The two batteries on the other side of the water, plaid vpon the bafe Court, and into the portall of the Dongeon at randon, vpon those that should issue forth, or offer themselves to defend the breach, the which did more amaze the besieged then any thing else, who being well furnished with artillery and other munition, spared not their shot, the which notwithstanding could not hinder the lodging of the Kings artillery. Whilest they planted the Cannon, the King went to view the passages of the mountaines, by the which the Duke of Sauoy might enter on this side. He was then at Thurin, and did not bouge, seeming carelesse of the ruine of his Estates: yet sometime some of his most trusty seruants would say: The King of France takes Townes in Sauoy, but patience: his Highnesse will take as many in France, and better. These words being reported, made the King suspect some bad designe, considering the aduertisement they had of three murderers, whereof one was come expressly out of Piedmont to murder the King: yet hee feared not them, but rather La Fin, who was very inward with the Marshall of Biron, and that they would seeke to effect the designes which they had plotted at Paris, when as the Duke of Sauoy was there, whereof the King had had some intelligence, but he could not beleue it. His Maiesty, who loued the Marshall of Biron well, wished him to dismisse La Fin, that his company was dangerous, and that in the end he would deceiue him. But the Marshall was no more capable of counsell: two great and violent passions, Ambition and Reuenge, had so disordered his iudgement, as hee was no more himselfe, the which grew vpon occasions which fell out in this war of Sauoy. The first was despight and ieaousie, to see all the authority of command, all the honour of enterprises, all the conduct of executions giuen to Des Dignieres, for that he knew the country, and the enemies forces better then any other. Hee was discontented for that hee was not at the siege of Montmelin, as he had bene at the siege of Amiens. The other was the refusal which the King made vnto him, to dispose of the Citadell of Bourg, when it should be taken, which refusal was grounded vpon great considerations. The first, that it was not reasonable to trust a place of that importance to him that was suspected to haue intelligence with his enemy. The second, that Governours of Prouinces which command in chiefe, ought not to haue the guard of places and fortresses. The third was, that the King meant to commit the place (as one of the Keies of his Realme towards Italy) to one that depended immediatly on his Maiesty. But we must ioyne this discourse to his proceesse, and to the discouery of his conspiracies, the which he thought to be very secret, for that they were not knowne nor divulged.

States in Italy.

All Italy being amazed to see the King at the foot of the Alpes, and the three fortresses which remained in Bresse and Sauoy, so straightly besieged, as they must needs fall into the power of the victorious French, said; That the Marquisate was the pretext, but Naples and Milan was the cause of the war. The Duke of Sessa, the King of Spaines Ambassador at Rome, represented vnto the Pope the infinite mines and desolations which would follow by the continuance of this war, & the victorious successe which the Turke had vpon the frontiers of Austria, being ready to make a great breach vpon the Christians, whilest the Princes which he feared most were at war, and the most warlike people of Europe killed one another. He therefore beseecheth him to send his Nephew vnto the King, to stay the course of his armes, and to resume the execution of the treaty of Paris. The Pope to whom the diuision of Christian Princes hath alwaies bene displeasing, desiring more then any of his predecessors to assure the publike quiet, grants this famous Ambassage of Cardinall Aldobrandino his Nephew, who young of age, but not of wisdom and iudgment, would not depart out of Rome before the Duke of Sessa had giuen him vnto the Pope, that he would cause the King of Spaine to approve, and the Duke to obserue whatsoever he would treat: with this assurance hee past to Milan, getting the like promise from the Count of Fuentes vnder his hand, being there ready with the King of Spaines forces to succour the Duke of Sauoy, to whom he said: That hee made this voyage for the onely respect of the King of Spaine, and if the Duke of Sauoy onely had bene interested, he would not haue absented himselfe so long

A long from the Consistory, he was not therefore resolu'd to proceed any further, if hee did not assure him to make the Duke obserue all that hee did treat, and to retire his forces if he made any difficulty. The Count who fought but to saue that which was on the other side of the Alpes, to serue as a rampier for Milan, promised him, So as a passage might be reserved for the Spaniards to goe into Flanders. It was a great wisdom in this young Cardinall not to treat of so important a businesse, but vpon good cautions. The Cardinall being thus assured, leaues his traine at Alexandria, and comes to Thurin, faining his intention to be, to finish his pilgrimage to our Lady at Mont Deuis, and to see him in passing. The Duke enters into complaint of the losse of his Estates, and sweares to seeke all meanes to haue his reuenge. The Legate seemes cold, he represents vnto him the necessity of Peace, and the good of Concord, and he lets him know that hee should desire to keepe his friends which are the true Scepters of Princes. He adds moreover, that he was sorry for the bad estate of his affaires, the which if he might repaire, he would willingly goe to Chambery. The Duke intreats him to take the paine, giues him a blanke, and assures him, that he will neuer haue any will nor resolution to contradict that which he should conclude in this negotiation: with this promise (and an assurance that he should not attempt any thing more then the succouring of Montmelin) hee passed the Alpes. And for that he feared the King in his great aduantage would not hearken to a peace, and much lesse grant any truce, and that this inequality would make all reasons vnequall: he would not aduise the Duke to send his Ambassadors vntill hee first knew the Kings minde. Hee therefore commands Hermínio his Secretary to aduertise him of his coming, and of the desire hee had to serue his Maiesty, not for the continuance of the war, but for a confirmation of a peace. The King vpon this aduise staies at Annesly, to giue audience to Hermínio, who was presented vnto him by the Patriarke, who said vnto him, That the Legate his Master was sent by the Pope to quench the fire of war. The King excused himselfe vpon the disaduantage he should receiue, and the preiudice it would bring to his affaires, in retiring when he should aduance, and to neglect the commodities and occasions which were offered vnto him in this enterprise. By the consideration of time and place. But he assured him that the Cardinall should be very welcome, for the respect of his Holinesse, for the particular of his person, and for the subiect of his Legation, although his enemies had giuen it out, That it was made in the Dukes fauour. That hee did a tribute all to piety, wisdom, and a fatherly care in his Holinesse, who should alwaies finde as much will in him to maintaine peace, as hee had bin grieued to come to arms, refusing neuer any treaty, so as it might be with honour and safety, being resolute, neuer to endure any iniury from the Duke of Sauoy, nor his adherents. Hermínio made some other propositions, the answer whereof the King referred vnto Chambery, whither the King appointed to come within foure or five daies: The King went from Annesly to Beaufort, to view the passage of the mountain, by the which the Duke might come: hee sent the Duke Biron to discouer that of our Lady of Gorge, and others altogether inaccessible, but onely for Beares and Camels. The King went vnto the mountain, as far as the pace of Cornet, where hee dined vnto a Rocke, to defend himselfe from snow; after he had viewed the passage which may serue the enemy, he parted from Beaufort, and took his lodging at Gilly neare to Constance, where he was enformed of the true estate of the besieged, who had no hope but in themselves, being impossible for the Duke of Sauoy to succour them. But what doth the Duke whilest the King rules in his Counties, and that Des Dignieres spoiles all the Vallies of Morienne and Tarentaise? Hee which had bene the Kings Agent with the Duke, hauing taken his leave, came to his Maiesty at Grenoble, telling him that the Duke talked of nothing but fighting, he answered, That he should finde him ready to shew him sport. The Spaniards, who would make him apprehend the voyage of Paris, said, That they might not break the body of their troops, nor diuide their forces appointed for the voyage of Piedmont. The Duke would haue sent three thousand Spaniards to defend the Valley of Tarentaise, but they would not march, not for feare, but by order of their Commander, which kept them backe. D'Albigni had much adoe to make them stay at the Fort of little Saint Bernard, on that side of the Valley of Aost, which if they had done, the Duke might haue attempted something in Prouence and Dauphiné to haue diuerred the Kings forces.

But it hath bin alwaies obserued, that such as haue trusted to the succors of Spain, haue tried to their griefe, that they desire rather to entertaine the disease, then to advance the cure. It is a militarie Maxime among them, to make one body of an army, but especially, not to doe any thing without direction, so as oftentimes great opportunities are lost in attending: for, if the Councells be far off, they come alwaies after the effects. The King having provided for the passages, returns to Montmelian, he sent word to the Earl of Brandis, That if he would forbear to thort that day, he would also cause his battery to cease. They told the King, that the Earle granted it as willingly, as if he had no resolution to refuse any thing to so great a Prince. The King was not ignorant of the estate of the besieged, for besides that at the taking of the towne, hee had taken Notes and Inventories of the munition that was in the Castle, there alwaies escaped some one out of the wall which brought newes, and described the place in as miserable an estate as they could, as well to excuse their flight, as to tell the truth. A Cannon shot from one of the Kings batteries pierced the wall within a foot of the Cause, whereas all the powder and munition of war did lye, the which had ended the battery, if it had gone a little further. The Earl of Brandis seeing that nothing came from without that might entertaine hope, and judging that nothing was lesse beleeving a Capraine then rashnesse, did not contemne the perswasions which necessity and the aduice of his friends gaue him to thinke of the souldiers health, seeing that of the place was desperate. The King summons him againe not to be obstinate: they found him so well disposed thereunto, as presently they did iudge whereunto things would tend. The Earl calls together the Captaines and Gentlemen that were with him, to determine of some wholsome expedient, not to offend the service of their Prince, nor to incense the power of a great King, and to provide for the common health of them all. If he were resolu'd to hold it out, he should not aske counsell but of such as were of the same resolution, being easie to iudge, that amazement will alwaies carry them to opinions contrary to duty, and that from a fearfull man you shall neuer draw good counsell. Euery thing is vnpleasant to a man that feares. Being therefore assembled, he spake vnto them after this manner: " My masters, when I consider that we hold this place for our Prince, to defend it for him with the price and perill of our liues; I doe not finde, that either feare of danger, or despaire of succours, or rigor of afflictions can discharge vs: But when I consider the state wherein we are, the extremities which presse vs, the great distance of our hopes, and the weaknesse of our force, I say, that in the end we must submit our wills to that which may bee, and that it should be an ouer-weening, to will that which is impossible. It is not the custome of a Gouverneur in a place besieged, to publish the wants he finds, for commonly a good shew couers defects, to the end that his waivering daunt not the courage of his souldiers. In like manner I haue concealed as much as I could the necessities which enuiron vs: but seeing you see them and feeble them no lesse then my selfe, iudge what the issue of this siege may be. I coniure you by the duty which binds you to his Highnes, by your Loyalties, honours, and consciences, you consider the choice of two things, wherof if it were possible, I would desire neither the one nor the other, which is; Either to endure all the attempts of the Kings Army, and to yeeld vpon our liues with the place; or to capitulate to yeeld it vpon the longest time we can obtaine. If we follow the first, we cannot auoid our owne ruines, nor the losse of the place: if necessity suffers vs to make vse of the second, we may giue his Highnesse leisure to doe his businesse, or to succour vs. Thinke not that any base apprehension of danger makes me to vse these words. I shall neuer in all my life finde a more glorious death. All that may be done out of this place to saue a mans life, I will doe it to finde death, and in euery thing else that shall be vnfortunate. I will euer remember, that it is not the duty of a Commander to haue care of his own safety, but of the preferuation of his souldiers.

" Take therefore this proposition as I giue it you, and expecting your resolution, I shew vnto your companions neither feare in your courages, nor despaire in your words, and in all your resolutions call your eyes, not so much vpon that which you desire, as vpon necessity, which must giue a law vnto your desires, remembering, that they pitie such as fall into accidents not fore-seene, and mocke at those which fall into apparent dangers.

This proposition was not applauded of them all: some representing, that there is no crime more horrible and detestable, then to yeeld vp a strong place, without extreme and

A and most apparant violence, remembreing, That his Highnesse had honoured them with the guard of the onely Bulwarke of his Estates: they should rather all die therein, then yeeld the place to the French King, and that the apparant danger might bee auoided by some favourable accident. Others of the contrary side maintained, That accidents were doubtfull, that it were better according to the time, to take an assured and easie party. That euery one knew that the most Christian King was well informed of the estate of that place: That they had suffered to the extremity. That they were battered with forty Cannons: That they had receiued many disgraces, and losse of men, burnt by fire which had taken their powder. That since two moneths they had receiued no newes from his Highnesse. B That they wanted all kind of victuall but corne, which with good husbandry could not last to the end of Nouember: That it were better to enter into composition, seeing the King offered it, and take a reasonable rearme to yeeld vp the place, whilst that his Highnesse should giue order to succour them, or to treat of a peace. The most resolute were shaken at these words, and in the end all concluded to make their peace in time, whereunto in the end they had beene forced. The Earle made an ad, the which was signed by all the Captaines and Officers of the Garison, by the which hee demanded a truce of the King for five daies; at the end whereof he did capitulate, to depart, he and his company with liues and goods, Ensignes displayed, Drums sounding, bullet in the mouth, Harquebuzee charged, their matches light, and furnished with what munition of warre they could eary, without search, if the Duke did not succour them within one moneth: the which was granted; and moreover, they had leaue to send a Capraine to the Duke to aduertise him thereof. The Cheualier Bricheras had the charge to carry these newes vnto the Duke, with letters containing this in substance: That hee and his had suffered and did suffer all that humane flesh could endure, besides an infinite number of disgraces, and losse of many men burnt euen by fire which fell among the powder. That the King being informed of the estate of this place, had summoned it three or four times by letters of his owne hands, to yeeld it vp vnto him, being come in person foure times into the towne of Montmelian to heare his answer, the which he had forborne vntill he had seene nine batteries planted about the Castle, consisting of forty Cannons.

The capitulation of the Castle of Montmelian.

The Earle of Brandis letters to the Duke of Sauiy.

D That his highnesse must consider he was besieged by a Royall army, in the which were three Generals, the Duke of Espernon, the Marshall of Biron, and Des Dignieres, with many Princes and Noblemen. That hauing receiued no newes from his Highnesse since his Letter of the fiftenth of Augult, he had lost all hope of succours, and had propounded vnto all the Captaines, to try if they could get a sufficient time to giue his Highnesse meanes either to succour them, or to treat of a peace.

That holding a delay of more aduantage then such a sudden losse, he had entred into Treaty, hauing demanded a much longer time then they had granted him, notwithstanding that all prouision of victualls wanted, except corne and Rice, the which with very good husbandry could not last till the end of Nouember.

E That he was much grieved to yeeld the place to any other then to him to whom it did belong, and if he could as well dispose of all them that were with him, as of himself, and of other chiefe Officers, to die when as the place should change his Master, he would rather take that resolution, then present himselfe before his Highnesse after so great a losse, in comparison whereof his owne fortunes and safety seemed nothing vnto him.

That if his Highnesse did not succour them within the moneth, the place was lost, the King hauing giuen it out, That he would not yeeld it againe, notwithstanding any peace.

The same day the Capitulation of Montmelian was made, the King sent the Secretary Herminio to goe and meet the Cardinal Aldebrandino his Master, with charge to assure him of his Maiesties willingness to peace, & of the desire he had to see him to open his heart, and to represent vnto him the iustice of his Armes, and to let him know that he had not vnder-taken them to trouble Italy or Christendom, as his enemies had maliciously giuen out, after that they had forced him to protract his marriage, and to take the way of Sauiy, the which was not greatly pleasing vnto him in this season, intreating him to take it in good part, if he did not answer to the particular propositions, propounded ded vnto him by Herminio vntill his arrival, assuring himselfe, that hee would come with sufficient power, to conclude a good accord, without any more trouble of doing it twice. But his Maiesty excused himself from any surceasing. It being vnreasonable to lye idly in an enemies Country, whereas the entertainment of his army cost him two thousand Crownes a moneth, and that he should attend the winter, and giue the enemy leysure to prepare himselfe. The Duke held this Treaty of Montmelian to be sudden and rash, some braue spirits about him imputed it to cowardlinesse, rather then to treason. He made answer by Bricheras, & assured the besieged to succor them, and presently after, he sent another letter in these termes: "Monfieur Brandis, for the execution of that which I haue signified vnto you, by the Cheualier Bricheras, behold, I am on horse-backe ready to passe the Alpes with 10 mighty an army, as if you will giue me some little time, more then is specified in the capitulation, you shall see the sport, and bind me, mine, and all Sauoy for euer, to acknowledge you for the most faithful, the most profitable, and the worthiest subiect in my Estates; you shall be noted throughout all Christendome, which now attends your resolution, and you shall free your selfe from the ignominy and reproch which you should incur by your Capitulation. Shew your selfe (I pray you) a Knight worthy of the house from whence you are defended, and of the loue I haue borne you: regard herein your honor chiefly, and the consequence which shall grow by your resolution, it is but for a few daies, if I come not by the time limited, and the Cardinall Aldobrandino, who is generally ther ward, effects not what he doth expect, you must not respect your hostages, it is not likely they shall miscary, and if the worst happen, they cannot import so much as the losse of that place. Write vnto me (if it be possible) in my hope from you, depends all that I am to doe with these goodly forces. If I were not assured to succor you speedily, I would not periwade you to breake the Capitulation. But this assurance makes me say vnto you, that you ought not to doubt, for these reasons and infinite others which you should lay before you. The Duke hath added in the end of his letter, these words with his own hand. I thinke that Bricheras is already come vnto you, shew mee now the proofe of so many promises which you haue made mee, and giue mee the time that I haue set downe, and you shall see the sport where you are.

The
speech vnto
King.

By this letter it seemed the Duke cared not much for the life of his Hostages: The Duke of Epsernon went by the Kings commandment and acquainted the Earle of Brandis with this Letter, who answered, You may say vnto his Maiesty, that I will keepe my word, in the assurance whereof I hold my life and honour. The King tooke a new assurance in writing, signed by him and the other Captaines, which had signed the Capitulation. Five daies after this confirmation, the Cardinall Aldobrandino past by Montmelian, the army standing in battell, where hee was saluted by the Kings artillery, and that of the Castle. The Duke of Epsernon met him first vpon the bridge of Montmelian, and then all the Princes and Noblemen encountered him vpon the way, and accompanied him to Chambery, whereas the King receiued him with great honour; who in his first audience at the Capuchins, said vnto him: "That he doubted not of the iustice of his armes, and of the aduantage which his valour had gotten him ouer the D. of Sauoy, but he held him for a Prince so full of affection to the good and quiet of Christendome, as he would neuer vse the fruits of his victory to the ruine of the peace and publik tranquillity, but would suffer the Popes earnest motion vnto him to desire peace, to be of more force then the persuasions of such as inuited him to continue this war: a war which was neither worthy the greatness of his courage, nor the fruits of his armes; for if it were made to enlarge his Empire, the Estate of Sauoy is a small thing, and if it were for the reuenge of some wrong, he should consider, that the reuenge which is not betwixt equal parties is alwaies vnjust, and hath no sparke of generosity in it. That war is vnertaine, and the end is not alwaies answerable to the beginning; and there was no Prince that for the most assured opinions of victory, was to be commended in refusing the conditions of an honourable peace. A peace which the Pope desired for the good of Christendome: for the consolation of those which trembled at the Turkes approaches: who feared that this diuision would engage France in the fore passed miseries. A peace which the D. of Sauoy desired, and for the which he promised to yeeld himselfe more tractable then euer he had bene. A peace which would bring forth means to succor the Christians affaires in Hungary, to roote the memory of the Turke out of the world, and free Europe from his fury. The King answered him, That hee had alwaies held it for a rule of conscience to content himselfe with his own, as well as not to suffer an vsurpation. But he could not hope for any reason from the D. of Sauoy but by arms, the which he was forced

A to vse to reuenge the vsurpation of his Marquifate, seeing neither the feeling of his owne conscience, nor the iudgement of his Holinesse, nor the assurance of his promises made at Paris, could moue him to doe that which he ought. That if his army did passe the Alpes, he should find good seruants in Piedmont, and that the soile was as fertile as cuer it was to plant the Flower-de-luce there, and make it flourish, but when he should haue gotten all that the Duke holds on this and the other side of the mountains, hee would alwaies leaue it in yeelding vp his Marquifate. The effect of this Ambassage was, that Hermio went to informe the Duke, that the Cardinall his master had disposed the King to a peace; the Duke receiued these news with ioy, and made choice of the Count d'Arconas, and the B. Siegnour d'Almes for this negotiation, commanding them to doe all the Legat should command touching the peace. The King notwithstanding sayd, that hee would not thinke of any peace vntill that Montmelian were yeilded. And that his Councell was not neerer him, the Constable and Chancellor being sent to Marfeilles to receive the Queene. And the Duke was not so much inclined to a peace, but he did his endeavour to succor Montmelian. The twelfth of Nouember he came to the valley of Aost, with ten thousand foot, foure thousand Hargebuziers on horse-backe, and eight hundred men at armes: hauing past the Mount Saint Bernard, hee lodged at Ema being himselfe in person.

The King commanded the Count Soissons to goe to Moutiers, where as Des Diquieres attended the enemy, and his Maiesty went from Chambery to Montmelian, to expect the yeelding vp of the place, the which was deliuered vp the sixteenth of Nouember according to the capitulation by the Count Brandis, with great store of artillery, bullets, and powder to shoot about 20000 Cannon shot: the Marquis of Rhosny, and Cregny (who was appointed Governor by the King) entred into it with 300 men. His Maiesty hauing giuen order for Montmelian, departed the next day (without entering into the Castle) to visit his army.

He had his thoughts turned to peace, not so much for his owne inclination, nor for the consideration of his affaires, as for the reuerence he bare vnto the Popes aduice: in his zeale to the publike good, and knowledge hee had of the disloyalty of his chiefe seruants. D But hee was sorry the Duke of Sauoy should take the paines to come so neare him and not see him, for hee lay still at Ema, at the foot of the Mount Saint Bernard, two leagues onely distant from Moutiers, whither hee had sent the Earle of Soissons and Des Diquieres. He came thither himselfe in person to view the feat of the Dukes lodging, and the countenance of his army, vnto a village called Vilette, and caused a skirmish to bee giuen to five hundred men which were there for the guard of a bridge which they must passe to goe to Ema, it was so faintly defended, as they thought they would stand vpon their aduantage, and not abandon the river which serued them as a trench and ditch. The King returned the same day to Moutiers, and went to lodge at Villars neere to the Towne of Beaufort, whereas the Dukes of Montpensier and Epsernon were lodged. Hee E commanded Nestran to goe and discouer the passage of Cornet, and to see if there were any means to enter that way into the enemies lodging, the which hee performed happily, for he charged and defeated a Corps-de-guard of Milanois, which the Duke had placed vpon the descent of the passage, and presented some prisoners vnto the King. Hereupon his Maiesty resolved to charge the enemy by two wayes at one instant, meaning to enter by the passage of Cornet, and commanding the Earle of Soissons to charge by that of Tarentaise: but there are accidents, though naturall and ordinarie, which cannot bee foreseene, and yet stay great executions: for the same night the Dukes army was so barricaded with Snow, as there was no means nor deuice possible to approach.

F The King stayed three dayes to see if the weather would alter, and make the passages accessible, but it fell out otherwise, for the Snow increased. Hee returned to Chambery, from whence he sent the Earle of Soissons to S. Katherine's Fort, with an intent to follow him speedily, hauing caused two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, to passe along the Marquifate of Saluces by the valley of Maire, vnder the conduct of Dauriac, who tooke the Fort of Affel by Petard.

His Maiesty comming to Chambery, the Cardinall Aldobrandino presented vnto him Arconas and d'Almes, the Dukes Deputies for the Peace, to whom he sayd, Tout Ma- for hath nothing but words, and I shew the effects: I sayd vnto you at Paris (speaking to Almes) that you were welcome, so I say now, but I meane not to treat, but with this Reuerend personage, speaking of the Legate. Two dayes after this, the King went to take horse (hauiing referred the Treaty of peace to the returne of his Chancelor and Councell from Marseilles) and went with the rest of his army to assure S. Katherines Fort, whither in the beginning he had sent the Lord of Sancy, to raise a Regiment of foot in the Country, to keepe in the Garison of the Fort, and afterwards Monsieur de Vitry with the Regiments of the Cheuallier of Montmorency, Carces and other troopes. Saint Katherines Fort is built vpon an high hill, which ouer-lookes all the Country: it consists of fise Bastions which are not walled, yet it is ditched and furnished with all things necessary: It lyes two Leagues from Geneva, defended by fixe hundred men, whereof two parts were Suiffes.

Some few dayes before the Kings arriall, one of the Capraignes of the besieged, went forth with his Maiesties leaue to the Duke of Nemours, who with the Kings good leaue was retired to his Houle of Annie, that he might be freed from this warre, and not hurt or preiudice his Cousin the Duke of Sauoy, the King sent presently one of his Guard to bring him to Leluisel, where he was lodged, a quarter of a League from the Fort: hauiing let him vnderstand the resolution of his designe, the greatnesse of his forces, and the small hope they should haue of the Duke: hee prevailed so, as soone after his returne to his Companions, they did capitulate to depart with their baggage and armes, their drums founding, and Ensignes displayed, carrying away with them a third part of the Artillery, if they were not succored within ten dayes. The King left the Count Soissons to attend the effect of this capitulation, & went to Lyons to meet the Queen, as we shall heereafter.

The Duke of Sauoy hauiing failed at Montmelian, gaue it out, that hee would succour Saint Katherines Fort. He had a goodly army, and those that were about him thought there were but too many to chafe the French out of Sauoy. Moreouer, hee thought to haue passage by Valais, either willingly or by force: hee had also good friends among the petty Cantons of the Suiffes, being distastful with the seruice of this Crowne, for that they were not payed what was due vnto them. De Fic the Kings Ambassador, made all their friendship fruitlesse, employing himselfe worthily against all his practises: he assisted in all their assemblies, hauing good words to content some, and patience to digest the in-diference of others, and courageous answers against the threats and braueries of the most difficult, yet he could not hinder the leauy of 4000 men, granted to the King of Spaine, by four or fise Cantons, for the defence of Milan, with charge not to enter vpon the Kings Dominions, vpon paine of death: but hee kept them from marching so soone as the enemy desired, which stay made them not only vnprofitable, but also hurtfull, by his great expences. The fixe dayes being expired, the Gouernor of S. Katherines Fort came forth with fixe hundred men, according to the Capitulation.

All the Capraignes of the duke of Sauoys places excused their yeelding vpon necessitie, to accuse their Prince of indifcretion, who had reason to complaine of their valours, for they might haue done better. The Count Soissons aduertised, after the yeelding of Saint Katherines Fort, that the Duke comming by the Tarentaise, aduanced with his whole army, to succor the besieged, he assembled his troopes, and resolved to meet and fight with him if hee durst hazard the day. But hee was sooner aduertised of his retreat, then of his marching. The Duke had layd at Paris, and to the Siegneur of Fossecausse at Turin, that who soeuer would make warre against him, hee would shew him sport for forty years space, but hee lost all Sauoy in lesse then forty dayes, and there remained nothing in Bresse but the Citadell of Bourg. The Baron of Lux had reduced them within it to despair of all succours and constancy, and although they had great aduantages ouer him, yet they got nothing but blowes in all their Sallics. They were more in number in the Citadell then in the Towne: There were no retrenchments to hinder their sallics, & yet Wit and Vigilancie prescribed a Law to force a number. There was a conuoy ready in the Franche Country, prepared to put into the Citadell: the entry was easie by a way which the Baron of Lux had discouered. They fought to corrupt him: but hee was so farr from giuing care vnto this Charme, as he fortified this place with a good and vigilant guard: so as hauing reioiced the enemies offers, hee hindered the execution of their designses.

Hee was aduertised that Vanlier making shew to retire himselfe into the Franche Country, and to lay downe Armes, for that hee would not oppose himselfe against the

A Neutralitie, had seized vpon a Castell neere vnto Bourg, called Vernay, where there was great force of victuals, and plenty of prouision appointed for the Citadell. Hee sent speedily thither, and hindered Vanlier for drawing any thing out of that lodging, but his person and traine. After the Marshall of Biron returne from the Kings army, the Baron of Lux went to giue an accompt of the siege, whereupon the King tooke the subiect of this letter which he sent vnto Bouvens, commanding at the Citadell of Bourg.

" Monsieur de Bouvens hauiing now more reason then euer, to hope for speedy Reduction of the place, I will let you vnderstand what esteeme I make of those which resemble you in Vertue and Valor, and testifie vnto you my bounty, by inuiting you to treat with me of a thing which in time cannot escape mee, whether the warre bee continued, or the peace be made. For if your Duke could not succor the Castell of Montmelian, to whom in the Capitulation I had giuen a moneths respite to doe it, how shall hee now free you from the extremity whereunto you are reduced, being to fight with Reason, the length and discommoditie of wayes, the aduantages which the occupation of Countries, and passages of Riuers haue giuen me ouer him with my army, which is as strong and as well led as his? And thus much concerning warre. In respect of Peace, with the brute thereof the said Duke doth comfort and entertaine them that serue him, it is not a worke that can be finished in few daies: It may be you shall come to the extremity of your victuals before it be any thing aduanced. I haue demanded reason of the sayd Duke for many pretensions well grounded, which the Crowne of France hath vpon his Countries, the which will not be soone enough ended to draw you out of paine. Moreouer, if I should bee contented to treat only for the Marquisate of Saluces, the said Duke offers already to leaue mee Bresse, with the place you hold for part of a recompence: So as it resteth only in mee to haue it either by warre or peace. Which being, you shall much better your condition, if you treat presently with me, and satisfie mee, for I will giue you occasion to commend my bounty.

You haue hitherto performed as much as a Gentleman of Resolution and Honour might doe, to defend that place, hauing in this duety exceeded all others in the like charge, that I haue assayed. No man is bound to doe things impossible. It is the necessity of victuals and other things which oppresse and presse you, and which prescribe you a Law, with the small apparence there is now to hope for any succours of what kinde soeuer.

Resolue then to doe that which you cannot auoide: You are aduised thereunto and inuitd by a Prince, which makes profession of Glory, and to loue and esteeme men of Honour. If you consider the priuate estate in which you are, and whereunto the publike affaires are reduced, you would not lose this opportunity to assure your reputation, your person, family, and goods, being certaine, that if you reiect it, you cannot auoide to make trayll of the rigours of Warre, which they deserue that attend the last extremity should reduce them to their enemies mercy and compassion. Let me then vnderstand your resolution by the returne of this Trumpet, whom I haue sent expressly herewith, and if you desire any further satisfaction of my intention concerning this Subiect, my Cousin the Duke of Biron will giue you content, being very well informed thereof, and on whom I doe greatly rely, &c.

This Letter was brought by a Trumpet vnto the Marshall of Biron, who sent it vnto Bouvens, and did accompany it with one of his owne, exhorting him to resolue according vnto necessitie, and not according vnto the affection which hee bare vnto his Prince, nor that which his courage did suggest: for Constancy must bee measured according vnto Reason; and it is rather Oblinacy and Wisfulness, when it resolues to things either impossible or vnreasonable. Bouvens answered not discreetly, but couragiously, so as hee seemed to bee grieved, the French did not know his courage and vndaunted valour.

So, when this place was put into my hand by the duke of Sauoy, my Lord and Master, I resolved to burie my selfe in it, and to performe the duty of an honest man. I grieue at nothing but that your Maiestie will not make trayll thereof by violence and force. Yet I hope to win as much glory in surmounting the necessities wherein your Maiefty thinks I am, as in resisting your attempts. And so I beseech you to beleene that I will alwayes remaine your Maiesties most humble, most loyall and faithfull seruant, &c.

He wrote in like manner to the Marshall of Biron, that hee held him to bee so great a A Souldier and making profession to loue men of worth, as he would allow of his Resolution, which was to keepe the place for him that had giuen it him in guard, vnto his last gasp, holding it the greatest honor that could happen vnto him, to giue a testimonie vnto his Prince of that whereunto he was borne. His constancie was recommended by the King, recompensed by the Duke, and propounded for an example to others.

But the Duke exhorted them by Letters to hold it good vntill the Treaty of Peace, whereof he assured them: the which was the onely meanes (as wee shall shew) to free the besieged from the necessity whereunto they were reduced, and without the which they must needs haue false vnder his Maiesties subiection. Behold, all which passed of B greatest import in the conquest of Sauoy and Bresse by the most Christian King.
But this warre did not hinder him from thinking of his marriage; hee had bene contracted at Florence the five and twentieth day of August, Monsieur de Bellegarde, Master of the Kings horse, carried the procurement to the great Duke of Tuscany. The Duke of Mantua came to Florence the second of October, and the next day arrived the Ambassadour of Venice. The Pope would gladly haue had the Queene receiue this blessing of her marriage at his hands, and to haue done the like honour, as hee did to the Queene of Spain at Ferrara, the which for certain reasons could not be effected, and therefore hee sent the Cardinall Aldobrandino, his Holinesse Legate and Nephew, in whose hands the words of present Marriage were made.

The fourth of October, the Cardinall Aldobrandino entred into Florence with great pompe and magnificence, riding vnder a Canopie, and the Duke on his left hand, and so was conducted to the Dukes Palace. After Supper, in the presence of the great Duke of Tuscany, the Dukes of Mantua and Bracciano, the Princes Iohn and Anthony of Medici-cis, together with the Lord of Belle-garde the Kings Ambassadour, hee delivered vnto the Queene the contentment which the Pope had of this Marriage, with a sweet kinde of Grauine and Modestie: and a Discourse full of pleasing words: hee conceived great hopes of great good to come, by the meanes of this happy coniunction, not onely for the houses of the Kings of France and the Dukes of Tuscany, but also for all Christendome: D and not onely for Christian Kingdomes, but for all the whole world: so as the Queene moved with ioy and great hope, thanked his Holinesse for this salutation, and sayd: I haue God hauing so decreed it, shee assured her selfe, that the blessing of the holy Father would bring the grace of God with it, whereof she would endeavour to make herselfe worthy and capable, recommending herselfe most humbly to the prayers of his Holinesse, and of the Church. Which words were delivered after so Maiesticall a manner, as if the Princeesse had vsed alwaies to command absolutely: and so that day was spent. The 5 of October the marriage was celebrated after a Royall manner, the Legat said Masse, the which being ended the great Duke had a sonne christened, the Signeury of Venice giuing it the name. The Queene parted from Florence the 16 of October, and came to Luouine the 17, where she imbarked in the great Dukes generall Gallie, being assisted by five of the Popes Gallies, five of Malta, and fixe more of the said Dukes. The King hauing intelligence of her imbarking, provided for her reception at Marseilles, and gaue the charge of his Will to the Duke of Guise, his Maisties Lieutenant generall in Prouence: he also sent his Constable & Chancelor with the Dukes of Nemors, Guise, and Ventador to receiue her. The Cardinals of Ioycuze, Gondy, Guiry, and Sourdy, with many Bishops and Noblemen of the Council.
The nauigation was dangerous in many places, and tearfull straights betwixt Genoua and Marseilles: yet with a resolute and cheerful countenance she seemed to scorne the tempests of the sea. The 3 of November sheooke port at Marseilles, being accompanied by the great Duchesse of Florence, the Duchesse of Mantua her sister, D. Anthony her brother, and the Duke of Bracciano. At their coming to land, there was a great questi- F on who should haue the right hand: The Knights of Malta would fight for it with five Gallies, against the Florentines who had seuen. Without it they had the ranke which they desired, and with their valour had maintained since they were planted at Rhodes, there were no prayers nor coniurings could make them quite it, no nor for a moment.
The great Prior of Champagne undertooke the answer, and said: A head strikes off can never be fit on, and that their Generall brought his owne in danger, if he allowed any precedence for a lesse time.

A The Queene leauing her Galley, entred vpon a Theater made of two great boats:
whereunto ioyned a bridge, which went vnto her Palace. The Constable receiued her;
the Chancelor deliuered the Kings pleasure, foure Consuls of Marseilles presented her the keyes of the City, and a Canopy of cloth of siluer, vnder which shee was conducted to the Palace. One of the most remarkable actions during her abode there, was the protestation of obedience, which was made vnto her by the Court Parliament of Prouence, in the great Hall of the Palace, Monsieur de Vair making a most eloquent Oration.

Du Vair Oration to the Queene.

Madam, seeing your Maiesty to arise in this Prouince, and with you the felicity of France, we haue abandoned the seat of Iustice, where we haue the honour to sit, to come and prostrate our selues at your feet, to yeeld you the noblest and most worthy Homages B which are due vnto the Crowne that doth now enuiron your head, and withall to pronounce our selues bound for all the vowes which wee haue at any tyme made for the good of this Estate. For assuredly we beleue that this day we are heard, and thinke that so many wonders, which God hath wrought for the restoring of this Realme, are fully accomplished, and that our good fortunes which seemed to be waivering, are now settled vpon a time and irremovable foundation.

God hath giuen vs a King excellent in vertue, admirable in bounty, and incomparable in valour, who by his labours hath giuen vs quiet; by his perils safetie; and by his victories, glorie: So as in a manner wee termed our selues happie, if this mournfull thought had not often troubled the course of our ioy: This care I say, which represented vnto vs, that Nature hath limited the life of all men, that Solitarinesse and Liberty made our Princes life lesse pleasing, and did diminish his care to cherish and gouerne it.
For the which our wishes did euery day seeke remedy, and knew not where to hope for them, vntill that the beames of your Royall countenance had pierced through the clouds of our cares, and lightened our eyes with a liuely hope, to see our happinesse as durable as it is admirable.

The
reuerencie.

For seeing in you so many graces wherewith Nature hath endowed you, admiring that rare beauty wherewith shee hath adorned you, considering that naturall sweetnesse wherewith shee hath tempered your Royall grauitie, and hearing with our cares the voyce renowned by Fame, which proclaimeth the quicknesse of your spirit, the soundnesse of your Iudgment, the Elegancie of your discourse, and that which doth exceed all the incomparable commendation of you holy and religious disposition: C Wee persuade our selues that you are shee whom the Heauens had appointed by you pleasing company, to mollifie the life of our King, to prolong his dayes by his content, and to make his Raigne perpetual by the continuance of a great and happie posteritie.

Wee beleuee, that you onely are shee vpon earth, worthy to make the life of the most triumphant King vpon earth, to rest in your chaste bosome; and that hee about all others, did merit to embrace the most vertuous and pleasing Princeesse in his victorious armes.

Whereby we preface, that wee shall soone see a number of goodly Children carying on their Fore-heads their fathers Valour, their mother Vertue, the greatnesse and nobilitie of the House of France, whereunto you are allyed, the happinesse and power of that of Austria, from whence you are issued, and the wisdom of that of Florence in the which you were borne.

To the beleefe of this preface, all things seeme to inuite vs: but chiefly the Heauen and Sea, for that wee see plainly at the very arriual of your Maiesty, the Sea full of torments is growne calme, and the Heauen ouercast with Clouds is cleare, as if they would with a pleasing Skie celebrate with vs the magnificence of your happie reception.

In good time then, O great Queene, are you come vnto our coasts, long may you liue happily in France, and for France: That the age which wee begyn may see you in the end a happy Wife to our King: And future ages may terme you a happy Mother of Kings. But to heape vpon the measure of your glorie, remember and remember againe, that as you are a great Queene, for that you are married to a great King, euen so you become a charitable mother of children, whose true Father he is.

And therefore begin to take your share of this Royall care, and seeing that the Subiects

riches happinesse is the true glory of Princes, foster and increase by your ayde and fauour, A the loue and affection which this great King doth naturally beare to the good and ease of his people, to the end they may feel you as a new Star shining ouer them, carrying them a happy and auspicious influence of all good and plentifull prosperitie.

And we which seeke no other happinesse in this world but in his seruice, nor honour but in his obedience, and seeing you aduanced with him in his Throne, we congregate vnto you all the remainder of our liues, as we doe presently our hearts and affections to re-maine for ever your most humble, most faithfull, and most obedient seruants.

This discourse was pleasing vnto the Queene, who by her attention and answer did witness how much she was pleased therewith. The Princes and Princesses did commend it, and learned men did admire it.

He made the like at Aix, whither the Queene went the seuenteenth of Nouember, from whence she parted the next day with about two thousand horse, and made her entry on the nineteenth into Auignon, where she was received with greater pompe and magnificence then in any other place: She stayed but three dayes at Auignon, and passed to Valence, Rouffillon, and Vienné, and came on the Saturday, being the second of December, to Guilloiere.

The next day approaching neere vnto Lyons, shee was met by Monsieur de la Guiche the Governour, with the Nobility of the Towne and Countrey, who hauing done their obedience in the open field, went to horse backe and conducted her to her lodging. C
There Roguelaine brought her newes of the King, and presented her in his Maiesties company with the great Royall Collar of inestimable value, which did beautifie her other ornaments: The next day after, she entered into the Towne. They had erected a Theater at La Motte covered with rich Tapistrie, in the midst whereof was a throne for the Queene, where she received the honors, and heard the vowes and prayers of all the Orders of the Towne. The Chancelor was in this action the townes Interpreter, the which is as much honoured by his birth, as Athens was by the Phocians, and Rome by the Catoes. The Clergie spake standing, all the rest kneeled, except those which spake for the Germanes, Imperiall Townes, Swisses, and Grisons. The Chancelor willed them to doe as the rest, and telling them that in this action, Strangers had no priuiledge, and that they should do as the Princes subiects did, vnder whose lawes they liued. They gaue him to vnderstand, that they were in possession to speak standing: that at the entry of King Henry the second, they were no otherwise presented, and that the like difficultie hapning at the entry of the King now reigning in the same Towne, his Maiesty took it not ill they should stand vp upon their knees. The Constable, who thought that an action of that consequence, should not lightly be passed ouer, nor the truth carelessly and irrespectively examined, as it hapned often in like accidents, hee would bee informed, if at other entries the Swisses and Germanes had beene presented vnto the King in other manner and fashion then the French. The Governour of Lyons reported the truth, wherewith they were satisfied and contented.

The whole Body of the Towne protested their obedience and affection at the Queens feet. Antibac of Villards President of Lyons won much honor, for the grace, grauity, and eloquence of his Oration. He spake for the Court of Iustice in this manner.

"Madam, the wonders which God would haue the world see in the birth and progress of the life and actions of our King, haue beene the effects of his diuine Iustice, to preferre vnto our Soueraigne Prince the lawfull inheritance of Saint Lewis: but that which we now behold with admiration of this great Alliance, is an assured and infallible testimonie of his diuine bounty, and of that which he hath decreed for the good of the whole Realme. Time by his accustomed inconstancy, did threaten our happinesse with a great fall, wee did not enioy our quiet, but with feare to lose it: Our prosperities were but Leues, and our Peace as a Flower. The wofull and lamentable History of our fore-passed disorders and tumults, did set before our eyes a fearful image of future miseries: Our goodly dayes were troubled with nights of care, which a violent imagination presented vnto vs. It was the will of God, that for a full reuolution of the happinesse of France, shee should haue a second recourse to the most famous Race of the Medici, to make our Flower-de-luce not only flourishing, but fruitfull & abounding in Royall issue, the sole and true Support of an Estate, Doulphins are prelates of a storme at Sea,

A but a Royall Daulphine shall be to vs a pawne of the eternitie of our health, and of the assurance and happy confirmation of our quiet. It is the holiest of our good Kings desire, it is the worthy subiect of all good and faithfull-hearted French-mens vowes. Your Maiestie hath beene referred by Heauen, to continue the sacred Stemme of our Kings, and to make their succession equall to the continuance of the world. Nature hath infused into your Maiestie all her greatest and richest gifts, to make you the ornament of France, which is the ornament of Europe. Yong Eagles are exposed to the Sunne-beames, to try their naturall generositie, and your Maiestie being issued from the Eagle by the mothers side, hath onely been found capable to gaze vpon the Sunne, who with the beames of his Royall vertues, doth not onely lighten France, but all the world. All other eyes haue been dazzled with the aspect of so great a light, onely yours will endure this shining and by a sweeter reflection, the shadow of your Royall countenance, will raise our hopes to the highest heauen of felicitie, and shall make vs see in our dayes the most firme assurance of our peace and quiet. Recciue, Madame, if you please, the homage which wee yeeld vnto your Maiestie, to whom we offer our hearts as pleasing sacrifices of our most humble obedience.

She stayed eight daies at Lyons before she could see the King, demanding ever when he would come, and in this expectation the houres seemes yeares vnto her. The King after the capitulation of S. Katherines fort, tooke post and came the 9 of December to Lions.

C The Chancelor aduertised her that he would come that day. Being at supper a Gentleman came to tell her, that the King was within a quarter of a league of the city, and that within lesse then an houre she should see him. The ioy of this good newes had taken away her appetite to any meat. The King was already entred disguised, and was gotten into the press among certaine Gentlemen, where he might see and not be scene. After supper the retired into her chamber, and the King entred presently after: the Queene cast her selfe at his Maiesties feet, and he tooke her vp and embraced her, where after many kinde imbraces of mutuall loue and respect, the King went to supper. During the which, the King sent the Queene word by the Duchesse of Nemours, that he was come without a bed, hoping that shee would afford him part of hers, which should be common vnto them from

D that time: To whom the Queene answered, That she was come to please and obey his Maiesties will, as his most humble seruant. This being deliuered vnto the King, hee vnclouthed himselfe and entred into the Queens chamber, whom he found in bed, and then the Ladies retired. The Cardinall Aldobrandino, the Popes Legate, being at Chambery, the King sent to inuite him to his mariage, and to come to Lions, with the Duke of Sauoy Deputies, where they should treat more commodiously then at Chambery. He made his entry the 16 of the moneth, where hee was received with honours fit for so great a dignity: the Prince Conty and the Duke Montpensier conducted him, going vnder a canopie caried by the Burgesies of the townes, the streets were hang'd, the Inhabitants were in armes, and the Clergy went singing before him: and in this fort he was conducted to Saint E Johns Church. And although the mariage were perfect (the King hauing ratified it by procuration, and by words of the present which the said Legate had received, so as there needed no other solemnity) yet would he make his subiects partakers of this publike ioy, appointing the Ceremony the Sunday following, the which was celebrated before the Great Altar of S. Johns Church, whereas the nuptial blessing was giuen by the Legate to the married couple. After the which a Largeesse of pieces of gold and silver, marked with a speciall device were cast vnto the people. All which performed, they went to the Royall feast in the Archbishops Great Hall.

We haue said, that in the end of the last yeare, the Cardinall Aldobrandino, Legate to his Holinesse, made his entry into Lions to treat a Peace betwixt the King and the Duke F of Sauoy: Presently after the Ceremony and Confirmation of the Nuptial blessing of their Maiesties, they began the Treaty of this Peace: the Proposition had bene made at Chambery, but the conclusion was referred and ended at Lions. The King had made choise among all his Councell of the President Sillery and Lamin, to deliuer his intentions vnto the Legate, who acquainted Arconas and Aymes therewith. First the Dukes Deputies demand peace of the King, in yielding vp vnto him the Marquissate of Saluzzes.
The King answered, I haue beene at warre, but he had neuer refused peace to them, that had demanded it: that seeing the Duke desired Peace, and his Holinesse perswaded him to it, for the quiet of Christendome, that he was content to grant it, so as the Duke did yeeld him his Marquisate, and pay him eight hundred thousand crowns which he had disbursed for the wars of Sauey. The Legate found well by this demand that the peace was not so easie to be made as hee expected: he spake vnto the King and told him; That the Duke could not yeeld the Marquisate, and so great a summe of money, but he would giue him all Bresse in exchange: and for all the charges and other his Maiesties pretensions, he would giue him moreouer Baugcy, Verromey and other Lands vnto the riuier of Rhosie. This Proposition was accepted by the Kings Deputies, so as they yeelded vp the Castles of Centall, Mont and Roque-palmier, which did not belong to the Marquisate, but to the Prouinces of Dauphine and Prouence. The Deputies said, that what they offered was for all pretensions: to whom they answered; That no thing could then be concluded.

These things were so wisely handled by the Kings Deputies, as the Dukes Deputies offered besides a part of the Baylywicke of Gex, a hundred thousand Crownes, so as the King did yeeld vp what he held in Sauey, especially the Castle of Montmelian and Saint Katherines fort, in the same Estate they were.

Saint Katherines
fort ruined by the Geneuans.

As they were vpon these termes, newes comes, that they of Geneua had ruined S. Katherines fort, and that with such animosity and diligence, as within two dayes after you could scarce discern the forme of it, for this fort was built but of earth. The Legate was wonderfully discontented thereat, and complained, saying, That he would returne to Rome, without doing any thing, seeing they kept not their word with him, that he reuoked his, repunting this demolition as an affront done vnto him. The Kings Deputies answered him, That the King had no need of a Peace with the Duke, but for that his Holinesse perswaded him therunto: that it was a small cause to breake the Treaty of Peace seeing it was but a piece of earth: that the foundation should remaine vnto the Duke, the which he might repaire when he pleased. The King tooke the Legats words for a renewing of the warre, and gaue leaue to his armie to do all acts of Hostilitie, charging the Commanders to stand vpon their guard, to defend and offend, as occasions and meanes should be presented. Whereupon all depayinging of peace, made new enterprises; judging, that the King would not rest, hauing so great advantages, they talked of nothing but of scouring of Armes, preparing of horses, seeking of money, and to make them ready for a new warre.

The Kings answer to the Ambassadors of Spaine.

Taxis the King of Spaines Ambassador came vnto the King, to let him vnderstand, that if a Peace were not concluded, his Master should be forced to enter into this warre, to preserve his Nephews Estate. To whom the King answered, That he would live in peace with them that loved peace; but whosoever should seeke to support the Duke in this vniust warre, hee would make them repent it. That hee would make warre like a Lion against them that played the Foxes with him, and would strike them, that should make but shew to threaten him.

The Dukes Deputies (thinking that the Kings victory was neither absolute, nor perfect, so long as Bourg held good) did little temporize, nor caring to presse the conclusion of this Peace, no further then the extremity of this place did presse them, and in the meane time the Duke should haue leisure to attempt something vpon his owne or vpon that which was the Kings. And in truth if Bourg had bene relieved, or the conuoy which was in the Franche County had entred, the Peace had bene broken. Besides the wants and impatience of the besieged, they without vfed policy which made them almost desperate: some men chosen for the purpose gaue them to vnderstand, that the Dukes Deputies did prolong things, vpon assurance that the Citadell might hold good a moneth, and that they cared not to finish the Treaty, nor to supply the necessities of the besieged, so as this temporizing, at what price and perill so euer, might giue the Duke time to doe his businesse. This did pierce so deeply and wrought such an impression in the besieged, as (despighted with the tediousnesse of the Treaty, and wearied with the languishing of the besieged) they resolved not to suffer any more, seeing the Deputies did not consider what they suffered, but how much and how long they might suffer. Vpon this vaine terror they write vnto the Deputies in these termes, "My Lords, your protractiōs and delays kill vs, the temporizing of your Treaty, is preiudiciall to the honor of our Master, and the health of his seruants that are in this place: make hast then to finish the Peace, for wee cannot hold about two dayes: it is the prefixed time of our resistance. This Letter with the fearfull report of the horrors and inhumanities which extreme famine caused in the Citadell of Bourg; awaked the Ambassadors from the slumber, which the ruining of S. Katherines fort had held them in.

Vpon these newes they goe vnto the Cardinal, they beseech him, that the ruine of one place (whose foundation remained to the Duke) might not hinder the perfecting of this great building of peace, the which notwithstanding could not be but necessary, and profitable. The Cardinal who knew that the Duke was much discontented with this demolition, and that the Count Fuentes army was much increased, and their minds more inclined to warre then peace, and yet being loth to repasse the Alpes, without the glory to haue quenched this fire, he said vnto the Ambassadors, that he could not re-enter into the treatie of peace, if they did not giue it him in writing vnder their hands, that it was their aduice, and that they intreated him to doe it, as profitable for the Duke, and necessarie for his Estate. The Ambassadors being too much amazed with the newes of the extreme wants of the Citadell of Bourg, fearing it would be lost before the peace was concluded, the which would impair the bargain, they willingly past this promise.

renewed.

The Cardinal was still in choller that the demolition of Saint Katherines fort, should send him backe to Rome, and not carie the Pope that contentment of his Legation which he expected. The King would gladly, the Pope should haue remained satisfied with the sinceritie of his actions, but neither his honour nor his humour would suffer him to intreat. He therefore thinke it dishonorable to perswade him to peace that hath more need of it then himselfe. Hee is therefore resolute to warre; and seeing that the Legate continued still in his complaints, hee commanded the Marquis of Rhosny to goe to Paris to take order for munitions of warre. Being ready to take horse for the execution of the Kings commandement, hee goes to take his leaue of the Legate, and toucheth some things of the cause of his voyage, saying, "That it was the Kings resolution to make warre, seeing they could not hold themselves to a peace. That for his part hee was forric, that so great a personage as himselfe should take the paines to passe the mountains
D and bring them so neere vnto the Temple of peace, and not to enter into it: the Legate answered, That he was much grieved that his Legation and the paine hee had taken proued fruitlesse: that he knew well the King in shew desired peace, but in effect warre was his delight."

Rhosny replied, that if peace were good before the demolition of the fort, it was now also good, that this accident did nothing import, seeing the ground was the Dukes, to doe withall what he pleased, and that for fifty thousand crownes he might build an other fort.
The Dukes Ambassadors gaue the same reasons, coniuering him not to abandon the ship in this tempest, seeing he had taken the helme in hand in a calme season. Hereupon the Le-gate asked Rhosny if he thought the King would be pleased to recompence this demolition with money. Rhosny answered him, that he knew nothing, but being a thing reasonable, and the King a Prince of reason, he presumed that if hee should promise it in his Maiesties name, he would not faile of his promise. The Legate intreated him to acquaint him with it, saying that he was forie he had dealt no sooner in the businesse. Rhosny tels the King thereof, and returns his Maiesties intencion vnto the Legate, and so with a little moderation they finish this worke of peace. The Articles were drawne and agreed vpon; and the Ambassadors of Sauey sent for to signe them, they come and tell the Legate in his eare that their Master had forbidden them to signe, before that he had talked with the

and tongues were bound. The Legate doth presse them, & they intreat him to giue them bee countenanced by his counsell. They repaire vnto the Oracle, they consult of two continue on the other side of the Alpes, and that there might bee a passage on this side to A goe into Flanders; who weighed the conditions of peace, not by the difficulties of reasons, but by the prosperity of euents; not by the pieces, but by the whole, wherein hee findes what his Master desired; and twereth this: That seeing his Highnesse hath commanded you to signe the peace foure dayes since, I see nothing happened since, that may bee sufficient or available to reuoke this commandement, nor the word which hee had giuen you to effect it. It is true that I thinke by this last Letter, you are bound to stay the time which he demands to conferre with the Count Fuentes.

Hereupon arrived the Patriarke of Constantinople, great in perswasions, found in reasons, profound in Councell, & subtil in inuentions. He sheweth them the importance of B this breach, the wrong done vnto the King, and the Legats word ingaged. That the Duke writing this Letter had not considered that the first was effected, that the Estate of the businesse allowed no countermand, that that which was yesterday voluntarie, is this day fastened with nayles of Diamonds to an ineuitable necessitie: That the wings of the dukes hopes were glued with the wax of his opinions; that irresolution the mother of great inconueniences, which had begonne his ruine, would finish it: That God was offended with them who reiected and contemned the conditions of Peace that were iust and honorable: That it was a great indiscretion to ingage himselfe in the perpetuall inconueniences of this warre, vpon foundations that were neither firme nor perpetuall, and to continue a great warre against a mighty enemy, vpon succours which could not be certaine, seeing C it depended vpon the will of another: That a Prince assailed by one more mighty, cannot erre more grossly in his cariage, nor commit a greater fault then to refuse peace, which cannot be but honourable, seeing it stayes the Conquerors victory.

The Dukes Ambassadors who feared more to erre by disobedience, then by obstinacy, stand firme vpon the necessity of the Dukes command: for the order which a Prince D prescribeth to his Ambassador may not be altered. The Patriarke assures them that the Legat, who had authoritie from their Master to command them, and they bound to obey him in all that he should iudge profitable for his affaires, should warrant them vnder his hand from all blame which they apprehended; that he would take the paines to goe vnto his Highnesse to Thurin, to let him vnderstand that they had done nothing but what hee should haue done himselfe, and that he would employ all the power his vnclie had, both in heauen, and in earth, to free them from danger. The Ambassadors (who seemed not to will that which they most desired, with such impatience, as the houres seemed yeares vnto them) were content with this assurance signed by the Legat, and a moneths respit for the Duke to ratifie what they had signed.

So the Peace was concluded and proclaimed at Lions the seuenteenth day of January, in the year 1601, the substance whereof was: That the Duke should yeeld vp and transport wholly vnto the King, and to his successors Kings of France, all the country and Seigneuries of Bresse, Beaugency and Veromey, and generally all that belongs vnto him, vnto the riuier of Rhosne, so as all the riuier from Geneva should belong to the Crowne E of France, the which should remaine vnto the King and his successors with all the Soueraignty, iurisdiction and rights which the said Duke might haue ouer the said countries, reseruing nothing but the bridge of Gressin for the commoditie of the passage: the which is vpon the riuier of Rhosne, betwixt Elcluse and the bridge of Arlay, which by this present Treaty belongs vnto the King: and on the other side of the riuier of Rhosne, the duke should enioy the parishes of Ella, Luyuent, & Cizerre with all the Hamlets and Territories which belong vnto them, betwixt the riuier of Varenne, and the mountaine called the Grand Credo, vnto the Village called La Riuiere, whereas the riuier of Varenne doth passe, with Maiercombe, vnto the neereft entry into the County of Bourgongne, vpon condition that the Duke should not leauy any impositions vpon the goods and Merchandise, nor any toll vpon the riuier at Pont de Gressin, or any other places before mentioned. Moreover, the Duke might not build any fort vpon any place that was reserued for the passage, but should remaine free as well for the Kings subiects, as for all that would goe or come into France; and the soldiery which shall passe through the Kings country, for the Dukes seruice, or any other Prince, by the sufferance of his Gouvernours Lieutenants generall, shal no way annoy his Maiesties subiects. And for the effecting of that about-mentioned, the Duke should deliuer vnto the King (or to any one deputed by him) the

A the Citadell of Bourg, as it then was, without any demolition, and all the Artillery, Powder, Bullets and munition of warre, which shall bee in the place at the yeelding thereof. Moreover, the Duke did passe ouer vnto the King, on the other side of the Riuier of Rhosne, the places and villages of Aux, Chouly, Vuley, Pont D' Arley, Cessell, Chancy and Piere Chastel, with all the soueraignty and iurisdiction hee might haue ouer those places, and the Inhabitants thereof. The said Duke did also transport and resigne vnto the King, the Barony and Baylywick of Getz, with all the appurtenances, as the Duke and his Predecessors had formerly enioyed it, without any retention. All which places and things yeelded and resigned, should remaine vnted and incorporated to the Crowne of France, B and should be reputed the patrimony of the Crowne, and might not be separated for any cause whatsoever. Also it was agreed that the said Duke should truly and effectually restore vnto the King, or to any one deputed by his Maiesty, the place, towne and Chastelleny of Castle Daulphin, with the Tower of Pont, and all that had been held by the Duke, or any of his, depending of Daulphine, in the same estate they then were in, without any demolition or ruine, leauing in the said places, all the Artillery, Powder, Bullets and munition of warre which were then in the said places, the souldiers carrying away such goods as belonged vnto them, without exacting any thing of the Inhabitants. It was also agreed that the said Duke should demante the fort of Beche Daulphin, the which was built during warre, and should pay for the passage reserued, a hundred thousand crownes in the cite of C Lions, fifty thousand ready downe, when as the fort of Charbonnieres should be yeilded vp, and other fifty thousand within six moneths after.

And in regard of the said cession and resignation, the King should be contented (for the good of peace) to quit and resigne vnto the Duke, his heires and successors, all the rights and pretensions which he or the Daulphins of France had, or might haue to the Marquisate of Saluces, and all the dependances, with the townes of Cental, Mons and Roquesperuier, without retaining any thing: leauing vnto the Duke all the Artillery, Powder, Bullets and munition for warre, which were in the said places, in the year 1598. The King did also promise to restore vnto the Duke (or to any one that should be deputed by him) all places that had beene taken since the year of our Lord 1588 from the said Duke, and D now held by his Maiesty or his seruants, all in the same estate they then were, and without any demolition; and in restoring of the said places, the King might transport all the Artillery, Powder, Bullets and munition of warre that was in them, and all the goods that belonged vnto the souldiers, not exacting any thing of the Inhabitants.

These were the chiefe points of the Treaty of Peace, the which was signed by the Legat and the Duke, and thanks giuen vnto God. The King holding his abode at Lions (after this conclusion) to be vnprofitable, takes post and goes to Paris. The Legate goes to Aignion by the Riuier of Rhosne. The King left the Constable, Villeroi and the Deputies at Lions for performance of the Treaty. At the same time Herminio was dispatch to carie newes vnto the Pope, and in passing to the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count Fuentes, E he found them both at Some vpon Po to consult of the meanes which the Duke of Biron propounded vnto them, to resolute vpon warre rather then peace. The Duke receiues it as the most ruinous effect of all his aduentures, swearing that hee would cut off his Ambassadors heads that had signed it.

The Count Fuentes said that he had not to doe with this peace, hauing so many iust occasions and such good meanes to make warre, that hee would not let forty thousand men, and forty peeces of Cannon remaine idle. Both seemed discontented, the one for that the King, or the King of Spaine had all the benefit of the peace, and the other for that his master should haue neede of him by the warre, and hee should keepe Piedmont in awe.

The Duke complained that the Councell of Spaine had kindled a warre to consume F him, they had thrust him into a storme, to make profit of his shipwracke, and had drawne him to a preiudiciall exchange, reaping no benefit, for that the French were out of Italy, hauing them nearer neighbours in another place, nor that Milan should be conered, or that Italy should haue the Alpes to guard it from the inundations which it had receiued in former times by the forces of France, seeing this rampart was made with the weakening of his Estates.

The Count of Fuentes fore-seeing wherunto these complaints did tend, gaue the Duke to vnderstand, That the King of Spaine his Master, had reason to complaine of this great great and fruitlesse charge, being a troublesome thing to entertaine great forces to no effect: that this mighty and fearefull army was not raised nor entertained, but to restore him to his Estate: that the fault was in himselfe, if it were not employed: and withall, he added the mutinies and murmuring of the Spaniards, who complained, that they deprived them of the fruits of a victory which they did limit with no lesse then the taking of Lions. In this contention they resolute, not to signe any thing without the King of Spaines commandement, and to keepe the armie still ready to march, to make himselfe to be more feared, and to be more assured. The Kings Deputies being advertised that the Duke made no care to confirme what had been concluded, they advertised the King thereof, and sent a post vnto the Legat, being at Aignon, to know his opinion thereof. The King commands them to attend the Dukes resolution, without impatience, being indifferent vnto him which he made choise of, but he should shew a weakie iudgement, if hee should accept of any but of peace: for that he should not of a long time recour that by warre, which peace should now presently bring him.

The Legate advertised that the Duke refused to signe the peace.

The Legate was so moued with this alarum, as he presently tooke post to goe vnto the Duke, sending Count Othouis Tazzoni to the King, to advertise him of his voyage; and to beseech him not to enter into any distrust of the Treaty, being so greatly interested in the obseruation thereof, as he could no longer endure this brute and insuence with patience: and that he would be pleased to grant a prolongation of the truce & a suspension of Armes for fifteene dayes, besides the time limited for the ratification: Such as knew not the negotiation betwixt the Duke of Sauoy, the Count Fuentes, and the Marshall Biron, could not beleue that the Duke of Sauoy would make any difficulty to signe the Treaty, but that he made some shew of it to haue it seeme the better. For those that were interested with him in the Treaty, did not promise to returne any more vnto the warre.

The Duke of Biron refused the Citadell of Bourg, being vnto him of victualls and Munition.

It is true, that if the Duke of Biron would haue taken the Citadell of Bourg, as the Duke would haue deliuered it vnto him, the King must haue returned with as great speed to Lions as he departed. In the meane time the Legate past all passages by post in a troublesome time, and came to Genoa, from whence he sent to the Duke and Count Fuentes, to keepe their word with him.

The Duke hearing of his arrival at Alexandria, parts from Nice, and goes to Thurin, D and both of them excuse themselves. The Count made his refusal, to take from the Duke all subiect of complaint, that they had abandoned him, and that hee had meanes to recouer his Estates, if they had assisted him. The Duke would be recompensed for this vnequall exchange before he signed by the King of Spaine. So the Legate receiues nothing from the one but complaints, and from the other but respects, and from both words of contempt against the Treaty. Hee met with the Count Fuentes at Tortoul, and from thence went to Milan, where hee past the Shroue-side: The Count Fuentes omitting no kinde of recreation to driue away melancholy, attending the Duke of Sauoys resolution, who sent to excuse himselfe by the indisposition of his children, and promised to come to Milan; but coming not, the Legat and the Earle went to Paui, with an opinion that the Duke would not come thither. The Legate sends Tazzoni vnto him, who returns with excuses of his sonnes sicknesse, and his complaints of the vniust and preiudiciall conditions whereunto he was bound.

The Legate sends backe Tazzoni to the Count Fuentes, giuing him to vnderstand that hee knew well that his legation had not bene undertaken, but for the seruice of the King of Spaine, at the intreaty of the Duke of Sassa his Ambassador: that he was not come for the Duke of Sauoy who mockt him, and considered not that he had done more for him then father or mother; that hee cared not for his ratification, and much lesse to see him, or to thanke him for his paines: that hee excused his affection in the infirmity of his sonne, but if he thought that he would attend to proceed vntill that hee were cured, hee was deceived. The Count Fuentes answers that the effect of the Treaty depends not vpon his signing, and that he must not send vnto him to effect it. The Legat cut off these temporisings and delays, and to discover where the fault was, that the peace was not signed, aduised himselfe of a subtilty, worthy of a Romane, and of a Cardinall. He commands the Count Tazzoni to fly vnto the Count Fuentes, that hee was advertised from the Duke, that all the difficulties in this business were framed by the Count, who restrained the Dukes liberty, in the signing and execution of the Treaty.

He

A He had scarce entred into this discourse, when as the Count Fuentes (full of choller that all the blame should be laid vpon him) went to horse, and came vnto the Legat, to whom hee discovered all the secret betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and him. Many dayes are spent in going and coming. In the end, the King of Spaine, who desired to begin his raigne by warre, would haue no peace, but vanquished by the perswasions of the Duke of Lerma, who thought peace to be more profitable for his condition, hoping to gouerne his Master more freely in the delights of peace, then in troubles of warre, sent vnto the Count Fuentes, that seeing they restored vnto the Duke of Sauoy his Country, and that he might keepe the Marquise of Saluces, he would employ his forces elsewhere, and confirme the Treaty of Lions. The Duke is forced to follow this course, there is no more armie for him. There was one complement yet remaining. The Duke was desirous to see the Legate: the paines which he had taken deferred this view and thanks. The Legate meant to goe speedily to Rome.

The Duke imbarques vpon the Riuer of Po, to goe visit him, and sends a Post to advertise him of the houre of his imbarking. Here was an accident that had almost spoiled all. This messenger reports vnto the Duke that he had met the Legat, and the Count Fuentes in Caroffe together vpon the way, who returned when as he advertised them of his coming. The Duke discontented with this returne, sends them word that hee was gone backe. The Legate enters presently into a small barke, follows after, and ouertakes him, whereas the riuer of Tesin enters into Po. The Duke being advertised, turns head and ioynes with him. They striue who shall enter into the others boat, but the Duke leaps in to the Legats, and sits downe by him: they spent some words in complements, before they entred into the Treaty of Peace.

The Legat and the Duke of Sauoy meet.

The Legate protested that in all this negotiation, hee had nothing else in his thought, but the good of his Highnesse estate, but he was incountered with so many difficulties, and necessities, which ouer-ruled his affection, as he was forced to preferre profitable and necessary things, before that which was goodly in shew. The Duke thanked him for the paines he had taken, but so coldly, as the Legat found wel, that he held not himselfe beholding vnto him. The one tooke his way to Thurin, and the other to Paui, and so to passe to Rome. The Duke had signed, but he was not yet wel resolved to obserue the peace. The feare left Bourg should be lost before the conclusion of the Treaty, made his Ambassadors to resolve: the Assurance which Bouvens now gaue the Duke, that he would incounter all extremities, both of famine and force, made him vnwilling to performe the Treaty; sending Bely his Chancellor to Rome, to make his excuse, that hee signed it not. The Pope tooke it ill, that a Chancellor, a man of peace, should intreat him to vndo that which the Legat his Nephew had done, and sent him backe with his answer.

The Dukes resolution.

But for all this the Duke seeks to smother this peace in the Cradle, and grounds his last hope vpon Bouvens, to whom hee sends the counterfigure, without the which hee was bound not to yield it.

He sends Bely his Chancellor to Rome.

E This token was but counterfeit. D' Hostel played another part, he made this his colour to haue meanes to enter into the Citadell, and to giue this counterfigure to Bouvens for his warrant; and thereby to assure him that if hee had meanes to hold good a moneth, hee should disclaime the signing of the ratification, and make a shew of disobedience, and hee should be relieved. D' Hostel went into the Citadell, and found that misery would not suffer them to want of resistance as they had done, that things were no more in the estate that Bouvens had represented them; and that their necessities were so extreme, as there was no meanes to suffer them any longer, being prest without by the Kings armie, and within by cold and hunger, which made the Duke more tractable to yield that which he could not hold, sending the ratification in the beginning of March, and at the same time the Citadell was deliuered into the Kings power.

A counterfigure came to Bouvens.

The general censures of this peace were diuers. The King was pleased that the profit was apparant, and assured for his Estates: hauing for one Marquise, more Earles and Marquises, then there are Gentlemen in the Marquise of Saluces, enlarging his frontiers about thirty leagues, and so restrained the Dukes estate on this side the mountains, as he hath left two third parts, lost eight hundred Gentlemen, and a fort which he himselfe writing vnto Bouvens esteemed more then all the Marquise, with Prouinces as fertile as any be in France. It is true that the Honour to keepe that which was the cause of the warre remained remained to the Duke, and by this meanes of a peace he hath no more need of Spaniards, A nor of the Count of Fuentes, who did him alwayes some Spanish affront, and is free from all feare of the French, who kept Piedmont in awe while they had a retreat there. The Duke, who neuer went out of the gates of Thurin without six companies of horse for his guard, and entertained Garisons which cost him more then the reuenues of the countries exchanged, may now sleepe, and goe and come in safety. This month of March Louyse of Lorraine, Dowager of France, Widow to Henry the third, King of France, died: her death was better knowne by the losse of such a light, then by the mourning of her heyres, or the honour of her funerals; for the Duke of Mercure her brother, to whom she left her goods, and the execution of her will, was then in Hungary. The Duchesse of Mercure attended on her vntill she died, and laid her body in the Couent of Saint Clare, vntill there might be entered with greater pompe. She desired to be layd in one Tombe with the King, whose body attends vntill that the piety of the liuing may remember the condition of the dead, the which giues cause of amazement, that the earth which neuer failes for the life of Princes, should now want for their interment.

The desire of this Princeesse was not performed, although the will of the dead ought to be religiously obserued, the best part of her life had beene a troublesome carriere of afflic-tion, more fertill in thornes then in roses: but it is the way of heauen, which hath bene beaten by all the happy, and there is no reason to make a new for them that came last, how great and mighty soeuer they be. King Henry the third going into Poland saw her so faire, as at his returne (when as death had made him forget the Princeesse of Conde, in whose remembrance he did sometimes forget the greatness and grauity of a King) he remembered her, and by the aduice of the Duchesse of Lorraine his Sister, who said that there was not any woman in the world more fit for his humour then this Princeesse: hee demanded her, and had her to wife. Gaff was sent vnto her, and found her coming from Saint Nicholas, whither she had gone in pilgrimage on foot. The Queene of Nauarre did much dis-swade this alliance, apprehending to march after a daughter to the Earle of Vaudemour:
for this cause the King would not haue her goe one day after her who should thinke her selfe honored the next day to be the first after her: so as there was no difference betwene her coming, making sure, and marriage.

Six weekes after her marriage they found her to be with child; but soone after she had a mischance, and had a false birth, being a sonne. This caused her to haue a Jaundie for a time, and an indisposition for euer, which made the King and Realme out of hope to see her a mother. This barrenesse made the Queenes life barren of all content. It is true that the three or foure first yeares were spent in all delights. The King made no voyage without her, no feast where she was not; he could not be to any other, being wholly to her, his delights were vnto her desires. Before his marriage he had loued Chastelnew, one of the Queene-mothers Mayds, the fire had beene so violent, as the ashes were yet hot, and had bene sufficient to kindle a new flame, if the Queenes wisdom had not caused them to be cast into the wind, when this great beauty appeared the rest lost much of their light.

The Queene was somewhat troubled: but when as the Queene-mother told her that she had endured much more, her griefe was somewhat allwaged, though not altogether taken away. She dissembled vntill that the saw this virgin come one day to dance attired, by emulation, like her selfe, at what time she told the Queen-mother that she could endure it no longer:
the who loued her dearly, wrought so as this Star was eclipsed, & appeared no more;
she left the Kings heart as well as the Court, and in despite married at her owne will. This Princeesse who had neuer bin bred vp but in her fathers court, grew suddenly very skillfull in all the complements of Court. The King instructed her himselfe in all the perfections which the world admires. Neuer Queen before her did better vnderstand what did belong to Queenes. She had past through all the honours which are due to Kings wiues. She was crowned Queene: she had set twice in the Assembly of the Estates of the Realme: she re-ceiued all sorts of Ambassadors, with lesse or more respect, according vnto the dignity of the Prince from whence they were sent, and shewed in her discourse wisdom, government, and much iudgement. She wonne the Queene-mothers heart so absolutely, as none but she did possesse it; there was such a conformity betwixt them, as what pleased the one could not displease the other. There was also a great intelligence betwixt her and the duke of Alanson, who honoured her as much as if he had beene farre inferiour vnto her: It was thought

A thought that if the King had died vpon a disease in his care, wherof the Physitians were in some doubt, he would haue married her, ynesse the Pope had denied a dispensation. Also, when he was dead, it seemed she would no more vie her eyes but to weepe. They held her to be very disdainfull, neither did she regard the Princes and Princeesses of the blood as she ought, louing none but them of her owne House. The Kings great heat of loue beganne to grow cold. His heart was like a tree planted on the high way, whose fruit is free for all passengers. He committed much excess, and gaue himselfe to the pleasures of the Court, which did then abound: he was not pleased to see her richly attired, nor to see her in companies. He made two voyages to Lions without her, his nature still affecting new

B things. Shee who loued the Princes of her House, was grieved to see them sequestered from the Kings fauours, which the Dukes of Ioyeuse and Elpernon did wholly enioy.
They were all in Court, and did possesse the Kings heart absolutely. Then she began to take the course of piety and deuotion, which she had rather discontinued then forgotten, hauing sucked deuotion from the bosome of piety. The King on the other side began to frequent reformed Cloysters. Shee was rather seene in the Churches then at the Loure.

This Sphere of deuotion did alwayes turne, neither could any occasion either within or without the Court stay the course thereof. She began to neglect that great beauty, which at her coming had made her amiable, and admirable, and gaue her the prize of all the beauties of the West. The Roses and the Lillies of her liuely hiew were withered, more C through the rigour of affliction then for age. And though the Kings affections were much diminished, yet they had neuer but one bed, neither did they lye asunder but fix or seuen moneths, by the aduice of the Physicians, vpon an infirmity of the Kings which was contagious. She was much afflicted for the death of the Duke of Guise, from which time afflictions neuer left her, for presently after followed that great insurrection of all the towns in France, the which wasted the Kings treasure, and reduced him to necessities that were vknowne and incredible, she was forced to send all her Maids of Honor to their houses, she remained alone with foure Ladies, with the which she retired in Chenonceau after the Kings departure from Tours to besiege Paris. There she had newes that a Monke had hurt the King of Saint Cloud, and resolved to goe and see him; but shee was caried backe to Chenonceau whereas the Earle of Fiesque and then, Dinet her Preacher told her that

D the King was dead, the newes of his wounding had already prepared her to this accident, for as soone as the King was hurt, hee wrote these few words vnto her with a trembling and dying hand. My friend you haue heard how I haue bene miserably hurt, I hope it will be nothing, pray to God for me, farewell my friend. Notwithstanding vpon the newes of his Death she fell downe in a sound, and then began to dye in this death. She caused foure of her maids of Honor to returne, who found a wonderfull alteration betwixt the visage of the Loure, and that of Chenonceau: for the necessities were so extreame, as most of them liued of their owne purses. Shee had no dowry, and the liberalitie shee receiued from the King was lesse then her necessitie: she was much wronged by her during the

E reigne of the deceased King. She could not dissemble the hatred shee bare him when hee was at Tours, where she shewed him so cold a countenance, and gaue him so bad a reception, as forseeing the mildnesse of his nature, he said that hee would thinke of it, and that she should repent it. But being King of France hee would not reuenge the wrongs done vnto the King of Nauarre, no more then Lewis the twelfth would those of the Duke of Orlenace: for hee relieved her necessities as much as his affaires would permit him, and gaue her after the death of Queene Elizabeth the Dowry, which shee enioyed, and had giuen her more but for the Duchesse of Beaufort, who loued her not, for that they had reported some words of contempt which shee had vsed on her. Shee bore a singular affection to the Princes of her House. And although that friendships grounded vpon

F vertue, are better then those which grow from nature, as being more voluntary, yet shee did not esteeme any friendship but that of her owne blood: which made them say that shee had intelligence with the Princes of her house against the King: but she shewed that her actions were free from it, refusing to see any of them after the death of the King her Husband, for the which shee was so afflicted, as the violence of her hearts griefe did ruine the vigour of her body, by a continuall defluxion vpon her lights, and coldnesse of her braine. Shee could neuer vie the souveraine remedy of the most intenerate vlcers of the minde, forgetfulness: she alwayes represented vnto her selfe, how she

she could possibly live, seeing the spirit of her life was dead, for even then she began to die, all the rest of her life was but torment and languishing. Shee went to the King to Mantes, where after shee had implored justice, always assisting at the Throne of God, shee cast her selfe at the Kings feet to have a iust and lawfull revenge for the death of the King her Lord. Du Buillon of the chiefe of her Councell made a learned and eloquent speech touching the iust affliction of this Princesse. La Guelfe the Kings Proctor made another, able to moue the hearts of the most barbarous Scythians. After the end of the Kings Masse, when as this Princesse heard the Palme which the deceased King did vniuallly cause to be sung, her griefe renewed with such violence as they held her for dead. The King ran to helpe her, and kneeled downe to lift her vp: All the time of her widowhood which was spent at Chenonceau, & at Molins, was rather the life of a priuate Lady, then of a Queene; or of a religious woman, then of a widow. The best part of the day was employed in prayer, and that which remained after the houres of eating, and of Businesse, were spent for some workes for the decoration of altars, there being few churches in France, where the hoth not sent of her worke. And although the were often visited by Princes, Princesses and great Noblemen, yet she neuer neglected one minute of her deuotion. To conclude, she was a sweet vessell of piety, and as a violl full of excellent Balme, or some Odoriferous liquor, whilst it is whole it giues no sent but to them that are neare it, but being broken, it delights them that are farr off. So this vessell of most Odoriferous vertue, being broken by death, hath powred forth her sweet sents ouer all the Earth.

Death of the Princesse of Conde.

Princesse of Condy dies.
The Duchesse
dies.

The same yeare also, Madam Francis of Orleans, Princesse of Conde, Mother to the Count of Soissons, died in her house of Grenelles at Paris, the Funerall Pompe was celebrated in the Abbey of Saint Germain de pres. About the end of this yeare the Princesse of Conty dyed of a great and languishing sicknesse, as she went to her house at Boanestable in Perche, to change the aire by the aduice of her Physicians, but she changed her life, leaving one onely Daughter, the which the Count of Soissons married.

Afterwards the Duchesse of Esguillon dyed, being daughter to the Duke of Neurs deceased, who left great cause of mourning to the Duke of Esguillon, eldest Sonne to the Duke of Maine, and the rather, for that he dyed in child-bed, and the child also with her. The King in forty dayes had conquered all Sauoy, within forty daies after he married, treated of a Peace, made the Queene in safe to be a Mother, went in post from Lyons, and came to Paris, who bare his long absence impatiently. His returne gaue the world to vnderstand how quiet and constant the affaires of France were, that a King which went a hundred Leagues with twelue onely in his traine, was wel assured of his subjects, and feared not his neighbours.

The Queene followed by small iourneys, and came to Fountainbleau, where she staid not long, but came to Paris about Saint Germaines fayre, her first lodging was at Gardies house her first Gentleman of Honour, being in the suburbs of Saint Germain. The next was at Zamets, superintendant of her house, and then she came to the Louure. The Parisiens prepared themselves and besought the King to giue them leave to make her a stately entry: but his Maiestie would haue the charges of this entry reserved for a more durable worke. All the Princes of the blood, with the chiefe Ladies of the Court and City presented themselves to kisse her hands, and to doe their duties vnto her Maiestie. Shee made much of all them that the King fauored, and resolved to loue what he loued, framing her will in such sort vnto him, as she held his will for an vnwritten Law.

Paris.

This yeare the Pope granted a Iubile and Pardons to all the French that should goe visite the Church of Saint Croix in Orleans, doing the workes of Christian charitie. An infinite number of people went thither from all parts of France; the King and Queene went thither with the first, and gaue meanes to helpe to build this Church, which had bin ruined during the fury of the first ciuill watres. The King laid the first stone of this building. An act worthy of a Christian King, the true successor of the piety of Saint Lewis his Predecessor. But whilst he gaires Pardons, his enemies watch to surprise the best places of his Realme. He was disarmed vnder the assurance of the Peace. The armie of strangers was still whole together, and became fearfull to all Italy. All the Princes were troubled thereat, and although they be not well vnited together, yet when there is any question of danger, they haue good correspondency. At Rome they said it was for Geneva, and that the

A the Marquis of Aix was gone to intreate the Pope to fauour him with his blessing, and to fortifie him with his meanes. Many other discourses were made touching this army, but time discovered that it was entertained for Marseilles. There is nothing so holy, but money will violate, nor so strong but it will force. The Count of Fuentes vpon promise of great recompence, had practised an enterprise very easie to execute, if the bargain had held. It was adooing during the treaty of Peace with the Duke of Sauoy, who sent Don Sanchis de Salina to Milan to the Count of Fuentes, with two of them which made this march, whereof the one gaue aduice to the President Du Yair. Hee which had promised to deliuer the Tower of the Port for an entry to the enemy, discouered himself to the D.

B of Guise. La Goye (a Gentleman of Prouence) was sent vnto the King, to beseech him to giue him leave to encounter them with the like practice. The King who desires not to gain by treachery, said that hee was content to keepe his owne, and to let the world know who did first trouble the peace. At that time another enterprise was discouered vpon the towne of Metz. The King sent the President Ianin thither; the accused were brought to the prison of the Palace of Paris. The proofes being weak, some were enlarged, vpon condition they should appeare when they were called for, his Maiesty commanding they should inform more amply against the rest, banishing two from the town of Metz, Thoul and Verdun. This great army finding no employment in France, made worke for the hangman in Italy, by the discouery of many conspiracies.

C Rocheport being Ambassador in Spaine, certaine French Gentlemen (among the which his Nephew was) had a quarrell with some Spaniards, who did iniure them, and cast their clothes into the water, they being a swimming. The Spaniards had the worst, and some were hurt and slaine. Their kinsmen demanded iustice of the King, (who commanded his officers to doe it) but the Ambassadors lodging was forced, and the Gentlemen drawn forth to prison, notwithstanding any thing that he could say or doe to maintain the libertie of his place, the which is inuolable even among enemies. The King was so offended with this iniury, as he commanded his Ambassador to returne, giuing the King of Spaine to vnderstand, that he assured him selfe, that he would do him reason, when hee had well considered what cause he had to complaine. Whereupon all traffike was forbidden betwixt these two Realmes. The Pope fearing that this violence done vnto the Ambassador of France, could not passe without some feeling, and that this Coale might kindle the fire of Warre betwixt these two great Kings: hee sent into Spaine to haue the prisoners, the which were sent vnto him: and the Pope deliuered them presently vnto the Lord of Betunes the Kings Ambassador at Rome, and so the Peace was continued.

D The Ambassadors of Venice were better intreated in France. That great and wise Senate holding themselves bound by the lawes of friendship, to deplore the misfortune, and to reioyce at the prosperity of their friends, hauing been long troubled for the afflictions of France, they send a great and solemne Ambassage to congratulate the fruit of the Kings victories, and the beginning of his marriage. The Ambassadors were chosen out of E the Procurators of Saint Marke, and of the chiefe men of the State. They came to Paris, the King sent the Marquis of Rhofay to conduct them to Fontainebleau, and to intreat them, to be contented with their reception in that place whereas the Queene was, seeing their Ambassage was common to both, and that for the indisposition of her greatnesse, it could not be at Paris, which occasion did renew the ioyes of the Court, the which was in so great tranquility, as it seemed neuer to haue beene in trouble.

An Ambassadeur
from Venice.

The Great Turke sent Bartholomew de Cueur his Physitian vnto the King, to acquaint him with the Estate of his affaires, and to intreat him to mediate a truce in Hungary. When as this man spake of the Turkes power, hee did fo extoll it, as if hee had beene able to vanquish all the Princes of Christendome, not excepting Pope nor Emperour, so as the King of France did not meddle in it. Hee presented a Dagger and a Cymiter vnto the Kings Maiesty, whereof the Hilt and Scabbars were of Gold, garnished with Rubies, and a Plume of Herons feathers. The King related vnto him what he had done in Sauoy, and complained that (to the prejudice of ancient Capitulations) not onely the English were distressed from the Banner of France, (vnder whose guard and protection they were bound to traffike) but also the Flemings, Hollanders, and Zelanders were comprehended vnder the Banner of England. To this complaint he added another, against the courtes and violences of the Pirates of Algier, and the coast of Barbary, saying that if the the Justice of the great Turke did not cause these Piracies to cease, hee should have no A reason to beleue his friendship.

The Order of Recolets.

At this time there sprung vp religious men in France, who said they were true obseruers of the Order of Saint Francis, and that the Franciscans and Capuchins did not maintain it so exactly, but they needed reformation. The king gaue them a Couent at Beaufort, and by the example of this piety, many other places desired it. They would lodge at Balmette neere vnto Angers, the which had bene founded by rene King of Sicilia. The Franciscans (who could not endure to be dispossest by these Recolets) besieged them, offered to force their gates, & to scale their walls. These besieged defended not themselves with words and exorcismes, but with stones, and in such choller, as if the people had not come the scandall had not ended without murder. The Prouinciall seeing that the Recolets would not receiue him, and that the Bishop would not suffer him to vie force, appealed, as from an abuse of their establishment. The Recolets shew vnto the Court, that they are the true Children and Disciples of Saint Francis, liuing according to the rule and discipline that was obserued in Italy, from whence the good precepts of the reformation of Regulars were drawne, that if those of the Family of Obseruance, and of Capuchins, were tolerated and honoured in France, they should be of no worse condition. This cause was the argument of a famous pleading in the Court Parliament, in the which Seruin the Kings Aduocate said; That a Reformation was necessary not onely in the Order of the Franciscans or Gray-Friars, but also in all others; but they must be careful, not to transforme by nouelties, in stead of reforming by censures, alledging many reasons against the bringing in of new Orders.

A great pleading

liament.

Whereupon the Court pronounced that there was abuse, and restored the ancient Religious to the Couent of Balmette, forbidding all religious men of the Order of Gray-Friars to goe out of the Realme, without licence from the King or their Superiours. Jealous and distrustfull heads gaue it out, that the Peace was in weak estate, when as after the injury done vnto Rochepot in Spaine, and the forbidding of traffique, they see the King gone suddenly to Calais, and that from thence he had sent the Duke Biron vnto England.

The Arch-Dukes tooke a sudden alarme, and to that end sent the Count Sora vnto the King, to deliuer vnto him the state of the siege of Ostend, and to beseech him not to suffer that their enemies should think that these approaches should be to their aduantage, and that their rebellion should be fauoured by an example so hatefull to all Princes. The King sent the Duke of l'Esquillon to visit them, and to assure them that his intention was not to trouble the peace, but onely to visit his Frontier, and to prouide for the fortifications. They did not generally beleue this, for although hee made his voyage in poste, many thought that he would embrace this occasion of the siege of Ostend, and all the Court followed him as to some great exploit. And for that he would not haue the world in suspence of his designs, he gaue the Governours of his Prouinces to vnderstand, that the cause of his going to Calais, was but to visit his frontier, and to prouide for that which should be necessary to assure it, not from present dangers, but from those that might happen. He declared also that he had no other designe then the preservation of peace with all his neighbours, to enioy that which God had giuen him. But there were other practices which could not be dispersed but by the Kings presence.

The Duke of Biron sent into England.

The Queene of England sent Sir Thomas Edmonds to visit the King, and the King returned her the like by the Duke of Biron. He went accompanied with an hundred and fiftie Gentlemen. The Count of Auvergne was there as vnkowne, but his quality discouraged him. There was nothing omitted that might be for the reception of an Ambassador, and somewhat more. Being at London, many Noblemen receiued him, and accompanied him to Basing, where he rested a day or two before he did see the Queene, who made him know that she was honoured by her Subjects about other Princes. A Prince should lose no occasion to let strangers see the greatness of his Estate, to giue them cause to admire him, and to maintain his Subjects in the duty which they owe him. The Queene of England, who hath made good proofe that women may reigne, as well and as happily as men, obserues this better then any Prince of her age, making all them that followed the Duke of Biron in this Legation, to giue the like iudgement.

the Queene.

The Queene being set in State, all the French Gentlemen entred first, but when as the discomfited the Duke of Biron, whom she knew by the description they had made of his face

A Face and stature, she spake with a loud voyce; "Ha, Monsieur de Biron, how haue you taken the pain to come and see a poore old Woman, who hath nothing more liuing in her, then the affection shee beares vnto the King, and her perfect iudgment to know " his good seruants, and to esteeme Knights of your fort. As she spake this, the Duke made a low reuerence, and the Queene rose from her Chaire to embrace him, to whom hee deliuered the charge hee had from the King, and withall his Maiesties Letters, the which she read. Shee thanked the King for his remembrance of her: but she said shee could not concale, that as there was nothing vnto a heart (like vnto hers) full of affection and desire more pleasing, then to see and heare what it desired, so could shee not " but feele an extreame torment, to see herselfe deputed of the sight and presence of the " obiect which shee had most desired, whose actions shee esteemed not onely immortal " but diuine, being ignorant whether shee should more enuy his Fortune, then loue his " Vertue, and admire his Merits; so much the one and the other did exceed the greatest " maruailes in the world. That she could not say that a courage which feared nothing but " the falling of the Pillers of Heauen, should feare the Sea, or not trust vnto it for a pas- " sage of seuen or eight houres, blaming them rather which had not instructed him as " well to contemne the Vvaues of the Sea, as the designs of his enemies vpon the Land. " From these speeches, shee fell into some bitterness of Complaints, which shee deliuered with a little vehemency, saying: that after shee had succoured this Prince with her " C Forces, Purse, and meanes, and if she could haue done it with her owne blood, and had as " much desired the happy successe of his affaires as himselfe, and the ruine of his enemies " more then himselfe, they made no account of her, forcing her to thinke that the loue " they bare her was but for the hope of commodities they might draw from her, the " which being dried vp, all affection was cold. That they had fought her in the torment " to forget her when the time was calme. That they preferred new friendship before the " old, wisdom before Iustice, and profit before reason. And for a signe of inhumanity, " they refused her her owne. Then taking the Duke of Biron shee led him to a window " where she continued her discourse in softer and milder termes. There she gaue her hand " vnto all the Gentlemen which the Duke of Biron presented vnto her: among them all " D shee noted Creguy to bee sonne in Law to L'Esquignon. Shee commanded him to approach neere vnto her when all had done, to whom she declared what esteeme she would make of him for his sake, whom shee held to bee without Peere, saying; That if there were two L'Esquignons in France, shee would demand one of them of the King her brother. Creguy answered; That he would thinke himselfe happy, if by the Kings commandement any occasion were offered worthy of her seruice, to witnesse vnto her Maiesty that hee did partake in the desire which his Father in law had alwaies had, to giue her some proofe of his affection, and that hee would alwayes cary himselfe so in effect, seeing hee could not bee present but in desire, the Kings seruice binding him to remaine elsewhere. To whom the Queene said; That she did accept of his good will, and with- " E ed him to remember. The Duke of Biron receiued all the honours of the Queene and State, that might be giuen to so great a personage, the particularities wherof I omit for breuities sake.

Having finished his Legation, he tooke his leaue of the Queene, to whom shee gaue a great Present, and so dismissed him with very gracious speeches. He found not the King at Calais at his returne, who was gone backe to Fountainbleau against the Queenes lying downe, where hee had left her, and the Duchesse of Bar with her. All France attended the Fruit of this birth, as the full of their Felicities, assuring themselves, that by the birth of a Dauphin, they should find all that which forepassed ages, and that which was to come could desire. Ten daies before his birth, the Earth quaked in many parts of Europe. " F great Duchesse who desired greatly to be neere the Queene, sent her a rich Cradle, exquisitely made at Florence, hoping it should serue for a Dauphin (for she would not haue giuen it with so good a will for an other Sexe) inreaching the Governor of Lions, by her Letters, to fauor the passage, and his diligence that had charge of it, to the end that hee might arise in time, and not to suffer any to open the Coffers.

The Queene fell in labour on Thursday at night, the seuen and twentieth of September. The King and the Princes of his blood, were in the Chamber, according to the ancient law of the Ceremonies of the Crown, to the end, that the interested in the succession, may not pretend there was any supposition. The Queene was held for a while in great danger, for she had given herselfe such liberty in eating of fruit, as she felt it, and repented it in her travell, but in the end, about eleven of the clocke, shee was delivered of a sonne. The King blessing him put a Sword in his hand, to vset it to the glory of God, and the defence of his Crowne and people. All the Princes and Noblemen flocked to reioyce at this new Grace. The Ioy was so great, and the King was so prest with the Congratulations of them that came about him, as going to the Church to give God thanks for this favour, he lost his hat in the throng. The Secretaries of State, made dispatches presently into all Provinces, to make them partakers of this great ioy. The first was brought to Paris by Favennes about foure of the clocke, to the Chancellor, the Court of Parliament, and the Towne-houfe, presently thanks were given to God, and bonfire made throughout all the Realme, the people holding this latter grace, as an assurance of the fruit of all the precedent. Sourmay was chosen for his Gouvernour. The Pope sent presently vnto the King and Queene to congratulate with them of this birth, and to cary vnto the yong Prince swadding bands, bearing clothes, and other things, blessed by his Holinesse. All Princes allied to this Crowne, sent to congratulate this happy occasion.

The Queene of Spaine was brought in bed about the same time of a Daughter. The Spaniards were no lesse content then the French, taying that they had rather the Queen should begin with a daughter then with a sonne, lest they should fall into the accidents, which lealouise and Ambition doe breed, when the Children appeare so soone to folliw, cite them to bee gone; when as their ages are confounded, that the one is in the flower, the other in the season of fruites, the which is most capable to command and rule, and that the desire to succeed may not give occasion to trouble the order of Nature, and maketh the one repent that they are Fathers, and declares the other unworthy to bee Children.

The Duke of Biron returns out of England to Court.

The Duke of Biron came to Fontainebleau, whereas the King, Queene and Dauphin remained, he gaue an account of his Ambassage into England, and delivered the Queenes Letter vnto his Maiesty. He continued in Court vntill the end of the yeare, and presented vnto him the three Estates of Breffe, Beaugy, Veromey and Gex; whom the King receiued as graciously, as if they had been Frenchmen by birth and affection; hee confirmed their Priuiledges, and made them feele the fruits of this change. Hee erected a Presidiall Court at Bourg, depending vpon the Parliament at Dijon, notwithstanding any opposition made by that of Grenoble, pretending that the Countries exchanged should hold the place of the Marquitate of Saluces, and be incorporate vnto Dauphine. Hereleeued the Countries exchanged, in their impositions and Taxes, and with such moderation, as the most miserable, promised vnto themselves happinesse, vnder his sweet subiection. Among other speeches, which the King vled vnto the Deputies, these were noted, It is reasonable (said he) seeing you speake French naturally, that you should bee subiect to a King of France: I am well pleased that the Spanish tongue shall remaine to the Spaniard, and the Germane tongue to the Germane, but all the French must belong to me. The Dauphin made his first entry into Paris the 30 day after his birth: the Port was beautified with Armes. The pompe was of a Cradle in a litter, whereas the Lady of Monglas far with the Nurce. The Prouost of Merchants and Sherifes went out of the City to meet him. The Gouvernesse made answer to the Oration. His first lodging was at Zamets house. Two dayes after he was caried backe to S. Germane in Lay, and to the end the people might see him passing through the City, she nurse held him at her breast. The King had determined to conduct the Queene to Blois, but the desire he had to instruct the Duchesse of Bar his sister in his Religion, stayed them all at Paris, whither he had sent for the most learned Prelates and Diuines, to satisfie her in the presence of such Ministers as the had brought with her. But they conuired her not to yeeld vnto this change, nor to dismember her selfe from the Body and society of the Children of God, to bow her knees vnto Idolatry. She continued so constant in her beleefe, as shee made a protestation, that if her Religion were prejudiciall to the Estates of the Duke of Lorraine, shee was ready to returne into Bearne, beseeching the King to suffer her to end her life as shee had begun it. So as the conferences vpon this subiect remained vnprofitable, and were of no more effect, then that which was made at Ratisbonne at the same time, and for the same cause. The King having settled as happy a peace in France as could bee desired, hee sought to redresse

A redresse the disorders which could not be cured during the violence of the warre, hee did two things to reforme the disorders of the Treasure, in the one hee cut off a great number of Officers belonging to the Treasure, and in the other hee caused a great and seuer search to bee made of their abuses. The more Officers the King hath for the managing of his Treasure, the lesse profit comes vnto his Coffers, for that a great part is spent in their entertainments. So as it was resolved at the Estates held at Rouin, to suppress the Offices of the treasurers of the generalities of France by death without hoping of reuiuing.

As for the abuses of Treasurers, their couetousnesse was so great, and their abuses so countenanced, as no man liued happily but they. Such as rob the Poore dye in Prisons and are hanged, but they that steale from the King and the publicke, are at their ease. When as Ribousy was called to be Superintendent of the Treasure, they were out of hope to doe their businesse as they had wont. By his aduice the King commanded a strict search to bee made of their Abuses in the Treasure, and to that end, hee erected a Chamber (or Court) which hee would haue called Royale, consisting of Iudges chosen out of his Soueraine Courts: of one of the Presidents of the Court of Parliament: two Masters of Requests of his Household: two Councillors of his Court of Parliament: one President of his Chamber of Accompts: three Councillors of the Court of Aydes: of one of the Aduocates generall of his Court of Parliament: and of one of the Substitutes.

A Chamber Royall created.

And for that they had given the King to vnderstand, that nothing did so much impoverish his Realme, as the transport of gold and silver, the which was vsuall by the sufferance of Officers, he therefore reuiued the ancient Lawes for the transporting of gold and silver, or bullion out of the Realme, adding paine of death thereunto, and losse of all their goods that should doe to the contrary, the third whereof should goe vnto the Informer. He commanded all Governours to haue a care of the obseruation of these prohibitions, and not to grant any passports to the contrary, vpon paine to be declared pariares of these transports, and for their Secretaries that should countersigne them, confiscation of their goods and perpetual banishment. But the forbidding of the transportation of gold and silver is not the onely meanes to make a Realme abound therewith, if the vse of it within be not well ordered. And therefore the King did forbid the superfluous vse of gold and silver in lace or otherwise vpon garments. This Edict did greatly trouble the Ladies in Court, yet it was obserued, for that it was generall and excepted none: the King himselfe did throwne of a Prince of his House, who had not yet thought of this reformation. The King continuing the same care to settle all things in good estate, seeing that foraigne Coynes went at a higher rate in his Realme then where they were coyned, hee commanded that the vse of foraigne Coynes should bee forbidden, after a certaine time giuen to the people to put it away, restoring gold to his iust value. This commandement was iust, but it was a great ruine to the people, for the Strangers seeing that their Coynes were not currant among vs, discontinued the trafficke, and liued without that, without the which we thought they could not liue. Those which were wont to come to Lions went to Geneva, where the Duckats were raised as much as wee had abated them. The King by all these Edicts had nothing releued the necessities of the Nobility, if he had not provided for vsuries, which haue ruined many good and ancient houses, filled Townes with vnprofitable persons, and the Country with miseries, and inhumanities. Hee found that Rents constituted after ten or eight in the hundred did ruine many good families, hindred the trafficke and commerce of Merchandise, and made Tillage and Handicrafts to bee neglected, many desiring through the easinesse of a deceitfull gaine, to liue idly in good Townes of their Rents, rather then to giue themselves with any paine to liberall Arts, or to Till and Husband their inheritances. For this reason (meaning to inuite his subiects to enrich themselves with more iust gaine, to content themselves with more moderate profit, and to giue the Nobility meanes to pay their debts,) hee did forbid all vsury or constitution of Rents at a higher rate then fixe pounds fixe shillings for the Hundred. The Edict was verified in the Court of Parliament, which considered that it was alwaies prejudiciall to the Common-weale to giue money to vsury: for it is a serpent whose biting is not apparant, and yet it is so sensible as it pierceth the very heart of the best Families.

Ambassadors
chosen to send to foreign Princes.

The affaires of the Realme being in so great tranquillity, as the King had no care but to enjoy the fruits of a Peace. He made choice of Ambassadors to send to foraign Princes that were in League with him. Barrault was named for Spaine, Betunes for Rome, the Count Beaumont was chosen for England, and the President Fresnes Canay to go to Venice, who had a particular aduice giuen him, the which for that it is of consequence and serues for instruction to others in the like charges, deserves to be noted. It hath alwaies bene obserued at Venice, betwixt the Popes Nuncio and Princes Ambassadors that remaine there, that the last come is alwaies first visited by the others before hee returns them the like. It happened that Huraut de Mesle the Kings Ambassador at Venice, hauing bene twice or thrice sent backe thither by his Maiesty, and no other Ambassador: at his last returne the Popes Nuncio refused to visit him, saying, that hee was not a new Ambassador, and that it was in him to visit him first, the which he did, as well for that they could not take his returne for the beginning of a new Ambassage: from this complement of courtesie, the Popes Nuncio would draw a consequence of dutie, and would challenge a right to be visited first. So as the Ambassador of Spaine hauing made difficultie to visit the Nuncio, attending it first from him, according to the ancient order, they stood so long vpon this Ceremony, as they passed all the time of their Legation without visiting one another. And therefore the King foreseeing that if de Fresnes Canay were not informed of these particularities, he might haue bene surprisid in this Complement of visiting. In this discourse of Ambassadors let vs see the issue of two important Ambassages, the one for the King at Thurin, the other for the Duke of Sauoy at Paris, and both for the swe ring of the peace. Ianus Mitles of Nycolans Lord of Saint Chaumont, Knight of both the Kings Orders, was commanded to goe to Thurin to receive the Dukes oath. Hee went well accompanied with Gentlemen, and neuer Ambassador was better received than hee was in Sauoy and Piedmont. D'Albigny Gouverneur of 'Sauoy feasted him at Chambery like a Prince, the Duke commanding him to intertaine him in all places as himselfe.

The Duke of Sauoy, exceeds all the Princes of his quality in such Ceremonies: There is not any Court where they are performed with more order and pompe. The Ambassador coming within a League of Thurin, hee was intreated by the Duke to stay his entry one day, for that the Duke of Nemours did feast him at a house of his, and that the chiefe men of his Court being all inuited, desired to be there, and not to lose the opportunity to meet with him, nor the Ladies to see his reception. He sent for him, and for all the chiefe men of his traine richly furnished, with footmen in very good order to enter into Thurin. Two leagues from the Towne he was met by his Companies of men at armes. The commanders hauing presented themselves vnto him, the Companies opened and made them way to passe through the midst of them, hauing passed a little farther, he was incountred by the Marquis of Lan, in the head of the chiefe Noblemen of the Dukes Court, to accompany him into the Towne; at the ports whereof there were twenty Staffiers or footmen, euerie one with two torches of white wax in his hand to light him to his lodging, whither presently the Duke sent the Earle of Crenie the first Gentleman of his Chamber, to let him vnderstand how much he was pleased with his coming, and grieved that he should not see him vntill the next day: At the houre appointed word was brought that the Duke desired to see him, where at the first encounter hee vied him with more then ordinary words, and great declarations of ioy which the Duke received of his arrival, and of the contentment he promised vnto himselfe by the effects of his legation. The Ambassador did the Kings commendations vnto him, and told him that hee had commandement from his Maiesty to represent many things vnto him touching the treatie of peace. The Duke answered, that they must not talke of affaires, intreating him to forbear eight dayes. The Kings Ambassador was well aduertised, that he would gaue time on the one side, as hee lost on the other, attending a Post from Spaine touching the oath which he was to make: his good shewes could not hide his hart's griefe for the losse of part of his Estates, the possession whereof had neuer bene so pleasing, as the priuation was troublesome.

Chenieres visited the Princes & the Infanta's according to the Kings commandement. The Ambassador of Spaine went in Pilgrimage to our Lady of Mont de Vic, because he would not be at the Assembly. The Ceremonie was like vnto the precedent at Cham-

A bery for the treaty of Veruins, after which the Ambassador dined with the Duke, where there was nothing forgotten that might giue him contentment. The Duke told the Ambassador that he would sup with him, but alwaies at his owne charge, whether hee caused many Ladies to be inuited: during the heat of these iollities the Duke tooke no taste in affaires, he so much desired to content the Kings Ambassador and those that were with him. Yet he did not leaue to satisfie him in that which he had proponed, touching the rights and pretensions of the Lady of Lucy, and for many demands which they of Geneva had made vnto the King, vpon the execution of the treaty. For the first, they answer that hee will giue the King contentment, and for the second, that his Maiesty would neuer iudge reasonable that he should bind himselfe in his owne Estates, to conditions, which they of Geneva would not allow in theirs. The Ceremonies being performed, the Ambassador rooke his leaue, and his departure was not lesse honored than his coming, where hee did not forget to giue them great Presents. Some said that after to great an expence in his voyage to Paris, and that hauing wasted his Treasure, and ruined his Countries with warre, those which did accompany Chenieres should not haue like Presents to them that were with Botheas when as the Duke swore the peace of Veruins. But hee did the contrary, shewing, that the last of the vertues which should die in him should bee liberality, and that he knew, to whom, how much, when, and how he should giue, and that in such occasions sparing was hurtfull. He gaue vnto the Ambassador a Jewell of 4000 Crownes, and to all the Gentlemen horsies. The Marquis of Lullins came into France to take the Kings oath. The Ceremonie was done at the Celestins in Paris, according to the accustomed manner and forme vsed in the like treaties, and in the presence of many Princes of the blood, Noblemen, & Councillors of State, the act being signed by the King, by Villeroy and Forger Secretary of State. The Siegneurie of Geneva intreated the King to giue them the Baliwicke of Gex, as a necessary thing for the safetie of their Estate. The King answered, that being concluded by the treaty, which he had made with the duke of Sauoy, that the lands exchanged for the Marquise of Saluces, should remaine vnted and incorporated to the Crowne, he requested them to rest satisfied with this condition, and not to hope for any alteration, for this consideration, these Countries being of one condition with the other Prouinces of the Realme, they would not admit any diuersity in their lawes, he therefore established the exercise of the Romish religion, and sent the Baron of Lux to put the Bishop of Geneva in possession of the Churches of his Diocesse, causing Masse to be said in the Churches of Gex. They of Geneva made faults, and publike prayer to the end (sayd they,) to keepe the Idols from their wals.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Court being quiet, and dreaming of nothing but of feasts and dancing, and the whole State in such tranquillity, as nothing might seeme to interrupt it. The King had but one businesse without the Realme, whereon depended the contentment which hee might giue to the Suisse, in confirming the promise which his Ambassador had made of the renewing of their alliances. There had bene many Assemblies held to that end at Bade and Soleure, but all vncertaine, as they be commonly. Their resolutions were inconstant and variable, with new demands, which did cut off nothing of the necessity of the first. These diuers agitations sprang from Milan and Sauoy, who could not endure to see the Flower-de Luc flourish in the rocks and Alpes, and were grieved to haue spent so many double Ducats in vaine, to choke the feeds of their affection to this Crowne. De Vic disposed things in as good sort as the King could desire, Brulart was sent to make the worke perfect. He gaue them to vnderstand the kings last resolutions, with so great wisdom and dexterity, as they were allowed by the greatest part of the Cantons. After that, the partisans of Spaine and Sauoy found that their crosses brought more aduancement then difficulty to the Kings affaires, and that the most obstinate became temperate, and were forced to yeeld, and that they could not hinder, but that the light of vertue and the Kings fortune would shine through the Chaos of their practices. Sillery finding that their wills were well prepared, and disposed to entertaine and accept of the Kings intentions, he made the proposition of renewing of the League at Soleure in September, after this manner:

"My most honored Lords, I haue bene fent into this Country by the most Christian King my master, your best friend, ally, and confederate, with charge to deliuer vnto you, his louing recommendations, with the letters which his Maiesty hath written vnto you, by the which you may conceiue his intention vpon the cause of my voyage, according to the which his Maiesty hath also exprefly commanded mee, to assure you of his loue and affection, and of the esteeme which hee had made of your Nation, for that hee had made better triall of their courage and valor then all other Princes, hauing bene so often with them in battell and other exploits of warre, and to tell you that he desires to continue with you the ancient friendship, alliance, and good correspondency which hath so long and happily continued, betwixt the Kings of France, his Maiesties predeceffors of happy memory, to the common good of the one and the other. After that hee had received your friendly answer dated the 15 of May, in the year 1600, touching that which had bene propounded vnto you on his behalfe by the deceased Monsieur de Montfautaine his Ambassador concerning the renewing of the League, his Maiestie did presently appoint his Deputies to come and treat with you, the which had bene duely effected, if the vnexpected warre of Sauoy, contrary to his Maiesties intention, had not stayed the voyage of his said Deputies, the which since hath not bene deferred, but to send by the same means greater prouision of money which cannot be so soon gathered together as was requisite, for the pouerty of the people, who are yet afflicted for the wars and calamities past, which haue so long continued, and is the onely cause which hath stayed your payments, to the great griefe of his Maiesty, and of all good Frenchmen, who were sorry to see you vnaccommodated and could not helpe it. This excuse my Noble Lords, is not only true, but worthy of compassion, if it please you to remember the true and iust cause of this stay, and the great miseries and wrongs which all France, and to many poore Innocents haue since suffered.

And although that by the happy peace which is hath pleased God to giue vs, there be occasion to hope for all prosperity, and that the mischiefe decreasing, and commodities increasing, as we see daily, by the grace of God there will be meanes to giue his Maiesties good friends and seruants satisfaction. Yet this cannot be so suddenly, but it is necessary to haue sometime to reape the fruits, notwithstanding it is most assured, and the haruest and fruition is neere, which will recompence the long expectation.

I thinke my Lords it were superfluous to shew how profitable this alliance hath bene heretofore to the one & to the other, for that it is notorious to all the world, being made manifest by effects, and hath no need of prooue. We acknowledge freely and willingly, that the assistance and succors of your souldiers, which at sundry times, and in many occasions, haue bene employed both within and without the Realme, haue bene very profitable for the succouring of the Kings and Crowne of France. I assure my selfe also, that for your parts you will acknowledge how much the Alliance and friendship of France hath bene fauourable and helpful vnto you, since the which you haue not bene only respected of Princes and Potentates, which are neere vnto you, but haue also bene sought vnto by them that are farthest off: you haue not bene molested, nor set vpon by any, and by this meanes you haue increased in wealth, power and authority, and your Estate is become one of the most happy and most flourishing that euer was. So your wife Predecessors haue thought that no other alliance could be more commodious vnto you for many reasons best knowne vnto your selues: we demand nothing one of another, there are certaine conuentions betwixt your Nation and Ours, whereby they agree better then any other. We desire your battailions to fortifie our Armies, which may bee also said that you did neuer trust, nor agree so well with any, as with our French foot and horse.

My Lords they which faime imaginary rights and pretensions for any part of your Estates, desire not your good nor vnion, and if according to your wisdomes it please you to examine strictly the Councils and proceedings of some, who vnder a disguised shew of some present profit, seeme to affect your friendship, you shall finde that their chiefe end is to separate you one from another, to weaken and diuide the force and bodies of your Leagues, and by that meanes to open & make the way easie to execute their old delignes, which they haue long prosecuted, being needfull to vs great force to prevent them, and not to suffer your selues to be abused with their policies.

You must thinke my Noble Lords, that you haue none so dangerous enemies, as those which seeke to sow diuision among you in your Councils, for it is directly contrary to your greatnesse and quiet. The Kings of France, pretend not any thing of you but your friendship, they desire your vnion and prosperity, for the loue and affection which they beare

A beare you, but to the end that no man may be in doubt, I say, they ought to desire for their owne interest, that you should bee alwaies vnited and fortified, to the end that your assistance may be vnto them a speedy, powerful, and assured succour, they which may not faile them when sooner they shall haue need. The Kings of France and their ministers haue alwaies employed themselves to perswade and maintaine a peace and vnion betwixt you. And it may bee truly said, That the alliance of France is the most proper and firme bond of your coniunction and friendship, to maintaine you powerfull and happy together by this common intelligence, the which cannot be when you shall bee diuided. King Lewis the eleuenth employed himselfe to compound the controuersies which were betwixt your famous Predecessors, and the House of Austria; and by his authority and mediation, the Treaty was concluded of the hereditary League, with the Archduke Sigismund in the year 1474, the which hath bene since confirmed by his successors, and continued vnto this day.

In the year of our Lord 1531, the five Cantons hauing some diffention with them of Zurich, were forced to contract with Ferdinand the King of Romans, and since Emperor, brother to the Emperour Charles the fifth. The fruits of this new friendship were the cause of a ciuill war betwixt the said Cantons. This war was pacified by the care and diligence of King Francis, who made both the one and the other capable of that which was necessary for their owne good and preferuation. A peace was concluded, but it was expressly agreed, that the letters and seales of this new alliance should be restored, as if it had bene held the chiefe cause of this trouble. In the year of our Lord 1582, the deceased King Henry shewed no lesse affection and care to prevent the beginning of a war, which was apprehended betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and my Masters of Berne, assisted by some other Cantons; there are many yet liuing which can witness the good endeauours of Monfieur de Mandelot, and Hautfort, to smother this trouble in the breeding, as in all other occasions the Kings of France and their ministers haue giuen prooue of their affections to the good and quiet of the Cantons.

My Lords, with the alliance of France you may assure your good and prosperity without any feare, and free your selues from many dangers and inconueniences which do fallibly follow the multiplicity of alliances. And if the alliance of France hath euer deferred to be esteemed, if it hath heretofore bene desired; in my opinion it shall bee with more reason now, when as we are nearer neighbours, hauing meanes to succour one another, without demanding passage from any Prince, the Realme of France being in full peace, restored to her beauty, and her limits extended by the force, clemency, wisdom, and conduct of that great King, who hath iustly merited the title of greatnesse, for the glory and greatnesse of his vertues, and of his high exploits, for in him may be seene the perfect Image of a good King, and a great Captain, which is the greatest commendation which the ancient Sages haue thought might be giuen vnto a mortall man. His Majesty hath shewed his valour and force of armes during the war: hee hath also made his bountie and wisdom shine in time of peace. All diuisions are ceased in his Realme, and every man liues in peace vnder his authority, as well by his power, as through the loue and affection of his subiects, who reuerence and feare him as a great King, and loue and obereue him as a good father. And doubtlesse his Majesty hath no other care but to make his Subiects most happy vnder his obedience, restoring the manuring of the Land, the traffike, Merchandize, order and policy in all the parts of his Estate; and it is to be hoped that his raigne will abound in all felicity for his Subiects, Friends, and good Neighbours.

This great King, my noble Lords, desires your friendship and alliance, such as you haue had with the Kings of France his Predecessors. It is not to hurt any one, but to doe good to all. It is not to trouble the publike peace, but rather to maintaine it, his Majesty hauing giuen good proofes of the sincerity of his intentions, for the generally quiet of Christendome, by his facility in the treaty of peace made at Veruins with the King of Spaine, and since confirmed at the City of Paris and Lions with the Duke of Sauoy, whereof I can giue testimony hauing had the honour to serue in all that hath bene negotiated in the said Treaties of Veruins and Lions. His Majesty offers you his loue and affection, which is to be esteemed in a good and iust Prince, whose faith hath neuer failed to his friends, enemies, nor to his owne subiects. he promisseth you all affection that can with reason be desired, as well for your payments, as for all other conditions which should be required, and hath given power to my Lord Ambassador and me, to advise with you of the best means that may be, to renew the alliance with you, and to make it so firme and durable as it may never be changed nor altered.

His Majesty doth also assure himselfe of your widomes and enquiry, that you would not require any thing that were not reasonable and in his power, and that you would consider and adde therunto what shall be required of your part, to assure the effect of a good alliance, that hereafter they might not fall into former inconveniences, by means whereof of his Majesty finds himselfe charged with great and excessive debts, the which had not bene if alliances had bene kept: I speake it without offence to any but only by the necessity of duty, which binds mee to represent the truth of the fact for two reasons: the one, that it may be provided for; the other, to the end that considering the greatnesse and quality of the debts, you may know we deserve to be a little borne withall in the payment thereof.

I hope in his diuine bounty, that as it hath pleased him to manifest by so many miracles, that he hath taken into his protection the affaires of this good King, this realme, and this mighty Common-weale, that he will also be pleased to inspire your hearts with his wisdom, to take a good and holy resolution, which may be first to his glory, for the health of both the Estates, and of all good men; and finally for the encrease of the honour, glory, and prosperity of your Estate, for the which the alliance of France shall be vnto you as it alwaies hath bene, very honourable and profitable.

His discourse was very pleasing vnto the hearers, who thought that the alliance of France, with whom they neuer had any question, and whose friendship had not bene troubled with those feelings, which the injuries of war doe fix deeply in the minds of men, was more profitable and necessary then that of other Princes, which haue hereditary designs vpon that Estate, who would cast lots againe, and come to a new diuision.

These had some-times fought to make their profit of the diuersity of Religion that is amongst the Cantons, in weakning the body by cutting off the members. France on the contrary side had alwaies exhorted them to liue in peace, and not vnder-mine the foundation of their Estate, the which consists of concord and vnion. So Princes should alwaies desire that their Allies might liue in Vnion and Peace. This proposition of renewing the League with the King, was very acceptable vnto them all, but it troubled the small Catholike Cantons, who had made new Leagues with their neighbours, and desired that they would propound some means vnto them, that in contenting the King they might with honour keepe their latter promises. The Ambassadors answered, that they must take those resolutions of themselves, whereby they might willingly contribute that which depended of them. It is no reason sayd the Ambassadors, that you should be directed and set into the right way by vs, seeing you left it without vs and against vs. The Cantons sayd, that the friendship which they had sworne to France, was grounded vpon conditions, the which saying, the duty of their alliance must also faile.

Friendship grounded vpon profit is neuer durable, that of the Swisses cannot be otherwise vnited, they loue the Darigues more then Darius himselfe, and glory to see the greatest Princes of Europe to purchase their friendship. Some aduised the King to leaue the petty Cantons, and to take them as his enemies, seeing they had broken the League. But he thought he should wrong the reputation and dignity of his Crown, if he should lose the friends which his Predecessors had gotten. And therefore his Ambassadors (although they seemed not to care for it) omitted nothing that might serue to reduce them into the right way, from the which the opinion of profit, more then the force of his friendship, had drawne them: thinking it reasonable to loue friends with their humors, not for the respect of the continuance of friendship, nor of their constancy, but for the honour of this Crowne. They would not bind the Kings word to any other thing then the payment of a million of gold, in discharge of their debt or pension. There must be another day to deliuer that which should be resolved by euery Canton, vpon the Kings offers and propositions. The petty Cantons appointed a Diet at Lucerna, to resolve of the difficulties they were in betwixt the alliances with France and Spaine, seeing they might not hold the one, but they must abandon the other. Their resolution was, to accept the renewing of the league, and to esteeme old friends for the best. Yet they did not publish it so soone, that it might be the better accepted: many daies were spent in generall assemblies at Bade and Soleure, to reduce it to an immutable point. Monsieur de Vic went vnto the Grisons, and procured an assembly to be called at Coire of the three Cantons and their commons in their Episcopall city: there were as many difficulties as the country is rough, the Spanish practices had so much withdrawne their affections from France, they could not dissemble the griefe they conceived for the confirmation of this League. The Count of Fuentes would not suffer any prouision to goe out of the Duchy of Milan, that the dearth and discommodity of victuals, might make the Grisons know that the friendship of Spaine was more profitable vnto them then that of France, and that they should not so much desire the number, as the profit of friends.

De Vic propounded the Kings intention to threecore and seuen Ambassadors deputed by the three Cantons of the Grisons, and to as many other chosen out of the country. They hold a great liberty of opinions in their assemblies, euery man speaks what he thinks. Heere they which made least shew, spake loudest, in the end they resolved to accept of the renewing of the League, adding therunto such preiudiciall conditions, as two of them were sufficient to make the League fruitlesse for the King. De Vic sayd vnto them, that they must not thinke that the King would endure any addition or deminution in the ancient Treaty, answering the sayd Articles by writing, to the end that the commons which were to determine thereon, might iudge that their reasons were not stronger then those which he had propounded vnto them, and their commodities and iustities greater with the Kings alliance, then with all others. Whilest that De Vic was with the Grisons, Sillery labored to dispose the 13 Cantons to the Kings will. But there was still more to resolve then had bene resolved on. The Swisses although they haue not the quicknesse of spirit as other nations, yet are they not lesse aduised in the conduct of their affaires. So as when the Kings Ambassadors thought that in the last Diet held at Soleure, there would be but one sitting, for that all difficulties had bene very exactly considered, they must yet haue patience for twelue dayes, with more crosses and difficulties then were euer treated of in Switzerland, for the like affaires; for both the Kings friends and enemies, had conspired not to consent to the conclusion of the Treaty, without assurance to be paid unreasonable sums euery yeere, besides the million of gold that was granted. The stay of the bringing of the Kings money did also greatly distast them that should haue the best share in the distribution. The more certaine the hope is, the more troublesome is the stay. This failing was insupportable vnto them, and thrust them into bad resolutions against the aduancement of the Kings affaires. So as the Ambassadors did thinke for a time they should get much, to breake with some, and to differ with others, rather then to tie the King vnto such forced conditions. But after much toyle of body and mind, the Treaty was concluded with the good liking of the superiors. There remained nothing but to haue the Duke of Biron come, to authorise by his presence, what had bene concluded by the Kings Ambassadors: he came in the end of Ianuary, well accompanied, and as well received by the Lords of that Common-weale, and by the Colonels and Captaines, to whom it seemed that they were in France, seeing him alwaies that had commanded ouer them in the Kings Army. The Duke spake vnto them in the generall assembly at Soleure in this sort: "Noble Lords, the King my Master (making the same esteeme which his Predecessors haue done, of your generosity, desiring the continuance of true friendship and faithfull alliance, which hath been of long time betwixt his Crown and your Commonalties) hath commanded me to come into your Country, for the happy ending of the Treaty, which the Seigneurs of Sillery, and de Vic, haue managed for the renewing of the League. His Majesty hath also commanded me to assure you of the account he makes of your faith, and that he will fully obserue the promises that shall be made vnto you. He doth also assure himselfe, that for your parts, you will bring all willingnesse and freedome, now that his Realme is the most flourishing, giuing more cause of enuy then of pity. He desires more earnestly to renew the ancient alliances that haue bene betwixt the Kings and Crowne of France, and your Common-weale, thinking that the good which shall rise thereby shall be profitable vnto you, and the best and most assured means to make you liue powerfully, and happily. I will conceale how highly I esteeme the honour which the King my Master hath done me, in making choice of me with these Gentlemen, to serue for good and holy a worke, and also to see my selfe with a Nation, which hath bene often (both in peace and war) cherished and esteemed by my deceased Lord and father, the Marshall of Iron, and of my self: For proofe of my affection, I offer you all that is in my power, being desirous to assist you with all fauour, and to serue you in that which a Knight of honour ought and may. The Kings alliance was accepted by the Suisses, publike thanks were giuen to God, and the Duke with the Ambassadors solemnly feasted. The alliance which before had bene contracted but for the Kings life onely, was concluded for the Dauphins also, after that of the Kings, and as many yeares after as were granted to the deceased King. The King receiued great content to see this Treaty so happily concluded, to the honour of his Crowne, contrary to the intent and practices of those that fought to hinder it.

The continuance of the League.

The King of Spaine had leauied a great army in Italy; men spake diuerly of his designs, some added, that D'Albigny was gone to Milan to the Count Fuentes; that the Marquis of Aix was in Spaine; that the Duke was ready to subiect himselfe wholly to the will of the Councell of Spaine, to whom he deliuered his two sonnes, having made them Knights of his order, to prepare them to the voyage, and had sent De Fourny (an extraordinary Ambassador to Rome) to beseech the Pope to send them his blessing. But the King knew well, that vnder these shewes and pretences, there were other negotiations to trouble his Estate, whereof he made no shew: yet such as did see him when hee was most free and priuate, discouered that his head was troubled, and that the toyle & weariness of his minde, was much more then that of his body. One day coming from hunting, being very penfue before the fire, with his hat on his eyes, he drew his sword, speaking some words vnto himselfe, then he turned towards the Vidam of Chartres, who was there present, asking him when La Fin his Vncle would come, and that he longed to see him. At the same time there were great reparations made at the Basille, rather to keepe that fast that was to be within it, then to resist without.

There are crimes whereof they make no shew vntill they be committed, but in cases of Treason they must thunder and lighten both together, and it is better to auoid the blow being far off, then to attend it, and not regard it, there being nothing so troublesome as to liue in continuall feare of conspiracies, the which the more they are dissembled, the more they are fortified. This winter the Queene made a rich and sumptuous maske, calling fifteene Princesses and Ladies of the Court vnto her, which represented fixteene Vertues, whereof the Queene made the first. The Duke of Vendome being attired like Cupid, marched before the Queene: but within few daies after he changed that habit into mourning, for the death of the Duke of Mercure his Father-in-law, who died of a pestilent feuer, on Twelfth day, in the City of Nuremberg, coming into France to prepare a greater expedition against the Turkes.

The death of Philip, King of France, of the name of D. of Mercure.

A complaint of the third Estate of Dauphiné.

The King was much grieved for his death: his funerals were made in Lorraine, and at our Ladies Church in Paris; the whole Court of Parliament did assist, and Francis de Sala (elect Bishop of Geneva) made the Funeral Sermon. During the publike sports in Court, the Kings Councell laboured to end the suit betwixt the Commons (or third Estate) and the two first Orders of Dauphiné.

The Commons complaining, that all the charges and publike oppressions were laid vpon them, without any helpe from the other Estates of the Prouince, although they made not the sixth part, being reasonable, that all the charges being common, they should be supported equally by all the Prouince, which (by her first condition) was declared free from all such charges, and with this freedom was giuen to the first Sonne of France. Euerie Order pleaded for his owne liberties.

This suite continued six yeares, during the which the parties made ample productions, the which were deliuered into the hands of Andrew Hurault, Seigneur of Maafles, one of the Kings priuy Councell, who before he made his report vnto the King and Councell, caused the whole Proceesse to be seene by the President of Commartin, and to Merle and Villegaignon, Masters of Requests of the Kings household, and heard the Deputies of the parties touching difficulties which did arise. The King would haue the Proceesse seene in his Councell, and that the sentence should be solemnly giuen in his presence, and with the aduice of the first Officers of the Crown, & chiefe of his Councell, whom he did particularly name. Many daies being spent in the report, & much pleading by the deputies of either part, the King ordained by decree a general order for the subsidies of Dauphiné.

A. The third Estate was not well pleased with this Decree, but in the end they were forced to remember, that in all Countries gouerned by an absolute Monarch, they might not enter into comparision with the other Orders.

The King having passed the Feast of Easter at Fontainebleau, prepared to goe to Blois, to Tours, and to Poitiers, and farther, if the good of his preference so required. Many beleued that his intent was to goe another way, which agreed well with their humors who breathed nothing but war. The great leauies which were made in Italy, the warlike humour of the Count of Fuentes, the great stirring of the D. of Sauoy, who could not liue in peace: the discontent of the Spaniards for the preiudicial conditions of the Treaty of Veruins, and many other considerations, gaue some shew of the common opinion of war.

The King had also some intelligence, that the Sea Army, prepared in the realme of Naples, had an enterprize vpon Prouence, although the Spaniards gaue it out, that it was for Algier; but the cleere sighted knew well that without some treason among the French, the Spaniards affaires were not in so good estate as to attempt any thing against France. The King was aduertised that the Duke of Biron was straitened by his duty, and assured moreover, that this disposition of his did not grow in an instant; and that he had not entered into these bad resolutions suddenly, if he had not had conference with strangers. He could not beleue that a spirit so vigilant, so aduise and so valiant, could suffer it selfe to be transported with such violent furies: and it seemed a dreame vnto him, that

The Duke of Biron's conspiracy discovered.

C. a man which had gotten so much honour, to whom his father had left so much, and who had receiued daily what he would from the King, should refuse to that which was contrary to his honour, and greatness of his courage. This good opinion made the King not beleue the aduice giuen him of his bad intentions, making no shew thereof, but would giue him the gouernment of Guienne, & 200000 crownes recompence, with the Castles of Trompet and Blay, to draw him from the frontier, which was more commodious for conference with them, who were resolu'd to draw him from France, or to ruine him.

They had fought him after the taking of Lan, when as they discouered, that hee was come to Paris in choller, for that the King had refused him something, wherewith he gratified the Duchesse of Beaufort: then they offered him two hundred thousand crownes yearly entertainment, and to be General of all the King of Spaines forces in France. As they had found him an Achilles in battell, so they found him an Ulysses to their words, stopping his eares at their enchantments, saying; That choller should neuer draw him from his duty: that although his nature were fiery and boyling in the feeling and apprehension of a wrong, yet his heart would neuer suffer this fire to consume the faith and loyalty which he ought vnto his Prince. Hereafter nothing of the offer which they made him, but onely the remembrance of the reparation and esteeme which they made of his valour; and euen then he suffered himselfe to be caried away with those motions, which often transpire the minde to infolency, and contempt of all things, when they see themselves assured of ease, how fouler the chance fall, and that they shall neuer bee vnder the seruitude of necessity. He was sometimes heard say, That he would not die before he had seene his head set vpon a quarter of a Crowne: that he would rather goe to a Scaffold to lose his head, then to an Hospitall to beg his bread: that he would dye young, or haue meanes to doe his friends good. Either Caesar, or nothing. Either a free life, or a glorious death: but he had neither of them. His designs made him vtter words of a Soueraigne, and so absolute, as the wife did impute it to extreme arrogancy, the which hath alwaies ruined and confounded them that entertaine it. It is a great happinesse for an Estate to haue great Captains, but nothing is so hard to entertaine, for when they thinke they haue bound their Country vnto them, although all they doe be lesse then their duties, they are easily discontented, and like Pausanias and Themistocles, seeke new alliances and friendship from enemies, if they be not rewarded to their own wils, and to the height of their ambition. The Duke of Biron had done great seruice to the King and Realme, so were his recompences so great, as no Nobleman of his quality in France but might enuy him: For being not yet forty yeares old, he had enioyed the chiefe dignities of the Realme. At fourteene yeares he was Colonell of the Suisses in Flanders. Soone after Marshall of the Campe, and then Marshall General. He was receiued Admirall of France in the Parliament at Tours, and Marshall of France in that of Paris. Hee acknowledged none but the King at the Siege of Amiens, and was his Maiesties Lieutenant General, although

The D. of Biron refused the gouernment of Guienne.

He refused entertainment from the Spaniards.

He said he would die a Souldier.

He was honoured with the first charges of the Realme.

there were Princes of the blood. To encrease his greatnesse, he was declared a Peere of France, and his Barony erected into a Duchy. And yet not content with all this, he said; He would not die, but he would straine higher. That he will goe no more to recover the Townes of Picardy, vnto the King set vp his Image in brasse before the Louvre, vnto the King still in his brauery some very dangerous speeches, and with such affection, as hee was not pleased with them that did not applaud them. When he saw after the siege of Amiens, that Britany was reduced and the war ended, he thought, that hauing no more vnto of his valor, he should haue no more credit: that hee should haue no more meanes to play the petty King, and to doe all that without feare which he did without iustice. Hee complained of the King, and of the vnequall recompence of his merits and seruice: hee proclaimed his discontent, adding threats to his complaints, speaking of the King with so small respect, as his most passionate seruants held his speeches to be insolent and dangerous. It was the defect of his nature, but fortune added something vnto it, for finding himselfe to abound with all the prosperities that a well ordered desire could wish for in his condition, he found that men lose themselves, being too much at their owne ease. The opinion of himselfe raised his thoughts so high, as hee valued himselfe at an incalimable price, thinking that his heart was not of the common temper of others; that there was no man living might equall him, and that none that were dead had attained to his merits. And although that in all his life he had shewed small zeale to religion; yet now when he prepared his heart to the motions of ambition, he would seeme very religious; protesting that he would be an irreconcilable enemy to the Protestants. La Noche, Seigneur of La Fin, was (by reason of the troubles of Prouence, and the quarrell of Des Diguieres) retired to his house, being threatened by the King, in quarrell with some great personages of the realme, and surcharged with debts and suits in law. The discontented doe still meet by appointment or by chance. The Duke of Biron (who knew that hee had bene employed in the Duke of Alancons affaires, that since he had negotiated with the ministers of the King of Spaine and the Duke of Sauoy, during the siege of Amiens, and that he had a heart full of discontent) imagined that he sought a Master. They talke together, and mixed their griefes and passions in one complaint, they propound to seeke that without the realme, which they could not find within it, and to enter in practice with the Duke of Sauoy: they resolute to aduise him of an intelligence which Des Diguieres had vpon the Fort of Barrault, the which he executed happily. Now after so many examples of incontinable dangers, the Duke of Biron abandons himselfe to a voyage full of dangerous rockes, and fearfull straights, vnder the conduct of a man who was yet wet with shipwracke which he had suffered.

Hee went into Flanders for the execution of the Treaty of Veruins, where Picote of Orleanse had conference with him, and inspired his heart with desire to raise his fortune with those who both knew and admired his merits. The Duke of Biron heard him, and made no shew to vnderstand him, and yet he left him in an opinion, that if hee came into France, he would be well pleased that he should speake more plainly vnto him of that subiect. The Spaniards did beleue that hee yielded, seeing he gaue ease, and assured themselves, either to win him, or to vndoe him. The King was aduertised by one which was then employed in the Archdukes Court, of this practice; but he sent him word, that the Marshall Biron was of too high a spirit to yeeld to so great a treachery. Being returned out of Flanders, the King would haue married him; but he made shew that his affections were otherwise settled. And although he gaue it out that he sought the Daughter of Madame de Luce, yet he treated to haue the other daughter of the Duke of Sauoy, whereof Cheualier Breton had spoken vnto him.

He discouers his discontent to La Fin.

La Fin had a promise from the Duke of Biron to do all he could to content his hopes. Picote had made a voyage into Spaine to receive directions. Farges (a religious man of the order of Cisterians) went into Sauoy, and so to Milan, to receive order how to teare this plaint from France: but the Duke of Sauoy being at Paris, pulled vp the Flower-de-Luce which was planted in his heart, and disposed him so to trouble the King within the Realme, as he should leaue him the Marquitate of Saluces in peace. Vpon this assurance the Duke of Sauoy had no meaning to effect the Treaty of Peace: war was proclaimed; the Duke of Biron takes the chiefe places of Breffe: being at Pierre Chastell in the beginning of September, La Fin comes vnto him, who by his order had made two voyages

He conceales the Kings aduice.

He is discontented for the refusal of the Citadell of Bourg.

He treats with the Duke of Sauoy and the Count of Fuentes.

They offer him one of the D. of Sauoyes daughters in marriage.

A voyages to Saint Claude, where Roucas met him. The King had aduice thereof, but hee thought it better to dissimble these practices, then to surprize the best of his seruants in his acts of infidelity. He was content to draw him into Sauoy, and to tell him that he must abandon la Fin, and not giue care to his bad perswasions. The King shewed him his error, to guide him in the right way, but as they which are posselt with this violent passion of desire to be masters, are no more capable of gouernment nor counsel, hee conceiued that what the King spake for loue, proceeded from feare, continuing still his practices with la Fin, and neuer going to see the King, but with a great troope. He made him beleue being at Annelly, that he desired to discover some passage, and demanded guides of the Country to that end, but it was only to let Renae passe to the Duke of Sauoy, to discover vnto him the estate of the Kings army, and to make D'Albigny retire with his troopes, the which without this aduice had bene cut in peeces.

It was at the same time when as the Duke of Biron intreated the King to giue the gouernment of the Citadell of Bourg to him that he should name. It is the nature of great men which serue Princes, to thinke they merit all, and to be more dangerous then enemies if they be refused what they demand. The King answered him, That hee would commit that place vnto de Buiffes. This denyall did so transport the Duke of Biron, and thrust him into such strange and deuillish resolutions, as one morning being in his bed at Chaumont, he made an enterprize vpon the Kings person, whereof mention is made in the deposition of la Fin and Renae, but it was not executed. He himselfe had horror of so execrable a thought.

La Fin went also from the army to conclude the bargain with the Duke of Sauoy and the Count of Fuentes. He treated first with the Duke, and the Ambassador of Spaine at Iuree, and then at Thurin with Roucas. He went to Milan to the Count of Fuentes, whither Picote also came, bringing an answer from the Count of Spaine, to the Duke of Biron's propositions, and order to conferre with la Fin, and to perswade him to make a voyage into Spaine. He said openly, that the King of Spaine desired to haue the Duke of Biron at what price and perill soeuer. The Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes appointed a day to meet at Some with the Ambassador of Spaine, La Fin and Picote.

There their minds were knowne, and all difficulties freed of either side. La Fin who had pierced into the secret of his counsels, sayd, That the marriage of the Duke of Sauoyes third daughter, was the Cyment to ioyne together and vnite all this treaty, with promise of five hundred thousand Crownes, and the transport of all the rights of the Souerainity of Bourgongne. A more settled iudgement, and greater constancy then that of the Duke of Biron, might haue bene troubled with such plausible and goodly offers: hee could not be seduced but by that Demon of Ambition, nor stumble but by that blindness.

The Duke of Sauoy gaue him more hope then assurance of this marriage, and it was not credible that he would accept of a meane Gentleman for his Sonne in law, who was not E of so great a House, but there were many better then his in France. Princes promise all, and hold nothing but what doth not preiudice their greatnesse. Whilest that la Fin treated of the Duke of Biron's capitulation in Italy, the treaty of peace at Lyons was concluded. The ignorant sayd, that the King had done ill in not proceeding, and that he should keepe that great rampier of the Alpes, for the frontier of Gaule. These were discourses of men which did not consider, how dangerous it is to goe farre from the frontier, and to leane behind his backe a strong conspiracy: without this peace the King had bene forced to passe the Alpes, the which had bin a favorable occasion for this treason. He was aduertised of the bad seruices the Duke of Biron did him: and that the enterprises which he had vpon the Citadell of Thurin, and the best places of Piedmont, were discovered by their F trechery, to whom he had trusted his Crowne and Scepter. A Prince that hath traitors in his army, neuer fighteth happily. Charlemagne repented his trust reposed in Ganelon, and Charles Duke of Bourgongne in Campobaccio.

The Duke of Biron had alwayes disswaded this peace. For that is alwayes the nature of Souldiers to desire worke at whose cost who soeuer, and not to haue rest, but in troubles, which they breed or entertaine. But finding that this peace must send him home to his gouernment, and that the King had some notice of his practices with la Fin, he seemed to be very penitent, & asked pardon of the King, walking in the Cloister of the Franciscan Friars at Lyons, beseeching him (with a countenance full of contrition and humility) to forget A his bad intentions, the which rage and despite for the Citadell of Bourg had possessed his heart with. The King pardoned him, saying; That he was well pleased that he had repented upon his clemency, and the love which he bare him, whereof hee would alwayes give him so good proofes, as he should have no cause to doubt, nor to attempt any thing against the assurance he had of his loyalty. Going from thence, he met with the Duke of Espernon, saying, That (as to his best friend) he would impart vnto him the best adventure that euer happened vnto him, hauing discharged his conscience from the terrors and horrors that did afflicke him: and that the King had pardoned him what was past, and had promised him all fauour hereafter. B The Duke of Espernon answered, That he was glad, but he must craue an abolishment for offences of that quality are not so easily remitted. How should I (said hee) assure my selfe better then in the Kings word? If the Duke of Biron must sue for an abolishment, what must others doe? The Duke of Espernon had reason to aduise him to take an abolishment, and the other was in no error in trusting to the Kings word, who had forgotten his fault, if he had done nothing since to renew the remembrance. But here they offered an act which had all the signes of an implacable hatred. The Duke of Biron being sent for by the King, to come and receiue his commandements, and the testimony of his clemency, parts from Bourg, and comes to layt Vinny. There hee made a dispatch to La Fin, who was at Milan. He goes to Lyons, and is receiued of the King, as the father doth his lost child, whom he hath found againe. He stayed some dayes at Lyons, and hauing accompanied the Queene at her departure, he returned to Vinny, where hee made another dispatch to La Fin by one Fargas. As soone as he comes to Bourg, hee sends away Besca (cousin to Rencas) to aduance the businesse.

This negotiation was continued at Some, betwixt the Duke of Sauoy, the Count of Fuentes, and La Fin. The Count of Fuentes led la Fin to Milan, desiring to be satisfied of some points, but finding his answers not constant, hee thought it not fit to trust the secret vnto him, but to dispatch him; who finding that he was vnpleasing vnto them in this negotiation, stayed not long there. Hereupon he sent him back, and requested him to passe by the Duke. But he did well in taking his way by the Grisons, to recouer Basil, Parentin, and Besancon, for Rencas his Secretary, who passed into Sauoy, was stayed prisoner. D The worke changed nothing but the instrument. Alphonse, Casal, and Rencas, continued it with the Baron of Lux. In the meane time the Duke of Biron slept not, hauing sent a man into Spaine, although he were neere vnto the King, who for that he would not lose him, kept him about him, he caried him to the frontier, and sent him into England, where he heard of the death of the Earle of Essex. A fresh example of iustice against those that seeke to be feared of their Masters, and abuse their loue. At his returne he made a voyage into Gascony, where he was honoured of the Nobility as a Prince; and being returned to Dijon, he went into Suizzerland, to conclude the renewing of the Kings alliance, where he continued his practices with the Count of Fuentes, to whom he sent his Secretary, vnder colour to conduct his Pages to Nova Palma, a Fort of the Venetians. Being returned out E of Suizzerland, he went not to giue an account of his charge, excusing himselfe vpon the holding of Estates of the Prouince. The King who had some inkling of these broyles (by Cambellan) desired greatly to speake with la Fin, to be informed of the truth. La Fin who had his heart big with despite, that the Baron of Lux would haue all the fruit of this negotiation: and that Rencas was detained prisoner in Sauoy, sent Cerezat to the Duke of Biron, to tell him that he could no longer be his seruant, if he did not deliuer him Rencas, aduertising him also that he could no longer deferre his going vnto the King, and that he desired to know what he would haue him say, touching things past. Hee made small account of one of his propositions, and spake of Rencas as if hee were no more among the liuing. Touching the otlier, he sayd to Cerezat, that hee was of opinion hee should goe to F Court with a small traine, and that hee should prepare himselfe at the first, to receiue words of choller and contempt from the King, the which hee should easily calme, in beseeching him to beleuee that the voyage which he had made into Italy, was onely for deuotion to our Lady of Loreto, and that passing by Milan and Thurin, they had charged him to propound the marriage of the Duke of Sauoyes third Daughter vnto him, which he would not hearken vnto, seeing his Maiestie would take the care to marrie him. He entreated and aduised Cerezat, to aduise la Fin, to dismiss all those that had made the voyages

to Court.

A voyages with him, especially a Curate, and to lay his papers in some place of safety, if he would not burne them, and to consider in the end, that he had in his hands, his life, his fortune, and his honour. La Fin came to the Court at Fontainebleau in the end of Lent, he spake first with the King, and with Villeroy alone, he had conference with the Chancellor in the night, with Rhospin in the Forrest, and with Sillery at the pressing place, being newly come out of Suizzerland. All had horror to see the writings, and to heare the designs which they vnderstood. We must not beleuee lightly: for slander is subtil, and doth seek to supplant the most innocent actions. But when the preservation of the State is in question, the most doubtfull things are not to be reiecte nor contemned. The King could hardly beleuee so great a wickednesse: the facility of his bounty made him hard of beleuee. B La Fin made him to see such apparant and certaine proofes of this conspiracy, as hee was forced to beleuee more then he desired. He declared all that had past in his voyages to the Duke of Sauoy, and the Earle of Fuentes, for the Duke of Biron, saying; That hee desired that the returne of the warre might haue troubled his Maiesty, and profited them that were the cause of it. But seeing that his sacred and inuolable person was not excepted, and that they made cruell designs against him, he had such horror, as he was resolu'd to giue him intelligence thereof, choosing rather to faile in his promise to the seruant, then in his duty to the Master.

The King full of clemency and bounty, was wonderfully grieued to see so vnnatural a C conspiracy: yet he said; that if the conspirators did their duties, and gaue him the meanes they might to preuent the bad designs of his enemies, hee would pardon them. If they weep (sayd he) I will weep with them. If they remember what they owe me, I will not forget what is due to them. They shall find me as full of clemency as they are void of good affections. I would not haue the Marshall of Biron the first example of the severity of my iustice, & that he should be the cause that my reigne (which hitherto hath bene like vnto a calme & clear skie) should be suddenly ouercast with clouds of thunder & lightning. And from that time his resolution was, that if the Marshall of Biron confessed the truth, hee would pardon him. His Council were of that opinion, so as he would employ himselfe effectually, to doe as much good for the seruice of his Estate against his enemies, as he had D practically ill among them. Of many papers which La Fin presented vnto the King, they made choise of seuen and twenty peeces, which were not those which concluded most against the Duke of Biron, but which made mention onely of him, the King being vnwilling to haue the rest discouered, to the end that the punishment of one, might serue for an example to all. The Chancellor kept these papers with such care, as he caused them to be sowed vnto his doublet, being loath to trust any one with them, or shew them till need required. The Baron of Lux was at Fontainebleau when La Fin arriued; the King sayd vnto him that hee was very well satisfied, that La Fin had spoken so honourably and so wisely of the Duke of Biron, that he knew well his intentions were not conuered to any bad designs, as they sayd. Hee returned to Dijon well content, thinking that all things E were found.

La Fin writes to the Duke of Biron, that hee had satisfied the King of his actions, and hath said nothing but what hee thought might serue to banish all bad impressions. The King managed the businesse so wisely, as the count was happy, making shew to feare no enemies but abroad. He grew iousal of the arming of so many gallies at Genoa for the King of Spaine, vnder colour of the Prince of Piedmonts passage, lest they should haue some enterprize vpon Prouence. He therefore commanded the Dukes of Guise and Ventadour, to be carefull of their charges. Hee writ to the Governour of Lions (whose intent was to spend some part of the Summer at Chaumont) to returne to Lyons, for that hee was aduertised from all parts, that his enemies had some designe there, whereof they F vaunted.

He commanded Des Dignieres to goe to horse-backe if need were, and when the Governour of Lions should send for him; and he caused the Marquis of Spinola's troops to be obserued, the which were ready to passe at Pont de Grefin to go into Flanders, the which in truth were but to couer the Duke of Biron's practices.

The King parted from Fontainebleau to goe to Blois and so into Poictou. There are alwaies in States (as in great bodies) swellings and bad humors, which are not to be cured by violent remedies, but gently & by the Princes presence. There were in Guienne & Poictou diuers motions, which could not be disperfed, but by the light of the King. He refolued A to goe into thofe quarters, and to fhew himfelfe vnto them glorious in peace, who had neuer feene him but triumphant in warre. He paff to Blois, Tours, and then to Poitiers. His prefence did pacifie all mutinies which grew by reafon of the impofition of a Soule vpon a Litter, and through the apprehenfion which was giuen the people, that hee would giue garifons to fome Townes, and Citadels to others, and to all in generall an encrease of their miferies. The first decree

cates.

The great trouble of the Palace at Paris, by the intermiffion of hearing of caufes, and the diffimifion of Aduocates (the which happened the 12 of May, a fatal moneth for the Parisiens by a greater reuolt) femed to preface fome new ftorme. The caufe grew from a Decree of the Court, giuen againft Aduocates, and by the Kings authority and exprefle commandement, who before he parted from Paris to paffe the Eaſter at Fontainebleau, C ſent for the chiefe of the Court of Parliament, and of all the other Courts, to recommend their charges vnto them. From whose owne mouth they vnderftood, how much hee defired that iuſtice might be adminiſtered with leſſe charge, and leſſe loſſe of time: that there was no iuſtice for them that had no money; ſo exceſſiue were the Iudges Spices, and the Aduocates Fees. The Court of Parliament deſiring that according to the Kings mind, intention, and laſt command, the exceſſe (whereof they complained) againſt the Aduocates might be reduced to a meane and iuſt temper, aſſembled to redreſſe thoſe diſorders. The opinions being heard and numbred, againſt Aduocates, the firſt Preſident ſhewing that a reformation was as neceſſary in Iudges as in Aduocates; in the end, a decree was made, by D the which it was ordained and appointed, that euery Aduocate ſhould fet downe vnder his owne hand, in the end of his writings, what he had taken for his owne fees, to the end that in caſe of exceſſe, it might be moderated, when as the Court ſhould proceed to iudgement of the proceſſe. Moreover, they ſhould giue a certificate what they had taken for the pleading of caufes, to be ſet down in the taxe of charges, all vpon paine of extortion. This law was not made againſt the good, but onely to reſtraine the auarice of others, who preferre the opportunity of taking, before all apprehenſion. All, notwithstanding, did oppoſe themſelues againſt the execution of this law, ſaying, That they would rather leaue their places, then ſubiect themſelues to the rigour of the Decree, and doe ſo great a wrong to the dignity and liberty of their profeſſion.

The ſecond decree againſt Aduocates.

The Court made another Law, whereby it was decreed, That ſuch as would not plead, E ſhould deliuer their names vnto the Register, after which they were forbidden to praactice as Aduocates, vpon paine of falſhood. This ſecond Decree was pronounced in open aſſembly in the houſe of the Kings Atturney generall. The next day there went out of the Chambers of Conſultation, by two and two, to the number of three hundred and ſeuene, they paſt through the Palace Hall, went to the Register to giue vp their hoods, and to declare that they obeyed the ſecond Decree, ſeeing they could not obey the firſt.

the Aduocates.

From that time the Palace was without pleading, the Aduocates being buſied to defend themſelues, yet the toyle was not great for them to maintaine a bad caufe for themſelues, which had defended ſo many for others. The caufe was bad indeed, for that it F did impugne the iuſtice of a Law made at the Eſtates of Blois, and that it ſeemed private men would know more then the law it ſelfe. They cauſed a Declaration to bee publiſhed at Paris, in the name of a young Aduocate, but it was written by one of the learnedſt of the Palace, declaring, That as of cuſtome they ſhould reſerre their reward to the diſcretion of the parties; the reaſons were grounded vpon the fidelity, diſcretion, learning, and eloquence of the Aduocates of the Court of Parliament of Paris, to whom they could not reproach preuarication, or filthy contracts, ſo ordinary heretofore at Rome, or

A or that they euer had proceſſe for their fees, although they plead infinit caufes, for the which through the pouerty or miſpriſion of parties, the Aduocates haue not any thing, and others for the which they receiue no recompence, but a yeare, yea three or foure after their employments. They ſhewed, that they could not iudge of the exceſſiue fees of a Pleader, vnleſſe they knew the time which had bene employed to perſue the writings, and to ſtudy the queſtions, and that ſometimes bare words coſt more whole nights, then a long diſcourſe, which ſhall containe many Citations, will require quarters of houres. That for this reſpect the Preſident Then in a famous cauſe, after that hee had pronounced ſentences, ſaid, (as hauing charge from the Court) that all which Princes and Noblemen B gaue vnto their Aduocates, could in no fort equal the recompence which their care, diligence, and knowledge did merit. That this profeſſion is very laborious and painfull, to the which the gate of the greateſt dignities of the Realme was open, when as they knew not what it was to buy ſuch offices. That there is nothing comparable to the apprehenſion of an Oratour, to loſe in one day the reputation which hee hath purchaſed in thirtie yeares, when as he ſpeakes in the preſence of 3000 perſons which neuer heard him, and that an inconfiderate word or defect of memory (wherein the greateſt Oratours haue failed) ſhould blemiſh all the fruits of their ſtudy. That this profeſſion being an Art which conſumes much, it ſhould be fauoured, to the end that ſuch as are in that courſe, might be encouraged to perſeuer, and others inuited which might ſucceed them. That C next to the Art of warre, there is nothing more generous, then to oppoſe themſelues to the violence of great men, notwithstanding all their ſecre and open threats: and to make Truth, Equity, and Juſtice, to ſhine through a million of clouds, which they would obſcure by diuers Contracts: To cauſe the wicked to tremble, to encourage good men, and to be a Sanctuary to innocents oppreſſed; and by the lively force of an eloquent diſcourſe, capable to moue rocks, to breake the hardneſſe of mens hearts banded to ſupport iniuſtice and wrong; and according to occaſions which ſhould be preſented, extoll vnto heauen, his Prince and Country. That it was impoſſible that they which had attained to the moſt difficult Sciences in the world, ſhould ſubmit themſelues to the ſcandall of Solicitors, who would giue leſſe to the Aduocate then their maſters had commanded them, and to couer D their theft they would make them beleue, that they would not giue them quitrances for ſuch a ſumme, although they had taken all. That the very day this order ſhould take place, all liberties ſhould be baniſhed from the Bar, there being few which could reſolve to liue otherwiſe, then vnder the Lawes which great perſonages haue made, hauing immortalized their names by their learning and eloquence, who could not doe any thing againſt their honour, no more then againſt their conſciences, flying diſhoneſt things, not as vnlawfull, but as ſhamefull and reproachfull. That poſterity will neuer approve the counſell which ſome would giue his Maieſty, to be the firſt that ſhould begin to diſſauour thoſe which had bin alwaies held & eſteemed among the beſt & moſt pregnant wits of his kingdom, and who by their golden pen and immortall founding voyce doe conſecrate to eternitie the worthy actions, and glorious deeds of armes, of great Kings, and great Captains: yet could they not moue the Court to reuoke or change the Decree, they were forced to haue recourſe vnto the King, to reconcile this diſuſion, which happened vpon a day, which reuined the memory of a greater trouble, he ſent his Letters to the Parliament, in termes conformable to his iuſtice, and the wiſedome of his Councell. By the which it was lawfull for Aduocates to exerciſe their functions, as they had done before the ſaid Decree, enioyning them notwithstanding to obſerue the ordinance made at Blois in that behalfe, in the 161 Article. The parties which had ſutes did languish in expectation of this Declaration. As they complained of the corruption, ſo they ſuffered the inconueniency of the remedy.

F The Court which had made many iuſt and ſeuere Lawes againſt Duels and Combats, confirmed the Edict which the King made at Blois. Before his Maieſties departure from Fontainebleau, he had commanded the Conſtable, Chancelor, Marſhals of France, and the chiefe of his Councell, to deuſe ſome meanes to ſuppreſſe the libertie of Duels, being ſo iniurious and preiudiciall to his Eſtate. By their aduice an Edict was made, by the which they that call, or are called, or which aſſiſt, or ſecond him that calls, or is called, are declared guilty of high treaſon, and to be puniſhed according to the rigour of the Lawes. vinces, to prevent Duels, and to forbid them vpon paine of death; to iudge absolutely as they shall thinke good, of all that concerns the reparation of wrongs, and to force them that are condemned, to satisfie by imprisonment. It is true, that the custome of fighting is stronger then the Law, that the obedience of the law is alwayes held for faintnesse of heart; and to kill in single combat not for iniuries and offences alone, but for opinions and shadowes of offences, is but a sport, being to be feared that Duels will bee as ordinary in France as in the Realme of Narbonne, whereas the King doth not onely allow them, but doth also assist, and giues markes of honour and recompence to the victors, vpon condition that another might take it from him by the same means that he had gotten it, in measuring their armes. But it is lost labour to prescribe lawes to them who thinke their courages cannot be subiected, nor the French kept from fighting, being of such an humor as they cannot lue otherwise, but must with the losse of their liues pay their apprenticeship of fencing. Whilst the enemy watched to ouerthrow this Estate, & that to minister occasion to speak of them, they would let Diana's Temple on fire, and consume obedience to ashes, the King neglected not the means to crosse their designs. The voyage which hee made into Poitou, diuerted the effects, and reclaimed them to their duties which by perswasions and dangerous impressions were gone astray. And although wee haue some feeling of the last Frenzie, and that the Feuer which hath possessed the body, hath in it some bad humours, that the people is by nature variable and easily drawne away. Yet the pretexts which they tooke to moue them, were reiected like drugges which had taken wind, and bitter pills guilt ouer with goodly hopes, to profit by the charge of the present estate. In the end, the King effected this business happily in Poitou: he found so great an obedience in them to please him, as he remained very well satisfied. His Maiesty left so many testimonies in all places of his bounty, as all had cause to praise him, and to blame the practices which fought to trouble the peace. The Duke of Biron did not thinke the King should haue found so great obedience and loue, among his subiects of that Prouince. He had sent some of his seruants to Court, to learne how the market went, and to shew the discontent he had for the iealousie which was conceiued of his faith and dutie. The King who was well informed of his intelligences with the Count of Fuentes, resolved to see him, and to keepe him from his enemies. He sent Desportes vnto him, with charge to say, that hauing intelligence of the great leaues of souldiers made in Italy, he had resolved to maintaine the body of an army vpon the frontier, and to giue the charge vnto him, and to that end he had commanded de Vic his Ambassador in Suisse, to demand a leaue of six thousand men, and to cause them to march where he should haue directions: that therein he followed the counsell of the Constable his gossip, whose aduice he sent him in writing, and desired to haue his by mouth, coniuering him to come with speed. Hee stirres not for all that, excusing himselfe sometimes vpon the holding of the Estates: sometimes, that the enemy being so neare, it were an act vnworthy of his reputation to turne his backe and to abandon his frontier. The King sent the President Janin, a man powerfull in perswasion, who comming to Dijon, gaue the Duke to vnderstand how much the King desired to see him, and how necessary this fight was, and among many discourses (applied fitly to his humor) he let him know the Kings strength, and the length of his arme. This was not able to moue him. He considered that the Duke of Biron must be perswaded to this voyage, by him that was all of his counsell, whom he assured that as hee should haue all the honour of this perswasion, so he could expect nothing but disgrace and ruine of a contrary counsell. His friends notwithstanding did conuere him not to come: one of his best friends sent him word by his brother, that his government was disposed of, and that for his last hope he aduised him to retire into the Franchie Conté. Another friend sent him word that he should distrust all he saw, and all that should be said vnto him to moue him to come: that the Kings letters were golden pills: that la Fins assurances were but deceits; and to consider that the voyage which the Vidame of Chantres had made to Autun (to assure him that his Vncle had sayd nothing) was made at the Kings charge. But another friend sent him a contrary aduice to come, and that his onely presence would disperse all these bad reports. There was danger in either. The King swore he would go fetch him; Hee should haue seene himselfe besieged with the Kings forces, and farre from the strangers which had charge to passe into Flanders. In going, the foulness of his offence could giue him no hope to returne. Hee takes that aduice which he thinks lesse perillous; and nothing

backe.

A nothing doth so much aduance the execution, as the assurance hee takes of that which La Fin had written vnto him, whom he sees returned to his house contented, and freed from all distrust. So the duke promised to come vnto the King about the mid of Iune, to some of his houses nere vnto Paris. It was a signe of distrust which the King dissembled, as being indifferent vnto him. The President Janin goes before, and the Duke of Biron with Desportes follow after by easie iourneys.

Vpon the way hee had an aduice sent him to come no further, and being at Montargis he was in great suspense, but hee had so great a confidence of himselfe, and of the opinion which all the Court had of his valour, as he did not beleue there was any man so hardy as B to lay hold of him, and that if he might haue but means to draw his sword, he would free himselfe from his enemies. Hee flattered himselfe in his vanity, and pleased himselfe as Pigmalion did in his Image, and Narcissus in his Shadow. The counsell which they gaue him to humble himselfe vnto the King, was the last anchor of his health. He found no man that spake for his pride, but euery man would haue intreated for his humilitie: But his courage was too great to stoop. Presumption had filled his eares with so much vanity, as the voice of Truth could not enter. If hee were not resolved to take that course what need he come? He should consider that he had offended the King, that offences of Princes are fixed starres, their fauours are moueable, and are like to the Egyptian wheeles. That if the King had had no other proofe of his bad designs, but what suspicion and opinion C might giue him, it had bene alwayes dangerous to approach. If hee had knowne nothing but by dreames and diuinations, yet should he thinke it had bene sufficient to put him to death. We must thinke (said Neslor to Agamemnon) that all that a Prince doth dreame for the conduct of his Estate is true. And if the innocencie of that whereof hee was accused, had assured him of his returne, yet should he consult with his conscience: it is better to rely in her, then in all the assurances which the offence can imagine, to free him from the punishment which followeth him, as the shadow doth the body. The conscience is the Accuser, the Witnesse, and the Iudge of the most secret crimes, the pursuits and torments whereof cannot be auoided.

These with other reasons were giuen to stay him in his iourney. But it is impossible to D auoid the providence of Heauen. The Duke of Biron will needs carie his head to the Kings Iustice. The discourse of Reason, or the iudgements of Truth preuaile not with a spirit transported with passions. There were many bad prefaces of the Dukes voyage. A Duke came into his Cabinet and no man knew how, hee commanded it should be carefully kept, but as soone as hee was parted it died. Presently after, the horse which the Archduke gaue him, called Passerana, fell mad and killed himselfe. The like hapned to a horse which he had from the great Duke. Another horse which the Duke of Lorraine gaue him, pined to death.

He came to Fountainbleau, when as they had no more hope of his comming, and the King had resolved within two or three dayes after to goe into Bourgongne. His Maiesty E walking in the great garden about six of the clocke in the morning, was heard say vnto the Lord of Souvray. He will not come? Hee had scarce spoken these words, but hee sees him enter with him. The King said, hee comes fitly to conduct him to his house. Hee aduanced and makes three great courtesies a good distance off. The King embraced him and said, that hee was come in good time to conduct him to his house: which words were diuersly vnderstood by the hearers. The first words he vsed vnto the King, were vpon the occasion of his comming, beginning to excuse his long stay. The King gaue care to few words, but tooke him by the hand, to walke and shew him the plot of his building.

Passing from one garden to another, the Duke of Elperton saluting the Duke of Biron, told him in his eare, that in comming hee had giuen more credit to his owne courage, then to the counsell of his friends. In all the discourse which he had with the King, as there appeared coldnesse in the countenance of the one, so there was some signe of perturbation in the other words. The King talked vnto him of the bad course hee had taken, the which had no other issue, then ruine, repentance, and despair. The Duke of Biron answered, That hee was not come either to iustifie himselfe, or to demand pardon, or to accuse his friends. He let scape many other words, which his Maiesties presence and the law of duty should haue restrained. It is not sufficient to be faithful, if his tongue and heart doe not witness his loyalty.

The Duke of Biron not respectful.The Duke of Biron justifies himself.

Dinner time being come, he desired to dine with the Duke of Espernon, for that his owne Trainee was not yet come. After dinner they came to see the King, who hauing walked a little in the Hall, retired into his Cabinet, commanding two or three to enter, and said nothing to the Duke of Biron, who stayed at the corner of the bed towards the chaire, observing that he was not respected as he had wont to be, and that he was no more in opinion and admiration as he had beene. The Marquis of Rhosny entred into the Cabinet, and hauing stayed there almost halfe an hour, he came forth and saluted the Duke of Biron, telling him, that the King asked for him. There he was perswaded not to conceale that which time could not long keep hidden, and whereof the King was so well informed, that what he desired to know from the Dukes owne mouth, was but to let him see, that B none but himselfe should haue knowledge thereof.

The Duke of Biron (who thought that La Fin had not discovered any thing) continued still firme, vpon the protestations of his innocency, beseeching the King to doe him iustice against them that sought to oppress him by slanders: insupportable to a conscience so cleare as his was, or to suffer him to take his reuenge by the sword. The King led him to the Tennis-court: he could make the match, saying, That the Duke of Espernon and hee, would play against his Maiestie and the Count of Soissons. The Duke of Espernon answered presently, Tou play well, but you make your matches ill. At night hee supped with the Lord Steward. It appeared he was not content. Hee ate not any thing, no man spake to him, and they held him for a man abandoned to misfortune. Yet hee thought no man would lay hand on him, trusting too much in his owne courage. The King in the meane time walked in his chamber, deuising of some great resolution, he was heard speake these words, He must bend or breake. He gaue him time to take counsell of his conscience, and to evaporate those bad humours which did choke him. The night past so quietly as many thought it would be, but a thunder-clap, which made a great noise, and did little harme; that the King would rest satisfied to haue discovered the Treason, and taken all means from the Traitors to hurt him, not being conuenient to discover all the conspirators. He commanded the Count of Soissons to goe to the Duke of Biron, and to do what he could to dissolue the hardnesse of his heart, and to draw the truth from him: he goes vnto him, hee coniuers and aduises him, to thinke of that which hee thought least of, to humble D himselfe, and to feare the Lyons paw, and the indignation of a King. The Duke of Biron answered, That the King could not complaine but of the good seruices hee had done him, and that he had great reason to complaine that hee suspected his loyalty, hauing given him so many proofes.

The Count of Soissons hauing observed his humour, and what little fruit might be drawne from his obdurate heart, by any more perswasions, who beleued that the King had sent him to draw something from him, he left him. Early the next morning the King walking in the little Garden, he sent for the Duke of Biron, and talked long with him, thinking to reclaime him, and to giue him means to free himselfe from the mischief into the which hee did runne headlong by his wilfulness. Hee continued long bare-headed, lifting E his eyes vp to heauen, bearing his brest, and making great protestations to maintaine his innocency. There appeared choller in the Kings countenance, and by the Duke of Biron's behaviour there seemed fire in his words.

From thence the Duke went to dinner, by the way he met one with a Letter which aduised him to retire himselfe: he shewed it to the Capaine of his Guard, who wished that he had beene stabbd with a Dagger, so as hee had not come. Hee mocked at all them which fore-told his fall, and seemed alwayes hardy and bold in his answers. The King heard his braueries coldly, but not able to apply himselfe to dissemble, which is held a new vertue in Princes, he still cast out some words of the bad estate into the which his wilfulness would bring him. The King was much troubled in minde before he could resolve: the Lords of F Villeroy, Sillery, and Geure went and came often, before they could vnderstand whereunto it tended.

Many thought it was to shorten the course of Iustice, in so apparant a crime, and begin with the execution, dealing with the Duke of Biron, as Alexander did with Permenio: for Princes are Masters of the Lawes, they haue one forme of Iustice for Great men, and another for those whose quality requires not so great respect. In these accidents there is no difference whether blood be drawn before or after dinner; Necessitie teacheth the disorder

A disorder, and the profit doth recompence the Example, so as the Estate bee preferred by the death of him that is preuented. But the King will none of that. Hee proceeds with more courage and generositie: these examples of execution had beene blamed in his Predecessors, hee will haue his subiects, and all the world to know, that hee hath power and authoritie sufficient to root out by the forme of Iustice, not the authors of such a conspiracie, for they bee diuels, but the complices and the instruments how terrible fouler. Hee will haue the solemnities and lawfull ceremonies observed, and that they be iudged by the rigour of the Lawes. He vseth no Proscriptions, he makes no Proclamations, that hee will giue 100000 crownes to him, that shall bring the Conspirators heads, B and will make his house Noble: he sends for them, they come, and being come, hee punisheth them.

The resolution was taken to apprehend him, and in like sort to seize vpon the Count of Auvergne. The King would not haue them taken in the Castle, but in their lodgings. The Duke of Biron who had some doubt thereof, and who was prepared for that which hee could not fore-see nor preuent, thought that hee needed not to feare any thing in the Kings Chamber, and that all the danger were at the going forth; and therefore hee prouided himselfe of a short sword, with the which he presumed to make his passage. They gaue the King to vnderstand, that if hee were apprehended in any other place, it must needs be bloody: that to auoid an inconuenience, it was good to passe ouer resp. As that C were more vaine then necessary. The King walking in the Gallery, called for Vitry and Pralin, and gaue them order how hee would haue his commandements executed, and then he called for his supper.

The Duke of Biron supd at Montignies lodging, where hee spake more proudly and vainly then euer, of his owne Merits, and of the friends hee had gotten in Switzerland. Then he fell to commend the deceased King of Spaine, his Piety, Iustice, and Liberalitie. He praised D Montigny stayed him suddenly, saying, That the greatest commendation they could giue vnto his memory, was to haue put his owne Sonne to death, for that he had attempted to trouble his Estates.

This speech brake off the Duke of Biron's discourse, who answered but with his eyes, D and thought of it with some little amazement. After supper the Count of Auvergne and the Duke of Biron came to the King, who walked in the garden. They were wel accompanied, intending to haue gone with a lesse trainee. It was said the Dukes horses were sadled ready to be gone, and that he had asked leaue in the morning. The King hauing done walking, invited the Duke of Biron to play; they entred into the Queenes Chamber. The Count of Auvergne passing by the Duke at the entry of the doore, said vnto him in his ear, We are undone. There played at Primero, the Queene, the Duke of Biron (vpon whom all the mischief must fall) and two others. The King played at Cheffe, and in playing did act the part of Vlisses, going and comming to giue order to his affaires. It appeared that his spirit was troubled with a weighty action. He entred into his Cabinet, being E perplexed with two contrary passions, doubtfull whereunto he should yeeld. The loue which he had borne to the Duke of Biron, the knowledge he had of his valour, and the remembrance of his seruices, made him to reiect all thoughts of Iustice, and to intreat him, as Licurgus had done him that put out his eye. On the other side, feare of trouble in his Estate, and the apprehension of the execrable effects of so vnnatural a conspiracie, accused his clemencie of cruelty, which preferred the priuate before the publike. Hee prayed vnto God to assist him with his holy Spirit, to pacifie the combat which hee felt in his soule, and to fortifie him with a holy resolution, to that which should bee for the good of his people, ouer whom he commanded by his onely grace.

His prayer being ended, all difficulties which troubled him were dispersed, and he fully F refused to deliuer the Duke of Biron into the hands of Iustice, if he might not otherwise draw the truth from him of his disloyall enterprises. They continued play still, the King taking the Queenes place sometimes, attending the end of his resolution. The Count of Auvergne was retired: The King sent for him, and walked vp and downe the Chamber whilst the Duke of Biron dreamt of nothing but his game. Perennes Lieutenant of his company, making a shew to take vp his cloake, told him in his ear, That hee was undone. This word troubled him so, as he neglected his game. The Queene observed it and told him, That he had mis-reckoned himselfe to his owne losse. The King said, That hee had played enough, enough, commanding every man to retire. He entred into his Cabiner, and commanded the Duke of Biron to enter with him, whose health or ruine depended vpon an answer pleasing to his Maiefty. Who would him once for all to declare what hee had done with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes, and that he should assure himselfe, his clemencie should be greater then his fault. The Duke of Biron who beleueed that hee defenced death that demanded life, had not the heart to humble himselfe, nor the tongue to craue pardon. He answered the King more boldly then euer, That they had over-press an honest man, and that hee neuer had any other designe, then that which hee had said. I would to God it were so, replied the King, but you will not tell me: Adieu, good night.

As he goes out of the Cabiner, and had past the Chamber doore, hee met with Vitry, B who layes his hand vpon his sword, and demands it of him by the Kings commandement. From me (said the Duke of Biron) to take away my sword who haue so well serued the King? my sword, who haue ended the warre, and haue settled a Peace in France? That my sword which my enemies could neuer take from me, should be taken from me by my friends. He intreated the Duke of Montbazon to beseech the King, to giue him leave to deliuer it into his owne hands. The King sent Vitry charge to doe his commandement. The Duke of Biron was forced to suffer them to take it from him, and in deliuering it, hee cast his eyes about him, to see if he could seize vpon some other, but they had pruned him. When as hee saw all the guard placed in order in the Gallery, he thought they would haue slaine him, and demanded something in his hand. That he might haue the honour to dye in defending himselfe, and some little time to pray vnto God. They answered him; That there was not any man would offend him, that they had no other charge from the King, but to conduyt him to his lodging. You see (said he in passing) how they intreat good Catholikes.

He was conducted to the Cabiner of Armes, whereas hee neuer slept nor lay downe. Pralin went to the Count of Auvergne, declared vnto him the Kings commandement, and demanded his sword; Hold, take it said the Count, it hath neuer killed any but wilde Boares, if thou hadst aduertised me of this, I had been in bed and asleepe two houres since. These two Noblemen were like vnto two Torches, which being held downward are quenched with the wax which did nourish them and giue them light. And as if all the Dukes power had beene in his sword, as soone as hee had deliuered it, hee remained as a body without a soule, and was in a moment deprived of all that which Galba held most precious amongst men, faith, liberty and friendship. There came no word out of his mouth but did offend God or the King. He suffered himselfe to be caried away with extreme impatience. The fore-sight of misery which doth moderate it in others, made it insupportable to him, cursing himselfe and his indiscretion, in that he had not beleueed his good friends, who aduised him to make his peace a farre off. This choller in effect was not much vnlike vnto a mad-man, but in the continuance: for suddenly he reclaimed himselfe, and considered that all his cries and words, were not of force to saue him.

Precisely dispatches were made to all the Princes and Porentates of Christendome, to Governors of Proouinces, and to Ambassadors, who were amazed in this accident, as of a most odious conspiracy, by a persion that was so much obliged. Those which fauoured it, gaue out false brutes in Italy, that it was a blow giuen to Religion, to weaken it in the ruine of him who said that he desired no more glorious title, then to be furnamed the Scurge of Huguenots. That it was an aduice from England to breake the Iavelins one after another. The King would haue these false impressions made cleere by the light of truth, even when as the passion of his enemies did seeke to obscure it.

One writing out of the Realme vpon this subiect, said, That it was no question of Religion, but to dismember the Crowne, and to diuide it at the discretion of the Councell of Spaine, and the Duke of Sauoy, rooting out the King and his Race. It may be the Authors and Vnder-takers would haue bene troubled in the execution of their designe, C though we had not prevented them, as now we haue. But it was the end whereunto they aspired. The names of many haue been drawne in vnknowne to them, the which the Kings Justice might well discerne and verifie: you must not bee moued with the brutes which say abroad, but beleue what I write vnto you, for it is the very truth. The next day about dinner time, the Duke of Biron sent to tell his Maiefty, That if hee tooke not order for B Bourgundy it was lost, for that as soon as the Baron of Lux, should heare of his imprisonment hee would vndoubtedly deliuer Dijon, and Beaune vnto the Spaniard. These words did

A did greatly offend the King, who said; Behold the boldnesse and impudency of the Mar- shall Biron, who sends me word, that Bourgundy is lost, if I take not order, and that the Baron of Lux will draw in the Spaniard when he shall heare of his imprisonment. His obstinacie hath vndone him, if he would haue told me the truth of one thing, whereof I haue proofe by his owne hand writing, he should not be where he is; I would I had paid two hundred thousand crownes, that he had giuen me means to pardon him. I neuer loued any so much as him. I would haue committed my Sonne and Realme into his hands. Hee hath done me good seruice, yet he cannot deny but I haue thrice saued his life. I drew him out of the enemies hands at Fontaine Francoise, so wounded, and so amazed with blowes, B that as I played the souldier to saue him, I also play'd the Marshall to make the retreat, for he told me that he was not then in case to doe it, nor to serue me.

The King attended not this aduertisement from the Duke of Biron, for hee had already sent the Marshall Lanardin to settle his Authority in that Prouince, with a resolution to march in person if there were need. His enemies were not without feare, doubting that he would proceed farther, nothing being so much to be feared as an enemy that hath alwayes vanquished. About fifteene dayes before, Bourge l'Espinaffe receiued a Commission to raise a Regiment of ten Companies, and Nereflan had the like to supply his. The order was to send them into Prouence, but necessity had drawne them into Bourgongne, with two Regiments of Suisses, vnder the commands of the Colonels, Galaty and Heyd, and a great quantitie of Artillery drawne out of the Arcenall of Paris, and that of Lions, if all the country had not presently yielded obedience to their Prince.

The President Ianin made many voyages thither with great expedition. Some of the Duke of Biron's seruants had a desire to reuolt. The Baron of Lux was retired to Saux, the King sent them word that they must seeke the prisoners liberty by proofes of obedience, and not by effects of rebellion, and that he would iudge of his intentions by the behaviour of his seruants. The townes of Dijon and Beaune intrenched themselves against the Castles, who (acknowledging that it were not only a rashnesse, but an iniustice to fall from their obedience) deliuered the places into the Marshall Lanardins hands for the King. Breffe continued quiet through the care of Boesfe. All France was in peace, every man desisting the Duke of Biron, and his adherents.

The King seemed to be very well satisfied, seeing things to succeed better then he expected, having found all obedience and submission in them who in shew were most bold and resolute to trouble his affaires. He was more respected and feared of them then euer, and there was no man so great, but did humble himselfe. He said openly, that he was resolved not to endure his subjects to play any more with their King, abusing his bounty as many had done, contemning his actions as vniustly and rashly as without punishment. The prisoners were led to the Bastile at Paris on the Saturday after. The Duke of Biron going in the boat seemed heauy and pensif. The Count of Auvergne was merry and dined. The Duke of Biron entred into the Bastile as into a graue: The Count of Auvergne went E as to the Louure, and imagined that the place where he should be, could not bee a prison: The King entred into the City the same night, and the people with great cries of ioy, blessed his returne, and praised God for their captiuitie that would haue brought France againe into seruitude.

This great Prince who like vnto Augustus neuer thought of the death of the least of his subjects but with sighs, did shew that a father cuts off his members with griefe. Some dayes after a Gentleman coming to doe his dutie to his Maiefty, said vnto him that he held his life, fortune and honour of him, and that hee came for to doe him homage; to whom the King answered aloud, that he might be vnderstood; I know you well, if every one did resemble you, I should not be in the paine I am. There were new forces which passed F the Alpes. The Spanish Ambassador demanded passage for Flanders, beseeching the King not to beleuee that his Master was acquainted with the Duke of Biron's designs.

There was some likelihood that their journey was not so farre, for they could not but arriue too late, Count Maurice was entred into Brabant, to passe into Flanders to the reliefe of Ostend. The Archduke was prepared to hinder him; they must measure their forces, and it was most certaine before this new armie had past the Alpes, they had met. This made their marching to be much suspected, and had done more, if the President Ianin had not assured the King, that the Baron of Lux would not giue care to the officers that that were made him, promising to bring him to the Court, where the King offered him A all fury.

The King commands the Marshal Liancourt to exempt upon the frontiers.

The estate of the prisoner in the Bastille.

The Greave is the public place of execution in Paris.

His words in prison.

His Majesty was advertised that the Count of Fuentes (one of the chiefe instigators of the Duke of Biron's conspiracie with the Duke of Sauoy) had caused his forces to aduance vnder colour of finding them into Flanders, to giue fauour and countenance to his Puritans that were in Bresse and Bourgundy, to incourage them, and to with-draw them from his Majesties obedience. For these reasons as the Ambassadour of Spaine did p[re]fere to haue the passage vpon the riuer of Rhosne free; the King who beleued that by reason of things past, he could not be too distrustfull, answered, "I wil not leave the frontier vnarmed, vntill I be satisfied by the arraignment of the Duke of Biron, what account I shall make of the faith of the King of Spaine your Master, touching the obseruation of the Peace. You will haue me beleue that he was ignorant of plots and practises laid with the Count of Fuentes; and I answer that it is hard to beleue that his money, hath bene so bountifullly employed without his priuaty and command: yet I meane not to breake the commerce that is allowed by our treaties. He had only commanded the Marshall Liancourt to lodge and camp vpon the frontier, to defend the entry of his Estates. D'Albigny hauing bragged; that if he attempted to retrench the passage, hee should soone haue it laid open by Armes. But the Spaniards durst not attempt to passe the bridge of Grefin, fearing to be repulst and charged, retired to Rumilly and Anicy. In the end the King seeing that they feared more their owne harme, then they had any desire to doe harme, hee suffered them to passe.

But to returne to the Duke of Biron, it was a strange thing that hauing consulted with himselfe, whether he should come to Court or not, hee neglected his friends aduice, and tooke the worst resolution. A minde transported with passion, rejects the best reasons, and retains the most dangerous opinions. Like vnto a boulder which lets the floore passe, and keepe nothing but the Branne. Before his departure from Dijon, they said at Marfelles that he was taken; and in parting, his friends sent him word that he should leave his head where he caried it: and that there was no returne for him. Neuer prisoner was better guarded, with more care, order and vigilancy. The King caused the Duke to be kept as in his own house, & at liberty. And for that nature hath found no other remedies against the injuries of fortune, and the weariness of life, then death, they feared that hee would offer violence to himselfe. And therefore those which kept him, caried no armes, and seeing himselfe serued with a knife without a point, he said, it was the way to the Greue. Scorning death, hee said, that it could not come vnlooked for, to a man well resolved, nor strange to him that hath forescene it, nor shamefull to a resolute minde. Yet hee found that it is a miserable life not to be able to dye, being deprived of all meanes to aduance death, and to haue no other consolation but in the onely desire of an impossible thing.

He spent the first dayes of his imprisonment, without eating or sleeping. These violent motions of choller, and the heat of his blood, put him into a Feuer, and griefe carried fuming passions vnto his braine, which increased his sickness, in the which (as all other diseases) the feare of death, the paine of his body, and the alteration of his life, did much augment the griefe of his prison. He was some what affraid lest vnder colour of remedie, they should giue him poison to cure all his griefes, and therefore hee would haue them take a taste of euery thing, although there were no other assurance of his life, but what his owne conscience could giue him.

His captivity deprived him not of the liberty of speaking. The fire of his courage was not smothered vnder the ashes of this affliction. What said hee? and what said hee not? choller thrust forth a streame of words, in the which there was not a drop of reason. Sometimes he said; That if they desired to put him to death, they should dispatch him; that they should not bragge they had made him to feare death; that they should speedily drink themselves drunke, with the blood which remaine of thirty and fise wounds, which hee had receiued for the seruice of France.

It is the nature of great spirits not to be silent for present perils, or the feare of seruitude. They feared that solitarie sse, fasting, melancholy and change of the place would trouble his braine, and thrust him into some furious passion. To pacifie the discontent of his first imprisonment, they perswade him to submit himselfe to the mercy of God, and gaue him hope of the Kings Pardon. The Archbishop of Bourges went to see him, hee dissuaded him

A him from many bad Maximes of conscience, and satisfied him of many points which he held against the purity and integrity of a iust confession: He desired to speake with Villerey and Silery, who went to see him by the Kings commandement.

They had told him, or he had learned it in the time of his liberty by the reading of Histories, that the Constable of Saint Paul had bene prisoner in the same place, and desired to see the discoure. They gaue him Enguerrand of Monstrelet, in whose edition this Tragedy is related. He deceiued the time in the reading of Annals, the which hee had amplified if they would haue let him alone. He should haue done better if hee had read them sooner, and had propounded vnto himselfe his fortune, whose dignity he did effect, full of so many accidents as it had bene sufficient to correct his. If he had seene it sooner, he had found precepts, which like vnto a Lanthorne had giuen him light amidst the darknesse of this dangerous navigation, in which he had nothing but his owne ambition for compasse and faile. He should haue knowne that Machiavels counsell (whofaith, that private men rise neuer from a bafe to a high fortune but by fraud and force) is ruinous, and that humane lawes being grounded vpon diuine, suffer no confusion of signes whilst that euery one doth limit them by this condition, and that hee knows that God doth distribute powers for the government of people: That it is alwaies dangerous to play with his Master, and although he suffer him for a time, yet he is like vnto the Lion who suddenly laies hold of him that thought to haue mastered him. The Germanes say, we may not eate cherries with great men, for that they will cast the stones in our eyes if we play the companions with them.

In the beginning of his imprisonment, he talked of nothing but of Iustice; but knowing his fault, he had no hope but in the Kings mercy. Some one published an admonition at Paris, beseeching the King to change the punishment of death into perpetuall imprisonment, that of imprisonment into banishment, and his banishment into an honourable seruitude to make war against the Turke. That if by his offences he did not merit to serue the state, which he sought to ruine, yet hee might serue the generall estate of Christendome.

This Counsell was dangerous, for who could assure the King that he would make war in Hungary? and what caution could be sufficient for France? He had bene more dangerous without it, then within. A burning fire-brand casts more flame and smoake without a chimney, then within it. Hee added moreover, that hee should forbid him the carrying of armes, and tie him from the warre, but if hee should haue made his house his prison, who should haue kept him? if he had designed of reuenge in prison, what would hee haue done at liberty? Many which respect no more the Lawes of Honour, then of Iustice, would haue repayed vnto him, to bring in ineuitable mischiefs. There was an intent to saue him. The iron worke was forged in Bresse. The refusal of fise hundred crownes, for the Petardier, hindred the execution. As soone as hee was a prisoner, euery one sayd hee was a dead man: and seeing himselfe so carefully guarded, hee sayd; E That they did not put birds of his sort into a cage, to suffer them to escape. Hee made that iudgement of himselfe, which the Admirall did of the Earles of Egmont and Horne, when he heard they were prisoners: when they once come to accuse and imprison a man of courage and faction, it is more dangerous to absolue him then to condemne him.

The King sent his Letters to the Parliament, to proceed in the criminall and extraordinary proceffe of the Duke of Biron, according to the formes which are to be obserued in crimes of so great importance, against persons of his quality: all other affaires set aside. The Commissioners appointed for the King, were Achilles de Harlay first President in the Court of Parliament at Paris. Nicholas Poise second President and Councillor of State to his Majesty. Stephen Fleury and Philibert of Thurin, Councillors of the Parliament, good Iudges, but not to be moued in crimes of State. Informations were taken at the Bastille. The prisoner made some ceremonies to answer, but being entred into discoure, hee gaue the Commissioners matter ynough to worke on, confessing in a manner all. From his answers alone they might haue framed his condemnation, saying ynough to make him lose as many liues as hee had yeeres. Hee had to ill gouerned his iudgement in his prosperity, as it did him no seruice during his imprisonment, yielding some times vnto griefe, some times vnto choller, and alwaies to indifferency, speaking as much to ruine himselfe, as to discharge him. He was confronted with the witnesses face to face; but when as he did see La Fin, he fell into an extreame shaking. A

The first President asked the Prisoner, if he would except any thing against La Fin. He answered; That he held him for a Gentleman of honour, his friend, and his Kinsman. But when he had heard his deposition, he cried out against him as the most execrable man in the world, appealing to all the powers of heaven and earth to iustifie his innocency. La Fin grieved that he should hold him for a slanderer (a name common to all wicked men) said vnto him; That he was sorry they were in a place where the one was allowed to speake all, and the other was forced to heare all. He maintained all he had said against him, and spake more plainly of his conspiracy, then in his deposition. The Prisoner said, That if Renaze were there, he would auerre the contrary: He was brought before him, whereat he was much amazed to see him, whom he held to be dead; & who was out of his remembrance as in another world. He then beleued that the Duke of Sauoy had set him at liberty to ruine him, he felt his conscience rought, when as all things conspired to his condemnation. An admirable iudgment of Gods secret Iustice in this escape of Renaze. Mens intentions produce contrary effects. Hee was detained prisoner at Quiers in Piedmont, to the end he should not discouer this practice; he escapes from his guard, and comes to fortifie his Masters deposition, who else had beene but one witness.

He is am'vred to see Renaze who he held to be dead.

Hee had many friends, but not to iustifie his innocency, as Plato saith; That many friends is a signe of wisdom, and want of them shewes the contrary: There were none that durst presume to sue for his liberie or pardon. The King had made this attempt so detestable & C odious to the Princes and Noblemen of the Court, and the meanes to execute it so execrable, as all his friends were silent: there were some that said; That for any other crime, yea, if he had killed a Prince in the Kings Cabinet, they would haue begged his pardon, and would haue sacrificed their children to the Kings Iustice for an expiation of the offence, rather then to lose him. But in this act, friendship was conspiracy, and intercession a crime. His friends went to Saint Maur where the King was: they cast themselves at his Maiesties feet to implore his mercy, and to moderate the severity of his Iustice, more in consideration of his father, then for any respect of the sonnes seruices, which could not equall his fault.

sue for him.

The King said, That it was a matter of such importance for his Estate, as he was constrained to leave it to the course of Iustice; that to haue attempted against him who was his King, and his benefactor, was insupportable; that he could not remit this crime but he must ruine himselfe, the Queene his wife, his Sonne, and his Estate. That hee knew they were such true hearted Frenchmen, that as they desired not the one, so they would haue patience for the other. They hauing knowne the foulness of the fact, and the reasons which forced clemency to yeeld vnto Iustice, abandoned the pursuit. The Countesse of Rouilly solicited the Court: The Prisoners mother was not there. The King commanded the Court of Parliament to proceede to iudgment without any intermission.

A Peere cannot be iudged but
by his peeres.

The Prisoner was a Peere of France, the Barony of Biron being made a Duchy and a Peere by the King. A Peere cannot be iudged but by the King and his Peeres, but the King is neuer present when he is a party, and that the accusation of the party concerns his person, his honour, or his Estate. And although the order of the ancient Peeres be more in number then by the first institution, for that of the fix secular Peeres, five are vniued vnto the Crowne, and the sixth doth no more obey the King, yet the new created enioy the same priuiledges and prerogatiues that the ancient did, and the last, although he be about the number, shall not be iudged but by his Peeres, but may assist at the iudgment of another Peere, and haue his voice as well as the Duke of Burgundy, who is the Deane of the Peeres, yea, the wittes, whose lands are erected into Payries, or that hold it by succession may assist. Mathilda Countesse of Artois, was called a Peere of France, and deliuered her opinion with the other Peeres at the iudgment of Robert Earle of Artois. But if the Peeres being called doe not appeare, they may proceed. The Peeres of France were called to the Arraignment of the Duke of Biron, they appeared not.

come not.

The Court forbears not to proceed notwithstanding their absence. All the Chambers being assembled, the Chancellor accompanied by Maisse and Pontcarre (two Councillors of the State) entred into the Parliament, two Sergeants at arms, & some officers of the Chancery going before him. He was receiued at the cutting of the Barre by two ancient

A ancient Councillors, and being saluted by the Court, he set him down in the Presidents place: hauing deliuered the Kings intention, and his assurance of the integrity and wisdom of the Court, vpon an occasion importing the State, and vpon a foule crime in a person other waies recommended for his seruices; he made a signe to Stephen Flenny the Reporter of the Proceffe to begin. This was done for want of the Peeres. A request was made in the Prisoners name, that it would please the Court to allow him Councell, to direct him in the fornic of their proceeding, whereof he was as ignorant, as he had let all France know how well he vnderstood the art of war. De la Guesle, the Kings Attorney General, being heard vpon this request, and Seruin the Solicitor General speaking for him, he said; That although this request seemed to be grounded vpon some presidents, for that the like had beene granted vnto the Prince of Condé, yet there was great diversity, & many considerations for the denying of this. Their opinions being given, it was rejected. Cicero pleaded for Rabirius, and Anthony for Norbanus, but there is no Advocate admitted for crimes of State: Councell depends vpon the conscience of him that is accused, his defence must come from his owne innocency, and hee may well free himselfe from blame, without the mediation of any man, and without the helpe of an Advocate.

His Proceffe

His request rejected.
They which are accused of crimes must plead for themselves.

If he be innocent, truth will confound all the practices of his accusers. If he be guilty, there is no excuse nor euasion but his guiltinesse will appeare. It is not lawfull to defend the wicked, and good men haue no need of defence. They spent three sittings to examine the informations; which done, the conclusions of the Attorney General were read and followed. There rested nothing but to heare the Prisoner and to call him before the Parliament.

While they were viewing of the Proceffe, one had set vp a discourse vpon the Palace gate, to moue the Iudges to pity, and that they should not punish the weaknesse of Adam for the Serpents lubrility. The Lord of Montigny came vnto the Bastille about foure of the clocke in the morning; the Prisoner who alwaies slept litle (holding sleepe to bee no life) was already vp and at his deuotion: he would not trouble him in so necessary an action, but staid vntill he had done. Entering into his Chamber, he told him the occasion of his coming, that the Court was assembled for his Proceffe; that the Lord Chancellor was there, and had commanded him to bring him. Hee seemed a little troubled, although he had beene aduertised that he should be sent for. Being ready, hee goes out of the Bastille, thinking neuer to returne, and that they drew him out of the cares of Captiuitie, to lead him vnto the darknesse of death, and that he left the prison to lose his life. He was conducted in the Marquis of Rosnies Carosse, through the Arcenall to the Ri- uers side; where he entred into a boat couered with Tapistry, in which the Kings guards were, the chiefe Approaches, the Ports, the Greue, and the Towne-houfe, were manned with Suisses. Hee entred into the Palace by the first Presidents garden, and went to rest himselfe in one of the Chambers, vntill he were sent for, presenting him a breakfast before he entred.

The houre being come, the Register went to call him, and he entred into the golden Chamber; The place whereas strangers haue come to implore Iustice of the King; whereas great Kings haue held it an honour to haue a place: where he himselfe had fate, and beene honoured with the most glorious title of verue: whereas one of the Kings Solicitors had said; That Biron had none before him to imitate, that hee could imitate none but himselfe, and that he made himselfe inimitable to them that should come after him. This place I say, shining with the beames of the Kings Iustice, made him to remember the change of his condition, the which forced him somewhat to blush: an accident which happens to the most assured. These Scarlet Roabes doe more amaze him then all the red cassacks of Spaine, or the most fierce encounters of his enemies. He had no other place then that which was appointed for men accused, being set vpon a stole within the Barre, but finding himselfe too far off to heare, or to be heard, he rose vp and caried his stole neerer, saying vnto the Chancellor, Excuse me my Lord, I cannot heare you, except you speake louder. When the Duke of Alencon was examined before the King, and in open Court, he was set in the midst of the Hall vpon a low stoole; the Constable of Luxembourg, the Duke of Nemours, and the Chancellor of Poyet, were set within the Barre, like to the Duke of Biron. Hee fate with his Cloake vnder his right arme, holding his hand sometimes by his side, after a brauing manner, the which notwithstanding did not become him ill, having his arme free to lift vp his hand to heaven, and to strike his breast, when hee would protest of his loyalty to the Kings service. They would not have allowed it in another, being expected that men accused should shew humilitie outwardly, and feare inwardly.

In this Estate the Duke of Biron thought, that in this great Senate he should finde some one that would doe for him as Sempronius Gracchus had done for Scipio: that hee would speake openly, that hee would neuer endure the Common-weale should receive that disgrace to see Scipio set in the ranke and habit of men accused for crimes. He whom the Court had seene sit upon the Flower-de-luce, in recompence of the services he had done. The Chanceller fired his discourse in such fort, as there was no occasion to call him by his name, nor by those of his qualities. Of many points that were in his proceesse, he collected five principall, the rest consisted in presumptions, whereof he made no account, for that we must neuer moue the opinion of the Judges upon a matter without prooffe.

Accusations of
the Duke of Biron.

The first was, to haue had conference with one Picote, borne at Orleans, and fled into Flanders, to haue intelligence with the Archduke, and had giuen him a hundred and fifty crownes for two voyages to that effect.

The second was, That he had treated with the Duke of Sauoy three daies after his coming to Paris, without the Kings permission, offering him all assistance and seruice against all men, upon hope of mariage with his third daughter.

The third, That he had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy in the taking of Bourg C and other places, giuing him aduice to attempt against the Kings armie, and against his owne person, discouering many things of importance.

The fourth was, That he would haue brought the King before S. Katherins fort to be flaine there, and to that end had written to the Gouernor, giuing him some tokens whereby he should know his Maiesty.

The Duke of Biron answer.

The fifth was, that he had lent La Fin to treat with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes. The D. of Biron denied all that he had confessed at his first examination, holding it no danger to suppress the truth, when as confession may hurt.

To the first the D. of Biron answered, That Picote being his prisoner in the Franche D Country, and knowing that he was acquainted with Capraine La Fortune (who was his friend) he thought he might employ him for the reduction of the towne of Seurre; where in he vied such diligence, as the place was assured for his Maiesties seruice: that since this reduction he had not seene Picote but in Flanders, when as he went for the confirmation of the Peace, where he came vnto him with some others, intreating him to be an Intercessor for them vnto the King, that they might returne vnto their goods, and liue in their owne houses, promising him for recompence of his intercession two suits of Tapistrie, the which he reiected with some spleene, for that they sought to buy his fauour, and for that they desired from him an assurance for their returne, he sent them to the Lords of Belleure and Sillery, who knew what was fittest for them, and the forms that were to be observed for their returne. That it was true that Picote had received 150 crowns of him, but not for any other respect, but for the charges he had bene at in the reduction of Seurre, hauing often intreated him and prest him by many letters, to haue pitty on him as one that was banished from his house and Country, hauing borrowed this sum to beare his charges in this reduction. That hee had put it to account in certaine summes which hee disbursed for the Kings seruice, and that he neuer had any other busines or conference with him.

To the second he answered, That he came to Paris fiftene daies after the Duke of Sauoyes arrival there; that La Fin who accused him, came after him. That it was true, the King dining at Conflans, and the Duke of Sauoy with him, after dinner the King retiring into his Wardrobe, he commanded the Count of Auvergne and him to entertaine the Duke of Sauoy: That the Count of Soissons, and the Duke of Montpensier coming into the chamber, he gaue them place, & went into the Wardrobe, tied the Kings points, gaue him drinke, and presently after went to Paris. That vpon some speech which Rancas the Dukes Secretary had with him touching the mariage of his Highnes third daughter, he acquainted the King therewith, who hauing since giuen him to vnderstand by La Force, that he did not like thereof, he had no more dreamt of it. And in token that hee had no intelligence with the Duke, nor will to conspire with any of his, the King hauing

A commanded him to accompany him in his returne, and to shew him the strongest townes in Bourgogne, he had excused himselfe, beseeching his Maicity to dispence with him, foreseeing that the Duke would not effect the treaty, and that hee should bee grieved to make war against a Prince, whom he had accompanied, and made good chere vnto. Aduising the Baron of Lux to conduct him through the weakest townes, and not to giue him any time to view their fortifications.

To the third, that hee had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy, in the conquest of the country of Hesse, giuing him aduice to attempt against the Kings army: He answered, That if he had had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy, hee would not haue vndertaken Bourg, against the Kings opinion, being not assisted by any, but such as were ordinarily with him. That the Gouernors of places (who were then the Dukes Subjects and now the Kings) could witness if there were any fauour vsed, and if in making war he had any other object, but the execution of his Maiesties commandements; that if hee had had any bad intent, he had not yielded vp Bourg so easily as he did.

To the fourth, vpon the aduice giuen to the Gouernor of Saint Katherins fort, to kill the King. He beseecheth his Maicity to remember, that he alone did dissuade and diuert him from going to view the fort, giuing him to vnderstand, that there were very good Gunners in the place, and that he could not goe without great danger. That vpon this aduice, his Maicity altered his purpose, saying, that if he desired to see the place, he would bring him a plot of it the next day, offering his Maicity to take it with five hundred Harquebuziers, and that he himselfe would goe vnto the assault.

To the fifth, That he had treated with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes, by the mediation of La Fin: He answered, That being denied the keeping of the Citadell of Bourg, he grieved in to that despaire, as he had desired to be all couered with blood, being capable to say or to do any thing. At these words the Chanceller asked him, With what blood he desired to be couered? With mine owne, answered the Prisoner, wishing to liue no longer after this refusal and I would haue engaged my selfe in such sort among the enemies, as I would haue died there, or would haue returned all couered with blood. That for two moneths space he had written and spoken more then he ought, but hee had not omitted to doe well. He added moreover, that La Fin had to bewitched him with enchanted waters, and by speaking Images, as hee was forced to submit himselfe to his will: That he spake not vnto him, but in secret and vknown words, calling him his Master, his King, his Prince, his Lord. And scratching his left eare, he spake execrable things against La Fin, to moue the Court, not to regard his accusation and testimony. He that had not seene the fact verified by his owne letters, would haue said it was Plissies accusation, forging false letters from Priam to Palamedes. He still fled to his pardon, saying that hauing done nothing since, the Kings clemency should remit his fault; and that if hee must implore it once more, he had his knees as supple as euer to doe it. The Chanceller said vnto him, that he had written a letter vnto La Fin since the Dauphins birth, by the which he did aduertise him, that seeing it had pleased God to send the King a sonne, hee would no more dreaume of those vanities, desiring him to returne, and if hee had not imployed him he would not haue written.

This letter was produced to shew the continuance of his bad designs, whereof hee made vse to iustifie himselfe and to shew his repentance, saying alwaies that he had done well, although he had some thought of doing ill.

The Chanceller said vnto him, that seeing he felt his conscience to cleare, and knowing that he had do nothing, why did he not lay himselfe more open vnto the King, who sought him with great affection at Fontainebleau, to tell him the truth of that which hath bene since discouered by the proceesse. He wauered at this demand, saying, That he did not thinke the King had knowne any thing of that which passed betwixt him and La Fin, for that he had assured him by oaths & fearfull curses, that he had said nothing that might hurt him. That hauing conferred with a religious man of the order of the Minimes, to know (if hauing past his word with an oath to La Fin, neuer to discouer what had past betwixt them) hee might with a safe conscience say any thing? Hee had answered him, That seeing there was no more any intent to execute the things that were sworne betwixt them, hee ought not to reueale them: That this resolution continued to constant in his minde, that although the Archbishop of Bourges had visited him in prison,

"and had giuen him many reasons to free him from these scruples, yet hee held it an act unworthy of a man to falsifie his oath, and that it was only fit for a soule hardened with Atheisme (the spring of all impiety) to sweare with an intent to circumvent. Here his speech failed him with the violence of his griefe, but recovering his spirits, hee spake these words:

"My misfortune hath this consolation, that my Iudges are not ignorant of the seruices which I haue done to the King and Realme, and with what loyalty I haue caried my selfe in the greatest and most important affaires, to restore the King vnto the Realme, and the Realme vnto the King: to preferre the lawes of State, and to settle you in this place, from the which the Saturnales of the League had expelled you. This body (whereof you hold the life and death in the disposition of your Iustice) hath no veine which hath not bene opened, and which I would not willingly open for you. This hand which did write the letters which are now produced against me, is the same which hath done the contrary to that which it hath written. It is true, I haue written, I haue said, and I haue spoken more then I ought, but no man can shew that I haue done ill. And there is no law that punisheth the lightnesse of a simple word, or the motions of the thought without death: my words haue bene alwaies feminine, but the effects of my courage masculine. Choller and despight haue made me capable to say all, and to doe all, but reason would not suffer me to doe any thing, but what deserued praise and imitation. I haue had bad designs, but they neuer past my thought: at the same instant they sprong vp they were smothered. If I had bene desirous to nourish and make shew of them, I haue had great meanes and occasions. I could haue done bad seruice to the King, in England and in Suifferland. There are aboute a hundred Gentlemen that can witness of my behaviour in the first Ambassage: & for the second, I desire no other testimony but that of the Seigneurs of Sillery and de Pic, who know in what manner, and with what fidelity I employed my selfe, to reconcile and vnitte so many wils disioyned and withdrawn from the Kings alliance. If you will consider how I came, and in what estate I left the places of Bour-gongne, it will be impossible to haue any bad conceit of my designs. They found not a man of war in my government. I haue left the places without Garisons. I haue giuen the Capitaines no other commandement but to serue the King well, and to do that only wherunto they are bound.

"Euery man aduised mee not to come to Court. I met a Foot-man by the way, who brought me a letter from one of my dearest friends, who coniured me not to aduance. Being aduised, my Sister of Rouffy sent me another, aduising me to be gone without taking of my leaue: I shewed it to a Gentleman that was with me, who said vnto me, That he would willingly be stabbed in the bosome so as I were at Dijon. I answered, That if I were there, and were sure to receiue a hundred stabs at the Court, yet would I come vpon the Kings word. A guilty minde and prest with horror of his conscience, had fallen in peeces with feare and trembling, and would haue embraced another party. The secret knowledge I had of my loyalty, and the innocency of my designs, could not giue me any imagination of distrust: I alwaies said within my selfe, I haue serued the King too well, to haue a thought that he should not account me his seruant. The King hath had too many proofes of my faith, to suspect my loyalty. I could not comprehend, that the Kings Iustice could touch a man, resting in the tranquillity of his Conscience, and in the expectation of his commandements. Moreover, I was assured that the King had pardoned me, and that I had not offended him since his pardon. I cannot deny, that I told him not all that had past in this action, but in saying vnto him, that the refusal of the Citadell of Bourg made me capable to say and doe any thing. I did thinke it was not needfull to specifie that which I was ashamed to haue attempted, and that the consideration of the good which I had done vnto the King in his seruice, should alwaies weigh downe the euill that I would haue done, and the which I haue repented. That if he hath not giuen me life, but to put me to death, he must consider, that it is more commendable for a Prince to giue it, then to take it away from him to whom hee hath giuen it, and that his clemency shines neuer more clearly, then vpon offences that concerne himselfe. If it please not the King to regard my seruices, and the assurances which he hath giuen me of his mercy, I confesse my selfe worthy of death, & hope for no health in his Iustice, but in yours, hoping you will remember better then he doth, the dangers I haue

A haue vndergone all my life for his seruice. I implore his mercy, and although I should not say any thing, yet the wounds which I beare would speake for mee. I hope for it the more confidently, for that it hath neuer bene refused to them that haue done worse then my selfe. I would haue done euill, but my will did neuer passe the termes of my first conception, being ouercast with the clouds of choller and despight. It were hard if I should bee the first President to bee punished for thinking. Not that I feare death, the which I hold to bee ordayned, not as a punishment, but for the end of Nature, and that it imports nothing to leaue this life in the midst of my course, if it were with as much honour, as I haue had in the beginning. My fault is great, but it was only in conceit and not executed: in desire and not in effect. Great offences must haue great fauours. I am hee alone in France, which feels the rigour of Iustice and cannot hope for the merit of Mercy. Whatsoever chanceth, I relye more vpon you my Masters then in the King: who hauing heretofore regarded mee with the eyes of his loue, looks no more on me now but with choller, and holds it a vertue to be cruell vnto mee, and a vice to vse any act of clemency towards mee. It had bene better for mee that he had not pardoned me at the first, then to giue me life and then to make mee looe it with shame and dishonour.

They gaue him leaue to speake what he pleased, the Chancelor holding it reasonable, that seeing he had no counsell to aduise him what he should say, they should in regard thereof giue him time to speake all, and hearing, to consider his reasons, and the variety of his first answers with the last, in the which there were great contradiction. Those which are accused of any crime take it for a fauour to be heard patiently vnto the end: although for the most part they doe but increase the reasons of their punishments. He spake so boldly and so eloquently, as if a man should iudge of the fauour of a discourse by the attention, there was not any one of long time heard with greater patience in that place. Some thed teares in the place and wept in their houles, for pity, not of his innocency (for that appeared not) but of his fortune so miserably deiected. Heat is more naturall to a man then cold; and mildnesse more then rigor: but he could expect nothing but Iustice from this great Assembly. It was impossible that passion, fauor or respect, should alter the integrity of their iudgements. The opinions of some weak spirits may be moued, who regard more the appearance, then the essence of things, and which beleue not the harme vntill they feele it, or that the fire is hot, vntill it burne them. But to blinde so many graue heads from seeing of the truth, it was an enterprise of too great difficulty. A little water may be poysoned, but not a whole Riuer.

The prisoners discourse was so long, as they had no time to giue their opinions. Hee was sent backe to the Bastille, returning more cheerfully then hee came, for as in going forth of the Bastille to the Palace, he imagined that he went to his death, so seeing himself brought backe, hee conceiued that he returned to life. And for that he had answered the Chancelor to all his demands, and had moued some of his Iudges to lament his misfortune, many to detest his acculer, and all to wish that the fowlenesse of his offence, and the good of the State would allow of his pardon. He thought that he had so ballanced their opinions, as mercy should preuaile aboue rigour. Hee therefore neuer ceased all Saturday, Sunday and Munday, to relate vnto the Capitaines, and to the guard, that kept him, all that had bene demanded of him, what hee had answered, and how brauely and discretely he had satisfied all: adding withall, that he did imagine hee saw the Chancelors countenance going out of the great Chamber; he did counterfeit him in his staydnesse and the grauity of his words, fit for a man of his age and quality, imagining, that he spake in this manner: Behold a wicked man, he is dangerous in the State, we must dispatch him, he deserves death. Which words neuer came out of his mouth, hauing caried himselfe very respectfully in this Arraignement, hauing neuer pronounced that word of Death, but in concluding the iudgement. And therein he alwaies vsed some words to qualifie his griefe in the Image of his affliction, more then of his innocency, vnable to forget the remembrance of the good that was past, or the feeling of the present euill. These were the last fits of the prisoners hope, the which finding no solid body, did run after the shadowes of his imagination, and flattered him so pleasingly, as he thought not to die, saying, Thus they could not supply his place, if he were dead. Noting among all them that thought themselves most capable, great wants and imperfections. Yet in all these extremities hee had nothing nothing that lulled him so much asleepe as his owne praifes. Sometimes he would say, A Is it possible, that the King should be so vaine, as to make him to apprehend death, and to think to tormente him therewith? But he conceived of things according to his imagination, the which was not answerable to the truth.

On Monday the Chancellor returned to the Palace to determine on his sentence. They continued vntill two of the clocke in the afternoon in giuing of their opinions. They were drawne from one principle of truth, as many lines are from one center, and did concurre all in one resolution conformable to the conclusions of the Kings Attorney generall; That it was iust, necessary and profitable to quench these burning flames of ambition in the blood of the Duke of Biron, if they would not see the Realm in combustion. B
A whole day, and a good part of the night would haue been spent, if euery one had giuen a reason of his opinion, those of the great Chamber onely, and the Presidents of the Inquests spake what they would. This subiect is like vnto a great and thicke Forrest, they know not what tree to choose: it is so full and so rich, as abundance of reasons troubles the choise: And these were the chiefe. There was a concurrence of a great crime and great merit. All France was a witness of the one: and of the other the truth was apparent. The proofes which are required to discouer a secret crime are here made perfect.
Proofe by mouth, and the prisoners answer. Proofe by writings, letters and instructions.
Proof by the deposition of witnesses, against whom he hath objected no exception, which might impugne that which they sayd and maintained.

By these three sorts of proofes wee see that monstrous attempt against the Kings person verified, and that furious conspiracy to trouble his Estate, and to make it a prey to his enemies; and both the one and the other doth make the prisoner guilty of high treason in the first and second degree. He confesseth that hee would ill, that his intent was written and imparted to others, and yet he neuer did ill. That it neuer past his thought. That thoughts are not to bee punished as hee said. That the desire to steale makes not a theefe: It is true, but the guilt of treason is so detestable, as the intent how farre so euer from the execution, is punished and repited for the effect. Repentance which follows after, and changeth the designe, may well serue for the offence, but it helpes nothing for the punishment.

C A Gentleman hauing attempted to kill King Francis the first, repented, and revealed it in his confession, yet being accused by his Confessor, he lost his head. As the respect of the Image of God, grauen in the Maistie of Kings, frees them from all lawes made by men, so the dignity of their persons doth warrant them from all enterprises and conspiracies of humane malice, the which dares not once thinke to put them in practice against their Images, much lesse against their persons. The proofe of an intent, although it were not resolved nor determined, goes not vnpunished, which passeth often times vnto things without life. To houses, images, ashes, yea and to the memory it selfe. This crime troubleth the dead, thirty or forty yeares after their funerals: for that it is not extinct in dying, and the which is contrary to common sense and naturall humanity) they punish the child, the wife, and the family, for the fathers offence, being a contagious Leprosie, and hereditarie to all his race. The father cannot excuse his sonne. And the Senator Fulsius was commended to haue put his Sonne to death; for that he had bene one of Catilines conspiracy. Let him then plead no more, that hee hath done no euill, it sufficeth that he would haue done it. Lawes are not made for bad actions onely, but for Counsels alio and resolutions. His intent began the crime, occasion had ended it, it bee had not bene prevented. If he had done no other euill, but to giue eare to the promises and perswasions of the enemies, he were guilty. For in matters of State, the subiect cannot dispose of any point of his will, without the permission of his Prince. We must not stay till venomous beasts haue bitten, and then kill them, nor Traitors intents executed, before we discouer the treason. It is then too late to iudge of the crime, but to complaine of indiscretion: then they seeke no more: reliefe from Law, but they flee to Armes. It is not then time to accuse and to punish, but to weepe and to flee. The City of Rome laboured in vaine to resist Cesar, after that hee had subuerted the lawes, vsurped the Dictatorship, and terrified all Italy with the brute of his forces. If they should haue stayed vntill the prisoner had executed his designs, there had bene no talking of Iustice nor of State. You must not tarry, till the house shake, and be ready to fall, you must ynderprop it, and repaire it

A it in time. It is a misery: (sayd the Emperor Domitian) when they will not beleue a conspiracy against Princes, vntill they be slaine by the Conspirators. Now that God by a singular worke of his providence hath discouered this conspiracy, it toucheth the health of the State, and the honor of the Court, to punish these Conspirators. Reason requires that the example may make knowne how execrable this offence is, for the which it is law-full to torment the dead, and terrifie them that bee liuing, to make the children partakers of their Fathers punishment, and to assure them rather of miserie then of life, that the world might haue more horror of his wickednesse then feare of his punishment. The Kings Clemencie hath had her turne, now Iustice must take hers, making her authority to be feared and admired, like vnto the sea, which is more admired when the waues are swola and risen vpon to the clouds, then when it is calme and still. But they consider the quali-tie and merit of the prisoner. First, Iustice hath her eyes blinded, and shut from all distinctions, but that it holds the offence greater in a great person, then in a meane, and by this proposition, the punishment must be greater. The faults of meane men are hidden in the multitude, their fortune and reputation is one thing. Those which railed to great places, doe good or harme by the example of their good or bad actions, are they which are knowne and discouered to all men.

In matters of rebellion and crimes of State, they regard not what is past, they looke only to the present, and what they may expect hereafter: the most vertuous actions yeeld to the violence of the bad. The accused hath seru'd the King, it was his duty, he hath bene recompenced. He hath attempted against his seruice, therein hee hath done what hee ought not. The offence and the punishment are twins: at the same instant that hee hath offended, he draws vpon him the rigour of punishment. If with Antipater, hee hath caried vpon his body the markes of vertue, there is nothing now to bee seene but signes of infidelity in his heart. His merits haue mounted to the greatness of the first digni-ties of France, his ill deservings cast him downe with shame, and shew him to bee vnworthy of those excellent degrees of honour. Good seruice cannot enter into comparison with bad, nor crimes in parallel with merits. The offence which is greater then the seruice, changeth the bond of recompence into punishment. Hee that helpes to build a Dole, deserves much of the owner, but when he lets fire to it, all the remembrance of his good which he hath done vanissheth away. The accused hath had a good share in the restoring of the State, but since he would haue vndermined it, and ruined the foundations, he hath practised to make it a prey to the enemy, they can no more returne to that which he hath done, they iudge what he would haue done, and shall haue no other esteeme or reputation, but as an Arisson, a Nabis or a Catilin. Hee hath bene profitable to the State, it is true. But he hath offended against the Lawes of State. Their preservation is so necessary, as it were better to lose the most profitable members in an Estate, then to suffer them to be violated: for in putting them to death, it doth but decrease the number of valiant men, but in suffering them to liue, you doe wrong vnto the Lawes, and thereby ruine the quier of the State. He hath done well for the preservation of the State: it is true. But he that seekes to destroy what he hath preferred, makes himselfe an enemy, and the remembrance of his well-deseruing dies in the injury which he would haue done to the whole body. He hath begun well, but he ended ill. All actions are censured by the end.
If the heele, (that is to say) Constancy and firmnesse, had not failed in Achilles, hee had bene immortal. It is not sufficient for a man to begin to doe well, if hee desists in the middle, and continues not vnto the end; Who deserued better at Rome then Mantius, the onely preferer of the Capitoll against the Gauls? and who was more severely punished then hee, whom they cast downe headlong from the Capitoll, for his factions and murmurs?

F If it were a crime not to serue the Prince, was it not execrable to hinder, and to conspire against his seruice? As the seruices done by the accused, cannot bee compared with his offences, so his quality cannot moderate his punishment. Iustice hath no eyes to regard a Dukes Crowne, a Marshall of France his staffe, nor a blew riband. All these are no prerogatives, but that he which attempts to trouble the State, shall be held an enemy to the Maistie of the Prince, and the publicke good. Great men are greatly punished.
Dignities aggravate the offence vpon him that is bound not to offend. The greater the bond is, the more execrable is the ingratitude.

There

In crimes of State they consider nothing but the punish-

There is no Gentlemen in France more bound vnto his Prince, then the accused: A If duties and bonds hold no place in the affections of subiects to their Prince, to what Altar shall they goe to seekke assurance of faith? Must not the King in these continuall doubts of diloyalty, trust the guard of his Person vnto strangers, as Leuis the 11 did vnto the Scottishmen. And finding no religion nor confidence among men, trust vnto beasts, as Masiusa did? God is offended when as respect of the quality withholdes the course of Iustice, and threatens that Estate with ruine, wherein they suffer a wicked subiect to liue. Achab felt the heauie hand of his wrath, for that he saued the life of Benadab. As this furious desire of soueraigne command, troubles all the considerations of Nature, Friendship, Duty: so in punishing them wee must neither regard the respect of blood, the remembrance of seruices, nor the motions of friendship. The offence is of too great a consequence to dissemble it. Hee that doth not punish an euill, allowes of it. But they say it hath beene pardoned, that wee must not open a wound which hath been closed vp, Kings and Fortune doe often pardon, to punish them more seuerely that haue abused their pardon. The prisoner confesseth that he did not say all, and a pardon cannot extend, but to those things that haue beene mentioned and confessed, the greatest part of the offence hath remained in the will of the repentant, hee hath confessed but as little as hee might. There was a difference betwix him that did pardon, and him that demanded pardon. The King pardoned to the end hee should not fall into a relapse of his former faults: and he demanded pardon that he might offend more safely. It appeares by his confession, and by that which he hath said in the face of the court, when as he was demanded why hee had not discovered his offences freely vnto the King, when as hee gaue him so great assurance to forget it. He answered, that hee did not thinke La Fin had layd any thing, and that he had kept his word, hauing confirmed it with great oaths, that if hee had acquainted him with that which hee had discovered to the King, hee would haue cast himselfe at his Maiesties feet as readily as hee did to craue pardon. There was then something betwixt them that was not yet pardoned. They which offend doe often misreckon the time, seeking to excuse their fault. The conference of times discouers the continuance of intents. The pardon was in January, and after September hee writes, That seeing it hath pleased God to giue the King a Dauphin, hee would no more thinke of those vanities: and La Fin adds, that there was a biller of a contrary tenor, that the negotiation was continued, and that the King had no knowledge thereof from the prisoner. The pardon should haue drawne him to repentance, and not to ingage him in new trecheries, the which could not be remitted nor pardoned, for that hee had offended often without punishment. He must not continue his errors, the last payes for all the precedent. The Court allowes not of this pardon in a crime that is beyond all pardon, and whereof the abolishment depends not of the King, who may not bee prodigall of his subiects blood, nor bring the health of all in generally in danger, for one in particular. This reason moued Alexander to put Philotas to death, being giuen to vnderstand, that if he pardoned him, hee would make him able to attempt new treasons against him, when as it should not be in his power to pardon him. A pardon doth not change the bad intent of a mighty malefactor. This Philotas knew well, that they which had exhausted all mercy, and drawne it dry, hauing no more hope, did run headlong into despair. That there are benefites which are odious, for that hee blusheth to confesse the cause, and to acknowledge himselfe debtor for his life to any one. Alexander had enemies enough abroad, hee had no need of any at home, and assuring his Estate of those, hee needed not to feare the rest. Kings like vnto Physicians must know the diseases of their States, the accidents that are past, the present, and the future, and employ Iustice as a drugg, the which is good for them that be sicke, and may profit others before the disease hath actually seized on them.

There remains one only consideration, that the Duke of Biron may doe great seruice, and that it is not impossible but he may returne to the way of his first innocency. There is lesse harme not to beleue it, then to beleue it. Wee must not vpon an vncertaintie that is to come, neglect the remedie of a present mischiefe. There is more trouble to absolue him, and more danger to set him at liberty, then to put him to death. He is not likely to doe any more good: we can expect nothing but reuenge from his courage. There is no more any Furius Camillus who changed his exile into a bond vnto his Country that Euill vnguished is suffered.

A pardon extends but to confession.

A Prince cannot be liberall of his subiects blood.

A had banished him. Serpents seeme dead in winter, the cold keeps them from hurting: but when the Sunne recouers his forces, they spend their venom. The prisoners had intents might sleepe for a time, but it should bee to awake againe and neuer to leaue the State at rest. He that can neuer profit by his vertue nor his loyalty, must profit by his example. These were the reasons of the Court, vpon the which by a generall consent a sentence of death was concluded against the Duke of Biron. There were few in condemning him but said, that it was fit to arraigne La Fin, and giue warrant to apprehend him, and that it was impossible he should be cleane from the slime which he had handled, and that if the affaires of Spaine (which is like vnto the Temple of Hecatempedon, the which goes forward in words and not in workes) had beene answerable to the vehemency of their affection, he had sayd nothing. The King was aduertised thereof, who assured La Fin by his letters, that he would neuer endure that so great a seruice done to the Crowne, should be his ruine. It was reason, for if the Ancients did appoint Honors for beasts, that had done any seruice to the Common-weale, they should be no lesse thankfull vnto a Gentleman that had saued his Country. Whosoever discouers a conspiracy against the sacred and inuolable person of the Prince, ought to be rewarded by the publike. So was Vindictis by the Romans. Princes loue them for a while that haue done some great villanies for their seruice, the which is soone turned into deadly hatred, lothing to looke on them, for that their preference doth reproach them with the wronging of their conscience. But this happens not to him who without any infligation of the Prince, but moued onely with his duty doth reueale a conspiracy, chosing rather to faile in the office of a friend, then in duty of a faithfull subiect. The Chancelor concluding their opinions, pronounced the sentence of death, and by graue reasons and great examples reconciled some few opinions for the apprehending of La Fin. Saying, that the enterprize of the prisoner condemned, was not in his head alone, that there were others, who hauing a desire to say something, would retire themselves when they should see La Fin so intreated, who in the common opinion had deserved reward. And although that Atars would not haue the day which is giuen vnto him, to be the last to one that had deserved the name of a second Mars, yet the shadow of death did enuiron him on Tuesday about Noone: seeing a great multitude of Parisiens about Saint Anthones gate, he then beleued that he should be a spectacle vnto them. The Lord of Vitry's Lieutenant freed him from this imagination, making him beleue that it was to see certaine Gentlemen fight. Hereupon (and of that which the heart doth alwaies diuine in the like accidents, seeing more signes of death then of life) he framed in his imagination infallible consequences of his death, sending the Siegneur of Baranton to intreat the Marquis of Rhosny to come vnto him, or if hee could not, to be an intercessor vnto the King for his pardon. He answered, that he was extremely grieved that hee durst not doe the first, and had not meanes to effect the second. That the King was sorry that at his comming to Fontainebleau he was obdurate and would not deliuer the truth, which tooke from him the meanes to saue his life, and for his friends to sue for him. This multitude did not run to the gate without some occasion, they knew that the sentence of death was giuen the day before: Certaine Officers of the Court and the Executioner were seene enter into the Bastille, the scaffold which should be set vp at the Greue was made, but they were ill informed: for the King hauing commanded the Chancelor to send him the sentence, after he had giuen it in the Parliament, that he might let him vnderstand his pleasure touching the execution, Sillery who had carried it to Saint Germaine, returned with letters, by the which (for the auoyding the ignominy of his death at the face of his friends, and for other considerations) his Maiesty was pleased to change the place of the execution, and to appoint that in the Bastille, which should haue bene at the Greue.

These letters being verified, on Wednesday morning the last of Iuly, the Chancelor accompanied with the first President of the Court of Parliament, Sillery and three Masters of Requests, and followed by some Officers of the Chancery, De Poyson Register for criminall causes, and fixe Vthers, came to the Bastille about nine of the clocke in the morning, to let him heare the sentence of the Court. At his entrie hee commanded them to make the prisoner, dine and not to aduertise him of his comming, remaining in a little Chamber neere the entry on the left hand about an houre and a halfe: where he resolved who should bee sent for to assist at this execution, of whose names hee made a list. that apprehends death, hath no desire to eate: yet he set him downe, rose againe present- ly, and according to his vsuall manner went vnto a window which looked into the Court of the Bastile, where hearing the cries and lamentations of a woman, hee thought they were for him, and had this sad content to see they wept for him before his death. Soone after, the Chancellor goes towards him, who crossing through the Court, the Duke of Biron espied him and cried out, that he was dead. You come (sayd hee) to pronounce my sentence, I am condemned vnjustly, tell my kinsfolkes that I die an innocent. The Chancellor went on without any motion, commanding that they should bring him into the Chappell. The prisoner seeing him come asafar off, cried out: Oh my Lord Chancellor is there no pardon? is there no mercy? The Chancellor saluted him and puts on his bat. The Duke of Biron continued bare, and hauing abandoned all the powers of his soule to griefe and passion, he tooke the aduantage to speake first, and to speake all that a tongue ouer-gnied might vtter, reproaching the Chancellor that he had not had so great a desire to saue him as to condemne him. He added thereunto certaiue words, the recording whereof is prohibited, and the report punishable. But Princes regard not the railing of subiects against their Maiesty, the which returns alwaies from whence it came. The Duke of Biron knowing not whom he should challenge most for his misfortune, turned towards the Chancellor, and shaking him by the arme, sayd, You haue iudged mee, and God will absolve me, he will lay open their iniquities, which haue shut their eyes, because they would not see mine innocency: you my Lord shall answer for this Iustice before him, whether I doe summe C you within a yeare and a day, I goe before by the iudgement of men, but those that are the cause of my death shall come after by the iudgement of God. All which was deliuered with such violence, as hee cryed out and stormed both against the King and his Parliament. They beare with all which proceeds from choller in a condemned man of his humor and qualitie. But this excesse to adorne a Chancellor to heauen being seventy yeares old, was held vnworthy the great courage of a Captaine, blaspheming and brauing death, and yet ignorant how they plead in another world. Hee was not the first in the like extremities, that haue adourned their Iudges before the throne of God. Iohn Hus sayd in dying: Thas those which had condemned him should answer a hundred yeares after before God and him: and the Bohemians who preferred the ashes of his bones and maintained his doctrine, coynd money with this adournment. But the Duke of Biron's affligations was vaine: for the Chancellor appeared not, but hath beene more healthfull since then before. He found no meanes to enter into discourse amidst the confusion of so many words which were like to a violent streams. Yet he interrupted him, to tell him that he had need of Gods helpe, and that he should recommend himselfe vnto him. He presently answered, that he had thought vpon God, and implored his ayde to giue him patience against their iniustice, but neither he nor his Iudges had thought of it in condemning him. Passion (said the Chancellor) makes you to speake many things without any colour, and against your owne iudgement. There is not any man hath better knowne your merits than myselfe, and I would to God your offences had been as much vnknowne as they haue beene: diffembled. The knowledge thereof was to great and so perfect, as your Iudges haue been more troubled how to moderate your paine, then to haue you punished, they haue more laboured to iustifie you then to condemne you.

Whilest the Chancellor was speaking, the Duke of Biron turned towards Raisy Master of Requests, and asked him if he had also bene one of his Iudges. Raisy answered; My Lord, I pray God to comfort you. My father loued you so intirely (replyed the Duke of Biron) that although you were one of them that had condemned mee I would forgive you. And so returning to his discourse, he addrest himselfe vnto the Chancellor, who was laying something vnto Raisy. I see well (said he) what it is, I am not the most wicked, but I am the most vnfortunate. Those which haue done worse then I would haue done, are fauored. The Kings clemency is dead for mee. Hee doth not imitate the examples of Cesar nor Augustus, or of those great Princes, who not onely pardoned them that would haue done ill, but euen them that did ill, and who were euer sparing of their blood, yea of that which was least esteemed, wherein can the King shew himselfe greater then in pardoning? Clemency is a Kingly vertue, euery one may giue death, but it belongs onely to Soueraignes to giue life. And cruell that he is, doth hee not know well that hee hath pardoned me. I had a bad designe, he granted mee grace. I demand it againe, you may easily ad- uertise

A uertise him, a Post will soone returne. The Queene of England told me, that if the Earle of Essex would haue humbled himselfe and sued for grace, he would haue pardoned him. He grew obdurate, and would neuer implore her mercy, taking from her all meanes to shew the effects. She like a generous Princeesse desiring to pardon him, euen as she would that God should pardon her. Hee was guilty, I am innocent: he sued for no pardon for his offence, I craue it in my innocency.

Is it impossible the King should thinke no more of the seruices I haue done him? doth he not remember the conspiracy at Mantes, and the danger he had runne into, if I had had intelligence with the conspirators, who found nothing that did more hinder the effects of their designe then my loyalty, nor a more ready meanes to attaine vnto it then in causing me to be slaine? There is no veine in my body which hath not bled for his seruice? He shewes that he neuer loued me any longer then he thought himselfe to haue need of mee. Hath he forgotten the sieges of Amiens, where they haue seene mee so often couered with fire and bullets, and to bee in so many dangers either to giue or to receiue death? He neuer quenched the torch in my blood, after that he hath vsed it. My Father exposed himselfe to a thousand dangers, and purchased death to set the Crowne vpon his head. I haue receiued fise and thirty wounds vpon my body to preferre it for him, and for my reward he takes my Head from my shoulders. Let him beware lest the Iustice of God fall vpon him. Hee shall find what profit my death will bring him, it will nothing as- cure his affaires, but impaire the reputation of his Iustice. Hee doth lose this day a good seruant, and the King of Spaine a great Enemy. I am not put to death for that I treated with him; my courage railed me vp, and my courage ruines me.

It is not lawfull for a man condemned to dispute of that which hath beene iudged against him. And therefore the Chancellor sayd: that hee should not torment himselfe any more against his Iudgement, that they had done him that Iustice which a Father is bound to pronounce against his owne Sonne if he had offended in the like sort. At that word, choller makes him to breake forth, saying: What Iustice? I was neuer heard but once, I could not deliuer the fiftieth part of my Iustification. What Iudgement vpon the testimony of the most wretched and most execrable man in the world, who neuer came neere mee but with incantments, nor went from mee but he had enchanted mee? He bit me by the eare, and made me to drinke incanted waters, calling me his King, his Prince, his Lord. Hee cannot deny but hee made me to see an Image of waxe which spake these two words in Latin. Thou shalt dye wicked King. If hee hath this power ouer a senselesse Image, what might hee not doe vpon me whose will he did tyrannize vpon by his witch-craft, forcing me to doe what hee pleased. But La Fin sayes, that hee knowes not what this Image meanes. If it be true, these words discouer the Diuels policie, who speaks the truth in his misery that trusteth vnto his lies, and intangles him still with inscrutable ambiguities. So hee deceived Cresus when hee told him that the Riuer Halys should lose a great power, meaning his, not that of Cyrus, against whom hee went to fight. So the Diuell meant not any other King then he whom La Fin saluted by the name of King, calling the Duke of Biron his Prince and his King. At euery word now hee vttered (some execration against La Fin, taxing the Court of Iniustice, to haue condemned him vpon his accusation. The Chancellor said vnto him that the Court had considered aduisely of his answers and his letters. It is true, said the Duke of Biron, I haue written some, but there are some that by an odious wickednesse premeditated haue bene counterfeited. Those that were of my hand-writing were not my intention. I disauowed them when I sent them. There are some that can counterfeite letters so artificially, as they that are charged therewith are confounded, and beleeue they had written that which they neuer thought. The Marquesse of Vernuell confessed to haue written that which was not her hand, nor euer in her thought, and when he had read the letter, shee cryed out, that her hand had betrayed her heart, hauing neuer any thought of that which was contained therein. The Chancellor would haue interrupted his discourse, but hee prest him in such sort as there was no meane to make any way. He spake of the Kings pardon which he had granted him, as if he had relied vpon his word, not seeking any other assurances. He told what letters the King had sent him to perswade him to come, and the policy of the President Lianin to draw him thereunto, to deceiue him as hee sayd, calling him a Deceiuer, the aduice of his friends conuincing him not to come, with many other vnecessary discourses.

The Duke of Biron delivers vp the Kings
order.

The Chancellor to interrupt him, sayd, that the King demanded his Order, the Duke of Biron drawing it out of his pocket, deliuered it vnto him, protesting and swearing vpon the saluation and perill of his Soule, that hee had neuer broken the oath which hee had made in taking it. It was true that hee had affected Warre more then peace, to make himselfe necessary, and to maintaine the reputation which hee had gotten by the practice of Armes. It seemes he had not well obserued the articles of this Order, by the which no Knight of the Holy Ghost might take any Pension, Entertainment nor money from a foraigne Prince, nor tye themselves to the seruice of any other person during the Kings life, but should faithfully reueale all which they knew did import his Maiesties seruice. The Chancellor would haue had him to read his sentence: hee beseeched him not to intreat him with that rigour, that he knew what it did import, but the King should content himselfe with his Life, and suffer his goods to goe vnto his kinsfolkes, ending his paine with his death. The Chancellor said that hee doubted not but the King like a Prince full of bounty would let his kinsfolkes know that hee had loued him. Although the losse of life is nothing comforted by the preservation of goods, yet this gaue him some consolation, so as the fume of his choller was suddenly dispersed. The Chancellor sayd, That hee had brought two Diuines to comfort him, and to prepare him for death. The prisoner said vnto them, That hee was already prepared, and had his Soule in that tranquillity, as the night before he had spoken with God, and that his guard had heard him laugh in his sleepe.

The Chancellor who had much forced his patience, sayd vnto him, wee will bid you farewell. What farewell said the condemned? I will come and see you againe after dinner, answered the Chancellor: As he went forth he intreated him to grant him the last consolation that remains for men that are dying, when they may haue their wils to passe after their deaths, and to suffer him to make his Testament. It was granted, and hee disposed thereof with a spirit free from all perturbation. Hee remembered his seruants and friends, not forgetting the Baron of Lux whom he lamented aboute all. He drew three rings from his fingers deliuering them to Saranten to giue vnto his sister of S. Blancart, desiring her to wear them in remembrance of him. Hee had about three hundred Crownes when hee was taken prisoner, a part he playd, the rest hee gaue away to the poore. Eight or ten of his guard came to take their leaues of him with teares in their eyes. Hee gaue them Apparell, Shirts, Cloakes, and all that he had in his Coffers. So when the table is taken away, they giue the meat that remains, to them that haue wayted. Garnier the Kings Preacher and now Bishop of Mompellier, with Magnan Curat of Saint Nicholas of the field, presented themselves to comfort him, to take from him the violent fits, which the opinion of his innocency did giue him, and to withdraw him from the affections of the world. Voisin told him that it was the course of Iustice to read the sentence, and that hee must kneele downe before the Altar. Read it saies hee, I will bee as supple as a gloue. It was read in these termes: The Proceffe being extraordinarily made, and examined by the Court and Chambers assembled, and by the Presidents and Councillors that were deputed by Letters Patents of the 18 and 19 of Iune, at the request of the Kings Attourney Generall against Charles Contault of Biron, Knight of both orders, Duke of Biron, Peere and Marshall of France, Gouernour of Bourgongne, prisoner in the Bastille, accused of treason: interrogations, confessions and denials, confronting of witnesses, letters, aduices and instructions giuen to the enemy, confessed by him, and all which the Attourney Generall hath produced. A sentence was giuen the 22 of this Moneth, by the which it was decreed in the absence of the Peeres of France (being called) they should proceed to Iudgement, the conclusions of the Kings Attourney Generall being giuen, and the prisoner being heard by the Court vpon the Crimes wherewith hee was charged, all considered, it was sayd: That the said Court had declared and did declare the said Duke of Biron guilty of high Treason, for his conspiracies against the Kings person, enterprises against his Estate, and treacheries and treaties with his enemies, being Marshall of the Kings Army. For reparation of which Crimes, they deprived him of all his Estates, Honours and Dignities, and condemned him to lose his head vpon a Scaffold at the Greue, declaring all his goods moveable and immouable whereloener, to bee confiscate vnto the King: the Seignurie of Biron to lose the name and title of Duchy and Peere for euer, with all other goods held immediately of the King

choller after the reading of his sentence.

A King to be vnto the Crowne of France, decreed in the Court of Parliament the last day of Iuly 1602, and signed by Bellieure Chancellor of France, and Fleury Councillor in the Court, and Reporter of the proceffe. He grew into choller thrice in the reading of the sentence: when they said that hee had attempted against the Kings person, he protested with great Imprecations that it was false. That hee had neuer made any conspiracie, that he had his head troubled with some enterprises of State, for that hee would not lie idly in peace, but giue some employment to men of warre. But it was about two and twenty moneths since he had any thought of it; desiring that Voisin might raze that out of the sentence. When he heard that he should be executed at the Greue, he said he would not goe thither, but would rather be drawne with foure horses, and that it was not in all their powers to lead him. Voisin said, that they had provided for it, and that the King had done him the grace to change the place of his execution, hauing appointed it in the Bastille: What grace answered the prisoner? The third point of his sentence was, that he was troubled for the reunion of the Duchy of Biron to the Crowne, the which he said, could not be forfeit to the preiudice of the substitution of his brethren, and that the King should be satisfied with his life.

The Diuines after the pronouncing of the sentence spake more boldly vnto him of death, and to free himselfe of all worldly cares as he had done of his goods, and that hee should haue no other thoughts but of his Soules health. Hee then grew into choller, swearing that they should suffer him in peace, and that it concerned him onely to thinke of his Soule, with the which they had nothing to doe. It is the order in Criminal executions to deliuer the party condemned into the hands of the Executioner as soone as his Iudgement is read. They would haue done so with him: but Voisin went to speake vnto the Chancellor, to know if they should not distinguish him from other prisoners. The Chancellor was in doubt whether they should binde him or nor. Hee asked Sillery what he thought, who vnderstanding by Voisin that the party condemned was well pacified, sayd, it was to be feared that in seeking to binde his hands they would cause him to breake the bonds of patience, and enter into new furies, for that they which are in that disordre, are dis tempered for small matters.

Yet the Chancellor would haue the aduice of the first President, who was in another Chamber, for that he had dined before hee came vnto the Bastille: Hee sayd that it was dangerous to suffer his hands free, and therefore they must binde him. Euery one was of Sillerys opinion, who considered not so much what should be done as what might bee done, for the party condemned would neuer haue suffered himselfe to haue bene led bound to the place of execution but in Fury and Despaire. The Executioner (who said since that a yong langman and not experienced would haue dyed for feare) had bene in danger to endure that which he would make him to suffer. In this liberty, his spirit was alwaies free in his thoughts for the last disposition of affaires: the Diuines intreated him to consider that hee was no more what hee had bene: that within an houre or two hee should be no more: that he must leaue this life to liue for euer: that his Soule must goe before the fearful Throne of the liuing God, to be rewarded with a more happy and perfect life then that which hee had past in this world: or condemned to infinite paines, in comparision whereof, that which hee should suffer was but a slight pricking, in respect of the burning flames of the Diuine Iustice.

Hee then entred into the examination of his Conscience, in the which hee remained aboute an houre. This action required an humble, penitent and a contrite heart, and yet he seemed much more carefull of worldly things, and of the affaires of his house, then of his Soules health, and as it were a yong apprentice in the first prayers of his Religion, praying vnto God not as a deuout Christian, but as a Souldier, not as a religious Man, but as a Captaine, nor as Moses or Elias, but like to Iesusa, who, on horsebacke and with his sword in his hand prayed and commanded the Sunne to stand still. His confession being made, he walked vp and downe the Chappell, still calling out some exclamation for his Innocency, and some execration against La Fin, asking if it should not be lawfull for his brethren to cause him to be burnt.

Hereupon Voisin comes, who tells him that the Chancellor and the first President were very glad of the constant & generous resolution hee had to die, and that they would come presently to see him. He answered that hee had bene long resolved, and that it was not

the paine of death, but the manner that did amaze him. Whilest he attended them, there A were many nores brought him, touching his affaires, whereunto hee answered without trouble or passion. Hee recommended the payment of some debts which he did owe to Gentlemen, that had nothing to shew for it; and among others, to the Ambassadour in England: when the Chancellor had dined, he came to see him with the first President, and found that as a troubled water grows cleere being settled, so the time which he had giuen him to thinke of his affaires, had taken from him the violent agitations of his fantasie, and freed his heart from the feare of death: he commanded all that were in the place to retire, and they sat downe together about halfe an houre, but their discourse is vnknowne.

He reflects to eyes.

In the end the Chancellor sayd vnto him, I should doe wrong vnto your courage, if I should exhort you vnto death, the hath presented her selfe vnto you in so many places, as it is not in her power to trouble the Constancy and Patience, whereunto I belecue you are disposed. You find it hard to die in the flower and vigour of your age, but if you consider that our dayes are limited, and that they depend on the foresight of the Governour of the whole world, you will receive this death as by the will of God, who meanes to retire you out of this world for your owne good, before that some great and long misery shall find you. As we may not desire a death which is far off, so may we not reiect that which offers it selfe. No, no, answered the party condemned, labour not (my Lord) to fortifie me against the feare of death, these twenty yeares it hath not feared mee, and knowing not where the would take me, I haue expected her euery where. You haue giuen me 40 daies C to thinke vpon it, yet I could not beleuee that it being not in the power of my enemies to take away my life, I should be so miserable as to be seized on by death, with the consent of my friends. The King (said the Chancellor) hath cut off all that might bee shamefull and ignominious. He then asked him if he would speake with any one. He sayd that he desired to see La Force and S. Blancart. They told him that they were not in the City, but there was a Gentleman of the Lord of Badoules, and after that he had demanded for Preuost (Comptroller of his house) and that they had answered him that he was gone three daies before to a house of his in the Country, he then said, that he ought not to haue bene there, that he had all his blankes: adding thereunto these words of compassion; All the world hath abandoned me. In these crimes friendship is dangerous, friends faile, and the delect is taken by acquaintance, as well as by infection. He is wise that knows no man, nor no man knows him. D

He desires to see his friends.

The Chancellor takes his leave of him.

At these words the Chancellor and the first President tooke their leaues of him with teares in their eyes. He intreated them to receive a good opinion of his life, by the assurance which he gaue at the point of death, that hee had neuer attempted any thing against the King, and that if he would haue vnderaken it, the King had not beneeliuing three yeares since. The Chancellor went out of the Bastille with the first President and Sillery, and stayed in the Arceual vntill the execution was done. The Duke of Biron intreated the Knight of the Watch to goe after him, and to request him that he would suffer his body to be intened with his Predecessors at Biron, for although nature hath provided that no man shall die without a graue, yet men thinke curiously thereof before they die, and imagine, that as glory preferres the reputation of the life, so the graue maintaines the remembrance of the body. He that had seen him would haue thought he had not been ready to dye, so little care he had of death, or else hee promised to himselfe some vnepected effects of the Kings mercy, or to escape by miracle. There is no such deceit as imagination frames in these extremities, whē she flatters herself with vain hope, imagining that God doth greater wonders, and that they haue seene a pardon come betwixt the Executioners sword and Prisoners necke: Voisin asked him if he pleased to say any thing else that might serue to discharge his conscience. The Preachers exhorted him not to conceale any thing, and to consider that they could not giue him absolution but for what he should confesse. He answered, that although the King did put him to death vnjustly, yet hee had F so much loued his seruice, and had serued him with so great loue and obedience, neuer diuiding the one from the other, as hee felt in his thoughts of death, those of his loue, to be so liuely and ardent, as he would not conceale any thing that he knew to be against his person or state, for all the world, no not for the assurance of his life he would not speake any thing that was not true.

Hee drew Voisin and his Confessors apart and whispered something vnto them, the which was presently written. Having continued with his Confessors halfe an houre, (being

A (being neere fise of the clocke) one came and told him that it was time to part. Goe we (said he) seeing I must. He then kneeled downe before the Altar, makes his prayer, and recommends himselfe vnto God, before he goes out of the Chappell. He asked if there were any one that belonged vnto the Marquis of Rhosny, Arnaud was there, whom he willed to present his commendations vnto his Master, in remembrance not so much of him that went to die, as of his kinsfolkes which remained aliue, and to assure him that hee held him for a good seruant to the King, and profitable and necessary for his seruice, and that hee was sorry hee had not followed his counsell. Hee knew one that followed the Duke of Mayenne, and intreated him to say vnto him, that if in his life he had giuen him some cause not to loue him, yet he desired him to beleuee that he dyed his seruant, and the Duke of Elguillons and the Earle of Sommerues his children. Hee charged Baranton to deliuer his last words of loue and affection vnto his brethren, commanding them to keepe the faith which bound them vnto the Kings seruice, not to apprehend his misfortune, nor to come at Court vntill that time had worne out the skarres of this ignominious death. He intreated one of them that had guarded him, to go tell the Earle of Auvergne that he went to dye without griefe, but for the losse of his friendship: that if God had giuen him a longer life, hee would haue done him more seruice, beseeching him to beleuee that hee had sayd nothing at his arraignment that might hurt him, if it were not that hee had more want then bad meaning.

He prays before he goes forth of the Chappell.

C The Count of Auvergne receiued this farewell as from a true friend, and with a feeling, worthy of his friendship, hee intreated him to leaue him a bafe childe of his, the which hee would bring vp with his owne. Going out of the Chappell, the Executioner presented himselfe vnto him. Hee asked Voisin what he was. It is (said he) the Executioner of the sentence. Retire thy selfe (said the Duke of Biron) touch me not vntill it be time. And doubting lest hee should bee bound, hee added, I will goe freely vnto death, I haue no hands to defend my selfe against it, but it shall neuer bee said that I die bound like a thiefe or a slave: and turning towards the hang-man, hee saw that if he came neere him he would pull out his throat. He could not endure the sight of the Executioner: Hee had reason, for they torment the body, as Duels be executioners of the soule. And although D they be men and the instruments of Iustice, yet they are held execrable, and had no dwelling house allowed them in Rome by the Censors Law. The two Preachers led him downe, intreating him to resist his impatience, which did but distemper his minde, and made him loath to leaue the place which he could not hold against his will. Coming into the Court, hee went fise or fixe paces without speaking a word, but ha, ha, ha. He cast his eyes vpon the Lieutenant Ciuil, in whose house la Fin was lodged, to whom he said, I am your friend, beware you bee not abused with Sorcerers and Magicians, if you free not your selfe of them, you will repent it.

He sends commendations to the Count of Auvergne.

He grows into choller when he sees the hangman.

He goes to the scaffold.

They had made a scaffold in a corner of the Court of the Bastille before the portall going into the Garden, fixe foot high and somewhat longer, there were fise steps to goe vnto it. There were no Ornaments, no Tapifry, no distinction. The most stately death is not the least troublesome, the greater the preparation is, the more remarkable is the infamy. It is no great honor to kneele vpon a velvet Cushion, vpon a Scaffold spread ouer with Tapifry, and to haue by him an Executioner clad in blacke velvet and Crimson Silke, with the sword of Gold of Helias abalus: the death which is least ceremonious is the best. The beholders were some at the windowes, some in the Court. There were the Prouost of Merchants, foure Sheriffes, three or foure Masters of Requests, some Presidents of the Chambers of Accounts, and some Councillors, the Lieutenants Ciuil and Criminall, and the Kings Attourney General. The Duke of Biron coming to the Scaffold kneeled vpon the first step, praying in few words, and his eyes lift vp to Heauen. He was exhorted to kisse the Crosse in remembrance of his Redemption. Hee F was attyred in Rustet Taffata, with a blacke Hat. Hee cast a furious looke vpon the Executioner. Voisin perswaded him that it was another, but he knew him well, saying, that they sought to deceiue him, but hee commanded him to stand by, and when it were time hee would call for him. Hee threw downe his Hat, and cast his handkercher to a boy, and presently called for it againe to vse it, seeming in this act that hee had not the courage to looke vpon death with open eyes. He put off his dublet, and cast it to the same boy, but the Executioners man, got it, and kept it.

Vuuu3

The

The Executioner offered him a cloth to put before his eyes, the which hee rejected, A saying, that if hee toucht him, but to giue him the stroke of death, hee would strangle him. Hee layd vnto the souldiers which guarded the Port (shewing them his naked breast) that he should be much bound vnto him that would shoot him with a Musket: what a pitty is it sayd he, to die so miserably, and of so infamous a stroke? They might see by his hollow eyes, that his thoughts were dis tempered. At these words the teares fell from the souldiers eyes. All those of his profession sware by his Spirit, and by his good Angell, as the Ancients did by that of their Prince. The poorest souldier was cherished by him, at the least he had some good words to assure him of his good liking. The Harguebuziers did wound him at the heart, through the extreme compassion they had of him. So were B the souldiers of Eumenes, moued when they saw him bound and manacled, intreating them to kill him. He asked if there were no pardon, and directing his words to the standers by, hee sayd, that he had made his soule ready to present it before the face of God, but hee tooke pity of the Kings soule, who put him to death vniustly: that hee dyed an innocent, and that his death was the recompence of his seruice: Voisin said vnto him, that it was the manner to read the sentence. He was angry that they would make him to feelee death, and to die to often before his death, for he felt himselfe to die cruelly in the repetition of the crymes of his condemnation, being sufficient that they had brought him thither where hee was ready to obey, and that they which did see him were not ignorant of the cause.

When as the Register answered him that it could not be otherwise, he gaue him leave: but vnderstanding the words: that he had attempted against the Kings person and State, he sayd that it was false. That God was his Iudge, that he would bee de priued eternally of his grace, if it were true, that for two and twenty moneths past he had neuer any thought of it, and that the King had pardoned him. He talked all the while that Voisin read his iudgement, so as neither the one nor the other could bee vnderstood, the Auditors not knowing to whom to giue care. The party condemned protesting still, and coniuring the Assisants to remember that these two and twenty moneths he had not attempted any thing against the Kings seruice. No man doth at any time condemn himselfe. You shall see D few of these great Spirits, that die by their owne confessions, although they bee found guilty. Some confesse the Fact, but they hold it no crime, as that yong Gentleman who was one of them that murdered the Duke of Milan, being ready to receiue the stroke, he cried out, that the death which hee suffered was troublesome, but his Reputation should bee euermore glorious.

His iudgement being read, the Preachers perswaded him to call to God for helpe, and not to thinke any more on Earth, but to yeeld his Soule to the immortall disposition of the Creator, and to leaue his body to that which Iustice had decreed. Hee asked what he should doe, and takes his hand-kercher, with the which hee blinds his eyes, asking the Executioner where hee should set himselfe: hee answered him, there my Lord, there. And where is that? Thou seest that I see nothing, and yet thou shewest mee as if I did see plainly: and therewith being in choller, he pulled away his hand-kercher to see: Hee blinded his eyes againe, and for that it is a kinde of grace to bee soone dispatched, and a great cruelty to languish in the expectation of a paine, hee commanded the Executioner to make an end. He desired to die standing, according to the aduice of Vespassian. The Executioner answered him that he must kneele, that hee might doe nothing out of order. No no, said the Duke of Biron, if thou canst not doe it at one, giue thirty. I will not stirre. They preff him to kneele, and he obeyed, willing the Executioner to dispatch: then hee start vp suddenly againe, casting his eyes vpon the Executioner: & looking vpon the standers by, hee asked if there were no mercy: It was imagined, that either he would haue layd hand vpon the Executioners sword, or that he presumed that when hee should be ready to receiue the fatal stroke they would bring him his pardon, and that the King would doe him no other harme then feare him, as Papirius Cursor did one of his souldiers for breaking of his ranke. The Executioner intreated him to suffer him to cut his haire. At that word hee grew into choller againe, he vnband himselfe, and sware that if he toucht him he would strangle him. You may see in two persons, two extreame passions. Feare rettyred the Executioner within himselfe. Choller transported the Duke of Biron beyond himselfe. The one trembled for feare, the other for rage. Voisin said vnto him, that he had too much care of

ratoris excusatoris deat.

A of his body, which was no more his owne. Hee turned to him in choller with an oath, saying, I will not haue him touch me, so long as I shall be liuing: if they put me into choller, I will strangle halfe the company that is here, and will force the rest to kill me, I will leape downe if you thrust me into despair. His colour did rise, and shewed a dis temperature in his face. Those that were vpon the scaffold went downe. The Executioner remained amazed, fearing death more then hee that was to die.

But this choller preuailed nothing, it was like vnto Ctesiphon, to kicke against the Mayles heeles. Re lly horses get nothing but spurring, they are neither freed from their burden, nor from their journey, he must resolute to goe this way, the which hee must passe B at length. Voisin intreating the Preachers to goe vp againe, and to pacifie him, fearing lest hee should fall into despair, for his soule being much troubled with the violence of so tragical an end (entering into these furious motiues) was subiect to great dis temperatures. They goe vp againe, and speake some good words vnto him in his eare, the which doth temper his furious rage, and calmes the choller which the Executioners presence did thrust him into: he had alwaies liued in war, he could not dye in peace. All men found these furious passions strange in the last act of his life, the which required a great constancy of minde, and a perfect iudgment to know God, to call to him for mercy, and to pray him to intreat his soule more fauourably then Iustice had done his body.

Hitherto hee beleueed, that although he were entering into death, yet he thought not C to dye, and that he would seize vpon the Executioners sword. Suddenly hee resolues to free his passage, and hauing receiued his absolution, he said, My God, my God, my God, take pity on me. Then turning to the Executioner, he takes the binder that was in his hand, trusses vp his haire behinde, and binds it vpon his forehead: and with his handkercher hee blinds his eyes, and so kneeles downe. The Preachers comfort him in his last resolution, assuring him that his soule was ready to see God, and to be partaker of his glory in heaven. I said he, Heauen is open for my soule. And this done hee bends downe his head, presenting it as willingly vnto the sword, as Agis did his vnto the halter, saying vnto the Executioner: Strike, strike, ob strike. This was to dye in commanding, and to command in dying.

D The Executioners hauing seene him to rise, and to vnbind himselfe thrice, that in turning towards him being not bound, hauing the sword in his hand, he might wrest it from him, thought that there was no way to execute him but by surpris, and therefore hee said vnto him, that he must say his last prayer to recommend his soule vnto God, intreating the Preachers that were gone downe to cause him to say it. At which words the Executioner made a signe to his man to reach him his sword, with the which hee cut off his head, euen as he was speaking. The blow was so sodaine, as few men perceived it, the head leaped from the scaffold to the ground. The Preachers prayed for the happy departure of the soule, from so vnhappy a body, the which was presently stripped into his shirt, and couered with a sheete. His heart panted, as if in rising against the head, it had said as E Apollodorus thought that he did when hee dremp that one did hew it in peeces; It is for thee that I suffer. This head full of the fumes of Ambition, was the cause of the Hearts death. The Executioner struck him so high about the nape of the neck, as hee glanced vpon his lawe-bones, and left a great tuft of haire on his neck. Being dead, hee shewed choller in his countenance, as they write of the Souldiers which died at the battle of Cannas. Euery one departed, commending the Kings Iustice, and lamenting the misery of so valiant a man, beleueing that of long time they should not see his equall. His kind-folkes would thinke themselves happily, if the glory of his life might wipe away the infamy of his death, if the shining of his first actions were not obliuiscd with the darknesse of the last, that for a recompence of all his seruices which haue made him so famous, they might obtaine the fauour that they would neuer speake of him. But there is no law of forgetfulness, to deface the memory of that which hath bene, and of that which is. About nine of the clocke at night, he was caried to S. Pauls Church, and buried in the middle of the body, before the Pulpit, the Celestines hauing refused to giue him buriall hauing had no permission nor commandement for it. Hee was not distinguished from others by his funeral pompe, nor by the number of Ensignes (like vnto that great Captaine at Grando) but by the holy water which the Parisiens did cast hourly vpon his graue. Such was the end of the Duke of Biron.

There is no calme but hath a storme: one would haue said to haue seene him at the height of his prosperities; That hee had fixed a nayle on Fortunes wheele, that it might not turne, and yet he is suddenly cast downe. There past but one night betwixt his glory and his ruine. The Flower being so suddenly blowne, the first Northerne winde did wither it, and cary it away. His honours and greatnesse were the meanes to ruine him, like vnto Abalons long haire, by the which he was hanged. King Lewis the eleuenth did alwaies say, That pride caried ruine bebind him. A heart which knowes from whence the good comes which it enioyeth, is alwaies an enemy to Pride. So there is but a moment betwixt glory and ruine. Great trees are long in growing, but are rooted vp in an instant. And it is true, if the Duke of Biron had had a braine, he had not lost his head, and had not brought it into the hands of his Princes Iustice, whom he had so much offended.

The Marshall
Biron's vertues.

This Marshall had goodly parts, communicable to few, his valour was admirable, and happy in all his encounters; of an inuincible courage, infatigable, and neuer tyred with any toyle, continuing ordinarily fifteene daies together on horsebacke. He was not enclined to voluptuoufnesse, nor much to the loue of women, sober enough, the which began to quench that furious humour, as intemperancy and greatnesse encreased, or that rest did moderate his boyling passions. He was extremely vainglorious, yea, sometimes he would refuse his meat, and content himselfe with little, to feed his fantasie with glory and vanity. Hee was of a meane stature, blacke, reasonable grosse, hollow eyed, and rough in speech and conseruation. Hee was aduenturous in war, ambitious beyond all measure.

glory.

The excessse of his ambition made him to braue it without iudgment. He became so presumptuous, as hee thought that neither the King nor France could subsist without him. He was become ill tongued, speaking ill of all the Princes, threatening the Parliaments, and the officers of Iustice, some with death, and to dispossesse others of their places. Hee was advanced from the meaneest to the highest degrees of honour; of a simple souldier, he became a Captaine, then a Colonel, afterwards Admirall and Marshall, and in the end Lieutenant of the Kings Armies, and in his heart hee aspired to be Duke of Bourguigne, Sonne in law to the Duke of Sauoy, and Nephew to the King of Spaine. If Sylla were resolute, cruell, and bloody, hee yielded nothing to him therein: If hee were valiant, this man exceeded him by ten degrees, and all the Romane Princes together.

A comparison
betwixt Sylla and the D. of Biron,

Their actions and their ends were almost alike; but that Sylla died after hee had vanquished: this before he could vanquish, and in the midst of his course did feele the vengeance of Gods wrath. Howloeuere, he had won the Souldiers hearts, to whom hee gaue all liberty, he purchased credit with them that had neuer seene him (for they that had seene and felt him wished him at the Indies) and made strangers admire his valour: The Constable of Castille in the Franche County, the Archduke at Amiens, and the Marquis of Waranbon in Artois, whom he made to pay forty thousand crownes for his ranfome, with many Spaniards which he caused to be hanged suddenly, for that they had called him Baron.

His credit, and how he was effected.

Moreouer, the Kings exceeding fauours, the praises wherewith hee did publicly honour him: his admirable fortune, his comming to the restoring of the last ruines of the State, like to another Camillus to deliuer the Capitoll, had made him not onely famous throughout all Europe, fearefull to all the neighbours, but necessary for France. Behold a man that was happy, full of content, which held fortune captiue with all her treasures: he commanded the felicities of this world, he had glory, honour, riches, and those gifts which Fortune imparts to her darlings. He was raised to the top of Fortunes wheele, but he fell, for he that gouernes the helme and all her motions, could no longer endure his infolenie and vanity.

pride.

Sequitur superbus ultor a sergo Deus. The causes of his ruine are infinite; the contempt of piety is the chiefe: this ground taken away, all vices abound, and as the Seruant said to King Atræus, O Prince, follow the infallible way of Piety, and your Scepter shall be durable: for whereas faith and holinesse hath no place, there is no happinesse; the reason is, for that without God we hold all things indifferent, the Law folly, Iustice frenzie, and faith a fantasie; we hold the words of vertue and vice to be idle, whereas the feare and trust in God, limits our passions and insatiable desires, so as gouerning our actions by a iust proportion, we cannot erre.

He was often times seene to leaue at the Masse, and to laugh at them of the reformed religion, with whom he had bene bred vp from his infancy. For at the age of eight yeares, the Lady of Brisfambourg his fathers sister, (being of the reformed religion) did so affect him

A him for his actiue disposition, as she demanded him of his mother, the which she granted, and from that time she made him her onely heire. Vntill the age of sixteen yeares, he was called Charles of Contault: for then he had an elder brother which died since at the Duke of Alancons voyage into Flanders. And bred vp at Brilembourg, neare vnto S. Iean d'Angely, where he was nothing giuen to his booke, but wholly enclined to Arms: for which consideration, his father, the Marshall Biron, a martiall man, and then a Catholike, tooke him from his Aunt, and led him for a while with him through the countiies of Xaintonge, Aulins, and Angoulmois, where he caused him to be instructed in the Catholike religion: but vpon false principles which he did learne of some Courtiers, he did often mocke at all religion. The second cause of his ruine was the alteration of his fortune. After the death of his elder brother, his father caused him to bee called Baron of Biron, and brought him to Court, where at the first he had a quarell with the Lord of Cerency, sonne to the Earle of la Vauguion, the which was ended by a combat of three against three, Biron, Loignac, & lenissac of the one side, luc Cerency, Eftillac, and la Bassie: their quarrell grew for the Heire of Chaumont, which either of them affected in marriage, yet neither of them had her. The Duke of Elpernon got his pardon, the which was confirmed through the credit which his father had then in Court. Some say, that being thus in trouble he went disguised like a Carrier of Letters, vnto one La Brosse, a great Mathematician, whom they held to be skilful in casting of Natiuities, to whom he shewed his Natiuitie, drawne by some other. And dissembling it to be his, he said: It was a Gentleman whom he serued, and that he desired to know what end that man should haue. La Brosse, hauing rectified this figure, said vnto him: That he was of a good house, and no elder then you are, said he to the Baron, asking him if it were his: the Baron answered him, I will not tell you. But tell me (said he) what his life, his meanes, and end shall be. This good old man, who was then in a little Garret, which serued him for a study, said vnto him: My Son, I see, that hee whose natiuitie this is, shall come to great honour, by his industry and military valour, and may bee a King, but there is a CARRY ALOUD which hinderts it. And what is that? (said the Baron of Biron.) Aske me not (said La Brosse) what it is. No, (said the Baron) I must know it. In the end he said vnto him: My Sonne, it is, that he will doe that which shall make him lose his head. Whereupon the Baron (as they report) did beat him cruelly, and hauing left him halfe dead, he went downe, and caried away the Key of the Garret doore, whereof he bragged when he was gone. They say he had conference with one Caspar, who was a Magician at Paris, who told him, That onely a backe blow of the Bourguignon would keepe him from being a King. He remembered this prediction being a prisoner in the Baillie, and intreated one that went to visit him, to learne if the Executioner of Paris were a Bourguignon; and hauing found it so, he said: I am a dead man.

He went to a Mathematician to know his fortune.

During these last ciuill wars, his Father being Commander of the Kings army, of a young Baron, he was suddenly made a Captaine, and Marshall of the Campe. After his fathers death at Elpernay, he was Generall and Admirall of France; then Marshall and Lieutenant of the Kings Armies: The defear of the Spanish succours at Laon, with his exploits in Bourguiny and Picardy, made the King so loue him, as hee onely was in credit: there remained nothing but to vie his happines modestly. Doubletless he did great seruices to the King and to the Crowne, but he was rewarded with great fauours, and advanced to the greatest dignities and honours of the Crowne, the which if hee could haue vied temperately, euen in the height of his fortune, he had bene too happy. It is reported that his father said vnto him, seeing his haughty disposition; Baron, I would advise thee, when a pease shall be made, to goe and lye priuately at thine own house, else thou must leaue thy head at the Greue.

but Baron of Biron.

In many things Soueraigne Princes haue a common interest: a blow giuen with the right hand is sensible to the left: A conspiracy in one place, giues example and consequence in another. Who so hinders his neighbour from punishing the felonies of his subjects, binds himselfe to the like, and may suffer the same forme, for every Soueraignes Country is apt to breed sedition and treachery, and as intercessions are odious, so the defence and protection is vniust. Whatsoeuer is said, that Princes should embrace them which are persecuted, as one Element defends him that is afflicted by another, it is not to be vnderstood but of persecutions apparently vniust. Hence growes the custome of Princes to congratulate for the discouery and punishment of treason against their Estate.

of the Duke of

These Troopes
of the D. of Sauy were sent for Lions,
but for Geneva

All Princes that were allied to the Crowne of France, rejoyced at the discovery of the Duke of Biron's treason. The Queen of England, and the King of Scotland, sent their Ambassadors vnto the King, to congratulate that God had so happily prevented their last conspiracy. The King of Spaine did the like by Taxis. The Archduke laid all the blame vpon the Count of Fuentes. The Duke of Sauoy sent the Count of Vieque vnto the King, as well to obferue how the Duke of Biron's death had bene taken in Court, and in that great City, whereas there was diuersity of humours and opinions, as to excuse him from the imputation which was laid vpon him to be the Architect of this conspiracy.

The Ambassadors of England, Scotland, and Sauoy, were received on one day at Montcaux. The King in receiving of them made a great difference, for he received them not with one countenance. The last was not vsed like vnto the first, the King leaning vpon a window, shewed by his gesture, that he was not pleased with his excuses, and that words alone could not repaire to bad effects, nor make him beleue that the Duke of Sauoy had bene an Actor to corrupt the Duke of Biron. The Dukes Ambassador made his excuse with a great grace and boldnesse, although it be a very hard thing to discourse of a subiect to one that can giue no beleef vnto it. The Count of Vieque passing through Lions, visited the Governour, and gaue him a letter from his Master, the which hee sent vnto the King, who was very well pleased with his proceeding, and writ vnto him in this sort: It was not needfull to send mee this Letter, but onely to giue me a new confirmation of your loyalty, which I hold so assured, as it needeth neither that, nor any other. But the wisest do alwaies obserue the ancient formes, whereof that is one of the principall, not to see nor heare anything from foraine Princes, without the priuity and permission of his Master. The King parted from Montcaux to goe to Paris, where he dispatched the Ambassadors. That of Sauoy came to his Master, being newly returned from Verceil, where hee had visited the Duke of Sixonies brother, passing into Italy. He presented him with eight horses richly furnished, and a Hat-band with a Iewell esteemed at twelue thousand crownes. Soone after he went to Riouly for his pleasure of hunting, leading D'Albigny with him, to whom he made shewes of extraordinary loue. Mens conitctures were not able to pierce into the secrets of that which they treated of together; but they will burst forth before the yeare shall end. The Count of Vieque came to Riouly in the beginning of October. Every man said at Thurin, that his Ambassage was gracious, and that the King was well pleased with that which the Duke of Sauoy would haue him beleue: yet all Sauoy was full of Souldiers, and no man knew how they should be employed. Some said that the Duke of Biron's death would breed a new storme in France. But all the choller and threats of them that repined thereat, was but a phantasticall lightning. The Count of Fuentes would haue done his best to haue bred a storme: his spirit, which hath no rest but in exercise, thinking (with Teres, father to Sitalces) that nothing doth distinguish him from the rest of his Masters Seruants but war, was so much discontented for this death, as he could not sleepe. Hee did meditate of reuenge, and the King was well aduertised thereof.

It was thought, that vnder colour of passing a new army ouer the Alpes, hee would discouer some designe, and the King was a hurtled from many parts, that the City of Lions was not the last nor the least in his chollericke thoughts. That three and twenty Companies of Spaniards (in the which were at the least three thousand men) had past the mountains, and were dispersed in Sauoy: that the Duke of Sauoy had at Romilly fixe hundred men, vnder the Regiment of Valdiers, and at Anisly fiftene hundred Neapolitans; that they attended some Lanquents: that neere vnto Geneva there were thirty Companies of Spaniards landed, and that they fortified Saint Genis (against the last treaty of Peace) a fit place to execute any designe vpon Lions or Viennne. The King therefore foreseeing that if they fought any aduantage vpon France, it should be rather for Lions then any other place, he therefore lodged in the Battions of Saint John and Saint Clair fixe Companies of the Regiment of Bourg L'Espinalle; and those of Nersan, at Monduel and Sciffel.

The opinions of this new Army were as diuers as their designes were secret, yet it seemed that the Duke of Sauoy feared lest his Country should be forced again by the Kings Army, and that he should not haue so good a composition as the first, and therefore hee

he provided for all his places in Sauby, but this hatched another great designe, whereof we will speake in the end of this yeare. The King was much troubled to search into the depth of the Duke of Biron's conspiracy. La Fin was not acquainted with the last resolutions, the party condemned would neuer discover his complices. All this practice was well knowne to the Baron of Lux, who came vnto the King vpon the assurance of his Maiesties word to goe and come freely: yet he was aduised not to approach neare vnto the Court of Parliament, who would not entreat him more mildly then they had done the Duke of Biron, seeing he had been imbarcked with him in the same vessell, and to consider, that Princes promise any thing to discover a treason, but they neuer trust the Traitors; and if happily they fauour them for a time, the hatred which follows after is more violent and irreconcilable. That they vse men as Countrymen doth his Bees, when they haue drawne out the honey and wax, they chase them away with fire and smoake. The King was so well satisfied with that which the Baron of Lux had said vnto him (hauing talked long with him) as entering into his Carosse, he told the Count Seiffons, and the Cardinal of Ioyeuze, that hee would not for two hundred thousand crownes but haue spoken with the Baron of Lux.

His pardon past in the Parliament at Paris, and he was receiued in that of Dijon, with the same honours hee had before, and his charge of Lieutenant in the gouernment of Bourgongne, and of the Country of Bresse; his wilddome did condukt him in a stormy sea to a safe Port, and made him to avoid some dangers, whereas any other would haue lost both Card and Compassse. The greatest indiscretion which the Duke of Biron had committed, (next to the giuing eare to the promises and perswasions of strangers) was, that he had written his intentions, and had imparted them to another. It is a maxime in matters of conspiracie, not to commit any thing to writing, but all must goe by mouth. They could not haue condemned the Duke of Biron, but by his owne Letters. And of all those of whom hee spake in his Letters, there was nothing found of theirs in writing. Letters serue indifferently for an assurance of the faith that is giuen, and for a prooue of infidelity.

He would dye with that content, that none of his friends should be toucht but himselfe. Herbert his Secretary endured the Racke, and his patience did iustifie him, but the Kings words were a more violent torture vnto him, drawing the truth from him, the which he would not confesse vnto the Court. The Baron of Fontanelles, (who was found to haue intelligence with the Duke of Biron) was broken vpon the wheele by the decree of a great Councell. Mombarrant Governour of Rennes was committed to prison. Such as had knowne him during the last troubles full of resolution and affection for the reduring of Britany to the Kings obedience, lamented his misfortune. The Earle of Auvergne continued two months in the Bastille after the execution of the Duke of Biron. The King set him at liberty and receiued him into fauour, after three or foure daies that hee had purged himselfe, and discharged his confidence to the Chancellor, the Marquis of Rosny, and to Sillery. He grew presently familiar with the King, as if hee had neuer bene sequestred from his presence, wherein appeared his Maiesties good nature, and his generous spirit, which doth neuer remember any iniuries.

This generous and naturall disposition to forget offences, hath alwaies bene obserued in him when as he commanded armies. The Author of the free discourse saith; That he had seene within a quarter of an houre after a battle won, the vanquished so familiar among the victors, as they could not distinguish them; they came ordinarily to his Maiesties rising and going to bed, to his dinner and to his chambers, and into his Cabinet, and were for the most part petty masters of the Campe in those ciuill warres, who neuer durst to haue spoken to the King if they had not bene his enemies; and in this quality they receiued a good countenance. But the Duke of Bouillon considering what had bene done in the Bastille, vpon the person of so great a Captaine, would not trust to this great mildnesse, although hee had as great prooue thereof as any other. The King sent for him, and he desired to iustifie himselfe in the Chamber at Castres. The King let him vnderstand, that the pretext which hee tooke to flye vnto the Chamber at Castres for Iustitie, was without ground, for he was as called into question, and when hee should doe it, it could not be there, for that he depended not of that iurisdiction, neither could they take knowledge thereof without commission from his Maiey. He attended not to vnderstand derstand his pleasure more particularly by the President Caumartin, whom he resolved to fend vnto him, but tooke the way to Geneva, and so to Heidelberg. The Subiect may neuer capitulate with his Prince; but if necessity doth require it, it must not bee betwixt two Bars, like to the Constable of S. Paul, but as far off as he can.

The Duke of Bouillon being in his Viconte of Turenne, when as the King sent for him, he answered him with this Letter; "Sir, having vnderstood by that of your Maies- ties owne hand, of the eighteenth of this moneth, that I had beene accused by those which had beene examined in Councell vpon the conspiracies of the D. of Biron, and that you commanded me to repaire presently to Court to iustifie my selfe: I sent away him presently that came, with answer to your Maies-ty, that I would follow instantly, the which I had done, if I had not receiued certaine intelligence who were my accusers: The which made me to change this resolution, and humbly to beseech your Maies-ty to consider, that the treacheries and disloyalties against your Person and State are so fully pro- ued against my accusers, as it disables them to accuse me, and much lesse to condemne me. They haue not, nor cannot haue but lying tongues in their accusations, the which hauing failed them in the execution of their intention (being preuented by your Maies- ties happinesse and wisdom) they employ them; to make you suspect the second Offi- cer of your Crown, and your household Seruant, who hath neuer sought any glory in this world, but what proceeds from your Maies-ties grace and fauour, and who hath so long serued you. It is to be presumed, that hauing an intent to hurt mee, they haue intended C your displeasure against me, by the most horrible crimes they could inuent. They would make me the Instrument of that which they haue promised to the enemies of your Estate to preiudice you. And seeing they cannot now suborne any others, they will accuse them, who in the like affaires haue made proofe of their innocencies, by so many circumstan- ces, as it is not to be beleueed they would haue any thought to the contrary. They doe ill acknowledge your mercy, to continue still culpable, changing onely their offence. Seeing, that since they are become false witnesses, I will say vnto you, my Liege, as the Psalmist said vnto God: Lord come not neere me vntill I be fortified. I must confesse that I fear your countenance (hauing admitted such men to accuse me) seeing that your Maies-ty demands my iustification, the which hath retained me, not that my conscience doth ac- cuse me of any fault that is worthy of such an examination. Seeing it doth import your seruice, it is requisite I should satisfie your Maies-ty, your Realme, and mine honour; and free them of my religion from the scandall which they should receiue, if my crime were not punished, and mine innocency knowne. For the attaining whereof, I assure my selfe that your Maies-ty would not deprive me of the liberty which all your subiects of this re- ligion enioy, and the rather, for that no Iudges can bee more interested in these affaires, seeing the question is of the decay of your Realme, to augment that of Spaine, where- in all your Subiects haue one common losse; but those of the Religion (whereof the Chambers doe consist) haue a more particular: the which they esteeme more deare than their liues, which is the losse of their exercise. They will therefore bee seuerer Iudges rather then milde. If they shall finde me guilty they will hate me more then any other, from whom they did least expect it. I must humbly therefore beseech your Maies-ty, to send my accusers and accusations, thinking the imputation which is laid vpon me heauy, and the time tedious, vntill your Maies-ty may bee fully satisfised of mine innocency: for the speedy effecting whereof, I will attend at Castres the iustification of my fault or inno- cency, iudging that the time which I should haue spent in going to your Maies-ty, would haue but prolonged the affliction of my soule, remaining accused, seeing that your Maies-ty was to send me backe to the Chambers to condemne or absolue me, being the Iud- ges which your Edict hath giuen me. That it would please you to relieue my mind speedily, in giuing me the meanes to make my innocency knowne, and that by this prooffe you may rest assured of my faithfull seruice, and I of your fauour, the which shall bee a- boue all things desired of your most humble, most obedient, and most faithfull Subiect and Seruant, Henry de la Tour.

The Prince of Ginville committed.

The King caused the Prince of Ginville to bee committed to the Duke of Guise his brother. Sillery examined him very carefully, his Maies-ty relying vpon his wisdom and integrity. He aduertised the Gouernors of Provinces why he did vse it, yfing these words;

1602

A I haue committed my Nephew the Prince of Ginville, vnto my Nephew the Duke of Guise his brother, for that he had rashly & indiscreetly giuen care to certain propositions, that were made vnto him against my seruice: I will hold him in the same guard vntill that matters be made plaine, but I assure my selfe it concerns him only, wherein those of his house haue no share, neither is there any one named or comprehended with him: whereof I thought good to aduertise you.

We need not feare that the hearts of the French, although they be inconstant, will passe any more into Spaine, the Marshall of Birons had hath stoppt the passage. There is no man desirous to giue care to the promises of Spaine, hauing such ruinous effects: and who doth not detest that cruell ambition, which hauing corrupted the best blood of the Duke of Biron, bred in him so violent and continuall a feuer of the minde, as after that it had afflicted him about foure yeares, there was no other remedy but by that shamefull letting of blood, which made his soule all bloody, and violently to leaue his body. Those that will not be diuerted by the aspect of this head, and which imagine vnto themselves mountaines of gold beyond the Pirenes, let them consider that a Prince, and chiefe of his party, hauing followed their designs, hath gotten nothing but ruine, after that hee had engaged his liuing, his wiues and childrens, he spent five hundred thousand crownes in ready mony, and became indebted vpon his owne credit and his friends, in about a million of gold, he was in the end so disliked, hated and contemned of them, as in stead of canonizing him, the Duke of Feria did giue aduice to make him away, or to keepe him C prisoner. We must resist the first thoughts of despise, discontent and rebellion, and take heed lest the desire of new fauours which we affect of the Prince, make vs not forget the former: for hence grow discontents more powerfull to draw vs to ill, then reason is able to restraîne vs to good: from despite spring bad desires, which neuer encrease but by fury and blindness, and produce violent motions of ambition, which binde him to vnder- take and to doe any thing, although there be nothing that may dispence the Subiect from his duty to his Prince.

They did speak, write, and discourse of this death both in their Prose and Rhime, some with so small reason, as they strined to finde innocency in the life, and constancy and resolution in the Duke of Birons death, although that in the last there were more cholier and violence, then constancy, whereof patience is one of the principall branches, and in the first so great guilt, as if the Court had quitted him, his conscience could not absolue him. Such as in these discourses desired rather to seem learned, then wise, repented their know- ledge, and were in paine. Herein some one did me a bad office, which forceth me to adde something in this Narration for mine owne defence, and is that which I shall say doth not content slander, yet shall it be according vnto truth, or like vnto bad Multitians, who are neuer wearied themselves though their musike be vtunable.

Presently after the D. of Birons execution, I did write six lines to Lions vpon this sub- iect, to dispence my selfe of a longer discourse which they expected, meaning to referre it for this History, whereunto I added six Verses written (as it was said) by one of the first E Poets of France, vpon the heads of the Father and Son, the first struck off with a Cannon, the other with a sword. This letter coming before all aduice of so famous an accident, was impaired and copied out greedily, contrary to my intent. In the end it returned to Pa- ris, and from thence to Monceaux where the King was. Hauing found opportunity there to speake to his Maies-ty after supper, of a busines far from this letter, whereon I dreamed no more: hauing told me his pleasure, he added these words: Go and speake with Monseur de Villeroi, I asked if it were for the businesse wherof I had spoken vnto him; No, said he: and drawing me aside, it pleased him to heare me, and to giue mee better words then I could hope for, adding in the end, Speake to Monseur de Villeroi, without giuing me any farther knowledge of the matter. I repaired vnto him early in the morning, not knowing what F to say, but only to receiue his Maies-ties intention after some complements of courtesie, he caused all them in the Chamber to retire, and then he said vnto me; You are made the author of a Letter touching the Marshall of Biron, which hath gone far out of the Realme: it contains but six or seuen lines, & hath points in it, which the King hauing well considered of, is so much the more offended, that hauing made you his Historiographer, it appears plainly what your passion might be, words being the interpreter of the minds affliction.

It behooued me then to protest, that I had neither spoken nor written any thing a- gainst the Kings Iustice, to lament the Duke of Birons death, who in his life had not gi- uen uen me occasion to bewaile it, with any other then a common affection, which grieues A that to braue a Knight should to forget himselfe: that hauing seene a discourse of my writing of the causes and effects of the wars betwixt the Houses of France and Austria, vnto the peace of Veruins, thinking that I had not spoken of him neither so often, nor so highly as he desired, for that all the glory of braue exploits should be referred vnto the head, especially being in the Army, he complained to the Chancellor of Belieure, and discovered his choller more plainly to De Vic, Ambassador in Suisseiland, adding cruell threats to his bad words against me. Here he cut me off, and said; This letter speaks not after this manner, and I beleue you will know it by the copy. At the first three words I did auow that which was of my stile; if I had denied it, they could hardly haue reprehended the Originall: but being loath to lye vnto God, I spake my conscience, which was free from scruple and apprehension. He approved this freedome, and said; That the last line was it which had offended the King. They which haue his life, doe not beleue his death: whereunto I replied, That the copy was not conformable to the Originall, & that by an inuiolent forgetfulness, or an extreme impossure, they had left out a word which did peruent the sense, and had giuen the King occasion to be offended, and that there was, They that haue knowne his life, will not beleue his death: That besides this omission, there was nothing in the letter but might be spoken of so extraordinary an accident, and death of that quality, and that there was great difference betwixt writing of an History & a letter. And admit he had said that he went as chearefully to execution, as he had in former times to a charge, that he had amazed death, and made the Hang-man to tremble, this did not impugn the iudgment of the Court, seeing that the innocency of the condemned is not iudged by his constancy in dying: That it is not strange nor incredible to write, that a man which had contemned his life, and braued death in so many occasions, had shewed courage in this last action.

That if they had obserued violent motions in him, a death of that fashion might well put a man of his humour into fury. This letter did also speake of that head which had caused the death of the body, saying, That the one was generous, and the other full of glorious wounds. But these termes were to be considered according to the simplicity D of my intention, which did not iudge of this head as it was vpon a scaffold, but for that which it had beene in many great actions, and had purchased honourable markes of valor for his Princes seruice: That it were a point of great ignorance, or impudent flattery, to attribute glory to an act full of shame and ignominy, and to confound the light of his first actions, with the darknesse of the last. These reasons did content him, and he ended with these words. The King would not speake vnto you of it, for that he hath a good opinion of you, but thought fit that I should tell you of it. This much I thought fit to say for my Apologie, passion hauing moued me to make this little digression. The King hauing since bene satisfied of the truth, he returned againe into fauour.

There came fiftene or sixtene Deputies out of Dauphiné to Paris. This Prouince was giuen to the Crowne of France, by Humbert Prince of Dauphiné, vpon condition that the Kings eldest Son, (the presumptiue heire of the Crowne) should be Soueraigne thereof from his birth. Hauing made great ioy for this blessing, and to see that which they had not seene since King Charles the eight, they made choice of some out of the three Estates of the Country, to go and performe their first duty of subiection, & to know their Soueraigne Lord, Ierome of Villars Archbishop of Viennae, was the chief of this Ambassage, the which he gouerned and performed happily, and with honour. Hauing done their duties to the King and Queene, and let them vnderstand the charge which he had from the States of the Country, with the other Deputies, hee was led to Saint Germaines, to see their new Prince, who was vnder a cloath of Estate in his Cradle, vpon a little bed. The Count Saisins, Gouernour and Lieutenant Generall of F Dauphiné, his Gouvernesse, and his Nurse were by him. The Archb. of Viennae spake vnto him standing, all the rest kneeled of one knee. The substance of which speech was, "That the ioy of France had bene infinite by his birth, foreseeing that her felicity should bee imperfect without it, and that the blessing of peace could not continue without his birth, who should bee the death of all pretexts of ciuill warres, but your Prouince of Dauphiné hath tane greater cause of Ioy, for that it sees in effect, that which the rest of the Realme hath but in hope. Those which haue beleued that felicity could

A could not be in the infancy of a child, seeing it requires a continuance of yeares, and a constant knowledge of vertue and fortune, meant it not by Kings Children, and about all of the first borne of the Crowne of France, at whose first birth we see all the fauours raine vpon his head, the which Heauen can powre vpon them whom it will make happy. The same day, my Lord, that you saw the light, the Sonne did salute you a great Prince, and the Sonne of a great King, you are borne our Soueraigne Lord, and we are become your faithfull vassalls, and most humble Subiects, so as this Prouince, which amidst so many afflictions hath sighed about an hundred yeares, for the day when it should see borne that sacred Bud of the Royall Flower, holds it the greatest point of glory and B felicity, not to know any power more absolute and soueraigne then yours, and to obey you before you know what it is to command. This Cradle (my Lord, about the which the Eternall Providence, which hath a speciall care ouer this Realme, hath appointed the Angels for your guard) is the throne wherein we adore in your liuing Image the inuisible Maiesty of the liuing God. The rocking of this Cradle hath fetled the felicity of France, which began to be shaken by furious and dangerous attempts both without and within. It is an extreme griefe vnto vs, that the law of this Cradle will not suffer vs to heare you, and make vs so happy as to vnderstand you. And if you vnderstand not but by the language of Infants, which beteaures you shall know the affections of your people: hearts by the teares of ioy which fall from their eyes, praising God that it hath pleased him to giue them a Prince, issued from the first Crowne of the world, who carries in his heart the generosity of his father, and in his eyes the sweetnesse of his mother. A Prince which in greatnesse of courage, and in reputation of braue and immortal actions shall exceed the glorie of all the Princes of the land and sea, as the Dolphin in lightnesse and swiftnesse passeth all the creatures both of Land and Sea. We acknowledge you for our Prince and Soueraigne Lord vnder the King your Father, and the Queene your Mother, and we doe now offer vnto your Highnesse our liues, our persons, and our fortunes, for homage of our most humble and faithfull subiection. These goodly words were accompanied with a rich present: it was a Cupbord of Plate, richly wrought and beautified with sundry figures of Dolphins, being valued at twelue thousand crownes. All that attended vpon the Prince had presents of some value, or else Medailles made for that purpose.

The Sonnes Present serued for the Mother. The King was the better pleased with this Deputation, for that it was the first yeare of his Sons infancy: and it is certaine, that of all the proofes of duty and affection which the subiects can yeeld vnto their Soueraigne, those are most commendable which are done without design. As Dauphiné doth acknowledge this Prince for their Soueraigne Lord vnder the King: so Bourgongne and the Countries of Bresse, Bugey, Valromey, and Gez, (which are annexed vnto it) had him for their Gouernour: But during his Infancie, and vntill he were capable to vndergo the functions of that Charge, the power of Lieutenantie was giuen to Roger of Bellegarde, first Gentleman of the Chamber, and Master of the Kings Horse, who tooke his oath in the Kings hands: His Patent was read in the Parliament of Dijon, the Citie receiued him with all sorts of honours, and went to fetch him at the Carthusiens where he made his abode, attending the preparation for his reception.

The Kings desires being seconded with so many prosperities, it pleased him of his owne bountie to take pittie of the ruines and calamities of his subiects, in reuoking the Imposition of the Soule vpon the Liver (or two shillings) which they called the Pan-carte. Hee would not that this great releefe should surprize his peoples hearts, declaring his pleasure some months before it was put in practice, to the end that things being first expected before they were enioyed, might be the more acceptable. The King raised his coynes of gold and siluer, the crowne to six shillings and six pence, the quarter of the crowne to sixtene Soules, and the Francke to one and twenty and foure Deniers, that the coynes of Siluer might bee valued after the rate, of threecore and foure Soules to the crowne. And as that which is held good and profitable at one time, is not so at another, the counting by crownes (found in theyeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and seven, and now very preiudiciall) was forbidden, and that of the Lyeuer brought into practice in contracts, obligations, and acts of Iustice, as it was before, since King Philip the faire, Francis the first, and Henry his Sonne. There is no law which should should be more firme and lesse variable then the stander of mony, and there is no crime lesse pardonable then that which offends the Kings picture. For the effecting whereof, all coynes should be of pure metall without mixture, all good, all silver, or all copper. For, as long as mixtures shall be allowed, the Mint-men will alwaies alter the price of that which should be immutable. The abundance of Dozens in France is such, as it is impossible to purge the Realme, but by a generall decay of those that are made, which would be the ruine and impoverishment of the poore people, or by a defence to coyne any other hereafter but of silver.

There sprung up a new ioy for all France. The heauens which in former times did raine gold at Rhodes for the birth of Minerva, did now poure forth a great shower of ioy for the birth of the Kings first lawfull daughter. The Queene was happily brought in bed on the 22 day of November in the morning, and thanks were giuen vnto God, according to the vsuall custome. The Riuer of Saonne was overflowed in that fort as the townes that were seated vpon the banks, were in great danger of this inundation. The bridge at Lions was so shaken, as if it had not been fortified by the weight that was laid vpon it, the two Townes had bene diuided by the riuer. This inundation was greater and more furious, then that which ioynded the Riuer of Roine and Saonne, in the place of Comfort; but not so terrible as another which happened an hundred yeares since, in the month of February, with such violence as the waues past ouer the Bridge, and beat downe one of the Arches towards the Exchange.

Mynes of gold discovered.

This yeare all the Elements did contribute to the prosperity and blessings of the peace, the Earth did let the King see a new production of his treasure. They discovered in many parts of the Realme mynes of gold, silver, copper, and lead. In the Country of Lionois, nere vnto a Village called S. Martin the plaine, which depends of an Earldome of the Church of S. Iohn of Lions, there was a Mine of Gold found by a Countryman, who labouring in his Vineyard, found a flint stone intermixt with gold, whereby they gathered an infallible assurance, that this member was not without a body. De Vic Superintendent of the Iustice at Lions, had commandement from the King to see to the work in it. The first production was admirable, and among many goodly peeces, one was shewed vnto the King very rich, in the which the Gold did appeare, and put forth like vnto the buds of a Vine, as fine as that of Caruana, so as it might be said, that these five thousand yeares the Sunne had made nothing more perfect in the bowells of the Earth. For it was not Gold in pepin nor in poulder, as in the running streams of the New-found Land, nor mixt with sand, as in Bohemia, but in Stones and in Rocks, all pure gold, or pure silver: for alwaies the one goes with the other, perfect of it selfe without mixture of any other metalls. The King imitating his Predecessors, who had alwaies fauoured the workes of Mynes, which bring infinite commodities, made a generall Edi& for the ordering of the worke and worke-men: He created a great Master and a Controulleuer generall ouer all the Mynes of France, with priuiledges to draw in foraigne worke-men, which they could not want. Bellegard was the first great Master of the Mynes, who resigned it to Ruffe Beaulieu, Secretary of State. Belingin, first Groomer of the Kings Chamber, was Controulleuer generall.

The new alliance with the Suiffes being concluded, they deputed forty two among them, to whom they gaue power to sweare the obseruation thereof. They came into France in September, being honourably receiued in all places. The fourteenth of October they came into Charanton, a league from Paris, where they were royally entertained at the Kings owne charge, in Senamys house. After dinner the D. of Montbazon, and the Lord of Montigny Gouernour of Paris, went out of the city with an hundred or fixscore Gentlemen to meet them, and to welcome them in the Kings name. At S. Antonies gate, Bargelone, Prouost of Merchants, with the Sherifffs, Councillors of the City, Quarter-Masters, chiefe Bourgeses, and the three companies of the Archers of the city, receiued them, and conducted them to their lodging in S. Martins street: where besides good wines of welcome, they found presents fit to procure thirst, Gammons of Bacon, dried ficer meats, and store of Ipcoras and choice wines. The next day they dined with the Chancelor, after dinner he went to his Maiefty to the Louvre, desiring them to haue a little patience vntill the King sent for them. Some after the Duke of Elguillon accompanied with fifty young Gentlemen of the best houses then in Court, went to fetch them

A them, and to conduct them vnto the King: entring into the base Court of the Louvre, the Duke Montpensier, with many Knights of the holy Ghost, and Noblemen of marke, receiued them in the Kings name: At the staires foot, going vp to the Hall, the Couer of Soissons, with many Gouernors of Prouinces, and old Knights of the Order receiued them, & so conducted them into his Maiesties Chamber, where they did their obeysance, the King taking every one of them by the hand. Then the Aduoyer of Berne, who was their Speaker, said vnto him in his owne language, I hat the cause of their coming, was to sweare the renewing of the alliance, and to assure his Maiefty of their faithfull service. Fl. ger did interpret vnto the King, who after he had answered them, and witnessed the content which he had of the declaration they had made in the behalfe of their superiors, hee told them, That they were welcome: from thence they went to kisse the Queenes hand, who was in her chamber, with all the Princeses and Ladies of the Court, presenting their seruice vnto her, and the good affection of their Superiors, for the which shee thanked them.

mande.

Before the oath was taken, they entreated the King, that it would please him to heare some particular charges they had from their Superiours. The Chancelor was appointed to heare what they demanded: the which the Aduoyer of Berne deliuered vnto him in three demands. The first was, That it would please his Maiefty to augment the summe of foure hundred thousand crownes, which was appointed to be distributed every yeare among them, being not sufficient to pay their interets. The second was, That the priuiledges of those of their Nation, which trafficked in France, might be confirmed. The third was, to giue them the declarations that were promised, as well vnto the five petty Cantons, for the continuance of their alliance with Milan and Sauoy, without infringing that of his Maiefty, as to the Protestant Cantons, that they might not be forced to giue men to make war in France against them of the Religion. To the first his Maiefty made answer, That the ciuill and foraigne wars, wherewith his people had bene ruined, would not giue him means to do better yet, and that they must content themselves with that which had bene promised. The second and third were granted, and the Declarations required by them, signed. Sunday the 12 of October was appointed for the swearing of the Alliance in our Ladies Church, where the Ambassadors were conducted by Monsieur De Vic. The King being come to the Church and set in State, the Princes of Condé & Conty went to fetch the two and forty Ambassadors in the Bishops Hall, and conducted them to their places. All being set, the Archbishop of Vienne approached to his Maiefty, carying a booke of the Euangelists in his hands, and at the same instant the Ambassadors drew neare also. Before them was Vaguer, Secretary of State at Soluvre, berwixt Monsieur De Silley and De Vic, he caried berwixt his armes a cushion of crimson Veluet, garnished with gold, on the which were two Treaties of the Alliance, the one in French, the other in the Germane tongue, sealed with his Maiesties Seale, and those of the Cantons and their Allies. After they had all done their duties, and saluted his Maiefty, Monsieur de Silley said vnto the King: "That these Treaties of Alliance were the same which his Predecessors had made with the Seigneuries of the Cantons; and that whatsoeuer was added, was for the honour and profit of his Maiesties seruice. The Aduoyer of Berne, who deliuered the speech, said, That the Seigneurs of the Cantons, their Superiors, had held it for a great honour, that the King desired their alliance, for the which thinking themselves much bound, they had enioyned them to thanke his Maiefty, and to offer him on their behalfe their most humble seruice in all occasions that should be offered, and of all might be expected of true and faithfull allies and confederates, according to the Treaties of their alliance. That they were also sent by their Superiors for the performing of the oath, to the end they might faithfully obserue what was contained in the Treaty, and to beseech his Maiefty to doe the like for his part, as it belongs to good and loyall friends, allies and confederates. That by his Maiesties commandement, they presented themselves for the performance of the oath, praying God to poure out his blessings vpon so good an alliance, to the content of both the Estates: with prayers, that it would please God to preserve the King and the Dauphin their new ally, in all prosperitie, and giue him a long life and happy raigne. The King hearing him, stood vp with his hat on, and answered him with a great Maiefty. That he desired to renew the treaty of peace and alliance with the Seigneurs of the Cantons, for the great eheeme hee made of

made by the Chancelor to the Swittes.

"The Chancellor made a long speech vnto them to the same purpose, saying; My "Masters, you haue heard from the Kings mouth, the contentment he receiued of your "Legation, and the esteeme which he makes, and will alwaies make of the good friendship,
"alliance and confederacy with the Cantons, ancient and faithful friends, Allies, and Con"federates to the Crown of France. Whereunto I will adde the ioy and generall content "which the three Orders of the Realme doe in like manner receiue. The memory of "former ages, and all histories may teach vs, that those Estates haue bene held most pow-
"erfull and assured, which haue bene supported with most friends, and yet it is seldome "seene (what need fouer Potentates haue to fortifie themselves with alliance of their neigh"bours) but that there remains some distrust, that the greatnesse of their Allies will in "the end cause the ruine of their Estates. The alliance of France with the most vertuous "nation of the Leagues, hath alwaies been free from suspition. First, there was neuer que"stion, pretension, nor contention betwixt the two Estates, by reason of the Countries C "which are held by either part. The Kings of France since the Treaties, and long time be"fore, haue alwaies desired to fauour the greatnesse and prosperity of the Nation of the "Leagues, whereunto besides their naturall inclination and good will, they were moued
"by their owne interest and eation of State. The greater and more happy that you haue "bene or shall bee, the more they shall thinke themselves fortified with so good a friend.
"You haue heretofore made the like iudgment of the Kings of France, and his Maiesty
"here present assures himselfe, that you will continue the like opinion of him, as you haue
"had of his Predecessors, and will still haue the same confidence, and retaine the same
"good opinion of your friendship.

"He thinks, that your greatnesse is his owne; hee loues and esteemes you for the great
"and worthy proofes hee hath made of your valour and affection to the good of his af"faires; he entreates you to beleue that his greatnesse and prosperity shall be alwaies yours,
"& vpon your loyalty, at your command, not only bound to the assistance which is promi"sed you by the Treaty of Alliances, but also if it should chance, that any Prince or Po"tentate whatsoeuer, without exception, should attempt against your Estates, he hath re"solved to let you know by the effects, that your greatnesse is in like recommendation vnto
"him as his owne, and in such an occasion he will neither spare his Person, nor any means "which God had giuen him. I will tell you, that as you haue found the Kings of France af"fected to loue and cherish you, so haue you found their Ambassadors most ready to serue
"you, and to employ themselves in any thing that might concern the good and prosperitie
"of your affaires, they did neuer thinke that which we haue blamed in some, that they "should neuer confirm our vnion, but by diuiding you, and troubling your quiet; but con-
"trariwise, I may speake confidently and with truth, that they haue done the best offices
"they could, to nourish peace, concord, vnion, and good correspondency amongst you,
"the which hath made you hitherto fearfull vnto all your enemies, and your Countrey as "happy and flourishing as any others of Christendome: The actions of the Ambassadors
"discouer their Masters intentions. The successe of things happened, doe also giue a great "testimony of the good that is in this happy alliance.

"In the time of King Francis the first, of glorious memory, we did see in the year 1544,
"all Germany, the Netherlands, Spaine, and in a manner all Italy had conspired the ruine
"of this Realme of France, vnder the conduct of the Emperor Charles the fifth, with whom "Henry the eight King of England did also ioyne. King Francis had not then any other
"friend or confederate to succour him but the Nation of the Leagues, wherewith hauing
"fortified his Armies, he won the Barrell of Cerisoles; made head against the great forces
"which the Emperour had gathered together from all parts of Christendome, made "him to confume his Army which was entered into Champagne, and forced him to demand
"a peace, the which was afterwards concluded at Crepe. As the alliance with the Leagues

A hath bene happy for France, so we may say that the alliance of our Kings, hath brought
"that happinesse to your Nation, as when they haue seene France vnited and in League
"with the Cantons, neither the Emperors nor any Prince of his house or others, durst at"tempt to make warre against you, and yet before Maximilian the first and his Predeces"sors you haue bene forced, for the preservation of your liberty, to hazard many battells,
"in the which by the grace of God you haue gotten the victory. We hope, and we promise
"with the help of God, that this good fortune shall continue on either side, if we do follow
"the wise counsels and resolutions of our forefathers, remaining well vnited together, and "not giuing care to any thing that may breed alteration, or a coldnesse in our alliance; if "we preferre it carefully in the same faith whereon it is grounded, and doe cherish it by all "the good offices which true and faithfull friends, allies and confederates, may expect. It is "the oath and promise which you make presently vnto the King. It is the oath and pro"mise which the King doth make presently vnto you, and will religiously obserue. These "words being ended the Chancellor invited them to the oath.

Which done, the Ambassadors presented themselves to sweare the oath, laying their "hands by order of their Cantons vpon the holy Euangelist, to euerie one of the which,
"the Chancellor sayd. You sweare and promise vpon the holy Euangelist, in the name of your "Seigneurs and Superiours, well and faithfully to obserue the Treaty of alliance made betwixt his "Majesty and your Superiours, without any contradiction or breach directly or indirectly. The "Order which the Ambassadors held in the oath was, first; The Cantons of Berne, Lu-
"cerne, Zurich, Schwitz, Vonderwald, Zug, Glais, Basle, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffuse
"and Appenzel. And of allies, the Abbot of Saint Gall, and the Towne of Saint Gall.
"Of the Grisons, the Canton of Grise, the Cades, the Canton of Droituas, Walais, "Mulkus, Rorweil and Brenne.

After all the Ambassadors had raken the oath, the King likewise sayd; *That hee did
"sweare and promise to obserue the Treaty as it had bene agreed. Which done, they dined
"in the Bishops Palace. The Prince of Conde sat at the bords end, the Princes of Con-
"try, Soissons and Montpenfier, the Constable, the Dukes of Neuers and Elquillon, the "Earles of Auvergne and Sommeriue, with many others were on the right hand, and the "D forty two Ambassadors with some French Gentlemen on the left. About the end of din"ner, his Maiesty (who had dined apart) came to see them, commanding euerie one to "keepe his place, then he called for wine, and dranke to all his friends and allies, and so went "presently to the Louvre: towards euening bonfires were made and twenty peeces of can"non shot off in signe of ioy. During their aboad at Paris they were feasted by the Prouost
"of Merchants, the Count of Soissons, the Constable, and the Duchesse of Longueuil
"and the Friday after the ceremony of the oath, they tooke their leaue of the King, who
"gaue to euerie one a chaine of gold, with his picture, and what was appointed for their "voyage, stay and returne, and so they returned into their Country.*

In the Iurisdiction of the Town of Langres (in a village called Aprez) Claude Berenger,
"B Lord of Pont, and Guillemette of Metz his wife made their residence, hauing also a Ne"phew of the sayd Berengers with them named allo de Pont. This woman being suborned
"by a Chanoins bastard of Langres, named Chauvete, Nicholas Journe and John Fernet, "called the youth, to satisfie their fleshly lust without suspition and at more liberty, they
"resolved with her and a maid of hers to make away her husband and his Nephew.

This plot being layd, they found an easie meanes for the execution. These three "Adulterers seeing the Gentleman gone to Langres, goe a hunting with his Nephew,
"whom they flew in the thicke of a wood, and threw him into a deepe hollow place be"twixt two high rockes, out of the which hee could neuer be drawne. These murderers
"seeing themselves rid of this poore young man, reported vnto the Gentlewoman what
"F they had done, concluding with her to cut her husbands throat at his returne from Lan-
"gres, the which they put in practice the same night that hee returned; for this poore Gen"tleman hauing receiued a kisse (of this daughter of Indas) being very weary, went to bed "and slept, the which she knew, and presently brought these murderers into his chamber,
"who coming easily to this poore young mans bed, being asleepe, they cut his throat, and
"bury him abroad amongst the Rockes.

After this murder they giue it out, that the Lord of Pont was slaine in his voyage to "Langres. His wife put on a mourning weed, and makes a counterfeit shew of beauti"nesse:

nelle: but God suffers not such offences to bee vnreuealed, a poore man found out the hole where they had buried him, and gaue notice thereof vnto the Iustice, who went to the place, and caused the Gentlewoman to be brought thither, who at the first seemed not to know him, but seeing that he was knowne by euery one, and vanquished by apparent signes, which they shewed her, in the end she knew him. But the Officers did not proceed against her with that dexterity that Lugoly did to the wife of Claude Antonie a Merchant of Vines at Paris, who had also caused her husband Antonie to be slaine coming from a house of his, by soldiers whom one named Lumeau (her Adulterer) had suborned, for the wife of the said Antonie was hanged, and Lumeau broken alive at the place Maubert: but this Gentlewoman Du Pont, seeing the Iustice to proceed against her by informations, and that they ment to apprehend her, she made an escape with all her complices and her seruants, and could neuer after be taken; yet through their contempt their professe was made, and all of them were hanged in picture.

The other accident hapned at Paris, of a Gentleman which slew his wife and her Adulter lying together, in this manner. This Gentleman called Seigneur Scipio, being aduertised that his wife (a faire yong Gentlewoman) did abandon herselfe to lust, and defiled his bed with a yong man: he admonished his wife, and said vnto her, That he did willingly pardon what was past, but if she returned any more to her sin, he would kill her with her Ruffian, if he found them together. The Gentlewoman scornes this aduice; and another giuen her by a wife and vertuous Gentlewoman; That if she did not cary herselfe more discreetly, without doubt her husband would doe her a shrewd turne. She answered her, That her husband was too very a foole to attempt it.

Seigneur Scipio aduertised of the impudency and lewd behauiour of his wife, takes his horse, and make a shew to goe into the Country: his wife goes to the Sermon at Saint Germaine l'Auxerrois, Scipio returns, and shuts himselfe into his closter vnknowne of any one. The Sermon being done, she returned presently to her house, and aduertised her Adulterer of her husbands absence, who failed not to come at the assignation he gaue him, and then they went into the husbands bed: who coming out of his closter, found them naked together, and slue them, the adulterer had thirty wounds, and the woman feuen and twenty: and so their detestable sin was known by the view of their dead bodies, the which were brought before the Iustice, being a lamentable thing, and pitifull to behold: The husband did easily obtaine his pardon the which proceeds from the Kings bounty. It is a iust griefe the which may suddenly transport a husband, finding his wife with another, as these poore infortunate wretches were. The King about this time pardoned all those, that had bene of the Duke of Biron's conspiracy, so as they came & declared themselves within two moneths, and caused their pardons to be confirmed.

The discourse of the enterprises and intelligences which the D. of Sauoy and his father haue had, to surprize the City of Geneva, with their pretensions, and their defence on the contrary side to maintaine their Liberties, would make a good volume. They relied vpon the publike assurance of the Treaties of Veruins, Paris and Lions, in the which they held themselves to be comprehended, and thereby assured from all the designs of their neighbours. The Duke of Sauoy did not hold himselfe ryed by the peace, nor to seeke the meanes to become Master thereof, and to reigne there as his Predecessors had done, and that there was no danger to breake his faith with people of a contrary Religion. This City doth so much import his Estate, as it deserves, if not to breake the peace, at the least to fraine and wrest it. It is situated at the end of Lake Leman, which serues for a ditch on the North part: The river of Rhosne passeth by the towne on the West side, and vpon the East and South is the County of Sauoy, the great and rich plaines of the Bailiwicks of Thonon and Ternier, and the Countreies of Chablais and Faucigny. The Duke had great pretensions to it, as soueraine of the County of Geneva, and Vicar perpetual of the Empire. He maintained, that if the Bishop of Geneva had some absolute authority, it was a preiudice to the Souerainty, the which had alwaies remained to his Predecessors, as Earles of Morienne or Duke of Sauoy.

The City of Geneva (who to maintaine her liberty findes all propositions of seruitude troublefome and strange, hath alwaies derided the Sauoyards command) sayes; That the Bishops of Geneva haue bene alwaies soueraigne Princes of their City, and that the Earles of Sauoy and Geneva, haue often done homage to the Bishops of Geneva, for the

The situation of Geneva.

The Dukes pretensions.

A the Barronies of Ternier, Remilly, Montfaucon, and for the County of Geneva. That the Duke of Sauoy can pretend no right, as Vicar perpetual of the Empire, being granted by surprize, and reuoked after examination of the case by the same Emperor, who vpon complaint made vnto him by a Bishop of Geneva, called Arducius, declared that hee had bene surprized in that behalfe, and disanulled all that he had giuen to the Earle of Sauoy his cousin, forbidding him to contradict this reuocation, vpon paine of his indignation, and a thousand markes of pure gold. The parties differing vpon the maine point, the question could not be decided without prooffe. The Duke would haue no other production, but his title of Duke and Soueraigne of Geneva, to maintaine the which hee besieged the Towne, and brought it to extremity, as hath bene shewed elsewhere. It is true, that without the Kings protection this City would not long resist the forces of the Duke of Sauoy.

The Inhabitants haue bene reduced to that Estate as they might say as the Capouans did vnto the Romanes, imploring their ayde against the Samnites: It is a grievous and miserable thing, what our misfortune forceth vs to confesse (fathers conscript) to be brought to that extremity as hereafter we must abandon our selues, either to our friends, or to our enemies. If you defend vs, we shall be yours, if you forsake vs, the Samnites. Being abandoned by the King, there is no defence for them but will proue weak against so mighty a Neighbour, who shall bee alwaies assisted by the greatest forces of Italy and Spaine. And if they be succoured by them of Bearne with whom they haue an equall alliance, they shall run the hazard of Common-weales, which in the end haue bene recompenced with a forced subiection. The Suisseis propound not bare words in their amities, they ground them vpon equality of profit. The humor of this City is to be free, there is not any Citizen but speaks freely to any Prince how great soeuer, as Demosthenes said, when they talked of the milde and easie command of Antipater, We will haue no Master how gentle soeuer. The Inhabitants of this City haue an hereditary hatred against the Duke, the which is so rooted in them, as if hee did presse them by force to the extremities of a siege, they would reloue with them of Xantho to mingle their aithes with the smok of their houses. The Duke hauing attempted what he could by force, resolues to surprize them now by policy. He made an enterprise as full of proofes of his courage, judgement and good conduct, as of his misfortune.

It had bene long in hand, and yet nothing was discovered, yet was it well known, that he had caused ladders to be made. That from all parts he drew vnto him men of resolution; that he had good numbers at Chambery well payed, and wel entertained, attending the full ripeness of this designe, and yet they knew not how he would employ them, preparing onely their hearts and armes for the execution of their Princes commandements, referring the conduct thereof to his wisdom. Yet could they not beleue that this designe was against them of Geneva, for that he treated with them of the liberty of trafficke, hauing some few daies before, sent President Rochette to let them vnderstand, that it was expedient to treat of some manner how to liue for the ease of the people.

They were so well pleased with this motion and his assurances, that although Cities of this condition do not easily beleue them that make warre against them, yet they were lulled asleep therewith, and neglected their preuention, thinking that there was nothing of more power to defend them, then the Treaties of peace betwixt France, Spaine and Sauoy. In the which they thought themselves to be comprehended vnder the name of Allies and confederates of the Cantons. In like sort the Dukes subiects went so freely to Geneva, as the Eue before this execution, certaine Gentlemen who knew something of this designe, being come into the City to buy horses, said; That they would come the next day to conclude the bargain: and others had vied the like speeches for other Merchandise, beleueing that the victory was assured: but Heaven which laughs at the presumptions of these Imaginations, had resolued to humble them.

The Governor of Lions had speedy intelligence, that the Duke of Sauoy was come on this side the Alpes, and that hee had brought scaling Ladders: hee aduertised the King thereof, and made prouision for the City of Lions. D'Albigny Lieutenant Generall for the Duke on this side the Alpes, had drawne them downe, and lodged them in Townes neereft to Geneva. The Rendezuous was at Chambery, the time of the execution was referred to the Generall. The troops began to march about fixe of the clocke: Bignolles Governor

Gouernor of Bonnes had beene a chiefe actor in this designe, holding it so certaine, as he said; He would die if he did not line in Geneva. D'Albigny had set guards vpon all the waies to stay all passengers, that no report might go before them, and that the Duke of Sauoies marching might be vnknowne, to whom they represented the execution to be so easie and certaine, as he would needs be there himselfe in person to reape the fruit, and the triumph which his grand-father had begun. He past the Alpes but with suite in his company, and came the same day neere vnto Tremblieres, a village but a league distant from Geneva. They which should execute the enterprize and giue the first attempt, went along the riuier of Albe, that the noise of the water might keepe the Sentinells from hearing them as they marched. Two things hapned that were predictions of bad successe. There appeared vnaccustomed fires in the ayre. A Hare crossed them many times in their way, and gaue them a false alarm. Many things were seene that night that troubled their imagination, causing them to take Groues for Squadrons of men, and Thistles for Lances, as it hapned once before Paris. About cleuen of the clocke at night, they discovered certaine flakes, on the which the Serge-makers of Geneva did drie their Serge. Those that were in the foremost ranks would haue charged them, thinking it was some Ambuscado. From thence they passe along the riuier of Rosne, placing the body of their troopes in the meadow of Plainpalais. Briguelot with those that were appointed for the escalado, follow D'Albigny, who leads them into the ditches by the counterescarpe, on the side of the Corraiere, without being discovered by the Sentinells, although the Duckes in the ditch made what noise they could to awake them of Geneva, as the geefe had done at Rome against the Gaules. They passed the ditch vpon hurdels, and planted three Ladders against the wals, they were of a strange inuention, being portable vpon Moyles, and to be made a long and as short as they pleased, and yet were as strong as if they had bene but of one peece. If they had bene as fortunate, as they were well furnished of all things necessary, they had executed their designe happily. They had made prouision of hatchets, hammers, and pincers, to cut in sunder chaines of Iron, breake open lockes and to pull out great nailes and barres of gates. They had many Petards, and few that could vie them.

Fortune which is powerfull in such enterprizes sayled them, after that [slee] had brought them into the midst of the towne, and made them Masters of the streets about two houres. There were almost two hundred men mounted by one of these Ladders. Briguelot was the first, carrying himselfe more valiantly then wisely. Having recovered the wall, he surprised the souldier that stood Sentinell, hee got the word from him, slew him, and cast him into the ditch, staying in his place for him that went the round, that he might doe as much to him, the which he effected, comming to giue the word in his care. The boy which carried the Lanthorne fled, and aduertised the Court of guard what hapned to his Master, wherewith notwithstanding they were not greatly moued.

This was betwix one and two of the clocke, attending the houre of foure, for then they had propounded to begin the execution, meaning to giue more time to them that were to second them, and to haue the day draw neere, for that in all executions of warre which are done in the night, there is confusion. The assailants had a good houres respite to mount, and as much time more before they incountred any that made resistance. If D'Albigny had bene within to vie the benefit of the time, and to dispose more wisely of things, then Sonnes, Briguelot, or Attignac had done, they might boldly haue said the towne had been won. Halfe an houre after two of the clocke, a Sentinell in the tower of the mint, having heard some ruffling in the ditch, thor off his peece to giue the alarm, and forced Briguelot to discover himselfe, charging all that were at the court of guard of the new gate, to plant the Petard there, and to make an entry for the body of the army which was in Plainpalais. They forced the court of guard being 25 men: but against the Maximes of warre, which commands them to kill all, they let one escape, who ranne vp and let downe the portcullis, to make their Petard vnprofitable. The towne was full of cries and fearefull exclamations, whereof the Sauoyards should haue made their profit, and increased their courages, as it did daunt the inhabitants, who knew not which way to run, some crying to one gate, others running to another. But the assailants lost themselves in the appearance of so happy a successe. Those without should haue giuen an alarm at some gate to diuide the forces of the Towne. Those that were within made no vie of their hatchets, hammers and pincers: they did forget to fire some houises, and they were surprised with

A dulnesse of spirit, thinking more of booty & spoile, then to make perfect their conquest. In the meane time, the Consul cries as they did sometimes at Rome: Hee that loses mee, let him follow me. Some Countrymen of the neighbour villages which kept guard in the Towne-house by turnes, being led by some Captaines and Townsmen, presented themselves to the new gate, they were valiantly repulsed, and yet the first that they made, slew their Petardiar, who was buisie about his Petard.

This first charge had not dislodged them, if the whole strength of the Inhabitants had not come, and charged them so furiously, as they began to giue way, shewing neither conduct nor courage. Necessary which breeds assurance, euen vnto them that are borne without courage, made the Townsmen so resolute in this defence, as the Sauoyards did presently turne their backs. The nimblest were forced to returne to their ladders, which now could no longer serue them, for a Cannon planted vpon the Bulwarke de l'Oye, against the ditch, had broken them in such sort, as they left foure and fifty dead vpon the place, along the Curtaine of Corraiere, and thirteene that were taken aliue. If the townsmen had had souldiers enough to haue made a fallie in this confusion, those that were at Plainpalais had not returned in so good order. There were thirteene taken aliue, vpon promise that was giuen them that they should be prisoners of warre, for else they would haue preferred an honorable death, before any promise that was made them, to take them aliue, and to disarme them. Attignac was amongst them, who fought courageously, and gaue the order of Saint Maurice (which hee wore) to his seruant, willing him to saue himselfe, being resolu'd to dye with his sword in his hand. It had bene better for him to haue bene slaine at the combate of D. Philippin, then to bee referred for so ignominious a death.

The resolution of the Prisoner of Attignac.

The Seignetry would not intreat them as prisoners taken in the warre, but like theuees that had entred the towne by surpris against the Law of Nations, and the publicke faith. They said that the Duke was too noble a Prince to aduow so wicked and treacherous an Act. There were many opinions vpon the Iudgement of their death. The most modest concluded to haue them put to ranfome, others to keepe them prisoners, that they might serue for exchange if occasion required, through the continuance of the warre: but the most violent stirred vp the people, representing vnto them their Religion, the rauishing of their wives and daughters: the murder, sack and perpetuall slavery concluded against them, and the lamentations of their widowes and children that had bene slaine, the which being well considered of, made the mildest opinions seeme vniust. So as they were condemned to be hanged. They requested their heads might bee cut off like Gentlemen, the which was granted them, but it was after they had been strangled. The threecore and seuentene heads, as well of those that had bene hanged, as of the others that had bene slaine, were planted vpon the Gallowes, and their bodies thrown into the riuier of Rhofne. On the Tuesday after they made a generall fast for their deliuey. They presently sent to all their neighbors for succors. They published in all places, the wonders of this deliuey: they write vnto the Gouernor of Lions, in this manner.

My Lord, you haue vnderstood heretofore, by many of our letters, how his Highnesse of Sauoy, notwithstanding that he knew, and had confessed, that wee were comprehended in the peace made in Ianuary 1600 betwix his Royall Maiesty of France and him: yet hee hath oppressed vs in sundry sorts, not only by the detayning of our Reuenues; forbidding of trafficke and other violences and extortions, yeelding nothing to the many and iust admonitions of his Maiesty, but also hath attempted often to inuade and surpris vs in this time of peace. So it is, that to glut his pernicious designe, the Lord of Albigny on Saturday last the 11 of this moneth, about midnight, had brought before our towne, on the side of Plainpalais, about 2000 choice men, horse and foot, and had cast about 200 into our ditch, neere vnto the old gate of Corraiere, and hauing planted Ladders one within another, he had caused them to mount about three of the clocke on the Sunday morning the 12 of the moneth, encouraging them, being himselfe in the ditch, so as being entred into the Towne, some went to the new gate to plant the Petard, and to draw in the body of their troopes, which made a stand in the meadow of Plainpalais, others would haue seized vpon the Mint-gate, and so haue entred into the midst of our towne. But it pleased our good God to looke vpon vs with a fauourable eye, and to giue courage to our men, so as they haue repulst them so valiantly, as they haue slaine the best part of them vpon the Many iudged of the end of this enterprise by the beginning, and were more diligent to write then they had bene to execute it well. The King had intelligence, that the Duke was Master of the Towne, and the manner of the execution was represented with to great ease and happinesse, as there was lesse reason to doubt it then to beleeue it. The truth was not known but by letters for the gouernour of Lions, the which came before any discourse that was published by the Towne that was deliuered. The Duke repast the mountaines in poist, his troops remained a League from Geneva in three places, at Tounon, Fossigny and Ternier. He commanded his Ambassador to giue the Senate of Berne to vnderstand, that he had not made this enterprise to trouble the quiet of the Cantons, but to prevent L'Esquadrilles from being Master thereof, who intended to deliuer it vp afterwards vnto the King, who had bene too mighty a Neighbor, and would haue giuen them altogether occasion to feare him. The issue of this enterprise did shew, that God will not haue Treaties violated, for the assurance whereof his Name hath bene inuocated, notwithstanding any pretext of Religion. Witnesse Leus King of Hungary in the vnfortunate battell of Varna against the Turkes, where he had broken his Faith.

The King aduertised of the successe of this enterprise, he sent word vnto the Magistrats of this Common-weale, that if their enemy did attempt by a sieged siege, or by open War any thing against them, he would assist them, and employ all his forces for their defence, commanding the Gouernors and Lieutenants General of the neereſt Prouinces, to ayde them all they could. The Cantons of Berne and Fribourg allied to Geneva, being aduertised of this attempt, sent twelue hundred Swiſſes, and the King who had an enterſt therein should not fall vnder the command of any other Prince or Common-weale, sent also fix hundred French. All prepare to Waite, the Geneuoiſ made ſome courſes into the Duke of Sauoyes Country, and ſurpriſed S. Gery of Aouſt, they imagined vpon alittle good ſucceſſe to extend their limits vnto Mont Cenis. The King commanded De Vic his Ambassador in Swiſſerland, (who returned then to his charge) to passe by them, to assure them, that he was not of their humors, which frame not their affections, nor bind not the duties of friendship but vpon good euents, louing friends no longer, then they draw profit from them. That he would neuer faile them for their defence and protection, desiring to know of them, what means they might haue to make an offensiue warre, to the end, the succors he should send them, might be profitably employed. They received De Vic with a publicke applause, sending forth the French Horse and Foot, to meet him: but as hee was deceived in this vnexpected Ceremony, so were many others which thought that he came to incourage them to warre. They heard his Propositions in apriu at conference, exhorting them rather to a long and durable peace, then to a short warre. They intreated him to propound the like in their generall assembly, which no man else durst doe, euery one holding it a Crime, and a signe of Balenefice, not to preferre the Counsels of warre, before any accord, and not to enter in a hostile manner into the Dukes Country. Some which had neuer seene war, but in the Idea, conceived victories in their imaginations, building vpon the Snow of Mont Cenis. That it would not continue about six moneths; that the warre would be no lesse profitable for the good of their Common-weale, nor lesse happy, then it had been to their Neighbors, in the time of Duke Charles: and that all that had any interest in their preferuation would assist them. That all those great Spirits which delighted in the exercise of warre, would come and offer them their Armes and Lives.

De Vic through the truth and excellency of his discourse, gaue them to vnderstand, that peace was so necessary for them, and warre so preiudicial, as they had great reason to imbrace the one, and to flie the other. That although the causes of warre, be alwaies goocly, and the means made easie, yet the effects were no lesse terrible, the successe being not alwaies answerable to their hopes. That a forraigne Warre was profitable, and to be vnder-

A taken when as Ciuill Warres could not be otherwise auoyded: but a well fetled Estate, which hath alwaies liued happily by Peace, should not seeke these stormes, nor take delight to be at warre with her Neighbours. Thus hee perswaded them to imbrace peace, confirmed by an equall commerce of all commodities, and which should route out all occasions of Warre. They entred into some truce with the Duke, but hauing required assurance for the obseruation thereof, it being not honourable, they proceeded no farther, and the Duke gaue them to vnderstand that it was indifferent to him, whether they were his friends or enemies. The King, who is a Prince full of iustice and integrity, foreseeing that this warre would not be ended by them that did begin it, desired to maintain the peace which was so necessary for all Christendome, for the which he had layd aside Armes, when as he might hope for most fruit for the increase of his Estates. His Ambassador therefore in Swiſſerland perswaded the Cantons of Glaries, Basle, Soleurre, Schaffouze and Appenzel, as least suspected and interested, to bee the mediators of this Accord. There was some difficulty, but the Siegneury tyred with a warre, the profit whereof could not repaire the ruines which the want of Peace should cause, and hauing tryed that all the profit they could hope for, depended on their neighbours succors. That hope which is not maintained but by forraigne supports, is alwaies ruinous: That they had no means to reuenge the wrong that was done vnto them: that there was no likelihood that the Catholike Swiſſes would breake with the Duke of Sauoy for their respect: that being so neere they must of force apply themselves to some quiet and equal kind of liuing: they yielded to the perswasions of their friends and Allies, and by their aduice relinquished many demands which their Councell had refused, and the Duke had reiecte as vnjust and dishonorable.

 Peace.

Geneua resolves to a Peace.

The Conference of the Treaty was at Rouilly with D'Albigny; and the conclusion at Saint Julian, betwixt the Deputies of either part. If the issue hath bene happy and profitable to both parties, they are bound to none but the grace of God and the Kings wisdom, who desiring to entertaine the publicke quiet, hath made a peacefull union of those wills that were so much diuided: for at his instance the Swiſſes had layd aside more Muskets and Pikes which they had provided, then had been seene in Sauoy in ten yeares before, and they of Geneva did moderate their demands, not so much for any respect of their enemy, as to please the King, yet the malicious gaue it out, that the King had incensed them to war by his Ambassadors. The Consulate of Lions had obtained of the King (at the Queens intreaty, and in consideration of the honor done her at her entry) a Priuilege, by which none might come to be Sheriſſes, that were not Town-born children: it was the same prerogative which Reſeruius Niger had giuen vnto the Romanes, forbidding any person to bee admitted to publicke charges that was not borne and bred a Roman. Euery Priuilege which causeth an inequality among Citizens (liuing vnder the same Lawes) is the Apple of discord and cause of diuision, like vnto that of the Bianchi and Neri at Florence. A great town hath euer but too many seeds of diuision, without seeking new; Most commonly the rich are intolerable to the poore, and the poore enuy the happinesse of the rich: there is alwaies some question betwixt the great and the small.

A Peace concluded betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and the ciuill of Geneva in July 1603.

A Priuledge granted to the City of Lions.

This new distinction of persons must needs cause dangerous innovations in a City, where the inner part is more to be feared then the outward. Those which pretended to bee from their beginning, by birth and affection, of the Country of Lions, seeing themselves perpetually excluded from the most honourable charges within the City, had recourse vnto the King, laying before him the inequality of this Priuledge, the disgrace which they received, and the ruine which should fall vpon the City, when the Inhabitants should abandon the place of their abode, and that they might not remaine in a place where without offence or any iust cause, they were for euer deprived of that little Honor they might hope for, after they had serued the Publicke in many burthenſome charges. Those which were originally borne at Lions sayd, that the Inhabitants of the Country coming thither, labored more for their owne profit, then for the good of the publicke, and did not much affect the publicke good, if they did not hope for their owne private commodites, hauing no hands but for themselves. That it was neither profitable nor commendable to impart the chiefe Honours, and to commit the gouernment of the City to new men, for many reasons which haue bene set downe by the wise, but especially lest they confound the ancient Order and Gouernment with strange Customes and Manners.

Intention to France.

The profit of the care of silke.

The King considering that a small matter doth trouble a multitude (as the encounter of a ditch doth disorder the ranks of an Army when it marcheth) he gaue them to vnderstand that he desired they should agree together, sending them to La Guiche Gouverneur of Lyons to reconcile these wills, diuided onely vpon this subiect, but vnited in all other points that concerned the obedience and seruice of his Maiesty. This diuision began to decrease when as they vnderstood that his Maiesties pleasure was to content both parties, to reduce things to the ancient order wherein they had liued happily, and not to suffer the good correspondency which had bene betwixt the Inhabitants of one City, to be lost by the quality of this priuiledge, the which by fruitlesse innovations did alter that which the Ancients had allowed and maintained.

The King therefore commanded that the reasons of either part should be carefully examined and considered in his Councell. The President tanin was reporter of this controuersie. The Councell hauing vnderstood the Kings intention, and considered of the Governor of Lyons aduice, thought that as they might not change the ancient customes in the which they had liued well, so it was iust and reasonable to gratifie the Originall families of the City, for that they had suffered most in these last troubles, and had opposed themselves most resolutely against the faction. They therefore thought it good that there should remaine a distinction with some marke or prerogative of Honour, reseruing the charge of Prouost of Merchants for such as were Citizens born, & that those of the country which had continued there for ten years Heads of Families, should be capable of the Consulship, to enter indifferently with them that were borne there. By this declaration both the one and the other had part of their demands. The King sending them backe, recommended vnto them obedience, and respect to their Governor, and Concord and Vnity among themselves. And for that in the last Consular Elections there had bene something done indiscreetly, the Chancelor vied some words vpon that subiect, both graue, iust, and worthy the greatnesse of his charge.

It is my opinion (sayd he) that as the king hath an interest, that none should be chosen for Magistrats of a Towne, but those, of whose Loyalty his Maiesty is well assured, so the more the liberty of election is left vnto them, the more obedience should his Maiesty, the Governours and Lieutenants Generall of Provinces finde in the Inhabitants, in that which it should please him to command them.

The King desiring to increase the commodities of the Realm, and to enrich his subjects, hauing tryed in his royal: houses of Fontainebleau, Madril, and the Gardens of the Tuilleries, that silke wormes might be bred and brought vp as happily in France, as in any part of Europe, he resolved to adde the art of silke to the felicitys of the peace, a speedy and fit remedy to auoyd the transport of gold and siluer. Hereupon he had the aduice of Commissioners deputed for the establishing of the trafficke, the which hee had chosen as well out of his Councell, as of the Soueraigne Courts of Parliament, Chamber of Accomptes, and Court of Aydes. They gaue his Maiesty to vnderstand, that for the more speedy bringing in of this new worke, he must of necessity begin by the planting of Mulberry-trees, to feed the wormes that weaue and make the silke. And therefore some expert in that Art, did binde themselves to furnish a great number of white Mulberry-trees, and graines to make Nurseries, in foure parts of the Realme, at Paris, Orleans, Tours, and Lyons, who were bound to make their diuisions by the first day of Aprill this yeare, with instructions how to sow and plant trees and Kirnells, to gouerne the wormes, to draw and spin the silke, to prepare it, and make it ready to be sold. There could not bee found in this age a more profitable husbandry. The people of Languedoc, Prouence, and Dauphine haue found this labor so successfull within these few yeares, as the onely reuennue of silke doth now bring more money to these Prouinces, then the Come, Oyle, and Woade, although they haue great abundance. It doth also begin very happily at Lyons, and if it continue, this City will be as famous for silke, as Tire and Bulis were for Scarlet.

As the profit is great and pleasing, so the practice is not painfull, for one man is sufficient to imploy the leaues of three great Mulberry-Trees, to nourish and entertaine halfe an ounce of Wormes; women and children are as capable as men. It is done without any diuersion from their labour, and almost without any losse of time, at such a season of the yeare when as the fruits of the Earth require rather the fauour of Heauen, then the industry of men. It is not done without a perpetuall admiration of the wonders of that

A Soueraigne hand of the Almighty, by whose order we see these little beasts without flesh, blood, bones, veines, sinewes, or arteries, without scales, or bowels within, without teeth, nayles, or prickles, and without silke, haire, eyes, or eares, to make that in forty daies which all the industry of man could not doe in forty yeares. They are the workers of a stuffe which serues for an ornament in the house of God, and in those of Kings, and furnish the chiefe ingredients for a most wholesome confection, for the cure of melancholly, which is that of Alkermes, which is made by the infusion and decoction of silke in the iuice of Kermes.

The King went to Metz and tooke the Queene with him. The cause of his voyage was the bad intelligence betwixt Sobole commanding in the Citadell, and the Inhabitants of the Towne. The Duke of Espernon shewed in this trouble, as in many other more dangerous, that of the two best things of our life, happinesse is the first, and wisdom the second. Sobole was one of them to whom he had yielded a part of that great and incomparable fauour which hee had during the reigne of the deceased King. Hauing the gouernment of Metz from the King, he made Sobole his Lieutenant of the towne and Citadell, in whom hee had as much confidence, as hee had vowed his affection vnto him.

As the great troubles in the yeare 1589, had made France like vnto a troubled river for Ambitious men to fish in, so those which held places of importance began to raise their authorities as high as the liberty of the time, and the forgetfulness of the French would suffer them. Two or three yeares after the Duke of Espernon was troubled in Prouence, and his credit crackt with the King. They say that Sobole began then to cary himselfe more proudly then he was wont, yfing no moderation, which is the perfect ornament of prosperity. He suffred himselfe to be called Governor. A title which added nothing to his profit and commodity, and did breed him lealouise with his equals, bad opinion in the iudgment of his superiors, and hatred and feare in the hearts of his inferiors.

There was another occasion which made his carriage more odious, which was the pursuit he made against the principall of the towne, for treason and conspiracy. They were freed from prison being innocent, but they tooke this resolution to free themselves from the command of Sobole. It is the humor of the people to write any good they haue received vpon the water, and to ingraue the wrongs are done them in brasse. The Duke of Espernon passing by Metz to goe to the Spaw, heard great complaints against Sobole, the which he did but heare, finding that there was some lealouise of his aboad at Metz, for as often as he sent for him to eate or play with him, and to bring his brother with him, the one or the other remained still in the City. Yet the Duke of Espernon entred into the Citadell, and was received with all the honours hee could desire, Sobole presented him the keyes at the gate, protesting of his affection, and complaining of those which said hee would refuse him the entry: the souldiers stood with their pikes vp, and their Hargiebuzes and Muskets vpon their shoulders, and the Halbardes behinde them.

The Duke of Espernon returned to Court, to vnderstand the Kings pleasure touching these troubles. He made a second voyage to Metz. Their murmuring against Sobole was turned into publike complaints, and their complaints into Barricadoes betwixt the Citadell and the towne: the Inhabitants were transported with so strange a passion, as they submitted themselves to any thing, so as they might not be commanded by two the Brethren. This commotion had not lasted long: if it had not bene supported. The presence of the Duke of Espernon gaue them courage, who else would haue bene much amazed. The King first sent Boisize, and then Parente, both which serued his Maiesty according to his intentions, and disposed Sobole to doe whatsoeuer he should command him, declaring notwithstanding that he would not deliuer the place but to himselfe. This was the occasion of the Kings voyage, who went thither in a very vnseasonable time. Vpon the brute of his going, many Princes of Germany sent to take vp their lodgings at Metz, who notwithstanding (hearing that the King would make but small abode, and the time being troublesome) came not out of their Stoues, so as there came not any but the D. of Deux Ponts, the Landgraue of Hesse, and the Prince of Brandenburg. The King finding the hatred betwixt Sobole and the Inhabitants to bee irreconcilable, was aduised to giue the charge of the Citadell to Arquien, Lieutenant of the Coronells company, of the Regiment of his Maiesties guards: and the Lieutenantcy of the gouernment of the Towne and of the Country of Messin to Montigny his brother, to hold them as Lieutenants of his Maiesty in the absence of the Duke of Espernon. The King would not enter into Metz before A that Sebole was out of the Citadell. Some thought he would not haue bene so obedient, but he shewed he had no designe beyond his duty. This was a disgrace vnto him. Hee bla- med his fortune, and Fortune accused his bad carriage. The way hee tooke to maintaine himselfe, ouerthrew him. Men must hold great Commands like simple Commiſſions, and not as Inheri- tances. They must desire them without Passion, and receive them without Infoleney. The King past the feast of Easter at Metz. Where he heard the Iesuits requests for their re-establishment. They could not find a better opportunity to speake vnto the King, then that which Varenne (Controller general of the Posts of France) gaue them, giuing them intelligence that the King would come to Metz and there spend the Easter. Hereupon foure Iesuites of Pont a Mouzon, were deputed to goe and doe their duties vnto his Maieſtie, and to renew the request for their returne vnto those places from the which they had bene expelled. They came to Metz on the Wednesday before Easter day, and the next day in the after-noonne they had audience in the Kings Cabinet, where, as the Duke of Espernon, Villeroi, Guerre, and Varennes were present. The King recei- ued them graciously and would not suffer them to kneele, but commanded them to stand vp: and although he takes no delight in long speeches, knowing that they come prepared with goodly words. Yet he heard father Ignace Armand with patience and attention, who made a long and eloquent Oration.

"Sir, since it hath pleased God to make you victorious, and a peaceable possessor of C the Scepter and Crowne which is due vnto you, and that wee had the happinesse to read, and know in your Maieſtie those great perfections, which since the memory of man haue not bene found in any great Prince or Monarch, and especially that great clemency, and assured marke of a Noble and generous minde, the which after so many victories and triumphs you haue vsed towards them which had most offended you, wee then conceived a great hope that you would shew the like clemency and mildnesse to vs.

"But as all things in this world are mutable: When as wee thought to doe you humble seruice, and to yeeld you the obedience which subiects owe vnto their King and naturall Prince, there fell out an vnfortunate accident which troubled all our designs, and seque- D ding vs from you, tooke from vs the meanes to doe you the seruice which we pretended. Yet we can assure you with truth, that notwithstanding all the crosses and contradictions, or the false reports which haue bene raised vp against vs, both within and without the Realme, we haue neither lost the affection we owe to our deare Country, nor our desire to your seruice, nor the hope we had in your clemency and naturall bountie: Assuring our selues that time in the end will discouer the truth, and mollifie all offenses which the misery of ciuill warres haue bred.

"This hope hath much increased since your coming into these parts, which makes vs now to prostrate our selues at your feet, and to beseech your Maieſtie not to deferre the grace any longer which we haue so often demaied, & to giue vs occasion to preach throughout E all the world, that our hopes were not vaine, being supported by the bounty of so great a King, receiuing vs in the end as his most humble subiects, and most desirous to employ our selues for his Maieſties seruice, there being nothing that can be more grievous vnto vs, then to see our selues in disgrace with the King, and not able to assist our country with those poore meanes which God hath giuen vs, and according to the vocation wherunto we are called.

"We doubt not but they haue laboured to make vs appeare before you, otherwise then we were, by the imposition of the fouleſt and most odious crimes, which a subiect might commit against his Prince and country, the which we detest as execrable; and if we had once thought to do them, we should thinke our selues vnworthy, I will not say to be re- ceived into our country, but to liue vpon the earth.

"They haue in like manner sought to blame our institution allowed in a general Coun- cell, and by so many Popes, and receiued by the most Christian Kings your predecessors, as if it tyed vs to obey our Generall in all things, yea in that which should be contrary to Gods reason. Yet I cannot beleue Sir, that euer any such opinion could lodge in the hearts of those that haue the least knowledge of our institution, being contrary to our constitutions, which do alwaies except in the obedience due to our Superiours, all that which

A which may not be done without offence to God. But how were it possible, that of so many which enter into our company, and all desirous of saluation, any one should remaine, if they should fee that such an impiety, (not obedience) should haue place? Was it euer heard of any one that left vs (how great an enemy soeuer) that there was any such thing, and that this obedience did derogate from that which we owe vnto Kings & Magistrates, or that it doth command vs to giue counsell to any one that may bee preiudiciall to your Maieſtie and State? Many haue also sought to perwade you, that wee did sollicite chil- dren of good houles to bee of our company and religion, to haue their goods and ioyne them vnto ours: It is contrary to the course we hold in the reception of those which de- fire to serue God in our company, receiuing not any one before we haue made a long tri- all of their vocation, whether it be by the inspiration of God, or perswasion of men, and that many times for three or foure yeares. If they finde this vocation not to bee of God, they are refused, being an essentiell let to their reception, and there is not any thing which Superiours recommend more to them of this company, then to bee very carefull not to perwade any one to enter into a religious estate, but onely to excite them to ver- tue and learning, leauing that to the holy Spirit, which is of the perfection of the Gospel, and of the counsell of our Saviour: and for prooffe, the number of them which are in France, is so small as it makes not the twentieth part of them which are of other religions.

"As for that which is said, wee pretend to enrich our selues by their meanes which are receiued into this company, it needs not many words to discouer this falshood. Euery man knows the reuenues of our Colledges, I thinke that few men can vaunt that they are much enriched. One thing I can say, that hardly shall you finde one of our Colledges in France, whose foundation is sufficient for that which is necessary to support the charges, and you shall finde many which for the most part liue of almes. That of Paris the chiefe City of your Realm, comprehending the legacies of the Presidents Saint Andrew, and Hanſelquin with all others, hath neuer had above a thousand Crownes rent, which will hardly serue to entertaine twenty persons. Such a Colledge requires at the least three score, for all the benefices and faculties whereof wee make profession. Many of this great City haue entred into our company, and some of good houles, the which haue not left a doct of land. If they haue giuen vs any almes in money, to supply the want of our founda- tion, the greatest summe doth neuer come to the eight part of their goods, the which hath bene alwaies sought with the good liking and consent of their Parents. If our Col- ledges haue sufficient foundations, we desire no more. And if any one of our body dispos- seth of his goods, the application is left free vnto him, and commonly if his kinsfolkes bee poore, he leaues them all, if they be rich, he employes some part to godly vses, and to Hof- pits, with the liking of his kinsfolkes. We were in truth very miserable and voyde of sense, if hauing quick all the commodities which we had by succession, or might get by our industry, we would seek them in Religion. And how were it possible we should be so greedy to affect them, hauing nothing in particular, and it wee had a hundred times more in common, we should reape no greater commoditie for our own particulars, the ouer-plus being employed according to our constitutions to entertaine poore Schollers, & in other works of charity. They also importune your Maieſties cares continually, and say that we meddle with matters of State. The cause of this opinion and presumption is, for that sometimes Noblemen and Prelates, vouchsafe to vse vs for matter of Confidence, and to direct them in their deuotions and spirituall exercises; whatsoeuer they doe or appoint af- wards, is attributed vnto vs, although we haue had no communication, nor haue medled in the busineses. For in truth Sir, there is nothing so contrary to our estate and intention, nor more forbidden in our company, vpon grievous paine, then to meddle in like affaires.

These be Sir, the chiefe points which are objected against vs, and if there be any other, whereof it shall please your Maieſtie to be better informed, we promise to answer, by writing or by mouth, as you shall rest satisfied, and see plainly that they are but inuenti- ons, forged either by them which affect vs not, or by such as haue no knowledge of our institution and manner of life. But wee will answer more plainly to the view and contentment of all the world by our workes, when it shall please your Maieſtie to vn- binde our hands. Then shall euery man see plainly, what wee say and promise: and your Maieſtie shall witness, yea they which are most contrary vnto vs, that wee haue bene true.

1603 " That if our prayers and humble petitions can finde no place in your Royall heart, yet A
 " we wil not leaue to haue yours alwaies grauen in the bottome of ours, to loue you, to wish
 " all greatnesse, and happinesse, and to offer our continuall praers vnto God, for the prefer-
 " ration of your Maiestie, of the Queene your most beloued spouse, of our Lords your chil" dren, and of your Realme, our most deare Country; remaining in perpetuall sorrow, that " we could not shew by effects, that affectio which we haue desired. But we hope otherwise,
 " and with this hope wee beseech you to cast the beames of your clemency, vpon this little
 " company of your most humble subiects, who with griefe of heart, vpon their knees, and " teares in their eyes, implore your mercy: Yours I say, being so naturall vnto you, and im-
 " parted vnto so many. Regard not that which hath bene done and said, with more zeale
 " and lesse discretion then was needfull. It was some priuate member, and not the whole " body, the which as it hath neuer allowed of the errors of priuate men, so should it not re-" ceieue the preiudice. We doe not implore your mercy, but to serue God and your Ma-" iesty, thereunto tend all our desires and intentions, and therein wee will employ our " bloods and liues. Such as desire not your greatnesse, nor of your Realme, reioyce at " our disgrace, thinking (it may be) that we might helpe to make it more flourishing, it we " were restored.
 " We beseech your Maiesty, in all humility, that ye will bee pleased to adde this Bond to " many others, which tye vs to your seruice, let not the mercy and clemency which you " shall vse to vs, depend vpon any but your selfe: let it be wholly yours, and let vs not bee
 " beholden to any but to you. The gift shall be more pretious, and our bond much greater.
 " This will increase our courage to loue and serue you, and excite every one to the like du" ty. We will not be vanquished therein by strangers but will rather surmount them. If " they of our company in Spaine, Italy, and Germany, do it, we will rather dye being natu" rally Frenchmen, but we will yelde the like duty to our King and Country. The lawes of " God and Nature (common to all) binds vs thereunto, and we shall haue many priuate
 " bonds to doe it, when it shall please your Maiestie to vse so great clemency.
 " Sir, the holy and sacred time of the death and passion of our Sauour speaks for vs,
 " That blood which he hath powred forth abundantly vpon the Altar of the Crosse, for " sinners, his enemies, doth inuite you to vse clemency to those whose heart and affection
 " are wholly yours. We haue not deserued to great a grace of your Maiesty, but he in whose " name we demand it, and who without doubt demands it for vs, after so many prayers
 " which wee haue offered vnto him, shall haue such power with your Maiesty, who by his " Christian pietie will neuer depart from that which hee shall know to be pleasing, to that " foueraigne bounty of our God, whom wee pray that after hee hath made you to reigne
 " long and many yeres in this world, he will giue you an eternall and assured Kingdome in " the other.

The King answered them very gratiously, I wish no harme to the Iesuits, and all the ill that I wish to any living creature, let it happen vnto my selfe. My Court of Parliaments hath done something against you, but not without good consideration. He received that in writing which they had deliuered by mouth, deliuered it to Villery, and hauing considered thereof, he declared vnto them expressly how desirous he was, and what care he would take for their returne. If your businesse (said hee) were not in the Popes hands, I would dispatch you presently, but you know it is not expedient to doe any thing without him. I will haue you: you are profitable for the publike and for my estate. He added moreover, that being at Paris he would thinke seriously of their affaires. They demanded if his Maiesty would not bee pleased that the three Princiuals of their company in France, accompanied by three others should attend there at his returne, and receiue his commandements. There needs not so many, said the King, it shall be sufficient that you and father Cotton come. The King made this voyage partly to pacifie some trouble growne betwixt the Cardinall of Lorraine, and the Prince of Brandenburg, for the Bishopricke of Strausbourg, and this was the cause of their quarrell. The Bishopricke of Strausbourg being voyde by the decease of their Bishop (who was a Catholike) the Cardinall of Lorraine obtained the grant thereof from his Holinesse. But for that they of Strausbourg since the fittes in Germany, had held the confession of Ausbourg, the deceased Bishop had retired himselfe out of the City, and liued at a house of his in the Country in his religion, and yet notwithstanding hee receiued his temporall reuenues from them of Strausbourg. On the other side the Marquis

A controuersie betwixt the ricke of Strausbourg.

A quis of Brandenburg, Elector of the Empire, had obtained an election from them of Strausbourg for one of his Sonnes, who being named to the Bishopricke, and receiued by them of Strausbourg, he will enioy the Bishops rights without any other ceremony.
 The Cardinall on the other side hauing receiued the accustomed order therein, demanded the Bishops rights of them of Strausbourg, such as his Predecessor enioyed, who died a Catholike, and according to the Article of the Invocam, set downe by the confession of Ausbourg. Hereupon they of Strausbourg made some difficulty, and the rather, for that being neighbours vnto the Duke of Lorraines territories, they haue often many controuersies to decide, as it doth commonly fall out betwixt neighbors. They had also B given their consent to the nomination of the Prince of Brandenburg for Superintendant or Administrator, that is to say, Bishop after their manner: for these and other pri-uate reasons, they refused the Cardinalls demand.

The Prince of Brandenburg gets possession, and prepares to withstand the Cardinall, all things tending vnto Armes. Many and great leaues of men were made on either side.
 Those of Strausbourg were also in Alarme, seeking to prevent all disorders if it were possible, yet fauouring the Prince of Brandenburg more then the Cardinall of Lorraine.
 The Emperour had written vnto them both, declaring that his intention was, that neither of them should haue wrong. The King was intreated to interpose his authority as a Friend to both parties, for the auoiding of all scandall. The Prince of Brandenburg, C named the Bishop of Strausbourg, was come into France some months before: And they say he remained some dayes at Troyes, vntill his Maiesty had assigned him a time and place to haue the Honour to come and kisse his hands, the which was done at Loges neer to Saint Germaine in Lay, where the King gaue him audience, and so the said Prince was dispatcht, with promise of all fauor, to compound the controuersie betwixt him and the Cardinall.

During the Kings abode at Metz, the said Prince of Brandenburg came accompanied with the Lantgrau of Hesse, the Duke of Deux Ponts, and a Deputy from the Archbishop of Treues, Elector of the Empire: and by their aduice it was determined, that the Cardinall should haue a portion out of the said Bishopricke, and the rest should D remaine vnto the Prince, and by that means they should continue friends as before.
 Thus a Peace was made betwixt them, the which might else haue bene preiudiciall to the whole Empire and to all Christendome. The King went from Metz to Nancy to see the Duchesse of Bar his sister, and the Duke of Lorraine. At that time a mariage was concluded betwixt the Duke of Deux Ponts and the Ladie Katherine of Rohan, remaining then with the Kings Sister, and so hauing provided for all things necessary for the frontier, he tooke his way to Paris the 7 of Aprill. It is a signe of a happy Reigne when the subiect reioyceeth to see his King: Pronounce had been posselt with this desire fifteene yeares, being the onely Province of all France that had not yet seene the King. He was expected there with great impatience, hauing promised after his returne from Metz to E go thither. As it was reasonable to giue comfort to that Province, so was it necessary to fortifie that Coast, and to haue an eye to the designs of the sea army of Spaine, which vnder colour of attempting something vpon Algier, might fall vpon that coast, by which the Emperour Charles the fifth held it the easiest to invade France.

At the same time (report which carries all things abroad without distinction of iudge-ment) did publish throughout all Europe, a newes happily false; which was, that the King had bene extremely sicke. He was indeed sick, but not so extremely as they should ioudge of him. He was soone restored to his natural health, and returned to his ordinary manner of liuing. The actions of Princes must be alwaies great; not buying themselves in making of Lanthornes, like to that King of Macedonia. They must alwaies F hold their Subjects in this opinion, That in doing nothing, they doe some great worke.
 It was a great precept which the Emperour Charles the fifth gaue to King Philip his Son, alwaies to exercise himselfe in some vertue, agreeing with the duty of a King, so hold the Subjects as it were in admiration of his effects, and not to giue their thoughts at any time to fill them with other affections. When occasions of war cease, he must apply himselfe to those of Peace, as to the administering of Iustice, and ordering of his Realme.
 To conclude, all the actions of a Prince must tend to the good and health of his people, for whom he liues, and more then for himselfe, as the Sunne doth not shine and giue heat

heat but for men and the elements. During the war, no man enquired what the King did, his great affaires prouided store of worke, the end of one enterprize was the beginning of another. Now that these seditious stormes are appeased, that the waues are smooth and the Sea calme; that Peace giues him a rest worthy of his labours, that so many paines past make his pleasures more sweet, and that the reward of Vertue makes his triumphs seeme more glorious, there passeth no day, but some one asketh, What doth the King? They need not tarry for an answer, hee is alwaies in action far from idleness. The chiefe action is neuer to be without action, he hath bene so bred vpon his Cradle, he cannot be otherwise: Bees neuer become Drones, great spirits do neuer degenerate, we shall see him on horsebacke at the age of Massaniha, he will be fierfull to his enemies at that of Agassilaus, hee will show himselfe in the head of his armies at the age of 80 yeares, like vnto Phocion, his valour will neuer grow old no more then his memory.

He contents himself notwithstanding to enioy the fruits of peace, and not to thinke any more of war, vnlesse hee be wronged. One of the greatest contentments the peace doth yeeld him, is that of his buildings, and there is no exercise more worthy of a King then to repaire the ruines of time, if they bee buildings which regard the glory of the Prince, and the common profit of the people, when as the mortar is not made with the blood and sweat of his poore Subjects. At one time the King had Mansions in diuers places, in the great Church of Orleans, at Fontainebleau, at S. Germaine, at Monceaux, and at the new Bridge at Paris. All great workes, whether that we consider the building by the designe, or the designe by the building. Among many maruells of his life, that was admirable, That hee did build and make war both together. The first day hee entered into the Louvre hee did designe and set downe what he hath since continued. Hee hath made S. Germaine and Fontainebleau (two houses of the Kings his Predecessors) royall and stately Palaces. He finished in the hottest of the wars and foraign tempests, that which they had vnderaken in a calme and peacefull season.

They were buildings whereof wee may truly say, That the workmanship exceeds the matter, wherein he was seru'd with as great affection and promptitude, as we way obserue good order and iudgment, and will be the more durable, for that the workemen receiued commoditie, and the Labourers did not sweate for nothing. Many gallant Spirits found out ingenious inuentions which our age admires, and the forepassed haue not knowne. Waters had not yet bene raised higher then their Springs. This present age, and those which are to come, owe this industry to Montenis, President of the Minte in the generality of Lion. This aduise affection in the King to royall buildings, made subjects (by an honest and commendable imitation) to raise the ruines which did generally shew a hideous face, and mournfull markes of horrible and furious effects, both in townes and country. The paued Causes which are continued in diuers Prouinces, the Bridges, which by the motion and care of the Marquis of Rosny are built vpon Riuers, where neuer were any, witnesseth with what curiosity, the King sought the ease and commoditie of his people.

We haue seene what the King does, wee must also know whereunto the Court is inclined. How can they liue without warre that thinke it a dishonour to dye in their beds? who are accustomed to triumph ouer idleness, and rest not but to take new breath? What doe so many Noblemen, which cannot endure rest but with impatiency? Some goe a hunting, others dwell and dye among Ladies: many giue themselves to the knowledge of tongues and the Mathematickes: the most quarrellous strip themselves into their shirts, notwithstanding any prohibition of Duells or Combats: the most temperate retire themselves from great expences. Some there are, who loath that ease should triumph ouer their reputations, goe out of the Realme with the Kings permission. It is a signe of a great and noble courage, to goe and make war vpon a foraigne Theater, and to see the diuersity of people and nations, that he may settle his iudgment, and arme himselfe with experience. When we speake of them that haue well employed the ease and liberty of peace, wee must remember the Duke of Neuers. Hee went into England, Flanders, and Hungary, and through a great part of the North. Hee past to the King of Denmarke, who for the respect of those two great & famous houses, of Gonzaga, allied to the greatest houses of Europe, and of Neuers, which carries the title of D. of Brabant & Limbourg, but much more for loue of this crown, receiued him with great & famous honors.

A The King was aduertised, that the Seignery of Venice would renew a negotiation which they had attempted and left vnperfect twenty yeares since, which they now sought to conclude. De Fic, Ambassadour for the King in Suifferland, hauing discouered, that both parties had begun without the King, gaue them to vnderstand, that they could not finish nor conclude that without his Maiesty. The Count Fuentes did also crosse it, for that this new League should make him to lose the hope of that which the Spaniard had pursued for many yeares. As soone as the King had giuen them to vnderstand that he was well pleased therewith, it was concluded: neither party respecting the threats of the Count Fuentes, who Iware that he would take from the Grisons the trafficke which they had in the Duchy of Milan, and the reliefe of Corne which they receiued from thence.

B The Articles of this alliance are set downe at large in Peter Mathew. The Count Fuentes discontented with this league, made the Grisons repent it, hauing cutt off their commerce, and all commodities which they drew out of the territories of Milan, without the which they could not wel liue. The two Countries ioyne together, and the barrenesse of the one is supplied by the fertility and abundance of the other. To bring them vnder the yoke of Spaine, and to force them to breake with the Venetians, hee built a fort at the entry of their Country, whereof shall be spoken hereafter.

An Ambassador sent from Venice into France about the same time past by Lions, a graue and wise man, and well practised in affaires of State. The Governor of Lions did visit him, and among other discourses vnderstood from him, that the Seigneurs of that Common-weale did hold themselves more bound vnto the Count Fuentes, then to any man liuing, for that they had made vse of his threats to sharpen their courages, which time had made blunt and dull. His braueries had made them to take resolutions for the good of the State, which they had neuer dreamt of, drowning their countells in the delights of Peace, and presuming that they should not feare any storme in so great a calme, but hauing seene the Counts humour to stir vp war in Italy, and that hee bragged he had Instruments to draw them in, that had no will to dance, they had so well provided for their affaires, as they feared his hand no more then his tongue. The last yeare the Lord

Sa of Pont had bene in new France (called Canada) from whence hee had brought two Sa- uages, which hee presented vnto the King: they learned of them that the great Riuer which they thought to haue bene but a Gulfe (for that it is eighteen leagues broad where it enters into the Sea) was about 400 leagues long, and past through many goodly Countries and Lakes, into the which many other goodly Riuers did run, and that hee might goe vp into it in Canowes, which the Sauages did vse to saile in that Riuer. Hee resolved with some other Sea Captaines (with the Kings good liking) to returne, and to search into the heart of the Country by means of the Sauages, as well as hee had discouered along the Sea Coast, where is nothing but rocks and high mountaines, and sands full of Pine trees, Sapins, Cipres and Holly. Hee parted from Honfleur the fifteenth of March, carrying the two Sauages backe with him, and the eighteenth of April he came

E into the great Riuer of Canada, where hauing entred a hundred leagues, in the end hee came to Tabouacac the twenty fourth, where hee found many Sauages in Cabines. Going on land, hee went with some of his Company to the Cabin of the great Sagamo, called Anabacion, where they found him with some foure score or a hundred of his Companions, which made Tabagie (that is to say, a Feast) who receiued them very well, according to their custome, and made them to sit neare him, the Sauages being placed one by one on either side of the Cabin. One of the Sauages which hee had caried with him, began to make his Oration, of the good reception which the King had made them, and of the good vsage which they had receiued in France, & that his Maiesty wished them well, and desired to people their land, and to make peace with their enemies (which be the Iro- cois) or to send them forces to vanquish them. He told them of the goodly castles, places, houses and people that hee had seene, and the manner of liuing of the French. The Sauages gaue him audience with great silence. When hee had done speaking, the great Sagamo began to take Tobacco, and gaue some vnto the Seigneur of Pont Graue of S. Malo, and to his company, and to some other Sauages that were neere him, hauing taken it well, hee began to make his Oration to them all, speaking deliberately, staying sometimes a litle, and then beginning againe, he said: That in truth they had reason to be greatly contented to haue such a King for their great friend: Whereunto all the other Sauages answered red with one voice, ho, ho, ho; that is to say I, I. Then the Sagamo said againe; That he A was very glad the King of France should people their Land, and make war against their enemies. That there was no Nation in the world to whom they desired more good, then vnto the French. Then he gaue the Sauages to vnderstand, what profit they might receiue from his Maiesty.

After that he had ended his Speech, Du Pont and his company went out of the Cabin, and then they began to make their Tabagie, or feast, the which is done with the flesh of Orignac, which is like vnto beefe of Beares, Sea-Wolues, and Beauers, which is the ordinary meat that they haue, with great store of Wilde-fowle. When they eate they sit of either side of the Cabin, euery one hauing a dish made of the barke of Trees: the meat being foddren, there is one that giues to euery one his portion in his dish, where they eate very grossly, for when their hands are greasie, they either rub them vpon their haire, or vpon their Dogs, (whereof they haue great store to hunt withall) before they eate, they daunce about their Pans, and after they haue eaten, they returne to their dauncing, euery one taking the head of his enemy which he hath slaine in battell, the which hangs behind him. They made this Feast together, for the victory which they had obtained of the Irocois, of whom they had slaine some hundred. Three nations of Sauages were there assembled, that is to say, the Estechemins, Algonmequins, and Montagnez, to the number of a thousand, all enemies to the Irocois, against whom they make cruell war by surpris, for that they are more in number then they.

The eighteenth day of the Moneth, the said Sauages which were then at the point of S. Mathen, came to campe at the Port of Todoufac, where the Frenchmen were. At the breake of day the great Sagamo, going out of his Cabin, went about all the other Cabins, crying with a loud voyce, That they must dislodge to goe to Todoufac, where their good friends were. Suddenly euery one pulled downe his Cabin, and the great Sagamo began first of all to take his Canow, and to carry it to the Riuer, in the which he embarked his wife and Children, with great store of Furies, so as they were neere two hundred Canowes, which goe exceeding swiftly, for although Du Pont Ship-boat were very well manned, yet they went faster then it. There are but two persons that doe row, D the man and the woman. Their Canowes are eight or nine paces long, and one broad, they are very subiect to ouer turne, if they be not well guided: they are made of barkes of trees, strengthened within with little hoopcs artificially made, and they are so light, as a man may carry one easily, and euery Canow will carry the weight of a Pipe. Their Cabins are low, made like Tents, covered with barkes of trees, leauing a hole open in the top, to let in the light: they make many fires in the midst of the Cabin, whereas sometimes they are ten families together. They lye vpon skins one among another, and their Dogs with them. All these people are of a pleasant humor, they laugh most commonly, yet they are somewhat Saturnine: they speake deliberately, as if they would be well vnderstood, and stay suddenly, sludying a good space, and then they speake againe. They vse these customes in their Orations in Councell, whither none come but the principall which are: ancients: the women and children assist not. All these nations endure so much sometimes, as they are in a manner forced to eate one another through the great cold and snow, for the beasts and fowle which they vse, retire themselves into the hotter countries. They are apt enough to learne to till the ground, or any other worke, if they might be taught. Many of them are of good iudgment, and will answer directly to any question. They are full of reuenge and great lyars, in whom there is no trust, they promise much and performe little. For the most part they haue no law, and beleue that after that God had made all things, he tooke a number of Arrowes and stickt them in the earth, from the which sprung men and women, which haue multiplied in the world vnto this day, and are growne in this sort. That there is one God, one Son; the Mother, and the Sun which shines, which are four, yet that God is about all, and that the Son, and the shining Sun are good, by reason of the benefit which they receiue, but the Mother is nothing worth, for that she eates them. In like sort they hold, that the father is not very good. They haue an infinite number of other foolish opinions, & they haue certaine Sauages among them whom they call Pisotoma, which speakes wisely vnto the Deuill, and tels them what they should doe, as well for matters of war, as other things: to whom they obey at their first command. They also beleue that all their dreames are true, and many say that they haue

A scene and dreamt what should happen, but to speake truly, they are illusions of the Deuill which abuleth them.

They are all well proportioned, without any deformity of their bodies, and nimble. Their women are well fashion, repleat, and somewhat full: they are yellow by reason of the painting wherewith they anoint themselves, which makes them of an Oliue colour. They apparell themselves with skinned: one part of their bodies is couered, and the rest bare. In winter they couer themselves with good Furies, whereof they haue great store, where there is great store of Snow, they vse a kind of Racket, the which is twice or thrice as big as that of France, which they tye vnto their feet, and to go in the snow without sinking, for else they could not hunt nor goe in many places.

They haue a kind of mariage, when a maide is fourteen or fifteene yeares old, she may haue as many seruants and friends, and accompany with as many as she please; then after five or six yeares she will take whom she likes best for her husband, and liue together till death, vnlesse after some time they haue no children; then the man may be vnmarrid, and take another wife. After they be once married they are chaste, and the husbands are for the most part ielous, giuing presents to the father or kinsfolkes of the woman whom they haue married. As for their Interments or Funeralls, when a man or a woman dieth, they make a pit, into the which they put all the goods he hath, as kettles, furies, harchets, bows, arrows, apparell, and other things, and then they put the body into the pit and couer it with earth, on the which they lay great peeces of wood, and one peece they set right vp, the which they paint red on the top. They beleue the immortality of the soule, and say that they go to reioyce in other Countries with their kinsfolkes and friends when they are dead. The Seignour of Pont hauing spent some time to discover the great riuer of Canada, and some other particularities of the Country, returned the 24 of August, and arriued at New-hauen the 30 of September. The great Turke (seeing the great exploits which the French had done in the wars of Hungary and Transiluania) had often entreated the King not to suffer any French to goe to the wars of Hungary, and to tye him to make a strict prohibition, he granted all and more then his Maiesty could desire for the reparation of publike and priuate iniuries, against the liberty of the commerce, and the safety of the nauigation in the Leuant Seas, the which were greatly molested by Pirats. He sent a Chaoirs (which is a General of a Carauane) vnto the King in September, with very kind Letters, and a style not vsuall for the Princes of the house of Ottomans, who speake as Turkes, and glory to speake proudly and imperiously to the Potentates of Christendome giuing him this title: To the most glorious, magnanimous, and great Lord of the belisfe of Iesus, Eleited amongst the Princes of the Nation, of Messias, the Compounder of Controuersies which happen among Christians, Lord of greatness, Maiesty and riches, and cleer guide of the greatest, Henry the fourth, Emperor of France, that he may end his dayes with peace and happinesse. The Letter I omit for breuities sake, being not greatly pertinent to this subiect. And for that the great Turke was informed, that the Pirats of Algier and Thunis, made markets of the French which they tooke, and sold them vnto the Moores (who were alwaies cruell and mercilesse vnto the Christians, being forced to endure all without complaining, and to murmur against the rigour which Fortune allows the Master ouer his slaue) hee writ to Amet King of Fez, and intreats him to preuent this sale, as against the Iustice that was left them by their Prophet, and to set all the Frenchmen that were in his dominions at liberty. The King laboured to conuert the war of Hungary into a long truce, or an honourable peace for the Christians. He vnto the war of Hungary into a long truce, or an honourable peace for the Christians. He disposed Mahomet thereunto by the dexterity of his Ambassador; and if the house of Austria had trusted that of France, they had reaped the fruits of this negotiation. Mahomet to shew that he had a desire to lay aside armes, presented the Emperour with armes and horses, and to Mathias the Archduke he sent a rich Roabe for a present.

There was no talke in Court but of the quarrell betwixt the Count Soissons and the Marquis of Rhosny, the which was very hard to reconcile. It grew vpon words reported and disputed. The Count Soissons was much offended, many framed diuers metemorphs in their heads, vpon the consequence of this question, some there were that made damnable vowes, the which were as odious and as punishable as those fellers of funerall stufes that were punished by the Senate of Athens, vpon the accusation of Demades. The King foreseeing that his seruice did suffer in this diuision, gaue him to vnderstand by the Chancellor and Sillery, and afterwards by the Count of S. Paul, and the Duke of Mont-Aubert, that he desired this trouble were ended and he satisfied: he answered them all after one sort, That he should hold himself unworthy of the honour to be as he was a nearer kinsman to so great and courageous a King, if he had no feeling of so bloody an injury. The King considering that this quarrell did nothing advance his service, he made himselfe the instrument of this reconciliation. Hee sent for the Count Soissons, and the Marquis of Rhosny to the Louvre. They came both well accompanied. The presence, authority, and intreaty of his Maiesty, was of force to smother the remembrance of all injuries, and to reconcile their wills. Let vs now see what they haue done in the Nationall Synode held at Gap, held by them of the reformed Religion, whereas many beleueed, that in giuing audience to Ambassadors, and receiuing Letters from foraigne Princes and common-weales, they had done more then their condition would allow, and had taken the way to make an Estate in the Estate. I will say no more. The passion of Religion might diminish the beliefe of the truth. The Synode began the first of October. It treated of things touching doctrine, discipline, and the government of Churches, giuing a good testimony that there are among them men full of zeale to the advancement of their religion, and who in their resolutions can ioyne wisdom with doctrine, causing them to blush that haue so much suffered the ancient constitutions of the Church to degenerate, and haue so much neglected the government and discipline, as the Synodall assemblies of Diocesses, so necessary and profitable, are nothing but vaine and fond ceremonies, where they doe onely exhort them to doe well hereafter, not caring to correct or amend the ill that is gone and past.

Of many meanes which the Church (in her infancy) did vse to preserve this spirit of peace and charity, which gaue life vnto all the members, and entertained the cymen and bond of the whole building, that of these assemblies hath bene held the most fruitfull, and should be made twice a yeare, if they will follow the Canons of the Apostles, and the Decrees of Nice and Sardinia. There they conferred of the order and direction of all affaires.

There the Pastors taking knowledge one of another, entertained their friendships, renewing the bonds of their affections. It serued for a blood letting and a good purgation for bad humors in a corrupted body, to preserve and keepe it in health, purity, and chastity of the Faith. There they shewed the power of the spirituall sword vpon the incorrigible, who in the end found the pappes of the Church drye for them, when through error, malice or obliquity they made themselves unworthy of the sweetnes of her milke. There in the end they did straine the strings of the policy and discipline of the Church, the which being through negligence growne slacke, made no found nor harmony. In this assembly of Gap (after that all the Deputies of the Prouinces of the Realme had shewed their Commissions) they began by the Inuocation of the name of God, the which was followed by the reading of the confession of the faith, wherein they did expound those things that were not plaine enough. The common desire of the Ministers to see the schisme pacified that was betwixt them and the other Congregations of Germany, England, and the Low countries, made them resolute that the assembly should write vnto the Vniuersities, both Lutherans and Caluinists, to desuise some meanes to reconcile the contrarieties in some points of their confession.

This Assembly began by a declaration that the Bishop of Rome was Antichrist, foretold by the word of God. The Ministers haue for a long time written and preached it, and the Catholike Doctors the contrary. They now made this opinion an article of Faith, & added it to their confession for the 31. And for that many said they were molested because they teamed the Pope Antichrist in their publicke or priuate discourses, they were exhorted to perseuere in this confession as one of the principall causes of their departure from the Church of Rome, and charged their Deputies in Court to beseech his Maiesty not to suffer them to be hindered in making a free confession of that which they beleueed. The Pope complained vnto the King by his Nuncio, who no lesse affected to the holy See than his Predecessors, who had receiued the glorious title of Christian, was much offended, forbidding the Ministers to proceede any farther, and not to vomit forth those bad words, from whence might spring a new kinde of poyson.

The confession of faith being read and examined, it was sworn by all the Deputies in the

A the name of their Prouinces, with promise to continue, and a protestation that it was the same doctrine that was taught in their churches. Which done, they entred into the examination of their discipline: It is the order which should be held for the administration of the word of God, praiers, and the decency of Ceremonies, whereof their assemblies are very bare, and yet notwithstanding being purged from superstitions are very necessary and maintain religion, as the barke preferues the tree, without the which it withers and dries away. In this reading of the discipline, it was obserued, that some Prouinces had particular formes and ceremonies, in the election and reception of Ministers. The assembly iudging by the aduice of the Apostle, that wee must haue but one rule and one forme in matters of Religion, they ordained that all Churches should follow the same forme, in the imposition of hands vpon Pastors, by the which he that should be presented to be receiued should kneele, and this imposition should be vpon the Sunday, or some other day of solemne assembly, in the presence of the people, and not in Consistories, or Colloquies.

And for that it was shewed that many Ministers in their preaching, vsed more the authority of the Fathers, then that of the Scripture, the Assembly threatned them with suspension which straying from expositions conformable to the word of God, were carried away to those of the Fathers, or scholasticall Doctors, or deliuering allegories, or discourses of Philosophy, produced the words of the Fathers in the Pulpit, namely, in the time of Lent, or the like season, or tooke the text of Catholike Preachers.

They did also disallow like disputations in Synodes and Colloquies, vpon controuersies of Diuinity, sending them to the Schooles at Saumur, there to be argued according to forme of Syllogisme, which is the instrument of disputation. They also thought these contentions among Pastors to be dangerous, and necessary to restrain them that would bring them in vse.

The Discipline hauing bene read and sworne by all the Deputies, in the name of the Prouinces, with a solemne protestation to obserue it strictly, and to cause it to be obserued in all points, and in all their Churches, they produced the acts of the last Synodes, to see what remained to be executed. Then they past Appellations made by priuate men, greiuing at the Decrees of Prouinciall Synods, after which they iudged of censures, suspensions, and other corrections, whereunto they added that which concerned the prouision and establishment of Ministers, in those places where they were demanded, and whereas the assembly thought them necessary.

Afterwards they treated of the generall affaires of the cause. The petition of the brethren of the Marquitate of Saluces, banished from their houses for the profession of this religion, hauing bene read, the Assembly answered; That they should be maintained and confirmed in the vnion of the Doctors and discipline of other Churches, and to that effect petition should be made vnto the King, to recommend them to the Duke of Savoy, that they might enioy the liberties graunted by the Edicts.

Vpon this question, if in suites depending before the Iudges of another religion, they should vse these words, Pretended, reformed Religion. The Synode said; That petition must be made vnto the King, nor to force them to say or doe anything contrary to their Consciences, exhorting all men of this religion to forbear this word of Reformed, as contrary to the freedome and liberty of their confession.

They of Xaintonge propounded another if it were lawfull for a priuate man to appropriate a place for his buriall, and to set it vpon pillars or otherwise; and if it be lawfull for Noblemen or other, to set vp their armes in Temples which are built. The Synode answered, That for Sepulchers, all should be obserued according to ancient simplicity, without appropriating anything in particular, witnessing their communion with the Saints that were dead, as well as they desired in the happy resurrection. As for Temples they should obserue the same modesty and simplicity. The assembly casting their eyes vpon spirituall and politike matters, they did carefully consider of that which concerns Schooles and Vniuersities, as the Nurseries of Ministers, and Pastors of their Doctrine, hauing nothing in religion more important then the instruction of youth, the which is made apt to anything we please, wherefore they ordained, That all the Prouinces should entertaine a certaine number of Schollers in the Vniuersities of this Realm, the which should not be admitted to the Ministry in their Prouinces without good and sufficient testimony ny of their manners and doctrine, from the Pastors and Professors of the Vniuersities A where they had studied. The Vniuersities are also exhorted to haue common Libraries, and especially the great Bible of Antwerpe in many languages.

This yeare the King did graue in the Register of his vertues a memorable example of Iullice: The cause is considerable, and the subject of consequence. A young Gentlewoman of Normandy visited and courted by her brother, disdained her husband, by whom she had two Children, for that hee was somewhat aged, and made no profession of armes. This inequality of age, together with his condition, made the conyugal affection like vnto a small brooke, whereof when the spring is stoppt, the bed remains dry, and there is nothing left but filth for roads and frogs. The greene grassie that was vpon the banks wth thereth, yea, the trees that were planted along, dye. This marriage, hauing lost the radieall humour of loue, it made all pleasure and content to wither, produced nothing but noise, disdaine, contempt, and quarrell. This miserable woman cared no more for her husband but to draw means from him to make her selfe more pleasing in the eyes of another, delighting in luxuriousnesse and excesse of apparell, vnder the which the Deuill is accustomed to make open way to Chastity, and to rauish the honour of a woman, without the which her life is a life without a body, a body without a soule, a soule without a spirit, a spirit without breath, and a breath without ayre.

It seemed that the first acquaintance of this woman with her brother, was nothing but a perfect loue, such as honour and that which they were one vnto another might well allow. Who fo had seene the familiarities of this Sister with her Brother, would not haue beleueed that they had made loue, the law of Nature being of greater force then reason, or truth it selfe. In the meane time this fury proued Adultery and Incest, making the wife to abandon the company of her husband, to cleaue vnto her brother, who forgetting nothing that might befall or done to couer his crime, and to auoide punishment, wandered vp and downe the country with her vnder disguised names, but carying still in his conscience the sting and vuluer of fo execrable a pleasure. She grew big with child, and beleueing that in hiding her great belly, her offence should be also hidden, she caused her selfe to be conducted into that great forest of Paris, where she continued with her brother the exercises of Cupid and Phycus. The Fig leaues could not couer their shame. The All-seeing eye of the diuine Iullice discouers them, and will not suffer that so infamous lust should continue. These violent fireames being run out, the mud and filth that was in the bottome appeared presently. The husband oppressed with so iust a griefe (as the Law doth not hold him punishable, whom it forceth to kill, the wife being surprisid in adultery) came to Paris, and discovered those which had deprived him both of rest and honor; he caught them to be apprehended and committed prisoners, the one in the great Chasteler, the other in Four l'Eueque. The Sister confesteth her selfe guilty of adultery, to free her brother from Incest, laying the child to one that was altogether innocent. Vpon the difficulty of proofes, the Lieutenant Criminal condemned them both to the rack. He might well haue proceeded to sentence.

But considering that they must deliberate well, before they iudge of the life of a man which is not made without care, he desired rather to proceede cololy therein, then ouer boldly. The husband, whose heart could not be moued to pittie, by the consideration of his two children, appeales from this sentence of the Racke. The Court considering that mildnesse doth nourish, and giues more scope to vice, declares the appellation and sentence from the which he had appealed, to be voided, and amending it, they iudge the accused sufficiently conuicted of the crimes of adultery and incest, for satisfaction whereof they condemne them to lose their heads. The King, during the Proceffe, was often sued vnto for their pardon. But considering, that in such crimes it were impiety to shew pittie: that mildnesse was severity and clemency cruell; and that the most holy and the most iust of his Predecessors, reuoked a pardon which he had giuen to a malefactor, falling vpon that verse of the Prophet Dauid in his prater booke: Doe iustice at all times, said; That he referred it to the iustice of his Court of Parliament. The father desired to change the infamy of the punishment into a death lesse shamefull, but longer and more cruell, the which the Emperour Otilius Macrinus vsed, causing such as were condemned for crimes, to be shut vp betwixt foure walls. He offered all his lands to procure his children that manner of punishment. This could not be, for that by the doome of the iudgment, the

of the priuie
condemned.
The Constable of Castille pattise.

A the execution was to be done at the Greue, where it moued pittie and compassion in many, lamenting the youth of the brother, the beauty of the sister, and the misery & blindness of them both. Theyeare ended in peace, as it had begun in pleasures and sports, there was no new occasion offered but the passage of the Constable of Castille to go into England, for the conclusion of the Treaty of Peace betwixt the Kings of England and Spaine. The King aduertised of his passage by Bourdeaux, sent to the Marshall d'Ornano to receive him, the which he did, going to meet him with a great number of Noblemen and Gentlemen of the Country. The Emperour Charles the fifth, passing through France, admired the great and goodly traines of Gouvernours of Provinces, which came to receive him, commending them very much.

The Constable of Castille (full of his Spanish fumes) made no great account thereof, and received these honours after a Spanish manner. The Marshall d'Ornano entertaining him with the singularityes of this Realme, told him: That he should see a country, yea a world, in seeing Paris. He answered him; That hee had left behinde his backe the goodliest Cities of Christendome. But they are not so great nor so well peopled, said the Marshall d'Ornano. The people, answered the Constable, add nothing to the excellency of Cities, although it helpe something for the strength of the State. The Marshall asked him, If he would not see the King. He shewed by his answer, That hee was not greatly curious, yet must hee see him, with the respect that was due to that Maiesty. Hee came to Paris with a great traine. The King of Spaine, spares no cost on such occasions, and thinks no expences more royall, then those which make his gold to glister in the eies of strangers. Inlike sort, his Ministers and Ambassadors seeing themselves so well followed and serued, take delight in shewing the greatnesse of their Master, and are not silent when they must publish his power. Mendoza who neuer went out of his lodging but on horse backe, in Litter, or in Carrosse, with all his traine, although it were but to goe to the Church, the which was very neare his lodging, he neuer spake three words, but two was for the greatnesse of his Master, saying often, That God was mighty in heauen, and the King of Spaine on earth. Another going out of Rome to accompany the Pope, went with six Litters, six Carrosses, every one hauing six horses, two hundred Groomes, and threescore Carts for baggage, and all for a small journey. The Prince of Parmas traine was admirable and royall, shewing by his equipage the greatnesse of his Master whom he serued. The Constable of Castille did not hide it, neither in his words nor in his traine, hee had alwaies some words of ostentation to shew it.

He went to the Louvre and did see the King in his Cabinet, he entred with a good grace, but stately and proud, the which was suddenly conuerted into great humility, for approaching neare vnto his Maiesty (who was sitting in a Chaire) he kneeled vpon one knee, and continued so a little longer then he thought. The King tooke him vp, embraced him, and shewed him a very good countenance. Hee spake much to assure him that the King of Spaine held nothing more deare, then the preferuation of the peace; and vnto that time should greatly force his will, hee had no other power but to continue it in this resolution, and to bring forth fruits of great loue and friendship, the which is firme and constant betwixt equal powers. Hee heard from the King words of the same affection: then hee tooke his leaue to goe see the Queene. Going downe to crosse the Court, where he was attended by his people with forty torches of white wax, hee said to some of his Company; That the King had receiued him with the Maiesty of a King, and had embraced him as his Kingman.

Hauing done his duty vnto the Queene, he demanded leaue to goe and see the Dauphin. The King caused him to be conducted the next day to S. Germaine. Being arriued there, they gaue notice to his Gouvernesse, that the Constable was there with a great Trainee of Spaniards. At that word of Spaniards, the little Prince opened his eyes, and makes them speake it againe. They be Spaniards that come to see you; Spaniards, said the Prince, say, say, giue me my Sword. Who fo had not knowne that this word came from his owne motion, would haue thought that they had printed in his fantasie the same opinion which King Charles the 7, Lewis the 11, and Charles the 8 had had in their infancie of the English and Bourguignons. And if the Spaniards had heard him, the strangenesse of such a word would haue caused them to apprehend new worke, and to feare and beleue that which the French souldier faith, That they must present Milan for the

the first attempt of this young Eaglet. The Constable admired his constant eye, and his Physiognomy, and was amazed at so great a boldness in that age, and so much judgment in that infancy. Monsieur the Dauphin told him tales in his language, and according to his understanding, as Alexander did to the Ambassadors of Persia. All the Spaniards did maue, and the more, for that the doore was open for the least of the traine. They see about him a goodly company of young Noblemen, Alexander Monsieur, the Prince of Longueville, and the three Sons of the Duke of Elspenon. The Constable of Castille past on to goe into Flanders, he came to Bruxelles, and descended at the Archdukes Palace, where he was well received, and from thence he past into England.

Although the Subiect ought not to reckon the yeeres of his Prince, but to wish him a long and prosperous life, yet we must say, that with the end of the last year, the King began the four and fiftieth yeare of his age, a yeare which Calb held to bee ripe and well advanced, whereunto few Kings of France attained, and yet it hath nothing abated the vigor and strength of this Prince, who is active and disposed, and as lively as he was at the age of thirty yeares. Cares and yeares hauing onely made his beard white, it is true, that now he begins to feeble some flux of the gout. A discale which breeds with ease, and which comes to Princes rather by excess, then by trauell in their youth, and which is sooner gotten by the chase of Venus, then by that of Diana, there being no pleasure in the world which doth not carry some displeasure behind it. The best course is to repent the euill before they commit it, that is to say, to haue onely intended it, and the meanes to grow old, is neither to doe nor to care any thing through voluptuousnesse. A great condition or quality to whom all things are lawfull that please, will finde this rule of gouernment very hard. Great men commit great excess, and in the end they tast the fruits which they haue sowne. It is reason that after a time infirmities should cease, and cleare the troubles of their soules, as thunder and lightning doth purge the ayre, that diseases (as fore-runners of death, and porters of the prison wherein they are inclosed) should teach them that they are men, and subiect to humane miseries, that they are not raised vpon the Clouds, to be free from a world of miseries that are dispersed vpon the earth, and that they should remember that the more their delights abound, the more their strength decays, and that he that doth least, doth least harme, and passeth the daies of his life with more content and lesse grieve.

The King would not complaine much of that little touch of the gout, for that it had beene but gentle, and when that after his recovery, the Courtiers did see him to weare furred boots, they said, It was more to hold the grieve in some reputation, then for any need he had. He did a publike act which hath particularities worthy to be knowne. I doe not forget these occasions, for that they supply the discourse of this History, without the which it should be constrained to seeke for matter far without the Realme: for secret things, and which are treated of in the Councell of the Cabinet, we must attend the knowledge thereof by the euent, which time shall discouer, and not trouble our selues to seeke out the Springs of Nilus. A father, how great and how powerfull foucer, cannot thinke too soone nor too often, to breed vpon the youth of his Child in vertue, nor to assure his fortune: I say a Child without distinction: for although the law doth distinguish Bastards from them that are lawfully begotten, yet Nature makes no difference. The King hauing determined to make Alexander Monsieur (his bafe son) of the order of the Knights of Malta, resolved to do it in time, that he might receiue the name & the effect. The great Master reputing it an honour to haue a Prince of their company, issued from so valiant and courageous a Race, sent all necessary expeditions. The King hauing receiued them, would haue the execution to be accompanied with a sumptuous and a stately ceremony. He caused the great Commander of France, & that of Champagne to come to Paris, & commanded them to call the greatest number of Commanders and Knights they could find: The King had chosen the Augustines Church for this effect, but the Commander of Ville-Dieu (being Ambassador of their Order) beseeched him, that it might be in that of their Temple, as one of the chiefe houses of the Order. On the Sunday morning the King and the Queene went in one Carosse, hauing Alexander Monsieur betwixt them, who was deliuered by the King vnto the grand Prior, who attended him at the first gate with all the Commanders and Knights. As the church was hung with the richest Tapistry that could be found, so was it filled with that which was of greatest worth in Paris. The

A Princes, the Princeesses, the Cardinall of Gondy, the Popes Nuncio, many Bishops, the Ambassadors of Spaine and Venice, the Constable, the Chancellor, the seven Presidents of the Parliament, and the Knights of the order of the Holy Ghost. The ceremony began by the blessing of the Sword, and by the change of his habits, to let the Knight vnderstand, that he did bind himselfe to change his life, and to take vpon him the true ornaments of vertue, without the which all the pompe & felicity of the world is but winde and vanity: for being attired with white Satin, laid thicke with gold Lace, the sleeves whereof were garnished with rich Medailles, a Carcanet of stones crosse vnder his arme, a blacke velvet Cap, with a little white feather, and a band couered with great Pearles, he put on a Roabe of blacke Taffata, and was conducted nere vnto the great Altar, being accompanied with the Duke and Duchesse of Vendome, and followed by the Commander for the conduct of this ceremony. Saincte Foy Bishop of Neuers made him a little admonition of the greatnes and excellency of the order whereinto he entred. It is the first of Christendome, as that of the Germanes is the second. Of Calatraua the third, of S. Iaques in Spaine the fourth, of S. Mary de la Mercede in Arragon the fift, of Christ in Portugall the sixth, of Saint Lazare and S. Maurice in Sauoy the seuenth, of S. Stephen in Tuscane the eight. This exhortation ended, the Masse began, and after the Gospell, Alexander Monsieur presented himselfe vpon his knees before the Grand Prior of France, with a burning torch of white wax in his hand, to demand the Order. Hereat the King (who was set vnder a rich cloth of Estate of Purple Veluet embroidered, in the midst of the Quire) left his place, and coming nere to helpe him to answer, hee said aloud, That he left the ranke of a King, to doe the office of a Father. The Grand Prior gaue him the Order after the accustomed manner, and after Masse was done, as a new Knight he presented himselfe the second time to make profession. The King advanced againe, and promised for him, that coming nere to the age of sixteen yeares, he should make the vovues and profession perfect. They be the same vovues which religious men doe make, Obedience, Pouerty, and Chastity. He did his obedience in the same place, and then being disrobed, the Grand Prior set vpon his breast a plastron of blacke Satin, with a great white Crosse, and so the Ceremony ended with great joy and sounding of Trumpets. The new Knight feasted the Grand Priors of France and Champagne, with the Commanders and Knights at the Temple, and the King went to dine with Zamet.

This Order hath alwaies affected two sorts of Knights, some for seruice, and others for honour, and both for the greatnes, defence, and support of the Order. There haue bene Children of the greatest and mightiest houses of Christendome, who although they do no seruice in effect, (being dispensed withall) yet they profit their profession much, by the entertainment and communication of friendships and respects of their houses, to the common good of the Order. Others that are issued from the noblest Families of all the Nations of the world, are bound vnto actual seruice in the Iland, they haue all the Mediterranean Sea for the bounds of their exercise, and all the world for witnesses of their glory. After that they haue done the seruice which they owe vnto the Order, they cannot grow old in pouerty, and in this assurance they goe more willingly vnto all occasions that demand a proofe of their valour, being reasonable to hazard themselves in great enterprises, to merit great recompences.

Let vs passe to the Duke of Lorraines Court, which we shall finde all in teares and mourning, for the death of the Lady Catherine of Bourbon, Duchesse of Barre, and the Kings onely Sister, shee had bene tormented with a continuall Feuer, and there were some signes of being with Child. All the Physicians said she was not with Child, onely maintained the contrary, and she beleegued his opinion, for that he was of the religion, neither would she take any thing but from his hands, for that he beleue that easily which we desire. She grew in choller against them which impured her disease to any other cause, saying: That they neither desired her contentment nor her husbands. She thought she could not endure too much to become a mother. This beleefe that she had a child in her body, made her to bring forth death, rejecting all kinds of remedies to preferre her fruit. If the Physician which administered to her as to a woman with child, had not fled to Metz, and from thence to Sedan, all his physike could not haue kept him from death. The profession of Physicians hath this priuiledge, that the Sunne sees their practice, and the earth hides their faults.

The Duke of Lorraine did her no lesse honour after her death, then he had witnessed A in her life. He sent vnto the King an Inuentory of her Jewells. He caused the body to bee conducted vnto the Frontier of France, in a Carosse well appointed, couered with black Veluet, and drawne with foure horses, the foure Bailiffes of Lorraine caried the four corners of the cloth which couered the Coffin: three score Gentlemen marched before with the Guards. The Earle of Chaligny and some Noblemen of the Country went after it. There were twelue Swisses which marched on either side. It was receiued on the frontier by those whom the King had appointed. The Inhabitants of Troyes would haue recieued it with a Canopy, but intelle thought it not fit, neither would the King haue taken it well. She was much lamented by the Duke of Bar, who could not haue bene B husband to a better wife, nor the wife to a better husband. The fifth yeare of their marriage was with as great respect and loue as the first. The affections of this Prince and this Princeesse were in such harmony, that besides the diuersity of religion, you would haue said they were but one soule, not in two bodies, but in one called by two names: for they spake with one mouth, and thought with one heart. And if there bee any content in dying, amidst the contents of this world, this Princeesse protested, That she had neuer content in this world more perfect then in Lorraine. The Duke of Lorraine and the D. of Bar, desired as well to see her satisfied for doubts of Religion. They conured her in the extremity of her sickness to thinke of her soules health, but she said vnto them, That she would dye as she had liued. Shee was no more forced in the exercise of her Religion C at Nancy then at Nerae. True it is, that she went to receiue the Communion without the towne, and had preaching and praiers in her house, but for her selfe onely and her followers, without the which shee had bene much honoured by the Lorraines, and at that time more then before, the Pope hauing granted a dispensation of the marriage. When the newes of her death was brought vnto the King, the chiefe of his Councell came presently to apply some remedy to this wound. He found that they came to that end, and therefore he commanded them to leaue him alone, and that he would resolute with God. He caused the doores and windowes of his Cabinet to be shut, casting himselfe vpon his bed, to weepe more freely, and to ease his griefe in the liberty of his sighs. D All the Court did mourne, and the Ambassadors presented themselves in that habit vnto the King, to condole this death in the behalfe of their Masters. The Popes Nuncio was somewhat troubled in this complement, and would not mourne at an accident, for the which those of his profession could not weepe. The King said, That he would not tye him to it against his liking, but he would be glad not to see him vntill his time of mourning were past. Some other would not haue spoken so mildly: and we know that Princes haue shewne strange effects of their choller, against Ambassadors that haue failed in the honour and respect of these complements. The Nuncio being better aduised, resolu- ed to apply himselfe to the time, and to doe as the rest, thinking it would not bee taken ill at Rome, knowing that he did it onely to please the King, and to haue audience. But he had some difficulty to decypher himselfe when he was to speake vnto the King; for he could not vnder one habit play two contrary personages, neither had hee words in his mouth, nor teares in his eyes for this sort. He that will ease anothers griefe, must shew, that he hath a part and feeling thereof. He went after another manner, and his spirit did fit him with another kind of complement, the which although it were free, yet was it not vnpleasing. He said vnto the King, That such as knew what he was, & in whose name he spake, would wonder at the office which he did, but he had more occasion then any other, for that all lamented the losse of the body, but his Master, the losse of the soule. The King said vnto him, That he beleued his Sister was saved, for that in the last gaspe an extreame griefe might cary her right into heauen: the Nuncio replied, My Lord, that discourse is more Metaphysicall then Physicall, and to they both entred into other talke. F

The King of Spaine and the Archdukes had the yeere before set an imposition of thirty for the hundred, vpon all merchandize that should come in or go out of their dominions. This was secretly to forbid the French to traffike into their countries, & openly to break the Treaty of Veruins. This Imposition did very much trouble, and in a manner put all our Townes which traffike commonly into Spaine and Flanders, into a mutiny. The King could not in the beginning perfwade himselfe, that they would tye his subjects to the obsecration of this charge, commanding his Ambassadors which resided with those

A those Princes, to expostulate the matter, and to aduertise him thereof. Their answers, and the rigor they vsed afterwards to his Maiesties subjects to make them pay the Imposition, did witness sufficiently that they would not exempt them. To obferue some equality in the entercourse of publike trafficke betwixt the subjects of the three Princes, the King imposed the like custome vpon all Merchandize, that should come out of the Dominions of the King of Spaine, and of the Arch-dukes into France, and vpon those which should be transported out of France into their Countries. These burthenome impositions, the rigours wherewith they were exacted, the abuse and deceipts which were committed in receiving thereof, could not induce the two brother-in-lawes to make the trafficke free as it ought to be betwixt good neighbours, which desire to enioy the fruits of peace which God hath giuen them, as the King protested he would doe, by his declaration, and had alwaies shewed it by the effects.

The French King moued did the like.

So to redeme his subjects from the losses and vexations which they receiued by this Imposition, the King by the aduice of his Councell, did forbid all his subjects in generall, to transport any kind of Merchandize, without exception, vnto any place vnder the obedience of the King of Spaine, and the Arch-dukes in Flanders; and the entry into his Realme, of all those that might come out of their Countries and Estates. And to the end that the effect of his intentions might not be made frustrate, to the contempt of his ordinances, by such as might lade Merchandize in France, and afterwards cause them to be transported into the said Princes countries, he ordained that all strangers, subjects to other Princes and Common-weales, to whom he allowed free trafficke into his Realme, before they should depart from those places where they had laden the Merchandize which they meant to transport, should giue in good and sufficient caution before the Officers of the Port, to bring backe within a certaine time prefixed, a certificate from the Officers and Magistrates of those places, whither they pretended to cary the said Merchandize, by the which it might truly appeare, that they had bene discharged there: and if it should bee afterwards verified, that they had bene laden againe, and caried to any forbidden places, the Sureties should bee answerable. And it should bee lawfull for the Kings Iudges and Officers to commence sute against them and their posteritie.

Traffick into Spaine and Flanders forbidden.

The Merchants of the coast Towne produced many great reasons to moue him to take away this Imposi- but his Maiesty did oppose others that were more important the which made him obstinate in this defence. He himselfe receiued the greatest preiudice, for his farmes were much diminished. But he desired in this point as in all other, to doe the office of a good father to his people, and rather suffer this losse for himselfe, then to see an infinit number of families to fall into ineuitable ruine, by Bankrupts which these insupportable Impositions would make.

Desire and hope of gaine, would make Merchants to sle through fire, if there were no other passage, rather then to lose any occasion of profit: yet notwithstanding many did by the meanes of Strangers traffike into forbidden places. Neither is there any Decree which couetousnesse, and the Trechery of Officers wil not violate: wherefore the King did by a second defence adde corporal punishment, with confiscation of Merchandize against them that should infringe it, their fauourers, counsellors, or abettors, and giuing the moiety thereof vnto the informers: enioyning the Merchant which should haue any Merchandize in the Sea-ports, and frontire Townes, to cause them to be marked and inrolled by his Officers, to auoide the abuse and fraud which might be committed against his intention: whereunto the corporal punishment of some forced others to obey.

Some thought that these bitter proceedings should soone alter the peace of Veruins: yet it continued and remained firme and irremovable: neither was there any breach, but some complaints which the two Kings made one of another. King Philip began, being offended, that the French going voluntarily to serue the Estates, prolonged their Rebellion and delayed the reduction of Ostend: That the King did succor them with money and men, with other necessaries belonging to warre, and that he had forbidden his Subjects to traffike into Spaine and Flanders. But it is impossible for Princes to impose such strong threats vnto their subjects, but they will passe them to conuey themselves into forraigne Countries, and it is sufficient satisfaction, that they disanow such a dispence with themselves to goe and serue another without leaue, as the King did them which went to serue the Estates. lent him, and did pay by retayle the grosse which hee had receiued in his necessity. As A for the defence of trafficke, it tended to no other end, but to force the King of Spaine and the Archduke, to discharge that intolerable Imposition, and to make him know that France can better liue without the commodities of Spaine, then Spaine without those of France.

The King for his part complained, but with Iustice and Reason. For (sayd hee) I impart my designes to very few men, and yet they are presently discovered to my enemies. The King of Spaine will he neuer leaue to corrupt the fidelity of my subiects? will he alwaies entertaine some traitor within my Realme? my Ambassador complains vnto me by his letters, that he is so ill informed of affaires, and so late, that the King of Spaines Ministers know of them before him. As his Maiesty was much troubled to know from what Spring did rise this pestilent liquor of Trechery, behold, God doth lay open the iniquity of Indas, by means which humane wisdom could not foresee. Villeroy (that great French Oracle, who deliueurs the answers of the affaires of the Realme, who knows the most secret, and doth manage the greatest) was serued by one Nicholas Losse borne at Orleans, and with the more confidence, for that his father had spent most of his yeares in his seruice. La Rocheport going to reside Ambassadour in Spaine, Losse desired to bee entertained by him, and to serue him as a Secretary, and to fashion himselfe to affaires. The recommendation of Villeroy gaue him an easie access, by the which in few moneths he made himselfe so capable both for the language and fashion of the Countrey, as he might well be taken for a naturall Spaniard. The Ambassador hauing sworn the Treaty of Veuins in the name of the most Christian King, the King of Spaine presented him with a rich chaine of Stones, and with six others of gold of an hundred and fifty crownes apiece, to honor so many of his chiefe Followers. The pride and presumption of this young man made him thinke he should be of this number, seeing that a companion of his had bene found worthy, and his master did not thinke that his youth and small experience, did so soone merit to be placed in the first ranks of his seruice.

As the Humors of Bodies that are altered, doe insensibly peruert the health: So the deuill insinuates into the hearts of men, if they giue him any little entrance. Enuy and Icalousie were the windowes by the which hee slipped into the soule of Losse. Vanity, Lying, Pride, Luxury, and excesse of youth gaue him full entry. Hee had spent all his money to purchase the loue of a Curtizan, and saw no great meane how he should bee able to furnish this great expence of luxury, the which notwithstanding he would not giue ouer. His Masters disdain had made him mad, but he knew the secrets of his cabinet, and discouering them to the King of Spaines Ministers, he giues two strokes with one stone, he is reuenged of this contempt, and preuented the shame which followed him, not to be able to continue his amorous bounty. With this designe he makes himselfe known to Don Francisco, one of the Secretaries of the State, and shewes him the consideration for the which he is resolu'd to giue certaine proofes of the seruice which hee had long vow'd vnto the Catholike King, the which hee could easily performe, hauing the charge of the dispatches which the French Ambassador receiued and sent vnto the King his master. Don Francisco heares this proposition, as coming from a young man whose brain was not so well settled, as it did merit much credit; or it may be abhorring the trechery of this bad seruant, who held him like vnto himselfe. The Catholike King sayd he (but coldly) hath so good correspondency with the French King, as he desireth not to know of his affaires, but so farre as his Ambassador shall informe him. Losse yeelds not at this repulse. He knows that mens spirits being diuers may produce diuers aduices, and beleues that some other will lend him his eare with more attention, and his heart with more affection. Talaeques another Secretary of Estate, considering how much it did import a Prince, to know his neighbours secrets: That by reason of State they must buy them with Gold that can reueale them, and must try all meanes to effect it: That the contempt of so rare an encounter will be against his masters seruice, and the duty of his charge: he gaue eare to the reasons of this Traitor, and tasted them: he exhorted him to persist in this good affection, which he shewed to procure the contentment and seruice of the Catholike King: hee promised to make the report vnto the King his master, and giues him his word that this affection of his should be rewarded with a bountifull recompence.

A with the Duke of Lerma, whom lately they called Marquis of Denia. He shewes him the Alphabet of Cipher, by the which the Ambassador his Master did write vnto the King. And for a proofe he deciphered vnto the Secretary his Maiesties last dispatch. The Duke inuities him to continue to produce the effects, whereof he had giuen him his word: Hee causeth twelue hundred Crownes to be deliuered him as an earnest peny of the bargain, by the which this Traitor sold both his Master and the King, and assures him of the like yearly Pension, and of so large a remuneration as hee should haue cause to extoll the bounty of Spaine. From henceforth the French Ambassador receiueeth not any dispatch, but the Councell of Spaine is duly informed thereof. But Rocheport being called home, as we haue said, it depriued this Traitor of all meanes to continue his Trafficke, and by consequence to merit the payment of the Conuentions which he had made and ratified. He must therefore discouer the secrets of the Councell in France, and finds meane to returne into his first masters seruice: But he was kept backe by a controuersie which Villeroy had with his mother, vpon some remainder of Accompts. Notwithstanding, hee was farre engaged in the affections of Spaine, and had rather beare this losse out of the portion which fell vpon him by his father, then to see himselfe by his mothers disgrace excluded from all entry into his fauour which he affected. The Ambassador also hauing at his instant suite giuen testimony of his fidelity and diligence, made his returne easie into his Masters Cabinet. Being thus restored, he becomes more subiect, more aduice, and more diligent, then all the rest: yea he offers to helpe his companions: but with a designe, that hauing also knowledge of the dispatches which passed through their hands, he might giue the better aduice to the Ministers of Spaine, and assure them of his deuotion to their seruice.

He did often visit and conferre with Taxu Ambassador for Spaine; and after his Ambassage ended, with Doctor Balthazar of Suniga his Successour, yea so slyly as the dispatches came sooner to the Councell of Spaine, then to Des Barreaux Ambassador for France, who aduertised the King, that when he propounded his Maiesties commandments to the Councell, he found them as well and sooner instructed then himselfe, neither could he discouer by what practice it came. It must be of necessity (said the King) that one D of my Councell hath great intelligences with him of Spaine, and yet I know not whom to suspect. The eternall Providence doth often draw very good effects from exceeding bad causes; as one nayle driues out another: so hee suffers that the wicked shall discouer the trecheries one of another. Losse had had secret conference with one Raffis, who had bene sometimes Secretary to Lausac, and a fugitiue into Spaine, for many disloyalties which had made him become a Pensioner to Spaine. But they had begun to shorten his pension since the treason of Fontenelles Gouvernor of Dornauent in Brirany, whereof he had bene one of the chiefe instruments: and as by the discouery of his treason, Raffis had no more meanes to serue the Councell of Spaine, so they held him for an vnprofitable mouth, and cut off his Pension. From that time hee receiued no other commoditie but a free access and vncontroleable admittance vnto some of the chiefe of the Councell, who notwithstanding did not looke on him with so chearfull an eye, as when they drew from him instructions conformable to their intentions.

Raffis finds himselfe now reduced to that extremity, as he is ready to fall into great poverty & misery, on the other side, he sees a goodly occasion offered to preuent it, and a great gate opened, not onely to returne into his Countrey, but also to merit an abolition of his fautes, with a notable recompence for so great a seruice which he might do vnto his naturall Prince. Hee therefore directeth himselfe to one in whom the Ambassador did much rely, and tels him how much hee is grieved to haue bene a dealer in the troubles and Rebellions of France, whereof hee did confesse, that God had alwayes shewed himselfe Protector against all assaylants: That he desired to deface the memory thereof, and to repair them by a notable seruice, which did very much import the King, France, and all Christendome. That although hee did little esteeme the hazard of his life, for so iust and holy a worke, yet would he not aduenture it, but with a generall abolition of that which made him guilty towards his Maiesty. This report made vnto the Ambassador, hee heares Raffis, who tels him in general termes, that the King is betrayed, that his designes and most secret affaires are discouered, but he would not name the Traitor, but vnto his Maiesty himselfe. That his pardon being come, hee will free himselfe both heart and body body from those which he hath sufficiently known to be sworn Enemies to the Realme. A The Ambassador doth aduertise the King hereof by a confident man. The King gives him authority to treat with Raffis. Hee could not verifie his accusation, but by two Letters written by Losse, to a great friend of his named Blas, a man of the same metall, the which he knew were in a box which Blas had, who lodged with him, for the getting of them they find meanes to send Blas vnto the Escuriall. In his absence, Raffis and Descardes the Ambassadors Secretary, breake the Boxe, and take out the Letters, by the which Losse did greatly extoll the bounty of the Spanish Ambassador, as exceeding the merit of his seruices. With this iustificacion, and the French Ambassadors dispatch, Raffis made them go vnto a Monastery neere vnto Madrill, there to passe the Feast of Palme Sunday, as he had bene accustomed to doe at solemne Feasts, being opposite to the way of France, to take away all suspition: but he came to Bayona with Descardes at a certaine day. Blas returned, the Feast-day being passed, his Boxe being opened, and the Company absent, made him thinke what it was. The King of Spaines Ministers are presently aduertised, who instantly dispatched two Carriers to the Ambassador, to let him know that there was one gone, who without doubt would discouer the intelligences & practises of Losse. That he should haue a care of his safety, that being not able to be auerred but by his mouth, he should be instructed (if he were taken) religiously to obserue the lawes of Silence.

Descardes and Raffis being come to Paris vpon Easter Tuesday, they shewed a great fidelity, but not so much discretion as a businesse of that importance did require, Villeroi C went the same day to lye at his house, to be the next day at Fontainebleau, where the court was. And hauing met them at Luvill, they did accompany him vnto Villeroi, but did not aduertise him on the way of the cause of their coming, nor speake of the treachery of his man, but in deliuering their dispatch at his arriual. Without doubt hee would haue neglected all other affaires, to assure himselfe of his traitor, who then finished his deuotion at the Charter-houise Convent.

The next day he doth earlly acquaint the King with the coming of Raffis, and the detestable and vnexpected Treason of an vngratefull wretch, whose father and himselfe had neuer had better fortune but in his house. As he returns to his lodging, hee vnderstands that two Spanish Carriers are come to the Post-houise. He commands one of the Deputies of the Poste to carry them into a Chamber, and that no man might speak with them: and to Descardes to watch for the coming of Losse, and not abandon him but presently to aduertise him thereof. But both the Deputie and Descardes doe commit a great error: for Losse being come in Post about Noone, this vnadvised Deputie tells him, that there were two Posts come out of Spaine, who inquired of him, and had letters for him: and to adde more to his indiscretion, hee suffers him to goe vp to their Chamber, and to see them. Hauing saluted them, one of them told him in his care, that hee was vndone vnlesse hee fled, and that Raffis had discovered him. Terror, amazement, his conscience (whereof he could not suffer the testimonie) and the horror of the iust punishment of his wickednesse, doe easily perswade this wretch to fly, whom the Furies of hell doe violently pursue. Yet he assures his countenance as well as he could. Hee goes out with an intent to take horse, and to recover some place of safety. Descardes and Raffis find it. Descardes salutes him; who (it may be) thinking himselfe sufficient to giue an accompt of his person, was not curious to aduertise Villeroi, who was then in his Cabiner with the Bishop of Chartres. The presence of Descardes was troublesome to Losse: to be rid of him, he said, he would go to his master who attended him. Descardes offers to accompany him: he then pretended that hee had not dined, and thinking they had done at the lodging, he would seeke it in a Tauerne. Neither haue I (sayd the other) we will dine together. Finding Descardes to follow him in this manner, hee seeks another euasion. I am weary (said he) my Bootes trouble me: Descardes adds, that hee desired to drink with him, and that he would be better after dinner. Thus discoursing together, they entred into Villerois lodging. Descardes leaves him in the chamber, being ignorant that the Carriers had spoken with him, and draws neere vnto the Cabiner, thinking that he had brought him into the snare. But when as he found himselfe free, he goes downe into the Stable, where finding his horse saddled, he flies directly to Paris. Villeroi is in the meane time aduertised that his man is come, he commands that hee should enter: but they finde him not, nor his horse in the Stable, neither can they coniecture which way he is gone.

Losse escapes
and is pursued.

Villeroi aduertiseth his Maiesty of his escape: and they send out of all sides to follow him. Losse coming to Paris about nine of the clocke at night, he went to take counsell of the Spanish Ambassador, and before the breake of day he departed disguised like a Spaniard, with the Ambassadors Steward to conduct him, taking the way to Meaux to recouer Luxembourg in profile. To encourage all men to seeke after this traitor, it was giuen out, that one of Villerois Secretaries had attempted against his Maiesties person. They described his stature, his age, his apparrell, and his horse. The Prouosts of Marshalls went to field. They had forbidden all Poste-masters to giue any horses. But hee of Meaux had notice giuen too late, he was already on horse-backe. But when he began to gallop, his horse falling, B gaue his rider a heauy peflage of some occurrent ill. Being re-mounted, hee seemed so amazed, as the Guide thought hee had committed some wicked act, for the which he fled. He aduertised his master thereof at his returne, who remembering the defence which had bene made, presumed that this was he which was in question. Hee presently went to the Prouost Marshall, who prepared to pursue him. Passing the Riuer of Marne, the Prouost learns that hee could not bee farre from the first Poste: and coming to the second Boat neere vnto La Ferte vnder Iouarre, hee findes that hee was then passing the riuer: but the force and feare which those Runaways offered vnto the Fermien, preyaued more then the Prouosts commandements and threats. Being past, they thought their Poste-horses would be presently ouer-taken by the great horses which C they imagined to be at their backes, who leauing their Guide, commit their safety to the swiftnesse of their feet, during the darknesse of the night, through the thick bushes which did grow vpon the banks of Marne. The Prouost disperseth his Archers, makes fires in the field, and sets the Country-men to search. The Spaniard got away: Losse went creeping from bush to bush, so terrified with the apprehension of Iustice which he could not auoid, as hearing the Prouost and his men beating the bushes with their swords, hee desired rather to free his body from the feeling of the punishment which his treason had deserued, and to abandon his soule to the iudgement of God. At the breake of day his hat being seene betwixt two posts whereas the current of the water had stayed it, made them presume that the carcase was not farre off. He was found there by the Abbesse of Iouarre men D who (as Lady of the Iustice of that place) required that the processe might be instructed and made by her Officers. The Prouost of Paris and hee of the Kings house did also consent to haue knowledge thereof. In the end it was renoued and retained in the Parliament by a decree made the 10 of May: the body was drawne from the Chaflet (where they had exposed it to ignominie, according to the custome in such actions) and caried to the prison of the Conciergiere, and the 15 day following, was layd vpon a hurdle & dragged into the Greue, and drawne in sunder with foure horses, and his quarters set vpon foure wheeles at the chiefe approaches of Paris. A worthy reward of an vnworthy Treacherie, which he deserued, if the eternall Prouidence had not otherwise disposed, that he should haue bene sensible of those torments, whose desperate death was happy for E those which could not hope for any health, if any other more pittifull end had giuen him meanes to discouer their practises. This was very displeasing vnto the King, for that this wretch had smothered with his life, that which might haue giuen him light in many things importing his seruice, but exceeding griuous vnto Villeroi, for that the full knowledge of the Traytors designs, and of the wickednesse of his Confederates was forbidden: moreover, that hauing bred him vp, and bound him by the effects of his fauour and loue, hee was so sensible of the ingratitude and treachery of this monster, as hee could neither ease nor sleepe. Besides, as the greatest dignities are most subiect to enuy and slander, hee did foresee that his enemies would take occasion to taxe his loyalty, to blemish his reputation, and if they could, to ruine his fortune. Yet hee had this great consolation, F that although hee held the estate of this Realme as it were in his hand, the King knows that he doth not breathe any thing, but what is of his seruice. His Maiesty visiting him to confirme him in this consolation, would haue the world know, that he hath alwaies caried the marke of a good seruant, and the integrity of his conscience did serue him as an inextinguishable rampart against all his ill-willers.

Soone after, the King discouered a new practice against his seruice, and the Dauphins. The windes are inuisible, but they that blow them to gather these clouds together were well knowne, and from what coast they came. They were but sparkes of fire, as soone quenched quenched as kindled. The King did write vnto some of his chiefe and principall seruants A in these termes: You must take it for a good signe, that you heare so seldome from me by letter, for it is a signe that all is well, God be thanked, as well for my person, as for my affaires. The Spaniards would willingly haue more matter and oftner, for they cannot desist from their ordinary practices to corrupt my seruants. I haue of late discovered some new designe, in the which my Nephew the Count of Auvergne and the Seigneur of Entragues are named, the which they haue willingly aduowed and confessed. But I haue taken for good an order as no inconuenience shall happen.

Creating of new Cardinals.

The ninth of Iune, the Pope created eightene Cardinalls, not according to the passion of great Princes that had intreated him, nor to the liking of his kins-men, knowing that his Predecessors had conferred those dignities vpon vnworthy persons, set Scarlet Hat vpon heads without vnderstanding, and giuen Pasquin occasion to complaine, that some approached neere to Saint Peters Chaire that were more stones, and had lesse braines then he had: The King had recommended many great Prelates of France to be remembered at the first promotion, to supply their places that were dead. Among them that were newly created, there were two French & two Spaniards. The Spanish Ambassador made great instance to haue more, and not to haue his Master equalled by the French King. The first in the list was Seraphin Olinari Patriarke of Alexandria, by race an Italian, but borne at Lions, one of the most iudicious Prelates of his age: only vertue advanced him to this dignity, and the King made great instance for him by Bethunes his Ambassador. C James Day Bishop of Eureux receiued the like Honour by the Kings recommendations. His seruices in reconciling the King with the Pope, his learned Writings, and his knowledge in Diuinity, did worthily purchase him this honour. The rest were all Italians except Bernard Maizetion Bishop of Cracovia a Polonian. Cardinal Aluobrand did also advance Hermínio his Secretary to this honour, of whom there is so much spoken in the discourse of the Warres of Sauioy. Anselme Marzat a Capuchin of Monopoli was forcibly drawne into the number by the Popes expresse commandement, hauing once refused this dignity, and professing with teares of the iniurie that was done vnto Saint Francis and the strict rules of his Order. Of all the eightene that were made Cardinalls, D there was not any but this Capuchin but did affect it, and many others that did expect it were disappointed. There was some teare left the controuersie betwixt the Count of Fuentes and the Grisons should draw a ciuill Warre into Italy, vnder the pretext of Religion. The reason of this trouble grew, for that he would force the Grisons to breake the alliance they had made the last yeare with the Vencians, and to make that which they had with France fruitlesse. The King aduertised of these practices, commanded De Vic his Ambassador to goe vnto Coire, and to represent vnto that people the wrong they should doe vnto their reputations in forsaking their faith and obseruation of their Treaties. Out of the discourse which De Vic did vnto them, to perswade them to the keeping of their word, these points were collected of the inuolable firmnesse of their word and oath. There must be many acts of vertue to purchase and maintaine a great and good reputation, one only action to the contrary doth ouerthrow it, and smoothers the remembrance thereof. It is gotten by many commendable and vertuous actions, but that which proceeds from constancy and generosity in the obseruation of promises, is so much the more commendable, for that it is grounded vpon Faith and Religion, which bee the two pillars that doe assure and maintaine Estates.

Troubles betwixt the Grisons and the Count of Fuentes.

De Vics discourse vnto
the Grisons.

Religion one of the pillars of a State.

The Ancients haue said that Faith was the Foundation of Iustice, the honour of Heauen and Earth, without the which the world could not continue in peace, and they erected her Altar neere vnto that of thundring Iupiter, to shew that God is the Rewerger of the breach of Faith. And Religion is so proper to Man, and to the society of Men, that as Man cannot be Man without it, so there is no Nation how barbarous soeuer, that liues without some shadow of Religion. As they haue the best part of essence and the solemnitie of Alliances and confederations, in the which God is called on as a witnesse and Iudge of their intentions that doe promise and binde themselves; so is hee greatly wronged in the breach of promises. And therefore the commendations that are giuen to many Nations are held vaine and ridiculous, being separated from this constant and immutable affection of keeping their faith. As the Greekes haue beene commended for many actions of Valour and Vertue, the which notwithstanding vanish away shamefully, in

1604

A in the reproach which hath alwayes beene made vnto them, to deny their words easily, and neuer to binde themselves, but with an intent to hold. And contrariwise, the memory of the Faith and constancie of the Romanes is immortal, who abhorred the breach of promises, and held it an inexcusable crime to violate Treaties. It is not armes alone, but the constancie of Religion and their faith giuen, that had raised them to so great a power, as they held in their hands the Reynes of all the Prouinces of the habitable Earth. In the beginning, the neighbour people did not esteeme them as a City; but rather a campe of Thebes, a nest of Tyranny, and a Citadell in the midst of them, to trouble and practise all the furies of their ambition. But when as they vnderstood that Faith only and a simple path (all feare of punishment laid aside) did gouerne the Citie, they grew to such Reuerence and respect, as they held it a greater happinesse, to obey a people so generous in their actions, so constant in their words, and so religious in their oaths, then to command over others. The formes of the Common-weale of the Grisons haue great conformities with the politicke and militarie Lawes of the Romanes: and as it yeelds nothing vnto them in Valour and Generositie, so hath it alwayes preferred (like vnto them) the Religion of their word and promise, holding publique faith the Foundation and Ground-woke of Estates, as Treachery is the plague and ruine thereof. This sufficeth to shew how odious the perswasions or rather practices and Inclinations of those should bee, that counsell them to reuoke the Alliance, made and sworne with the Common-weale of C Venice.

ancient Rome.

Wee must cherish and respect the counsels and remedies of such as loue the sick Patient, but wee must suspect all things that come from the hand of a Neighbour that is an enemy; they minister nothing, how sweet so euer, which causeth not great motions and alterations in the body. His Hony is worse then that of Cholchos, which did not infect the heart, nor trouble the vnderstanding but for a day. In the distinction and choice of aduice, wee must preferre those that preserve Honour, and augment Posteritie, before those that dissolve the concord and quiet of an Estate. Those (saide a great Orator to the Athenians) are to bee credited that counsell to entertaine alliances with friends: for there is nothing more befitting a free City, then the care and loue of Equity and Iustice. Those D that by their policies and ruggenesse, would separate the Grisons from the alliance of their friends, haue happely some designs vpon their liberty, the which they cannot execute better then by cutting off the number of their friends, the which can neuer bee too great, how great and mighty soeuer they be: And if they haue not this designe, yet their counsell is alwayes vniust, seeing the effect concerns the shame and ignominie of this Nation, which cannot goe from the truth of their promises, vlesse they will bee generally taxed for treachery and basenesse. A reproach so much the more to be feared, being certain that as soone as a Common-weale hath giuen any subiect to doubt of her faith, the must inuent new formes of Religion to purchase credit with other Estates, and vnknewne people, to trust vnto their promises: for such as know the deceiuers, will auoid the deceit. And although among the corruptions of our age, sinning and dissembling bee esteemed vertues, and haue in the opinion of the vulgar, notable qualities and operations, yet among those that haue contained themselves within the bounds of ancient Integrity, and know not the policies and deceits of the new-comers, the people that are defamed for treachery and disloyalty lose all their friends.

And in the end this alliance hath beene sworne by the most solemnne acts of Religion. The name of the liuing God (who should not bee taken in vaine, and is polluted by the lightnesse of an oath) hath been called vpon. It is an extreme impiety, to make that Soueraine spirit, that Infinite, Immutable, and Incomprehensible Essence, who is all Iustice and all Truth, a witnesse of our basenesse and lying, that the Holinesse of his name should counter our dissembling; his Iustice, our wrong; his Truth, our deceit; and approue that which naturall reason cannot allow of. And this bond of faith giuen, is of such necessitie, as it must be kept euen with enemies, whereof that great Captaine Iulius hath left a memorable example, refusing to breake the Treatie which he had made with the Gabionites, Pagan Infidels: although he had discovered their Deceit, and was intreated by the chiefe of the army to lose their alliance. The answer he gaue them, was grounded vpon Reason, saying; That they had giuen them their faith, and that they must feare lest the fury of God (by whose name they had sworne) should come vpon them.

The great promises of the Count of Fuentes to the Grifons.

Refutation of the Grifons.

An alliance purchased did honorabie.

There was great difficulty to retaine these people inclining to change, vpon the huge and copious promises made them by the Count of Fuentes. They could not resolute in their Councils. The weight and burthen of will and hope caried them away. Hee would reduce them to extreame necessitie, taking from them the Commerce of Milan, without the which they could not live. The Grifons estate is meere popular, consisting of six and twenty Commonalties, the which are divided into three Cantons. It is a difficultie to finde any thing equall, constant, or well aduised among so many heads bred vp in the Maximes of a Democratic. The Count of Fuentes had debauched foure, who had like to haue corrupted and polluted the rest, as a little Leuaine marries a great lump of Dough. For they stucke onely vpon money, which the one demanded, and the other offered. Hee gaue so go od entertainment to the Ambassadors that came to him to Milan, as they passed as many Articles as hee pleased, applying themselves to his humour of Peace, which being dishonorable, is of worse condition for Free-men then Warre it selfe. But when at their returne they would haue drawne the people to allow thereof, the Ambassador of France arised so happily, as he let them vnderstand the preiudice and wrong that they did vnto themselves. So as the best aduised being informed of this surprize, rescolued not to stray from the obleration of the Alliances of France and Venice, nor to depend for their passages, vpon the aduice and command of the Count of Fuentes nor of his successors, as he had bound them by his Articles, presuming that he could defend with the sword, that which hee had gotten with Gold. True it is, that they made offer to enter into a new Capitulation of all that might bee without preiudice to their Alliances, to assure a good Neighbourhood with the State of Milan, so as the Count of Fuentes would demolish the Fort within fix moneths vpon their Frontier. The great Cantons of the Suisses were actors in this businesse, perswading the Grifons to trust rather to courage then to the safety of their Mountaines. Matters continued in great suspence. They sent often to Milan, and what was concluded there was dissolved in the Assembly of the people, by the friends of this Crowne, and by the wisdom of the Kings Ambassador, who said plainly that his Maiesty would leaue their Alliance, if they made not a Declaration that might content him. Those iudgements that were found and not preiudicate, found it reasonable, and in this reason the honour of their faith, and the reputation of their estate; as contrariwise they thought it could not bee an act of glory to sell their alliance, as it was not commendable for the Spaniards to buy it, if they were of the Romanes humour, who neuer fought that by gold, which they might doe by the sword. But against these apparant reasons, the Count of Fuentes had so many tricks and deuices, as the Ambassador of France had much adoe to retaine this people; who promised in words not to forsake the Alliance of France and Venice, doing the contrary in effect. In former times it was incredible that the Suisse, so great an enemy to the House of Austria, from whose subiectie they had revolted, and the Grifon so contrarie to the Spanish fashions, would incline that way, and contradict the very feeling of Reason and Nature. The Truth hath freed the doubt, and let vs see that it is of this people as of Vinegar, the which neuer freezeth for that it is extremely cold. The Suisses and Grifons (for that they are enemies to the Spaniards) will not haue the power of Spaine to be their enemy.

The bad successe of this busines did not concerne France and the Venecians alone; the best aduised did fore-see that it might draw a ciuill Warre into Italy, vnder the pretext of Religion. Many Commanders and Captaines Grifons, not able to endure the rigour and threats of the Count Fuentes, were solicited by them of their Beliefe and Religion (lurking in Italy) to hold good, and to attend vntill the Lord came from Edom to disperse their enemies, and to beleue that as there is no warre more glorious then that which is vnderaken to free their Countrey from seruitude, so there is none more iust then that which is made to deliuer Consciences from Tyranny, and that both in the one and the other occasion, it is a great happinesse and delectation to sacrifice their liues. The King sent aduice thereof to Rome for the consequence and danger of Religion. Hee did also pacifie the diuision of the people of Valais, who were in Armes, and ready to come to a generall combat for the same quarrell. In the meane time the Grifons remained betwixt the doubtfullnesse of Warre, and the discommodities of Peace, and as in the breeding of such Diuisions, free and curious spirits cannot retaine their passions, they made

A made Pasquins in Italy vpon this subiect, and the Spanish braueries were not mute, the which the Grifons answered with like humour. If the Venecians who were the cause of all the mischiefe, would haue spoken and set their hand to the worke as they ought, the Count of Fuentes (who did more by example then by any authoritie) would haue intreated the Grifons more mildly. But besides, that Common-weales are not good for an offensive Warre, these Seigneuries who would not hazard any thing, but preferre present and assured things before that which was past and perillous, would haue beene content to haue enjoyed that which they desired without any trouble.

There was a generall assembly held at Illant, at one of the corners of the Grifons, where after great diuersitie of opinions, it was concluded by the greater part, that (seeing the Ambassadors had through their auarice defamed their Legation, and siffered the Count of Fuentes to binde the liberty of their aduice with chaines of Gold, and had exceeded the instructions that were given them) the last Treatie made at Milan, should bee declared void, and of none effect, if the alliance of France and that of Venice were not expressly reserved. The Nobles of Spaine had wrought wonders, giuing motion to the most heauy, and speech vnto the dumbe, to fauour the Count of Fuentes inuentions, with a Nation that loues money beyond all measure. But in the end the consideration of their owne health, and the ruines of their liberty were of more force, making them to chooe the hazard of armes, and of all discommodities, rather then to suffer the fort which the Count of Fuentes had caused to be built, to stand vnrined. And for that (inceded with this resolution) he had made shew to seize vpon Valteline, they made a leauy of eighteene hundred men in six companies to oppose against him. The Kings intention was, that the Treaty of Milan should not alter the alliances of the Crowne of France and Venice. But if the Grifons should breake with the French, and dishonour their reputation with so foule a defection, the French had no great reason to regard it, seeing it were a losse but of inconstant friends, whose faith was ruined by the same meanes it was preferred. True it is, they should lose a goodly passage into Italy, but when they had any desire to go thither, it should not be by the Grifons. The French Armes were neuer led that way to passe the Alpes. It is true that when the Kings of France held Milan, this passage was necessary for them to draw in Suisses and Germanes for their seruice. But enioying this no more, they need not to care much to lose that which cost them so deare to maintaine. This was the beginning of the thirteenth yeare of Pope Clement the eight sitting in the pontifical chaire. In his youth a Mathematician told him, that he should be a Cardinall then Pope, and should sit in the seat twelue yeares. A Friar had told Leo the tenth as much (hauing faued himselfe in Mantoua after the battell of Rauenta) assuring him that he should be Pope, before he came to the age of forty yeares. A terme which made this prediction seeme ridiculous and impossible, and yet it was true, for after the death of Iulio the second the yong Cardinals being banded against the old, chooe him Pope. The Astrologian, hath spoken very truly in the two first aduentures of this Pope, but hee hath missecked himselfe in the third, yet some feare it is but one yeare, for this which we shall shortly begin is full of bad confellations vpon that sea, as they hold that haue studied the booke of the Abbot Isachim.

About that time there was a Iesuite that maintained an opinion that was held very hold throughout all the Catholike Church, but most dangerous at Rome. That it was no point of the essence of faith to beleue that Clement the 8 was the true and lawfull successour of S. Peter. He was committed to prison, and if the Ambassador of Spaine had not dealt in it, he had sped worse, and tryed that the body hath often reason to complaine of the paine which the spirit causeth. Another Iesuite propounded a proposition which was held very strange for the nouelty and the consequence thereof. Which was, That confession might be done by Letters and by Posts. These with some other questions were decided before the Pope and the Cardinals in the following yeare.

There fell out halfe a sedition in Rome by the meanes of Cardinall Farnese. One being pursued by the Officers to be caried to prison, fled into the Cardinals Palace as into a Sanctuary, where he found a backe doore to escape. This flight was fauoured by the in-courtesy of some of the Cardinals Gentlemen, who walking in the Court and seeing the Sergeants make a noise at his escape whom they thought to apprehend, they gaue them bad words with some threats, for the small respect they had borne vnto their Masters house.

Halfe a sedition

The Pope was aduertised thereof, and the Gouvernor of Rome went thither with his officers. The Cardinall Farnesze beleued that all the Confitory was offended at this affront, the which troubled all Rome. They had giuen the Pope to vnderstand that this did concerne the authority of his iustice, without the which the City could not continue happy. They had layd open this boldnesse vnto him by many considerations of his owne private interest. They said that this did but increase the discontents which many had conceiued against the House of Aldobrandin. The tumult grew so great, as one sword drawne had put all the City in armes. The Ambassador of Spaine came to the Cardinals Palace with all his friends, and there spent the whole night, looking on the Romane Gentlemen that played in the Hall, and asking who had wounde or lost, they told him that the Duke Gastan had lost six hundred crownes: Seigneur Duke (sayd he in Spanish) assure your selfe that you lose nothing this night for the notable seruice you doe vnto the King. Hee was often heard to say these words, which were fuller of vanity then of necessity or reason, qui quitero morir, as if the Pope, who had no forces, would come to besiege him.

The next day the Cardinall Farnesze retired himselfe to a house of his called Caprarola five and twenty miles from Rome, whither he was accompanied with the principall men in Rome. The Pope sent the Gouverneur vnto him to receiue his government from him, as if he had lost it for that he had entred into his Palace with his Sergeants. He quenched the heat of those fiery spirits with his teares, and complained that they did not loue him as he did loue, and that therein the intention of true friendship was decieued. But he commanded his Nuncio in Spaine to complaine of the King of Spaines Ambassador, who had openly discovered his passion against him. In the end, the Duke of Parma brought backe the Cardinall to Rome, and all was pacified. As he came from Monte-cuallo where the Pope was, he was well accompanied and followed into the Court of his Palace, with cries of joy; Viva la Casa Farnesze. These were the peoples violent passions, not so much for any loue of him, as in hatred of the Cardinall Aldobrandin. But none of them trusted to this reconciliation. The Cardinall, the Duke Gastan, and many others of the greatest of the City went out of Rome. The Pope caused fix hundred Cordes to come, and two hundred Harguebuziers on horsebacke for the guard of S. Peters Bourg, and if he had had the spirit of Sixtus the 5, or of Popes that were Predecessors to Paul the third, this small beginning had been the cause of great accidents.

The King hauing promised to restore the Iesuits; Father Cotton came to Paris by his Maiesties command, with father Armand the Prouinciall, and father Alexander. They not onely found all things easie, but beyond their conceiued hopes: for the King grew presently into such a liking with Father Cotton, as he did nothing but he was called, and in the end his Maiestic granted their returne vpon certain conditions, and the Edict made for their establishment, (notwithstanding any opposition made vnto the Court to hinder the confirmation thereof) was confirmed in the beginning of this year, and their Colledges restored at Lions, Rouan, Bourges, and Dijon. The Seigneur of Varenne (Controllor general of the Posts, and now Gouvernor of the Towne and Castle of Angers, who loued them of this company) becougth the King to build a new Colledge at La Fleche in Aniou, with priuiledges like to the other Vniuersities of this Realme, the which the King made of a Royall foundation, and gaue them his owne house, with pensions, for the instruction of a good number of yong Gentlemen, whom his Maiestic would haue bred vp, and instructed there in all Professions, Tongues, and Exercises.

The Edict was: That they might lawfully reside in the places where now they are established within the Realme; that is, in the townes of Tholose, Auch, Agen, Rhodes, Bourdeaux, Perigord, Limoge, Tournon, Puy, Aubenas, and Bezieres. And moreover, to settle themselves in the Townes of Lyon, Dijon, and especially in his Towne of La Fleche in Aniou, there to keepe their residences vpon the conditions which follow.

That they shall not erect any Colledges nor Residences in any towne or places of this Realme, Countries, Territories, and Seigniories of his Maiesties obedience, without his expresse permission, vpon paine to lose all that is contained in this present grace.

That all they of the said Societie, being in this Realme, together with their Rectors and Prouincials, shall be naturall Frenchmen, and that no stranger shall be admitted into their Colledges and Residences, without his Maiesties permission: and if there be any at this present, they shall bee bound to retire themselves into their countries within three

A moneths after the publication of these presents. The inhabitants of the towne and countie of Aignion, being not comprehended vnder this word of Strangers.

That they of the said Societie, shall haue neere vnto his Maiesty one of their company, which shall be a Frenchman, with sufficient authority to serue him for a Preacher, and to answer for the actions of their companies vpon all necessarie occasions.

That all Iesuites within the Realme and others which shall be receiued into the said societie, shall take an oath before the Officers of those places, not to doe nor attempt any thing, against his Maiesties seruice, the publike peace and quiet of the Realme, without any exception or reservation whereof the said Officers should bee bound to fend the said B acts vnto the Chancellor. And if any of them present or to come, should refuse to take the said oath, they should be forced to depart the Realme.

That hereafter all they of the said societie as well such as haue made the simple vow, as others, may not get any immoueable goods, either by purchase, donation, or otherwise without his Maiesties permission. They may not also receiue any succession, be it direct or Collateral, no more then other Religious men. And in case hereafter any shall be dismist from the said company, they may returne into their rights as before.

They shall not take nor receiue any immoueable goods from them which shall enter into their societie, but it shall be referred for their heires, or for such to whom they haue disposed them before they entred.

C They shall also be subiect in all things to the lawes of the Realme, and shall be tried before his Maiesties officers, like vnto other Clergy and Religious men.

The said company shall not attempt nor doe any thing, neither in spirituall, nor in Temporall things, to the preiudice of Bishops, Chapters, Curats, and Vniuersities of the Realme, nor of other Religious men: but shall conforme themselves to the common Lawes.

In like manner they shall not preach, administer the Sacraments, neither confesse any but those of their owne societie, if it bee not by the permission of the Bishops within the iurisdiction of the Parliament where they are established, that is, of Tholose, Bourdeaux and Dijon.

D The which permission shall not extend to the Parliament of Paris, except the townes of Lyon, and La Fleche. Where they are suffered to reside, and exercise their ordinary functions as in other places which haue been granted them. And to the end that they of the said societie, which are now restored, may haue meanes to liue in their Colledges and Residences, his Maiestic suffereth them to enioy their rents and foundations present and past, with a full discharge of all seizures which haue been made.

The Iesuits being thus restored, many others demanded leaue of the King to receiue them and to giue them Colledges, as Rouen, Bourges and Amiens. The Vniuersities of Orleans and Poitiers could not like of them, notwithstanding they sought much to bee receiued there, they returned in the end by the Kings fauour and clemency, into their co- E uent of Saint Lewis, neere vnto Saint Paul at Paris, and had restitution of all their goods and of their Colledge of Clermont in Saint Iague street, to enioy their reuenues without infrustion. Then the goodly spirits of their Order began to step into the Pulpit, and were heard with great applause in diuers Churches.

During these great Royall fauours, Father Cotton tasted of some private disgrace, for returning one night somewhat late (about the end of February) and passing by the street of the new bridge, to goe vnto the Louvre, there were certaine Pages and Laqueys, which calling for him at the doore of the Carosse, wounded him with their Rapiers, hauing one great wound in the shoulder going towards the necke and the throat, whereof notwithstanding hee was soone after cured. There was great search made F for this attempt, but the King himselfe discovered presently whence it might proceed. The Pages and Laqueys of Court had beene whipt by commandement for their infolence, in crying with dirision, old Wall, old Cotton (vpon the complaint of certaine Princes and Noblemen.) Those that say this blow was premeditated by the enemies of the Iesuits, were decieued, and his Maiesties onely opinion (who iudged that it came from the Pages and Laqueys) was true. Some were taken and examined, the King himselfe heard the examination; first they excused themselves of the fact, then they said that they meant onely to strike the Coach-man, so whom they had cried to goe farther off, and that hee would hurt them, coming so neere the wall, the which hee would not doe, and that thinking to strike the Coachman, they had hurt Father Cotton. If Father Cotton had not bene an earnest sutor vnto the King to pardon them, it had gone ill with them, but notwithstanding they were banished the Court, and forbidden euer to come there vpon paine of death.

This yeare the King, besides in his goodly buildings, which shall make his memorie commendable to posteritie, would also shew vnto future ages, that hee had a care of the good of his subiects, who for the commoditie of their commerce and trafficke, caused a channell to bee made, by the which all Merchandize should bee caried from the Riuier of Loyre into the riuier of Seine. At the same time when as hee began his channell from Seine to Loyre, which will cost a hundred and fourescore thousand crownes in three yeares, they propounded vnto his Maiestie, an enterprise of greater difficultie, to ioine the two Seas together, and to make the Nauiation from the one to the other through France, and not to passe by the straight of Gibraltar. By the meanes of a channell more easie to be made betwixt the two riuers, which passe the one from Tolouse into the Ocean, and the other from Narbone into the Mediterranean sea, then that which is made to ioine the riuers of Seine and Loyre together. The vnderfaker offered Caution to ioine the Nauiation of the said two seas by this channell, within one yeere for 40000 crownes onely, the which should carie a vessell of foure sadome breadth from one sea vnto the other, for a certaine prooffe of his desigine. Which was to make ships to passe afterwards, within a small time, and for little more charge.

There were many new inuentions for workes deuised and brought into France this yeare by strangers, as wauing of gold after the manner of Milan, and the making of cloth and lincs of the barke of white Mulberry trees, more easly then of Nettles or any other trees, and more strong and of longer continuance then any other, the which was inuented by Monsieur Serres in Prouence. The making of all sorts of Cipres both curld and smooth, and of all other sorts, which were not made before but in Italy, is now established in the Castle of Mantes. Hangings of guilt leather, of all sorts and colours that may be wished, fairer then Imbroidery, better cheape, and of greater continuance, for the easinesse and inuention to make them cleane, and to amend, they are in great shops in Saint Honores, D and Saint James suburbs, to let poore people on worke. There were cutting Mills inuented, and set vpon the riuier of Estampes, where they cut iron into many peeces, and into what forme they will, the which was not done before but by the Smiths. The turning of iron (whereof France abounds) into fine Steele, the which they were forced to seeke in Piedmont, in Germany, and in other strange Countries, for five or six souls the pound, hauing neuer found any thing in France but iron, the which for the excellency they call courle Steele of Brie, or of S. Desfer, the which is sold for two or three souls the pound, at the most. The founnailes are to be seene in Saint Victors suburbs. Vpon the mouth of the riuier of Bieure, the which deserues to bee admired for the excellency thereof, the making of white Lead, the which is a kinde of drogge or quintessence, drawne out of Lead, very necessary and common for Painters, Farriers, and many other vses, the which they were forced to seeke and buy dearly out of France, is now made there, better and better cheape.

The like inuention there is of pipes of Lead, as long and as bigge as you will, beaten, and as light as iron for Cuirasses, stronger and more lasting then the ordinary pipes of Lead, and better cheape, and which make the waters that passe through them more hol-some for the body of man, by reason of the ingredients of the folding which corrupts the water that passeth by them. Besides the folder doth still leaue some little tongues or drops pierced, the which stayes the slime of the water, and makes the pipe to bend: with many other secrets and commodities that depend thereon, inuented by Ferrier, dwelling F in the suburbs of Saint Germaine.

Some parts of France as well as of Sicilia were this yeere much afflicted for want of corne. The Dukes of Guise and Vantadour besought the King that he would be pleased to suffer Prouence and Languedoc to be supplied by the other Prouinces of his Realme, where there was abundance. The King hauing giuen liberty, there passed great store by the Citie of Lions, who fearing to fall into the like want, besought the King to reuoke his grant of the passage.

A The Kings answer seemed to proceed from the heart, not of a Prince onely, but of a father, who desires to prouide equally for all the necessities of his family, and hath a care that nothing be wanting. The principal reasons were, that there is nothing more necessary for the well ordering of an Estate, then to entertaine communication betwixt Prouinces to succour one another, and to haue the trafficke as free and as easie as may bee: Nature hauing so framed them, as they haue need one of another, for if the one restraines on the one side, the other may doe the like on the other side: so as if one Prouince annoyes another, it may also recieue the like annoyance from them: as if they stop the passage of corne at Lions, they of Languedoc and Prouence, may keepe from them, oyles and spice, and B many other necessary commodities. That the Citie of Lions hath no interest in this passage, being lawfull for them, to make what prouisions of corne they please, in Bourgongne, and other places. That he must also haue care of other Prouinces which haue need of relief, whom they might easily perswade that this liberty of passage, depended vpon the fauour and good will of them of Lions, and not vpon his commandement.

There wanted nothing in France, but permission to trafficke in the King of Spaines and the Archdukes dominions. The searownes endured great difcommodities, and in the end, if this prohibition had continued, they would haue said of the greatest, as was said of Megalopolis a great Citie in circuit of walls, and little in number of Inhabitants. Magna Ciuitas, magna solitudo, A great Citie, a great wilderness. The Spaniards found this inhibition much more grieuous and insupportable: there was nothing to bee heard amongst them, but publike complaints, for that all things grew extremely deare, and the Artisans desperate. This grievance depending vpon the execution of the treaty of Veruins, the Pope commanded his Nuncio to deale in it. The King would not yeeld to any thing, before that the Spaniards who had troubled the water, did make it cleare againe in reuoking the imposition of thirty on the hundred. There he forced his nature, for being so good, as he desired onely the good of his people, and feels in his soule that content wherewith God himselfe cannot be satisfied, he could not heare speake of this commerce, if the King of Spaine did not discharge that Impost of thirty for the hundred, which made the liberty of trafficke an extreme seruitude, and the profit an assured losse. This was most seuer and rigorous. There is not any but is bitter to the Merchants, couetousnesse hauing changed the first cause as well as the quantity of Impositions and Customes. In former times they were not payed, but for the safety and liberty of the passage from one place to another, and for that Princes haue publike wayes in their protection, which for that reason are called, The Kings high-wayes, they haue acknowledged this right of protection with some consideration.

In like sort when the Nauiation was vnderaken to the Indies, into Arabia and Ethiopia, the Emperour for the purging of the sea Pirats and Routers, imposed the Gabel or Custome of the Red Sea, for the entertaining of ships of warre against the attempts of Pirats, with the money that should be raised thereby. Such Impositions for so necessarie occasions cannot be iust. Others are not so, and yet they must beare them, being no more lawfull for the subiect to murmure against the Customes, and Imposts, wherewith his Prince doth charge him, then against the hayle, raine, stormes and tempests of Heauen. Obedient children kisse the rod wherewith they haue bene whipt. Reuenge is referred vnto God, who forbids the Soueraigne Magistrates to oppresse the people with such charges. He let Pharao know so much, when as Moses turned his Rod into a Serpent, to let him vnderstand that his Scepter and his reigne was changed into a tyrannie and extreme cruelty. Some said that Spaine (which deliberates long, and resolues constantly) would neuer reuoke this Impostion, for that they would not lose the reputation of the constancy and firmnesse of their Lawes, and not to bee taxed of lightnesse, applying themselves to the time and occasion. But they must endure it, and the Deputies of the two Kings, and of the Archduke, being resolved vpon that point, there was no difficulty but that the commerce was restored to the first liberty. The Constable of Castile returning into Spaine, came to the King at Fontainebleau. The King went to recieue him at the entry of Paris by the Duke of Montbason, who was well accompanied, and the next day at the entry of the forest of Fontainebleau, he found fiftene Carosses full of Gentlemen of the Court, who left them to offer them to him and to his traine, & so mounted vpon their horses which did attend them. It cannot be spoken how royally the King recieued him.

Among many testimonies of honour and affection, this was not ordinary. Zames invited him to supper, being ready to wash, the King accompanied only with Bellegarde and Roguelare enters, saying that he would sup with them. The Constable offered him his napkin, and would have kneeled, the which the King would not suffer; saying unto him, that it was not for him to yeeld honours, but to receive them, for he was of that House, being allied to the House of Velaques, to whom the dignity of the Constable of Castile and Leon is hereditary, and is an honour in a manner equall with a Souveraigne; the Emperour Isidorian finding no other place wherewith to honor and advance his brother Valence.

The Marquis
into Poitou.

The commerce which had bene forbidden for some months, being restored, there was nothing contained in the Treaty of Veruins but was duly executed, but that which concerned the private interest of the Earle of Saint Paul. As for the generall, all went so well, as it might be said the two Kings had never had better correspondency, and that their wils (although contrary) had bene like unto wine and water which cannot be separated. As for the affaires of the Realme, the King found so great respect and obedience in all places, as if there remains any passion in the hearts of his Predecessors, they must be grieved that they were never so well obeyed. The Marquis of Rohou, going to take possession of his Government of Poitou, was at Rochel, where he was received with all sorts of honours, causing his Maiesties intentions to be entertained and executed with so great affection, as it did amaze them that knew that since King Francis the first, this towne had not bene so obedient as the rest. There are secret murmurings, discontents and distrusts, but they are clouds without water. These are corrupt vices which draw vnto them bad humours, but the disposition of the body is no whit altered nor changed: In shew all goes well, and we have nothing else to care for, for men are commonly satisfied with that which seemes, as well as with that which is. It sufficeth that a Prince be well obeyed, be it either for feare or for love. France being never so miserable as when shee had Kings that cared not to be well obeyed.

The Dauphins

bleau.

And what wants a Prince, that is at peace within his Realme, admired of Strangers and redoubted of his enemies, who hath so great designs in hand, for the increase and beautifying of this Estate, as his Predecessors durst neuer thinke of them? One Arceall alone can furnish him a hundred Cannons, with powder and munition for a hundred thousand shot, armes for ten thousand horsemen, and fifty thousand foot, and treasure ready to pay a greater number. This Prince who knew what it was to make warre without money, will neuer undertake it without a iust cause, nor being in want. Warre which is attempted without cause is seldome happy and successfull, and although they bee iustificable, yet is there alwayes some scruple. He spent the best part of the yeare at Fontainebleau, and found his abode there so pleasing, and the season so faire, as he sent for the Dauphin. It was the first voyage to the place of his birth, and the second by Paris. Hee made shew that he did partiticipate of the fathers good disposition, for he neither feared nor felt sunne nor Serein, although it be much felt in that place. Thus the yeare past, when as France could not furnish wherewithall to make a perfect Narration. We may now say as it was heretofore sayd of the Gaules that they were more giuen to tillage and to the Government of their families, then vnto Warre and Armes. The most factious thinke of nothing now but of planting of their Orchards. The Grifons doe still pursue the demolition of the fort. They talke of a truce in Hungary, and of a treaty of peace in the Low-Countries. This will be matter to write on the next year following.

Interview of the Dukes of Sauoy and Mantoua.

But we may not forget the interview of the Duke of Sauoy with the Duke of Mantoua. It misinformed matter of discourse, and made the Princes of Italy somewhat iealous: to see two Princes send Ambassadors which had continued so long in bad rearmes, and two Princes that were Neighbours which had this advantage to haue made warre in person, was not without scruple. And although in shew they talked onely of peace, yet are they not the first that haue had peace in their mouthes, and warre in their hearts. Matthiuel faith, that a Prince of his time neuer talked but of peace and faith, and if he had kept either of them, he had lost his Estate and his reputation.

These two Princes haue lands lying on either side of the riuer of Po. The Duke of Sauoy was discontented that the Duke of Mantoua people had vnrped something vpon his subjects. This was a great dispute of their confines, the which notwithstanding was soon reconciled: the Accord is neuer difficult betwixt persons neere allied. The Duke of Man-

A toua came to Montferriat, which gaue the occasion of this interview, whereof the cause is vnknowne, if it be not for the mariage of his sonne to the Dukes second daughter. They met in the open field on Sunday the twelfth of December. The Duke of Sauoy was in carrosse, and the Duke of Mantoua and his sonne on horse-backe. They lighted to entertain and salute one another. The Noblemen & Gentlemen which followed them made a great Ring, in the which these two Princes did walke and talked together 2 or 3 houres. The D. of Sauoy feasted him at dinner the tuesday following, in a little house vpon the frontier of the Marquitate of Salusses. They continued together vntill night, when parting, the duke of Sauoy gaue vnto the Duke of Mantoua foure goodly horles, with very rich furniture. B To conclude this yeares worke, there was new matter presently, but it is alwayes bad when as the Princes clemency is forced to yeeld vnto his iustice, when as France doth bring forth spirits so easie to corrupt, as intelligences with the enemies of this Crown are not held for crimes, and their honor as vaine smoak, the which notwithstanding should be so carefully preferred, that rather then to see it blemished or charged with any reproach they should desire and offer themselves to death. The King, offended with the practices of the Count of Auernegre, commanded him to come vnto him, and to trust vnto his clemency, the which was not vnknowne vnto him, Desferres made some iourneyes vnto him, from whom he brought nothing but delays and excuses.

The King sends
of Auernegre.

The Kings iustice was once contented to make him change the ayre for a time. It was C the best counsell his friends could giue him: it was the surest resolution he could take: for it was better to be absent with the Kings good liking, then to bee retired and in disgrace. The King was wonderfully grieved at this relapse, and did impute it to an error which great courages detest more and pardon lesse then all other faults: for compare vice with vice, euill with euill, ingratitude is the most odious and the worst. This Prince notwithstanding (who cannot leaue pardoning) sent Desferres backe vnto him to cause him to come. He promised to goe, if they would bring him a pardon formally made. The King disliked this kind of capitulation, whereas his owne authority was wronged, and his word held deceitfull. A great King so much feared and obeyed, and of so great authority, should haue his words as much credited as anothers oath. It is not with this Prince as with some D of his predecessors, who vnder the most smiling and calme countenance smothered most dangerous and troublesome tempests. Hee sent him his abolition in the same forme and manner as he desired, containing all the euill that he had done, and all that he would haue done. It toucheth the honour of a Prince to iustifie himselfe, when as his innocency is any thing mistrusted or suspected of his King. In these encounters hee must leaue the charges which he holds, as Catus Menenius did: he must returne in the midst of his voyage like vnto Marke Anthony, he must quit all Legations to prevent all occasions, and he must oppose his innocency boldly and courageously vnto slander. But he that hath once offended his Prince, he hath no other remedie or refuge, but to his clemency, or to flight.

A pardon granted to a condition.

This pardon had a condition that he should come vnto the King, without the which the E effect thereof should be suspended and without assurance. Hee got nothing in growing obnoxious not to goe out of Clermont, representing vnto himselfe that hee could find no better counsell then in the remembrance of his last imprisonment, as Craesus did in his miseries. Hee did build much vpon the loue of the inhabitants of Clermont, and of the Countrie. But hee did not consider, that although hee had many hearts at his deuotion, yet would he hardly draw them all together to oppose them against the Kings commandements, when it should please him to seize vpon him in that City, and that it were more safe for him to be free without the Vineyard, then to remaine there, not being absolute master thereof.

He refuseth to goe.

Aduertisy doth instill.

The King giues order to haue
him taken.

The King therefore seeing that he would not come but with conditions that did not agree with a perfect obedience, resolved to haue him by one meanes or other. The first O- F rures were made to the two Brothers of Murat, the one Lieutenant General in the Presidiall Court at Ryon; the other, Treasurer extraordinary of the warres; both vehemently affected to the Kings seruice, and for this reason greatly suspected by the Count of Auernegre, who to let them vnderstand the actions that he would haue knowne, did often conferre with them of his affaires, but in like manner as Princes doe communicate with Ambassadors and Spies, and the more freely for that hee thought they were not men to lead him to Paris, But there were others to execute his commandements, and more then of one condition, condition, all resolute to take him, yea though he were shut up in a tower of brass. So A there must be some to take him, and others to conduct him when he was taken. It was necessary that such as had the Kings authority in the Province, and the disposition of his forces and of justice should deal in it. The Kings intention was imparted to the Vicont of Pont du Chasteau, to D'Enrre Lieutenant of the Duke of Vendosmes Company, to the Baron of Camille, to la Boulay Lieutenant of the Company of the Marquis of Verneuil, to Nereffan Colonell of a Regiment of foot, and to so many others, as it is a wonder it was not divulged being in so many heads. In this action all shewed the duties and affections of good men which respected their honours. Many means were attempted, but they were encountered with great difficulties and crosses. True it is, that if Nereffan had not come with tuocation of the Kings first commandements, his taking had been certain when as he went a hunting to la Tour of Brusseire, where as a Gentleman should have bidden him to dinner. The order was changed for that hee had given the King to understand that he had means to doe him a great peece of service in the discovery of great secrets. Some dayes past in the expectation of this miracle, but in the end it proved nothing. The Kings patience wronged, would beleue no more, but commanded that they should force him to come, and if his bounty had not restrained him, we should have seene him as extreme in reuenge, as he hath alwayes beene in bounty and clemency. He earnestly recommended vnto his subiects the execution of this prise, as a thing of great importance for his service, for the preservation of the State, and the assurance of safety of the Lord the Dauphin. The surest means (and that wherein there was least trouble and scandal) was the mustering of the Duke of Vendosmes Company, who by the aduice of the Count of Auvergne himselfe, and to please a Lady who desired to bee reuenged of some Country-men, dislodged from Saint Porcin to come to Balsac and to Yornie, where shee entreated her guests in such sort as they left not provision for three dayes to some one that had bene furnished for three yeares.

D'Enrre who prest Murat (Treasurer extraordinary for the wars) to pay his company a muster, intreated the Count of Auvergne to see it, to the end hee might assure the King that he had gallant men, and good horses, and that all his companions should be wonderfully honoured with the presence of their Coronell. I will part to morrow, said the Count of Auvergne, to hunt at Alezou, and will returne againe on Monday at night, I pray you be here at supper, and lodge your Company at Normaine, to the end that the next day, after wee haue drunke, runne at the ring, and dined, we may see it.

This was done as he had appointed, and it seemed he was an Agor in his owne misfortune, and an instrument of his misery, not being able to discover the bitterness of those golden pills which they presented vnto him. D'Enrre came to Clermont on Monday at night, and goes vnto him where he supped in one of their houses that managed this business. When as he espied D'Enrre as farre off, he said vnto him, Now sir, am I not a man of my word? D'Enrre thanked him for the paine it had pleased him to take to see his companions, beseeching him to thinke that hee desired it with great affection, to the end the King might know they were not in so bad estate as at the voyage of Metz. The next day the ninth of Nouember, the morning was spent in running at the ring, of foure courses heooke three.

He had intelligence that they meant to take him, and distrusting all, he had resolved to come so early to the place of musters, as not finding the company there ready, he should be excused if hee did not attend them, meaning to passe on a league farther, where a Lady that loued him did expect him. D'Enrre hauing foreseene all, leauing nothing to hazard that might be governed by iudgement, vfed such preuentions, as the subiects of this spirit prevailed nothing. He commanded la Bady Marshall of the Company, to see his companions in order. He aduertised Nereffan and the Captaines that did assist him, of the place whither they should come, and wrought so, that diligence and courage, which are the wings of great executions, were so supported by the secret of discretion, as none of the troop once dreamed of that was to be done.

They went to dinner, and it was well obserued that the Count of Auvergne had some distrust. He hath since confessed, that he was ready to call the two brothers of Murat into his cabinet, and to cause them to be searcht, for that he was well aduertised that they alwayes caried the Kings letters and his commandements. But a great resolution thinking that

He goes to horse with two more with him.

A that there is more harme in feáring, then in the thing that causeth feare, feares extremely to make shew that he hath any feare. After dinner D'Enrre asked, if it pleased him to goe to horse to see the Musters. He answered him: That it should be presently, and that he should use speed. He retired himselfe soone after into his Cabinet, and went downe, being followed by Maillonville onely, and Liuerne, mounted vpon a Scottish horse (which verry had given him) the which would haue outrunne all the horses of France. Hee would not attend the other Noblemen for that he distrusted them, having an intent to passe on, if hee found them not ready. But being come to the place, hee found the company in battell. This great diligence made him somewhat ieaalous, and they might perceiue him, that B pulling vp his Cloake, hee drew his Sword foure fingers out, yet without any amazement.

D'Enrre seeing him make euen the reines of his horse, came to him trotting, with his hat in his hand, and hearing him sweare with a great oath that he had bene very diligent. You see my Lord (answered he) I haue caused my companions to aduance, for that I would not trouble you with attendance. Monsieur D'Enrre (replied the Earle) you are one of my friends, I cannot make any long stay here. To whom D'Enrre sayd, All my companions are not yet here, but if it please you, you shall see this troope, and iudge of the whole by a part. Hereupon hee sees some horsemen come, and demands what they were. D'Enrre told him, That it was Nereffan who had bene at Ryon about a sute of his daughters. He beleued it, for hee knew C that Nereffan had staid some dayes at Ryon, and yet his heart beganne to suspect more. But it was too late, he was enuironed on euery side, and hardly can one resist many. Nereffan lighted to salute him, and hauing entertained him with some discourse vpon the occasion of his stay at Ryon, or of his returne to Court, he went presently to horsebacke, and thrust on one of the Lacqueyes with his foot, for a signe and token of the beginning of the execution.

One of Nereffans three Lacqueyes takes hold of his horse by the bridle. D'Enrre seeing that Nereffan had taken the right side to salute the Count of Auvergne, went vnto the left, and laying hold with his hand vpon the hilt of his sword, hee said vnto him, that hee had commandement from the King to take him; the other two Lacqueyes pulled him so D roughly from his horse, as he had like to haue fallen to the ground: hee was moued to see himselfe so intreated by Lacqueyes, intreating D'Enrre to cause two of his companions to light, and that he might not see those rascals any more: Nereffan said vnto him, that they were souldiers so attired, to serue the King in this action. A peece shot into the ayre by chance, made him to doubt worse measure, so as he intreated D'Enrre that hee would not vse his pistolet. D'Enrre freed him from these apprehensions, intreating him to resolute vpon the Kings will, and not to force them to entreat him other wise then they desired. Well, sayd he, I yeeld: what would you haue me to doe? That you mount vpon the Trumpets horse, said D'Enrre. It was feared that he would not haue suffered himselfe to be taken so easily nor so quietly, as we haue seene many great courages choofe rather to bee cut in peeces, then to see themselves referred for some shamefull end, and others that haue willingly died, for that they would not dye by force.

When as he sees himselfe in the toyle, enuironed on all sides, Liuerne his confident follower in flight, and his friends the ministers of his captivity, he said, Ab in the deuils name, I doubted all this. Being mounted vpon the Trumpets Nag, they conduct him presently to Aigueperfe. Before he had gone a hundred paces, hee entreated D'Enrre to lend him one of his troop, to carry some message of his remembrance and of his misery, to a Lady that attended him. De Pleche had the charge. She who had not prepared her heart to withstand the assaults of a most extreme and sensible griefe,ooke D'Enrre for the object, against whom shee poured forth the fury of her passions. If I knew (said shee vnto this Gentleman) that I might saue him in forcing through your troope, I would willingly doe it, and if I had but tenne Men of my courage and resolution, you should not carry him where you thinke. But I will neuer die vntill I haue giuen D'Enrre a hundred shor with a pistoll, and to Murat a hundred blowes with a Sword.

These were the passions of her loue transported with a resolution beyond her sex, and which did participate of a man, of a troubled mind, and of loue. This last makes miracles of maruells, and maruells of miracles, in wils that are equally toucht with his inspirations, so it is neuer perfect, if it be not fully and neerly toucht with the accidents of both fortunes, tunes, as the Moone is not pleasing but when it is at the full. Shee loued him well, and was well beloued, for the Count of Auvergne had bene heard say, that if the King did set him at liberty, and send him backe to his house, vpon condition that hee should not see this Lady, he would rather desire to dye. Shee presently ordered the affaires of her house, the disposition of her furniture, and the retreat of her seruants. This passion going from the memory to the thought, from the thought to the heart, from the heart to the eyes, made her poure forth so many teares, as she lost the sight of one eye for a time.

Being at Aigueperles he writ vnto the King. At the same place hee told the Baron of Camillac, that he was acquainted with the designe of his taking. It is true, said he, I knew it well, and I beleuee you thinke I am a very honest man. He said that he submitted himselfe to all the rigours of the Kings iustice, if he had said, done, thought, or attempted any thing since his abolition.

All the way he seemed no more afflicted, then when he was at liberty. He told youthfull and idle tales of his loue, and the deceiuing of Ladies. Hee shot in a Harguebuze at birds, wherein he was so perfect and excellent, as hee did kill Laikes as they were flying. Sometimes he would cast forth words of apprehension to enter into that great heape of stones of the Bastile, where he had already tried his patience for the space of foure or fise moneths.

He assures them of his innocency.

Defeuces met him at Briarre, and there he entred into a Carosse, and was guarded and led vnto Montargis, and from thence he was imbarcked vpon the riuier, and presently conducted vnto the Bastile, without passing by the Arcenall and entring into the Duke of Biron's chamber, he knew his bed with some feeling of grieft, and taking leaue of them that had conducted him, he assured them that he would goe out of that place as he had entred, and if they found him more guilty then he had said, he desired them not to pity him. Entering in, he said vnto Ruvigny, that he had rather lodge in a Tap-house in Paris, then in the Bastile. Those that beleuee that he is not lodged there to get out, so soone as hee did the other time, thinke also it is the worst that can happen vnto him. But it shall be an incomparable misery to be alwayes deprived of the Kings grace and fauour, without the which the best conditions are most lamentable, and a life of this manner, how florissouer, is a tedious and a languishing life, it is no life, it is to languish and to abuse life.

A tappe discourse of conspiracies.

The happy discouery and so fully, of all that was done, and in a manner thought against the Kings seruice, is no small signe of the prosperity of his reigne, and of his fortune; and an assurance that those heads which shall strike against this rocke of Diamond, will proue Glass. The designes of his enemies haue sometimes shewed themselves like vnto Comets and Exhalations, which drawne out of the earth, haue bene lost in the ayre of their vanity and inagination.

The conspirators amazed.

All these practices in the end were like vnto those poore wretched Cottages, built vp of durt, and covered with stubble. And if all the Conspirators be not yet taken, yet they doe nothing, being discouered and knowne to the eyes of the Kings iustice. Conspiracies are like vnto coales, which in the shadow doe flame, but when as the Sunne shines on them they fall into ashes. It is not the severity nor the rigour of his iustice, neither the terror of examples and punishments, that hath discouered these Conspiracies. He hath not caused the Bell of Ramire King of Spaine, to be rung to terrifie all the conspirators with the sound thereof. This King being offended with the conspiracies of his subjects, said, that he would show them a Bell, the which he had caused to be cast, the sound whereof might be heard throughout all the whole world. Curiosity made them goe, and they found in a great place the heads of the principall men of the Realme, set one vpon another in forme of a Bell. It is the great obedience that is yielded vnto the King, even by them that are least injured to obey, that hath discouered these practices: It is the great wisdom of his carriage, and the order hee hath taken to be aduertised of all and to know all. It is the authority and respect which neuer was so absolute & perfect in his Predecessors as in him. This apprehension was a famous president. For the time was when he must haue had more men to take the Count of Auvergne and to conduct him to Paris without lett.

Considerations vpon his taking

We may obserue in this apprehension many things that may breed admiration and amazement, and which shew that men doe in vaine furnish themselves with wisdom against heauen, and with intelligences against the King. The Count of Auvergne had aduertisements

1604

A uertisements from all places that they should take him, and that the Kings Pensioners were in the field to that effect. His most inward and nearest friends, and amongst others Floras knew it, and said nothing vnto him, preferring his duty to his Prince, before all affection.

He must be deceiued, and the King well serued. As Mint-masters say, that it is impossible to refine gold of twenty foure Carats, without a little of some other mettall, so it is impossible to make an execution perfect, if there be not dissembling mixt with friendship, deceit with wisdom, neither must the tongue alwayes speake according to the heart. The Constable was also as well informed thereof as any other, and yet he made no shew thereof. A shew of great wisdom. His duty prescribed him a law to all the bounds of Nature; so there is not any one but is more bound to the seruice of the King and his Country, then to his owne health, or to that of his children. A Gentleman being at his Table, speaking of this taking, said, Sir, if the King should command me to take you, I would doe it, although I be your most humble seruant, that you march in the first ranks of greatest in the Realme, and that all things touching armes, depend vpon your commandements. I beleue it (answered the Constable) else you should doe it, for the King is both your King and mine. I am your friend. There is no loue nor affection to dispence any one from the Kings commandement.

The Count of Auvergne long before and since his taking, hath not said nor done any thing whereof the Kings seruants haue not kept register. He complained of those that were daily about him, that they said nothing vnto him; and they all answered, that they were too honest to tell him anything. He is a Prince of great vnderstanding, capable of all sorts of designs, of a quick disposition, warlike, vigilant, and full of inuentions and subtleties. But all this auailed him nothing against the King, of whom we may say, that he hath wicked wretches enough in his kingdom that would deceiue him, but they are not cunning enough to doe it.

Soone after that the Count of Auvergne was lodged in the Bastile, D'Entraignes Gouernor of Orleans was committed to the Concergerie of the Palace, and the Marquesse of Verneuil his daughter guarded in her house, by the Knight of the watch. She cried, that this is capable to loue earnestly, may also hate extremely. Wee can say nothing of the causes of this change, but what may be learned by the issue of the proccesse. They be affaires which concerne the King, his person, and his State, and if it bee tolerable to heare what is sayd, yet is it not lawfull to speake or publish it.

D'Entraignes committed to prison, and his daughter, the Marquise of Verneuil re-tyed.

His Maiesty himselfe hath not yet declared the cause of the Count of Auvergues restraint, and in the Letter which he did write vnto the Gouernor of Lions vpon that subject, he did onely send him these words: You haue understood how that I haue againe caused the Count of Auvergne to be apprehended, being aduertised that hee continued still in his bad practices, and that hauing sent often for him, he would not come. At the least I will keep him from doing ill if I can. They doe basely abandon their honours, which flye to the practice of strangers, who embrace all occasions with vehemency to trouble the tranquility of the Realm. In cases of this quality suspicion makes the crime: yea the children suffer for the iniquity of the fathers, and wives of their husbands, as we haue said. Notwithstanding, the King suffers the beames of his naturall bounty and clemency to shine. Hee proceeds not rigorously in a notorious crime. He obserues as hee alwaies hath done, the order of his iustice. He giues time and place to the guilty to know themselves, and to flye to his mercy. Hee seekes himselfe all meane to iustifie them, for knowing that the Earle of Auvergne and Entraignes were found guilty of crimes which deserued the separation of their bodies from their soules; and that by a sentence giuen by the Court of Parliament the first of February, they were condemned to dye, and the Marquesse to be led with a good guard to the Abbey of religious women at Beaumont neare Tours, there to be strictly kept vntill the Kings Proctor generall should enforce more amply against her his Maiesty addes now to all his victories that of clemency: he causerh the execution of the sentence to surcease, and changeth the punishment into perpetuall imprisonment for the Earle and Entraignes; the which he did also moderate for the last, suffering him to remaine in his house of Bois Malet herbes in Baillie; he did also suffer the Marquesse to remaine in her house at Verneuil.

his affaires, but to retire himselfe out of the Realme, he hath vsed the liberty of his retreat wisely, and hath always sought the Kings fauour, for the assurance of his returne. Some foraine Prince of his friends aduised him not to returne to Court, to hold all reconciliaton suspet, and to beleue, that when a Prince is once offended, he is neuer quiet vntill the offence be reuenged. That he must not trust to that which he promisseth, nor to that which he sweares, holding both the one and the other lawfull for reuenge. That the word of a Prince that is offended, is like vnto Zenxis cluster of grapes, which takes birds; but his oth is like vnto Parafus vaile, which deceiues men. Those which haue lost the fauour of their master (for that they had intelligence with them whom they could not serue without crime) are alwayes in continuall distrust, the which followes the offence, as the Boat B doth the Ship, vntill they haue quenched and smothered the cause, and made it knowne that they are diuided, and enemies to all their wils, that would distract them from their duties; for men that are double and dissemblers, are neuer tamed, no more then a Bat, which is halfe a Rat, and halfe a Bird, or the Chaftor which is flesh and fish. The Duke of Boulton patience hauing giuen the King time enough to consider of his intentions, is ready through the Kings clemency, to obtaine all that he could desire to returne to a greater fortune, in the which lesse is allowed then to a meaner estate.

He had beene taxed with many capital crimes, whereof the chiefe accusations were to haue beene a partaker of the Marshall of Biron's conspiracie: And although they had severall designs, and were of very different humours, yet they were both of one mind to C ruine the King, and haue their shares in his spoile, by the means of the King of Spaine. It is true, there were no Letters found written from him to the King of Spaine nor his Ministers, nor from them to him, but those that were mediators for the other, dealt also for him: and he was more cunning they sayd, to couer his intent. It is no sufficient iustification to say that he did neither write nor receiue any Letters, the Treaty was made without writing: whereunto he made his answer.

After that diuers crimes had beene diffused and publicly spoken of to his dishonour, being also priuately aduertised thereof, he wrote a Letter of protestation to the King, to iustifie his innocency in these tearmes.

" Sir, hauing more carefully caused me so many true miseries, among the which I may " whereof false imputation doth cause me so many true miseries, among the which I may " iustly hold for the greatest and most insupportable, my debarring from your presence, and " the interruption of the faithfull seruice which I owe vnto your Maiesty: God in the end " hath sent me this consolation by Monsieur de Montluc who hath informed me particularly " of that which the common brute of the world could not teach me but in generall tearmes " and confusedly. I giue God thanks who hath by this speciall knowledge made me an easie " way to satisfie your Maiesty more particularly, hoping that he will dispose the cares and " heart of my King and Master to giue a favourable beleefe vnto the true iustification of his " most humble seruant.

" I vnderstand then from him, that I am accused to haue had intelligence with the Mar- E " shall of Biron. That I haue treated with him, or others, to receiue money from the King " of Spaine. That I was resolu'd to quit my Religion. That I had attempted to treat a peace " betwixt the King of Spaine and the Estates. That I was acquainted with a conspiracy a- " gainst your Maiesty, the Queene, and my Lord the Daulphin, and that I made secret lea- " ues of men without authority. To all these crimes and others which approach neere " them: I say and protest, that if euer my thought, tongue, or hand, my heart, or the least part " of my body or affection haue bin infected or once touched therewith, I will be held for the " most disloyal man liuing, not only vnworthy to taste of your Maiesties clemency, but also " to see your face, yea to tread on the ground which owes you obedience, as polluted by me " in so many sorts, as all the blood in my body could not wash away nor cleanse the spots of F " so foule an ingratitude vnto my King, my Master, and sole benefactor next vnder God. All " the fauours which your Maiesty might impart vnto me, would not serue me but as a free- " ing from punishment, which the most cauterized conscience in the world would continu- " ally giue vnto such a monster of men.

" Againe, I sweare and take the Searcher of all hearts to witnesse that I am wholly inno- " cent of the aboue mentioned crimes how small soeuer, beseeching your Maiesty, in the " name of God, the protector of the innocent, & the Father of truth, rather to giue credit to this

A this iust and true oath made by your most faithfull subiect and seruant, then to the flanders " of those whose actions shew that they haue neither God to feare, King to serue, nor lawes " to keepe. 1605

In the meane time Sir, as I am as free from all these crimes as any one within your " Realme, and haue no more need of the vse of your clemency, then I do feare your iustice: " yet I am neither so presumptuous, nor so ignorant of the infirmity of man in generall, or " of mine owne in particular, but that I doe freely confesse that I may haue offended your " person in diuers sorts, as erring in the iudgement which your Maiesty might haue made " of some action of mine: as to haue feared your presence, and not to present my selfe vnto " B your iustice, before that I had a speciall approbation from your owne mouth, thinking " that I was sufficiently warranted so to doe by that which is comprehended in your Ma- " iesties Edict. To haue vsed some speeches to the Earle of Saint Paul, which called your loue " in question in regard of the vsage of some. To haue sayd that I would neuer see your " face but in a picture, words which were represented vnto your Maiesty in a sense contrary " to my intention, hauing spoken them rather by way of complaint, and prediction of the " continuance of my miseries, by means of your displeasure, then for any designe or de- " sire of my will, which cannot be so inconstant as to fly her owne felicity. I vnderstand also " that your Maiesty is offended for a Letter which I had written vnto the Churches touch- " ing Renant, your bounty hath so shined in the obseruation of these Edicts, as you cannot " C imagine that I should perswade your subiects to retire themselves: my feare of the inter- " ruption of your Edict could not make me to incense them: for the maintaining thereof " your Maiesty hath beene offended, I am very loy, hauing had no intention to draw your " subiects to any other motions then the obedience which they owe you. I know and ac- " knowledge freely that these things haue displeased your Maiesty the more, for that I haue " had the honour to serue you priuately. I sorrow in my soule and am much grieved, most " humbly beseeching you to pardon me, and to restore vnto me the honour and onely hap- " pinesse of your fauour: resting fatished with this long and serious repentance which you " haue imposed vpon me, and attributing these faults to indiscretion or rashnesse, or else to " ouermuch confidence of your bounty, whereof I haue had too great a tryall. Vouchsafe to " D receiue of me the seruice which my God, my birth, my conscience, and especially your " ben:fits, bind be to yeeld you, and to continue, not with more fidelity (being able to adde " nothing to this qualitie) but with more circumspection and care not to incense hereafter " him of whom I desire to liue and die,

The most humble, most obedient, and most faithfull Subiect and Seruant, Henry dela Tour.

The Duke of Tremouille ended his fortune by death. He might haue died when as the " King would haue lamented the losse of him more, for he was not now well pleased with " certaine words which had beene reported vnto him; and if he had liued, he would haue " E beene in paine to excuse himselfe of the commandment hee had made him to come " vnto him to answer it: From hence springs two fruitfull considerations; the one, that " there is nothing so fearefull and terrible as the threats and disgrace of the King; the " other, that it is alwayes dangerous to speake ill of his Prince. For the first, Cassander " greatly feared Alexander, euen when hee was dead, for that hee had sene him once " transported with choller against him. And although that after the death of Alexander hee " was aduanced to the throne of Macedon, yet walking in the city of Delphos, and hauing " sene an Image of Alexanders, who was now rotten in his graue, hee did so tremble as his " haire stood right vp, his knees failed him, and the palenesse of his countenance shewed his " amazement, by the terrible assault which his memory gaue him: for the second, when a " F free speech hath once escaped against the respect of the Prince, he must haue a great and " a strong citie as Lisander laid to defend his liberty of speech. They haue neither friends " nor counsell against the King, and if their misery finds any shadow or protection, it is " but like vnto Ionas gourd of one night. Let them not flatter themselves in the great- " nesse of their houses nor their alliances, this quality doth but increase their offence. Prin- " ces are not so much moued with that which the common people do, as with the licentious " words of great men. Caius disguised himselfe into as many fashions as he imagined there " were gods. A Cobler seeing him set in his Palace like Iupiter, with a Scepter in one hand, a thunder-bolt in the other, and an Eagle by his side, burst out in a great laughter. Cains A causing him to come neerer, asked him why he laughed. I laugh at this foolery, answered punishing other speeches severely which came from persons better qualified.

Edict for paying of the Paulet.

To end this year, the King made a Declaration, containing a dispensation of the forty dayes, granted by his Maiestie in fauour of all the officers of this Realme, that desire to enjoy the benefit thereof, paying euery year four deniers vpon the liuer or two shillings, vpon the value of their offices, as shall be set downe by his Maiesties Council.

Vpon the demonstrances made vnto the King in his Council, by some of the chiefe and most ancient officers of his seuerall Courts of Parliament, and other companies of this B Realme, that it would please him to set downe some order for the demissions and resignations of their offices: and also auoyding the losse of so notable a summe, as the value of their said offices, they may be no more constrained when they grow old, and by consequence are more capable to execute them worthily, to put them into the hands of younger men, and of lesse experience. His Maiesty hauing caused this to be propounded in his Council, and desiring to testifie his loue and fatherly affection to all his subiects and seruants, hath ordained in his said Council, that hereafter all the offices of this Realme, as well of iustice, finances, as others of what quality soeuer, falling voyd to his benefit, and being subiect to the rule of forty dayes, except those which shall be found comprehended in the contracts of engagement, and concessions made in consequence of those lands which haue beene heretofore alienated, as well by his said Maiesty, as by the Kings his Predecessors, shall hereafter be dispensed with from the rigour of the said forty daies, which euery of the said officers should suruiue after the resignation made of his said office, accompting from the day and date of the quittance, for the money paid into his casuall parties, euery one paying yearly (that desire to enjoy the said grace and dispensation) four deniers vpon the liuer, of the value and estimation made of their said offices, according to the order which shall be set down by his Maiesties Council: That is for the next year, within the monthes of January & February, and for the following yeares in lann: & vntill the 15 of Febr: comprehending the said day, which being past they shall not be receiued:

vpon payment of which money if they shall chance to die during the said year, their offices shall not be declared voyd to his Maiesties profit, but shall be kept for their behoofe to whom they haue resigned them, in regard of the offices subiect to suppression: and for those which are not subiect, to their widowes and heires, who may make their best profit thereof as they shall thinke good, as a thing belonging vnto them, paying onely into his Maiesties casuall parties the eight denier by the said officers or their widowes and heires, for the resignation thereof, to be taken of the valuation which shall be made. All which officers which haue thus purchased the said right, shall enioy the dispensation of the said forty dayes, during that year, shewing onely an acquittance for the payment made by them for the said right of dispensation, duly signed by Master Charles Paulet, Secretary of the Kings Chamber, and Farmer vnto his Maiesty, as well of the reuenues E of the said right, as of his casuall parties, together with an acquittance of the eight denier paid by them. Vpon which acquittances, his Maiesties pleasure is, that all necessary letters of prouision shall be granted, vnto the said officers, their widowes and heires, or others to whom they haue resigned, to enioy the said offices fully and peaceably, with the same honours, authorities, prerogatives, preeminences, freedomes, liberties, fees, rights, taxa-tions, profits, and emoluments, which those officers which were last in possession did enjoy, so as they be found sufficient, capable, and pleasing to his Maiesty. And if any of the said officers shall neglect in any one year to pay the said right of four deniers vpon the liuer, they shall be deprived for that year of the said grace and dispensation of forty daies, to the which notwithstanding they may be restored the following yeares, paying the said rights yearly by the 15 day of Febr. And the more to gratifie & fauor the officers, which shall pay the said rights, his pleasure is, that when as they shall come to resigne their offices, they shall not be bound to pay aboute the eight denier of the last value, in stead of the fourth denier, whereunto resignations were accustomed to be taxed. And as for those which haue nor paid the said right of four deniers vpon the liuer, they shall be bound at their resignations, to pay the fourth denier of the iust value of their said offices, as hath bin alwaies obserued.

But

1604

A But for that there may be many frauds committed by some, who abusing his Maiesties bounty and fauour, will not resolute to pay the said right of four deniers, but when as they haue an intent to resigne their offices, that by this means they might bee discharged in paying the eight denier in stead of a fourth: his Maiesty desiring to set some order therein, intends that this next year, all they that shall pay the said right of four deniers vpon the Liuer, shall enioy, if they resigne within that year, the grace of the eight denier;
but if in the following yeares they shall discontinue the payment of the said right of four deniers vpon the liuer, they shall be deprived of the said grace of the eight denier, vntill they haue paid the right two yeares together after the payment whereof, although they B haue discontinued some yeares, yet may they enioy the said grace of the eight denier, that year wherein they haue begunne to pay the right of four deniers vpon the liuer, within the time prefixed.

And as for those that without paying the said right shall chance to dye, before the accomplishment of the forty dayes, the said offices shall remaine void to his Maiesties be-hoofe and profit, as it is now obserued: but to the end the said officers may be eased of their paine and charges, being forced to take the said right of dispensation from the said Paulet, his Maiesty doth allow him to establish one or more deputies, in euery generality of this Realme, who by vertue of their quittances; may within the said time, receiue the money due for the right of dispensation, from such officers as desire to haue the benefit C thereof.

And to preuent the abuses which are committed by concealments in many of the Prouinces of this Realme, many offices which fall voyd by death to his Maiesties profit, whereof notwithstanding he is frustrate. His said Maiesty doth command all his Bayliffes, Scheneshals, Lieutenants Generall, and all his other royall and ordinary Iudges, as also his Proctors, and their Substitutes, to transport themselves, with the Deputies of the said Paulet, at the first instance they shall make, into the houses of the said officers, thus dead and concealed, whereof they shall be bound to make a certificate, the which they shall deliuer vnto the said deputies, who shall send them vnto the said Paulet, to haue them put to the tax: and for an exemplary punishment of the said concealment, his Maiesties D pleasure is, that the rigour of the ordinances shall be exactly obserued, against the wi-dowes and heires which haue committed such faults, by all due courses, as for his owne proper money and affaires, notwithstanding all oppositions or appellations whatsoeuer.

And to the end that all officers may be enformed of the grace and fauour granted them by this present Decree, his Maiesty doth expressly enioyne all the said Bayliffes, Schen-eshals, and their Lieutenants generall, Prouosts and other his Royall and ordinary Iudges, euery one in his iurisdiction, to cause it to be read and published in open Court, whereof they shall be bound to deliuer certificates vnto the bearer hereof, enioining them expressly to haue a care to the entertainment of the said Decree, the which his Maiesty will haue E inuolubly obserued in euery point, according to the forme and tenure thereof, notwithstanding all oppositions or appellations whatsoever, whereof if any shall happen, his Maiestie hath referred the knowledge vnto himselfe: forbidding all his Courts of Parliament, and other his Iudges whatsoever. Made in the Kings Council of State held for the Finances. At Paris the 7 of December 1604.

The King hauing receiued sundry complaints from his officers and household seruants, of the breach of their liberties and priuiledges granted vnto them as well by himselfe, as by his Predecessors, he thereupon made a declaration of his intent and pleasure, after this manner.

Notwithstanding any letters Patents heretofore granted by vs, as well in forme of an F Edict as otherwise, for confirmation of the ancient priuiledges, granted by Kings our predecessors of happy memory, to our household officers and seruants, yet we receiue daily complaints, of the infinite troubles and vexations which they suffer in the enioying thereof, by the officers of Iustice, Maiors, and Magistrats of our townes, where our said officers are abiding, who haue instantly required vs to provide some conuenient and necessary remedy.

Wherefore desiring rather to augment then to diminish the fauors and priuiledges granted in former times to those which haue had the honor to approach neerer to the persons of our said predeceffors, and to take away all difficulties which doe arise to ^{the} execution of our will, to the end they may not be of worse condition then those which haue gone before them, who were no more careful of their charges then they are. For these causes and other good considerations vs mouing, of our speciall grace, full of power and royall authority, and with the aduice of our Counteill, we haue to our said household seruants, to them of the Queene our most deare Spouse, our deare and well-beloued sonne the Daulphin, of our most deare and well-beloued daughter, and those which haue heretofore serued the Kings our predeceffors, the Queenes our most honored Ladies mother-in-law, and sisters-in-law, our most deare brother-in-law the deceased Duke of Aniou, & our most deare and only fitter the deceased Duchesse of Barr, which haue bin, or shall be hereafter enrouled in our Court of Aydes, and to their widowes during their widowhood, continued, confirmed, and approued, and by these presents (signed with our hand) continue, confirme, and approue the said priuiledges, freedoms, liberties, immunities and exemptions granted vnto them by our said predeceffors.

We will and our pleasure is, that hereafter, without any other recourfe then these presents, that all the said officers and others aboue-named, with their widowes during their widowhood, shall fully and peaceably enjoy these said priuiledges, and shall be free and exempt from all manner of contributions, both in generall and particular, borrowings to be made as well for vs as the said townes: and in like manner for the prouision for victuals, and munition for warre, conduct money, and from all taxes, aydes, and impositions, watches and wards of Townes, Ports, Bridges, Passages and Straits, furnishing and contribution for Staples, and for lodging of Souldiers both of horse and foot: and generally from all other subsidies, contributions and subventions, made or to be made, for what cause soeuer, although they be not here particularly exprest, whereof we doe free, acquit, and exempt them, nor withstanding there be mention made in the commissions sent and to bee sent, of exempt and not exempt, priuiledged and not priuiledged, and that they haue omitted to make expresse mention of the exemption, exceptions, and reservation of our said officers and household seruants, with their widowes during their widowhood, meaning not that they should be comprehended, but that they should peaceably and quietly enjoy the said freedoms and liberties. Enjoyning our faithfull Councillors, the Treasurers of France, Generals of our Finances, and our well-beloued Prouosts of Merchants, Sherifes and Capitaines of our City of Paris, and all Bayliffs, Scheneshals, Prouosts, E-sleuz and Controulers for matters of Subsidies, Mayors, Jurats, Capitous, Consuls, Sherifes and Capitaines of other Townes of our Realme, Farmers of our Aydes, and other Subsidies whatsoeuer: that in the enjoying hereof they shall not trouble nor molest them, vpon paine of confiscation, with the charges, damage, and interest.

We doe also expresse forbid all Mayors, Sherifes, Consuls, and Commonalties of Townes, Churchwardens and Collectors of Parishs, not to take any of the said officers, hauing a good and sufficient certificate, which if they doe, they themselves shall pay the said taxes.

We also command our faithfull Councillors, holding our Courts of Aydes, Bayliffs, Scheneshals, Capitaines, E-sleuz and Controulers, of our Aydes and Taxes, and others to whom it shall belong, to keepe and obserue our present graces, gratifications, continuations, confirmations, approbations, freedoms, and exemptions, and to publish and enroule it wherefoeuer it shall be needfull; causing the said officers, and their widowes during their widowhood, to enjoy them fully, peaceably, and perpetually, and to discharge them of the said impositions, Aydes, and Subsidies, causing all lets and troubles to the contrary to cease, for such is our pleasure. Notwithstanding all Edicts, Ordinances, Decrees, Orders, Commandements, Defences, and Lets to the contrary, to the which for this regard only, and without prejudice to other things, we derogate by these presents, and to the end it may bee firme and stable for euer, we haue caused our Seale to bee set vnto it.

Giuen at Fontainebleau in May 1605. The like exemptions and freedoms, were granted vnto the officers and household seruants of the Prince of Conde, and of the Duchesse of Angoulesme, which did serue them actually and had their names inrolled.

A Speech made by the Ambassadors of Germanie to the King in the kebale of the Duke of Bouillon.

SIR, the Electors, Princes, Common-weales and Earles most desirous of your prosperity, and of my Lord the Daulphins, whereon they thinke the whole state of your Realme depends, haue deputed vs vnto you to renew the vowes of this sincere & hereditary affection, which they protest alwayes to maintaine most carefully. The reason which now moues them to make this protestation, is, that some finding themselves bound by alliance, and others ride by the bond of cordiall friendship, to participate in the long and painful suffering of the Duke of Bouillon, Marshall of France, who they know is much grieved, to see himselfe deprived of the fauour and honour which your Maiesty hath heretofore so bountifully bestowed on him: and breathing no other thing in his languishing, then the recouerie of this felicitie by your fauour. To obtaine the which he doth continually call vpon God, and humble himselfe vnto your greatnesse. Our Masters ioine their prayers with his, to the one and the other, that it will please him who holds the hearts of Kings in his hand, to mollifie yours, towards one of your most faithfull subjects and seruants, and to restore him to that which his misfortune and no crime committed hath made him lose. We beseech your Maiesty to beleue that they which haue sent vs cannot receiue a more worthy Testimonic of the esteeme you make of their loue and affections, then by the fauourable reception of their request in this behalfe: and moreover, it will bee an assured prooffe vnto them that the enemies of Religion haue laboured in vaine to bandy your desires and designs against them that make profession thereof.

Behold the third year which good men see him banished from your presence, fauour and Realme! This exile is not felt by him alone, wee know that the griefe extends to your most faithfull subjects of either Religion, who participate of his affliction: His house makes him allied to the greatest of your Realme, who will take the like part in the happinesse of his reconciliation as they doe now in his disgrace, and we doubt not, but they would haue beene ready to second our Petition if they thought it would haue beene pleasing to your Maiesty, the which hath made our Masters the more bold to undertake it. It is an exact search which they haue made of the behauiour of the said Duke since hee left your Realme, the which hath giuen them such knowledge of his integrity as they assure themselves that there will neuer be sufficient prooffe to touch him in any sort.

We also assure our selues that the Testimonies of so many great Princes and common-weales, whose faithfull affection vnto your person and Crowne hath bin so well knowne, being put in ballance against the doubts and ialousies of those who louing neither the person nor Religion of the said Duke, seeke to incense you, will easily ouerway them and preuaile, considering that any man of wisdom and discretion which shall take the paines to examine the crimes imposed vpon the said Duke, will finde them incredible, as well for their enormities, as for the contradictions: And it is no matter of light consideration in the minds of our Masters the oath made vnto your Maiesty by the said Dukes Letters, deliuered into the hands of the Lord of Silery by the Seigneur of Montet whereof they haue a Copy, and which they thinke should be of greater weight then all the suggestions made to the contrary, if they bee not verified by proofes as cleare as the day. These reasons with the precedent Declarations made by your Maiesty that you would pacifie your displeasure if some formalities were obserued by the said Duke: makes vs hope that you will yeld to the intercession of our said Masters, ordaining what shall be necessary for the said Duke to doe, to attaine to his former dignity, whereby they shall receiue so great a contentment by the fruit of this Legation, as they would make no difficulty to interpose their Cautions betwixt your Maiesty and the said Duke if need were, to giue you full assurance of the fidelitie which may proceed from the hand, tongue and heart of him whom God hath made your subject, and is an officer of your Crowne by your fauour, to employ himselfe wholly to your Maiesties seruice; for your Royall prosperitie and for the whole Realme: for which bounty and fauour our Masters will hold themselves for euer bound to ioine their vowes and hands, to witnesse their their deuotion as truly by effects, as they haue now begunne to represent it by mouth A vnto your Maiestie. To whose speech the King being somewhat discontented, made answer.

That it was the third time the Elector had prest him vpon this subiect, but hee could giue him no other answer then the former. That it rested in the Duke of Bouillon to come and confesse his faults and to demand pardon: the which if he had done, he would willingly haue receiued him with open armes as a father doth his children. That Bouillon had done him bad seruices, and did continue them still. That he was accused, but hee desired that the accusations might not be verified as they are. That their informations were not good, as Monsieur the Elector knew well, neither was it needfull to tell it vnto them. That he was not bound to giue any account to them, their Masters, or to any others. That they should remember where they were, and in what estate he was.

That he had meanes to doe good to his friends, and not to feare his enemies. That Monsieur de Bouillon was subiect, and that hee desired not that they should offer their Cautions for him, or that they should deale with his affaires, no more then he would with any others.

To conclude, if Monsieur de Bouillon desired restitution, he should come and submit himselfe. ly craue pardon. That he had giuen his promise by word vnto the Elector Palatine. That he made no doubt of the continuance of their masters affection towards him, who hee confessed had assisted him at his need, and that they should not repent them to haue done it, C that he for his part would alwayes remaine their friend.

The Iesuits doe cunningly make their profit of this goodly humour wherein they now saw the King vpon the termes of clemency. They had obtained their repaile as wee haue said: at the voyage of Metz: but the Pyramide set vp for an eternall mark, of a most detestable Parricide, and a perpetuall memory of a iust publike reuenge, was a very troublesome moete in their eyes, wherefore they would not returne into Paris vntil they had obtained a demolition. In the end it was granted them in the moneth of May at the instant pursuit of Father Cotton. Iustice had caused to be built, and Mercy to bee ruined: a blow with a knife giuen vpon the face of our great King, had caused it to bee set in the most eminent place of the world. All men thought it should haue stood after a thousand Ages, but it scarce continued one age. Such is the certainty of humane things: Thus the strongest resolutions are subiect to change: Thus counells alter according to occurrences.

But we must subiect our selues to the pleasure of the Prince, to whom his estate is generally bound, to will what he wils, and not to accuse any one for this demolition, lest wee should accuse his commandement, who hath onely right to say amongst his subiects, Such is our pleasure. But from second causes let vs ascend to the first and Soueraigne, who gouernes the hearts of Kings by himselfe, and disposeth them to receiue such counells as hee thinkes good. The eternall providence provides for accidents according to the necessitie of the State, and the continuall vigilancy of our Henry knowes the motiues which presse him to the resolutions which he takes. It is not therefore lawfull for any to iudge of that with impatience which they vnderstand not. The King perswades himselfe that if the Iesuits haue heretofore beene blinshed in their honours, the remembrance of his bounty and fauour will binde them the more hereafter.

The like fauour he also shewed vnto the Marquesse of Verneuil: for shee hauing the space of seuen whole moneths effected the intention of the Decree giuen against her, his Maiesty thought that his Proctor generally, had not onely had time enough to bring new informations against her if there were any; but also that her actions and carlage had giuen an ample testimony of her innocency. Shee therefore besought the King to giue her leaue to take her course in his Court of Parliament, and required that a briefe delay might be giuen to the Proctor generally to furnish her accusation, and to make his proofes: And that for want thereof he should be no more receiued, and she declared innocent of the crimes wherewith she had been charged.

Thus his Maiesty holding it not reasonable that his clemencie & accustomed bounty, should suffer the Marquesse to passe the remainder of her dayes in the doubtfulness of such an accusation, and that she should bee exposted to the perill of the hatred and slander of any one that should haue will to annoy her: he declared by his Letters, giuen in September at Fountainbleau, that as she had not forgotten her selfe in the particular affection where-

A wherewith he had honoured her: So had she made proofe of the obedience and fidelity which she did owe him, desiring nothing more then to bee iustified of the fact for the which shee had bene called in question: In like manner hee would not forget the affection hee had borne her, and the naturall children hee had by her. Wherefore he ordained that all pursuits and searches against her should wholly cease, and that from that time shee should bee restored and liue in full libertie of her person, and goods, in the same manner as shee had bene before the beginning of the Proceesse. Hee did abolish and suppress for euer the memory of the crimes wherewith shee had bene charged, so as she hath no feare hereafter to be called in question by the Iustice: And hee dispensed B with her for not presenting her selfe in person to cause these Letters of Abolition to be registred in the Court of Parliament, the which were verified there the sixth day of September.

The taking of the Count of Auvergne had ouerthrowne one of the strongest pillars of this tower of confusion, which threatened to aduance it selfe against France: but the whole building was not like to fall at this blow. For many wrought silently vpon the foundations which the Marshall of Biron had laid in diuers Prouinces of Guienne, namely, in Perigord, Quercy and Limosin, and they sprung vp also in Auvergne, where as the coales did yet smooke which the chiefe fire-brand of this combustion had lately kindled. Languedoc was not free. The Luquisses and others their Adherents had diuers enterprizes vpon the C townes of Narbone, Agde, and Beziers; the which were discouraged by a singular fauour wherewith the Soueraigne Protector of this Monarchy hath alwayes blest it, and the confederates rewarded according to their meritis.

There were already a thousand or twelue hundred Gentlemen which had giuen their faith to declare themselves vpon the first occasion. The faction fortified daily: This Ganguene did hourly seize vpon some new member, and might in the end corrupt the whole body. The Seigneurs of La Force, Themines, and others who commanded in those quarters vnder the Kings Authority, had charge to crosse the attempts of these mutines. La Force hauing intelligence of an assembly which was made in Gascony, whereas some of his owne allies did assist, preferring the publike interest and his Maiesties commandement, D before all other respects, he came suddenly vpon them, tooke foure or fise, & dispersed the rest, some here, some there. Themines was as troublesome vnto them in other places. Belin a Captaine of Gascony, of the faction of Guienne, a bold and resolute man, promisheth to kill him. But God would make him an instrument to discover some part of this Cabal, which was not yet well knowne. His courage failed him, being ready to doe the execution: And finding his designe diuerted by some heavenly motion, hee came secretly to the Court, where casting himselfe at his Maiesties feet, hee demanded pardon, the which he obtained, and declared that the practice was great and common to many Prouinces, but as yet they had no other designe, but to send some of their company vnto his Maiesty to make complaint of the peoples charge, and of the bad Iustice which was administered by E his Officers, and other things whereof they would demand reformation. These were ordinary and goodly pretexts for such as sought to fish in a troubled water, and vnder the shew of publike good make themselves fat with the wretched povertie of the people, alwayes more susceptible of bad then of good impressions.

The King called one thousand and two hundred Frankes to bee giuen to Belin, hee commanded him to returne amongst them, and to discover particularly the Authors and their motiues. He returnes soone after, being gratified with a second liberalitie for the second voyage: He reported, amongst other particularities, that about twenty of the conspirators were at Chapelle Biron with the Lord of the place; That sending them a Pardon they will giue ouer the enterprize, who might informe his Maiesty of more then he, who could not pierce into the depth of it. Themines carries it them in forme, and doth summon them to returne to their obedience, from the which they had salne to their own ruines. They answer, that the pardon must be general for them of Auvergne, and for the rest of Guienne: that moreover, hauing not attempted any thing against the Kings seruice, they did not thinke they had need of any pardon.

Notwithstanding some companies of horse and foot, sent by his Maiesty to quench these first flames of rebellion, and to assist a Chamber of enquire appointed by the King at Limoges, consisting of the Parliaments of Paris and Bourdeaux, caused most of this troope troope that was ready to reuolt, to come before the punishment, and not to grow obstinate against force and duty. Some offered to come and demand their Pardons in person. And his Maiestie knowing that great offences haue not alwayes great punishments, but in the most culpable; he was contented that few should suffer the punishments due to the rashness of many.

The Baron of Caluerac of Quercy: the Seigneurs of Gaispel, Lymosins; Penigondan and Chassain, Perigourdins and Capitaine Mathelin base brother to Caluerac lost their heads. Chapelle, Biron, Tayac, Gyuerac, Balsignac, Lugagnac, and Reygnac, were executed in Picture, and some others imprisoned, did coole the courage of many hot braines that were ready to reuolt, and restrained such as finding no worse houses then their owne, fought and tooke an occasion for a cause to better their priuate affaires by a publike reuolt.

The Prince of Orange, returned to his principalitie.

The Churches which carie the title of Reformed in France, were for their affaires assembled at Chasteleraud. Maurice Earle of Nassau, takes occasion to write vnto them in fauour of Philip Prince of Oranges his brother, and to complaine that many as well of the Nobility of the country, as of the Inhabitants of Oranges, did seek to hinder the restoring of his authority, which the liberty of the last troubles had expelled; although that he had often promised, and did now passe his word, neuer to alter any thing touching their safety, but to suffer them to enioy the like liberty that the other Churches of France did, and to deliuer the government of the castle into the hands of a Gentleman, whose piety, zeale, valor, and integritie might not be called in question. Blacons a Gentleman of Dauphiné, held it by succession since the death of his father: Neither Philip nor Maurice had any occasion to loue him: for he had alwayes neglected their requests and reiected their commandements. The Prince had often complained that he couered his policy with the cloake of Religion, to vsurpe his goods and authoritie, and that hee had lately thought to pre-occupate the Deputies of the said assembly, to giue them an impression of a sinister intent of their lawfull and naturall Lord against the Church of Oranges, contrary to the declarations and promises which he hath often giuen them.

Count Maurice doth now make himselfe caution for the assurance thereof: and intreats the Synode to assist his brother with all fauour for his restitution to the Inheritance of his Grandfathers, and to take for assurance the faith which he gaue them by his Letters; and which he promised to giue more expressly (if need were) to any one amongst them that they should chooe to receiue it from his mouth. That by the dismissal of Blacons, and the change of the Government which he called tyrannous, into one that should bee lawfull and well ordered, there should be nothing altered nor diminished concerning the safety of the Church of Oranges, nor any prejudice done to the Kings seruice, who had long desired that the Prince of Orange should be put in full possession of his principality. Thus the Prince countenanced by his Miesties expresse commandement, together with the testimonie which the Earle gaue them, touching the intention of his elder brother, recovered that which he had long feared, and afterwards he married Eleanor of Bourbon, sister to Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, and first Peere of France, a faire and virtuous Lady.

The death of Theodore Beza.

They of Geneva doe now weepe for the death of the first and most ancient Pastor of their Church. They loued Theodore Beza liuing, and they lament him dead: for God had adorned him with graces which may make a man amiable, profitable and commendable amongst men. He was borne the 24 day of Iune in the yeere of our Lord 1519 at Vazelay in Fougundy, his father and mother being Noble, hee was bred vp by Nicholas de Beza his Vncle, a Councillor of the Court of Parliament at Paris vnder the discipline of Melchior Volmar a Germane, professor of the Greeke tongue in the Vniuersitie of Orleans, and afterwards at Bourges. Vnder whom he professed so well in seuen yeares, as at fiftene he not onely gaue a good and sufficient reason of the Doctrine contained in the most famous authors of Greeke and Latine, but also did answer pertinently in all humane and liberrall Sciences. He had a naturall inclination to Poetry, and being very yong, did publish some licentious Epigrams, whereof he sought to deface the memory, as of the first flowers of his Spring.

At the age of twenty yeares, he was made Licentiate of the ciuill Law, and was furnished with good reuennues in benefices, but he left all, to retire himselfe where that he might

A might liue according to the Religion, which did then multiply in Christendom vnder the name of the Reformed. He serued the Seignury of Bearne for the space of ten yeares, as professor of the Greeke tongue in their Vniuersitie of Lauzanne; and that of Geneva, in quality of Minister and Professor in Diuinity, from the yeare 1560, vnto the 13 of Ianuary 1600. On which day he expounded for his last Sermon, the third Petition of the Lords Prayer, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven, in the eightieth yeare of his age. For hee would not suffer his decrepitude to liue in idleness, as long as he should haue any strength to labour in his vocation. Hee concluded the rest of his course with a firme iudgement, a sound vnderstanding, and a memory not altogether decayed, in prayers, meditations, and serious discourses: giuing alwayes graue and solid reasons of that which was propounded vnto him, either in matters of Diuinitie, or in Politicke affaires: saying hourly with Lord Augustine, I haue liued long, and sinned long: Blessed be the name of the Lord. And, Lord finish that which thou hast begonne, that I suffer not shipwracke in the Port. And thus repeating many other Oracles, drawne out of the Authority of the holy Scripture, vntill that the Eclipse of the Sun, which was in October, had somewhat increased his infirmitie, yet without paine. His Colleagues thought it fit, that at least two of their company should alwaies be about him to assist him with their faithfull exhortations, and recommend him to the grace of God. Thus attending the last will and pleasure of God, the 23 of October, hauing caused himselfe to be taken vp about seuen of the clocke in the morning, hee made his accustomed prayers in his family, and walked a litle vp and downe his chamber, then as it were feeling the time come wherein he must end the trauels of this life, he demanded if all were well in the town: being answered, yea, hee caused himselfe to be laid in his bed, whereas his senses did suddenly faile him in the midst of a prayer made by Perrot a Parisien, one of his Colleagues and neighbours, hee yeelded his soule happily vnto God, without pangs, without conuulsion, and without sighs, hauing liued fourescore and six yeares, three moneths, and nineteene dayes. A man of a reuerent aspect, of a sound iudgement, and happy memory, learned amongst the most learned, alwayes ready to resolue suddenly vpon all questions propounded, practised in any thing that did concerne the Church and government; capable of all abstruse matters, wonderfull eloquent, high in conceptions, quick in his deliuey, and graue in his carriage and discourse, but of an affable, sweet, and most pleasing conuersation.

Comets for the most part are prodigious, said an ancient Poet. Their Decrees are martiall and Mercuriall, that is to say, violent, cruell, fatall, mortall, vncertaine, diuers, mutable and warlike. All that followes, threatens nothing but stormes and tempests. The beginning of this yeare hath giuen vs one, the which shewed it selfe, the third of October the yeare before, in the seuenteenth degree of Sagittarius, Jupiter holding the nineteenth, Saturnus the eleuenth, and Mars the two and twentieth degree of the same Signe. At which time there was seene in Hungaria, a Rain-bow as red as blood, which staid at diuers times vpon Cocker, vpon Strigonia, and vpon Mount Saint Thomas, and then vanished away. This bearded Starre was neere in greatnesse and likeness to that which was obserued in the yeare 1573, whereof France, England, the Netherlands, Spaine, Portugall, Hungaria, and in a manner all Europe in general, haue felt but two mournfull effects. Many vnfortunate confellations which meet together, make the Astrologians foresee that it shall produce in that yeare and the following, great and diuers euents, which are so many Trumpets to summon vs to reforme the peruerse actions of our liues, so many warnings of the wrath of God, vpon those Nations which cannot vse those graces well which he giues them in his peace: yet his diuine Prouidence hath alwayes a watchfull eye, to guard those Princes whose reignes he blesteth.

That seditious mutiny in Guienne, that fearfull and prodigious powder-Treason in England, the violence whereof he hath so miraculously diuerted, are sufficient Lessons for them whom hee lately threatened. Behold now another, which teacheth vs, as at many other times, that the blowes of a secret enemy are hard to auoid, and that they must equally esteeme the conscience and friendship of those that shall breake it, at the first aduantage which treason or infidelitie shall open vnto them, without consulting with their consciences, whether it be lawfull to put the sickle into another mans corne, to reape the fruits which they haue not sowne; and whether with their honours they might treat with the subiects of another Prince to the prejudice of the publike peace, and the faith sworne in the

the name of God, Doubleſſe ſuch practiſes are more dangerous then the force of an open A enemy.

Ambaſſadors are ſacred perſons, and muſt be ſo held and intreated : but it followes not that their priuiledges are not reſtrained within certaine bounds and limits, the which they may not infringe without forcing of the law of Nations: they are not to be blamed if they be careful to aduertſe their Maſters of all occurrents. The very duty of their charge, the loue and ſeruice of their Maſter, and charity to their country doth excuſe them, when they bind thoſe vnto them which may fit them with intelligences. But curſed be thoſe ſubiects whom couetouſneſſe and ambition tranſport to practiſes of Rebellion and Treachery.

Don Balithazar of Suniga, Ambaſſador of Spain, will not haue the King his maſter thinke him leſſe indutious then his Predeceſſor, to win thoſe vnto him that would open their cares and hearts to the inticement of Strangers. Iohn Taxis hath conſidered all he could with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Earle of Fuentes, in corrupting many of the beſt qualified within the Realme, and others of meaner ſort, as the courſe of the Hiſtory hath obſerued. Suniga hath imitated them but too much ſince his coming into the Realme: as the Treaty of Entragues, and the laſt of the Earle of Auvergne doe witneſſe. They haue reaped nothing but ſhame and conuſion, as bad counſell is alwayes worſt to him that giues it. He is now ſuſpected to haue raiſed a Leuaine of the ſame Dough, whereof he ſhall eate the Cake with bitterneſſe.

Conſpiracie of Mairargues.

Mairargues a Gentleman of Prouence, was deputed vnto the King by the States of the country. But he was not long at Court before he made it appeare that they had giuen the purſe of the verieſt theefe. Some years before, hee had propounded vnto his Maieſtie to haue two gallies armed, for the defence of the port of Marſeilles, and the coaſts thereabouts : one of the ſlaues in theſe gallies, a man of ſpirit and cunning, giues him inventions to play the Pyrat, with great profit and ſmall ſhew, and he puts them in practice with happy ſucceſſe. Thus Mairargues finds him to be an active vnderſtander, and thinks him fit for ſome greater enterpriſe. He therefore vnſolds vnto him the web which he was weaving with the miniſters of Spaine : to deliuer the towne of Marſeilles to King Philip : a matter (ſaid he) which would not be hard to effect, ſeeing that by meanes of his gallies, he was maſter of the Port : beſides, to make his deſigne the more eaſie, he had by his practiſes gotten a promiſe to be choſen Viguier of the town for the next year, by which office having all power at Marſeilles, with the keyes of the ports and forts in his hand, hee ſhall hold the towne at his deuotion. The Galerien makes himſelfe capable to vnderſtand all the Quinteſſence of this Caballe, and of the meanes which the Author pretended to follow for the execution. Being well inſtructed in every point, hee lets the Duke of Guiſe vnderſtand, that if it pleaſe him to mediate his pardon and liberty, hee will diſcouer a matter vnto the King which imports his Eſtate, and adds withall, that he will deſire no liberty if it be not found true. The Duke giueſt aduice vnto the King, and the King commands him not to neglect any thing, that he ſhould learne all that might be knowne : for in matters of that conſequence, he muſt ſecke all meanes, and ſet all ſtones to worke. So the King E is aduertſed that Mairargues draws from the King of Spaine the pay for the whole entertainment of his Maieſties gallies, and that euery year hee puts the Kings pay into his coffers, beſides the penſion which he hath from the Spaniard, of whom he is (as it were) Admirall in the King his maſters veſſels. That he hath ſo aduanced his traffike, as hee was within a ſhort time to make the King of Spaine maſter of Marſeilles. At the ſame time Mairargues came to Court: the King cauſeth him to bee ſecretly knowne to La Varenne Gouernor of Angers, who vnder colour of his familiarity, obſerues him, and ſets ſuch watches over him, as the ordinary going and coming of a Flemming named Bruneau, Secretary to the Ambaſſador of Spaine into Mairargues lodging, made them iudge that they hatched an egge which would bring forth a bad Rauin. In ſurpriſing them they F might by the ſame meanes ſurpriſe the papers and inſtructions of their negotiations. La Varenne and de Fontis Lieutenant to the great Prouoſt, had the charge from the King. They do it ſo diſcreetly, as the 5 of December, being aduertſed that the Secretary was entred into Mairargues lodging, at the Signe of the Pantofle in the Cloiſter of S. Germaine of Auxerois, they goe and enquire to ſpeake with him about nine of the clocke at night: but vpon his ſeruants anſwer, that they could not ſpeake with him, being buſie with one in his cabinet touching ſome affaires, they cauſed one of the Archers to entertaine his men with

A with a tale, and in the meane time goe vp to his chamber, whereas they heare at his Study doore a part of their diſcourſe. Coming out of the Study, de Fontis laid hold vpon Mairargues, who euen then pronounced his owne condemnation. I am a dead man (ſaid he,) but if the King will giue me my life, I will diſcouer great matters vnto him. The Secretary would haue drawne his ſword, but they put him preſently into ſafe keeping. The Preſident Tarin being appointed, with Sillery Keeper of the great Seale, to examine them in the preſence of Lomenie Secretary of State, they diſcouered that they ſhould ſoon put in execution, that which they had long before profeſſed. The Secretary was carried priſoner to the Chaſſeler, and Mairargues to the Baſtile. The Papers which were found as well in B Mairargues chamber and Study, as about the Secretarie being hidden vnder his garters betwixt two ſtockings, did ſufficiently proue the fact.

Notwithſtanding his Maieſty according to his cuſtome tempering the ſeueritie of his iuſtice, with the mildneſſe of his clemency, knowing, that Mairargues was allied to the Duke of Montpenſier, and to the Cardinall of Joyeuſe, by reaſon of his wife, he ſent them word, that in reſpect of them, and for their ſakes, he gaue Mairargues his life, but he ſhould remaine in perpetuall priſon. Their anſwer merites to be regiſtered in our Hiſtory, being generous and like true French-men: to ſerue for a leſſon to poſterity, that the Princes ſeruice, and the loue of our country, is to be preferred before all reſpect of friendſhip, alliance, or kindred. They moſt humbly thanke the King, and beſeech his Maieſtie not to C breake the courſe of Iuſtice in fauour of them; That they ſhould bee alwayes glad, that France ſhould be freed from ſuch ſoules: That treachery is ſo hateful vnto them, as they themſelues would be the executioners, if there were not any other to be found. So the Proceſſe being already inſtructed in the Councell, and by the great Prouoſt, it was ſent to the Court of Parliament to be finiſhed according to the accuſtomed forme. The Ambaſſador hearing of the detention of his Secretary, and of the cauſe thereof, he demands audience : where hee complains, that by his Maieſties commandement, his Secretarie was committed to priſon: he cries out with great vehemency, that it was to violate the priuiledges of Ambaſſadors, and to doe him great wrong by impriſoning him, a greater in detaining him, but moſt of all in examining him. That hee had not practiſed Mairargues;

D but contrariwiſe Mairargues had very importunately ſought him. That neither the Ambaſſador, nor the Secretary of a foraine Prince, are bound to reſuſe the Kings ſubiects to haue acceſſe vnto their houſe, nor to forbear to heare ſuch as would make propoſitions and offers vnto them, for their Maſters ſeruice. That they are bound to aduertſe him of ſuch offers, and are not tyed to reueale to the King of France the bad ſeruices of his ſubiects. That there is not any good ſeruant nor miniſter of the King of Spaine, which doth not wiſh and procure by all his endeauours, the increaſe of his greatneſſe, yea, of the abſolute Monarchy of the whole world if it might be. That the King of Spaine their Maſter, hath not made ſo great brute of an enterpriſe made by the French in Granado, vpon ſome places of importance. He doth not ſtorke at their ordinary practiſes in Nauarre, Biſcay, E in Flanders, and other places of the Archdukes country, nor the ſuccours of men, money, artillerie and munition, which the King doth viſibly giue, vnto his maſters rebellious ſubiects. That the King of Spaine was a little moued, to heare that the King reioyced too openly at the good ſucceſſe of Cont Maurice and the Eſtates, & was grieved at their loſſes. That the world will witneſſe with the Catholike King, that hee doth patiently beare the bad offices which are done him dayly by the Kings ſubiects, to the preiudice of the peace ſworne betwixt France and Spaine. That La Boderie being with the Archdukes for the Kings ſeruice, had ſought to praſtiſe the Earles of Vanden-bergh, and a Secretary of the Archdukes, yea, by the inducions of his Maieſties chiefe Councellers and Secretaries. And yet neither the King of Spaine, nor the Archdukes, did euer make any complaint, or demand Iuſtice. To conclude, that hee neuer made any motion to Mairargues, but to haue him to goe into Flanders. That his Maieſtie ſhould be better pleaſed to haue them fauour that party, rather then that of the Enemies of the Catholike Religion. And that if his Secretarie were not deliuered, hee profeſſed of violence done to the liberty and ſafety of his charge, which is the greateſt offence that may be done to the King his Maſter in his perſon.

But he that will haue credit giuen to his words, muſt beware that his writings doe not contradiſt them. The inſtructions lately ſurpriſed ſing another note of a contrary tenor:

And who knowes not that the King of Spaine, since the peace of Veruins hath openly A supported the Duke of Sauoy his brother-in-law, against the King, to maintaine him in the possession of those places which he had vnrped of this Crowne? how much doth the Fort built by the Earle of Fuentes import his Maiestie, not only for that it doth annoy his Allies, but also for that it doth hinder the passage and intercourse of the French into Italy? What be the ordinary practices both open and secret of the Ministers of Spaine, to distract the Swisses and Grisons from the Kings friendship? The onely treachery of Loffe, who discovered all the secrets of the Councell, hath he not done more wrong to his Maiesties seruice, then all that which the Spaniard can pretend against vs? The defection of the Marshall of Biron corrupted by the presents and hopes of strangers, is it not a sufficient B proofe of the small esteeme, which King Philip makes of an oath, which he had sworne to obserue the peace? A stranger to be found treating at an vn due houre, with a treacherous subiect, against the publike faith, against the duty of an Ambassadour and Minister to a King, who makes profession of friendship with ours, to cause him to lose one of the most important Townes of his Realme: and shall there bee no law to assure himselfe of his person, nor to cause him to be examined, to discover the truth, and vncloud the face of Diffimulation in a matter of such consequence? The priuiledges of an Ambassadour are not so generally, but they are restrained, not to seeke by sinister meanes to suborne the subiects of a Prince, neare vnto whom he doth reside: and vnder colour of Peace and friendship, to practice against his Estate. Notwithstanding, the King assures him by the vertue of C his royall word and promise, there shall be no wrong done vnto his Secretarie: hee is too great a friend, and a fauourite to Iustice and Equitie, to violate the Rights of an Ambassadours charge.

Finally, as the Ministers of Spaine haue giuen the King great occasion, to hope for little friendship from them, since the peace of Veruins, hauing either begonne or nourished to many fittall Designes to the pruiidence of this Estate, and the publike tranquillity, as the truth of the History doth teach vs: so future ages will not finde it strange, if hee hath desired that they should not subdue them whom they rearme their Rebels. In this consideration, his Maiestie hath bene more ready and willing to restore them the money, wherewith they had supplied his wants during the warres. Hee hath not in truth D made shew to desire their ruine and destruction: yet hath hee not assisted them with Artillery nor Munition, as the Ambassadour pretends. Many of his subiects bred vp in martiall discipline, goe to seeke their fortunes in Hungary, with the Archdukes, and with the Estates, neither is it in his Maiesties power to make them change their inclinations, to serue the one rather then the other. The warre of the Low-countries hath not Religion for the obiect. It is a meere warre of State, covered with a goodly and plausible pretext to giue the greater lustre to the cause of the assilant. This maske cannot serue him any longer, to disguise the truth of his conceptions. And if there were any question made to fight for the Catholike Religion, France would neuer attend to haue a summons from Spaine: shee would alwayes display her Ensignes first in field, as shee hath E cuer done in former ages. As for the Conspiracies pretended by Suniga, against the Estates of King Philip and the Archdukes: it is well knowne, that some broken by the Racke, and excess of torments, others terrified with the horrour of threats, and some wonne by the promises of recompence, hath babbled something. But what likelihood is there, that a people which knowes not how to pardon, would haue sent backe so many prisoners, if they could haue conuicted them of any crime? The King denies not but hee hath sometimes suffered his seruants to make such propositions of themselves, to haue wherewithall at need to crosse the ambushes and bad offices of the King of Spaines ministers. Yet it can neuer be verified, that his Maiesty hath commanded them to proceed, nor that he hath caused his Ambassadors to make Treaties to the prui- F dice of the Princes, where his Maiesty doth entertaine them, as the Ambassadors of Spaine haue often done, and now lately with Mairargues the prisoner. The question is not now of going to serue in Blanders, and if there were no other crime, is it not capital in a subiect which goes to serue a foraine Prince without the liberty of his Soueraigne? The Archdukes Agent had likewise engaged Terrail and many others, without any respect that he was a household seruant to the King, & particularly bound to the company of my Lord the Dauphin. The Governor of Perpignan hath done the like with the Luquisses and

A and their companions, to deliuer many places in Languedoc, to the Spaniard. As for Bodieres treating with the Earles of Vandenberg, his Maiestie is ignorant thereof: while he did happily let them vnderstand how much he did esteeme their valour and generosity: neither are they held to be borne subiects to the Archdukes, but Germanes. La Bodiere did feelee the Secretaries pulse, that it was with his priuity, but with no other designe, but to learne newes by his meanes, the which is not reproachfull in Ambassadors, who seeke to serue their Masters wel in like cases. His Maiesty doth excuse the Castilians for the corruption of Loffe, to whom he knowes they addrest themselves to the like end. But when these Treaties passe vnto practices, such as they haue pursued with Mairargues, the Luquisses, B and others named in the History, at diuers times, who had no other end, but to ouerthrow the Realme vpon his Maiesties head, and to ruine it quite. An open warre would be more honorable for Princes, and more profitable for their Estates, then to nourish vnder the ashes of a fained friendship, fuming firebrands to kindle a horrible combustion vpon the first occasion in their Estates, who thinke themselves assured vnder the shadow of publike tranquillitie.

The Ambassadors words had moued the King beyond his owne nature. But behold he is now flung to the quicke by the Castilians reply. The King of England (said he) in that which concerns the estate of the Netherlands, doth better obserue the Peace and friendship which he hath promised vs, although he be of a contrary Religion. Some man thinks C to reuenge a shame, which doth increase it. All comparisons are odious: and this doth not serue his turne that did alledge it. His Maiestie did riet this nayle with such quicknesse and viuacitie, as he would gladly haue recalled his words: For (said the King) the King of England hath begun beimes to know what trust may be expected from the Ministers of Spaine. I thinke also that hereafter I shall haue the like occasion to commend them. Notwithstanding, as I am content to entertaine peace & good correspondency with your Master if he giue me occasion: So I shall alwayes bee ready to encounter him that shall inuite me. I will cause my selfe to be informed of the grounds and truth of those things wherewith your Secretary is charged, and will afterwards cause you to be aduertised thereof, to know if you will aduoe them or not, and according to your answer, aduise D what I haue to doe. Thus the Ambassadour retired, discontent on the one side, that hee could not returne home with his Secretarie; but on the other, being forced to admire his Maiesties courage and wisdom, who doth not any thing in matters of consequence, but with wise counsell, and mature deliberation. Great men doe easily preferre the aduantage of an apparant profit before the breach of Faith.

Our Henry doth gouerne himselfe after another manner. Hee knowes that Faith must be inuolubly kept: euen with enemies, seeing it is the ground and foundation of humane society. This Bruneau conuicted of crime, hee could not be honestly aduowed by his Master, and to disauow him were to deliuer him into the hands of the Kings Iustice. But hee E is so moderate and temperate a Prince, as hee can quit part of his Right to them, that hee could bring into a tragicke Theater, to play a part there fit for so audacious an enterprife. Mairargues alone suffered the punishment of his offence, being condemned the nineteenth of December. The same day hee lost his head at the Greece, and his body was quartered, the which were hung vp at the entry of the chiefe Ports of the City. His head was caried to Marfeilles, and set vpon a Lance ouer the chiefe Port of the Towne. His goods were confiscate to the King, reseruing 12000 Livers to the poore, 12000 to the reparation of the Palace, and 12000 for the Ports and Hauens of Marfeilles. Yet his Maiestie disposed a great part of this confiscation in fauour of the widow. Great summes, which shew that the treachery of this Gentleman, is so much the more detestable, for that he had good reuenues, and was well allied: and that the holy Scripture doth name couetousnesse the root of all euill, ioyned with Ambition and Treachery, pernicious Councillors of State, verifying the Oracle: That man hath no miseries but what hee procureth by his owne vice.

Hee might haue ended his dayes as gloriously vpon the Theater of Vertue, as hee died shamefully vpon an ignominious scaffold. Active spirits which cannot containe themselves in the calme of Peace, finde wherewith to make their courage famous, if any generousitie animates them to actions which the spurre of Honour excites in the noblest resolutions. The example of Guy Earle of Lauall inuited him to this tryall. Age and Force had scarce brought this Nobleman to this commendable ambition, to learne the Art of A those whom Nature had bred of that quality to runne this Fortune. But behold, hee goes to seeke some schoole of Mars, to be as well instructed in the schoole of Honour, as he had beene in the differences of Religion, against the precepts of his birth and first institution. He obtained leave of the King, and parted from Paris the 29 of August, being followed by fiftene or fixtene Gentlemen, with a traine fit for his quality, vnder the conduct of Marsuilles, a Gentleman of Sologne, being famous for that he had slaine in single combat with a Lance Little Marivaunt, despairing to follow the deceased King his good Master: the King had lately made choise of him, to temper the violent heat of this young apprentice, and to keepe him from running into danger vnadvisedly. He was honoured by the Duke B of Lorraine at Nancy: from thence hee tooke his way to Strausbourg, Stuckart, Vlme, Newbrough, Ingolstadt, Ratisbone, and Vienne. He saluted the Arch-duke Matthias in a country-house, (whither, as the brute was, the Plague had drawne him) who seemed to adde something extraordinarily in the honours he did him, it may be by reason of the House of Arragon, whereunto that of Laual is allied. The 13 of October he came vnto the Imperiall Armie, which camped about Comorth, too weake to raise the siege of Strigonia, which the Turke did presse: all the Noblemen of the armie, and especially George Bass Lieutenant general of the Emperors, receiued him with all the honour and demonstrations of loue they could.

Strigonia being yeelded by the treachery of the Germanes, the Turkes dis-banding by C troops, gaue him occasion, to make prooffe of the affection which hee bare vnto this holy warre, in many encounters, skirmishes, alarms, taking of places, and other stratagems, whereas men of honour shew their resolutions. The 25 of Nouember gaue him a favourable opportunity, wherein hee did shew himselfe the true sonne of his father, who with the greatnesse of his courage surmounted the finalnesse of his body, and Grand-child to a Grand-father, who in the flower of his age, had purchased the title of Knight without feare. Fourteene or fiftene thousand horse charged a Regiment of Reistres, which made the retreat; when as the French and Wallons with the whole army following flaid their fury, and made them to recouer the top of a mountaine: yet often turning head, and witnessing that Feare had not put wings to their feet. In this retreat the Earle of Laual D was noted to haue done as much as any noble spirit encouraged by the sight of an enemy might do, alwayes the last with his followers in the reer-ward, and the first to make head, if the enemy did offer to charge.

But he had scarce made the first flames of his heat to shine, when as behold the 3 of December quencht him in an instant, when as they began to promise more glistering beames. The Turke came to charge the fore-ward in the morning: at this alarm he armes, but so hastily as he gaue his people no leisure to make fast the Garter which should tye his tassets at the knee. He leapes into the saddle, and runnes with his traine into the hottest of the fight. The ioy he had to be in so good an encounter, making him to lose all apprehension of danger. His Armes being guilt, made the enemy to note him for a man of quality. E They discharge a shewer of Arrowes, and shot vpon him: one pierceth the neather plate of his tassets hanging loose, and so past through his thigh into his body. Le Frasny Lieutenant Colonel to Cont Bingraff, who led the French and Wallons, and Captain Bourgle-Roye, who commanded a company in this Regiment, are commended for that they desired to succour him being thus charged, if the Marshall of the campe had not forbidden them to breake their ranks, vpon paine of death.

The enemy sometime chafing, sometime chafed, desired nothing more then to retire, seeing all the Christian armie to aduance: when as the Earle of Laual breathing more courage then life, returned to the charge, and pursued them a good League, vnto a riuers side, whereas there were one thousand and fye hundred slaine and drowned, F and nine Cornets, with many good horses taken. The riuer, and the greatnesse of his wound stayed him suddenly: hee begonne to stagger. They laid him vpon the ground, and finding himselfe to grow faint, hee called for a little Wine, the which hee had no sooner taken, but lifting his eyes, and hands to heauen, hee ended the trauels of this miserable life, to exchange it with the rest of the most blessed. Happy to haue dyed in the bed of honour, in a iust and holy quarrell, which many of his ancestors had sealed with the same seale; and most happy to haue left that commendable memory to

Earle of Laual.

A posteritic, neuer to haue giuen any man subiect to complaine of him His body was honorably conducted to Vienne: his followers did not forget any thing, to let those Nations know, in what ranke they held their Master. His bowels were solemnly interred in the most honourable place of the Quire in the Franciscans Church, iust by the Queene of Frances tombe. The body was conuayed with honour and respect into France, and dorso now rest at Laual attending the comming of the Soueraigne Iudge.

If there bee an arme to root out the wicked, there is another to maintaine the good. Three years of imprisonment in the Bastille (as we haue shewed) haue giuen his Maiefty leisure to know, that there was nothing in the actions of Mombarot, contrary to the fidelity B which he hath heretofore sealed by many worthy acts, in occasions which had bin offered to the establishment of his royall authoritie. His onely sonne had many times cast himselfe at the Kings feet, beseeching him, that seeing his fathers enemies could not conuict him of any crime, it will please his Maiefty to giue him that liberty, which slander, the cruellest torment which a generous minde could feare, had taken from him: Or to suffer him that by his company he might comfort him in his misery, by the seruice which nature binds the sonne to doe vnto the father.

The King moued with the pitie of the sonne, and the innocency of the father, verified by so long a tryall: He presently dischargeth Mombarot in the month of December, from all subiect of his detention, disanulling all pursuits, all Decrees and Iudgements gi- C uen vpon this subiect, so as he might neuer bee molested, nor it preiudice his reputation, no more then that which had beene done by him heretofore within his gouernment, during the troubles past, for his Maiesties affaires, the which are heretofore allowed by other Letters Patents. And moreover, he did restore him to his full liberty, & to the possession of all his goods without further trouble. But not to his gouernment, whereunto (to auoid iealousie, and to entertaine concord among his Officers) he had aduanced the Seigneur of Bethunes lately his Ambassador at Rome.

Thus the King hauing disperst the clouds which threatned France with a Chaos of diuers confusions in general, and taken away the subiect of great partialities for the gouernment of the town of Rennes, there is nothing now that doth afflit his spirit but the affairs D of Sedan; being resolute to bring him to that estate as his Maiefty should not need to haue any feare hereafter on that side, no more then on the other, whereas he hath lately quencht the first flames which haue caused a dangerous fire within the Realme.

The King prepares with all the speed he may, for the siege of Sedan; whilst the people of Paris view the rich beautifyings and new decorations of their capitall City. It hath the last obligation to Master Francis Miron Councillor of State to the King, Lieutenant ciuill in the Prouosty of Paris, and heretofore Prouost of Merchants. Dignities where- with the noble Families of the City thinke themselves honoured, as with the first public Magistrate of the first citie of the world; Paris doth now glory to see her towne- house beautified with a pleasing fore-front, and other goodly buildings. To see her pub- E like commodities increased, with a stately Port at the Tournelle, & that of the temple repaired, which the miseries of former ages had kept shut about forty years. To see before the gate of the sacred temple of Royall Iustice, a goodly Fountaine to spring vp, which doth wash that foule and detestable fury lately marked by a Pyramide, for a Monument which they presumed should haue beene eternal. To see the corners of the streets watered with many other Fountains, which will for ever refresh the memory of their restorer. Many streets opened, and paved to void the filth and the corrupt waters. Many bridges of Stone made. Many Ports built anew, and paved for the common ease: and many waterings restored. Finally, Paris commends him to haue done more for her ornament in two years, then his Predecessors had scarce done in twogages: and doth honour so many acts F done by Miron, of piety towards the poore, and strangers, to the sicke and diseased, and to the Church; of wisdom and fidelitie to the common good, to the administration of the publicke Treasure, in his good husbandry, and employing it for the beautifying of the City, in discharge of her debts. in the charges and rents of her demeanes, for his loue to his country, and his care and diligence to produce fo many goodly effects, which recommended his Magistracie, for his painfull indeauours, for the which hee hath made this abridgement of the world to flourish. For his great affection, by the which knowing that his owne health was ioyned with that of the common-weale, hee hath not respected enue, nor hatred, which doth commonly follow vertue (as the shadow doth the body) A in regard of that pleasing contentment which a good conscience brings to man, whose actions feare neither censure, nor Ostracisme, to that sweet consolation to leave his charge with lesse gaine, but more honour; and to haue by his commendable actions, giuen the King himselfe subiect to propound vnto the successor, the example of his predecessor when as he went to deliuer into his Maiesties hands the keyes and scales of the towne. His Maiesty at the same time gaue audience to the Petitions and Declarations of the Clergy being assembled at the Augustines in Paris. They insisted vpon the afflictions of the Church which was troubled. They required with great vehemency to haue the Council of Trent receiued. They shew the abules of symonies, and confidencies: And do recommend the choise of capable men in elections. The King acknowledged that all which they had said was true. The Church is afflicted: so he desires to do any thing that depends of him for the restoring thereof. If the publication of the Council be sufficient to restore it, he hath desired it, and doth desire to see the effect: but humane considerations doe many times crosse them of heaven, notwithstanding he will alwayes imploy both blood and life, for that which shall be to the good of the Church and seruice of God. As for Symonies, & confidencies, his Maiesty did exhort them to begin the cure by themselves, and to prouoke others by their examples to doe well. They are witness how he proceeds in elections. Those which he hath established differ much in sufficiency and merits, C others of former times; and the report which the Clergy it selfe hath made vnto his Maiesty, will double his courage to doe better hereafter.

To conclude, the King assured them as a good Prince, of his affection and sinceritie to any thing that did concerne the peace of the Church, and the protection of them which seruie at the Altar. But wishall he spake some words vnto them like a good father: that he was offended at the length of their assembly, at the great number of deputies and the factions that were among them. Remember (said his Maiesty) that you are now readie to enter into Lent, what your charges bee, and that your presences are necessary in your Churches. By your tediousnesse you driue the poore Curats to hunger and despair. I will ioyne with them, and with the honestest of your company, to take order for the long D time which you haue spent in your assembly, finally make accompt of my firme affection, to the seruice of God and to your protection. The Marshall of Bouillon had in the meane time by his submissions disposed the King to impart vnto him an equall or greater fauour, then before his disgrace: but his Maiesty did not yet finde them so free, as he might conceiue a full assurance, for the intercessions of the Queene of England, in the beginning of his retreat, of the Count Palatine, of the Marquis of Brandenburg, of Anspach, of Bade, and of many cantons of the leagues, by expresse Ambassadors, together with the Marshalls long stay without the Realme, as wee haue seene, made them presume that hee had forsok himselfe with diuers forain friendships, so as the King would haue him come in person to iustifie himselfe, and to see him of this imagination. His Maiesty doth summon him like a good Master and his best friend, and being alwayes more inclined to clemencie then seueritie, he desired rather to induce him by amiable callings, then by Soueraine Authoritie, or lawfull commandements.

Heretofore hee had sent Montlouis vnto him; and of late dayes La Noue to that end, yet their persuasions were not of sufficient force to disperse all the subiects of distrust which he had conceiued: neither could hee resolute to come but with speciall warrant, his friends doe what they can to entertaine this good will which the King doth now witness vnto him: but with all they know what his Maiesties resolution is if hee obeyes not, and exhorting him speedily to content his bounty, by a full and not limited satisfaction, they incite him to follow his duty, and to fly his danger.

The King was well pleased with the mediation of the Princeesse Dowager of Orange, by whom his Maiesty grants him freely all that he demands, so as (saith he) he doth witness by his actions that he deserves my fauour. But it is reason (addes the King) that granting vnto the Duke of Bouillon all the assurance he requires, he should giue mee such a pawnee of his fidelity, as I may not hereafter doubt of his duty. This pawnee which the King demands, is the guard of the Cattle of Sedan; giuing his word not to place any gouernour, nor garison, but of the religion receiued in the estate of Sedan: and not to praiudice the

A quiet of that Church, nor the rights and reuenues of the Lord; but onely to bee assured that this place hereafter shall not be in case to hurt him.

The Duke of Bouillon is amazed at this newes, he thinks that to deprive him of this possession, is to exclude him from all tolerable conditions. He makes many offers. He beseecheth his Maiesty to take both his person and the Souerainie of Sedan into his protection. He offers to receiue his Maiesty with all the honour that is due vnto him, with what company he pleased, without limitation, without restriction, and to beat downe the Cattle gates for his entry, the conditions of the protection being by the Kings good pleasure concluded, signed, and verified as they ought. He consents that the Gouernor of the B Castle should take an oath of fidelity to the King conformable to the Articles of protection. And in case the Duke should infringe it, the Gouernor should be freed of the oath which he owes him, to keepe the faith which he hath sworne to the King. That the like oath should be taken by the garison and inhabitants of Sedan. That hee will absent himselfe, if it did not please the King he should remaine there, and would lodge his wife and children, in some one of his houses within the Realme, to serue for an assurance to his Maiesty, with all his goods, and remaine so much the more bound to the full obseruation of faith which he owes vnto his said Maiesty.

But for all this, the King will not receiue him into grace, nor trust him vnlesse hee may haue this caution in his hands. The Duke on the other side will by no means dispossesse C himselfe of the guard of his Castle, and will rather endure all fortunes, all extremities, for it is no lesse troublesome vnto him to be spoiled of this place, then to bee separated from his owne moiety, from his flesh and bones: his Maiesty then resolues to constraine him to quit that by force which he will not doe by free will. The inhabitants of Sedan are much troubled, now they hold the Wolfe by the eare, they know not how to keepe him, nor how to let him goe. The Duke of Bouillon is their Lord: his affliction is theirs. Can they or may they abandon him whom God hath giuen them for their Lord? But on the other side, shall they grow obstinate against a mighty King, who is alwayes victorious, a King, against whose force they confesse themselves to be but dust? they therefore humbly beseech his Maiesty to spare a people, which heares nothing in their Assemblies but D vows for his prosperity, who see nothing but the Flower Deluce vpon the Cattle gates, who breathe nothing but seruice, and desire nothing more then to spend their bloods for the encrease of his Estate, and who abhorre to be reduced to that extremity, as to defend themselves for their owne preferuation. His Maiesty giues them his word, yea with an oath, that if he should take the place by assault, he would leaue the inhabitants of Sedan in the same estate they were, and would maintaine them in the same priuiledges, wherewith he did gratifie them of his Realme. That he had iust occasion to bee incensed against a subiect who runnes voluntarily to his owne ruine, for a thing without the which he might well subsist. That he will take this place from him, to take from him the meanes to doe ill, and will not touch the priuiledges of the towne, nor meaning to appropriate another mans E inheritance vnto himselfe, for he knoweth that the Lord giueth portions to Nations, and separates the children of men one from another; he will not that any man shall remove his neighbours bounds.

The King
resolues to be geehim.

The place imports his Maiesty as well for the situation, as for the strength. It is seated vpon the Frontier of France, much stronger then any of that quarter: and by consequence fit to trouble the estate of the Realme, and to breed ambitious counsels in them which seeke for all occasions of inuouation. Out of doubt these were strong reasons: but both the inhabitants of Sedan, and the Marshall of Bouillons friends, together with those that desired to haue these matters managed after some milder course, produced other reasons, considerable both for waight and number, to diuert this designe. Sedan (saith they) is fortified vpon a rocke, inuironed with goodly great Bastions, and deepe ditches cut out of the rocke, the which cannot be taken but by filling of them vp: you must come vnto it by degrees to take the outward part, the which cannot be kept by reason of the good counter-scarpes, flanked of themselves, and flanked moreover by the Cattle, and by the Bastions, so as it cannot be taken but by length of time, with great expence of money, munition, and losse of men. The importance of this conduct will force the King to bee there in person: for he knoweth that he is neuer so well serued as in his owne presence: and can he more assure himselfe of the fidelity of many, then of their sufficiencies. And the furni-

niture for fifty Cannon which his Maiesty prepares, with an army answerable, led so neere A the Low Countries, almost into Bourgondy, shall they make so little brute as the King of Spaine will not startle thereat? will he not be careful to man his frontier with another army? for Princes conclude their safeties more by that which they see, then by that which they heare. And he which gapes after all occasions of greatness, who thinks he hath more iustice to succour a Soueraigne assailed within his Estate, then they have to assist his rebellious subjects against him: will hee let passe this opportunitee if hee can, to make the Duke of Bouillon stand obstinately vpon his defence? will hee faile to suggest all necessary meanes, to crosse him whose prosperity he doth not behold, but with a malignant and enuious eye? Is it not credible, that both he and the Archdukes had rather haue the present possessor for their neighbour, then so mighty and redoubted a Prince? And is Sedan at this day lesse able to kindle dangerous combustions, then it did betwixt Francis the first, and Charles the fifth? So much needy Nobility which bow their necks vnder the burthen of the last warres: so many malecontents which thinke they haue merited more then the King thinks he owes them, would they not goe to field to foster their old designs, and to breed new? A royall army planted in one of the corners of the Realme, can he extend her wings farre enough to couer the remote Prouinces? His Maiesties Lieutenants, are they all of one temper? a change of affaires, may it not change their affections? doe they all loue, are they equally beloued, to hope for equall seruice, equall fidelity? will not the season make them vary their reason? The ashes of former combustion, doe they not couer some little fire, which some may take delight to kindle, when as the army shall haue least meanes to bring water to quench it? But what a displeasure were it to be forced to raise a siege from another mans Towne, to goe and plant it before one of his owne, assailed by the stranger. There is danger to lose the principall for the accessory.

As for strangers, England is so wonderfully scandalized at the monstrous attempts, lately discovered against their Princes, as they will neuer like of a war begonne against them of their belife, what lustre soeuer it carry. Italy promitteth it selfe great assistance of the French against the designs of the Earle of Fuentes: but it hath not so great prouision of courage, but it will be much daunted, seeing their forces turned another way. The Swisses will blame this designe, some for that it is against a Nobleman, and an estate of their confession: Others, for that they will say they are abandoned to the Sauiyard and Millanois. The Grisons are in the same predicament, and saile in the same Sea. The Estates of the vnited Prouinces will feele a great preiudice in their affaires, by the cutting off the commodities of France, being appointed for other places: The Empire will grow ialous of this approach, and the Germanes by the peace of Hungary which they hope for, shall want neither care to thinke of it, nor meanes to prevent it. The French army shall haue Liege behind them. The people are already ialous. The conquest of Sedan doth also purchase a title to the Duchy of Bouillon. They desire neither the one nor the other: and will crosse the first all they can to be assured of the second.

All these inconueniences may be auoyded. Sedan hath serued the Kings of France no lesse profitable vnder the title of protection, then can be hoped for vnder that of possession. And the Duke of Bouillon recovering the Kings fauour, brings vnto his seruice both his place and that which is more precious, his great sufficiency, well knowne to his Maiesty, and to all men, well knowne to the Councell of Estate, and to the affaires of warre; so as a perfect Amnesty may assure his returne. But the King cannot rest assured of the Marshal of Bouillon, nor of Sedan, but by the yeelding of the Castle, and the placing of a Governor, and a choice garison.

His troopes march, with an intent to haue five and twenty thousand men, and more if need were, with artillery and munition necessary to doe a great exploit. There were many commissions granted to leauy horse and foot: young men came from all parts; he was not held the sonne of an honest woman, that did not desire to make his apprenticeship of armes vnder so famous a Captaine, and to shew his valour in this warre of Sedan, yet this war was not like to be very violent. The King knowes better the state of Sedan, then those which haue distastd him, and the Duke of Bouillon who knowes that the shortest follies are the best, will not lose his Maiesties fauour by his contumacy, the which he will willingly redeeme, at a higher price then the towne of Sedan: rebellion fits not, but with such as

A are borne for the ruine of their Country. The King before his departure from Paris, declared openly and freely, that he marched towards Sedan, with an intent to receiue the Duke of Bouillon with open armes. Doubtlesse the best way to vanquish an enemy, is to doe him good when we may.

These gracious words gaue them occasion (who were grieued to see his Maiesty march against a place where the trauell and danger seemed more certain, then the purchase might be profitable, considering the difcommodities of the Country, and the difficulty of the place) to sollicite with great vehemency this businesse which they saw in so good termes. Netancourt a Gentleman of Champagne, noted for his piety, moderation, and integrity, B shewed so great zeale and affection in this negotiation, as then the King thought him capable to serue him, according to his heart in this action: The which being well auanced, his Maiesty depured the Lords of Inteuille (Gouernour of Champagne) and Villeroy, both wholly addicted to procure the good and tranquillity of his Estate, and his Maiesties seruice.

The Duke of Bouillon went to meet with them at Torcy, the last village of the realm, and there all conditions being examined, debated, and imparted vnto the King without any act of hostility, effusion of blood or sweat, his Maiesty knowing that mildnesse is the best remedie to cure the wounds of an Estate, and tempering his iustice by his clemency, and practising that goodly Oracle, That hatred must be mortall, and friendship immortall, C he gaue two great blowes with one stone: for hee assured himselfe of a place that would haue troubled him, being at the deuotion of men enuious of the prosperity of this Realme, or ialous of his greatness: and restored vnto his fauour so much desired, one of the chiefe Noblemen amongst his subjects, the second officer of his Crowne, a great man of State, active in counsell, and well practised in warre, and whom the trial of a long aduersity will make more fit to doe his master good seruice.

In worldly affaires, if some crosse of affliction should not temper the spirit of man, in the end prosperity will make him drunk. He came vnto the King being at Douchery the eleuenth of April, and presented himselfe vnto him in the morning before his rising: He deliuered vnto him by mouth, the humble submissions which his Maiesty required, and demanded an abolition in forme according to the treaty. His Maiesty receiued him as graciously as if the Sunne of his fauours had neuer been eclipsed before his fortune. The Queen shewed him as good a countenance as she was affected to this reconciliation.

Their Maiesties being accompanied with the Princes of the blood, the officers of the Crowne, and others, entred into Sedan. The Syndics and Sheriffes receiued him vpon their knees, protesting generally, that they had neuer attended or desired any more assured protection then that of his Maiesty: to which end they wished all prosperity to Henry the fourth, King of France and Nauarre, most christian, most mercifull, and most victorious: to the Queene, the happinesse of his long and fortunate company: to my Lord the Dauphin, encrease of vertues, and the fathers felicity. And they receiued from this sacred E mouth the answer which a people might hope for, being transported with the ioy and cordial loue of a Prince, louing his subjects as a good father doth his children: I haue nothing diminished (sayd he) nor altered the loue and affection which I haue alwayes borne you: I will neuer diminish it, whereof I will alwayes giue you good proofes.

Then were the Cannons heard (which seemed to bee planted for the defence of the towne) to applaud by their thundring this vnusuall action. The ayre did ring againe with cries of ioy, and with acclamations of God (sue the King, God sue the Queene, God sue my Lord the Dauphin), sent vp to heauen with vovs of eternall prosperity: and the inhabitants and Burgeses did not breathe any thing but a generall fidelity. Their Maiesties were much moued with the affections of this people, the which did merit this testimony from the King, See how this people loues me, (speaking to the Princes, which did assist him) I know they loue me. The Bonfires which were made at night in the streets and publicke places of the towne, did witness that they were pure and free from dissimulation and fraud. The thankes which they gaue solemnly vnto God, did shew that they tooke this warning for a threatening of his diuine punishment, or an exhortation to a more holinesse of life, and a continuance of the fidelity which both the Soueraigne Prince and the people of the towne and lands depending, owe vnto his Maiesty. The preaching and ordinary prayers made in the accustomed places with all liberty (whereas many of the Court assisted) are the certain taine effects of the inuincible promise giuen by his Maiestie, that the Church of Sedan A should suffer no alterations nor change in the liberty of conscience.

The small traine wherewith the Duke of Bouillon presented himselfe before his Maiesty, and the company which the King had when he gaue him this fauourable reception, did witnesse the assurance they had one of another: a good master receiues a good seruant with an open heart: a good seruant prepares himselfe to yeld vnto his good master the good seruice which he hath promised and doth owe him: finally, the gratifications and shewes of loue which the King had made vnto this people lately trembling, and now assured, made them know by experience, and confesse by effect, that they had no lesse subiect to praise God for the fatherly care which his diuine prouidence had now as heretofore of their good & preferuation. They commend the Kings wisdom and iudge- B ment, being able wisely to discern the capacity of his subiects, fit to serue him in great affaires. He left Nenancour for Gouvernour of the place, whose merits were no lesse pleasing to the Soueraigne then to the subiects of this petty Estate, and on the third day hee tooke his way toward Paris.

The Duke of Bouillon did accompany his Maiesty vnto Mouzon with a small traine: and the next day he returned to giue order for his affaires: within few daies after he came to hold his ancient place in Court, as he returned into the Kings heart, who to witnesse the effects of his loue, did abolish and suppress the memory of all things done, knowne, or spoken by him against his Maiesties seruice vnto that day, so as neuer any further search might be made. And by his especiall grace, full of power and royall authority, he dispensed with him for his appearing in person, in his Courts of Parliament, to haue his Letters of abolition registred. By the which also he was confirmed in the same estates, honours and dignities, which he had held and did yet hold within the Realme.

There is nothing more lawfull nor more commendable in a well gouerned Estate, then to provide for the necessities of such as for a mark of their vertue remaine lame, and haue no means to liue, after they haue serued the Prince in his warres well and faithfully. Our Kings haue alwayes desired to acknowledge their merits: but by the injury of time, or the negligence and fraud of officers, their ordinances haue bene without effect, to the shame of martiall discipline, which grieues to see many poore Gentlemen and other souldiers made vnprofitable to cary armes, and for all other functions, by wounds, losse of limbes, D and decrepit age: or that haue consumed their meanes in paying their ranlomes, in charges to be cured of their wounds receiued in their seruices, or of other infirmities and diffealties which the toyles of warres doe breed, were reduced in their declining age to a miserable and vnworthy kind of begging.

The King desiring to make them feele the effects of his bounty, to giue them means to passe the remainder of their dayes in rest, and to encourage his other subiects of all qualities, to serue him the more willingly in all future occasions, vpon hope of the like remuneration. He giues them by an irreuoicable Edict,

The royall house of Christian charity, and the money growing vpon the remainder of accounts of hospitals, almshouses, leprous houses, and other such companies, and of the usurpations and alienations of the reuenues thereof, reuisions of the said accounts, and abuses and disorders committed in the government and administration of the said places. Together with the money which shall rise of the places and persons of religious laymen, in every Abbey and Priory of this Realme, being in his Maiesties nomination: As is contained at large in the Edict verified in the great Councell, the seuenth of Iuly. So as all Gentlemen, Captaines, and Souldiers maimed, in doing his Maiesties seruice, in his companies of men at armes, light-horsemen, archers, or Hargu-buissers on horsebacke, taking certificates from the Captains and Colonels vnder whom they haue serued, containing the time of their seruices, their valour, with the combats, perils and dangers wherein they haue bene, and in wharaction F of warre they haue bene maimed for his seruice; the which they shall bring vnto the D. of Montmorency, Peere and Constable of France, to be verified exactly by him, to make a liste signed with his hand, and to note in the margin what annuall pension every one may merit in his opinion, according to their quality, valour, and wounds. And those which haue serued in the Regiments, Garisons, and Companies on foot, shall bring the like attestations to the Duke of Epernon, Colonell generall of the French foot, or (in the absence of the said Constable and Colonell) to the two eldest Marshalls of France which shall

A shall be then in Court, to make the like liste, and in the same forme, verified by the great Almoner of France, one of the Secretaries of State, and the Lords of Souray, Chastcaux, and Rocheport, Knights of the order, and Councillors of State, which lists being brought vnto the King, and deliuered into the hands of one of the Secretaries of Estate whom he shall appoint, there shall every yeare a roll be made of maimed men, and others, whom his Maiesty will entertain, and of the Pensions which shall be assigned to every one, payable by him that shall haue that charge, vpon the paines contained in the order of his Maiesties Exchequer, who to iudge of differences according to the accustomed formes of Iustice, hath erected a Soueraigne Chamber, consisting of the said Noblemen, and other B worthy personages, as you may reade in the Originall.

From this goodly and charitable act, we passe vnto another, which doth witnesse that the King, as a common father to all his subiects, will not onely maintaine them in peace in this age, but will also continue the quiet of their soules, seeing that our ayre cannot be purged from trouble, without the cleareness of consciences in diuine seruice. His Maiesty hath lent one care vnto the Clergy, & now on the nineteenth of August, he opens the other to the humble petitions of them which professe the Religion granted by the Edict of Nantes: and desiring to make them enjoy the contents of his Edict, and the priuate Articles granted in consequence thereof, he ordaines that the modifications and restrictions which haue bene made by his Courts of Parliament, Chambers of accompt, and other officers, C contrary to the tenure thereof, shall be taken away, and to that end all letters and necessary commandments should be made. Moreover, he did enioyne his said Courts, to enroll the said Edicts and Articles (if it were not done) in their Bayliwickes and Schene-shalshes. And commanding all Bayliffes and Schene-shalshes to send them into their iurisdic-tions, to the end that no man should pretend cause of ignorance. Inioyning all Iudges, Proctors generally, and their substitutes, to cause them to be exactly observed, and for default thereof, to answer it in their proper and priuate names. And granting to them of the said Religion, many demands and speciall orders which rise from the Edict: his Miesty enioynes them on the other side, to cary themselves according to the Edict, auoyding all occasion of scandall: and on the other side to Catholikes, to cary the like moderation and D wisdom for feare of stumbling. Thus he makes knowne how desirous he is that all his subiects should enjoy with concord the peace which hee hath heretofore purchased for them with so much toyle and sweate.

As the King seekes by his bounty to entertaine his people with concord, and so to raise them to the top of prosperity and happinesse: So wee now see that God doth giue him euident signes of the fauour and loue which he powreth forth vpon Princes which reigne according to his heart. He doth now seale to vs in particular the wonders of his loue to this Realme, by a gage which makes our hearts to leape with consolation and ioy, to remember the feare wherein we lately liued, seeing our selues in danger to fall into the miseries which threaten Estates wanting an assured successour. And retiring vs from the vallies E and gulphes of this misery, hee hath giuen vs an ample subiect to acknowledge his free bounty. For one of the greatest blessings which heauen can poure vpon man, is to haue many children, which cary the image of the father, and make him as it were to reuiue in their birth. So as from a lucky root grow new plants, which produce the like fruits vnto their stocke. The Soueraigne protector of this Monarchy, hath now supported the peace and quiet of France, with three precious pillars of his bounty, and we behold them as firm supports of his grace.

Their birth hath made them children to mortall Princes, whom the holy Scripture honours with the title of gods: and hath opened vnto them the gates of Realmes, and transitory Principallities: but it was expedient, that by a spirituall regeneration they should become the children of the great immortal God; and that Baptisme giuing them entry into the Church of Christ, it should open them the way also to the immortal and celestiall heauen, printing in their faces the Characters of the children of God, as vpon their fore-heads, the image of God himselfe. The Sacrament of Baptisme had bene giuen them within few dayes after they were borne, but the ceremonies were deferred vntill an opportunity. The King had long desired it, if many encounters had not crost the complement. The death of Pope Clement the eight had stayed it. Leo the eleuenth (before Cardinall of Florence) did in a manner see the last of his dayes with the first of his Papacy: Paul the fifth fifth his successor, being advertised that the celebration of the ceremonies and solemnities A was appointed the fourteenth of September, he wrote unto Francis Cardinall of Loyeuse, that he would haue them done by his Ministry in the blessing of the Lord: and thus seeing he could not assist in person, he had made choice of him to performe this complement, according to the dignity of the Apostolike See, and of the children of the eldest sonne of the Church; seeing that by the honour of his ranke, by the nobility of his blood, by his wisdom, fidelity and experience in affairs, he was pleasing unto the King, and acceptable unto the Realme.

The Princes and Noblemen in Court did contend who should exceed each other in bravery and expence. A small patterne will make vs to iudge of the whole peece, omitting to relate it all in particular. In the hilt of a stately sword which the Duke of Epsernon caused to be made, there were set eightene hundred Diamonds, whereof the richest was B at twenty crownes price, and the least at foure or fise; which hilt (as the Gold-smith said that made it) came to thirty thousand crownes. Our Ladies Church in Paris was appointed for this royall 'pectacle, but by reason of the infection it was translated to Fontainebleau, which the good King Saint Lewis called his desert and solitary place.

Thus the fourteenth of September, being a cleare and bright day, was notwithstanding lighted with many torches and tapers: and the ceremony was performed about fise of the clocke at night in the Court of the duncion (for neither the Chappell, nor the greatest hall in the Caste, was capable to containe so many thousands which came to this rare sight) vpon a great and high Theater, hung about with rich and sumptuous Tapstry; in the midst whereof was a square with fise fadome in compasse, inclosed with barres C couered with tapstry, and carpets vnder foot. In the front thereof was an Altar richly adorned with the ornaments of the Order of the Holy Ghost, and couered with a cannopie of the ornaments of the said Order. Behind the table there was a degree of three steps couered with Tapstry, and in the midst thereof a kind of great floole, adorned with cloth of siluer, vpon the which were placed the Fontes couered with an exquisite towell, and ouer them a canopie. On either side of the Altar was a scaffold prepared for the mu-sicke. Beneath it, and on the right hand, was a forme couered with tapstry for many Prelates. Among others there were three Archbishops, nine Bishops, and three Abbots. On the left hand were the Noblemen of the Councell: And before the Altar the Cardinall D of Gondie, enuironed with many Almoners and Chaplaines, and a great number of beholders, seated as they are in theaters. About the Theater were all the Suiſſes of his guard, euery one holding a burning torch in his hand. My Lord the Daulphin, and the Ladies his Sisters were in their chambers, vpon great beds made like a Tribunal, after a royall manner, vnder a cloath of Estate, with coverings of powdered Ermines, and they were caried to the square table, their gentlemen seruants going before, euery one with a waxe candle in his hand, being followed by the gentlemen of the chamber, with drummes, fises, trumpets, howboyces, Heralds, and the Knights of the Holy Ghost, with the three honors following. First, for the youngest Lady, the cup, the bason, the pillow, the candle, the cressme, and the saltceller, were caried by the Baron of la Chastre, by the Lords of Montigny, E Rocheport, Chemerauld, Lien-court, and the Marquis of Ferraques; the Marshall of Bois-dauphin caried the Lady, being followed by Charles Duke of Loraine the god-father, and by D. Iohn de Medicis, brother to Ferdinand great Duke of Tuscane, representing Christi-erne daughter to the Duke of Loraine, and wife to the great Duke, after whom marched the Duchesse of Guise, the Countesse of Guiche and Saulx, the Marquesse of Montlaur, with other Ladies. The Marshalls of Luerdin and la Chastre, the Duke of Suilly (before Marquis of Rosny) the Dukes of Montbason, Epsernon, & Elguillon, did the like office for the eldest Lady. The Lord of Ragny caried her in the place of Diana Duchesse of Angou-lesme, who represented the Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, Archduchesse of Austria, being followed by the daughters of Rohan, Montmorency and Mayenne, who were virgins, & F the Duchesses of Rohan, Suilly, and others. The third honour for the Daulphin, was serued by to Vincent Duke of Mantoua, and the Princesses of the blood, richly attired.

The

A The Daulphin being brought to the square Table, the Cardinall of Gondy being appointed to performe this ceremonie, he came neere vnto him, and hauing heard him answer pertinently to questions he asked him, according to the ordinarie forme, and to rehearse the Lords Praier and Creed in Latine, hee was blest, and annointed, and called Lewis by the Cardinall of Loyeuse the Popes Legat; at the naming of whom they might see ioy appeare in the Kings countenance, shewing by the exterior, the inward contentment he receiued, remembering that Saint Lewis, the ninth of that name, King of France, is the Author of that family or Clermont, from whence is issued that of Bourbon, sitting at this day in the Throne of his holy Predecessor: and the ioy of the assembly did witness, that his name is very plea-B sing, and of a good presage to France. The Ladies were afterwards caried to the Table one after another; and the eldest was named by the Dutcheſſe of Angoulesme, representing the Archducheſſe her God-mother without a God-father, Elizabeth: (which the Spaniards call Isabella) the youngest was named Christiernes by Don Iohn de Medicis, for the great Duchesse.

At the banquet, the King was serued by the Princes of his blood. The Prince of Condy held the place of Butler. The Prince of Contie of Cup-bearer. The Earle of Soissons had the place of Lord Steward: And the Duke of Montpensier of Caruer. The Duke of Guise, and the Earle of Vaudemont serued the Queene: and the Duke of Suilly, the Legat. The God-fathers and God-mothers were set, and then the Princes, Ladies, and Noblemen. At C the dancing, the Duke of Lorraine did precede by the Kings order, in consideration onely that he was a good and gracious Father.

The next day was spent in running at ring, and the Duke of Suilly caused an assault to be given by night to an Artificiall Caste, with an infinite number of Squires, Canon-hot, and other fire-works. But there was neuer any thing more admirable to the eye, nor more incredible vnto the eare, then the beautie, brauerie, and lustre of the Princes and Ladies of the Court. Mans eye could not endure the shining of the Gold, the brightnesse of the Siluer, nor the glittering of the Pearles and precious stones, which couered their robes, and the Princes and Noblemen were attired in the most rare and precious stufes that could be found out.
The Queenes robe haue two and thirtie thousand Pearles, and thirtie thousand Diamonds, made it to be without peare, and without price.

This yeare about Easter, there were such violent winds and stormes thorowout all France, as the tops of houses being cast downe, many were slaine and sore hurt in Paris, so as they could not goe safely thorow the streets: In the Countrey old growne Trees were torned by the roots, but although there were a great spoile of men, houses, and trees at land, yet was it not so fearefull as at Sea, whereas many suffered shipwracke and perished in these tempests.

In May the Riuier of Seine being much risen by the abundance of raine which had fallen, the King and Queene comming from Saint Germaines, the Carroch being in the passage Boat and comming to Land, the Horſes going forth, thrust backe the Boat with the force of their E feet, and ouer-turned the Carroch into the Riuier, so as the Queene was in great danger of drowning: the Courtiers leapt into the Riuier to rescue her, but Castelnery, (a Gentleman of a Noble Family) advanced the rest, freed her from danger, and brought her to Land, to the Kings great content: she rewarded her deliuerer with a rich chaine of Diamonds.

In Iuly, the Prince of Contie tooke to his second Wife Catherine of Lorraine, daughter to the Duke of Guise, that was slaine at Blois, and of Catherine of Cleues, who was one of the Daughters and Co-heires of the Duke of Neuers, visiting the houses of Bourbon and Lorraine in mutual loue by this Alliance, whereby it seemed all future ialousies being taken away, both houses would hereafter continue good friends, for there is no greater bond to tie Noble Families together, then mariages, and the fruitful issue which descends of them.

The infectious plague hauing begun to disperse it selfe, by reason of their holie burials, and the little care they had to prevent the danger; in Autumne it grew very violent, and to be generally dispersed ouer the whole Citie: Such as had meanes were forced to retire themselves to their Farms, and Country-houses, to auoid the danger.

The straightnesse of their Pest-house did increase the mischief, being easily gotten when as they did lye and conuerſe together, for such as were infected did infect others being not lodged apart: the which was not foreſene in time by the Magistrats: besides the Pest-house being in the furthest end of Saint Iaques Suburbs, such as were infected on the other side of the Citie, nor able to endure so long a carriage, died by the way, and some yet breathing, were A barred for dead by them that carried them. To prevent the like inconvenience hereafter they began to think of another Pest-house of an admirable structure, in another part of the Citie, as you shall hereafter heare: VVhen coming on, the plague ceased in Paris, and was dispersed into the Country, whereas many were toucht that had fled from it in the Citie.

I will be bold to relate a memorable accident, though out of France, yet nere vnto the frontier. A Gentleman of Savoy called Charmet, going in September after his accustomed manner, into the next woods to hunt some wilde beasts, having no other armes but a peece and a dagger, and for his companion a fierce dogge, of a Mastiue kinde, which would hunt vpon the scent, and finde out their dens: having wandered long in this wood, & lost his way, B being very penitue, he comes at last againe into his way, the day being nere spent; he had not gone farre but he was encountered by foure theeves, who with their swords drawne came to assail him, who finding himselfe vnable to make resistance against so many, he encourageth his dogges, and with his peece kills one of the theeves; the other three presse him in such sort, as he studied how he might tie from them, his dog takes another of the theeves by the throat and staies him, being thus intangled by the dogge, the Gentleman gets away his sword, and then refusing courage, he chaufeth away the rest, whom the dogge pursued with all eagerness, but his Master beat him backe, who being thus freed from theeves, he went to the next village called Saint Albaine, where he tels his misfortunes, and shewes both his and his dogs C wounds, perswading both the Iustice and the Inhabitants to pursue these theeves, who presently went into the wood, and followed them by their footing, having bene often molested by their deceuing; They could not be long hidden: In the end they found three young men in an holtry standing out of the way, being a receptacle for such people: one of them being hurt in the arme, argued their guilt, so all being carried to Chambery, they were broken and laid halfe dead vpon wheels, suffering a condigne punishment for their murders and thefts.

The King had another Sonne, a great increase for France, the Flower-de-Luce is neuer in danger when there be Males, they be the ruine of home-bred seditions, and a perpetual support of the Satiue Law: this last borne sonne had the title of Duke of Orleans given him.
It is one of the goodliest Dukedomes in the whole kingdome, and is next vnto the Dauphin; D the Citie of Orleans stands vpon the River of Loyre; It is very ancient, as appears by national Councils, and decrees of Popes, and in the first race of our Kings it had the title of a Kingdome, when as Clouis diuided his Realme to his three Sonnes. There were bonfires and shooting of Ordnance for the birth of this Sonne, and all France did reioyce, to see the old decayed tree, reviuie againe and grow young, by these new plants, vnder whose shadow they should finde refuge, in heat, raine, and tempestuous weather.

Henry the fourth, when he was but King of Nauarre, enioyed goodly hereditarie possessions, as well in Gasconie, Guienne, Vendosme, and generally thoroughout the Realme, as in the Low-countries, and other terraine parts: being come to the Crowne of France, and to a greater fortune, he made an Edict in Aprill, one thousand five hundred ninetie and two: by E the which he would haue all those his reuenues of Nauarre, with the rest, managed distinctly & a part, hauing a charitable care of his only Sister, whom he loued deerey, and of his Creditors, to whom he had ingaged his Lands before his coming to the Crowne: wherefore vntill this money were paid, he held it no Iustice to wnite those Lands vnto the Crowne. The Kings Proctor opposed himselfe against the Kings will, saying; That by the lawes of France, all that was the Kings, did accrew vnto the Crowne, as small streames which fall into great Riuers, and those into the Sea, lose their names. But when as the King had lost his Sister, (who died without children) and had paid those priuate debts, this year in Iune, by his Edict, he wnted his Realme of Nauarre, with those other dignities and possessions which he held from his Ancestors, vnto the Crowne, as they might not afterwards be diuided. So as F his Officers of Nauarre lost both their places and fees.

Pomponius Belieuerre Chancellor of France, & the Nestor of our Age, left the corruption of this world, to get an incorruptible life in heauen; He dedicated the first fruits of glory vnto the Senate of Lyon his native Country, but being called to Paris that great light, he was well knowne vnto Kings, and finding himselfe more fit for the secret counsels of Court and difficult affaires of the kingdome, then to plead causes, notwithstanding that it was his profession, and had supplied the place of President, yet following his owne humour, he gaue his minde

A wholly to terraine employments, being sent in many Ambassages, the which he did happily performe. He was buried with as much honour as could be desired for a man of his fashion, being followed at his funerall by many Bishops, Knights of the Order, and the whole Court of Parliament, Fenouillius appointed Bishop of Montpellier, made his funerall Sermon: he had a Monument of Marble erected, on the which was grauen this Epitaph in golden letters.

In France, to the end that future ages might know, there is a kinde of men whose Parents
C were neuer knowne by name, when as they come with their griping Tallons to manage the Publike or Princes Treasure, they sodainly become all gold, as if they had bathed themselves in the riuer Pactolus; in their diet, apparell, traine and pallses, they exceed the greatest Dukes, how rightly many doubt, how freely all men know; yet they are terrified by an Edict made euery third yeere, but as it were with a still lightning, for hauing paid a small more renewen out of a great prey, being freed from all their villanies, they giue themselves boldly to theeuing.

This yeere Iudges were chosen to presse this sponge, or rather appointed to reuenge these publike thefts, abundance of wealth was now fall vnto the owners, neither wanted they any other witnesses, then to enquire of their birth, patrimony, and what they had gotten together, D capital questions were not troublesome, the matter was apparent.

The Marquesse of Allegre had during the ciuill warres traitorously murdered Hallot at Vernon vpon Seine being vnarmed, coming vnto him vnder a colour of saluting him, being armed with a traine of fouldiers: He presently left the Kings partie (the which hee had maintained constantly) and fled to the League: And to the end he might free both himselfe and the rest that were guilty of this foule murder, he procured that a young man who had serued him as a Page should publicly carry Saint Romans Chafe, not without the emulation of other malefactors. As many as had bene conforts in this murder were by the Court of Parliament condemned and executed in Picture, and as many as could be taken, died for the fact: for the seruuing wife with an incredible charge did offer vnto him the E bloud of the guilty, or of those which with a dry hand and ignorance of the Treason were present at the fact; after the restless rage of a courageous wife, at length this young man La Mot fell into her hands, being in bonds he pleads his cause before the Parliament at Rouen, he seeks to proue his innocency by his tender age, by his duty to his Lord; by his hands that were not imbrued with bloud, hauing not at that time euer drawne sword, it is not any guilt for him to looke on, that could not auoid it; the Law doth not condemne any but such as when they might haue forbidden it, would not: The dishonour lies vpon them that behold and wink at violence offered, and not vpon them which are vnable to repell force, but must of necessity be silent and still, Pisicri out to his companions which beheld his ruine, by your stillnesse you make the guile common.

F La Mots Advocate did adde, that his case was farre otherwise, then that which Iohannes
Papa describes vnto Lewis the Emperour: He offends as well as the actor, who when he can revert, neglects to amend: notwithstanding La Mot being doubtfull of his life, and loth to rely too much vpon the conceiued hope of his innocency, he hath his refuge vnto the Alcars and Churches, as if they were safegards for wickednesse. Whilst his cause is in question, he ap-peales vnto S. Romane the reuenger of a pardoned crime, he calls the Archbishops Ioyeuse, and the Chanons of Rouen to assist him in this controuerfie, and to defend the priuiledges

of their Saint. It is be a guilt to sinne with the eies, for him whose hands were free from murder, nor with standing although he were the most detestable murderer living, by the onely carrying of this chafe, the offence being pardoned, there was no more question to be made vnto him; the ancient priuiledges of Neutrity were broken, force and reproach was offered vnto their household-god, the custome had beene obserued for many ages, not newly inuented, when as by the Hebrew law, euery yeere before Easter their custome was, to let a malefactor free: neither were some Cities in Palestina vnlike to Romulus Sanctuary, being built as a refuge for offenders, Gregory of Tours doth generally in his Annals witness in what reuerence the Altars and Churches of the gods were, and how many offenders haue by that means escaped present and capitall punishments. Crimes are not wiped away with blood onely: there is nothing of greater efficacy to pacifie Gods wrath, then repentance, and how acceptable it is, our Saviour teacheth, when as he fet the Adultresse free, who was ready to be stoned by the severity of Moses law: whilest he liued vpon earth, hee did not condemne any Malefactor, but did bleis euen the most wicked with his company and table: as Paul, who was afterwards the light of the Gentiles; Publicans, as Mathew; Adultresses, as Magdeline. He did so often wipe away the reproches of insulting circumcised men, as he did publicly confesse, that he came into the world to cure the diseased, and that the whole had not any need of a Physician. It is no fable that is reported of S. Romulus, who slue that monstrous Dragon which anoted Normandy, as of Hercules and his Lernean snake with leuen heads. Saint Romulus drew this raging monster out of his den, and as it were made tame and bound, brought it to a publike fire in the middle of the City, with the helpe of a Malefactor. It hath bene a custome obserued for many ages, that euery yeere an Offender should be fet at liberty, and haue his life giuen him.

Antiquity is a great testimony, and of more force then any Records: it came vnto posterity by tradition: in the affirmation of miracles the faith of Antiquity is more ancient then all monuments. Saint Augustine to the end he might confirme the faith of miracles, did thus write vpon them that doubted; I haue not seene Christ, who was seene and did appeare, neither haue I seene them that saw him, but I haue beleued the confirmed opinion of Nations, and the report which is very antient, this was commended from Heauen, this was deliuered vs by our Ancestors, and hath bene obserued vnto our time, to seeke to alter and peruerse this, is nothing else but to take a sacrilegious way to Religion.

It hath bene obserued in all ages, that Malefactors were freed from punishment vpon the sight of their gods. Ninus did first erect Statues whither offenders might fle: he did set vp an Image like vnto his father Belus, whither if any one came, he was pronounced free from the crime and punishment. The Athenians had an Altar of Mercy. The Ephesians gaue refuge to Malefactors in Diana's Temple: Osiris to the Egyptians, Apollo to the Allyrians, Iupiter to the Itacenses, Minerua to the Lacedemonians, who were their Tutelary gods. Finally, they ascribe to Devils, that which Christians doe now giue vnto the true God. At Rome the day before the Assumption of our Lady, there are two offenders brought forth to execution, and giuen to the Virgin, who left examples of mercy to be imitated, and pretences of Christian clemency to be embraced and followed. On Palme-sunday Eue there is one deliuered out of the Chasteler at Paris.

At Vendosme in the Abbey of Saint Trude, a Malefactor, after that hee hath gone naked with a great Torch on his shoulder thorow the towne, being followed by the whole Clergy, and admonished by the Crier to leade a better life, he is not onely freed from his bonds, but being refreshed with good victuals, is fet at liberty. The new Bishop of Orleans, at his first entrance into the City, sets all criminal persons at liberty. This was giuen to God, not that through hope of impunity offenders should grow more bold; but that their liues not being taken away, they should acknowledge to haue receiued them againe from God. Who will thinke that our fathers (as some malicious people say) being abused, would so long haue endured this impollution? as if this age (which is but a step-dame to the Ancient, and hath fallen into Heresie) had discovered this fraud. But we (a more wicked generation then our fore-fathers) are not wise in heart and beliefe, but with our eies onely: We giue not credit to that wee see, but what wee feele with our hands, when as faith comes by hearing, neither doe we approach to neere vnto God by any vertue, as by Mercy, which consists chiefly in sparing of the guilty: for as Seneca said; The whole world should perish if mercy did not semper angere. There was much more pleaded by the Aduocates for La Motte, and in defence

A defence of the ancient priuiledge of the Cathedrall Church at Rouen, the which for breuitie Iake I omit.

On the other side Halots incensed wife, an implacable reuenger of a wicked murder, powered forth many bitter words: That the Altars of the gods were much defiled with this rabble of wicked men: that they were better pleased with chaffity and cleanness then with sacrifices, and therefore it was vsuall among the Ancients, before they beganne the sacrifice, to cry out with a loud voice: Goe furre from hence ye men that are prophane. And the Hea then thought that the gods dwelt in their Temples: neither was it vnworthily spoken of one, The true power of dedication is that which brings in God, and sets him in his appointed place: it is not lawfull for euery man to doe this, but for such as haue chaste hands and holy hearts. And who would endure the Temples of the gods to be polluted by wicked murderers and theues, who defile all they touch and breathe on? They wrongfully produce many examples out of the Heathen, Hebrewes, and Christians, when as all Sanctuaries were instituted to protect them only that were guilty of murder committed by chance, or an vn-premeditated crime: for lo God the Reuenger commanded: If any one hating his neighbour, hath laid wait for his life, and hath slaine him flying, and then shall flee vnto one of the above named Cities, the Elders shall take him, and deliuer him vnto his neere kinsmen, whose blood he hath spilt, and he shall die. Neither was the severity of the Churches in old time to be remoued, when as Meroue moued with the hatred of Fredegond his step-mother, had fled vnto Saint Martins Church, (which was then very religiously worshipped by all men) King Chilperic his father (yeelding too much to a bloody woman whom he loued) wrote a threatening letter to Gregory of Tours: Curt that Apollina (said he) out of the Church, or else I will fire the whole Country. The Emperours would not haue their Statues to protect any other, but such as were oppress by the enemy, and power of their enemies. Tacitus the 3. commands that publike theues and way-layers should be excluded from the immunities of the Church. Vidus Pape, the light of the French lawes in his age, makes mention, that being Councillor in Dauphiné, there were two murderers drawne from the Altar to execution. The Ancients did rightly call that the Altar of mercy, to the which they were detacted by the stormes of angry Fortune, and vnable to satisfie: or that had vnwittingly stricken, or fallen into any other casual crime, had fled. Neither were parsons granted but to them that were guilty of vnpremeditated murders. When as Constantine the great at the birth of his children granted these kinde of graces, he excluded murderers, way-layers, witches, and adulterers: They that maintaine this wonder of S. Romulus, to absolve offenders, haue it not confirmed by any Annals and Records, but only by Antiquity. What ancient Writer (being then in a manner all Monkes) would haue past ouer in silence so great a miracle of a diuall power? haue set downe most trifolous things, yet no man writes of this serpent, which was brought round to a publike fire, whereby we may rightly beleue there was not any such wonder. Neither is it credible, that vnder religious Kings, one Malefactor carying the chaine, a multitude of wicked men should be freed from bonds and punishment, which is the sinew of ciuill gouernment, especially vnder Lewis the ninth, who was most sparing of pardons, and if he did with a trembling hand grant any, yet he still made his Almoner, who was his Confessor, acquainted therewith. But let vs allow that which is written of the most hidden secretes of the Hebrewes, that it is neither recorded in parchment, nor grauen in the barks of trees or stones, lest Time should weare it out, but left vnto vs by our Fathers by long Tradition: yet in maintaining the priuiledge, the abuse is to be corrected, euen by S. Romains will, who when as in that worthy act, he had but one Malefactor for his companion, would haue but one afterwards to be pardoned. But in our age what a summe of wicked men, being protected by this brazen wall, doe freely laugh at publike lawes? For by this the company of offenders is freed, any one that is past shame, that respects not his reputation, and blusht not at the faces of men, submitting his shoulders to this holy burthen, which he had so often subiected to the Stake, by his only act of heffres all the rest from ignominie, and absolues the absent, the which were insolent with all other Nations. Wherefore the widdowes Aduocate demanded La Motte head, with a longer speech, as a sacrifice to the ashes of her deare husband: the cause had many hearings, and much was written by the Clergy of Rouen for the defence of their priuiledge.

In the towne of Metz there was an Ensign of the Garrison called also La Motte, an insolent man, and dissolute in his life and conuersation, who being extremely in loue with a young Virgin within the towne, resolved to win her by all allurements; if not, to get her by force.

In this wicked deligne he employed a drunken Goffip, whose profession was to be a bawd: the A abusing this Virgin with an honest shew, brings her into the souldiers house, like a sheep to the wolfe and slaughter; being thus vt into a prison, he rauisheth her: her miserable parents are continually tormented for the want of her: they run vp and downe weeping and crying that their daughter is stolne away, they moue the Iudges to seeke her out and to reuenge: they hauing sent forth the Capitaines of the Garrison, who were suspected of this rape, aduised them speedily to deliuer the virgin vtouched vnto her complaining parents. La Mot the rauisher flood by, who being struck with the Prætors voice, and the horror of his offence, trembles and apprehends the punishment of his fact: he goes home, and resolues to adde one wickednesse to another, and performs it; if he should restore the Virgin deslowered, there were no meanes B to escape punishment: wherefore the first villany must be hidden by another. This cruel man, who had learned in warlike slaughters not to feare bloud, doth not keepe his cruell hands from the murder of this Virgin: he bereaues her both of life and honour: and left there should be some markes of this murder to discover him, he cuts the body in peeces, and putting it into a sacke, casts it into the next Riuier. This foule fact lay hidden vntill that this libidinous Ensigne-bearer had taken away another maid from a garrison Souldier with the like lust, who not bearing this indignity, complained to the Gouernour. La Mot with the bawd (who was accustomed to corrupt young maids) and the bawds seruant, were committed to prison: they refuse to be tried by the Iudge of that place. But soone after, the first fact, which he thought time had worn out of memory, began to breake forth: for the bawd and his seruant being examined apart, the truth began to shew it selfe, but there wanted a competent Iudge to proceed in the cause.

At length the matter was referred to the great Councell, there to be tried: and they were all carried bound to Paris, where being put to the Racke, the Bawd and her seruant not being able to endure the extremity of the torments, did willingly confesse all the fact, whereupon they were condemned to the Gallowes, and La Motte to lose his head, who hearing of this fatal sentence, beginne to storme, and refused to be bound and lead to the place of execution: he rushes with the Hang-man and Sergeants; in the end being cast vpon the Ground raging like a mad man, they binde him and carrie him out vpon their shoulders, and put him into a Cart: being come vnto the Scaffold, he shewed no more mildnesse, but much D lesse modolie and resolution then was befitting an Officer that professed Armes. He reuenges his rage and violence, and presteeth his friends that were about him to goe to the King to sue for his pardon: He that was now dying did still liue in hope. The Duke of Effernon, remembering his valour, had sued for his pardon: and Queene Marguerite going late to the King at night, had bene very importunate for him, but the King, overcome with no prayers, commanded hee should die. La Motte being told that the King would not bee moued for his pardon, and being aduised to take his death resolutely, and to forbeare these intemperat humors which did not become a gallant Souldier, the which in publike were taken for signes of basenesse: That hee which had so often sought death in the thickest troupes, should not now feare a Hang-man: Being at last made more calme, E he knelled downe, suffered his eyes to be couered, submitted his necke to the blocke, and lost his head.

In the beginning of this yeere the cold was so violent as it killed Corne, Vines and Trees, especially those that had any froth. There had not bene so hard a Winter scene in many ages. The swiftest riuers were so frozen, as Carts laden with great Burthens, went as freely ouer them, as vpon the firme land, the stockes of Vines euen to the very root withered away, with the force of the cold, neither did they spring againe, vnlesse they were cut off: all Nuts although they were old, and had very hard shells, withered away; and which is wonderfull, Medlar trees and other which are most firme dried away. The breath going hot from the mouth, grew presently white with cold, water taken hot from the fire grew presently hard, F and the Wine which was in the Caves would not runne out of the Vessels: so as in many places they were faine to cut it with Hatchets: as Belloy reports happened in his time, when as the Kings Army wintered in the Duchie of Luxembourg: The riuier of Seine was so frozen, as the King and Courtiers attending vpon him, pulled it daily out without feare or suspicion of danger. The people who liued vpon their daily prouision, were much oppressed for want of wood.

A hauing languished two yeeres of sicknesse, and waited to the very bones, being not able to receive any sustenance, was nourished (as they say) with womans milke. A little before his end, the Duke of Orleans, the Kings second sonne, was made fure to his onely daughter; his house hauing this support, by the perswasion of father Angelo his father in law, he left all worldly cares, and applied himselfe to heavenly meditations. The sharpnesse of the Winter did hasten his lingring end: for the force of it was so piercing, as it not onely dried vp his bowels being weak, but many (the cold growing milder) went away suddenly, as the Physicians said. Being then of the age, which makes a man of a goodly representation, rich in wealth, fauoured by his King, followed like a Prince, and abounding in the gifts of fortune, and the vertues of the minde, remaining still constant in the Catholike Faith: He died in the armes of his father in law and wife, without any motion, like vnto a Lampe whose oyle is spent. His funerall pompe was prepared: an Image of Wax was made like vnto himselfe liuing, and laid in a stately bed with golden Furniture, and the Armes of the House of Bourbon about it, whereas his Table was serued eight daies together in the same state and magnificence as if he had bene liuing. His funerall rites were performed in our Ladies Church.

Petrus Fenouillius the Kings Preacher, and appointed Bishop of Montpellier, did after the accustomed manner commend the Prince, with a learned Oration, where as all the Courtiers mourned. But his death hapning about Shrouetide, all their vsuall sports were laid aside, C many grieuing at the cost they had bestowed for this pompe. The Dauphins maske with the young Noblemen about him (for that it had bene importuned in this time of mourning) was deterred, till that Montpensiers obsequies were ended according to his dignitie: which done, his bodie was carried to his house at Champigny in Poictou, and there laid in the graue with his Ancestors, with the like princely pompe.

The Iesuites could not be contained in one Kingdome: as they had bene received into France, so they did desire to haue free access into Nauarre, and Bearne, for the propagation of Religion: That there was no cause of difference why they should not be admitted into the one Realme as well as into the other, seeing they were subiect to one Lord. They of Bearne opposed themselves with all violence, who hated the Iesuites, no lesse than D Philip did Demofthenes, and the other chiefe citizens of Athens, who were the defenders of the Atticke Libertie.

The King being at Bloies in the yeere 1599. granted by the Ediēt to them of the Religion of Nauarre, and Bearne; That no Iesuite should come within their Confinnes, lest they should breed some inuouation that might trouble the publike quiet: yet the Bishops in the country requiring the contrary, the King changing his resolution, decreed, That they should be admitted into all places as well as the other Orders, abrogating the contrary Ediēt; and protesting that his meaning was to send the Iesuites thither, to assist the Bishops to re-plant the Catholike Faith. All the Iudges and Officers in the Country were wonderfully discontented; for they hated the Iesuites about all creatures liuing, keeping them far from their limits, E and in former times they put them to death like Spies, if they found any: but the Maiestic of Henry the fourth is growne so great, as his power is feared as well at the foot of the Pyrenees Mountaines, which distinguish France from Spaine, as in Paris, and is as willingly obeyed. A rare felicitie of a Prince, which happens not to many, whose preferences are respected, but when they are retired, they are like vnto the Sunne, which being let, clouds arise, so doe Factions by their absence.

We will relate a memorabile fact, and the fatal end of a most wicked man, and cunning Impostor, of whom all Europe hath spoken. He was another Proteus, and transformed himselfe into sundry shapies. Sometimes he called himselfe Cesar Florio, another time Francis Fava; sometimes a Geneuois, another time a Neapolitane: sometimes he counterfeited himselfe a Physitian, and sometimes a Merchant, but at his triall he termed himselfe Francis Fava, F which we will keepe. He was borne in a little towne called Capriola, in the territories of Genoua; he spent his youth in many voyages, professing Physicke: being foure and thirty yeeres old, he came to Nouara, and there making gaine of his physickall profession, he becomes a suter to a Merchants daughter called Catherina Olina; the father fearing that this stranger had another wife, desired to haue some certificate of his country and parents. He who was exceeding cunning in counterfeiting of any hand, draws an instrument himselfe, annexing a scale vnto it, whereby the Iudge of Saint Smerin, a little towne nere vnto Naples, doth certifie

He all men, that Fana was borne there, a frugall man, of the Tribe and Familie of Fiore, the A which was an ancient, and no obscure house. The Merchant of Nouara knowing no deceit, giues him his daughter in marriage; being at length weary of the place and name, he gets him into a Towne of the Iurisdiction of Placentia, called Castellara, with his wife and three children remaining, and small store of stouffe: and being impatient of his fortune, finding himselfe vnable to maintaine a familie with so little meanes, he gaue his minde to incredible villanies, and hauing gathered together fiftie Crownes in Gold, he comes to Naples, whereas when he had fought out among the Bankers, that Alexander Bosfa was the chiefe, he gets him a long gouerne, and counterfeits himselfe an Abbot. He insinuates with this Banker, and persuades him that he hath a Nephew at Venice, which deale in his businesse, desiring him to make him ouer fiftie Crownes to be paid at Venice by exchange by his Correspondent, B Bosfa who suspected no deceit, writes his letters, and hauing receiued the money, deliueis them to this Impostor, who doth imitate it daily, vntill in the end he could counterfeite Bosfa's hand. After fiftene daies he restored the letters againe vnto Bosfa, and receiued his owne, pretending that his Nephew, hauing ended his businesse, was gone from Venice. Conuerling thus with the Banker, he gathered vp some stragling letters, which lay disperfed, being of no moment. And he being from home, he goes vnto his booke-keeper, and desires him to lend him paper and a seale, hauing good opportunitie to write vnto his friends, the messenger being in haste; hauing good leisure in the absence of Bosfa, being a speedy writer, he writes six letters suddenly, and seales them with Bosfa's seale; he deuised this fraud that he might obseure the forme of his paper, and the manner of his seale. Finding no such paper at Naples, he buies C the like at Ancona, and counterfeits the seale, the which he keeps for to effect his villanie.

During his abode at Naples, he was encouraged by a pardon granted for the like offence; There was one that had counterfeited a Bankers letters condemned to be hanged, going to execution, and meeting with the Viceroy of Naples, and the Cardinall of Agnania, he was deliuered, so as he expected the like grace, if he were taken in the like offence. Soone after he came to Padoua with a shauen crowne, counterfeiting himselfe to be a Priest. In this habit he goes in the euening to visit the Bishop of Concordia, and faines himselfe to be the Bishop of Venafrey in the Kingdome of Naples, who was forced to flie his country, vpon suspicion of adulterie with the Duke of Caietans Neece, whereof he was falsely accused by his ill-willers: that being banished from his country and house, he had bene at Rome to purge D himselfe vnto the Pope of so foule a fact, but the hatred of his great enemies had made him to yeeld to their enuie, who hauing often fought his life by poison and force, he had secretly escaped out of Rome in a poore Priests habit, and had fled vnto him as vnto a Sanctuary and safe refuge. He intreats him to fauour a miserable man and a vagabond, and that he would finde him some trustie man, vnder whose name he might safely receiue at Venice ten thousand ducates of gold which he had left in trust at Naples with Ian Baptista Carraciola Marquis of Saint Elmi: That in his aduersitie the said Marquis and the Archbishop of Bari his brother, had bene his great fauourers: and that he might requite this kindnesse with some good turne, he had betrothed his Neece vnto the Marquis with a dowrie of a hundred and fiftie thousand crownes, and the money which he had left in deposit was to buy E chaines, jewels, and other ornaments for women, whereby he might purchase his returne into his country. The Bishop of Concordia greeting at his misfortune, promitteth him all helpe, and to giue him a faithfull man to negotiate his businesse, namely, Antonie Bartholomius a Banker, by whom he might safely receiue the money at Venice which he had left at Naples. This counterfeite Priest answered that he thought it very conuenient, and hauing giuen him thanks he retired himselfe secretly.

This practise was confirmed by one of the Bishop of Concordias seruants, who said he had seene him at Rome in a Bishops weed, so as if there had bene any suspicion of fraud, the Bishop by the testimonie of his old seruant had easily freed it. Fana faines that he had written to Naples to Caracciola, and letting passe so many daies as a post might goe from Padoua F to Naples, and returne from thence to Venice, he giues a packet to Ostauus Olina his brothers brother, being acquainted with his coulensage; the which like a flying post he brought to Angelo Bosfa at Venice, being vnto Alexander at Naples: hauing opened the packet, he read the letter that was written vnto himselfe, and other three written from the Marquis Caracciola, whereof one was to the Bishop of Concordia, another to him of Venafrey, and the third to Anthony Bartholomius.

Thefe

A These three letters are sent from Venice to Padoua, to the Bishop of Concordia: hauing read that which was written to himselfe, he sends for the counterfeite Bishop, and deliueis him his, the third vnto Bertholomius being then at Venice, with charge that he should receiue the money for his fellow and friend the Bishop. All these letters were counterfeited, and written by Fana, that written by Alexander Bosfa, was of that paper which he had bought at Ancona, and sealed with his seale, the other of the Marquis of Caracciola was as cunningly counterfeited. Alexander Bosfa's letter to Angelo contained these words: You shall understand that the Marquis of Saint Elmi, within three daies after that the Archbishop his brother shall be come to Naples, is to deliuer vnto me ten thousand ducates, to the end that you deliuer so much to Anthony Bartholomius a Merchant at Venice, to buy pearles, precious stones, and other Jewels of B that kinde. The letter to the counterfeite Bishop of Venafrey was written in this sense: I haue vnderstood by your letters that you are safe in the Bishop of Concordias house, who hath promised you the helpe and assistance of Anthony Bartholomius a Merchant at Venice, by his meanes you shall receiue ten thousand ducates, which you left with me, within three daies after that my brother the Archbishop shall be returned to Naples, I will send a letter vnder Bertholomius, certifying, that you may receiue that money for the buying of Jewels. That which was written to Bertholomius contained these words: I vnderstand by the Bishop of Concordia, that I am to pay ten thousand ducats to buy Jewels, within three daies he will be here that should deliuer the money, hauing receiued it, I will presently deliuer it to Alexander Bosfa, from whom I will take a bill for the C payments of so much to you at Venice.

C Within three daies after, Fana suggests that he had receiued five other letters by a Post, one was written to Francis Bordenis factor to Alexander Bosfa, another from the said Alexander to Angelo, the three others to himselfe falsely called Bishop of Venafrey, to the Bishop of Concordia, and to Bertholomius, all counterfeited. The bill of exchange went in these words: Hauing read this letter, within three daies after or sooner, without expecting any other aduice, pay vnto Anthony Bartholomius a Merchant and Banker of Venice, ten thousand ducats, the which we haue receiued from the Marquis of Saint Elmi, to buy pearles and Jewels, and if Bertholomius will exceed this summe, doubt not to giue it him, for the Marquis hath left a thousand ducates more in deposito with vs. The letter which was written to Bertholomius, spake thus: I send you bills of exchange for ten thousand ducates, whereof I made mention in my former writing, three daies D since, you shall deliuer it to the Banker, and hauing receiued the money, you shall buy precious stones, pearles, gold chaines, and such like, according to the direction of my Lord Bishop of Concordia. He aduiseeth Fana to goe himselfe to Venice, and to make choise of that rich ware, wherein there was much deceit: he yeelds to his aduice, and hauing letters of commendation to Bertholomius, taking for his companion Ianua Peter Olina another of his wifes brethren, he goes to Venice, salutes Bertholomius, and deliueis him the Bishop of Concordias letters. He not knowing what a Scorpion he did nourish in his bosome, entertained Fana for his guest, and did reuerence him as a Prelate: hauing receiued the bill of exchange from him, he presents it to Angelo Bosfa, who accepts it, and promitteth payment accordingly, whereupon Bertholomius goes about to make choise of his pearles, he giues a scantling vnto the Goldsmith,

E hauing seene the ware, he payes the price that was agreed vpon: During this businesse, this counterfeite Bishop staid some daies in Bertholomius house, where he carried a very religious shew, hauing alwaies a Breuiary in his hand, still mumbling his prayers like an Ape, so as he was held to be very deuout; and when as he went abroad, he put on such a countenance, as he was taken of all men for a reuerend Bishop, and was much esteemed by the Generall of the Venetians Gallies, hauing carefully inquired of Bertholomius of the fame and life of this Prelate. And to the end he might more safely abuse Bertholomius, he told him of his misfortunes, of his profcription, of the malice of his enemies, and repeats vnto him what he had said vnto the Bishop of Concordia, adding that he had an intent to goe to Turin, to speake with the Marquis of Este, who was going into Spaine about the mariage of the Duke of F Mantouas sonne, with the Duke of Sauoies daughter, to intreat him to procure him letters to the Viceroy of Naples, that he might be restored to his country and Bishopricke. Whilest he remained with Bertholomius, he discoursed of matters of State, especially about the controuersie betwixt the Venetians and the Bishop of Rome, seeming often to take their parts, yet with such moderation as he dissented from the Venetians onely for religions cause. He often and very silyly talked of accidents which hapned vnto him, that he had bene sent Nuncio from Pope Clement the 8. vnto the Emperour Rodolphus, that besides his entertainment, he

he had spent of his owne in this Ambassage 15000. crownes, for the which charge he had A received no grace, when as by the iudgement of the Archbishop of Barry and other Statesmen he had defended a Cardinals hat: Bertholinus looking wilthly on him at the Table, said vnto him: Vnlesse I be much deceiued I haue seene you else where, the which Fausa did affirme, and vnlesse my memorie and mine eyes wander, I thinke it was in the Marquis of Palatinus Palace, upon the street of Sallo, where we did recreate our selues with fishing.

True it is that Fausa was neuer there, yet whether that he had learned of some other that Bertholinus had bene in the Marquiss house, and there taken delight in fishing, or that he had some diuining spirit, he did so intermix truth with his lies, as Bertholinus was forced to confesse that which had neuer hapned. The businesse being thus effected by this counterfeite Prelate, he writes vnto the Bishop of Concordia, that the Jewels being bought according to B his desire, he meant to depart the next day early, that they might be at Padoua before noone, desiring Bertholinus that going into Piedmont he would let him haue Martin his oldest seruant for a companion. Bertholinus hauing taken a discharge from the Bishop of Concordia, deliuered all the Jewels to Fausa, who gaue him a note for the receipt thereof. Fausa hauing packt vp all, he offered Bertholinus a largeword for his paines, besides his brokeredg, the which in regard of the Bishop of Concordia he would by no meanes receiue. But heare the villanie of a most wicked guest, who fearing if for want of money he should make sale of any Jewels, he should discouer his fraud by his want: Whilest he lay in the Venetians house, he had obserued that there was money in a chest in the Chamber where he was lodged; he picks open the locke, and steals fise hundred crownes from his Host, and locks the chest C again, so as his theft could not be discouered. He goes to Padoua with Bertholinus, who was ignorant of this villanie, and hauing giuen many thanks to the Bishop of Concordia, and commended his care who had giuen him so carefull an Host and Factor, being impatient of all delay, making haste as he said to Turin, he retired himselfe. Bertholinus returning home, and opening his chest, he found it empty, but to suspect the Prelate of this, his dignitie and profession did forbid him.

imposture discouered.

The next day Bertholinus received nine thousand ducates from Angelo Boffa: but behold there comes a Post with all speed from Naples, to aduertise Angelo that his Nephew Alexan- der had giuen no bills of exchange to the Marquis of Saint Elmi. The fraud being discouered, inqurie is made for Charles Pritius professing himselfe Bishop of Venafrey, and a war- D rant granted to apprehend him. Bertholinus & Boffa certified the Bishop of Concordia, how they haue bene all abused, so as they hunt ouer all Italie for him, but in vaine: And they giue notice vnto forraigne Nations of the villanie of this man, of his theft and flight, but they make particular mention of the Jewels, and of the weight of the pearle, with the colour and forme of the scales. The description of this theft is sent to Lumagne a Banker at Paris, who giues notice thereof to all the Goldsmiths.

Fausa went not to Turin, as he made him, but gets him home, and acquaints his wife and children with his intent to goe into France, that he had store of gold and pretious stuffe, whereupon he instantly changed his abode, and went backe againe to Venice with his wife, three children, and Ottauio and Peter Oliua his wiues brethren, and Ottauio milking this E voyage into France returned home. Passing from thence with all his familie through the Grisons and Suisses, he came in Nouember to Paris, and there hired him a chamber. Fausa thinking himselfe in a safe country, studied where he should settle himselfe, not at Paris, by reason of the concourse of Italians and other Nations, alwaies fearing the misfortunes which fell vpon him, but at Poytiers, or Angiers: He writes to Francis Corfina, who gouerned an Apothecaries shop at Brussels, requiring him to come speedily to Paris, that he had store of gold wherewith they would buy drugs, and set vp a shop for Physicke, and that he should haue an equall share in the gaine. Whilest he expects an answer from Corfina, he offers some Jewels to sell to a Goldsmith called Burgeio, intreating him to help him to a broker, by F whose meanes he might make sale thereof: The Goldsmith promisseth him his owne labour, and receiues foure cakes, for the which he giues him a note of his hand. He shewes one of them to Maurice and Turket, two Jewellers, who viewing by their notes the forme and red colour, finde it to be stolen: They make an agreement betwixt them to diuide the reward which was promised vpon the recouerie of the goods, and then they acquainted the Lieutenant Criminall therewith, who leauing his habit, did counterfeite himselfe a Merchant, and attended Fausa returne, who came soone after, inquiring of the Goldsmith, if he had found out

A out any one to buy his Jewels, yes marry haue I, said he, very sufficient and wealthy men, the which Fausa thinking to be true, he that had often circumvented others, fearing no deceit in this counterfeite Chapman, he drew forth his cases of Jewels, the which by the marke that came from Venice were knowne to be the same. Fausa seeing the Merchants to obserue the scales very precisely, began to feare, and to the end he might withdraw himselfe, he pretended that he had some present businesse with another Merchant at home, and that he would returne presently whilest they were viewing of the Jewels. But the Iudge discouering who he was, apprehends Fausa, he examines him of his other cases, who doth not denie but he had ten more, the which could not be hidden, whereupon the Iudge went with Burgeio the Goldsmith to Fausa lodging, where they finde the number of the cases, and the weight of B the Gold and Jewels, and take an Inuentorie thereof. This cunning wretch seeing himselfe brought into these straights, intreats that he may not be ouerthrowne with the losse of so rich Merchandise, when as his life, good name, and the health of his wite and children were vnder the protection of the Law and Iustice.

Fausa seeing his villany discouered, studies how to the

The day of his apprehension he was examined of whence he was; how old he was, and of what profession? He answered that he was called Francis Fausa, borne at Capriola, a towne in the Territories of Genoa, that he professeth Physicke, and was fise and fortie yeeres old. That although his chiefe profession was Physicke, yet he had bene accustomed to deale for Rings, Jewels, and Pearle: that he had bought this Merchandise at Placentia, from one that C was knowne, and two other vnknowne, to the end he might sell them againe in France and the Low-countries. Being examined againe the thirteenth day of Ianuary, he fals vpon his knees and craues mercy of the Iudges, saying, That whatsoever he had formerly confest was false, that he was guiltie of the theft which was in question, and so relates the whole manner of it, as you haue heard.

Examination of Fausa.

But he determining to do that vnto himselfe, which he expected from the Iudges, he resolved to prevent the infamy by a voluntarie death: Being wrapt vp in his clothes & couerlets, to the end the warme blood might flow more freely in the cold of winter, he cut the veins of either arme with a Penknife: but the violence of the cold congealed the blood, and forced him to liue, that would gladly haue died, his strength failing him, he calls for his keeper, his D armes were bound vp, and his life saved.

Fausa confes-
seth the fact.

In the meane time Polts fle to Venice with newes of his taking: They presse him daily with new questions, and bid him tell why he demanded Martin of the Bishop of Concordia to accompany him in his way? He answered, he did it that he might more cunningly hide his fact. Being asked why he returned to Venice after so memorable a fact? He answered, that he had made choise thereof as his safest way, and that such as pursued him would thinke he had bene gone farre from thence. The Iudge inquiring whether his wife were guiltie of all these villanies; He answered, that the secrets of such waightie businesse were not to be committed to a womans wit; that he was of an innocent life and conuersation, as all Italian wives be, to whom mariage is a willing seruitude: that he had bene alwaies modest and E obedient, and neuer questioning of his affaires, notwithstanding the wife (as if she should be a witness) was confronted with her husband, he hung about his necke, and could not speake for sobbing, but he hauing more courage, spake thus vnto her: O wife, either my life (shall be saved, or else I shall haue a certaine death; If I liue, thou shalt enioy a loving husband; if I die, thou shalt lose all cause of sorrow. When as hee viewed the cases with the Jewels and Pearle, he accused his want of iudgement, hauing still left them with the same wax and scales as he had receiued them at Venice.

Fausa seeks to kill his wife.

But being often vrged that it was not his owne worke and industrie, to counterfeite so many letters and hands, for that when hee had written to a Bishop, he did vfe pontificall phrases; to a Marquis he wrote like a Souldier and Courtier, and to Merchants he vfed their F owne stile: He answered, that he himselfe was the inuenter of all those deceits; that hee was not ignorant of their manner of speaking, and could so well counterfeite any mans hand, as it should not be discerned from the right; he had no lesse skill in scales, as he contended with any grauer in his art. Whilest his cause was in question, Corfina comes from Bruxelles, he visits the prisoner, and promisseth him all help and assistance. Fausa craues onely this fauour, that he would aduertise him daily what past in the Venetian Ambassadors house concerning him.
Vpon the fise and twentieth day of February Corfina informes him that there was a Post come from Venice, assuring that Bertholomius would be there the same day, and therefore he A should speedily resolve of his escape. Faua having conferred with Corfina, he bewraies his minde vnto him, how he meant to escape; that he would slip into the keepers chamber in his absence, and so get downe into the Court; if he might be assisted with a Ladder of ropes, he would get vp to the top of the wall, and so into the street. Corfina, or some other fits his turne, and makes fast such a Ladder vnto the wall about fix of the clocke at night, and cast a rope into the Court, with the which Faua should draw the Ladder vnto him.

This practise had like to haue taken effect on the seven and twentieth day of February in a very darke night. Faua having sent a seruant of the house forth, to fetch him Wine, in the meane time he gets into the keepers chamber, strips himselfe, and with a rope slips downe B into the Court: being there he was long searching for the rope which was tied to the Ladder, for that the night was darke and raينه: hauing found it, he goes vp, but being too short, he could not get to the top. Whilst he strues to come to the top of the wall, he that went to fetch him wine returns, and finding him not there, he tels the keeper: he with his seruants finding Fauas clothes, take him hauing one foot ouer the wall, and shut him vp close: they presently goe forth with lights to search where this Ladder was cast, and meet with a man flying with his sword drawne. The keeper examines Faua of his premeditated flight, and of the Ladder, and he freely confest all, yet he knew not whether Corfina or any other had provided him this meane to escape.

Bertholomius
comes to Paris.

Bertholomius comming to Paris with letters of commendation from the State of Venice, C he is brought vnto the King by the Ambassador, who giues him a fauourable hearing, and promisseth to doe him iustice, commanding the Chancellor that he should not suffer this wickednesse to goe unpunished. Bertholomius to proue him guiltie, produceth all things that might discouer the fact. Hereupon at the suit of Angelo Bessa his proccesse is made. Faua despairing of all helpe, being weary of his life, hee seekes all meanes to die; The fourth of March he sends for a Barber to cut his haire; he intreats him to helpe him to halte an ounce of Arsenick, Currans, Roses, and Sugar, with the which (being mingled with the whites of Egges) he would make a medicine for the swelling of his eies. The Barber did as he willed him, but when as he saw the poison mixt with all, the keeper looking on, he told him what it was, the which being taken from him, and asked to what end he made it; he answered, for D the paine in his eies, and although that Antimonie was taken for a poison, yet being beaten and tempered it lost his force; that he was so farre from offering himselfe violence, as euer since the cutting of his veines he had sought to preserve his health. He did abhorre to bee condemned to the Gallies, rather wilking death then seruitude, finding himselfe vnable for that labour by reason of his wounds.

Faua receives
humilitie.

All proofes being made, his proccesse was ended the two and twentieth day of March. Faua E haueing some notice that his sentence drew neere, he resolved to prevent his Ignominie by a voluntarie death: The violence of the cold had stopt his blood, poison had bene taken from him; and he had callt it vp often hauing drunke it: he must not now attempt death in vaine; he intreats his wife to make him a certaine cake, the which hauing sent by his eldest sonne, he brake it in peeces, and rowling it in Arsenicke he swallowed it: soone after the poison wrought on him with great torments; he tels his wife that his last houre approached, but he speaks nothing of the poison, and requires a Priest to haue pardon of his finnes: the violence of the poison increasing, he desired to be laid out vpon the straw, and soone after died on the foure and twentieth day of March.

Sentence gi-uen against Faua.

His bodie was opened and the poison found in his bowels, whereupon they gaue sentence against his carcasse. Faua was found guiltie for that he had changed his name, counterfeited other mens hands, stolne Gold and Jewels, and poisoned himselfe: his bodie was condemned to be drawne goulding vnto the common Gibet, and there to be hanged by the heeles: His goods were forfeited to the King, hauing first paid the price of the Merchandize: There F was a warrant granted to apprehend Ottauio and Peter, who had bene companions in all his villanies. It may be I haue bene tedious in relating of these Impostures, but I thought good to set downe this notable villany particularly, that hereafter other men may take heed of such Counsellers.

Alferianus Muscardus commits a cruell fact.

I will adde another without any fraud or deceit, but more cruell. Alferianus Muscardus not impacient unknowne vpon the frontiers of Picardie for his valour, during the combultions of France,

1608

A impatient of peace, and to liue quiet in his owne home, he murders a Gentleman his neighbour, his poore mournfull widow calls her selfe at the Kings feet, and sues for reuenge for the murder of her husband. The Prouost of the Kings houle had charge to apprehend the murderer, whereof being aduertised, he presently flies into a strong Castle called Moyencourt, and there hides himselfe.

He was summoned by a Trumpet, to yeeld himselfe vnto the Kings mercy, the which he refuseth to doe, vnlesse hee might haue his pardon granted vnder the broad seale, or that Monsieur de Cregui, or the Earle of Saulx his Brother would passe their word for his safety.
The Prouost seeing he could not bee perswaded by good words, sends for all the garrison
B Souldiers thereabouts, with an intent to force him: approaching neere, he shot five or six of them; Being thus obdurate, they sent for Artillery to Noyon, but before they planted it, they summon him againe to yeeld vnto the Kings mercy, who had long hands which no pri-uate man could escape; but they talked to a deate man.

Being againe thought fit to moue him by the Parish Priest, who discoursing vnto him of the cares and contempt of this present life; of the future blessednesse, or of the eternall paine, he lost all his labour: They then resolved to attempt that by force, which they could not effect by faire meanes. Whilst they prepare to force him, they sent the murderesse mother (who had bene a companion to him in his impudency and villanie) vnto them: being let into the Castle, she intreated her daughters and her suster with teares to yeeld, assuring C them of the Kings mercy, but the vnfortunate old woman not able to moue either of them, returned; telling the Prouost, that they were both resolved to die willingly, and to prevent an ignominious death. He first let downe a Boy and a Girl in a basket, to the end they might be preferred, then shewing themselves, and intreating the lookers on to pray for them, they went into a pinacle, where seeing they had no longer time to protract their yielding, the gates being forced, they shot one another thorow, and died. The Castle being forced, their carcasses were found bloudie and halfe burnt (for they had gathered much straw about them, to the end they might be consumed with fire) and were balmed to the end they might be reserved for publicke infamy.

The five and twentieth of Aprill the Kings third sonne was borne at Fontainebleau, on the looke for a fourth who shall bee called Duke of Alancou: I doe not reade that there hath bene more Sonnes of France. Henry the second had so many, but their liues were short, and their ends were not happy: but our Queene is fruitfuller and more blessed then the first Me- dicis, and promisseth more, which is the true meane to settle the quiet of the Kingdome, to bless their friends and confederates, and to curbe their enemies, enuironning it as it were with strong towers and defences.

In Iuly Dau Pedro of Toledo was sent Ambassador from the King of Spaine to the French King, he was entertained at Fontainebleau, with all the delights and sports that the Court could afford: being gladdened therewith, he went to Paris, where either the beautie of E the place, or the importance of his Ambassage staid him long.

Ambassage
from Spaine.

This yeare the Country-mans Prouerbe was found true, That after a sharpe Winter, fol- lows a hot Summer; as passengers were frozen with cold, so did labourers in Summer fry with heat, and many were smothered, as if they had bene in the Desarts of Arabia, so as the extreme cold of Winter and the violent heat of Summer spoiled their Vintage, hauing scarce had any raينه in three moneths. This yeare the Duke of Vendosme, the Kings base sonne, was made sure to the Duke of Mercuers onely daughter. The marriage had bene concluded at Angers in Aprill 1598, and a great penaltie imposed vpon him that should detract.

I doe not hold it vnto the History, nor to be left to posteritie, to relate the memorabile
Decrees of Courts, wherein you may obserue their great equitie and severitie, whereby young F people may be terrified from whorish and vnequal marriages, and contempt of Parents by the example of the parties condemned. James Drouet a Gentleman borne, sonne to an Auditor of the accounts in Normandy, being seduced by the perswasions of Joan Andrew a base woman, he marries her secretly, the Parents complained to the Court of Parliament against the woman for the rape of this young man, pretending that such marriages were forbidden by the Law of God, and an Edict made at Orlance, without the consent of the father, and sufficient witnesses, and all Priests were forbidden to consummate such stolne marriages: the woman and of a doubtfull fame, that their sonne was not to dispose of himselfe, and that he was forced. That these clandestine marriages had bene often punished, and that it was a rape.

In the end at the great Instance of the Parents, and in severitie of publike discipline, the Parliament decreed, that the stolne marriage betwixt James Dronet and Joan Andrew was void and of no effect, being made without the consent of the Parents, and against the lawes of the Kingdome. Joane was condemned to goe with a Torch in her hand, her face couered, and a halter about her necke, and to aske pardon of God, of the Parliament, and of the Parents of Dronet, then to be whipped three daies together at the corner of euery street, and so to be banished the Realme, or if he did not obey this Decree, to be hanged. All her goods were confiscate to the King, hauing first paid the charges of the sute. James was also deprived of all the inheritance which he could pretend from father and mother, and condemned to a yeares imprisonment, untill that his Parents should be sureties for him. Dronet and Joane were forbidden euer to see one another, or to speake together, by word, writing, or messenger, and not to renew this marriage. Those which had consummated this clandestine marriage contrary to the Decrees of the Councell of Trent, and the Edict of Blois, were also condemned to come into the Court, and vpon their knees with a torch in their hands, to craue pardon of God, the Parliament, and the Parents, being also condemned in a great fine.

It was also decreed, that the Edicts of Henry the Second, and Henry the Third, made at Blois vpon that same subiect, should be euery yeare published on a certaine day, in all the inferior Courts of Normandy, and commandement giuen to obserue them strictly, nor to suffer the banes to be asked by any hired Priests or Vicars, but to pronounce them themselves in open pulpit, three Sundaies in the presence of the Parents. The Officials were also charged, not to admit of these banes, vnlesse they were required by the Parents and Kinsfolkes. James, Joane, the Priests that were condemned, and the Clergie of Normandy ioyning all together, make great instance to the Kings priuy Councell to haue this Decree disannulled, and declared void, but it was irreligious to offer violence to so religious a Decree, yet with this moderation, as the King was moued to pardon the pecuniary fine, and the banishment of this wretched woman.

The Clergie of France had by their Deputies held a long assembly at Paris the yeare before: their conclusions (which were then kept very secret) burst now forth into a great complaint made vnto the King by the Archbishop of Bourges, in the presence of the Cardinals of Ioyeuze, Gondie, Sourdis and Perron, and thus hee spake in the name of the whole Clergie.

Most inuincible amongst mortall men, if it be lawfull for sorrow to speake, if nothing afflicts miserable men more then imposed silence; The Church plunged in so many calamities and miseries, so that it is ouerflowne and drowned in a Sea of griefe, hauing no passage but thorow thornes and bushes, whose Cup is Worme-wood and bitter Drege, shall receive no small comfort this day, if it shall please your most sacred Maiestie for to lend a fauourable and attentue eare to their iust complaints. The Edict hath exceeded, and farre extended it selfe beyond the torments and crueltie of Julian the Apostata, who forbade Christians to sigh and weepe, and did enuy this bitter comfort to wretches, more wicked then the Heathen which sung;

Elete meos casus, est quadam flere voluptas, Pacatur lachrymis egeriturque dolor.

Beweale my case; weeping brings some content;
Sorrow by teares findeth both ease and vent.

But now the Church hauing overcome tyrannous Impietie, and being laden and crowned with the spoiles of her enemies, adorned with the fauours of Emperors and Kings, and supported by their power, is not afraid to shew her bloudy wounds vnto the King. To the King, I say, whose Predecessors haue graced and beautified the Churches wedding with a Ring, and other Jewels; an eternal monument of the Kings, and of France her pietie. And for that thou hast more then once heard her sighes and groanes being vnworthily intreated, and received her (being assailed) into thy armes, she comes more confidently relying vpon your helpfull fauour, being againe deformed with the impuritie and corruption of the world, and with teares of griefe, doth prostrate her selfe at your most Royall feet; she speaks vnto you

Complaint of the Clergy vnto
the king.

A you not fearefully, but with a free voice, being worthily bound vnto her; hauing powred forth so many teares and prayers vnto Almighty God, for your preferuation and advancement vnto the Crowne, hoping you will not be vnmindfull of so great a pietie.

But oh! Henry thinke there is nothing more worth of a King, then a care to plant, preferue and propagate Religion: It is the cie of an Empire, the life of Government, an arme of thy Armes; and as I may say in a word, a Kingdome hath not a more firme support. The Kings of Persia held it most true, or else their Heathenish superstition did not suffer the children to be advanced to the Kingdome, before they had learned the Mysteries of their fathers Religion. Religion & Government are the two supporters of humane society: happy is the coniunction, if one requiring anothers helpe, they concurre friendly. The Tribes of Israel how did they flourish, when as Moses praised vnto God and Iosua fought and vanquished? They are much deceived which impute the ruine of Kingdomes to climactericall and fatall yeares: Farre be it from the thoughts of Christians, who should rather beleuee that the fates of Kingdomes depends of Religion, the which being maintained, stand firme, but neglected they goe to ruine: It is a parcell of Gods fauour, and a coniunction of mortall and immortal spirits, and a seale, and bond of the eternall couenant, the which the fates conspiring cannot dissolue: And therefore the wise Romans would haue the names of their Tutelarie Gods, kept from their enemies, lest they should goe into forraigne Cities; they had an Imagination that Sagunt could not be forced, vnlesse the God which did protect it were called away. Wherefore the Heathen did thinke the coniunction of Religion and Government to be an inexpugnable fort.

Beleue oh most Christian King! that thou art linked vnto God by Religion, and that there is no greater signe of a declining estate, then when Religion is banished, being apparent by many ancient examples, that God flies the company of mortall men, when as Religion and his worship is neglected. Thinke oh King! that thy state is not fetled by any politike Government, or by wise Counsellors; there is a secret power from aboue which rules it, euen God who giues and takes away Scepters, he watcheth for thy safetie, preferues thee from thy enemies, and makes thee a spectacle to all Europe by thy victorious triumphs. The same God hath broken the yoke vnder which France lay bound, wiped away the teares, pacified the ciuill warres, erected the ruined Altars of peace, cured the wounds, restored the Lawes, and (lest I should be tedious) renewed France that was almost dead, and hath made it a terror to other Nations. Thy glorie is so great as thou hast brought this ship being readie to be cast away by the violence of the storme, into a safe Port, thou hast broken the confederate Armies, and passing so many dangers, dost shine with the spoiles of thine enemies, thou hast releued languishing France, which despairing of all helpe ranne willingly to ruine, if thy inuincible courage had not exceeded the greatnesse of her extremities.

These, oh Henry! be the Monuments whereby thou hast bound future ages vnto thee. But this is not all: to make thy glory immortal, there rests one thing the which the Church must finish and make euerlasting; Namely, that thou wilt command the Decrees of the Councell of Trent to be obserued, whereby corruption, filthinesse, symonie, bargaines made in trust, and such like wickednesse may be punished. The Synod was celebrated by a general assembly of the world, confirmed by the Pope, and is obserued of all Christians; The which if you shall refuse to publish, that vndiuided garment shall not be cut with any other sheeres, nor the Vale of the Temple rent with any other whirlewind.

Antiquitie which is an incorrupt witnesse, hath worthily honoured France, for that it hath alwaies assisted the Church and saved it from tempest and shipwracke: A field which the heavenly Husbandman hath manured with his owne hand, and purged it from Tares, and Darnell, that the Lilly may flourish, vnder whose shadow it might rest secure from all heat and stormes; a Garden set with most pleasant and sweet flowers, neither is there any Nation more obedient to their Pastors and Ministers. France should lose these goodly Titles, if it should reiect the Councell of Trent.

The Astronomers hold, that the Planets are governed by the motion of the heauen: onely the Moone they ascribe hath a peculiar and contrary motion. It is most certaine, that sacred Oracles doe in like manner depend vpon Generall Councels, and that the wheele of Gods chariot (which Ezechiel saw) is greater, the which forceth the rest with his violent motion. The Councell of Trent is like a Sphere, which doth gouern the Planet of the French church, to requester the which from Synodall decrees by the pretence of priuileges & priuate Immu-

ities, what is it else, but to giue a priuate and opposite motion like vnto the Moone? They A that looke into the secrets of Nature, say that the eye, which is the window of mans body, is instructed with seuen Arteries, by whose violence it moues, yet the eye is not vawillingly moued. It is not vnlke the liberty of the French Church, the which depends of a greater motion, neither should priuileges make it proud, and moue against the eye whose beame it is, but by the motion of Synodall constitutions. It is the Load-star of the vniuersall Church, according to the which the French must direct her course. Your Maiestie is not prouided herebv. neither doe we with any other expostulation sigh at the taking away of elections: If we complain with more bitterness, the thing it selfe giues vs leave to speake for this shield taken away, sacred and profane things are confounded; the government of the Church is troubled; the censor is taken out of the Priests hands; the wall which diuides the holy Vestry, is broken; and the mytticall oyle of the Tabernacle is spilt.

It rests in your singular iudgement to make choise of Pastors, not according to the ambition of the Court, giuing men to spiritual liuing, and not spiritual liuing to men: By this choise the Church doth shine, thou hast made choise of corner stones to support it; thou hast prouided wise Mariners for this mytticall ship, and now the Order of the Leuities being cleaned, defends the Altars and holy things: Although in this age there are many things required to purge the Church, yet the glory is to be attributed to the hauing aduanced worthy Prelates, to as vertue hath no cause at all to complain that there is neglected, the which it may please you for to loue and embrace still, and to persecute it with honours and rewards, that it may glory and shine in all good arts and discipline. There remains how much we are grieved, and how iustly we exclaime against Symonie, the payson of spiritual liuing, the reproach and pollution of the Church, Give us trafficke, possession of spiritual reuenues giuen vnto Lay-men; Alienation of Church-lands, contempt of the Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction, and erroneous appeales, receiued with all impunitie, so as that which was held a great offence, custome hath made it nothing. It is like vnto the Leuitian, or lobs euill spirit, which doth no more lurke in darknesse, but shewes it selfe boldly: these finnes (like vnto Abeles innocent bloud) cry for reuenge. Leuis the Godly hauing polluted himselfe herewith, and flaying from the steps of Charles the Great his Father, treading Lawes vnder foot, he was not onely a reproach vnto France, but also a contempt and scorne to his children, whose righteous God did reuenge.

That all-piercing eye of heauen, which looks into the secret finnes of mortall men, with what an angry countenance doth he behold the holy pledges of the Church, the price of sinners, the godly deuotions, the bread of the hungry, and the cloathes of the naked bestowed vpon Lay-men, and employed to filthy vses, as in the time of the Gentiles by a wicked King in despite of the Christians, Adams Idoll was set in Christs place, the holy Ornaments of the Sanctuary so prophaned, in the banquets of the Kings of Asiria, as the Almighty hand of Heauen did by the learned vail denounce reuenge.

Pardon me, oh King, if I say that Adams Idoll is now set in Christs place, that the holy Ornaments are polluted, the Sanctuarie defiled, and the corner stones shaken and pulled away, if you shall any longer suffer the proposition bread and the holy corne to be stolne from the Altars by married men, Knights and Souldiers, whose hands are siter for armes and murders, than for incense and mytticall things.

In the Canticles the mytticall Spouse complains, that falling amongst souldiers in the night shee was spoiled of her ornaments: The goods of the Church, proceeding from the bounty of religious Kings, may well be taken for the ornaments of the Church: and if you shall suffer her reuenues to be waied by Courtiers, what is it else, but to abandon the Spouse to be spoiled by souldiers: and although it were with the consent of the Clergy, too indulgent to this mischiefe, yet there are many reasons which should perswade you not to fauour it. Adam as soone as he had tasted of the forbidden fruit did presently blush at his owne nakednesse: the reuenues of the Church is like vnto a tree, which God hath forbidden to touch, whose fruits being once gathered, our nakednesse is presently discovered.

There are many things whereof wee might complain vnto your Maiestie, but lest I should be tedious, I will end with this petition in the name of all the Prelats of the French Church here present, that you will confirme that which hath beene granted to our order, the which hath beene often neglected. Vnto the end your affaires may prosper, that God may bleesse you and your Kingdome, and that your Empire may be permanent, and haue no ting

A ting but the whole world, stretch forth your assisting hand to releue the Church which faints, helpe her, grieve at her misfortune, ease her afflictions, and cure her wounds. Looke vpon so many hundreds of Parishes with pittie, who whereas they feed their flocks with the food of Angels, they scarce eat the bread of mortall men, liuing most hardly, so cold is pittie, and so sparingly they offer vnto God. Wherefore vnto you God that you will hereafter be a sacrifice vnto him, and labour continually at his Altars, leauing a Testimony to posteritie that Kings should haue a continuall care of the Church and worship of Almighty God.

The Tribes of Israel were forbidden to contract mariage out of their kindred, onely the Tribe of Iuda had a prerogative, for that it did gouerne the rest, to marrie with the Tribe of Leuie, the which had the Government of the Altar and Priest-hood: By this Simbole the Hebrewes did fitly obserue, that the Priest-hood and Government were fitly ioyned. But oh most Christian King! shall it bee lawfull to speake vnto thee as the Israelites did vnto their King? Flesh of my flesh, blond of my blond, and bones of my bones: Let vs heresie be one, and an vndiuided couple: thy weepings are teares to me, thy sobs shall force me to sigh, and being conuerted one into another, I can comfort thee with these words; Daughter of Sion full of sorrow, leaue off thy teares, I am he that will free thee of thy sack-cloth and mourning weed, and wipe away thy ashes and deformitie, and will make thee shine with Balmamm and sweet smelling ointments. And as the Hebrew Daughter-in-law did thus flatter her King; I will that posteritie shall know that I haue clad thee with Purple and Scarlet, and enriched thee with the first fruits; thy Sabbots and Holy-daies haue beene worshipped by me: I haue armed thee with the Target of the strong: I haue girt thy thigh with the sword of Ionathan against thine enemies, which cannot be blanted, being accustomed to be goared with his blond. Gue then oh King! vnto the Church her Rights and Tributes; reioyce with thy mother, who hath called thee her first begotten sonne, and hath giuen thee the first kisse, whom about all others she would haue kept in her bosome. For so many worthy Titles grant he may bee free. That if Thyanen the Philosopher did sometimes say of Titus Caesar, Titus did vanquish Iurie, and Apollonius Titus; the Church may speake thus; Henric crowned with victories and happinesse, hath ouerthrowne and conquered all his enemies Armies, but the Church hath vanquished Henric with her teares and

I may not forget the reception of the new Bishop of Orleans, being rare and singular about all the Prelats of France. Aubespine being chosen Bishop the first day of September, he caused a Proclamation to be made, that on the fourteenth of the said month, after the ancient manner, he would make his entry into Orleans, promising impunitie to all malefactors, not onely to such as had slaine men accidentally, but euen for premeditated murders; and for all other crimes whatsoever. Thither flocke the most wicked among men: On the thirteenth the Bishop lay in the Abbey of Saint Hubert, where the next day the Abbot hauing said Masse, he put on his Myter and other pontificall ornaments. Staying there, the Chanoins of Saint Croix came vnto him, with the Doctors and Officers of the Vniuersitie, and the Magistrates of the Citie. The Bishop goeth forth bare-footed: being come to Saint Amians Church, the Chanoins receiue him, who holding his hands close together, protest that they are free from his Iurisdiction: yet they bring him to the Altar, after which, his feet are washed and cleansed, and white shooes of Silke put on: then hauing taken an oath not to attempt anything against their Rights and Priuileges, he is carried by foure of the chiefe of them in a chaire without the walls of the Towne: there they call forth foure Barons, who are subiect to the Bishop by their fees, and are euery yeare bound on the day of the Invention of the holy Crosse, to bring foure great Wax-lights in forme of gutters, euery one weighing an hundred pound weight. These Barons presented themselves to carie the Bishop, but he of his grace freed them of this seruice. Then the Clergie went before in order: being come to Bourgondie gate, he was met by the President, the Baylife of Orleans, the Lieutenant criminal, and all the Councillors of the presidiall Court. There all malefactors were let out of prison, who with great acclamations cried for mercy. The Bishop commanded the laylor to say if the prisons were empty, and whether there were not some malefactors detained, who being assured that all were freed from bonds, two of them were commanded to goe before all the rest: being come to Saint Croix, the Bishop rung a little bell, and then he made himselfe readie to say Masse: which done, he ioyned apart with the Chanoins, the Iudges were seated in another roome, and all the malefactors in the Bishops hall.

hall. After dinner the Crier being a Divine, makes them a sharpe admonition, and wils them A to live better hereafter: the Bishop confirms his speech: which done, they cried often for mercy. In the end, the Bishop giuing them his blessing, dismissed them with this charge, That they should pay all Fines and the charges of Sutes. Thus by the coming of the new Bishop, there were about an hundred freed from the Gallowes: the parents, children, and widowes grieved that they were deprived of all meanes of reuenge.

Father Angelo of Ioyeuse going out of France, had past the Alpes bare-footed, by the commandement of his Superior. At Turin a Feuer tooke him, the which when he felt, being no longer able to goe on foot, he caused himselfe to be carried in a Litter to a religious house of that Order at Riuoli. The Duke of Sauoy hearing of his sicknesse, sent his chiefe Physician, and an Apothecarie with all kinds of comfortable things fit for the recovery of his health, and Cooks to dresse his meat, being so carefull of his health, as twice a day he sent men in post to bee aduertised thereof. There was nothing omitted that the art of man could inuent: but the violence of his Feuer did make frustrate all their skill. The tenth day of his sicknesse, being the five and twentieth of September, his soule leauing the prison of his body, went happily to heauen. He died as he liued, not in the Court of Turin, nor in a bed of Downe with rich furniture, but in his garment of haire, and coucht vpon straw, in the prison of his Conuent he left the burthen of his flesh. Remold Walter, one of the Presidents of the Kings great Councell, being there by chance to negotiate some businesse for a Prince of the Blood, as he had beene deare vnto him liuing, so he was still by him in his sicknesse, and receiued his last dying words. His body was embalmed and laid at Riuoli, vntill that France his natieue Country should require it, as it did the yeare following. Walter aduertised the King on the feuen and twentieth of September, of the whole manner of his sicknesse, of his happy end, of the Duke of Sauoy's singular care, and of his last words, by the which he would haue his fatall houre made knowne vnto the Duchesse of Montpensier his Daughter by father Joseph of the same societie. So the good father did fore-see his daughter might receiue the easier wound: he knew well that Joseph was an excellent Artist to pacifie minds thus plunged in sorrow, and without doubt he did much mollifie the bitterness of this fatall message.

The Riuer of Loire did this Autumne swell so suddenly, as breaking the banks it overflowed the whole Countrey with strange whirle-pooles, rooting vp corne, woods, and old trees, drowning herds of cattle, and overflowing houses and farmes, or whatsoever withstood the rage of it. At Blois, Amboise and other townes, the arched bridges being broken, and the riuer swelling suddenly, many were drowned. The Duke of Sully receiued great losse by this inundation: when as he feared nothing that the violence of the Riuer should any way hurt his castle standing vpon Loire, behold it swels suddenly with such whirle-pooles, as it ouerthrew some towers of the castle which were very strong. Some Countrymen were seen escaping vpon tables, some climbing vp trees, and to the tops of mountains, and some by swimming laboured to flie death. And to speake in a word, all was Sea. The ruine and spoile it made, mans wit could not estimate, the which was fatal to the husbandmen for many yeares, their fields being so spoiled with stones, sand, and bushes, as they could not cleane them but with an incredible charge: for the Riuer arising out of the Mountaines of Auvergne, fragments of Rocks came rolling downe, which made the land barren: much vnlike to the Riuer of Nile, whose mud doth make their fields fat, whereupon the Country-men say, Egypt is fertile without raine.

The most Christian King sent an honorable Ambassage to Pope Paul the fifth, to acknowledge his obedience, by Charles of Gonzaga Duke of Nevers. Having made great preparations at Paris for his iourney, and taken his leaue of the Kings, he came to Mantes, where he was transported with his whole traine in foure of the Kings Gallies; and landed at Saona, from whence he went to Genoua, where the Duke and Common-weale receiued him with great honor, sending forth troups of Souldiers to meet him: being come into the citie, he was brought into the Senate by foure Senators, set in the highest seat, & had leaue to giue his voice. Having giuen thanks to the Genouoi's, he went on his iourney, and came to Ciuita-vecchia, a towne belonging to the Church, where the Popes officers receiued him with a princely entertainment, and that nothing might be wanting, Fabio Gonzaga the Duke of Mantua's Lieutenant, with many other Noblemen, came to congratulate his coming: at their departure, he presented them with a great chaine of Gold, the which they refused, not in disdaine of him that offered it, but that they desired no reward from the Kings Ambassadour but his loue.

The

A The Duke proceeding on his iourney, he was met by Monsieur De Breuiss, the Kings Ambassadour resident at Rome, the Marquis of Malatesta, the Bishop of Abrincenes, Marchmont, and all the French Nobility which was then in the City. Comming neere to Rome, there went forth to meet him, the Duke of Carpineta, the Marquis of Pallavicino, and Marke Anthony Victorio the Popes Nephew, whom the Duke of Neuers did much respect; him hee tooke into his Caroch, and entertained him very familiarly. The Cardinals stood at the entry of the City to receiue the Duke, with the Archbishops and other chiefe Prelates: the Pope had sent forth trumpets, and troups of horse, with his Guards and an hundred Suisses (being in all two thousand armed men) to guard him. The Duke of Neuers was accompanied with about three hundred of the French Nobility, all mounted vpon Genets of Spaine, Barbary horses, and coursers of Naples. He entered the City by the gate, which goes to Castle Saint Angelo: after the shooting off of the Ordnance, there was all sorts of musick: the windowes were full of Senators, Gentlemen and Ladies, and the streets pestered with people: hauing rested himselfe two daies, he had audience of the Pope, and deliuered the Kings letters, the which being read, he was brought vnto Saint Peters Palace, where he was lodged with the French Ambassadour at the Popes charges. The feasting being ended, he had a second audience, treating of matters of great importance; then after much honour done him by the Pope he returned.

There was a troupe of desperat theues, which did wonderfully annoy the Prouinces of C Poitou, Aniou, Britaine, and the neighbour Countries with their murders and spoiles, whose infoleny and power was such, as they durst encounter the Prouost Marshall with their armed Archers, who being too weake, these theues (who were called Guilleries of their Leader) had free liberty to continue their theeuing: being accustomed in the ciuill warres to cruelty and theft, hauing no meanes to entertaine their licentious life at home in peace, they returned to their former villanies. They drew into woods and vnouth places, Bankrupts, Forgers, men branded for villanies, Rascalls, Theeues, and the summe of all the world. They say that Guillerie the elder brother (for there were two of them) shewed some greatnesse in his theeuing, for if he did chance to meet any poore passenger, he tooke nothing from him, but gaue the poore man so much as he thought, would suffice his iourney. If a rich man fell into his hands, and had no present money for his redemption, he would take his Bill, and so dismiss him, with this charge, that if he failed to make payment at the day appointed, he would remit no kinde of cruelty to be vsurged of their breach of promise. This elder Guillerie did so despise them that fought after him, as he would often mocke them. He came into an Inne, whereas the Prouost Marshall of Rheims with his Archers was lodged, alighting from his horse, hee sat downe with them, and entertained them with discourses and playing at Dice, till it was very late: rising early in the morning, hauing payed for his and their charges, he willed his host to tell the Prouost and his Archers, that they were imprudent, seeking in vaine for Guillerie, with whom they had supped the last night, who hauing wonne their mony at Dice, had paid for their supper. Hereby you may coniecture E that a bold and vndaunted theefe this Guillerie was: But now heerein what denne this Camus lodged, in a deepe Valley, and in the furthest part of a thicke wood, hauing no ordinary passage vnto it, where he had built him a lodge like vnto a Fort. Hauing taken a Gentleman of good note, he brings him thither blindfold, being come in, he shewes him all his thefts, store of victuals, and a good armory with a wall, rampier and ditch to repell force: Hauing dined well in his denne, he dismisseth him, taking an oath that he should not bewray what hee had seene: he keeping his faith, for that he could not discouer what he had not seene, yet he observed the wood, and all the passages, and by this theefe they went into the Minotaur, who could not bee drawne forth but by a siege, and foure or five field peeces. Seeing himselfe inuironed by the Prouost Marshalls, the Nobility, and the whole Countrey, and prest with F smoke, fire, and sword, going forth with his Horse-men, hee brake thorow the thickest Troupes, but being kept backe by their shot, he forced them vnwillingly to kill him, for that he threatened death to them that prest him. The younger Guillerie and about threecore others were taken, the rest escaped, who finding no safety and became Pyrats: the prisoners were carried to Xaintes, and from thence to Rochell, where they were broken vpon the wheele, and executed according to their merits and deserts.

houses, it is now glorious for the uniformity of the building, losing the antiquity and the name both together : it hath not his name from milles and grinding, but from the flupes of birds which distinguish the houses, or from the builder, as passengers may obserue by these two Verses :

Pons olim submersus aquis, nunc mole resurgo,

Mercator fecit, nomen ex ipse dedit.

I was a bridge late drown'd with flood, now rais'd in richer frame, Marchant was he that made the worke, and gaue the worke his name.

But now hearken to an admirable and bloudy fact, proceeding from blinde loue : Peter Arvices Bourdeus, a Spaniard borne, an Augustine Monke, being for his great learning made publike Professor of Diuinitie at Tholose, before all his competitors : who besides his schollership, exceeded all others in preaching of the Word, honesty of life, and sincerity of manners. In the presidiall Court there was an old Councillor called Franciscus Geraldus, an observer of the Law, free from fraud, and of good fame ; but mans life is not knowne but by the last act. Both being austere in their manners and behaviour, fall in loue with a young maid :
she was borne in Portugal, and came to Tholose with her father and Familie : her name was C Violantilla of Castro, whose bewitching eyes and alluring countenance had set on fire the weak and decayed Councillor, and this Stoicall Monke. Neither doth loue disdain white haire, nor withered cheekes ; and although loues fire doth flame in this old man, yet he ioynees with the Monke, they diuide Violantillas loue and embracings betwixt them, and onely these two Cornials agree together, admitting no other competitor : they had both one care, to enjoy the wench with equall liberty. In the end they thought it fit to hide the stolne and vnchaste fire vnder the ashes of wedlocke. Geraldus hee procures the marriage, with a young Advocate borne in a towne neere to Tholose ; the marriage is concluded and consummated, and these two Solicitors pay the dowie. The feast being ended, the new spouse resolves to carry his wife home to his friends ; these two Sutors repining at it, especially Geraldus, who promised to procure him many Clients in the Court of Parliament of Tholose, or at the least in the presidiall Court. But he (whether finding himself vnfit for the City eloquence, or doubting of his wifes honesty, by reason of their riuals) stood firme in his resolution to carry her to his owne home. But they storming at the departure of the woman, for that the marriage procured for their stolne loue, had not succeeded according to their intents, they study how to draw them backe to Tholose. Geraldus follows the married couple, he feasts there with them a moneth together, and perswades them to returne to the City ; but finding his words to be of no force, he returnes much grieved at the husbands imperious command, relating to Bourdeus, the mans austere disposition, and the poore womans seruitude : they consult how they may recover their old loues, and take away the mans life. To attempt it by poyson they thought it not safe, they therefore resolved to doe it by the sword : and to the end it might bee the more easily effected, they call the husband to Tholose, vnder colour of a suite which was then in question. Geraldus agrees with a Scholler ; or rather a murderer called Candolus, and another named Esbaldus, to kill him, and pates them halfe the price of this wicked bargain. The vnfortunate husband, being ignorant of the plot, came to Tholose, and was invited to a solemne feast by Geraldus ; the guests were Bourdeus, Candolus, and Esbaldus, where their fare was great, and their entertainment in shew answerable : after supper Bourdeus retires himselfe, and the rest went forth to walke, being in the heat of Iuly : in the meane time Geraldus entertained the husband with a long discourse vntill it was late, lest the light should bewray the murderers : at length being darke, hee was let forth, and soone after was taken and led into solitarie and vnknowne places, where he was murdered with seuentene wounds. The perswader of this murder hearing thereof, cries out that his friend and guest had beene set vpon by Threemes, who seeking to take away his purse, and he resisting, had slaine him. Hee sends for the Officers of the City, and the Captaine of the Watch. Esbaldus sweating, and terrified with the foulness of the fact, was taken flying, the dead body was brought vnto the Towne-house, the Monke hearing that one of these murderers was apprehended, hee resolved to flee presently with Candolus

A Candolus the other murderer, going without his Frocke to Tonius a towne held by them of the Religion. Being still tormented with the testimony of his owne conscience, hee demanded of a Minister, whether hee might safely remaine there ? but being doubtful of his life, he presently fled to Millan, and from thence he went to Nismes. This mans flight, and the casting away of his protested habit, made the Court to hold him guilty of the fact, sending forth letters to apprehend the Monke. The President Ferdun giues charge to the Prouost Marshall to make diligent search after them, the Monke was apprehended at Nismes ; where they of the Religion tooke him from the publike Magistrate, pretending that hee was of the Religion, that hee was maliciously accused for that cause, and that hee could not be tried but by the Chamber of the Edict, wherein they presumed so much, as he was deliuered to the Judges of the said Chamber, both Courts concurring for their right.

The President Ferdun hauing by his letters informed the King of this controuersie, there was at length a Decree made by the Kings priue Councell, by the which the capitall question was referred to the Court of Parliament of Tholoua, they of the Religion complaining that the Edict was broken. At the length Bourdeus and Candolus being taken out of prison from the Chamber of the Edict, were brought bound to Tholoua, the Court was diuided vpon Bourdeus triall, some concluding for his present death, others requiring a stay, vntill that Candolus (being put to the racke) should discover the whole matter : But in the end they resolved not to protract his punishment any longer. Bourdeus hearing his sentence read, and seeing the Racke before him, he laid open the whole matter as we haue reported it. He accused the Countellour as the perswader and companion of the murder, having with him paid the murderers for the fact. He commends the Court for the equity of their iudgement, and giues God thanks, who by a momentary punishment had recalled him from a sinke of sinne and heresie, whereunto hee was running, hauing fled to them of the Religion only with hope of impunity : he accused Candolus and Esbaldus, that with their blou-dy hands they had done that premeditated villany. He was carried to execution with teares in his eyes, and a contrite heart, detesting much the fact : passing by the Anglijnes, hee said awhile exhorting his fellow Monkes to a more holy life, and entreating them to pardon him, for that he had so much deiled their Order by this false fact : and being come to the place of execution he made a long Prayer, and so had his head cut off, and his body quartered.
After the Monkes execution, the Countellour denies the fact so oblutately, as if hee would haue all men beleue he had bene free from this wickednesse : he was put to the racke, yet the bitternesse of the paine could not draw a word from him : remaining thus vnfully silent, the first President by a witty fiction, and without any force, wrested the truth from him, he threatened him that his sonne should be tortured : to whom the father answered, that his sonne had not deserved it ; that he was an innocent and altogether ignorant of the fact ; then being vr-ged to declare the matter and to free him from the present danger, the father was more moued with a fatherly affection, then with all their torments, confessing himselfe to be guilty, that he might free his sonne from danger ; who relating all as Bourdeus had done, was condemned to the like punishment. Bourdeus was executed the fifth of February, Geraldus the twelfth, Candolus the thirteenth, Esbaldus the fourteenth, and Violantilla the sixteenth, being the onely cause of the adultery and murder. Shee comming to the place of execution, made this speech vnto the company.

O you that asist at this fatal spectacle, to you my friends I speake : Having obtained con-fiancy from God to suffer death, I doe now intreat the helpe of your prayers at my approaching end : Learne by my vnfortunate mischance, how deceitfull and fraile vanity is ; behold I am (he who euen now abused with the alluring baits of Beauty, despising others, preferred my selfe before all, thinking that for beauty and wit not any one did equall me. But see F the fruits of vanity and pride which I now reape. The enticing baits of the world, bankers, dancing, and such like follies did bewitch me, and haue forced me to act this fatal Scene, an eternall reproach in respect of the world, but to God-ward a testimony of a contrite and penitent heart. I grieve him thanks, whom it may be in some other kinde of death I should haue forgotten. These are the fruits of my youths wantonnesse : hauing not past the age of fix and twenty yeeres, I die a sorne to the world : But I would to God in the beginning of my being, that my cradle and funerall had bene inseparable. O fortunate and happy death ! if my life had bene longer it had bene more wicked ; and more yeeres had increased my sins,

"dying a naturall death I should scarce haue repented: good God pardon a sinner, pardon A her I say, who exceeds all others in the multitude of her offences. Looke not to my crimes, but to a heart wounded with repentance, forgive a wretch, which hath forgiven so many Martyrs; they testify glory with their blood, and I walk away mine owne guilt with mine. I am a Sacrifice only for my selfe, although I am ignorant of the conspired murder; yet sufficiently guilty, for that my vnchaste manners were fatal to so many as haue died before me. This onely grieues me, that my country and kindred are dishonoured by this infamous spectacle: If I had given credit to their admonitions, I had not now bene brought forth to open infamy, but let not innocents be despised for my guilt. I aduise you againe, O you marions and virgins of Tholousa! let not your Sutors (which is the first precept to B preserve your chastities) abuse you with curlings, paintings, gay clothes, libellal speeches, banquets and coaches: these are snares and baits for your chastities: I was weary of my beauty, and my naturall hue did not please me, the which I did abuse with art. But to what end? that I might inflame a Spanish Monke blacke with rust, and an old decrepit Lawyer, who hauing bought my chastity, grew companions of my shame. But why doe I abuse your eares any longer with my filthinesse, but rather being penitent for my offences, let mee intreat your last prayers and vovves for an expiation, deny not this passage to a soule which is going to heauen,
 She was speaking more, when as the axe interrupted her last words, and left them vnperfected.

Death of the
D. of Cleues.

This yeere in March the Duke of Cleues hauing languished long of sicknesse, hoping of some recovery, was intercepted by death, going a hunting, to the great griefe both of his C subiects and neighbours, for that dying without children, he should leaue a doubtfull contention to them that pretended the inheritance, which did seeme to threaten warre and desolation: the sparkles which did shew vpon his death, gaue cause to feare a great fire, as you shall after heare.

Discourse of Terrail's apprehension and execution.

I must now relate vnto you an enterprife vpon Geneua, made by Lewis of Combourfieur, Seigneur of Terrail, and other places, Vicount of Rauell, Knight of the Order, Cornet to the Dauphin, and Baron of Moyllac, being executed there the ninth of Aprill. About three yeeres since there was intelligence giuen, that Terrail being much discontented, that the Spaniards had not assisted him well in his enterprises in the Low-countries, foreseeing that in the end they would ruine him, he gaue it out that he would serue the Gobet (for so he called the D Duke of Sauoy) saying openly that he had a notable enterprife vpon Geneua. Soone after he came to Paris, vpon colour to recouer the Kings fauour, but they were aduertised that hee should come into Sauoy. His designs were then disappointed by the murder which hee committed in the Louvre before the King, who treated of his peace with the Gentleman whom hee slue: so as to flie the Kings indignation, he returned to the Arch-duke, where hee remained, vntill that hee vnderooke a voyage to Loreto with La Basside, an Engineer, whom he had taken to assist him in his executions. They went on foot, and in their returne had conference with the Duke of Sauoy. Notwithstanding that the Earle of Fuentes had disswaded Terrail, telling him that the Duke would ingage him in his enterprises against Geneua, and that it would be his ruine. At which time the Duke imparted vnto Terrail and his man, his B designs vpon Geneua: from which time they continued in Sauoy, hauing made two voyages to that effect to Thurin. They of Geneua grew presently into ielousie, hauing had sundry aduertisements of a great and almost inuitable enterprize against them, managed by Terrail: being in this perplexity, God sent them some more light, the which did serue them as a meane to enter into the ground of the businesse, and to consult Terrail's man, and afterwards himselfe. Hauing plaied at Tennis at Chambery, and being hot, he retired himselfe into a Chamber, where lying vpon a bed, a seruant of the Tennis-court ayiring a shirt, he saw La Basside and some others, present a Paper to Terrail, (which was a plot of the towne of Ge-neua) discoursing secretly as of affaires of importance. This seruant hearing them name some of the Forts of Geneua, gaue more attentive eare, and perceived for certaine that they F deuised of some enterprife against the towne, hearing Terrail (after a long discourse) make no difficulty, but of the meane to draw a sufficient number of men together for this enterprife:
 wherein being satisfied by the Assistants, he said openly: They are taken, they cannot avoid it. This being vnderstood by the young man, he hauing a brother in the Garrison of Geneua, and desirous to saue him from this danger, went and discovered all to a Burgesse of Ge-neua, who was then at Chambery. This Burgesse made a faithfull report vnto the Magistrates of Geneua, and to the young mans brother, from which time they set spies to obserue

A Terrail's actions. In the end they were aduertised that they were past the mountaines, conferred with the Duke of Sauoy; and that he returned by the Lake Lemman, whereof they aduertised them of Berne, sending all the marks of Terrail, and intreating them to seize vpon his person if he past thorow the Country. The which they had exprefly commanded, hauing notice of the D. of Sauoyes practises against Geneua, their Ally, and against their owne Country. It happened at the same time, that a Deacon of Yuerdun, a towne belonging to the Ber-nois, neere to the Frontier of the County of Bourgondy, being at Geneua, came to salute the second Syndic of the Towne, and brought him letters. After some other discourse, hee acquainted him with the aduertisements they had receiued, of the enemies enterprises against B Geneua, and the country of Berne, but especially vpon the towne of Yuerdun, a place very important, being the key of the country ioyning vpon Bourgondie: hee gaue him also the markes of Terrail's person, whose picture they had gotten at Geneua, doubting that he himselfe would come to view the towne. Some daies after Terrail returning from Thurin, he past the lake, but with some ill preface by the falling of his mans horse into the water, which made him in a manner resolute vpon his returne, yet in the end being perswaded by his man he passed on, he came into the Country of Berne, but not into any frequented places: passing thorow their Country, he diligently obserued the places of most importance, neuer lodging in any towne, but in villages, hamlets and peasants houses, vntill hee came to Yuerdun, where he stayed not, but passing the bridge he found the Bailiffe and others, whom hee saluted, C but they obserued him not. Hauing past the bridge, seeming to stay for some other cause, he turned towards Yuerdun, and viewed the situation and defences of the place: the which was well noted by them that were yet vpon the bridge, thinking (imply that hee had staid vpon some other occasion: but hauing past a little further, the foresaid Deacon being in a Garden, saw him come a faire off, and hauing obserued his countenance, he beganne to doubt that it was Terrail, and the better to discover him, knowing that hee was bald, he made him a low courtesie, to moue him to vncouer, the which hee did, and the Deacon being now assured, ran speedily to the Bailiffe, deliuering his opinion. All the Assistants which had noted the countenance of the man to haue turned, and obserued the place, perswaded the Bailiffe to send after him, the which hee did by two men onely, who should obserue what course he tooke; that D if he went not toward Bourgondy, they should returne without any farther purpose, but if he went that way, they should follow him to his lodging, without making shew of any thing, and obserue particularly the markes which he gaue them of his person. There hapned another act of Gods prouidence, Terrail hauing past a village called Villeboeuf, which is within halfe an houres journey of Bourgondy, meaning to lodge that night in the Country, passing thorow a quag-mire, where his horse being mired, he returned and went out a planke; vpon the which his horse stumbling hurt himselfe, which made him halt: this made him resolve to lodge that night at Villeboeuf. Being lodged there, the two which were sent from Yuerdun, obserued him diligently, and one of them returned speedily to carry newes to the Bailiffe, who presently sent foure horsemen led by the Captaine of Yuerdun to bring him E backe, giuing them charge also to require aid of the Peasants: arriuing in the morning, they found Terrail ready to goe to horse, to whom the host and others, being aduertised of the fact, had said that hee could not passe the mountaines, where there were two great guards, which staid all men that had not giuen an account to the Bailiffe of Yuerdun. This was confirmed by them that came in the morning: and although that La Basside stormed at this affront, yet Terrail seemed willing to returne to Yuerdun, with 4. or 6. horse, whom hee might haue defeated, if he had foreseene his calamity. After his detention, he repented him often that hee had not shewed his great courage at that time: but God blinded him, for from that time hee shewed no signes of valour or dexterity, whereby he might often haue escaped, as wee shall see. Being returned to Yuerdun, and examined by the Bailiffe who was witty and of great F experience, he answered, that he was a Gentleman of Dauphiné, called Paul of Confians, and that hee went into Lorraine to follow a sute, which did import him much, intreating the Bailiffe to dispatch him presently. His answers hauing no greater ground, bred more iea-lousie in the Bailiffe, so as hee resolved to seize vpon his person, vntill hee had better adue:
 whereupon he demanded his sword, the which hee deliuered, and caused him to be lodged in an Inne very carefully guarded by foure men. Among other causes to breed suspicion, being at Villeboeuf, seeing that he must returne, and that there was no meane to escape, the passages being guarded, he called for a Candle, with the which he burnt a long letter written on both

both sides. Being demanded thereon, he answered that it was a letter written to Monsieur de A Creyg from his kin's woman, to be a mediator vnto his Maiesty for him; the which hee still maintained, and that he burnt it, left his name and quality should be knowne. The Bailiffe for his better satisfaction sent presently to Geneva, to haue some one that knew Terrail: to whom they sent one of the Magistrates of the towne and a souldier, who had serued vnder Terrail in the Low-countries, and had giuen many aduertisements of his enterprises, whereof he had the knowledge from his owne mouth, by the meanes of some of his seruants. These two being come to Yuerdun, it was held good the souldier should enter suddenly into the lodging, where Terrail was at supper: he enters, and at the first sits downe at the table without making shew of any thing. Terrail seeing him, was much troubled, seeming to be very B ill, and desiring them to warme his bed: thus he retired to his Chamber much dismayed, whether he sent for the said souldier, whom hee entertained very courteously, intreating him to tell if he were not sent to discover him, the which the souldier hauing iustified, he began to vie strange speeches vnto him: That he knew not why they of Geneva did malice him: That he had had diuers aduertisements from Chambery, that they laid wait for him at Geneva:
And that they would employ the said souldier to discover him: That he should die a gallant Knight and an innocent. That the Earle of Fuentes, the King of Spaine, and the Arch-duke would reuenge his death: That he neuer had had to doe with the Duke of Sauoy, who he said was an vnworthy and an ingratefull master, witnesse the end of Albigny: He beganne to suborne the said souldier to helpe him to escape, promising him a thousand crownes, if with all C speed he would write to the Earle of Fuentes, and goe into Bourgondy, to the Earle of Cha-nite, to aduertise him of his extreme danger. And La Bafide would haue deliuered the said souldier an hundred crownes, which he refused. Terrail intreated him to returne early in the morning, for that he had matters of importance to deliuer vnto him. In the meane time the Bailiffe being aduertised of the truth, & finding it not fit the souldier should confer any more with him, caused him with his man to be conueyed to the Cattle, where they were lodged a part, and well guarded. They of Geneva hauing notice of his detention, the Councell resol-ued to send to the Segnieurs of Bearne to demand him, giuing the charge to one of the Sin- dics of the towne, who being first heard in the Councell of five and twenty, he let them vnder-stand the great and iust grounds they had at Geneva, to desire to haue Terrail: that they D had certaine proofes of his practices: that the witnesses which they had at Geneva, could not be without danger transported: that the cause of both Townes allied was common: that the enterprises concerned them inseparably: that in the like case, they of Geneva had deliuered prisoners to Bearne: that the Kings men not long since had granted them a prisoner for the like attempt: that the consequence would be very great to diuert vnder takers, if they lay they could not without danger come about Geneva. In the end the petty Councell of Bearne being perplexed in this businesse, assembled the great Councell of two hundred, where the like matters being propounded with vehemency, it was generally concluded, that Terrail should be deliuered into their hands with his seruant and goods. The Kings Ambassador residing at Soluerre, did greatly allow of this resolution.

The aduice of this grant being come to Geneva, they vsed wonderfull diligence and dexterity to perswade his brother (which dwelt in the Tennis-court at Chambery) to goe thither to fetch him with goodly promises: the which he effected faithfully and speedily, as was wishin three daies he was at Geneva, and did serue much in the discovery. They also sent the Souldier which had knowne Terrail to Monsieur de Lions, where they knew there was a souldier which had sometimes bene his horse-keeper, and had heard his speeches touching the enterprises of Geneva, the which he had oftentimes told to Baleine, (which was the souldier's name of Geneva) but the horse-keeper was absent: but the said Baleine found another souldier at Lions, his Camerado, who assured him that the said horse-keeper had often conferred with him of this businesse, whereof the said Baleine tooke an iest by a Notaries hand: F Terrail was deliuered to the Sindic of Geneva, and conducted with a guard from Yuerdun to Morges, a little towne seated vpon the Lake Leman, 8. leagues from Geneva, where hee was deliuered in guard to the Bailiffe of Morges, vntill they should send for him to Geneua by water. This was done by a Decree of the great Councell of Bearne, with this purpose, that before he went out of their territories, they should send them letters vnder the Seale of Geneua, that it was done without prejudice to their iurisdiction, & of meere grace and clemencie.
Terrail was brought alone from Yuerdun, his seruants remaining behind, lest they should conferre:

A ferre: vpon the way he vsed strange speeches to the Sindic, asking him often, of what death will ye make me to die at Geneva? he seemed to feare much to be deliuered into the Kings hands, for which he had changed his name & fashion: that the King hauing him he will keepe him long in the Bastile, whereas being farre off, he might make his peace with greater aduan-tage, yet vnice seeing him selfe taken, he said he had no will to fall into the hands of them of Ge-neua, but to be deliuered to the King, hoping by this meane to make his peace very easily. He said also, that he had dissuaded the Duke of Sauoy from the enterprise of Geneva: but with such insinuous reasons, as they might easily see they were inuented of purpose. Being at Morges, he so bewitched the Bailiffe with goodly words and promises, as he refused him to them that came the next day to fetch him to Geneva by water, giuing Terrail meane to escape, B God had not deprived him both of courage and iudgement. There were some of M. Des Di- guieres men which past by Morges, entreating the Bailiffe to keepe him vntill hee had a new warrant from Bearne, whether they went to that end: there was a weake guard in Morges, he had the liberty of the Cattle, and meane to speake with whom he pleased, and to write to his friends, hauing sent a very artificiall and passionate petition to the Seigneurs of Bearne. Hee had also won the fauour of the people of Morges, by his good behauiour, iustificacions and bounty, so as if there had come but twenty resolute men to his rescue, he had bin safe, and this had bin ealie to execute, the lake in this place being but 3. little French leagues over, and right against Morges, all being the Dukes, if he had had the assurance to haue gone out of the Cattle, C he had escaped by the meanes of them of Morges it selfe, so much they fauoured him. They of Geneva felt speedily to Bearne to complaine, and to re-demand him, the which was confirmed with much indignation against the Bailiffe of Morges, who before any answer made to the Segnieurs of Geneva, had recieued letters of inuincation, commanding him speedily to de-liuer Terrail vnto them, the which he was forced to doe. For which contempt the Bailiffe was in disgrace, and there were presumptions, that Terrail had promised him ten thousand Crownes to keepe him from going to Geneva, or at the least that his man might not come: the which the Bailiffe had promised faithfully, hoping to effect it by the meanes of his great credit and alliance, but it fell out otherwise. The Earle of Fuentes, the Catholike Cantons, and Terrail's kin's men laboured much at Bearne to free him, but some came too late.

D He that was sent from the Earle of Fuentes, was entertained till the afternoon without audience, vntill that Terrail was deliuered into the hands of them of Geneva. The Segnieurs of Bearne did carry themselves very affectionate and zealous in this action. Terrail was conducted in an armed Frigate: vpon the way one of the chiefe of the Towne which did accom-panie him, entertained him with very honourable and kinde words: That if he would declare that which concerned the safety of the Towne, he promised him in the name of the Seigneurie, pardon, liberty, courteous vsage, and intercession to the King: but he denied all, yet he was much perplexed, saying that he was no man of iron, and if they put him to the Racke he should speake any thing. Being come to Geneva the fourteenth of Aprill about midnight, he was lodged in the Towne-houfe well guarded. The next day being sent for to E the Councell, they did in like manner let him know how desirous they were to free him, requiring him to speake freely, and to helpe himselfe, for that they had sufficient in their hands to conuict him, promising him liberty and all good vsage, if he would voluntarily declare the businesse. This was repeated aboue ten times vnto him: but still he persisted in the nega-tiue, with great execrations and oaths, so as in the end they told him, that seeing he would not saue himselfe, there was no more grace for him. Whereupon they caused him to answer criminally, vsing some rough speeches vnto him, which amazed him much: being confronted by Baleine the Souldier, he denied all, yea that which was most apparent, so as they began by his doubtful answers to discover the whole truth. On Monday morning being the 17 of Aprill, he was led from the Towne-houfe to the prison: about the same time the said F Sindic with a Secretarie of the State, brought his man from Yuerdun to the prison, and presently brought him to his answer, causing the young man of Chambery to see him, from whom they had had their best intelligence, who hauing viewed him, affirmed confidently that this was the man which had presented the paper to Terrail, and had vsed the aboue-mentioned speeches vnto him. This young man being examined apart, what apparell La Bafide did wear then, he told what hee had seene, the which La Bafide did confesse, but he denied the paper and the speeches, and so did Terrail. In the end, seeing that the young man did constantly maintaine his saying, it was resolved that La Bafide should be put to the Racke; who F f f f f hauing

haueing endured the strappado twice, being ready to be put to it the third time, he said he would A confesse all. This resolution to put him to the Racke, was also grounded vpon another occasion; for that a Burgeesse of Geneua hauiing by chance seene La Basfide the same day in the Court of the prison, did witness that he slept one night with him in a neere Village, and that in the morning the host had told him, that La Basfide had handled many maps and plots of Fortification, before he parted, so he was knowne by the host to be an Enginier, to whom he confessed it, and yet in prison he denied all. After La Basfides confession, he was confronted with Terrail, who began to disauow him, but La Basfide persisted in his confession, whereupon Terrail being presented the Racke, with teares in his eyes he confessed the whole act voluntarily, and had no torture: The French King, and the Estates of the vaited Prouinces, B were presently aduerted of that which did concerne them. La Basfide confessed that he was an Enginier, hauiing long serued the Arch-Dukes, that since he had giuen himselfe to Terrail, to execute the enterprife of Geneua, and that he had sometimes bene a scholler. He was gallant of his person, and cunning in matter of fortification. That about foure or fise moneths past, returning from pilgrimage with his Master, passing by Thurin, the Duke discouried with them, both of Geneua, & of the great desire he had to be master thereof, demanding their aduice: he refused to assaile it, not by sieg or open force, but by enterprife, wherein they offered him their seruice, the which he accepted, with many thanks and promises, giuing to Terrail 700. Duckets, and a Jewell of 300. crownes price, and to La Basfide 280. Philips Dollars. To effect this designe, the Duke gaue them charge to view the gates, Guard, Port, and C state of the Towne, whereupon La Basfide undertooke to goe into the towne, where hauiing viewed all, he brought vnto the Duke a plot of all that which had bin reformed in the fortification, since the Scalade, according to the which, the Duke did renew his ancient plot. That Terrail and La Basfide going to Thurin, they could not agree vpon the meanes of the enterprife, Terrail inclining to surprise a gate with a pettard or otherwise, and La Basfide shewing that it was a matter of infinite danger, by reason of the great number of defences which were at the gates, and their careful guard. After some dispute, the Duke inclined to La Basfides opinion, to attempt the Port, where there was not so strit a guard, and the which being sur-prized by a sufficient number of men, they should be in the heart of the town, and could not be in danger before they were entred: the which being executed, La Basfide made no difficulty, to accomplish the enterprife, being very easie (as he said) to seize vpon the Port De Riue, which was neere. Terrail hauiing heard all, yielded to his opinion, and went with La Basfide to passe the Lake about Euan, where he remained eight daies, informing himselfe particularly, from all the Water-men which went to Geneua, touching the disposition, guides, and deuicenes of the Port, visiting of boats and other things belonging to the nauigation of the Lake, by whom he discovered many errors in the Guard: and to be the better assured, he caused La Basfide to goe ouer the Lake to Morges, to the end that he might passe in one of the Barkes of Geneua, which on certaine daies goe thither to market, and obserue the state of the port, and enter into Geneua without iaculosity; the which he performed so cunningly as no man suspected him. The like spie had bin taken some two yeeres before, hauiing grossly visi- E ted the chaires, who being amazed, and wauering in his answer, confest by force that he had bin sent to view the place, not knowing any more of the enterprife, nor who had sent him, for the which he was hanged. Some thinke he was of Terrails faction. From that time they had fortified the fort with another ranke of double chaires, but that did not serue to warrant them against this last enterprife. Terrail and La Basfide (who returned vnto him by land) hauiing againe visited the Port of Riue, by the which he past, he returned to the Duke, assuring him of the certainty and facility of the enterprife, taking vpon them to be the Leaders and conductors of the execution. The enterprife was plotted after this manner: Terrail and the D. had made their desseigne to provide 4. or 5. great flat-bottomed boats, such as doe usually carry wood vnto the town, especially in May, when as they make their prouision, and to lodge F vnder the wood 150. or 200. choise men in euery boat, the which should approach without suspition, for that their counterfeite water-men should be attired like vnto them of Geneua. As for the farch which was heretofore made within the town, they did not regard it, hauiing resolved to kill the farchers suddenly, & to leape all together out of their boats: they should at an instant gather their troups together, farre from the commerce of them of Geneua, and at a prefixed time ship them, when as they should see a fauourable Northern wind arise. Terrail should be in the first boat, and the D. or his eldest son in the last. The first exploit being done,

the D. or his son should also haue other troups, especially horsemen ready, the which might well be drawne together, vnder colour of the D. of Nemours marriage, which should be celebrated at Anilly in Sauoy, 8. leagues from Geneua: and although the stay of the said marriage did cause some difficulty, yet they had so many other encounters, as they held the enterprife infallible: the facility was, in that they might imbarke them secretly, a fauourable wind carrying them in a quarter of the time that is required by land: they thought that 500. men or more being entred, would be able to slay all the people, & seize vpon the Caouan at the Port, and also at the Port de Riue, by the which the Duke or his son should enter with their landtroups. The enterprife was appointed at such a time, when as the town seemed to be moit vnarmed, by reason of their country labours, & at dinner time when it seemed euery man retires himselfe. They haue confest also (since their condemnation) that their voyage thorow the Country of Bearne, was to obserue it, for the pursuing of their victory, after the taking of Geneua: for although the D. entred alone into this enterprife, and that the Earle of Fuentes had not discovered himselfe to be of the party: yet Terrail said, that the D. had assured him, that the Spaniards which were in Sauoy, had commandement to follow and obey him, as he pretended in this enterprife. Terrail went into the Low-countries to take his leaue of the Archduke, to retire such meanes as he had yet remaining there, & to bring some of the best executioners that he could finde, with some Mariners. He and La Basfide agreed both in their confessions, being examined apart, whereby they had drawne from them the grounds of the en-terprife, against the which they themselves did afterwards giue them direction to defend themselues, especially Terrail made a draught in paper of the meanes how to preserue any Port from the Pettard: he said, that the D. was so bent vpon this execution, that notwithstanding his imprisonment, if they kept the confessions close, & gaue it out that he had not discovered any thing, but continued in prison till, vntill that time, the Duke would continue his enterprife, and might be easily taken both he and his son: but this was a forged meanes to delay his punishment, and to giue time to the intercessions which he knew would be made for him, by his kinsmen of Dauphiné, the expedient also was too dangerous. Being demanded if they knew not that it was a capital crime, to make like desseignes in a time of full peace, sworne and well obserued, the which they both confessed freely: Terrail desired that he might be kept alive betwixt 4. walls, and La Basfide intreated, that they would not make him lose his soule by some cruel punishment: being both condemned, La Basfide disposed himselfe to die with a constant resolution: being vpon the ladder, he said vnto the Spectators; My masters I pray you pardon me, I am more ioyfull to die here ignominiously, then if the enterprife which I had in hand had succeeded: pray vnto God for me that he will pardon me, for the loue of his sonne, who shed his blood vpon the crosse for me and for all true repentants. Terrail was condemned to lose his head vpon the place of Molard, where he was executed the 19. of Aprill, and La Basfide was hanged at the same place the 21. They both died very resolutely, especially La Basfide, who neuer changed his countenance, neither shewed any gesture vnworthy of his fore-passed life: La Basfide was much grieved that torture had made him accuse Terrail, of whose death he vnderstood, desiring rather to haue bene drawne in peeces with foure horses. Ter-rail was interred on the Bulwarke of Loy, whereas the heads of those which were executed at the Scalado were buried. If Terrail had made vse of the grace which was offered him in the beginning he had bin saued: but he did not thinke they should be able to conuict him, relying vpon the promises of the Bailiffe of Morges, that his man should not be deliuered to them of Geneua, as indeed he was staid at the instance of the said Bailiffe vntill a second voiage. It was held for certaine that the government of Sauoy had bin promised by the Duke vnto Terrail, if the enterprife had succeeded happily. On the eleuenth of Aprill there was a conference betwixt Monsieur du Moulin, one of the Ministers of the reformed Church of Paris, and Father Gontier a Iesuite, being seconded by the Baronnesse of Salignac: after which it was br-F
 ted abroad, that Gontier had confuted du Moulin in diuers points which they of the Religion did hold, Gontier himselfe writing a glorious letter vnto the King to that effect. du Moulin finding his reputation touched, and the truth mis-reported, was forced to publish a true discourse of the whole conference. The particular Arguments I must omit, being a more proper subiect for them that treat of controuersies of Religion then for History.

On the nineteenth day of Aprill being Easter day, the vines hauiing thrust forth their buds vnseasonably by the forwardnesse of the spring in March, were withered with the mornings frost, and the Sunne rising, burned them vp quite, so as that moneth which doth open, and

The King, persuaded to alter

gave them great hope, did presently extinguish it, and they were deceived of their vintage, A especially about Paris, the which was the more grievous, for that three yeeres before they had had small store of wine, so as the poore labourers were terrified from the charge: whereupon they drew so great store of Brewers of Beere out of the Low countries to Paris, as the signes of Alehouses were more ordinary then of Tauerns.

France is not unlike vnto a fat fertile soyle, the which with corne puts forth Cockell, Darnell, and such like, so as that kinde of Vultures are more greedy then any Farmers of Impoll, who make trafficke of diuine and humane things, and know nothing but to suck the marrow from the poore people, employing all their policies, cares, and counsels, to scrape what is remainings, and to shake the whole state of the Kingdom by their dangerous intentions, like B vnto Horleeches, which neuer leaue the skin vntill they burst with bloud: They were the authors of new Edicts, the which when they had bought for little, they opprest the subiects, ruined and spoiled them vtterly. Some of these bloud-suckers perswaded the King to abate his coine both in goodnesse and weight, by which wickednesse all mens fortunes would be shaken, and both ours and foraine trade vtterly ouerthrowne. This publike infection had so posselt the King, as he was fully resolu'd to alter his coine, and an Edict being vpon the Presse, should presently be published, yea against the will of the Court of Parliament.

They in whose perpetuall guard the Kingdome is, made it knowne vnto the Kings Council how dangerous it would be to alter the old coine, and what clamours and innovations it would breed. That they had read of examples in former times of great ruine which had growne thereby, the which should make them more warie to runne into the like: Next vnto ciuill warres and a generall desolation, the abatement of coine is the greatest mischief: By this line, traffick is maintained, the which being dissolued, France would languish, like vnto the Arteries which want nourishment. In the end the courage of Achilles preuailed, or rather the eloquence of Harley, that Nestor of our France, with whom the whole Councell assented.

There was a kinde of people, who hauing gotten great credit by their great trade, taking vp great summes of money at interest (they finde many desirous rather to lue vpon the vie D of their money, then to purchase lands;) In the end finding themselves opprest with vsurie, and vnable to make payment of their debts, they are forced to breake, and to runne away. They are the wickedest amongst men, who hauing purchased places of authoritie for their sonnes, and married their daughters with great dowries, hauing conueyed great store of gold, wares, plate and stuffe into foraine parts, they change their soile; the which hath hapned often within few yeeres. But the boldnesse and impunitie of these publike theenes, which in others haue bene neglected, was punished in one. It was a Merchant called Pingre, very well knowne for his great trade, whom the fame of his former life, and his abundance of Merchandize, had purchast great credit vpon the Exchange. He hauing defrauded his Creditors, and conueyed away his goods and his state to his friends and neighbours, and being E fled into the Low countries, was found by his Creditors at Valentia, and was brought backe to Paris, where he was called in question before the Masters of Requests: his Proccesse being made, he was condemned to come into the Court in his shirt, and a torch in his hand, and to aske forgiveness, then to be carried thorow Saint Denins street where his house had bene, hauing hanging at his backe these words written in great letters, A TREACHEROVS DEFRAYDER OF OTHER MENS MONEY. Whereupon there was an aduertisement made touching this crime, in these termes.

As good Lawes spring commonly from bad manners, so we from two great mischiefs which began to grow in this Realme, see two very wholesome Edicts made in one month, to suppress so many Duels, which tend to the ruine of the flourishing estate of the Nobility; F and to prevent Bankrupting, which we see so ordinarie, or at the least to punish such as shall be conuicted thereof, with their complices and adherents.

Leauing Duels for a more ample discourse, we will only speake a word vpon the subiect of the Decree against Wil. Pingre, condemned for Bankrupting, and fallhood, both foule crimes, the which draw others after them, as theft, coufenge, the robbing of the publike treasure, and counterfeiting, all capitall. There hath bene some doubt vpon the interpretation of these words, to punish them extraordinarily, and capitally, by the Tenor of the Ordinances of

A of Orleance and Bloys; if the new Edict which it hath pleased his Royall Maiestie to send vnto his Court of Parliament this month of May, in the yeere of our Lord 1609, had not taken away all cause of further doubt, appointing death for such offenders, to the great content of all good men.

But for that no Law is good or commodious to euery man, and that Iupiter himselfe (as the old prouerbe faith) whether he send raine or faire weather, cannot content all the world; I will yeeld some apparant reasons to them, which hold there is too great seueritie and cruelty in this Iudgement, and more in the Kings Maiesties Edict. They say there must be some pitie and commiseration had of those, who hauing lost their goods not by prodigalitie or B fraud, but by some great force, or by mischance, or by the breaking of some one of their Creditors; and that our custome and the Ordinances haue often allowed them, respits, delais, and surceallings by letters or Iudgements, which the Soueraine Courts haue confirmed. But admit it were so, and that there are some which are not vnworthy of the miserable remedie of cession of their goods, carrying the marke which is a Greene boner and hat, I say, a Greene hat, to prevent the fraud of such as hauing made cession doe still weare a blacke hat, and a little Greene night-cap vnder it, so as it can hardly be seene: Yet can we not too rigorously punish, not onely with a ciuill death, which is the losse of their goods and honour, but also with naturall death, those that are duely conuicted to haue by fraud or dissembling taken and carried away great summes of money out of diuers good purses, and then C into foraine countries, where they enioy their spoiles, an infinite number of good families being ruined, and brought to beggery.

These are (saith Tacitus) the fruits of vsury, whose biting is like vnto the wounds of cerata Serpents, whereof he that is stung seemes to feele no paine in the beginning, but in the end it brings them to a death full of anguish and paine. There is not any Bankrupt, but hath bene an Vsurer, actiue and passiue in diuers sorts: And if Cato compared an Vsurer to a murderer, we may well say that a coufenger is a very theefe, seeing he doth with a fraudulent intent get, and maliciously carry away the goods of so many poore men, and that by subtle and malicious practises, whereof the fraud depends, the which shall be called coufenge, if there be no other more significant.

D Robbing of the publike Treasure, is not often found, as it was in the dealing of this Pingre, yet most doe deale in it that manage the publike Treasure, whence growes the shame of either side, as well his that takes, as his that giues.

There remains the most grievous crime of all, which is fallhood, whereof no man breaking fraudulently, can excuse himselfe: for in stead of making good and loyall bookes of accounts, they make them false: If they say that all such faults, that are not punishable with death, as in a Notarie, Register, or some other publike person, and that by some Iudgements they haue bene content to cause them to burne the day: I answer, that by the Roman Lawes, such Registers of Bankers which are called Argentarij, Argyropatrae, Menfularij, and Cernatistae, of whom Seneca speaks in the preface to his Declamations, is a sufficient testimony E in Iudgement, and it hath bene iudged by infinite Decrees, that their Iournall is a good prooffe. He then that falsifies that rule, or makes it double, merites no lesse punishment then forgers, by a capitall punishment, not onely by the losse of reputation and credit, but by losse of life, as the Edict will haue it, and is practised in some soueraine Courts, namely at Rouen. But the equitie and necessitie of this Senatus consulto, fortified by Edict, will appeare and defend it selfe, and the profit and commoditie will appeare hereafter more and more. To stop the passage to all those that prepare themselves for the like frauds, and to coole their heat, who to affect a greater gaine vpon the place, contemne all honest meanes to employ their money, either in purchasing of Land, which is the most safe, or else in buying of rents by constitution, which is lawfull both by the Lawes of God and man, which is the F onely honest meanes to make profit of money with a good conscience. The King therefore to prevent these fallhoods, published an Edict in May as followeth.

HENRY by the grace of God King &c. To all present and to come greeting. Desiring to provide for the disorder and most frequent crimes, which the corruption of manners proceeding from the liberty of the forepassed troubles, hath brought in, and to restore Iustice to her authoritie, and former beauty, to the end that vnder her our subiects may be preferred and maintained in their duties: We haue considered that one of the things which we are speedily to redresse, is the abuse and apparent deceit which is committed vnder the name and pretext of playing Bankrupt, to the prejudice of poore Widowes, Orphelins, and other A of our good and loving subiects, by the means of which crime, which is growne frequent and in a manner common, for want of being punished as it deserves, the publike faith and trust amongst our subiects is greatly diminished, and the trafficke and commerce almost wholly decayed.

And for that the ancient Kings our predecessors haue ordained small punishments against Bankrupts, for that during their reignes, infidelitie and corruption of manners had not fully crept into the hearts of their subiects: King Francis the first, our most honoured Lord and great Vncle, vpon the aduice which was giuen him in the Citie of Lyons, ordained in the yeere of our Lord 1536. that they should proceed extraordinarily against Bankrupts, which B did breake fraudulently, their factors and dealers, by informations, confrontations of witness, and all other extraordinary means, and the fraud being discovered, the culpable to be punished corporally, by condemnations, asking forgiveness, to the profit of the parties interested, standing on the pillory, or otherwise, as it shall be determined by the Iudges, and to be kept close prisoners vntill they had made full satisfaction. And K. Charles the 9. also, our most honoured Lord and Brother, vpon the complaints which were made vnto him in the Assembly of the Estates held at Orleans, that the said crime of Bankrupting grew too common: He ordained that such as should fraudulently breake, should be punished extraordinarily & capitally, which Ordinances the last King deceased, had confirmed by an Edict made at Blois, in the yeere of our Lord 1579. and declared his intention to be, That they which C should fraudulently breake, or make cession of their goods, should be punished exemplarily. The which hath made the said crime so familiar, as many of our loving and loyall subiects, haue suffered, and doe suffer daily great losses. Desiring therefore to make these complaints which haue beene made vnto vs to cease, after mature deliberation, we haue held it very fit and necessarie to renewe and augment the said punishments against Bankrupts and cessionaries, which haue broken in fraud.

For these causes and many other considerations vs mouing, with the aduice of our Council, and of our certaine knowledge, full power and royall authoritie, by this our present Edict perpetual and irrevocable haue said, decreed and ordained, and doe say, decree and ordaine, will, and our pleasure is, that according to the Ordinance and Lawes of our said D Lord and Brother, vpon the complaint of the Estates held at Orleans, they shall proceed extraordinarily against Bankrupts and Debtors, breaking & making cession of their goods to defraud or beguile their Creditors, their Factors and Dealers, of what estate, qualitie and condition soeuer they be, and the fraud being proved, they shall be exemplarily punished with death, as theues and publike assaunters.

And notwithstanding for that most commonly the said Bankrupts breake with intent to enrich their children and heires, and the better to couer their malicious designs, make Transports and Cessions of their goods to their said children, heires, or other of their friends to keep them for them: We haue by the same means declared, & doe declare such Transports, Cessions, and Sales and Donations of goods, moueable or immouable, made to defraud or E beguile the Creditors, directly or indirectly, to be void and of no force at all; forbidding all our Iudges to haue any regard thereof: But contrariwise if it shall appeare the fore said Transports, Cessions, Donations and Sales shall be made to defraud the said Creditors; we will that the Cessionaries, Donataries and Purchasers, shall be punished as complices of the said frauds and breaking.

We will also and it is our pleasure, that they which, contrary to the truth, shall iustifie themselves to be Creditors to the said Bankrupts, as it often happens by Monopolies and Intelligences, to the end they may draw the true Creditors to composition, shall be also exemplarily punished, as complices of the said frauds and bankrupts: forbidding all men expressely F to retire the said Bankrupts, their cautions, factors or dealers, goods, moueables and papers, nor to giue them any comfort or assistance in any sort whatsoever, vpon paine of being punished as Complices, as is said. We doe also inioyne all those that are true Creditors (vpon paine of losing their debts and actions) not to make any accords or contract, or to giue any time vnto the said Bankrupts, or their mediators, but to pursue them by the course of Iustice, according to our intention. Allowing any one of our subiects, yea without Decree or Warrant, to slay any Bankrupt flying away, and to present him vnto Iustice, notwithstanding all Iudgements, Decrees, and Customes to the contrary. We command our loving and faith- full

A full Councillors holding our Court of Parliament at Paris, Bayliffes, Seneshals, and all other our Iudges to whom it shall belong, to cause these presents to bee read, published, inrolled and oblerued, according to their forme and tenor.

And to our Proctor Generall and his substitutes, to haue a care thereof, and to certifie vs of the contraventions which shall be made to our present Edict, as they will answer to the contrary, for such is our pleasure. And to the end it may be firme and stable for euer, we haue caused our Seale to be set to these presents.

Giuen at Paris in May. 1609.

Signed Henry.

THe King at the same time being much troubled with the daily combats of his subiects, one calling another to field vpon euery light occasion, whereby many Gentlemen of noble families did vntimely lose their liues, by the aduice of the Princes of the bloud, the Constable, the Marshalls of France, and other Officers of the Crowne, hee made an Edict to suppress it, as followeth;

HENRY by the grace of God, &c. To all our subiects greeting. The Kings our Predecessors and we haue made diuers Edicts and Ordinances, for the reitraming of the too frequent vse of Duels and single Combats, in this our Realme, moued as most Christian Kings with our duty and the discharge of our consciences towards God: and as loving and good fathers tending the safety and preferuation of our subiects: hauing likewise a care to maintaine our soveraigne Authority, which is much interested by the disordered and vnbridled liberty of the said combats. To this end we haue by our Edict dated in the moneth of Aprill, in the yeeres of our Lord 1602. with the aduice of the Princes of our bloud, Officers of our Crowne, and others of our Council, which did then assist vs, declared all such as vnder colour of drawing satisfaction from any one, for a pretended iniury, shall challenge, or cause to be challenged, guilty of high treason; and withall we did ordaine they should bee punished accordingly, as also they that should answer to any such priuate challenge, or assist and second them; expressely forbidding all our Officers, of what quality soeuer, to dispenze with any that are guilty of the punishments prescribed by the Lawes of our Realme; for treason, or to moderate the same vpon any consideration. Hoping that the terrour of the said punishment would be a means to suppress that detestable custome of combats.

E But we are so farre from attaining to our iust desire, as to our great griefe, and the contempt of Almighty Gods Commandements and ours, these Duells haue since beene farre more frequent then before, which we haue chiefly obserued, for to proceed from a false, erroneous and long conceiued opinion, too deeply rooted in all the hearts of our Nobility (who haue alwaies more valued their honours and dignities then their liues) That they ought not to seek for satisfaction for receiued iniuries, but by armes, without disparaging and disgracing their reputations, and incurring some blemish of cowardise, especially in those cases which they thinke cannot be sufficiently repaired but by armes.

Notwithstanding that, we, to free them from this doubt and colour, haue by our said Edict shewed that we haue beene willing to charge our selues with whatsoever might bee objected in this regard, against those that should subiect themselves to the obseruation thereof.

Moreouer many, as malicious, as rash, not considering how severely we doe censure such actions, doe oftentimes willingly ingage themselves, to the hazard both of soule and body, thinking thereby to increase their reputations, and to get the aduantage of others. Howbeit in effect it is contrary to true honour, no way becoming a true Christian, and altogether displeasing vnto vs. So as they are to hope for so little fauour from vs, as we hate those that practise these Duels, as a more then brutish madnesse.

Being

Being therefore very desirous now to satisfie them that build such opinions vpon so dangerous and deceitfull foundations; and by the same meanes provide (as much as in vs lieth) for the inconveniences and discomforts which fall out daily by this vnrestrained liberty; Experience teaching, that it is sometimes necessary and commodious for the publike good of the whole common-weale, to alter and change Lawes and Decrees, and to accommodate them to such accidents as shall happen in succeeding times, to make them the more profitable and beneficiall: wee likewise haue thought it good and requisite, with the aduice of the Princes of our blood, Officers of our Crowne, and other great personages neere vnto vs, who by expresse commandement haue often met about this subiect, to adde to those precedent Edicts and Ordinances, made by our former Predecessors and our selfe against the said combats (without reuoking or disannulling them in any sort) this Edict, which wee will and command to be inuiolably obserued and kept by all persons of what estate and condition soeuer they be. Expressly forbidding all persons: As also the Queene our deare and welbeloued Spouse, with all the Princes of our blood, and our chiefe Officers and Seruantes, not to make any petitions, supplication or suit vnto vs to the contrary, vpon paine of our displeasure. Protesting and swearing by the euerliuing God, neuer to grant any grace nor pardon, that may derogate from this present Edict, nor to dispence with any man for the punishment thereby prescribed, in fauour of any whatsoeuer, nor for any cause, colour, or particular respect, that may be propounded, pretended, or vpon what ground soeuer alleaged.

He enioyned all his Subiects to liue in peace and concord, not to prouoke one another by priuate scandals or open iniuries. That they should respect all men according to their births and dignities, and that they in like manner should forbear to wrong others. That all Controuersies amongst his subiects, whereof the decision did belong to Iustice, should be ended by the ordinary course of Law, vpon paine to lose the thing in question, for him that should attempt the contrary. That no man should demand the combat of the King, Constable or Marshalls of France, by another, of any supposed wrongs done vnto them. That they should address themselves to the Gouvernours of Prouinces, & in their absence to the Kings Lieutenant generall, to deliuer their grievances, and to demand their combat; which if it could not be otherwise ended, they should aduersite his Maiesty, and receive directions from him. That the party offending should appeare before the King, the Constable, and Marshall of France, or before the Gouvernors and Lieutenants generall, when they should be called; who not appearing after due notice giuen, should be suspended for bearing armes for his contempt, and turned over to the Courts of Parliament, to be punished as breakers of the Kings Edict. That if any one should reuile his Iudges to whom hee was referred, and the causes thereof found frivolous, he should be returned with blame to the said Iudges. That whoeuer should demand the combat vpon so light an offence, should be returned with disgrace. That he that did offer wrong to any other to the preiudice of his honour, should be suspended from all honours, offices, dignities and pensions, for the space of six yeeres, and neuer to be restored, vnlesse he should demand pardon of the King, and satisfie the party interested, and withall receive a new declaration of his Maiesties pleasure. That whoeuer had no office, E dignity nor pension, should lose the third part of his yeerely reuenues; & if he had not any or lesse then 20. pound a yeere (starting, he should remaine in prison two yeeres. That whoeuer should carry a challenge for any other, or be the bearer of a dishonourable message, should be for euer degraded of his Gentry, and kept in perpetuall prison, or put to some infamous death, and withall should lose a moiety of his lands and goods. That whoeuer should make his owne challenge, hauing not formerly demanded leaue, should for euer be held incapable to make his party good by armes with any one, nor receive any satisfaction for the wrong which he shall pretend to be done vnto him; and if the party called should giue notice thereof, as was ordained, then the offices or pension which the Challenger enioyed should be giuen vnto him, if he be a man fit to hold the place; but if the party challenged repaire to the place without giuing notice, hee shall vndergoe the same punishment with the party challenging. If any fight and kill one another, he that killeth shall suffer death according to the Law, and vntill he be taken, he shall be deprived of all dignities and pensions whatsoeuer, and lose halfe the reuenues of his lands, to be disposed of by his Maiesty, giuing no satisfaction to the heires of the party slaine in regard of his disobedience. And if both parties were slaine, their bodies should be deprived of buriall; and the thirds of their land to be imploied at the Kings pleasure. And if they had not any their children should be declared ignoble, and sub-

A iect to tax for the space of tenne yeeres; or if they were taxable, to bee held vnworthy for euer to be counted noble, or to hold any royall dignity or office. That all which should assill at such combats, if they did once draw their weapons, should lose life and goods: if they were but lookers on, and yet went to that end, should be degraded from bearing armes, and lose their offices and pensions. If they came accidentally, and did not seek to part them, should be suspended from their Offices and pensions for six yeeres, and not restored vntill they had asked pardon from the King. That whoeuer did fight in single combat, should incur the paines of death, or perpetuall imprisonment with the losse of halfe their goods, and vntill they were apprehended, should be degraded from their Nobilities, and deprived of all their liuing during their liues. In the end he enioyned the Constable, Marshall of France, and all other Officers belonging to the Crowne, to whom the decisions of the point of honour did belong, to haue a carefull regard of the obseruation of his Edict, and not vfe any moderation, nor to suffer it to be infringed by any fauour or conuience, notwithstanding any command that should come from him, as they desired to please and obey him.

There was a Turke of Constantinople, a man of good yeeres, who had bene taken prisoner by the Knights of Malta: he spake the Sirake tongue very well, and did write it perfectly. A Dominican Friar at Malta, learned both in Diuinity and Philosophy, and very delicious of the tongues, obtained his liberty, and brought him to Paris, where he instructed him in the principles of Christian Religion, and vpon our Ladies day he was brought to Saint Bennets Church to be Christened. Being examined of his demand at the Church doore, the Dominican being his interpreter, he answered that he desired to be a Christian, whereupon (hauing aduised the superstition of the Alcaron) he was baptized, hauing noble witnesses. Alphonso d'Ornano, Marshall of France, and the Kings Lieutenant in Guenne, was the one, and Mary of Seneton, a Lady of an honourable house, was the other. There was so great a concourse of people, as this spectacle was preiudiciall to many, who being fore bruised and hurt, could hardly retire themselves out of the presse.

Charles of Gonzaga Duke of Neuers, had laid the foundation of walls in the furthest part of his Country, neere vnto the riuier of Meuze, and caused his surveyors to measure our ground for the building of houses: he determined and resolved to make and erect a goodly New Towne, imitating Sedan, Iametz, and many such other petty Princes, who the neerer they are to Germany, hauing freed themselves from the Eagles talents, which did sometimes oppress the world, tooke vpon him a kinde of command, he drew new inhabitants to settle themselves there, with promise of immunities, and would haue it called Charcuille, making a new coine with this Inscription, *Carolus Gonzaga Dux Niner. Joachim of Chetardy a Councillor of the Court of Parliament at Paris, one of the Clergy, died in Iuly; But why should I ioyn him (though a man of a singular good life, and well deserving his purple robe) with great personages? his goodly Act, deseruing eternall memory, makes him worthy.

Joachim of Chetard es death and his priuie.

E He was Prior of Saint Cosme, neere vnto Tours vpon Loire, the which he repaired and restored, being decayed and ruined, as well by the violence of ciuill warres, as the negligence of his Predecessors, and not onely tooke away the long deformity, being in old time a holy and sweet place, seated in the Elisian fields of France, but also finding great Ronsards bones to lie in a base, mute and illiterate coffin, more iust then they that had bene aduanced by his rich spoiles: he would not suffer his ghost to lie any longer neglected, causing a stately Tombe of Marble to be made for Ronsard, and a liuely Image to be cut by the Phidians of Paris, with a short inscription; for it was sufficient to admonish Passengers that there lay Ronsard; neither did he need this care and charge of mortall men, who in his life time saw his owne eternity, whose glory after death cannot exceed that, which he did reape liuing: yet this goodly and bountifull Councillor, by this good Office hath deserued much of all them that honour learning. And as it was sometimes laid of a Roman, who when he had erected another mans decayed statue, that he had fixed his owne, so Chetardy building vpon Ronsards monument in dumbe marble, he hath placed his owne in the monuments of writers. Vpon the Tombe these words were grauen.

Marriage of
Vendosme.

In the beginning of Iuly the King performed an Act of great content to himselfe, which was the marriage of the Duke of Vendosme his base sonne, by the Duchesse of Beaufort, with the sole daughter and heire of the Duke of Mercuer, which marriage had beene formerly concluded vpon at the said Dukes reconciliation vnto the Kings seruice: But the Duchesse her Mother was drawne, and perswasively induced vnto it with great difficulty. She was one of the greatest marriages of France, for besides her fathers inheritance, she was by her mother heire of the house of Martigues in Brittany, a House of great possessions, and issued from the Dukes of Brittany. The King would haue this marriage solemnized at Fontainebleau, with as much pompe as might be, and therefore the Courtiers spared no cost to please the Kings humour: and the more to honour it, he called the Princes of the blood, the Officers of the Crowne, and the chiefe Noblemen to Court: among others came the Prince of Condé, the first Prince of the blood, and the first Peere of France, who some few moneths before had beene married to the Constables daughter, one of the fairest Ladies of France, whom the King did very much affect, and was the chiefe meanes of the making of that marriage. In consideration whereof, they say that the King augmented the Princes pension to ten thousand pounds sterling by yeere, being before but eight, and that he gaue vnto the young Prince a pension of two thousand pounds sterling more. The marriage day at Fontainebleau being come, it was put off vpon some pretended cause, and so was protracted from day to day hiteene daies together vpon many coloured excuses: but those that knew best the humour of the Court, said, that the King did it of purpose, that he might the longer enioy the sight of that faire Princeesse of Condé, whose beauty had made so great a breach in his heart, as hee could no longer dissemble it, nor hide it from the eye of the world. But the Prince was not well pleased with these long delays, protesting that if the marriage were not consummated the next day, he would be gone home to his house, whereupon all excuses were laid apart, and the ceremony performed, after which were great triumphs and sports, especially running at the Ring, where the King himselfe won the prize from all the Gallants of his Court, hauing taken the Ring three times in foure courses. The sports being ended, the Prince of Condé hied him home with his Lady to his house, meaning (if it were possible) to preuent that which he feared, and to keepe his honour vntained. The sequel you shall heare hereafter.

Retire in France of waies against Cleues.

The marriage being ended, the King retired to Paris, where they beganne to consult in Counsell of making warre in the Duchy of Cleues. It was generally thought it would be so, for that the King had called some of his companies of men armes, and giuen them their Rendezvous by a certaine day in diuers frontier townes in Champaigne vpon the way to Luxembourg. There was Artillery provided, leues for forraigne forces set downe, and all preparation for war: but it went so slowly forward, as they might easily iudge of the euent by the beginning. In the end they began to treat of a peace by their messengers with no doubtfull hope,

A hope, the Duke of Neuers (whose mother is issued from the House of Cleues, as appears by the name she beares,) and Henry de la Marke, Earle of Maulevrier, and Titular Duke of Bouillon, being a younger brother of that House, who pretends no small interest to the Earldome of La Marke, sent their Commissioners to an Assembly held at Delpord, where being heard, they were willing to shew their Titles: but the Marquis of Brandenburg, and the Duke of Newburg challenged the whole inheritance: what the success will be you shall heare in the following yeere.

We haue said in the yeere 1606, that by reason of the straitnesse of the Pest-house, which was built in S. Iaqués Suburbs, the plague was wonderfully dispersed in Paris, and very violent, whereupon the Magistrates of the Citie, and such as had the charge of the publique health, resolved to build a more spacious one on the other side of the Citie. The worke did equal their designe: for in Saint Martins Suburbs they made so large and spacious a building of Free-stone and Bricke, couered with Slate, with such chambers, porches, and walks, as it doth equall or exceed many Palaces. Which worke was finished in three yeeres: vpon the front of it this was grauen in Marble.

On the five and twentieth day of Nouember the Queene was brought in bed early in the morning of a daughter: France being sufficiently supported with sonnes, had now need to be strengthened with daughters, by whose marriages it might get alliances with forraigne Princes. If euer children came happily, they doe at this time, when as the ancient enemies of France renew their old practices, whereby they seek to withdraw the chiefe men from the duty and obedience which they owe vnto their Prince and Country, they receiue such as flie away, who thinking and desiring to returne, they dissuade them with assurance of safety, vainly seeking the ruine of France, which hath fallen out to their owne losse. So in the memory of our Grand-fathers, the Bourgondian receiued Charles the seuenth his sonne, flying from his father, who commanding him to returne, he kept him and entertained him seuen yeeres. But Charles sent the Burgondian word, that he did feed the Fox, which would one day deuoure his puelleine: which Prophecie he proued true: for Lewis pursued his receiuer and nurse with all force and policy, vntill that by his vnfortunate death, at the siege of Nancy, he left France, Lorraine, the Suisses, and in a manner all the borderers in peace.

brought in bed
of a daughter.

At this time there fell out an accident which did much trouble the whole Court, but especially the King. The Prince of Condé had during the Queenes lying in, come to Court to doe his duty to the King, who receiued him very graciously, and dealt earnestly with him to bring the Princeesse to Court to see the Queene in child-bed. The King prest him so much, as in the end he promised to goe and fetch her: and so he tooke his leaue, seeming to haue no other intent; but his thoughts were farre otherwise: for being come home to his house which is about 16. leagues from Paris, vpon the confines of Picardy, whither he gaue it out that he would goe a hunting, so as within two daies after he tooke his Caroch with the Princeesse, one Gentleman and a Gentlewoman, and without any other traine or prouision, hee set off with all speed possible thorow Picardy to recover the Arch-Dukes Country. Two daies were past before the King was aduertised of his retreat, who vnderstanding the manner of it, conceived what his intent was, whereat he was very much discontented, holding it a great affront & dishonour to haue the first Prince of the blood abandon his country after that manner, without his leaue or priuie. He sent the Knight of the watch with other in post after him, to bring him backe if they could ouertake him; but they came too late, for he was gotten out of the Kings dominions. At his returne the King vnderstanding where he was, he sent Monsieur de Praslin one of the Captains of his guard to the Arch-dukes, to demand the Prince,

Prince, and to request them to perswade him to returne into France. He had charge also to A tell the Prince how highly he had offended his Maieity, who notwithstanding would pardon what was past, and receive him againe into fauour: the Archdukes dealt with the Prince to that end, who answered, that he was his Maieities most humble subiect and seruant, but there was no safety for him in France, vnlesse the King would grant him a towne for his assurance. With which answer Monsieur de Pralin returned. The King holding it an indignity to haue his subiect (who had offended him) capitulate with him, yet before he would take any seuerer course against him, he refused to make him another summons: whereupon he sent the Marquess of Coeuvre, brother to the Duchesse of Beaufort, in ambassage to the Arch-dukes; who with Monsieur Brulard, Ambassador Leager for the King, and some others, repaired to B the Princes lodging, and there in the presence of the Prince of Orange (the Prince of Condes brother in law) did intimate vnto him the greatnesse of his offence, and his Maieities iust discontent. That hee affected him as a father doth his child. That by the mediation of the Arch-Dukes, he had promised to pardon all his offences, and to restore him to his dignity and fauour. And that condemning the Arch-Dukes counsell, he had incensed his Maieity by refusing his grace; yet they said they had commission to make the like offers vnto him, if he would obey the Kings will. The Prince answered, that vntill he might haue some better assurances from the King, there was no safety for him in France; saying withall, My masters, take not this if it please you for disobedience: The Ambassadors summoned him againe, in the name of the King his soueraigne Lord, to returne speedily into C France, vpon paine of the Kings indignation, and to be held as a Rebelle, and guilty of high treason. The Prince desired to haue an act of this Summons, vnder the hand of a publike Notary: the which was sent him. The Prince returned an answer in the like forme, intimating that he was the Kings most humble seruant and subiect, borne of the royall house of France, and neuer denied to his Maieity, and that he was ready to obey his Commandements, demanding reasonable assurance for himselfe and his family, beseeching his Maieity that he would not take his answer for any disobedience, and withall he protested nullity for any thing that should be afterwards done to his prejudice. This Act of the Prince was sent by a Notary to the Ambassadors lodging, who grew much discontented therewith, & would haue offered him some violence if he had not beene restrained by the respects he bare to the Arch-Dukes. D

The last yeere was spent in Conferences, Messages, Ambassages, and Treaties touching the affaires of Cleues and Iuliers, to see if the question for the inheritance might be quietly compounded, but being of diuers humors and dispositions, the controuersie is not yet ended. Sigismund Marquess and Elector of Brandebourg, before he would goe to armes, published his pretensions after this manner. About some 100. yeeres since, there was a marriage made betwixt Mary daughter to the Duke of Iuliers and Berke, and Countesse of Rauenstoung, and John Duke of Cleues, and Earle of Marke, and then it was concluded, that all those Estates & Seigneuries should be for euer vntied by an indissoluble knot, and neuer diuided. As wands bound together are hardlier broken then when they are dissolved, so they thought their houses and families well conioyned, would with greater difficulty be shaken and broken. Of this E marriage betwixt Mary and John were borne William, *Sybil*a, and Amalia: in the yeere 1526. *Sybil*a married with John Frederick, Duke of Saxony, vpon these conditions: That if either of them died without heires male, that then those vntied Prouinces should descend vnto *Sybil*a the eldest daughter, and John Frederick of Saxony her husband, vpon condition they should giue dowries to two Sisters answerable to their qualities.

But that William was married in the yeere 1545. to Mary of Hungary, after that he returned into fauour with the Emperour Charles the fifth, from whom hee had fallen being in league with the French King. From him he obtained a grant, that if there were no issue male of him and Mary, or they should chance to die, that then those three Dukedomes should descend to the daughters of William being liuing, or if they were dead, to their heires. Charles being dead, F and his brother Ferdinand succeeding in the Empire, he confirmed this coniuunction of those States, and would haue it indissoluble: after him Maximilian and the Emperour Rodolph, now liuing, renewed this first Decree, by a perpetuall Law, that the heires of William, in the direct line of either sex, sonnes or daughters, should enioy the whole inheritance. This William thinking to haue made a firme coniuunction of his Estates by the Emperours letters, in the yeere 1572. married Maria Leonora his eldest daughter to Albert Frederick Marquis of Brandebourg, and Duke of Borruia, with these conditions, that if he and his wife Mary should

A should die without any issue male, then the Duchies of Iuliers, Cleues, and Berke, with the Counties of Marke and Rauenstoung, and all their dependances, should come vnto Maria Leonora, and to Albert Frederick Duke of Borruia her husband, but with this caution, that Albert should out of his owne money pay a portion for downe by William his Father in law, vnto the Sisters dying, that money which he should receive in lieu of her Inheritance, should accrue to her surviving sisters, with this condition, that at the payment of the money by Albert, the future husbands of the said Sisters, should renounce and vterly disclaime all their right vnto the inheritance.

B Of Maria Leonora and William, the eldest was Anne wife to John Sigismund of Brandebourg: who by the disposition and conueyance of Duke William for want of heires male, was called to the vntied Estates. It happened that the second daughter, being married to Philip Lodowicke, Count Palatine of Newbrough, confirmed this decree, referring by expresse words her interest to the Inheritance, if her elder sister should die without children: The like was done by Magdaleine the younger sister, marrying with John the Count Palatine of Rhine: and with this Caution Brandebourgs right was settled and confirmed, drawing his beginning from the elder: Notwithstanding that by the contract of marriage betwixt Maria Leonora and Albert Frederick, not only shee and the heires male that were to be borne, but also the women by right of substitution were called to the succession. The Duke of C Newbrough, defended his right, by other letters and grants, but hee soone agreed with Brandebourg, and they two ioyned their forces together, and vntied their martiall powers against the other Pretendants: whereby it appears, the Christian King could not iustly refuse his succours to the confederate Princes of Germany.

The greatest Pretendants against Brandebourg, were the Elector of Saxonie, and Loepold, who had obtained a right and inueftiture from the Emperour. He contends that the Duchies of Cleues and Iuliers, are feathers taken from the Eagle, boughes from the stocke, and beames from the Sunne. And therefore a Fee belonging to Males cannot fall to women: for if any one will search into the Record of Antiquitie, he shall not only finde, that the Emperours of Germany, but also of Rome, haue giuen Provinces and Lands conquered from D their enemies in warre, in reward to their old soldiers, vpon condition, that as often as the Empire should be prest with war, they should willingly serue it, by reason of their fees. And no man will deny, but the Electors of the Germane Empire, the chiefe Ministers and Officers, are tied to a manly seruice and duty, both in peace and war, at the Emperours pleasure. The Lawes of the Empire haue excluded women from all iurisdiction and publike charges, yea in priuate causes, much more where the Maieity of the Empire is in question. In France (which falls not to the distaffe) after the death of Charles Duke of Bourgondy, who was slaine at Nancy, the Earle of Neuers might iustly haue challenged the Countie of Bourgondie, for that a disposition made in fauour of Philip the Hardy, extended to the women, who notwithstanding by the publike lawes of the Empire are excluded. By which example E the Law made in the Contract of marriage betwixt Maria Leonora and Albert Frederick, is to be held vaine, void, and of no force. Tacitus hath obserued in his booke of the manners of the Germanes, that they did not only fauour males, but did hate the women kinde, and that it was their manner and accustomed order to leaue the whole Inheritance to the eldest sonne as his lawful right, lest being diuided into diuers parts, it should runne to nothing, and to their younger children they gaue their cattle, money, plate, lute, and other furniture belonging to an house.

The Electour of Saxonie pretended the inheritance of Cleues by two titles: first, by a grant from the Emperour Fredericke the third, who gaue Cleues and Iuliers in Fee to Albert of Saxonie, for the great seruice he had done vnto his Maieesty, and Maximilian did grant the F same vnto Ernest, the Earle of Saxonies brother. His other title was grounded vpon the contract made at the marriage of *Sybil*a with John Frederick of Saxonie. These were the words: That if Duke John and Mary Duchesse of Cleues, Iuliers and Berke his wife die without any issue male, or if the males issued shall leave no heires, in that case it was agreed, that all those vntied Seigneuries should descend to his daughter *Sybell*e, and to the children that should come of her and Fredericke of Saxonie.

The Electour of Brandebourg did so impugne the title of Saxonie, as that grant made by Fredericke the third, and Maximilian the first, Emperours, vnto Albert and Ernest of Saxony,

Pretensions of the Elector of Saxony to

was held as abandoned: for after the departure of William Duke of Juliers and Berke, the Saxons neuer obtained that possession of the soile, which the Interpreters of Fees became minum rule: or if they had it, they lost it for want of vie. Such is the nature of Fees, as he that suffers an Inuelture to be made to another, and makes not his claime within the yeare, is excluded from the Fee: much more he that suffers another to enioy the Fee, ten, twentie, thirtie, or fortie yeares, and neuer makes any question to it. Neither did it auail the Saxons to haue made a protestation of their right, wherein no due forme of Law was observed, and hath bene made void by prescription. Whenas a sute began, and relinquished three yeares together, is void: and sicall causes if they be not produced in time, after a long intermission are reiected.

Duke William, and John the sonne of William, receiued the Inuelture of these States, from the Emperor and King of Romans, without any question or opposition made by the Saxons of their pretended right, so as that first protestation made by words onely, is to be held void. For it is receiued by the ciuill Lawes, that those protestations are void, which are not often repeated, and fortified by formes of Law; and therefore the Saxons right (if they had any) is lost by their owne negligence. Neither is the Saxon to be tolerated, who so much brags, that Albert had defrauded the Inuelture of the Emperor, for his warlike exploits, when as he and Ernestus by their continual silence foure score yeares, haue silently renounced it. How often did they (being aliue) rearme William John Duke of Juliers and Cleues, in their priuate letters, writings, and titles? It makes nothing to the question, whether it be a Masculine Fee, and impatient of a womans command: For the clause which is contained in the Emperor Fredrick the thirds grant, if the Duke of Juliers shall happen to die without issue male, is to be referred to the first case, that is, when as John and Marie should die without sons, and that by the opinion of Lawyers, who hold, That every disposition speaking of any Aile, is onely to be understood of the first: and he that is once excluded from the succession of a Fee, is neuer more admitted. For a Right being once extinct riseth no more, as in the yeere 1511. the Estate of Cleues was giuen to Marie, daughter to Duke William, by Maximilian the first, so all true Right of these Estates was giuen by Charles the fifth, and after him by a new grant, vnto the daughters of William and their heires.

But it appears by the Annals, that the Estates of Cleues and Juliers are falsely termed a Masculine fee, where it is manifest that Arnold Duke of Guelders & Juliers, gaue vnto Charles Duke of Bourgondy, Guelders, Juliers, and the Countie of Zutphen, who dying, they came to Marie his onely daughter, wife to the Emperor Maximilian, whence it hapned, that in the yeere 1511, whereas William Duke of Juliers died, not the house of Saxony, but his daughter, and wife to John Duke of Cleues, challenged her fathers inheritance, with whom there was neuer any controuersie. It hath bene obserued in all ages, that the foure Dukedomes of Juliers, Cleues, Guelders, and Berke, the issue male failing, the inheritance hath by right gone vnto the women. Marie after the death of Edward her brother, succeeded in Guelders, and afterwards marrying with William of Juliers, she brought it as her dowrie.

Renold made Joane his Sister heire of Guelders and Juliers by his testament. Engilbert Earle of Berke, hauing lost his sonne, hee left the Earledome to his suruiuing daughter. And the daughter of Theodorick of Cleues, wife to Alolph of Mark, obtained the inheritance of Cleues. In Henault and Holland it is receiued, that such Estates should come vnto the Daughters: neither is that insolent law allowed of in the greatest kingdomes: neither in old time were women tied to their distaunces. Among the Scythians Tomyris, and ouer the Egyptians Semiramis, Arjinoe, and Cleopatra did reigne. And now England, Spaine, Scotland, Ireland, and Naples, are subiect to the Government of women; yea women are called to such Kingdomes, not onely by right of inheritance, but also by testament.

Charles the first in his last Will made 1534. and in a Codicile 1538. ordained, that if Philip his sonne should die, then Marie his daughter, Queene of Bohemia, should succeed in all his Kingdomes. And likewise Philip in his last Will made 1597 provided, that if his son should die without heires, his daughter Isabelle Clara Eugenia should then be heire of all his Estates. It is therefore manifest by these examples, that women are called not onely to Duchies, but to great Kingdomes. And Cor. Neofladus in his booke of Fees, proues, that Cleues is subiect to the rule of a woman. The nature (saies he) of the Fee of Cleues is, That no males remaining, the females are called to the succession in their order.

Whereas the Saxon and others pretend the Emperor to be Iudge of this controuersie, they flatter

A flatter themselves with an error: although it be provided by the Imperiall Lawes, that if there grow any controuersie for a Dukedome, Earledome, or any other great fee, they must goe vnto the Emperor, as to the head of all Fees, that he may determine of the possession, and command them to be quiet which offer violence to the possessors, yet this was not alwaies obserued, but it hath bene often tried in other Tribunals, and euen that hath bene lawfull for the Saxons, when as they were opprest and grievously iniured by the Emperors seueritie, and the preheminece and power of their ill-willers.

Moreover, the grant which Leopold hath obtained, it comes not from the Emperor himselfe, neither is it gotten by iust suffrages, but by the sinister practices of Courtiers, the which was not allowed by the Electors and Imperiall Cities, who haue of late required by their Deputies, that it should be made void. The Saxon knowes it well by many familiar examples, that the Emperor decrees nothing priuately in such controuersies, but hath sent for the Electors, Princes, and Vicars of the Empire: In their Decrees they obserued more strict formes, then in these which are granted in fauour of the Saxon and Leopold. No man but knowes, that the Electors and Princes cannot be called by any Libell or Edict out of Germany, into a forraigne Court: as the Bohemians and they of Prague may not (by the Lawes of the Countrey) be called out of their owne limits.

No man is ignorant, that Leopold hauing left the course of Law and Equitie, hath setled all his Interest in Armes, hath leuiued Souldiers, hath called in the aides of his Confederates: forced Townes and Castles, built new Forts, hath called religious men to accompany him in this warre, who attentive to the Trumpet, as if the question were for their Altars and Religion, and not for a prophane thing, haue promised him money to make a ten yeares warre. If the Saxon be not blinde, he will easily see, that these attempts are not for his good, nor for the dignitie and greatnesse of the House of Saxonie, but that the Spaniards may be the more mightie in Germany, (who haue already swallowed it vp in hope) that they may vndermine it, and quite ruine it, the which his Predecessors of Saxony haue long since made trial of, to their owne losse, when as they like true Germans, and louers of their Countreys libertie, suppressed that violence and imminent destruction which began to disperse it selfe thorow their Countrey.

D Brandebourg who pretended to be before all others in the right of inheritance, when as he had protested his Right by written Tables after the manner of Clients, thorowout all Germany and the Netherlands: yet admonished by the examples of the Ancient, that the controuersies of Princes are not decided in Iudiciall Courts, but that their Right consists in Armes, lest if his Competitors should seeke to oppresse him by force, he should be found vnprepared, He draws his Allies and confederate Princes of Germany vnto him, who were not slow to assist him, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Wittemberg and the Prince of Anhalt, who being sent Ambassador from the rest to craue aide and succours of the French King, he found him very tractable and willing, and the rather in that respect: for if his heires should be debarred or deprived of their Inheritance, it were to be recovered by iust Armes, E and the vniuersall possessors to be expelled by force.

The instance of the Prince of Anhalt, and other Germane Princes, moued him to ioyne with him in this warre: for that when as the King was opprest with ciuill warre, they had sent him great succours. He therefore thought that aide was not to be denied them, who first of all had so well assisted him. And to the end he should not faile his friends being in danger, and might remove all violence and oppression from them, he sent Bossie, a man of great wisdom, of sound iudgement and knowledge, who had bene imploied in many Ambassages, and had performed weightie affaires, and important negotiations, vnto a generall Assembly of the Princes of Germany: who whilst he remained there in the Kings name, to obseue their Councels, and to perswade them to that which concerned the libertie and dignitie of Germany, and whilst that in this assembly they contend with words and speeches, they make preparation for warre in France: money is giuen to Captaines to leuy men, Artillerie, Powder, and Shot is drawne out of the Arsenall: it is put into Boats, and carried vp the Riuer in Champagne, that if happily they should fall to open warre for the question of Cleues, all this preparation might be ready, and the Christian King performe that in deeds, which he had promised in words. In the meane time Bossie deliuered the causes of his Ambassage vnto the Germane Princes, in these termes:

The beginning of my imposed charge (most renowned, & mighty Princes, Electors, of the sacred Bossie speech to the Princes of Germany.

 “ of the Cities of the Empire) shall rise from the manifold health, wherewith Henry the most “ Christian King of France and Nauarre, my foueraigne Lord, greeteth you, Wilhing that in “ this Assembly you enter into such found counsels, as the imminent danger which now threatens “ Germany, may be repelled, and that you may proceed in your affaires well and courage“ ously: moreover, he wiltheth you, to expect such good offices from him, as you may iustly “ hope for, from a most friendly King, your kinsman and associate. But when as by the sin“ gular grace and mercy of God, and the victorious armes of the King my master, the practices “ of the most wicked were preuented, and that France began to enioy her ancient peace and “ tranquillity, his Highnesse out of his most Royall disposition, thought it not sufficient for B
 “ the glory and honour of his name, vnlesse he might also prouide for the generall peace and “ quiet of Christendome. Of which his commendable intent, the ten yeeres Truce in the Ne“ therlands, obtained by his mediation and authority, are sufficient witness, whereby those “ Prouinces are now refreshed, and Italy freed from the feare of a most cruell war by the recon“ ciliation made betwene the Pope and the Venetians. But there was nothing, wherof his “ Highnesse tooke like care, as the safety and liberty of your country of Germany: the which “ when he saw to be many waies infringed, after the example of his worthy progenitors, he hath “ profest himselfe a champion and defender thereof. Thus much he thought himselfe indebted “ vnto you, both in respect of ancient amitie and league of the Kings of France with the Prin“ ces of the Empire, and for your owne great merits, and good offices conferred towards him C “ selfe and his Kingdome, in his greatest extremity: which kindnes that he might sometimes re-“ quite, he thought he should doe a matter worthy and becoming himselfe, if he were carefull “ for your generall safeties. When therefore not many yeeres since he obserued many things to “ be attempted to your ruine, as the depopulation of your countries, and the vsurpation of your “ townes and cities, contrary to the lawes and priuileges of the Empire, and that there were fa“ ctions nourished among the Princes, he could not chuse but by the lawes of friendship to “ admonish you, how necessary true loue and vnitie was among you, the better to repell those “ iniuries; and herein he dealt the more earnestly, for that he did preface to himselfe, that Cleues
 “ and Juliers, and other Prouinces of the house of Cleues would be the subiect of all troubles &
 “ dissensions in Germany, touching the which, he oftentimes treated with you in the Dukes life D “ time. And since his death (because that businesse seemed directly to concerne the peace of “ Germany) how willing and ready he hath bene euer to vndertake the protection of lawfull “ heires, I thinke you doe all know sufficiently. And to the end he might manifest his minde the “ more plainly in that cause, wherein the safety of Germany is in question, he thought good
 “ to publish the same to all the Princes in Europe, that he would neuer faile in so iust a cause
 “ to assist his friends and associat Princes, to whom those Estates by lawes descended, the which “ he did not, thereby rashly to intangle those Princes in war (for who hath knowne the hazards “ of war better then himselfe?) but rather the King his Master out of his great widome was “ highly pleased with that Treaty obtained by the labour and counsell of that most excellent, “ prudent, and most couragious Prince the Lantgraue of Hesse, touching the getting possession E
 “ of those countries, and referring the contention & variance between the Princes pretendants,
 “ to the iudgement and ordering of friends, which busines that it might be the more safely ef“ fected, he sent afore-hand some troupes of horse to the confines of the kingdome, to be assisting
 “ to these Princes, howsoeuer things should happen: for he knew very well, that some neighbour “ Princes had long since plotted, by what means they might adde those countries to their own “ Dominions. But after the possession of those countries gotten, when the Princes seemed some“ what remisse, neither did impart their resolutions to the King, he fearing lest that delay might “ hinder their affaires, in respect of the warlike preparations then made against them, he thought “ good to admonish them by letters and secret messengers, that they should beware that they “ were not surprized whilst they were in consultation of their businesse. But in the meane time, F “ whilst that the messengers went and came from one to another, the noble Prince of Anhalt “ came hither to Paris, being most deferuently welcome to the King my master, as well for his va“ liant & worthy seruice in war with his maiesty vnder your fauours, as also for his great know“ ledge and praise-worthy experience in marshall affaires, wherein he excelleth and is renowned “ amongst the Captaines of our age: who by letters brought from the excellent and mighty “ Princes, the Elector Palatine, and Duke of Wirtemberg, signified to my Lord the King, “ That it was resolved by the confederate Princes, to defend by force of armes the possession of

A of the Princes the heires, if so his Maiesty would supply them with those aides which they “ expected. How royally and friendly he was entertained, and how affable and tractable he “ found the King, you haue heard by report of the Prince himselfe. He treated further about “ sending an Embassador, that might confirme the Confederates in their resolution, and might “ thoroughly certifie them of the Kings intention: to which charge though vnfit for it, I was by “ his Maiestie chofen, and sent to be as it were the interpreter of his good pleasure and liking.
 “ Now therefore, most excellent Princes, it is your parts to looke that the Common-weale be “ not damaged, nor that the Princes your kinsmen be not vnworthily cast out from their an“ cient seats by forceine Princes that are no friends to you, who by possessing these countie
 “ B lay themselves out a way to invade Germany. As for that which concernes the K. my Lord
 “ and master, although he be not ignorant that by taking your part, he doth (as it were) draw “ vpon himselfe much trouble and discommoditie, yet the interest of his friends shall be euer of “ more force with him, he will protect and defend you and your Counsels against all violence “ and wrong, with men, mony, and all kinde of helpes, which he hath already prouided and in “ readinesse, wherein notwithstanding there will nothing be attempted against the Maiestie or “ right of the Emperour: neither hath he any priuate respect herein, but this onely he desireth, “ that Germany being the Bulwarke of the Christian Common-weale, may enioy all happy “ peace and security, and that his friends and well-deferring associate Princes, may still retaine “ their owne rights and priuileges, if so as their Ancestors haue done, and you haue constant-“ C ly performed, ye doe still remaine in league and amity with the King my Master.

The Marshall d'Ornano, famous for his worthy seruice in the wars, brought vp vnder his “ father, a Colonnell of forceine fouldiers, that were then stipendiaries to the French Kings.
 “ Afterwards he grew renowned by many prosperous exploits done vnder Charles the ninth,
 “ and Henry the third: for in the year 1587, he defeated Chastillon leading two thousand Suiſſes
 “ by crosse waies throw the countrey of Auvergne for them of the Religion, where he tooke “ diuers of their colours, and mightily annoied that partie. Henry the third being cruelly mur“ dered, Alphonso was a violent and vnreconciled enemie to the league, from whom he tooke “ Lyons and many other strong towers and forts in those parts, at length being taken prisoner
 “ by the Leaguers, they offered to giue him his libertie, with the chiefe charge of the Army, and “ D other aduancements and preferments, if he would quit the Kings party, yet he rather chose “ his freedom by the payment of fifty thousand Crownes, then by his defection to ioyne with “ them, which thing in a fouldier is like to a white crow: he was an vsuall and frequent seruer “ of God, and more zealous in his praiers, then many that were religious, and had taken holy “ orders, as he that had a daily custome to sing his Psalter.

When as the passage of his vrine was stopped, and that with much torment he eased his “ bladder, he was content to be cut, which falling out vnfortunately, he died of that deadly dis“ ease at Paris, whose death was a great griefe both to the King and all true louers of the Com“ mon-weale: For he not only shewed by his valour how much he loued his countrie, but he “ did also without feare in August last past, dissuade the King constantly and courageously “ E from certaine Edicts too grieuous and bitter to the people, and so much preuailed by that “ his worthy and manly speech, as he made certaine horseleeches and brokers (which make “ sale of our soules) to blush, and tooke the morrell out of their iawes.

He being dead, how few Alphonso's hath the court, which play not the claw-backes, but are “ vpright and iust Counsellors? In his last words he willed his body should be carried to Bour“ deaux: and because all power of a Testament dieth, if the liuing neglect the beherits of the “ dead, his body being embalmed and put in a Caroch couered with blacke, drawne with foure “ horses, was brought to that graue which himselfe had appointed; all the States of Aquitaine “ bewailed him, not only as the Kings Lieutenant, but as their father, and the want found by “ his death, shewed how honest his life was.

F But after that France had lost Alphonso, the most Christian King substituted in his Office
 “ and place Deslignieres, equall vnto him, if not superiour in valour, who being brought forth
 “ by the Duke of Vendosme, and a most choise company of souldiers to the Court of Parlia“ ment, was for his noble exploits publicly praised, in an eloquent Oration, as truly in this “ late ciuill war, he had serued the King very valiantly; A while after he was sent to treat with “ the Sauoyard, about most weighty affaires, which I will publish as soon as they come to “ light: for whatsoeuer is worth the knowing, both in this and the yeeres ensuing, I will adde to “ my Commentaries, if I may reele so much leisure from other lures.

Death of the Marshall Des-nario.

Deslignieres made Marshall of France.

Butenem.

We shewed in the preceding yeere, that the attempt of Terrail and Bastide against Geneva A did not only remaine vnexecuted, but that it was publicly reuenged by the death of them both : This yeere an attempt not vnlike the other, not by strangers and Catholikes, but their owne home-bred and native Citizens, was renewed and reuenged, so they will neuer cease from treacheries and stratagems, both within the walls and without, vntill either by surprize or a siege, it lose all command and power. Canalis, a man not meanly reputed of, both for his knowledge in physicke, and the languages, was drawne into suspicion of treason, detected by obscureignes, and his inconsiderate speech increased the same : for such is the force of truth, that it will breake forth euen in spite of the offender, and being tortured, he confessed all things more plainly : He being a man of good reckoning, and not the last or lowest B amongst the Treasurers and Decurions of the citie, did by spies certifie the Duke of Savoy of all the counsells of the Citizens, hauing promised him all his faithfull endeavour, and if at any time he intended the surprize of the Citie, by some stratagem in the night or by scalded or wilde fire, that then he would priuily fire the powder, that thereby he might auert the Citizens (being euery where scattered and buied in quenching the fire) from keeping out the enemye : Neither was there ability wanting to performe his treachery, inasmuch as to his custodie the powder and munition was committed : He accused also (as priuie to this villany) one Maillet, before that time found guilty and imprisoned for robbing the Treasury, and one Blanchet, whose brother for the same cause was before executed. But I heare that Canalis being so and guilty as well of that first conspiracy, whereof we formerly made mention, and which was not farre from effecting, as also of this new and fresh remembered treason, was condemned, and his body broken, and so laid halfe dead on a wheele vnbound, he was cast from thence to be burned in a fire vnder him. It is strange that so often treacheries against Geneva haue bene vndertaken in so few yeeres, or rather that before a yeere compleat (the treason of Terrail being discovered and punished) another within the same yeere should breake forth.

So neglected is the knowledge of holy things, as they which professe themselves Christians by name, disdaine to expresse the same in deed, being children in faith, so as they are ignorant of the rudiments thereof, and they which are most quicke of sight in prophane matters, are most blinde in matters of faith, which thing when Nicholas Pellegens matter in the chamber of the Kings accounts did obseue to be done, to the great despight of Religion, and hindrance of saluation, being a man of singular godlinesse and learning, he instituted for a yeerely stipend a holy Preacher of the Dominican Order, who out of the publike pulpit euery Sunday in the yeere should euidently shew to the youth, & the people, the rudiments of faith by short questions or oppositions (which we call the Catechisme) a Counsellor excellently well deterring of the Christian commonweale, which hath renewed the godly institution of the primitive Church, for they which were willing to beare the name of Christians, before they were baptized, were instructed by preaching of the holy mysteries. Which custome by degrees through the negligence and ignorance of the parish Priests is discontinued, and of so many hundreds of Ecclesiasticall persons, only the Iesuites in their Colledges haue not suffered this light of faith to be extinguished. Many perchance will account me idle to make mention of such a popular matter, although posterity ought not to know any thing more, then those things which are ordained to teach vs how to lead a godly and blessed life: Neither ought that to be a reproofe vnto me, which the Protestants reckon as a great honour to Sleidan, who spends himselfe wholly in the commendations of his reformed Religion.

About the end of February it was seriously debated by the meanes of Cardinall Perron, Augustus Thuanus, and other wellwillers of learning, concerning the enlargement of the Kings, or Cambray Colledge, and the increasing the number and stipend of the professors, and also for the pulling downe of certaine cottages, which hindered the prospect of the Court and Orchard, and now the Surveyors haue set out the bounds of the place, although in deed the Vniuersity haue bene long waste, and like a wilderness, needs not so much large walkes and Colledges, as Students to frequent and liue in it.

We heare also that Leopoldus and the Saxon haue had some bickering with Brandeburg, as it seemes rather in some accidental light skirmishes, then any set or generall battell. The Marquess of Brandeburg had sent afore-hand somethousand foot without ordinance, to winne, or more likely, to surprize a little towne, whilst he kept himselfe with his footmen not farre off in his Campe to bee ready to releue his men, if need required : but the business succeeded

A succeeded not as he expected, for whilst the Brandeburgers were ouer-long in winning the place (being vnprovided of Ordnance) Leopoldus being aduertised of the townsmens necessity, sending some field peeces before him, set vpon them on a sudden with a great power of horse, at the first vollee of whose Ordnance the Count of Salm Colonell, and at the second vollee his Lieutenant were both slaine : the rest being terrified with their death, and afraid of a greater power of the enemy approaching, tooke them to their heeles. The Marquis hearing of their flight by some runne-awaies (who are quicker in coming home, then going to the field) came in all haste with some troupes of Horse, and restrained Leopoldus in time, who hauing the victory in his owne hands, knew not how to vse it, for if hee had pursued them B more speedily, whilst they were disperfed, and in that perplexitie, he might vtrly haue defeated them, but by these euents the Brandeburgers were well warned to bee more prouident. But oh the inconstancy of humane things ! that no Nation hath peace permanent, and quiet fained with some sure hold, for behold the Germaines and the high Dutches, who since the death of Charles the first, haue so long abtained from domesticke armes, who by their helpe maintained warres abroad, are now enforced to vse them for themselves, and to desire helps from others, shaking off the rust from their swords, and the rest of so many yeeres.

Our Ancestors (saith Tully) would neuer suffer a poore man to lose his cause for want of a Patron, or Advocate to defend it. When many in France through their great pouertie vnablenesse defray or sustaine the charge of their suits, being destitute of helpe or counsell from Advocates, were constrained to forsake their intangled, though wealthy inheritances, or whatsoever else they had, and to yeeld them vp into the hands of the mightie and more powerful partie : it was decreed in the Kings Counsell, that in euery Court Parliament as other Courts, there should be chosen Advocates and Proctors of approved integritie, that should helpe poore men with their best counsell and furtherance without any fee or reward : so straightly was the law Cincia imposed vpon them, that if they were lame and crippled, they should not take so much as a wand of their needy Clients, but that contenting themselves with the Kings allowance, they should look for a greater reward in heauen : for euen amongst the heathen it hath bene accounted glorious to helpe the distressed, and to defend and support those that are oppressed, as it was also accounted most wicked and execrable to abandon or deceiue the Client : for Cato against Leulius did earnestly auouch, that there was nothing more religiously obserued of the ancients then to defend Orphans, and to be faithfull to their Client ; inasmuch as it was lawfull for Advocates to witness for their Client against their own Kinsmen, but by all meanes prohibited for their Kinsmen against their Clients : questionlesse a godly decree, but no longer of force then the like good and excellent lawes, whose setting or fall hath not bene much distant from their first rising.

Religion and custome require of necessity to anoint the Kings of France with that sacred oyle which is kept at Rhemes, as anointing was necessarily imposed vpon the Kings of Israel by the Hebrew Law : but for the Queenes of France to be anointed, it is more of custome E then of precept. Neuertheless, it is now growne to that order, that the Queenes also be installed with those Christian ceremonies : Neither ought we to enuy that this honour is done them, from whom spring young graits, and stens for the Flower-de-Luces, who are companions of the bed and Scepter, who also are Regents of the Kingdome, either in the sicknesse, or after the death of the Kings their husbands, to whom only the law Salique enuient the royall throne, although through them it is neuer empty : with the like step of honor haue the Cæsars dignified their Emperresses. For Princes (saith Papinian) honor their Princelless with the same priuileges which themselves haue, and Vlpian doubts not to mention the Treasury of Cæsar and the Emperresse by one and the same title : hence it is, that in ancient Monuments and Coines, we behold the portraiture of Kings and Queenes, circled with Lawrell and F Corall. After the golden Mines of India were discovered, Ferdinand and Isabella caused both their Images to be grauen in that new gold, as it were the one beholding the other : In like manner Katherine de Medices, caused to be coined a peece of Gold with the Sunne vpon it, so made and called in her owne praise and application : and now of late the Archdukes Albertus and Isabella in the Low countries, haue caused their coine to be stamped with their two faces. The marriage bed makes Queenes companions, so as they may well say, according to that old Prouerbe, where Women challenge to themselves halfe the charge and command of the house, Where thou art Caius, there am I Caius. They report out of the three willes of Saint Augustine,

Angustine, that he wished to see the Cæsars and the victorious Consuls going vp to the Capitol in their triumphant Chariots, but I wish to see a Queene drawne in a golden Chariot.

In such a Chariot as Cybele rides, Therow Ida's towred townes.

But now the Court of Parliament (according to the ancient custome in the happy and ioyfull Inauguration of Kings and Queenes) prepareth to remove out of the ancient house of Thames and the lawes, into the house of the Angustines next adioyning, not to returne thither againe, till the publike triumph be accomplished. Not unworthily sometimes, and very seldom in many yeares, doe the Lords of the Councell lend this house (appointed for ministration of right and iustice) to the Kings and Queenes for some few daies, as the Kings haue confirmed the same to them for euer; for therein they hold the Royaltie of their Court and coronation. This removing hath hapned three times in this age, as I gather out of the Annales, the more ancient of which was, when Charles the fifth, Emperor, hauing safe conduct to passe out of Spaine thorow France, advanced himselfe to repress the insolencies of the Gantois: the next, when Henry the second espoused his daughter Elizabeth to Philip the second, King of Spaine, and his Sister vnto Philbert Emanuel Duke of Sauoy. The third and last, was in the yeere 1562. That I am more tedious in a matter that is yet to come and vnedged, my desire to see it constraineth me, and desire to enioy the pleasure of it, carrieth me beyond my selfe.

The Coronation of the Queene.

The King after he had received the protestations of the King of Spaine by his Ambassador, not to infringe nor alter any thing in the peace, nor to meddle in the action of Cleues: hauing bene also intreated by the Emperor, to be an Arbitrator in that bulinelle, knowing that the Pope sent the Seigneur Risarello Bishop of Nazareth to that end; that the Protestant Princes did wholly incline to his intentions, and that the Archdukes had assured him of passages, victuals, and of their owne forces: Hauing resolved to see his Queene crowned with as much State as might be, all things for the solemnitie being prepared, they came to Saint Denis in France, on Wednesday the twelfth of May 1610. being attended on by the Dauphin, the Ladie Elizabeth his Sister, Queene Marguerite Duchesse of Valois, and by many Princes and Princesses, with a great number of Noblemen and Ladies: the next day being Thursday, the Act and Ceremony of the Coronation was done, as followeth.

There was a great Scaffold built in the midst of the Quier of the Church in the Abbey of Saint Denis, set before the great Altar, about nine foot high, being eight and twenty foot long, and two and twenty foot broad, to the which there was an ascent made of many steps. About the midst of this Scaffold inclining somewhat towards the backe part, there was another Scaffold about a foot high, hauing two steps vp vnto it, which Scaffold & steps containing about ten foot in length, and six in breadth, were covered with Carpets, on the which was set the throne or chaire of State, appointed for the Queene: which chaire was covered with azur'd veluet, imbroided with Flower-de-Luces of Gold, and ouer it a cloth of State of the same fure: the great Scaffold and staires were covered with crimson veluet, imbroided with gold. There were other Scaffolds both on the right hand & the left, as well for the Princes, Knights of the Kings Orders, Gentlemen of the Chamber, and other Noblemen, Captaines, and men of marke, as for Ambassadors, Ladies, the Queenes women, and others: within the compasse of the high Altar, there was a forme covered with cloth of Gold, for the Cardinals of Gondy, Sourdis and Perron, and behinde them was another for the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelats, appointed as well to serue at the Coronation and Masse, as to assist there.

Ioyning vnto the Altar on the same side, there was a Table honorably prepared for the great and lesse Crownes, the hand of Iustice, and the ring appointed for the said Coronation: On the other side on the right hand, there was a chaire covered with Violet colour Veluet, imbroided and fringed with Gold, hauing two long cushions, for the Cardinall of Ioyeuze who did the Office, and behinde on the same side was a table richly appointed for the bread, wine and candle, vntill that the master of the ceremonies should come to fetch them, and deliuer them vnto Ladies appointed to carrie them vnto the offering.

The

A The floor of the Quire, and from the great scaffold vnto the high Altar, was covered with crimson veluet imbrodered with gold, with good and rich carpets round about the said Altar, and ouer the said carpets was a covering of cloth of gold.

The said Thursday being the thirteenth day of May, the Queene was found ready in the morning in her chamber, attired with a kirtle and bodies of Ermines, a mantle ornament of her head, and other royall habits. Her mantle was of blew veluet imbrodered with Flower-de-Luces of gold, and furred with Ermines, hauing a traine seven ells long. The attire of her head was all garnished with pretious stones, her bodies were also of blew veluet, covered with Flower-de-Luces of fine gold, and her kirtle enriched with great diamonds, rubies and B emerauds, all of such riches and excellency, as the value was inestimable.

Being thus attired, shee was conducted with great state vnto the Church, being attended on by the Dauphin, who carried the traine of her Royall mantle, being assisted by Mounseigneur de Vitry, the Lady Elizabeth, Queene Marguerite, and by many Princes and Princesses, and other Noblemen and Ladies in very good order. The Queene being come into the Church, shee kneeled downe vpon a cushion before the great Altar, whereas shee found the Cardinall of Ioyeuze in his pontificall ornaments, accompanied by the Cardinals of Gondy, Sourdis and Perron, and a good number of Bishops, Abbots, and other Prelates, of either side of the great Altar, after which shee did prostrate her selfe, praying very devoutly, which being ended shee was raised vpon her knees, & then bending her head the Cardinall of Ioyeuze pronounced this prayer in Latine: O Lord God heare our prayers and supplications: that that which is to be done by the Ministry of our humility, may be filled with the effect of thy vertue through Iesus Christ our Lord, &c. This prayer being ended, hee tooke the pyhall in which was the holy vnction, and poured so much into a vessell of gold as he thought necessary, and anointed the Queenes head, and then her breist, saying, In the name of the Father, the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, this vnction of oile may profit thee in honour and eternall confirmation. After which vnction hee said this prayer: God eternall and almighty, pacified by our prayers poure the abundant spirit of thy blessing vpon thy seruant, to the end that this day being instituted Queene by the imposition of our hands, shee may alwaies remaine worthy by thy sanctification: and that shee may neuer after be separated from thy grace, as unworthy, through our Lord Iesus Christ, &c.

D The Cardinall proceeding in the said Coronation, hee tooke the ring and put it on the Queenes finger, saying: Take the ring of faith, the signe of the holy Trinity, by the which thou maist auoid all hereticall malice, and by the vertue which is giuen thee call the barbarous nations to the knowledge of the truth. After which hee said this prayer following: God from whom proceeds all power and dignity, giue vnto thy seruant by this signe of faith the prosperous effects of her dignity, in which faith shee may alwaies remaine constant, and serue continually to please thee, by our Lord Iesus Christ, &c.

Then the Cardinall put the Scepter into the Queenes hand, and the hand of Iustice, which done, hee tooke the great Crowne which hee offered to set vpon the Queenes head, being in the meane time supported by the Dauphin and his sister, and then was taken away, and in stead thereof was set on another of lesse weight enriched with Diamonds, Rubies and Pearles of inestimable value. The Cardinall setting the Crowne vpon her head, said these words: O Lord the fountaine of all goodnesse, and giuer of all honours, grant vnto thy seruant well to gouerne this dignity which shee hath taken, and fortifie in her by good workes the glory which thou hast giuen her; by our Lord Iesus Christ, &c.

The Coronation being ended, and the prayers said, the Queene was placed in her Throne, which was prepared vpon the Scaffold, and the great Crowne set before her vpon a stoole covered with cloth of tussie, and a cushion of the same, and on the right hand there was a Nobleman which held the Scepter, and on the left another, which held the hand of Iustice.

The Queene being thus seated in her throne, masse began to be celebrated by the said Cardinall of Ioyeuze. The Gospell being read, three Ladies carried vp the offering of bread, wine and candle, to the which there were thirteene peeces of gold tied. After the eleuation of the Sacrament, when they came vnto the Agnus Dei, they presented the Pix vnto the Queene to kisse, who was afterwards lead vnto the high Altar, where shee received the Sacrament with great deuotion and reuerence, which done, shee said her prayers, and then was conducted backe againe vnto her throne, where shee heard the end of Masse.

Masse being ended, the Queene descended from her Throne, and was conducted backe vnto her Chamber with the same order and Ceremony that shee had bene brought vnto the Church.

Church. After the end of Masse there was a largeffe cried for the Queene in the Church A bequene by the Heralds, and good fummes of gold and siluer ca't vnto the people at diuers times. All which was done with great acclamations and signes of publike ioy. All which being ended, the King did in some sort reconcile the Ambaſſadour of Spaine with him of Venice, who had giuen him a box of the eare for that he had called him Pantoloon in bidding him farewell: And the same night their Maieſties returned to Paris, where preparation was made for the Queenes entry vpon the Sunday following.

But oh the incontinacy of humane things! Man purpoſeth and God diſpoſeth; Yesterdayes ſunne-shine of glory, is ſuddenly ouercast with a darke cloud of heauineſſe and mourning. France which did yesterday ioy to ſee her King triumphing in glory at the coronation B of his Queene, doth now weepe and lament for the loſſe of him, and they apprehend the ruine of their fortunes, and the conſuſion of this flouriſhing Eſtate. He which yesterday ſupported the fortune and felicity of France, like another Atlas lies now wallowing in his owne goare, being treacherouſly murdered by the curſed hand of a damned and bloudy villaine, as you may heare by the diſcours.

Discourſe of the Kings inter-tier.

On Friday, the day after the Queenes Coronation, the King being aduertised of ſome ominous influence and prediction, which did threaten him that day, hee went to ſee Maſſe with great deuotion: at his returne they brought him ſome of his children, and amongst others the Duke of Anion, whom hee loued dearly, and in whom his Maieſty tooke great delight, but being then very penſiue, hee commanded they ſhould carry him to breakfaſt, C then turning very ſad, hee caſt himſelfe vpon his bed to ſleepe iſſe might (the which hee being full of life and ſpirit was not accuſtomed to doe) but not being able to take any reſt, hee fell vpon his knees and beganne to pray, then he lay downe againe, and prayed againe; and thus hee did three times. In the end he went and walked in the Gallery vntill dinner time.

After dinner many Noblemen came into his Chamber, and beganne to tell ſome tales to put him out of his melancholie humour, and to make him laugh; hauing ſmiled a little with the reſt (being by nature of a pleaſant diſpoſition) in the end he ſaid; We haue laughed enough for Friday, we may well weepe on Sunday. Hereupon, hee made a partie to goe to the Arſenall at foure of the clocke: whereupon, they ſay, that the Duke of Vendome told him that hee had bene warned to beware of the fourteenth day; yet making no account thereof, he went downe into the Court, whereas a man of a meane condition entertained him a quarter of an houre, then hee went into his Caroch, by the Dukes of Eſpernon (who ſate in the firſt place of the boot vpon the Kings right hand) Montbazon the Marſhall of Lauardin, La Force and Praulin, being followed by two foot men, and one of his guard on horſebacke, hauing commanded Monſieur De Vigny and the reſt of his guard to ſtay behinde.

Being betwixt the draw bridge and the Port, this miſerable wretch who watched his opportunity, drew neere vnto the Caroch on the right ſide, thinking his Maieſty had bene there, but ſeeing hee was on the left hand, and hearing them command the Coachman to goe on, he went the neereſt way by narrow lanes, and met with his Maieſty in the ſtreet called Petroniere, neere vnto Saint Innocents Church, where ſtaying to make way for a Cart to paſſe, the King leaned downe on the one ſide towards Monſieur De Eſpernon, preſſing him to reade a letter without Spectacles; the Duke of Montbazon turned towards them, and one of the foot-men was bulie tying vp his garter on the other ſide, ſo as this monſter had the opportunity to ſtab the King into the left Pap, but the wound was not great, whereupon crying out, O my God I am wounded, hee gaue him meanes to giue him a ſecond blow, which was mortall, the knife-entring betwixt the fifth and ſixth ribbe, it cut aſunder the veine leading vnto the heart, and the wound was ſo deepe as it entred into Cava Vena, the which was pierced, wherewith the King did preſently ſpit bloud, loſing all apprehenſion and knowledge, for any thing they could perceiue. They had great difficulty to ſaue the murderher from killing preſently, yet in the end hee way conuayed to the houſe of Retz.

fourth ſlain.

The King was carried backe vnto the Louvre: vpon the way they met with the Daulphin, who went to take the aire, but they cauſed him to returne, and to be carried into the Queenes chamber. The King was laied vpon a Couch in his Cabinet, whereas preſently after he gaue vp the Ghoſt. Many ſpake vnto him of God, and amongst others the Archbiſhop of Ambrun,

1610

A Ambroſius, being the 100. yeeres of a Church-man, exhorted him in this laſt action, but he made no more vnderſtanding him. This did the King Henry the fourth, whoſe victories and martiall exploits had purchaſed him, amongst his owne ſubiects, the ſurname of Great, whoſe life and actions future ages will ſayde with admiration. Neuer Prince was more reſpected of ſtrangers, more feared of enemies, nor more beloved and obeyed of his ſubiects. And euen now being in his greateſt glory, and holding himſelfe as it were the moderator of Chriſtendome, it pleaſed God to ſuffer him to be deprived of this light by an vntimely death.

At which time the Duke of Guife comming to the Louvre, he went to comfort the Queene, whom he found wonderfully afflicted with the newes of this lamentable accident: from whence he went with the Duke of Eſpernon to the Court of Parliament where they cauſed the Queene to be declared Regent, carrying a Regiſter with them to the Louvre, to dignifie it vnto her: which done, the Duke of Guife demanded two things of the Queene, the one was, the reſtoring of the Marqueſſe of Vennuel to her fauour: and the other, the continuing of the Duke of Sully in his charge, the which ſhee willingly granted. After which he went thorow the city with five or fix hundred horſe directly to the Arſenall, where he entred with five more in his company, whereas the D. of Sully &c. he embraced one another, and ſware a ſtrict league of loue and friendſhip, and then he returned to his houſe.

An houre before the Duke of Sully hearing of the Kings hurt, was going with about ſome threeſcore horſes towards the Louvre, but meeting with Monſieur De Villeroi in Saint Honores ſtreet; and he telling him in his eare, that he was dead, he returned preſently; and put himſelfe into the Arſenall, lodging that night, and the two following in the Biſhops. It was ſtrange to ſee the diſorder, deſpaire, cries and conſuſion which was generally thorow the citie, the people caſſing themſelues proſtriate vpon the ground, nor caring if horſes went over them, nor what became of them. Monſieur De Villeroi going to the Louvre, and entring into a little ſtreet right againſt it, he was incountred by a Captaine, one of his friends and familiar acquaintance, who was ſo troubled and tranſported with griefe, as he knew him not, but ſought to ſtop his paſſage, charging him with his pike, and putting him in danger of his life; but in the end knowing him, he caſt away his pike, and craving pardon of him, he ſaid vnto him; Sir cauſe me to be hanged, kill me, I am ſo troubled as I know not what I doe; for I did not know you. Whereupon he paſſed on, and entred into the Louvre, where he found the Chantellor, who had bene there before the blow, and there they lodged for three nights together.

The day the King was murdered, the Court of Parliament, hauing notice thereof, (as I haue ſaid) made this decree:

Whereas the Kings Attorney Generall hath informed the Court of Parliament; and all the chambers thereof aſſembled, that the King being now murdered by a moſt cruell, inhumane and deteſtable Paricide, committed vpon his moſt ſacred perſon, it were neceſſary to provide for the affaires of the preſent Kings; and for his Eſtate; and hath required that there there may be present order giuen concerning his seruice, and the good of his Estate, which A cannot be well governed by the Queene, during the minority of the King her sonne, and that it would please the said Court to declare her Regent, that the affaires of the Kingdome may be governed by her. Whereupon having consulted, the Court hath declared, and doth declare the said Queene (mother to this King) Regent in France, for the government of this State, during the minority of her sonne, with all power and Authority.

Made in Parliament the fourteenth day of May in the yeere of our Lords, 1610.

The King goes to the Court of Parliament.

ON Saturday the fifteenth day, the King, being assisted by the Queene, the Prince of Conty, and other Princes, Noblemen, Prelates and Officers of the Crowne, (for the Earle of Soylons was yet at his house and came not till Monday) went vnto the Court of Parliament, where sitting in his seat of Iustice, he made a little speech vnto them without interruption: but the Queene beginning to speake he sunk downe in a swone, but in the end the Chancellour wonne great reputation for the order and successe of this action, the which was as famous for the manner of it, as pitifull for the teares that were shed.

It seemed that Heauen and all creatures did second the mourning of men, all was so horrible and desolate, both in Court and City, and much more in the Country. At that time the King made a declaration, confirming the Decree of the Court of Parliament for the Regency of the Queene his mother, as followeth.

A declaration made by the King.

THE King sitting in his seat of Iustice, by the aduice of the Princes of his bloud, Prelates, Dukes, Peeres and Officers of the Crowne, having heard the request made by his Attorney Generall, hath declared, and doth declare (according to a Decree made by the Court of Parliament) the Queene his mother Regent in France, and to haue the care of the bringing vp of his person, and the government of the affaires of his Kingdome, during his minority. Commanding this present Edict to be inrolled and published in all the Ballewicks, Seneschalshes and other iurisdiccions depending vpon the said Court of Parliament, and in all other Parliaments of this Realme.

Given in the Court of Parliament the fifteenth day of May, 1610.

Iesuits sent for to receive the Kings heart.

THE King vpon the foundation of his royall Colledge at La Fleche for the Iesuites, had resolved to haue his heart layed there, after his death; the which they remembring, sought all meanes to recouer it, and to preserve this precious peece of that cruell shipwrack. Mounseur De La Varenne who had from the beginning laboured to aduance this Colledge, did now shew his loue and affection to them. He remembred the Queene of the deceased Kings will, who willingly granted that it should be executed in euery point; whereupon he presently sent vnto the Iesuites being in their profest house of Saint Lewis, that they should be ready to come and receive this Treasure when they should be sent for, and soone after he sent them certaine Caroffes, in the which they were brought into the Louvre, to salute the King and Queene and to offer them a new their most humble seruice, on Saturday the fifteenth of May.

Iesuits come to receive the Kings heart.

Being come into the Kings chamber, and hauing done their ordinary obedience, his Maiey hauing embraced the chiefe of them, father Cotton made a speech for them all, witnessing the extreme griefe which the company felt, by the incurable wound it receiued by the deceased Kings death, and that they were resolved for to spend and consume themselves in the seruice of his Crowne. The King assisted by Mounseur De Souuere his Gouverneur, assured them that amongst the other qualities which he desired to inherite of his Lord and most honoured father, was his loue to this order, and that continuing to affect his seruice, they should finde the like affection.

Queenes speech to the Iesuits.

This being done they went vnto the Queenes Chamber, whom they found accompanied with certaine Ladies of her Court, and some Noblemen and others. All the fathers hauing humbly saluted her, father Cotton made offer of the like seruice as he protested vnto the King. To whom the Queene said, The deceased King my most honoured Lord and husband loved you dearly, as euery man knowes, and in testimony thereof, he would haue you after his death, to be the depositors and gardians of his heart, I haue commanded it shall be deli-

A red vnto you; and that his will be effected. Hauing this precious pawne, and continuing towards the King my sonne in that dutie which you haue shewed vnto him, my loue and affection cannot faile you. Assure your selues I will maintaine you, and will haue a great care of your preservation, as men, who I thinke doe watch for this our Royall Estate.

These words were followed with humble thanks from the Iesuits, who hauing taken their leave, went directly to the Chamber where they did imbalm the Kings bodie. A lamentable sight, namely for those who but two daies before had seene him so pleasant and full of health! The Prince of Conde arrived presently after, who melted in teares: He knelted downe before the royall heart, and his prayers being ended, taking it vp on a cushion, he deliuered it into the hands of Bartolomew Jaquinet, Superior of the house of Saint Lewis, who being attired in a surpise and stole, he receiued it in the name of the whole company, with protestation of the eternall bond which the whole Order should owe vnto the memorie of the deceased King, in that he had honoured them with so precious a page. Then being accompanied by his brethren, and followed by a great number of the Nobilitie, many torches being light, he was conducted to the great gate of the Louvre, whereas the Caroches did attend them. He entered with foure others of the same Order, and two Gentlemen which carried torches in that where the Kings heart was, which was the same wherein this good Prince had receiued that lamentable and bloody wound of death. The guard, appointed by Mounseur de Vigny, did accompanie this dolefull conuoy, the which came to Saint Lewis about eight of the clocke at night, on Saturday the fifteenth of May.

Iesuits receive the Kings heart.

The furniture of this mournfull conuoy, made the afflicted Parisiens (who loue their Kings with passion) easily to discouer what it was; so as many notwithstanding the raine and the great discommoditie of the time, went on with the troupe, the more to witness their affection to their deceased Prince, and not satisfied to haue cast holy water vpon his heart, they would, in imitation of the Iesuites, kisse it one after another, yea if it had beene possible a thousand times, euer detesting the memory of that damnable parricide and wicked murderer that had deprived them of their dearest Jewell, the which was not done without great lamentation, and shedding of many teares.

After three daies rest in the Iesuites Chappell, it was conueyed with a solemne pompe to La Fleche, where after great ceremonies, it was laid in a place of rest, vntill a stately Vrine might be prepared.

This sudden and lamentable disaster did wonderfully afflict all the French in generall, and bred strange apprehensions in the mindes of many, who remembring the miseries and confusions which had growne through the factions of great men, during the minority of former Kings, praied generally for vnitie, and some did write of that subiect: among others, one Pelletier, discoursing of this miserable accident, concludes with an exhortation to great men to liue in vnitie, for the generall good of the Estate.

It is not (saies he) the propertie of greatest sorrowes to speake, for teares and heart-breaking sighes are the best demonstrations of greatest passions; the which maketh me to expresse in few words, the great griefe and publike sorrow wherewith France is now afflicted: Know then, and let future ages for euer lament, that on Friday the 14. of May, the next day after the Queenes coronation, our great Henry (of most famous memory) King of France and Nauarre, passing thorow the Citie in his Caroch, as a Prince which liued without feare or suspicion of his subiects, accompanied with some few of his Nobilitie, and without any of his vvaile Guard, was murdered by an accursed and execrable Assassin, called Francis Rasilac, borne at Angoulême.

A discourse made by Pelletier.

Is it not a wonder to the Christian world, to see France a second Affricke, breeding such deceitfull monsters? How infamous is this age, in regard of that of our fore-fathers? What a misery is it, that a French King should not be free from the rage and furie of a cut-throat villaine, one of his owne subiects? Accursed villaine, thou hast deprived vs of this great Prince, whom we lament with teares, and whose losse we shall euer feel. Thou didst thinke in thy damnable designe to swallow vs vp in a gulf of miserie and desolation: but God in his goodnesse hath preferred vs, and otherwise disposed the hearts and affections of the French, than thou in thy frenzie didst conceiue, or the hellish counsell of Satan suggest. The darke prison wherein thou art iustly detained, where new torments are prepared for thy offence, office, will not let thee see how (notwithstanding thy wicked Acts) that all things remaine A constant in the same tranquillitie they were in before. It is to God alone to whom we are bound for this grace, yet will we not forget to give due praises to his instruments which he hath vouchsafed to vicin this Nation: for the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, the famous Court of Parliament, with the Magistrates of Paris, have all with one heart and common consent assured the Estate: so as there is not any threat of mutiny or sedition amongst this great multitude: but resolution and modestie, which make the Patient to be much commended, and serves as an example to all other Provinces of the Realme. ^{Thou (say)} I can not see how the very heart of thy horrible attempt, all the Nobilitie ran to the Court, making offers and proffessions of their service and fidelity: they felt B not, though the Luther be taken away, the stone is left vs. to succeed in the Government:

though he be young, yet shall he be fortified with the wise advice of great Princes, and of the Queene his mother, who amidst her greatest sorrowes, will remember the common good, and hath vouchsafed for our comfort to accept of the Regency and Government of the Kingdome: In the presence of the Princes, Peeres, Constable, Chancellor, Cardinals, Marshals of France, and other great Officers of State, all assembled in the great Chamber of the Palace, with authoritie of the Court of Parliament, his lawfull Successor sitting in his throne, was solemnly acknowledged and proclaimed King of France.

To conclude, this young Prince is so worthily brought vp, in the love and feare of God, C with all other vertues, which serve to the ornament of a great King, that treading in the footsteps of the late King his father, he will cherish Religion, love Iustice, be generous, meeke, affable, gracious, and shine in a full lustre, like a glorious Sunne over all France. All things shall flourish vnder his reigne, his people shall bleesse him, and with cries lift vp to heaven, pray to God for his preservation.

Thus now we see this Prince happily sealed, and so well supported with the force of armes, advice of his Counsell, and the love of his subjects, as it shall be in vaine for any one to presume to attempt any innovation without condigne punishment: seeing then his coming to the Crowne is so blessed, and seconded by the fauours of heauen, let vs not prouoke the anger of God by our ill dispositions: let vs endeavour to haue this curled murtherer not only detected of all French-men, but also held in abhormination of all strangers: Let vs remember, D that as contrary winds cause stormes and tempests at sea, so diuision and factions trouble a State. If our owne iudgement cannot instruct vs, let the schoole of reason teach vs; let vs consider, that as in an humane body there is a head, and vnder that head many Noble parts, that the member appointed for one seruice, dares not execute anothers office, the legges will not be the armes, nor the lungs the heart: Euen so in a well-gouerned State, one is acknowledged for head, and giueth life to all the other members, which moue not but vnder his command, so as euery one discharging his duties, by a good vnion and correspondency, Kingdomes are preferred, and of small become great, whereas contrariwise by diuisions and factions great States are ruined and come to nothing.

Remember, that it is about 1200 years since this Realme of France hath bene held for E one of the greatest Monarchies in the world: Let not posteritie reproach vs, that it hath bene ruined in our time, and that by our intemperate rage; we haue ouerthrowne that which our Ancestors haue built vp by their wisdomes and valours: and if the publike interest doe not moue you, yet let euery man respect his owne particular: we are all imbarcked in one vessel, if it perill, hardly will any one escape: we are all in one house, if it fals, we shall be buried in the ruines. Let vs not forget, that we are yet drenched with our last shipwracke: that we haue not bene long freed from ciuill warre, the which neuer comes alone, but is attended on by plague, famine, and all other calamities and miseries, as losse of goods, imprisonment, ran-soming of our bodies, the sacke and spoile of our townes, the rauishing of our wiues and daughters, and the slaughter of our children.

Let vs know, that experience is the mistresse of fooles, and let vs not attend repentance after our errors. We are now in peace, let vs continue, preserve, and seeke to maintaine it with the assistance of God. Let vs not be like vnto Magicians, which procure stormes by their charmes, contrary to the course of nature. Calamities and miseries come but too soone, let vs not prouoke them, or goe to meet them. You great men which haue the charge and go-uernment of the State, in Gods name, haue no other obiect before your eyes, but the good and seruice of your King: flee diuision, which like a bad Counsellor, seeking to ruine others, ouerthrowes

A ouerthrowes it selfe. Assure your selues the greatnesse of the Estate is your owne, her tran-quillitie is the Basis and foundation of your owne families. Studie not who shall ruine his companion, but who shall serue his Countrey with greatest loialtie. It is incident to men of weake iudgements to be full of enuy, malice, and diffimulation: carry your hearts in your faces, loue one another, that you may the better serue one Matter. It shall be your prosperitie, and doubt not but there are more good then bad in an Estate, and that there was neuer any one so mutinous & factious, but in the end he was curbed by the Authoritie of his Soue-raigne. You haue at this day a King redoubtable, ouer whose person the eie of the diuine Providence doth so watch, as although he be young, yet shall he not be lesse obeyed and feared thorowout all his Kingdome: the Edicts of the deceased King his Father shall bee observed as his owne: you shall haue him a common father to all his subjects.

It is said, that Alexander made no distinction betwixt Greeke and Barbarian, but only by their vertues, not regarding the difference of their habits. So our King will iudge who are good and bad French-men, by their obedience and fidelity, euery one shall be partaker of his grace and fauour, as he shall make himselfe worthy by his seruice. So as all things being thus harmely settled within the Realme, we shall haue no cause to feare any danger from abroad:
The King is in peace with his neighbours, and we assure our selues, that there is not any one of them but he is so generous, as he doth deplore this lamentable accident befallen our late King. And although he had before the death of this Prince, some designs to preiudice
C France, yet now he will turne his hatred into loue, moued only by commiseration of this disaster. And if we may hope for this kinde from forraigne Princes, what ought we to expect from those which are naturall borne French-men.

God indeed in this dangerous confusion, did heare the praies & vovs of good men, and did so vnite the hearts of great men, as euery one did strive by emulation, who should doe best seruice to the King and State: but above all, the Queenes constancy was admirable, who in the midst of her greatest afflictions laboured continually, and did not neglect any thing, that might tend to the publike quier of the Realme, causing the King the two and twentieth of May, to make a Declaration for the entertainment of the Edict of Pacification made at Nantes, as followeth:

D LEWIS by the Grace of God, &c. Since the most vnfortunate and detestable murder of our most honored Lord and Father, the King last deceased (whom God absolve) the Queene Regent our most honored Ladie and Mother, (having alwaies teares in her eyes, and sorrow in her heart) hath not let to labour incessantly, and with great magnanimitie and widome, lest this fatall accident should be preiudiciall to our person, our state and subjects, holding her selfe bound vnto this dutie, not onely for the naturall affection which she beareth vs, but also for that she hath bene declared Regent, and in this qualitie charged with the government of the affaires of the Kingdome, by the suffrages and consent of the Princes of our blood, and other Princes, Peeres, Prelats and chiefe Officers of the Crowne, and the E Iudges of our Parliament, being all assembled there together (we sitting in our seat of Iustice) wherein her endeouours were so happy, & the affection of all our Subjects which were then neere vs (especially of the inhabitants of our good Citie of Paris) so great and sincere towards vs, as we cannot with nor desire more in their obedience and loialties, then in the good and wise government of the Queene Regent, our most honored Lady and Mother: Having also had intelligence by the advice which comes daily vnto vs, that in all parts of our Kingdome all our Subjects, as well Catholikes as they of the pretended reformed Religion of all qualities, strive by a commendable emulation, to exceed one another in readinesse of obedience, and in actions which may yeeld some testimony of their loialties and durie:
for the which we haue great cause to thanke God, and to hope that as it hath pleased him
F heretofore to preserve this Realme from great dangers, to make it flourish for many ages, that he will still by his bountie take our young yeares into his protection, and giue vs leisure to grow in pietie and vertue, hereafter to imploy the greatnesse, whereunto he hath raised vs, to his honour and glorie. The which we heartily craue at his hands, and that he will inspire vs with such counsell, as shall be fit and necessarie for the well governing of our Subjects in his state, and to make them liue in peace, vnitie & loue, one with another, as being the true grounds whereon (next after God) depends the safetie and preservation of the Realme: Experience shewing that Kings our Predecessors, that the fury and violence of Armes, had not onely bene vnprofitable to draw vnto the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romane Church, A their subiects that were diuided from it, but was rather hurtfull: which made them haue recourse by a more happy counsell, to mildnesse, granting them the exercise of the said pretended reformed Religion, whereof they made profession: In whose imitation, the deceased King, our most honored Lord and Father, had made the Edict of Nantes, to reconcile all his louing subiects: The obseruation of which Edict, with the Orders made in consequence thereof, haue settled an assured quiet amongst them, the which hath euer since continued without any interruption. By meanes whereof, although that Edict be perpetuall and irrevocable, and by that meanes hath no need to be confirmed by any new declarations; Notwithstanding, to the end our said subiects may be assured of our loue, and that our intention and will is to cause the said Edict to be inuolubly kept, being made for the good and quiet of all our subiects, as well Catholikes, as those of the pretended reformed Religion:

We make it knowne, that it hauing bene propounded in our presence, by the Queene Regent, our most honored Ladie and Mother, we haue by her good aduice, of the Princes of our blood, and other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of our Crowne, and many notable personages of our Counsell, decreed, and ordained, and our pleasure is, that the aforesaid Edict of Nantes in all points and Articles, together with all other Articles which haue bene granted vnto them, and the Orders made, and Iudgements giuen vpon the interpretation, or execution of the Edict, and in consequence thereof, shall be entertained and kept inuolubly, and those which shall infringe it, severely punished, as troublers of the public quiet: inuolubly all our Officers to this effect, to see it very carefully kept, as they will answer to the contrary, whose negligence shall be punished as rigorously as the disobedience of such as haue broken it.

We also command our louing and faithfull Iudges of our Court of Parliament at Paris, to cause these presents to be proclaimed and inrolled, and the Contents to be kept, entertained, and obserued in euery point according to their forme and tenor, not suffering any thing to be done to the contrary. For such is our pleasure. In witness whereof We haue caused our Seale to be set hereunto. Giuen at Paris the two and twentieth of May, 1610.

THE State being somewhat settled, and freed from all feare of factions and alterations: the Court of Parliament proceeded to the arraignment and condemnation of the infernall monster of nature, Francis Ravaillac, borne at Angoulesme, by profession a Lawyer. Being prisoner in the Concergerie, (which is the prison for the Court of Parliament) his processe was duly instructed and made, in the Chamber of the Tournelle (which be the ordinary Iudges for all criminal offenders,) who being put to the Racke on the 25 day of May, on the 27 day sentence of death was giuen against him, by the which he was declared, duly arraigned & convicted of treason in the highest degree, both against God & man. His execution was according to the sentence, after this manner. He was brought out of the prison in his shirt, with a torch of two pound weight lighted in one hand, and the knife wherewith he had murdered the King, chained to the other; and then he was set right vp in a tumbrell or dungcart, & so he was conducted with a good guard vnto our Ladies church, where being condemned to doe penance, he had bene torne in peeces by the peoples rage, if the Officers had not restrained them. After this he was accompanied to the place of execution by two Doctors of Diuinity, who still perswaded him to saue his soule from euermlasting punishment, by revealing his associates, the which he would not, but still maintained, that he did it only by the instigation of the deuill, and the reason was, for that the King did tolerate two religions in France, in this manner he was carried to the Greue, where there was a strong scaffold built for his execution, Du Fic the Kings Attorney was appointed to assist at his execution, and there to gather (if it might be) some further light of this hellish conspiracy. His death was terrible, to wit: all murderers from the like attempts. At his coming vnto the scaffold, he crost himselfe, in signe that he died a Papist, then he was bound vnto an engine of wood, made like vnto a Sauoir Croffe, which done, his hand with the knife chained to it (wherewith he had laine the King) was

A was put into a Furnace, then flaming with fire and Brimstone, wherein it was in a most terrible manner consumed, and yet he would not confesse any thing, but cast forth horrible cries, like a soule tormented in hell: and surely if helms torments might be felt on earth, it was produced in this mans punishment, the which (had not the foulness of his fact bene so horrid) would haue moued all the lookers on to pitie and commiseration. After which, the executioners hauing made pincers red hot in the same furnace, they did pinch his paps, the brauens of his armes and thighes, with the calues of his legs, and other fleshy parts of his bodie, pulling out collops of flesh, and burning them before his face: then they powred into those wounds, scalding Oyle, Rozen, Pitch, and Brimstone molt together: after which, they did set a hard roundell of Clay vpon his nauell, hauing a hole in the midit, into the which they powred molten Lead, yet he reuealed nothing, but roared out most horribly, like vnto him that was tormented in the brazen Bull of the tyrant Phalaris. But to make the last act of his Tragedie equall in torments to the rest, they caused foure strong horses to be brought to teare his bodie in peeces, where being ready to suffer his last torments, he was againe questioned with, touching the discouery of this truth, but he would not reueale any thing, and so died, without speaking one word of God. But his flesh and ioynts were so strongly knit together, as those foure horses could not of a long time dismember him, nor pull him asunder: but one of them fainting, it is remarkable to see the affection of a Gentleman who was present, mounted vpon a mightie strong horse, who seeing one of the horses straine but faintly, hee C lighted from his owne, and taking off his saddle, hee tied him to one of these wretches members, yet for all this, they were constrained to cut the flesh vnder his armes and thighes, with a sharpe Razor, by which meanes his body was the easier torne in peeces: which done, the fury of the people was so great, as they pulled this dismembered carcase out of the executioners hands, which they dragged vp and downe thorow the dirt, and cutting of the flesh with their kniues, the bones which remained were brought to the place of execution, and there burnt, the ashes were scattered in the wind, as being held vnworthy of earths buriall: the people shewing by these exterior acts, the great and sincere affection which they bare vnto the deceased King, our common father, and restorer of the estate. By the same sentence of condemnation all his goods were declared forfeited to the King; and moreover it was ordained, that the house where he had bene borne should be beaten downe (a recompence being giuen to the owner thereof) and that neuer any other should be built vpon that ground. That within fifteene daies after the publication of the said sentence, being proclaimed by the sound of a Trumpet in the Towne of Angoulesme, his Father and Mother should depart the Realme, and neuer to returne againe, which if they did, they should be presently hanged without any other forme of processe. His Brethren, Sisters, Vncles, and other his Kinsfolks, were forbidden euer after to carrie the name of Ravaillac, inioyning them to take another, vpon the like paines, the substitute of the Kings Attorney Generall hauing charge to see the execution of the said sentence at his perill.

It was an admirable thing after so great a disaster, to see the vnion & tranquillitie which was E generally in the State, there remaining not any markes of so great a mischiefe, but the morning weeds which all men did weare, and the sighes which all good French-men did breathe forth for the losse of their good King: neuer King was more lamented, nor Parricide more detested. This wicked murderer confessed no other motive of his crime, but the booke of Mariana, a Spanish Iesuit (so horrible a fact could not be committed if a Iesuit were not an Actor) which booke by a decree made by the Colledge of Sorbonne, and confirmed by a sentence from the Courts of Parliament, was for that cause condemned to be publicly burnt before our Ladies Church in Paris: the Tenor of the sentence was; The Court, the great Chamber, the Turnelle, and the Chamber of the Edict being assembled, hauing scene the decree of the facultie of diuinitie assembled the fourth of this Moneth of Iune, according F to a sentence giuen in May last, vpon the renewing of the censure in matter of doctrine made by the said facultie in the yeare 1413. confirmed by the holy Councell of Constance; that it is an heresie full of impietie to maintaine that it is lawfull for subiects or strangers, vpon any pretext or cause whatsoever, to attempt against the sacred persons of Kings and Soueraine Princes. The Booke of Iohn Mariana intitled, De Rege & Regis institutione. Printed as well at Mentz as in other places, containing many execrable blasphemies against the deceased King Henry the third of most happy memory, the persons and estates of Kings & Soueraine Princes, and other propoitions contrary to the said decree: vpon the conclusions of the

It doth also ordaine, that the booke of Mariana shall be burnt by the Executioner of Iustice, before our Ladies Church in Paris, forbidding all men, of what estate, qualitie and conditions soever they be, upon paine of high treason, to write or cause any bookes to be printed against the said decree & sentence. It doth also inioyne, that Copies taken out of the Originals of the said decree, and this present sentence shall be sent vnto the Bailewicks and Seneshalluses of this iurisdiction, there to be read and published after the accustomed manner and forme. And B moreover at Euenfong, in Parishes, in Townes, Suburbs, and other Burroughes the first Sunday of Iune. Inioyning all Bailiffs and Seneshals to proceed to the said publication, and the Substitutes of the Kings Atturney Generall to haue a care of the execution, and to certifye the Court of their diligence.

Given in Parliament the 8 of Iune, 1610.

They condemned for words.

Yet those holy men had such power and credit, as they stayed the publication of the said sentence for a time, whereat many were much scandalized. Presently after the execution of this Parricide, there was a young Boy of the age of thirteene yeares, dwelling with a Weauer, apprehended, for that he had said, that if he had the knife and the characters which Rauillac C had, he would doe as much to the young King, whereupon he was condemned to be hanged by the Prouost of Paris, from which sentence he appealed to the Court of Parliament. And the Prouost of Pluviers, twentie leagues from Paris, being accused to haue said, the day that the King was murdered, that he was slain or wounded that day, strangled himselfe in prison.

Another man of Meaux making profession of the religion, and reputed for a very honest man, came vnto the Duke of Bouillon (being accompanied with letters from the Minister of that place) to let him vnderstand that the Deuill had appeared vnto him, and had incited him, to kill the King, saying; That if he would not doe it, another should effect it before the end of Iuly. In the beginning of the Queenes Regency, all her care and endeavour was for the preservation of the peace and the safety of the Realme; She sought to giue contentment D to the Princes at home, and to entertaine the alliances of France, which made them resolute (though not without some opposition and difficultie) to pursue the desseine of Cleues, and to send the 10000 men which the deceased King had promised vnto the Princes, but the number of horse was not so compleat; the Marshall of La Chastre was chosen Generall of this Army, and Monsieur de Montigny was made Marshall of the Campe; there were foure peeces of Artillery, commanded by the young Marquis of Rosny (who was newly made Master of the Ordnance) to begin his Apprentiship there. This army began to march but slowly in Iuly towards Metz. The Marshall preparing himselfe for the voyage, there came two Iesuites to seeke him out, who told him that he could not goe his journey, nor carrie succours vnto Heretikes with a good conscience, seeking to terrifie his conscience with threats, E as that if he undertooke it, he could not be saved. But the Marshall giuing no credit vnto their words, sent them away with a fowre answer: yet soone after they came vnto him to change their language, and to pacifie him.

They now prepared for the Kings Funerall, and the Duke of Espernon with Mounseigneur de Bélegarde, Master of the Kings horses, were sent to Compiene to fetch the body of King Henry the third, which made many thinke that his Funerall should haue bene ioyned with the Kings, but his body was carried directly to Saint Denis, where it was interred without any pompe and ceremony.

Earle of Soif-

ernor of Normandy.

The Prince of Conde being aduertised of the Kings death, he sought to make his peace and reconciliation, writing letters full of humility and obedience to the King and Queene R. Regent, whereupon their Maiesties did write graciously vnto him, by a Gentleman whom the Princeesse of Conde his mother sent vnto him with 20000 Crownes to degage him from the Spaniards. At this time the Government of Normandy was giuen to the Earle of Soissons, and that of Dauphine to his Son, which bred great debate betwix the Prince of Conty and the Earle his Brother, the which did much trouble the Queene, who could not well tell how to pacifie the Prince; The Court of Parliament at Rouen, refused to verifie the Earles Parent for the said Government, whereupon they had a new commandement sent them: They

1610

A They grounded their refasall vpon this reason, for that they had already received the Duke of Orleans for their gouernour, by commandement from the deceased King.

After the execution of the Parricide Rauillac, and his confession, that the booke of Mariana the Iesuite, had bene the onely mooue to draw him to that damnable attempt; there was a fowle imputation laid vpon the Iesuites, and many condemned them as abettors and fauourers of the murderers of Princes, wherein they were the more confirmed; for that Mariana booke had bene condemned to be burnt by a decree of the court of Parliament. Father Cotton a Iesuite, who had bene in more credit and fauour with the deceased King than any one of that company, seeing their credits now in question, and that this brand of infamy was like to stick vpon them, hee impleads all his Art and eloquence to wipe it off, and to that end hee writes a letter or declaration vnto the Queene Regent, of the Iesuites doctrine, in the which hee disauowes Mariana's Booke in the name of their whole Company. And to winne them the more credit, hee procures them a Testimoniall from the Bishop of Paris, the which he plants in the Preface of his discourse. The Bishop writes, That whereas since the cruell Parricide of the deceased King, there had bene many brutes dispersed in Paris, to the preiudice of the remarkable Order of the Iesuites, we being desirous to prouide for the honour and reputation of the said Order, knowing well that such brutes proceed only from ill will, grounded vpon spleene against the said Fathers: We declare by these presents, that the said brutes are impossibles, and flanders in- C cented maliciously against them, to the preiudice of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, and that not only the said Fathers are free from all such blame: but also that their Order is as well for doctrine as good life, profitable for the Church of God, and to this E state. In witness whereof we haue signed these presents. After all this, Cotton begins his declaration vnto the Queene Regent after this manner.

Madame: God ordained in the old Testament, That they should not see the Kid in the mothers milke: to teach vs, (as Philon the Iew doth expound it) that we must not surcharge him with new affliction, that is otherwise oppressed. According to this rule being of the same nature, those of our Societie did hope, that after this atall accident which hath shaken the two Poles of Christendome, they should at the least haue had free liberty to fight after their D incomparable losse, a losse which is as particular to them, as it is common and general to all. But it is befallen them, as vnto those that are vnder the ruines of a great building; whereas one stone attends not another, to couer and ouerwhelme those vpon whom it falls. We were busied both hearts and bodies at the translation of that precious gage, which it pleased your Maiestie to cause to be consigned into our hands by my Lord the Prince of Conty, and to the which the chiefe Noblemen of France yeelded the last honours, when as some (ill affected to the Catholike Religion, and to them of our profession, to defame vs, and make profit of our absence) dispersed bruits, so far from likelihood and probability, as no man could thinke such flanders could enter (no not in dreaming) in the conceit of any reasonable creature. This E grew by reason of a bad booke, the doctrine whereof hath bene iustly condemned by the Court of Parliament: some maintaining that the doctrine contained in the said booke was common to all the Iesuites: others, that it was so particular to the Author, as many of the same company had written against it, and altogether condemned it in a Provinciall congregation, some yeeres past. A controuerisie which the least passionate will decide, concluding, that a disauow were a satisfaction, and that they should attend what we could say. Whereupon (Madame) hauing bene particularly named, it hath made me now to set pen to paper, to represent vnto you (as to her who is wholly affected to the true Religion, the most interested in the good of this State, and the most assured Sanctuarie which innocency can finde) that which the Doctors of our Company haue written of that subiect, knowing that the greatness of our affaires will not suffer you to seeke it, nor the little loue which our ill- F lours beare vs, to make you a true discourse of it.

After which he cites some Authors of that Societie writing of obedience to Princes, which held, that it was not lawfull for subiect nor stranger to attempt against the life of a Prince, although he doth abuse his authority: directly condemning the error of Mariana. And then he sets downe the opinion of the whole company, touching the question of obedience to Princes, concluding, that it is not onely vnlawfull to attempt against the persons of Princes, but that it is an execrable Parricide, a prodigious offence and a detestable sacrilege.

This

Bishop of Paris writes in the Iesuites.

Cotton the Ie-suites letter in the Queene
Regent.

This Declaration was no sooner printed, but there was a refutation presently written, called Anti-Cotton, maintaining, that the doctrine of the Iesuites allows and maintaines the parricide of Kings, and rebellion of subjects, which he proued out of their owne Authors.

1. Francis Ribadineira a writing of the parricide of James Clement, he saith, Forasmuch as the resolution which Henry the third took upon him, was the advice of a Polititian, and a Machinist, not conformable to the rules of our Saviour, behold the reason, that by the iust iudgement of God, the said Henry was killed by a young Monk, and died by the stroke of a knife.

2. Carolus Scribanus a Flemish Iesuite, who calls himselfe Clarus Bonarscium, in his booke intitled, Amphitheatrum honoris, saies, That if it so fall out, that a Denis, a Machanidas, or an Aristotimus, masters of their ages, oppress France, shall not the Pope haue absolute power to annuie them some Dion, Timoleon, or Philopœmen, that is to say, tarmers and suppressors of monsters. And afterwards speaking of a tyrant wasting France, Will a man (saies he) take armes against that tyrant wasting France? Will no Pope set free the noble kingdome from the stroke of the axe?

3. He cites Bellarmino, who although he condemneth treason against Princes; yet in ambiguous termes he seems to approuit it, by commending Garnet the Iesuite in these words: Wherefore was Henry Garnet, a man vnmistakeable in all kinds of learning and holiness of life, so punished in the highest degree, but onely for that he would not detect that, which with a safe conscience he could not. And the same Author in his booke De Pontifice Romano, saies, The Pope may dispose of kingdomes, taking from one, and giuing to another, as being the superiour Prince Ecclesiasticall. And the Iesuite Gretzer saies, We are not such dastards, as we feare to affirme openly, that the Pope of Rome may (if necessitie so require) free his Catholike subjects from their oath of obedience, if their Soueraigne intreat them tyrannically: yea he addes in the same place, That if the Pope doe it discreetly and warily, it is a meritorious worke. After all this he quotes the doctrine of Tolet, Mariana, and Iohn Guignard, a Iesuite Priest residing in Paris, who had written a Treatise in praise of James Clement, with diuers motives to make away the King which last died, for the which he was executed. But Franc. Verona, Constant, exceeds them all: he affirms, That notwithstanding the Councell of Constance, it is lawfull for any private man to hearth Kings condemned of heresie and tyrannie. And Emanuel Sa writes, That the rebellion of a Clerke against the King is no treason, inasmuch as he is not subiect to him. The which Bellarmino in a manner confirms, saying, The Pope of Rome hath exempted Clerks from their subiection to Princes: Kings are now no more superiours of Clerks. And to proue their doctrine of killing Kings more plainly, he produceth the equiuocations and euasions of Garnet, being apprehended for the powder-treason, the which is iustified by many of that Societie: Iohn l'Heureux writing thus; *When any man is drawne into question under an vniuersal trial, no man standing bound to informe against himselfe (as the law of nature teacheth vs plainly) he may peremptorily and freely denie that for which he is called into question, without any tergiversation, because he alwaies understands this clause, Vt teneat dicere. Which doctrine is confirmed by diuers other Iesuites: One of them affirming, that the doctrine of Equiuocation is grounded vpon the memorable example of S. Francis. In the end he shewes their opinion touching concealing of confession: One, which they hold ought not to be reuealed. Iohn l'Heureux writing of that subiect, saies, That a thing sealed up with the most holy signes of Confession, cannot be broken without detestable sacrilege: and that there cannot fall so great a mischife, for the avoiding of which, it can be lawfull to bewray a Confession. And Swarez addes, Yea though the safetie of the whole Common-wealth should stand vpon it. By all which proofes he shewes, that it was not Mariana's doctrine alone, to murder Kings, but that all the Iesuites haue erred with him in this, whom Father Cotton cannot iustifie in general.*

Anti-Cotton hauing set downe the Iesuites doctrine, he proues it by their actions. And first, by the fact of Iohn Chastell Clerke, brought vp in the Iesuites College; who hauing stabbed the King in the mouth the 27. of December. 1604. being examined vpon sundry questions, and among others, whether he had studied Diuinitie in the Iesuites College, he answered; That he had bene there vnder Father Gueret, with whom he had continued two yeeres and a halfe. And being asked if he had euer bene in the Chamber of Meditations, whither the Iesuites vie to bring the greatest sinners, there to behold the representation of many deuils, set forth (vnder colour to reduce them to a better life) thereby to cause a perturbation in their minds, and consequently vpon such resolutions, to thrust them forward to the vndertaking of some great action: His answer was, that he had often bene in this Chamber of Meditations. And being questioned,

A questioned, whether the killing of the King were not an ordinarie discourse among the Iesuites, he answered, that he had heard them say, It was lawfull to kill the King, and that he was no member of the Church, and that we ought not to obey him, nor hold him for our King, until he had receiued approbation from the Pope.

Peter Barriere being apprehended at Melun in April 1593. being discouered by an honest Friar, confessed that he came purposely to Court to kill the King, and that he had bene perswaded thereunto by one Varade a Iesuite, whose daily practise was to defame the King with vile speeches, by whose perswasion he had prouided a knife to doe the fact. He first of all discouered his intent to Aubry, Curate of S. Andrew des Arts, who directed him to Varade Rector of the Iesuites College, who confirmed him in his resolution to kill the King, assuring him, that in case he were put to death, he should obtaine in heauen a crowne of Martyrdom, and aduiring him vnto this action, vpon the Sacrament of Confession, and the holy Communion. And omitting many other actions of Iesuites both at home and abroad to proue their damnable doctrine, he concludes with Garnet, Hall, and others of the Sect, who were complices in that powder-treason, which was practised to ruine the King and the whole Estates of England.

In the end he seeks to proue by many pregnant presumptions, that the Iesuites are guilty of the murder: First, by an aduertisement sent from M. de La Force, the Kings Lieutenant in Bearn, that a Spaniard described by him, was come into France with an intent to kill the King, which Spaniard was brought vnto the King by Cotton, but the King hauing receiued these letters, shewed them to Cotton, and commanded him to bring the Spaniard againe, but he could not be found.

Secondly, the seditious preachings of Gontier and Hardy both Iesuites, the Lent before the fact was committed; inasmuch as the Marshall d'Ornano told the King, that if Gontier had preached so at Bourdeaux, he would haue caused him to be cast into the riuier, and yet he was a very zealous Catholike.

Thirdly, the confession of Rauillac, who iustified vnto Father Aubigny, that he had told him in confession, that he had bene sent to giue a great blow, and that he had shewed him the knife, hauing a heart grauen vpon it. But the Iesuite protested, that God had giuen him the grace to forget that presently, which was reuealed to him in Confession, whereby he saved his life.

And last of all, the predictions before the Kings death, as at Bruxelles, where the Iesuites domineere, it was spoken of 12. or 15. daies before it hapned. At Prague, a Iesuite had giuen it out, that the King was dead, before it fell out so, and moreover, he told them, that after his death, the Dauphin should not be King, but the King of Spaine, and that for some reasons which Gontier gaue in his Sermons in Lent last. And then the prediction of the Prouost of Pluuiers, that the King was either slaine or hurt that day. He was a Iesuite in faction, and hath a sonne a Iesuite.

The King being dead, the Queene with all the Nobilitie, prouounded in Counsell to yeeld him the last dutie in his oblique: three giues order, as well to pray for his soule, as for all things requisite for the ornament of the Funerall of so great a Monarch. Two daies after the death of this great King, his bodie was laid in a bed, his face bare to the view of all, and then they opened his bodie to embalm it, out of the which they tooke his heart to carry to la Fleche, and his bowels to S. Denis, as he had appointed in his life time: the which being done, he was laid in a coffin of lead, couered with purple velvet, on the which was a great croffe of white satten. On Whitson-munday about foure of the clocke in the morning, his heart being honourably embalmed, and laid in lead, was carried to la Fleche, as we haue said. The bodie being laid in a coffin, was set in a chamber hanged with rich tapistry, on either side were Altars set, where there were daily an 100 Masses said. In the chamber were many formes richly couered, for the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, Cardinals, Arch-bishops, Bishops, chiefe Ministers, and other Prelates, and Officers of the Church: and neere vnto the holy-water-pot, were two Heraults: on either side there were many other seats for religious men, who did ling day and night. Vpon the Kings bodie, were his Crowne, his Scepter, and the hand of Justice, vpon a cushion of rich embroidery. The Kings bodie remained in the said chamber fifteene or sixteene daies together, then was it carried downe with great honour and ceremonie, into the great lower Hall at the Louvre, being attended on by the Bishops, Prelates, and Noblemen of the Court.

Hall of Honour
Chamber

The said great Hall was hanged with the richest of the Kings Tapistrie, from the top to A the bottome, and the pillars and planchers were covered. Along the said Hall there was a Gallery on either side, for the comming in and going forth of Princes and Noblemen, which Galleries were covered with rich Tapistrie. At the upper end of the said Hall, there was a scaffold made with fourte steps, vpon the which was set a great bed-steed, covered with cloth of Gold, vpon the which the Kings Image (being made in wax) was laid, haueing his hands ioyned together, and attired in his royall Robes, with a Crowne vpon his head, the which did rest vpon a Cushion of rich imbroidery. Vpon his royall Mantle was the Collar of the Order, and on either side, were laid the royall Scepter, and the hand of Iustice, the Scepter on the right hand, and the hand of Iustice on the left.

Neere vnto the said Image were two Altars richly adorned, of either hand one, at that on the right hand was sung a Masse of Requiem in Musicke, and at the other were said foure other great Masses: Ouer either Altar was a rich Canopie, and betwixt the Altars were many seats for Prelates and religious men, who sung as in the foresaid Chamber, and at the lower end of the Hall there were many other Altars richly adorned, where they said Masse. The said Image being made as like him as might bee, was daily serued with meat to his table, by his Stewards, Sewers, Cup-bearers, Caruers, Almner, and all other Officers, and all order was duly obserued, as if the deceased King had beene liuing, and then the meat was distributed vnto the poore. The one and twentieth of Iune, the said Image and hangings were taken away, and the said hall both top, sides and floore were hanged and covered C with blacke cloth, and the body of the deceased King being in his coffin, was set in the place of the Image, covered with a paul of black velvet, which hung downe to the ground, with a crosse of white fatten, and a cloth of State ouer it of blacke velvet: vpon the Kings Coffin, were the Crowne, the collar of the Order, the Scepter, and the hand of Iustice. At the foot thereof was a great crosse of silver, vpon a cushion, neere vnto the which were two great tapers burning continually, and a holy water-pot of silver: on either side of which stood a Herald, the which were euery two houres releued by other of their companions which took their places. On the 25. of Iune, Lewis the 13. now reigning, dined in Longue-ville house, after dinner he was conducted with great state to the Louvre, to cast holy water vpon the body of the deceased King his father, being accompanied by his brethren, who were carried D of either side of him, the Duke of Orleans on the right hand, and the Duke of Anjou on the left. Neere vnto his Maiesty followed the Cardinals of Loy-uze and Sourdy. The King mourned in purple haueing a very long traine, the which was carried vp by the Prince of Conty, the Earle of Soissons, the Duke of Guise, the Prince Iouulle, and the Duke of Elbeuf: being followed by the Marshalls of France, and the Knights of the Order. Many Bishops, Prelates, and Noblemen, and an infinite number of men of account, Ladies and Gentlewomen were in the said hall, attending the Kings comming, who haueing giuen holy water, retired himselfe into the Louvre. The next day the Iudges of the Court of Parliament at the rising of the Court, went also after their accustomed manner to the Louvre, to giue holy water, being followed by the Iudges of the Chambers of accounts and aides, the Generalls of the money, and the whole body of Iustice, the Prouost of Paris, the Prouost of Marchants, and the Sherifes of the said City. On the 28. day of the month, the 24. sworne Criers of the City, haueing commande- E ment giuen them, went with the Kings armes on their breasts and backs, thorowout all the streets of Paris, to denounce the Conuoy and funeralis of the deceased King, crying out thus with a loud voice: Noble and deuout people, pray vnto God for the soule of the most high, most mighty, and most excellent Prince, Henry the great, by the grace of God, King of France and of Nauar, most Christian, most venerable, most victorious, his incomparable in- magnanimity and clemency, who is dead in his Palace of the Louvre, pray vnto God to receiue his soule. On Tuesday at two of the clocke in the afternoone, his Maiesties body shall bee taken vp to be carried to our Ladies Church in Paris, where the same day shall be said a E Euen-song for the dead, and the next day in the morning his seruice and accustomed prayers shall be said, after which he shall be carried to the Church of Saint Denis, to be interred in the Sepulcher of the Kings of France.

On Tuesday the nine and twentieth day the streets were hung with blacke on either side from the Louvre to our Ladies Church, vpon the which were the Kings and the Cries armes, one neere vnto another, and at euery house a burning torch. About two of the clocke in the afternoone, the same day, the funeral began, after this manner: First marched the Captaines, Lieu-

A Lieutenant and Ensignes of the Towne-houfe, with their gownes, swords by their sides, hoods and capes, the Archers and shot of the said towne-houfe followed in their cassakes of colour imbroided, and vpon a mourning hood, being 172. in number, going two and two, with their matches light, carrying their Hargbules and Halberds bending towards the ground, all which were diuided into three bands.

After them followed the Orders of Church men: First marched the fathers penitents of the third Order of Saint Francis, in number three score. Then followed the fathers of the third Order of Saint Lewis, being five and forty. The Capers, otherwise called the poore Scholars of the Colledge of Montagu three and thirty. The Capuchins in number foure B score and thre. The Minims being sixty eight. The Franciscans in number two hundred twenty foure. The Jacobins one hundred and sixty. The Agullines to the number of an hundred. The Carmes, sixty. The Feuillans thirty five. Before all which Religious men were carried their crosses, and of either side of euery crosse were carried foure torches, aginst them was a Scutcheon with the deceased Kings armes of either side.

Then marched five hundred poore men in blacke gownes and hoods, with new hose and shoes, euery one carrying a burning torch with the deceased Kings armes before and be- hind. After whom followed the foure and twenty sworne criers of Paris ringing their bells, haueing Scutchions on their breasts and backs. After them marched the Knight of the watch, with his Lieutenant in mourning gownes, and a truncheon in his hand, being followed by his company, in their cassakes haueing tips of blacke cloth vpon their shoulders: in the mid- dle of the said company marched the Ensigne, dragging his colours vpon the ground, being covered with blacke cypres, the drums making a mournfull found, being also covered with blacke. Then followed the Sargents of the Chasteler in long blacke gownes, and square caps, carrying blacke truncheons in their hands, being in number thirty. After them marched the Sargents of the Towne-houfe, on the left hand, and thote of the Chasteler on horsebacke of the right hand. Then followed the Noraries, Commisaries of the quarters, Proctors, and Aduocates of the Chasteler, in order, in their long mourning robes, and square caps, on the right hand: And the Proctors, Deputies, Registres and Bourges of the towne on the left hand, being attired after the same manner. After them marched the Lieutenant D Ciuill of the Chasteler on the right hand, and the Lieutenant Criminall on the left, being followed by the Counsellors of the said Chasteler.

After whom marched the Priests, Curats, and Religious men of most of the chiefe Churches in Paris, singing, and on the left hand went the Vniuersity, that is, the masters of Artes, Licentiats, heads of houses, Regents, Bachelers and Doctors of Physicke, with their scarlet gownes and miter; the Doctors of the cannon and ciuill law, the Doctors of Diuinity of all Orders, the Bedels of the Vniuersity, and the Recto.

Then followed the sworne Messengers, after whom came the master of the Ports, being all in long gownes and hoods. Then came the Pages of the Stable, attired in blacke serge. After whom marched the masters of the Haubois, Flutes, Musick instruments, Trumpers E and Drums covered with blacke, making a dolefull found. Then followed Mounieur De Crequy on the right hand, and Mounieur Del Esquire on the left, being followed by the Captaines, Lieutenants, and Ensignes of the Regiment of the Kings guard. After whom marched the great Prouost of the Kings house on horse-backe, wearing a mourning gowne with a long traine, haueing his Officers of either side him, and followed by his Lieutenants, Ensignes and Archers on foot, in blacke gownes and hoods, and their cassakes vpon them, carrying their Petronells and Halberds vnder their armes.

The Captaine of the port of the Kings house, with his porters, haueing their imbroided cassakes and a mourning hood vpon it, Mounieur De Merolles on the right hand, and Mounieur De Bouillon, with Mounieur De La Bourdesiere his Lieutenant, being followed by the F Captaine of the hundred Suiffes of the body attired in blacke water Chamlet, and round caps of chamlet pleited, their Ensigne being covered with blacke cypres.

After whom followeth Mounieur de La Paluze in the head of the two companies of two hundred Gentlemen of honour, being followed by the two Ensignes, that of the Vidame of Mans on the right hand, and that of Mounieur de La Bourdesiere on the left, all attired in black serge with tips. Then marched the ordinary officers of the Kings house, to the number of an hundred and sixty: and after them came the Musicians, Physicians, Surgeons, Groomes of the Wardrobe, and of the deceased Kings Chamber, euery one apart. The Vicers of the Hall,

Hall, with their heads bare: The Gentlemen Waiters, and Clarke of the Kitchen, on the right hand, on the left hand went the Generalls of the mony, of the aides, and of the Chamber of accounts. After them went eight Trumpets in mourning weeds, their trumpets being covered with blacke cypres. Then came Mounieur de Rhodes master of this Ceremonies, who carried the Kings Penon.

The Chariot of armes covered with a great Paul of blacke Veluet, having a crosse of white satten, being enriched with foure and twenty great Scutchions imbrodered with the armes of France, was drawne by six great coursers, being also covered with blacke veluet downe to the ground with a crosse in the midst of white Satten, guided by two Coach-men attired in blacke Veluet, bare headed, and their hoods off. Then followed Benjamin the rider, carrying the golden spurs: Bethe'se another rider came after him with the Gantlets: Pluine carried after a Scutchion with the armes of France and Nauar, and another Rider carried the coat of armes.

After all these came the first Querrie, who carried the Helmet mantled with purple veluet, Semé Flower-de-Luces of gold, and lined with Ermines, and vpon the Helme was a royall Crowne, all covered with blacke Cypres: all the riders which carried these peeces of honour, were on horse-backe, with long mourning gownes and hoods.

After these marched the Preachers, Confessors and Almoners of the deceased King. Then followed on foot seuentene Archbishops and Bishops, two and two, all with white Miters, and blacke Veluet Copes, after whom marched the Archbishop of Lions alone, and a good distance from the rest. Then went the Ambassadors of Sauoy, Venice and Spaine on horse-backe, in mourning gownes with long traines, euery one being carried by six of their Officers, euery of which Ambassadors was conducted by an Archbishop or a Bishop mounted vpon moyles.

After them came the Popes two Nuncios, the ordinary and the extraordinary, and of either side of them went the Archbishops of Aix and Ambrun, mounted vpon their moyles. Then followed the Cardinals of Ioyeuz and Surdy with their purple Copes and red hats, being also mounted vpon their moyles, and followed by their Officers.

After all these went the horse of honour, all covered with purple Veluet, imbrodered with Flower-de-Luces of gold, and fringed about with gold, the saddle and stirrups were richly gilt; there was nothing to be seene of the horse but the eyes; he was led by either rein by two Squires, being a foot and their hoods on. Of either side of the said horse marched ten Heralds, in mourning gownes and hoods, hauing their coats of armes vpon their gownes imbrodered with Floure-de-Luces of gold.

Then followed the Master of the horse, his horse being all covered with blacke Veluet, and a great crosse of white satten, carrying the royall sword in a scarse, and a scabbard of purple veluet, richly embrodered with Floure-de-Luces of gold.

After him came fourteene Vihers of the Court of Parlement, with wands in their hands, and after them the Presidents and Counsellors in their scarlet robes, being eighty nine in number. After whom went two Vihers of the Chamber with their Maces, E being bare-headed, and then followed the Bishop of Paris, and the Bishop of Angers on his left hand, with their Miters, Surplices and Coapes of blacke veluet. Then followed the Kings Image in the same honour as it was lying in the great Hall at the Louvre, holding in his right hand the Royall scepter, and in his left the hand of Iustice, being carried by the porters of salt in Paris: About which Image went many Presidents and Counsellors of the great Chamber, and the Scottish guard. The ground of the Canopie was of purple cloth of Tissue, all embrodered with Flower-de-Luces, and fringed with gold, the which was carried by the Prouost of Merchants, and the Sherifes of the Citie of Paris.

After which came the Earle of Saint Paul, carrying the Lord Stewards staffe, representing the Earle of Soylons, Lord Steward of France, on the right hand, and the Cheualier of Guise, representing the Duke of Elsquillon, great Chamberlaine, carrying the banner of France on the left hand, being mounted vpon great coursers, covered with blacke Veluet, with crosses of white Satten.

The Prince of Conty marched after them, vpon a little horse all covered, hauing a mourning gowne with a long traine, and vpon it the colour of the Order; his traine was carried vp by seven Gentlemen.

The

A The Earle of Soylons followed him, being also on horse-backe, attired in the like habit, and with the order. After whom came the Dukes of Guise and Elbeuf on horse-back in the same weed, but without the Order: the Duke of Elpermon followed them, in the same mourning attire, and with the Order: and then came the Duke of Montbazon, with the same order and habit; their traines were carried vp by Gentlemen which attended the. Then followed the Vher of the Order, carrying a blacke wand in his hand, being in his mourning gown, and his hoods off. After the Princes & dukes came the Knight of the order on foot, with their collors vpon their mourning gownes, their traines were carried vp by their pages. And then followed a great number of the Nobility, in order two and two: B After whom came the twelve Pages of the Chamber, attired in blacke veluet, & caps. And last of all marched the Capitaines of foure hundred Archers of the Kings guard, with their Ensignes, being followed by all the Archers of the said guards, carrying their armes to the ground, they hauing gownes and hoods. Before they came from the Louvre, there was some difference betwixt some great men, the court of Parliament, and the Scottish guard, but the Queenes wildome and foresight did pacifie all without brute. This is the order which was held from the Louvre to our Ladies Church, the way they went was ouer the new bridge along the Augustines key, and then ouer S. Michaels Bridge, to the new market, and so to our Ladies Church, into the which they entred at nine of the clock 27 night.

The body of the deceased King was set in the middelt of the Quier of the said Church, C vnder a burning Chappell, the which was made of the height of two pikes (it was so called, for that it had an infinite number of wax candles that were continually burning on it.) The Quier of the aforesaid Church was hanged round about with blacke cloth, and in the middelt of the said cloth was a band of veluet, on the which there were fastened Scutchions of the Kings armes, within two foot one of another. The great body of the said Church, was also hung in like manner, and all along were two ranks of waxe tapers, and the same night Euenlong and Vigile for the dead was said. The next day in the morning, being the last day of Iune, the Princes, Cardinals, Noblemen and Officers of the Crowne, the Courte of Parliament, the Conuents, Parishes, and all those that had accompanied the Kings body the day before, came vnto our Ladies Church, about ten of the clocke in the morning, D whereas diuine seruice was said by the Bishop of Paris. After the offering, the Bishop of Seés made the funeral Oration, the which continued a good houre. The seruice being done about two of the clocke in the afternoon, the Princes, Cardinals, Bishops, and all the chiefe men went to dine in the Bishops Palace, and thereabouts, where preparation was made for them. In the meane time the first began to march euery one in his first ranke and order, as they had done the day before, from the Louvre vnto the said Church: they went ouer our Ladies bridge, and so through S. Denis street, and without any stay, vntill they came to S. Denis in France. The streets from our Ladies Church vnto Saint Denis gate were hanged on either side with blacke. Vpon which were fixed the Kings armes, and those of the City, about an elle distant one from the other. The religious men, Curats of E Parishes, with the Fathers, Confessors, Almoners, Bachelers, Regents of the Vniuersity, and Doctors of Diuinity, did accompany the Kings body through the City, in their order, vnto the Church of S. Ladre, which is in S. Denis suburbs, and then most of them retyred, and left the body, the which was accompanied by the whole Court, his Officers, the court of Parliament, the Princes, Dukes, Earles, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Capitaines, Guards, and Archers, and by the Chanoin of our Ladies Church, vnto the crosse which is in the mid-way of S. Denis, where the Prior and Religious men of S. Denis came to receiue the body. There the Priests of all the parishes departed, and the Princes, Cardinals, Bishops, Dukes, Earles, Noblemen, with all the Kings Court, the court of Parliament & Officers, attended the body vnto S. Denis Church, where it was layed vnder a burning Chappell, and there F Vigels and Suffrages said for the dead. The Church of S. Denis was all hanged both body and Quier with blacke cloth, and in the middelt of it there was a large band of blacke veluet, vpon which were Scutchions with the Kings armes fixed. The High Masse was celebrated by the Cardinall of Ioyeuz, and answered in Musike: After the offering, the Bishop of Angers made a funeral Oration. The offices being ended, and the accustomed prayers said, the Master of the Ceremonies tooke vp from the Kings body, the Crowne, the Scepter, and the hand of Iustice, which lay vpon it, and withall the coverings of cloth of gold: Then the Gentlemen Waiters and the Archers carried the body into the vault.

which is before the high Altar of the said Church, vpon the right hand. Then came the Cardinall vnto the vault, and cast earth vpon the body, and the last holy water: which done, he fate downe on the one side of the said vault, by the high Altar, and the Master of the Ceremonies on the other; Betwixt both stood a Herald, who called the Noblemen and Gentlemen, which had caried the peeces of honour, one after one, the which being brought by them, were cast into the vault.

This done, the Earle of Saint Paul stricke the Lord Stewards staffe against the ground, and sayd in a low voice. The King is dead. The King is dead. The King is dead, Pray all vnto God for his soule. Then all fell vpon their knees, with teares in their eyes.

Soone after, the sayd Earle of Saint Paul, tooke his staffe againe, and said God save the King, and then the Herald tooke the word, and cryed out thrice, God save the King Lewis the thirteenth of that name, by the grace of God King of France, and of Nauarre, the most Christian, our most Soueraigne Lord and good Master, to whom God giue a most happy and long life. Which hauing said, the trumpets, drummes, phifes, hautbois and flutes began to sound. After which euery one of the Noblemen and Gentlemen tooke againe the peeces of honour which they had layd into the vault, and the Princes and chiefe of the Nobility were conducted into the great Hall, where the funerall Feast was prepared for their dinner. Euery one hauing dined, the Presidents and Councillors of the Court of Parliament, of the Chamber of Accounts, of Aydes, Generals of the money, Magistrates of the City of Paris, and other officers, came into the said Hall, whereas the Earle of Saint Paul holding his staffe in his hand, made a short speech vnto them touching the Kings death, to whom hee offered his seruice, promising to recommend them vnto the King now reigning, to maintaine them in their offices and estates. And in token that his place was also voyde, he brake his staffe in their presence.

There were many funerall Orations made in diuers parts vpon this lamentable subiect, euery one struing to discouer the griefe of his soule, by the eloquence of his tongue, among which I haue made choice of one, as followeth.

A Funerall discourse, made vpon the death of the deceased King, by the Bishop of Sees chiefe Almoner to the Queene.

MY minde is so oppressed with horror, so wounded with griefe, and so troubled with amazement (be it for the feeling of present things, or the apprehension of future) as I know not what bounds to giue my thoughts in their amazement, nor what Rule to my words in their complaint: being vnable to gouerne the one by the lawes of iudgement, nor the other by those of Rhetoricke.

Shall the miserable point of a vile and base knife, handled by an enraged Monster, inspired rather with a Deuill than a reasonable soule, be hereafter ordained traiterously to murder the greatest Monarches of the earth? and that which the condition of a man should hold most reuerent, as well by the institution of God, as by the consent of nations, shall it hereafter be expolled, not to the fury of some great and fearefull enemy, who by the lawes of his victorious sword, shall barbarously deprime him both of life and state, but to the frenzy of the most abiect and contemptible vagabond, which lurkes among the scumme of the people: so as by wicked persuasions, or by cursed illusions, hee may be drawne to this impious resolution, to giue his life, so as he may take away that of a great Potentate; and to ruine himselfe, so as he may ruine him withall. O lamentable age which doeth behold such accidents! O cursed earth which doeth produce such monsters!

It is almost 21 yeares since our late King Henry the third, after so many great and famous victories: which this Realme owes to the happinesse of his sword, when as the prosperity of his affaires was ready to open him the gates of Paris, being at that time rebelled against his Lawes, and to settle him in the Throne of his fathers, from whence the fury of his people had in a manner dejected him, was miserably slaine in his cabinet, by the villanous knife of an infamous petty humane fury, who to haue access vnto this religious Prince, vfed (as a passport throughout the army) the name and habit of a religious man.

We did not thinke the Sun should euer see the like, as I thinke it had neuer scene, but we did imagine that as this parricide had no president, so it should finde no imitation; but behold

A hold (wretches that we are) at the end of twenty reuolutions of yeares, we find our selues plunged in the same gulfes of sorrowes, and confusion of affaires, that we were them: and by the like accident, and in a manner the like murderer reduced by the blow of a knife, no lesse contemptible then the other, to the like or greater despair, and to more lamentable miseries, our losse being so much the more grievous, as the wife and mild gouernment of our last Prince, with the disposition of the affaires, made his life more necessary for this Estate; and the parricide so much the more detestable, as this good King hauing wronged no man, and receiued so many, but rather bound al the world vnto him by his bounty, and shewed his power rather in pardoning and sauing, then in punishing and destroying: for which reason he should not be hated of any one, but of such (if there be any such) whom good deedes incite to doe ill, and of whom to haue well deserved, is a sufficient subiect to be hated. I pray you what can be obserued in the life of this Prince, where they haue scene his indignation employ the severity of the publike sword to reuenge any priuate injury of his owne? what hath he euer done since his comming to the Crowne, but vanquish and pardon? change by a royall Metamorphosis, with the Charmes of his bounty, his very enemies to faithfull seruants? as well to suppress their hatred by good vifage, as their power by the force of his armes, and by his free confidence to binde the faith of the most faithlesse to serue him, loyally? without doubt I do not finde that euer Prince did equall him in this, whose life doth not rather serue him as a luster to make his glory shine the more, then of comparison to shew any equality. We haue heard him sometimes say that he would make his guards vnecessary, shewing by his words the confidence which the remembrance of his mild actions gaue him. Alas! poore Prince! thou hast done it: thou hast made the care of thy guards fruitlesse; and euen that which thou didst royally want of, we do now lament bitterly: It succeeded ill for thee, for it thou hadst not refused the faithfull seruice of their ordinary assistance, when as the vnhappyneesse of France did seeme to lead thee to that cursed and farall street, the which thy death hath for euer made odious vnto vs, we should rather now haue bene troubled to sing thy victories, then to weepe for thy lamentable death: and rather busied to erect Trophies for thee, then to prepare thee a monument & funerall pompe. But who would not in a manner say that the euents of things which are called contingent and casuall (for that they seeme so to them which know not the motives) are tyed to their first causes, with such chaines of necessity, as it is almost impossible for the wit of man to auoyd them, either by the counsell of any other, or by his owne prouidence? No man is ignorant but that this miserable accident was enigmatically foretold him by the inspection of his particular Horoscope, almost at the same time when it hapned. His most dearest did aduertise him; the most learned in that art besought him to haue a care of himselfe: the mournfull dreame which some few daies before, the Queene his faithfull Spouse had had lying by his side, and awaking suddenly with the terror of her vision, was also a speaking Image of his future misfortune, which should haue serued him as an Oracle to make him more careful of his preferuation, if the courage of this Prince had bene capable of amazement, and if he had had for himselfe the thousand part of the iust feare which did afflicte vs continually. But as nothing can assure a Hare, so nothing can amaze a Lyon. The memory of his royall actions, and the consideration of his mildnesse, whereby he bound all the world to loue him, made all such attempts incredible vnto him. He did rather cast the eye of his thoughts vpon his own bounty, then vpon anothers wickednesse. It was Caesar which would neither giue credit to his wife Spurina, nor to his faithfull Calphurnia, and it seemes he must of necessity imitate his disaster, as he had imitated his clemency and valor: wherefore in our complaints we accuse him to haue procured his owne death by the refusal of his Guards, and in a manner condemning him as culpable, we grow passionate against him for whom we are oppressed with passions: yet in the end, looking with the eyes of iudgment vpon the first Mouer of all our fortunes, who by the ratification of his incomprehensible course, drawes all after him, what resistance sooner they seeme to make, we do presently absolue him of the fauor which in shew hee gaue vnto this detestable Parricide, and accuse only our owne offences, which deserved this punishment, and the tormenting treachery of that infernall monster, whom the vnhappyneesse of this Realme had made choice of, to execute so brutish and barbarous a murder; For as Saint Jerome saith well, Cursed is he who for his vices merits to be the executioner of wicked and fall actions, as by the instrument of cursednesse it selfe.

And what act can be imagined, more wicked, more farall, and more cursed, then trayterously to murder his owne King? His lawfull Prince? His visible God on earth? Who the Soueraign King of Kings hath himselfe anointed by the hand of his Ministers, at the foot of his Altars, to make him as it were the Lieutenant of all his power amongst men, and the humane Image of his diuine Maiesty? But can there be any found so wicked as to make this proposition disputable? Hath it not been decided by the mouth of the Holy Ghost, in the decrees of the Law of Grace? Our Saviour as man, and the son of David, was the true King of Iury, as well as King of the whole world by his diuinity: So as if he had pleased him to re-establish his temporall Kingdome, the Gouernors of Iury had been but his Lieutenants: And yet when he was vniuently accused before Pilate, hee refused not his Iudgement, neither did he tell him that he did vsurpe vpon him (being the true Prince and Magistrate) an vnlawfull and tyrannous power: but he only answered him in milde and respectiue termes, Thou shouldst haue no power over me, if it were not given thee from above. And St. Paul besides the commendement which hee giueth vs to obey our Princes and Lords, although they be bad, hauing by chance offended in words, the High Priests of the Iewes, and being aduertised thereof, he answered, condemning himselfe, Brethren, I did not know that it was the High Priest, for it is written, Thou shalt not speake ill of the Prince of the people. How then? If it be not tollerable to speake ill of our Princes, shall it be lawfull to murder them? And not with the publike sword, which sometimes a generall rebellion of subiects against their Kings, puts into the hand of a furious multitude, but with the dagger or knife of any desperate mad man, who imagining, that he is chosen of God for such an enterprize, wil of his owne motion make himselfe Iudge, Accuser, and Executioner, altogether, of him, whom he should not looke on but with trembling, or at the least with the reuerence which is due vnto the liuely Image of the Monarch of all the world. And I pray you what will be the end, if it be lawfull for euery priuate man, not only to censure the actions, but the very intentions of his Prince, and holding them reprehensible, not before any other tribunall but himselfe, and his owne fancy, to vsurpe in solently a commission to punish him, as if he were some new Iehu, secretly anointed by the hand of a Prophet, to reuenge the sins of Achab, and to raigne in his place? Oh wretched & most cursed are they which by such maxims encourage weak and superstitious foules to such wicked & damnable resolutions, and who vnder a shadow of piety, make them dare things so monstrously impious. But it may be I declaine against an opinion, which is not approved by any one in France, and that his brethren, who they say did sowe it in other countries, and vnder another heaven, like an accursed graine of hell, doe abhor, condemne & detest it. As without all doubt it is detestable, and the booke which seemes to confirme it, worthy to burne the hand of the Author in his owne flame, as a damnable infant which should punish his father for giuing him life. For although he speaks not of any but tyrants, the which doth nothing concerne our Kings, being the true and lawfull and iust Princes of this Estate, yet doth he giue vnder this proposition (most wicked of it selfe) a silent praise of a murtherer liue vnto that which we now lament: And who knows not that to commend an action, is secretly to perwade the like? Moreover, from this Maxime which doth only concerne tyrants, may be drawne most wicked & dangerous conclusions. For if he hold it for certaine that it is lawfull for any man to kill a tyrant, what Prince liuing, how lawfull foucer, can be hereafter assured of his life in the midst of his guards, and in his chair of State. The greatest Monarches do they as soone as they are Kings change their humane and finfull nature into one that is diuine and perfect, and not subiect to sin, and shall they neuer more commit error which may in any sort scandalize their subiects? No, no, they are still men in imperfection, although they seeme Gods in power: neither doth greatnesse, which giues the more meanes to sin, take from them the desire. And will there not be alwaies found, some extravagant spirit in their Prouinces, who censuring their faults, it may bee, more bitterly then he ought, will arraigne them in his fancy, giue them his imaginations for fouereigne Iudges, will conuict them to be tyrants, and as such will seeke to murder them, if hee can come nere them? Yes without doubt, there will be alwaies some one found; And this venemous seed will still find some soyle to make it fructiue, especially if they crowne so desperate an enterprize with praises, if they propound the recompence of an eternall & future life, to those who to execute it, lose the present and mortall life, and yet they call the punishment of such murderers Martyrdome, communicating vnto murderers and Parricides, the

A the glory of Saints, and of the blessed Champions of our faith. Wherefore oh all you Kings and Princes of the earth, which shall hear the report of this horrible afflinare: you haue an interest in this lamentable accident, whether you loue vs, be our enemies, or hold vs indifferent; and the murder of our Prince should fill you with horror and amazement for your selues, there being not any one of you, whom the same knife by which this great Monarch receiued death, doth not threaten with the like aduenture: when as neither the innocency of his life, the glory of his actions, the wonders of his valor, his mildnesse, bounty, freedome, piety, liberality, wisdom, and all other royall vertues, shall not shroud and protect any, against the impious presumption of the like frenzy. For if we shall distinctly measure all the actions of his life, by the particular rule of euery one of the vertues which B Inamed, I assure my selfe that in some he shall be found without equall, in others without a superior, and in all without a second. And to begin by the innocency of his life: I alwaies except those frail and humane sins, which make the most iust culpable before God) can they iustly reproach him, that he hath against reason attempted against the life, honor or goods of any one of his subiects? Did he euer take away any mans wife by force? And hath it euer bene scene that by his incontinency, as by that of many other Princes, the beauty of Ladies hath bene fatal to their husbands? The delights of a goodly house did neuer cost the Masters life: and during his raigne hath there ben found a new Quintus Nereus, or a second Naboth, which haue accused their goodly vines & farmes to be the causes of their death: His greatest chollier and indignation against any one, was it euer C made a crime against them whom he hath most hated? No, no; but contrariwise that royall foule which had nothing in it but courage, seemed to faile in reuenge: and although all offences and seruices did equally touch him, yet had he no memory but for the last. As for his valor, who euer holds it vulgar and ordinary, after so many proofes which he hath giuen within these twenty years, he hath had neither eyes nor eares, or elie make lie and enuy hath made him stop them. France doth proclaim it sufficiently by the eternall memory of so many combats, so many encounters, and so many towncs besieged. We will produce new testimonies, when his own enemies shall cease to confesse it: we will extoll him with new praises, when euen those whom he hath vanquished shall forbear to D preach it: and finally, we will note them particularly, when as Arques, Yury, Fontaine, Françoise, Aumale, Noion, and many other Theaters of his glory, that is, when as mountains, vallies, fields, rampars of the towncs, and in a manner all the corners of France shall cease to witness it. I will say the like of his clemency: for as the fields couered with dead bodies were the proofes of his valor, in like manner, so many towncs preferred from sacke and spoile, during the greatest furie of his victorious armes, are and shall bee for euer the monuments of his mildnesse and bounty. But this needs no more confirmation of proofes then his valour: they are both without contestation, as well as without comparison. His vanquished enemies confesse the one, and his subiects preferred witness the other. The acts of the one haue bene in a manner alwaies signed with blood: the acts of other, haue E bene most commonly with teares of ioy, and pity: as if he had receiued as great pleasure to pardon, as glory to vanquish: and as if to raise vp with an vnarmed hand, an enemy lying prostrate, after the combat, were as royall as to ouerthrow him valiantly with sword in fighting. I know well one action in his life may be noted, wherein his clemency hath as it were suspended her ordinary effects, to giue way to the severity of his iustice: but the griefe which he seemed to haue in his soule, that he could not without danger, extend vpon the accused, the golden rod of his grace, and making compensation of his offences with his seruices, pardon his error, the loue of his valor, doth witness sufficiently that he was forced therunto, by the authority of the Lawes which he desired to see in force by reason of state, which did oppose against his mercy; and by that wise Maxime which faith, that there is nothing more dangerous then to bring a great courage to the place of execution, and then F draw him backe: for that he doth alwaies remember the affront, and forgets the pardon, As for his confidence and trust: Alas! we haue but too many proofes, and I would to God this vertue had not bene so great in him: It is that which hath vndone vs, for that he hath thereby vndone himselfe. We reuerence the memory of all his other perfecti- ons, but doubtlesse we may iustly hate the remembrance and proofes of this. Why way hee not more distrustfull? Why did he not feare like vnto other Princes, who hold that a moderate distrust is one of the parts of wisdom? Did hee thinke to be alwaies with his sword in his hand in the midst of combats, where it is a crime (at the least A for Cæsars) to shew any feare? Not to feare is a great perfection in battels, to assure his owne souldiers, and to strike terror into his enemies: for feare is contrary to all other things: only they which haue it not, may giue much. But yet this vertue, as all other, must be restrained within the center of mediocrity, being equally distant from her extremes. It is as great an error not to feare any thing, as to feare every thing: and without doubt by too much confidence, men are made too bold.

In the meane time we doe not forbear to commend this vertue in him, although we do now complain, for that he did ground it, neither vpon his valour, nor vpon his power neither vpon the care of his seruants, nor vpon the ranks of armes, which did enuiron him hourly: but vpon the only perfection, safeguard and fauour of him, who can preferre the silly sheepe amongst rauenous and deuouring Wolves, and can make Lions stand in feare of Hares. As on a time falling vpon that discourse, and we seeming to wish that he would not so lightly expose himselfe, and that in fearing somewhat more, hee should giue vs lesse subiect to feare. He answered vs with the words of the two and twentieth Psalm. The Lord is the light which guides me, and my health, what should I feare, &c. according to the instruction which he had learned from his infancy.

As for his pietie, the life which he had led from his infancy, being in a manner borne and nurt in armes, was the cause he could not make it so apparent to the sight of the world as it is great and visible to our God. But yet I will say, without flattery, that I did neuer see C warrior, that was more religious: being not ceremonious; who seeking not the outward shew, had more of the effects. Such as did obserue his life and actions more strictly then my selfe, know well, and doe witness it, that he seldome dressed himselfe, before he had humbly made his prayer vpon his knees, sometimes briefly, but yet his zeale did recompence the shortnesse: sometimes with a longer prayer, which did not abate his zeale.

This he did often at night, offering to God by this meanes, the first fruits, and the remainder of the day. For my part, I haue seene him sometimes, Masse being ended, and when as all men were risen, to continue at his prayers vpon his knees, with such signes of true pietie, as I was in a manner ashamed for vs who should haue beene an example to him, and not he to vs. And to say that it was a fained hypocricie, the humor of this Prince far from dissembling, both by nature and custome, would make this slander incredible. I spare to speake of other publike testimonies of his zeale to Christian Religion, for that they are well knowne to all the world; as well those by the which he hath newly raised from his ashes, and more richly endowed many Churches that were ruined; as those by the which he hath caused the standard of the crose to be freely worshipped in Constantinople, & in this Babilon of the Turkish Empire, the perpetuall sacrifice foretold by Malachy, to be celebrated. But I will not conceale that when as he gaue Bishoppicks to such as he held capable, he recommended vnto them with great care the duties of their charges: the pastoral care of their flocks, the preaching of the word of God, an exemplary life, extirpation of abuses, and other holy Episcopall duties, which he said were the onely meanes to ruine heresie insensibly, rather vndermining it secretly than to seeke to beat it downe by open violence. Neither will I conceale how carefull hee was to inquire if any one gone astray were newly returned to the Catholike Church; and how ioyfull hee was to vnderstand that any one of worth had therein followed his example. For although he would not haue any one forced, no more then he could endure to be himselfe, yet hee tooke great delight to vnderstand that reason had done that in any one, which the threats of fire & sword, had attempted in vaine at the massacre of S. Bartholomew: Thinking that the surest means to draw one vnto God, was by the care vnto the heart, and that the sweetnesse of persuasions should be the onely violence.

What shall I say of liberality, the which of all his vertues hath been least recommended in him? Those which haue a hand with the greatest in the government of publike affaires, and especially of the treasure, will be witness with me, that as well in pensions as in free gifts, he gaue really every yeare 300000 pounds sterling, dispersed here and there vpon an infinit number of persons, like vnto the Iewes Manna ouer al the people of Israel. Was not this to giue? What King of France did euer exceed him, howsoever he were repured to be another Alexander in liberality? Without doubt I doe not thinke that there is any Prince or Monarch liuing that can equall him in this bounty.

And

A And why then hath he not bene esteemed for this vertue, as well as for the glory of the rest? It is, as I conceiue, for that an infinite number of men hauing afflicted him in the conquest of his owne Realme, with their meanes, persons, tongues, pens, authority and industry, and finally with all that their condition did permit, and every one imagining that this Prince was bound vnto him for part of his Crowne: the greatest part of them held his free gifts for iust paiments and recompences due vnto them: whereupon many being lesse thankfull vnto him then they ought; and on the other side, many being not recompenced nor rewarded, who notwithstanding held themselves to bee as well deserving as those that were gratified, and by consequence held their good vantage to be a private wrong done vnto them: whereby it happened, that most of them that received, spake not any thing, and such as received not, complained bitterly: whence grew in my opinion that same so contrary to his effects, and that imputation so maliciously repugnant to the truth. But such as would curiously search into the truth, and not vnto that which was spoken, they shall finde, that in this perfection he hath shewed himselfe as it were superior to himselfe, in regard of his other more eminent vertues: At the least in this point hee hath bene superiour to all the Kings now liuing vpon earth.

Also, he neuer had knowledge of any excellent man within his Realme, especially being recommended for the glory of his learning, whom he did not fauour with some honest pension: and the rather if he had a Pen which might make the fame and honour of his acts liue eternally; for as he loued to doe things commendable and praise-worthy, so he desired to be praised. Wherefore such as he found to haue golden Pens, he made their condition to be of gold: neyther had the Vniuersitie of Paris euer a more iust subiect to hope for a reformation, if I may so terme it, of the glory which she hath sometimes had in the world, as she should promise vnto her during his reigne, and by his bounty, by the desire which wee saw him haue to build and enrich great Colledges, whereas Schoollers might be freely taught, and the Schoolemasters haue good entertainment: besides the publike Chaires filled with excellent men, whom with rich conditions he desired to call from all parts of the world.

But in the meane time, alas! so many rare vertues which did shine in him like goodly Starres in their mansions, haue not hindred but that the wretched fortune of France hath found an infernall monster among men, who without any respect of royall Maiesty, had no horror to murder him traiterously, to precipitate at an instant this Estate from the top of glory, greatness, and power, whereunto the wisdom and valour of so great a Monarke had raised it, into a gulle of totall ruine, or at the least into a Chaos of an immortal confusion of affaires. For, what could be lesse expected from so sudden and terrible a clap, but the totall ruine of the body whose head was so miserably taken away, what wisdom longer shine in the discreet moiety, which he hath left behinde him, to hold his place for a time, and to represent him during the minority of the King his Sonne? Certainly it is the iust effect of humane prouidence, that we care it: but in that it happens not, it is the mercy and grace of God: besides the wise government of so vertuous a Queene, and the fidelity of the great Princes of France: But by the wise government of the one, and the royall obedience of the other, both lightened with the beames of a wife and faithfull Councell, this blow which should haue ruined vs all, hath but afflicted vs desperately; and for floods of blood which should haue flowed, the wrath of heauen is contented with streames of teares.

No, no, execrable Fury, who by so detestable a murder, hast brought vs to the brinke of our precepice, vaunt not insolently in hell, that thou hast ruined the Empire of the French, as thou haddest propounded vnto thy selfe, hauing murdered the Father, and the Prince.

F Thou hast indeed shaken it, but in despite of thy impious hope it shall subsist for euer by the assistance of God, great, happy, triumphant, rich, mighty and glorious, alwaies the feare of our enemies, the honour of Europe, the hope of her Allies, the wonder of Strangers, and the protector of the Church, as well as the eldest Sonne. Such as thought (with thee) to see her glory for euer laid in the graue, shall not see it at this time but a little infirme and sicke for griefe, for the death of her father: But after this mourning paine, which habit she weares by thy treachery, she shall resume her former beauty and force, and shall raige as before, either triumphing in war, or flourishing in peace, like vnto those solid solid Triangles which stand right with one point vpwards howsoeuer you turne them. I doe prelaie both by this marke of heavenly fauour, which doth shine like vnto a fortunate star vpon the forehead of our new Prince, and by the incredible tranquillity of the State, which the wisdom and care of the Queene, his vertuous Mother, and our wife Regent, hath made suddenly to succeed the preparatiues of so great and cruell a storme. Wherefore burne more then euer in the eternall flames which torment thee, with an enraged despaire to see thy hopes frustrate, accursed soule that thou art, who diddest promise vnto thy selfe to ruine to great a Kingdome, in ouerthrowing the Pillar of her greatness, and hast executed but one of the two: Our God suffering the one for our finnes, but preferring vs from the other for his glory.

And you, oh wife Princeesse! whose happy wisdom doth in a manner keepe the publike from feeling of this losse, and makes vs iustly to say, That our deceased King liues in our Queene Regent, as not able to dye whilst that you are liuing: Continue, great Armenista, continue as you haue happily begun, to entertaine by good order this great body of the Estate in his disposition and former health; not suffering bad humours to engender for want of precautions, which in the end may cause some burning feuer of sedition. Entertaine this wonderfull calme, which raignes by your conduct vpon the waues of so great a Sea of publike affaires, and of different passions, as they be which wee may imagine should proceede from the flowing & ebbing of so many people, subiect to your obedience, and especially of so many great men which do assit you, who most commonly are caried away with contrary respects. Imagine, I beseech you, imagine that great Monarke (who to raigne elsewhere in a more happy Empire, hath assigned vnto you his Scepter and his Crowne, to the end you should preferre it for the King his Sonne) saies vnto you, as coming from heauen to comfort you in your cares, and to fortifie you in your glorious trauell; My deare Moverie, seeing that death hath separated vs, touching the corporall vnion, it is a great content vnto me, to see thee with such happy successe begin to hold my place in the throne of this Kingdome. I see thee gouerne thy selfe so wisely, as I cannot with more for the good of my Sonne, and my subiects, but that in this part of government thou wilt be alwaies equall vnto thy selfe. Cause the King my Sonne to be bred vp in the loue and feare of God, rather then in all humane sciences, holding it for certaine, that in seruing God humbly, he shall command men absolutely. Do what you can to procure him peace, vntill that a more manlike age shall suffer him to doe that which his infancy doth yet seeme to forbid him, peace gathers treasure together, war dispereth it: and it is no small meane to make a Prince to be feared, and to reaine his neighbours from attempting against him, to bee reputed to haue his Coffers full of gold and silver, as well as his Store-houses full of Armes. Continue this course which I see thee take, not to determine any thing of importance, but in Councell, and to assitt there daily, force the naturall delicacy of thy sex, forgetting in a manner that thou art a woman, to support the trauels of a man bred vp in the toyles of affaires, and to put off the person of a Queene, to assume that of a King. Yet vse a moderation in thy continuall care, and so labour in these royall vocations, as thou maist long labour in them: for thy life is alwaies more necessary for France, then thy daily presence is for the Councell. I haue held great mentied to the yoke of my obedience as much by benefits and good vsage, as themselves are retained by consideration of their duties, and my authority. Perseuer as much as you may to follow my steps in this course, vsing these meanes as a coyne of such price, as for it they giue that which is inestimable, that is to say, life: and remember that thou dost command Frenchmen, that is to say, Freemen, to whom a good countenance serues often for recompence; but yet in the end they fall off, if the field of their hopes brings forth nothing but flowers; his good iudgment which God hath giuen thee, will make thee know (as I see the experience) how far royall greatness should admit of easie access, and the familiarity which the French doe commonly desire of their Prince. For doubtlesse, as too much austerity is the losse of loue, so too much familiarity makes them to neglect respect: vse it then as wisdom shall aduise thee. But about all things seeke by all possible meanes to ease the people, and to haue the lesse subiect to leauy mony, draw thy selfe as little as may be into necessity to spend, to the end, that being first blest of God, and then of men, thou maist reape more happy fruits of the praiers which I make incessantly in heauen, for thy prosperity, for that of my Sonne, and of the whole Realme.

Thinke

A Thinke I say Madam, that this great Prince doth sometimes in your dreame make such or the like exhortations vnto you. Although it be a rashnesse in vs to presume to put you in minde by fained words and conception, of one part of that which either the oracle of his mouth, or the wise discourses of your excellent spirit doth speake vnto your thoughts.

But pardon (if it please you) our zeale, which makes vs erre by a desire of well doing, and that falling vpon the lamentable subiect to witness the vertues, greatness, and glory of that incomparable Monarch, we had rather flammer then be silent, and rather faile in the lawes of discretion, then in those of affection. I haue receiued from his grace and liberality; and partly by your intercession, the liuing, and Ecclesiasticall dignities which I enioy: his bounty did esteeme my writings much about their merit: and his greatness did not disdain to looke vpon me sometime with a good eye: how then could my remembrance moderate my words in blessing him, or my teares in lamenting him? Without doubt I haue as great cause to weepe for him as any man of my profession, if complaints should be proportionable to the losse which is made: but I protest it is not my owne private interest that makes me thus bitterly to lament him, so much as the consideration of the generall harme, which not only France, but all Europe sustained by this lamentable losse.

And therefore when as to performe the general offices of our duty, we entered into the Chamber where as his body lay pitiuously in the Hearse that did inuiron him, me thought that all the walles of his Palace, yea all the vallies and fields thereofabouts, should accompany with their sad accents, the sound of our mournfull songs, and that all the holy-water wherewith we did sprinkle the foot of his mortuary sheet, should bee composed of our teares. For we haue not onely lost a good King but a good Master, and not onely a good Master but a good Father, whose remembrance is vnto our hearts, as myrrh is vnto bodies which it imbalmes, incorruptible, but wonderful bitter. Alas, how can it be bitter vnto vs, seeing it puts vs in minde of his name, which was so sweet: seeing that putting vs in minde of his perfections, and making vs to see how necessary he was for vs, it doth shew vs by consequence how miserable we are to haue lost him, conuerting by these meanes his vertues into sorrow, his happinesse into despaire, and his owne good deeds into sad subiects of complaints, not suffering vs to remember them, or binding vs to sigh for them? No, no, it is not possible but for such to whom his vertues were indifferent (if there bee any such vpon the earth) to remember them without teares, either of eies or heart: it is in vaine in this case to object constancy, and the lawes of reason: Constancy may in other subiects be a vertue, but in this I hold it for a vice, at the least an infirmity: the reasons which I should admit in other accidents, should seeme to me in these vnreasonable Paradoxes, & the consolations which I should hold in other losses for moral sentences, should appeare vnto me in this case blasphemies. For what can be said vnto vs herein, to comfort and fortifie vs against sorrow, the which hath not already represented it selfe in our thoughts without fruit? VVhat, that he was mortal like to other men? It is true, but that is one of the subiects of our complaints. For the good of France required that he had beene immortal. VVhat, that we must will what the destinies decree? It is force perforce, but this necessity doth not mollifie our griefe. VVhat, that tears and sighs cannot recall him againe? Alas, I know it well: but it is that which makes vs lament more bitterly. For if teares and sighs could recall him to life, it is long since wee had wept no more: It is long since he had returned into the possession of the light, and had been no longer deperied, but whilst the brute of his death was disperied ouer the Country. Are these the considerations wherewith they thinke suddenly to appeale to sensible a griefe of ours? doe they thinke with such admonitions instantly to drye vp the iust and pittifull teares of poore Orphans, the which they shed for the death of their father miserably murdered before their eyes? Thinke they, that for such reasons poore and desolate seruants lamenting the death of their Master and Protector, should suddenly stop their mouths to all complaints? No, no, these petty reasons do not cure the griefe, but of mindes which are not greatly sicke. Euen so we cannot approach neare vnto his royall Hearse to wish him eternall rest, but in making our prayers at his feet, we do not feele our hearts as it were diuided in two by the knife of sorrow, and that after we haue cursed the brutish boldnesse of that vile Parricide, which hath so wickedly caused his body to be conuerted into dust, as well as our eyes into teares, we do not say vnto him in casting holy water, the word wherewith I will end this miserable discourse: Farewell great Prince, farewell good Master, farewell our Sword, farewell our Buckler, farewell our glory: the rest which thou hast purchased for vs upon earth, may be restored vnto thee in heauen, with an eternall rest for thy soule. And neuer may it happen, that our ingratefull memory may cease to remember with blessing and praises, although it bee with teares and sighs, the name of Great Henry the fourth, King of France and Nauarre, the hope of learning, and the glory of Armes.

Duke of Elpion
non leizeth vpon the Citadell
of Metz.

The Duke of Elpion did cunningly seize vpon the Citadell of Metz, by an example of most dangerous consequence, expelling Monsieur d'Archieu, to whom the deceased King had given it in charge. The Governour hauing notice, that some Captaines and other creatures of the Duke of Elpions, had an enterprize to seize vpon the Citadell, he put them out of it. Whereupon the Duke complained to the Queene, and entreated her to send for the Governour, to give an account of that which he had done: who hauing receiued her Maiesties letters, hee presently tooke his way towards the Court. As soone as he was gone out of Metz, the Dukes friends and seruants seized on the Citadell for him. Many did wonder at the Queenes patience, that she would suffer her authority to be so abused in this manner, yet no man opposed himselfe.

Refists helles to be incorporate in the Vniuersity
of Paris.

The Iesuits since their reuocation some seuen or eight yeares since, had laboured by all meanes possible to be incorporate into the Vniuersity of Paris, and to haue free liberty to open their schoole, and to this end they had built a house for their Nouices in the Suburbs of S. Germaine; the which is so great as a little towne may stand within the compasse of the walls. The Vniuersity of Paris opposed it selfe against them in this demand, and the deceased King in his life time (at the instance of the Vniuersity) would not yeeld vnto it. After whose death, the Iesuits, through the fauour of the Queene Regent, and some Noblemen, began their pursuit more hotly then before. The Vniuersity still opposing, it grew to be a question in law, and was brought before the Court of Parliament: during which contention, the Vniuersity presented this petition vnto the Queene Regent.

To the Queene Regent, the Princes of the blood, and the Lords of the Councell.

Petition made by the Vniuersity
of Paris.

MADAM, The Vniuersity of Paris most humbly shewes vnto your Maiesty, that the Doctrine of murdering of Kings by Assassins, who through deuotion vow themselves to death, as to a martyrdom, pleasing vnto God, is a pestilent infection neuer scene nor read of in all the Records of Antiquity: neither Pagans nor Christians euer knew it. Among the Mahometans, onely one, called, The old man of the Mountain, had put it in practice: but the rest of that Sect did presently suppress it, and neuer since haue they vsed it, although their hatred against Christian Kings is nothing decreased. Onely within these threecore yeares this infection hath crept into Christendome, and hath bene practised in England and France: we say in England, for that in respect of ciuill and temporall obedience, due to Kings, and for the safety of their persons, all Christian Kings, Pagans, Heretikes, Idolaters, Infidells, excommunicates, and Apostates, are holy and sacred vnto vs, as the Apostles, the ancient Christian Church, and the example of the Saints in Paradise, which haue bene Prelates and Bishops in France, doe teach. This hellish position vpon another erroneous doctrine, which is the Popes supremacy, whom we acknowledge head of the Church, as our Ancestors haue done. The doctrine of this Supream power is not found in the writings of the Diuines of Paris, nor in the boosome of the Vniuersity, but in the Sermons and writings of Iesuits, and in the answers of murderers when they are examined by their Iudges. Their owne words doe verifie it. Parry (who undertooke to kill the Queene of England) said, that he might lawfully doe it, for that she was excommunicate by the Pope, and therefore her life was abandoned. Catesby, the attempter of that Powder-treason, which should haue blowne vp the King, the Queene, their Children, and the States of England, maintained, that this enterprife was holy: For, seeing that Clement the eight had by two Briefes forbidden the Catholikes to receiue him, by a greater reason being receiued, hee would haue him made away.

John Chastell said, that it was meritorious to kill the deceased King, for that notwithstanding

A standing the Bishops of France had receiued him into the Church, yet was hee not in it, the Pope hauing not admitted him. Rauillac the last Murderer said, That the King made war contrary to the Popes liking, That God was the Pope, and the Pope was God, by these words; Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke, &c. Hereupon the Bishop of Clermont, one of their Disciples, failed nor, after the execution of the Particide, to come to the Sorbonne, according to the custome of our Ancestors, to condemne this doctrine of murderers: where going from forme to forme before the Doctors were set, he aduised them to be careful what they did: Ton haue here (said he) two Nuncios from the Pope. And the Company being set, he gaue his opinion, That the matter then in question had bene diuersly handled, and that it was necessary to speake vnto the Nuncios, who would write vnto the Pope, as if Kings might not liue but at the Popes pleasure. After that many good Preachers of this Vniuersity had detested the murderers of Kings, and the fauourers of this doctrine; in the end P. Cotton presented a letter declaratory vnto your Maiesty, of the Iesuits doctrine vpon this subiect, whereby he seeks to giue satisfaction to such as complaine, that their writings doe too much maintaine these three approaching doctrines; the Popes supream power, and thereon depending rebellion against Kings, and abandoning of their liues, when as such men shall hold them to be Tyrants.

Many men of vnderstanding are well acquainted with their equiuocations and fallacies, wherewith they hide their wicked doctrine: according to the practice whereof, that Sect doth make profession by Treaties allowed by their Generall, as may be scene in the Apologie of Henry Garnet, in the Chapter of Equiuocations: we should be loath to discover them, and to hinder the course of their false coyn, if any good might grow thereby. But seeing by the merit of their fallacies, that Sect will gaine that aduantage ouer vs, as to instruct youth in the Vniuersity of Paris, contrary to the constant and determinate will of the deceased King: This Vniuersity, the daughter of the Kings of France, should hold her selfe guilty of infidelity, if she should not lay open vnto you their deceits, and be an humble suitor vnto your Maiesty, not to suffer this daughter, so loyal vnto her Soueraignes (so long as she is kept from forcing or corruption to be infected with the company of a Sect which hath bene found so dangerous to our Kings. He tels you (Madame) D that the Authors of this Order say, We may not kill a Tyrant; but the Authors produced by him, and especially Valentia, their last great Doctor, addes a limitation: if it bee not (saith he, by publicke judgment. And to the end you should not doubt of this publicke authority, he afterwards sets downe articles of their doctrine ouer the authority of Kings, in this manner: That a Monarchy is the best kinde of government: that the Pope is Monarch in the Church, touching the spirituall government, and the King in his Realm for the temporall: not meaning the King should be King in his Realme, vnlesse the Pope be Monarch, and haue absolute power in the spirituall government of the Church. But (Madame) it is directly opposit to the doctrine of the Church, the which your Vniuersity of Paris hath alwaies maintained, that the Pope hath the power of a Monarch in the Church: for these be things contrary, that the Councell is aboue the Pope (as your Vniuersity hath alwaies held) and that the Pope is absolute Monarch of the Church. This doctrine of your Vniuersity, if it were euer necessary, it is now more then euer, both for the King, and all the Kingdomes of Christendome.

What be the effects of this absolute spirituall Monarchy? He tels you plainly in another booke which he presents vnto your Maiesty, and to the Princes and Noblemen of the Kings Councell. It is at the end of the second Tome of his Institutions, in the 35 Question, where he saith; That the Pope hath not absolute power to take & giue Kings Crowns and Kingdomes. All his fallacy consists in this word (absolute) for he saith, That he hath power to giue and take away the goods of your Subiects, but onely by way of Iustice. So P. Cotton a little after, affirms, That the Pope by vertue of his spirituall government, and for the coniuunction of Religion and State, of the Spirituall and Temporall, may by vertue of his censures dispoise of the Crownes of Kings: For Religion, she Service of God, the good of the Church, and for the saluation of Soules. This doctrine is not particular to him alone, but common to all his Society. This doctrine of coniuunction which hee saies is betwix Religion and the State, the spirituall and temporall, is contrary to the doctrine of our Lord Iesus Christ, who hath for euer made a great separation betwix Religion and State, saying; Yeeld vnto God that which is Gods; that is, Religion: and to Caesar that that which is Cæsars, that is, ciuill and temporall obedience, honour, seruice, and tribute. A Madam, your Vniuersity of Paris hath alwaies taught it thus, holding with the ancient Councells, and reiecting the new, in that they haue oppugned the wholesome doctrine, wherein our Kings, the Bishops of France, the Courts of Parliament, the Kings Councell, the French Doctors, and your Vniuersitie haue alwaies maintained, That the liberty of the French Church, and of the Realme of France consisted. It is no question of small importance: it concerns the Kings Estate, whereof these men affirme, the Pope may deprime him: these men (I say) to whom at this day they commit the instruction of youth in all towne: the consciences of people in confessions, and the teaching of all in general: The Kings life and your Maiesties is also in danger: for when hee hath deprime a Prince of his right of gouernment, they hold him for a Tyrant, which vsurpes an Estate against the iudgment of this publike authority, which may by the Iesuites doctrine make of a King a Tyrant: yea, they maintaine, That Subjects may rebell against their Prince, although he be not excommunicate, if they beleue, that for feare of his greatnesse they dare not doe it. This is the decision of the Iesuite Suarez, who thereby brings the Estate and life of all great Princes into danger. Such is also the practice of some murderers of Kings; men which acknowledge the Popes supream power, taught by the Iesuites, and beleue no other, but so farre forth as it shall please the Pope. And this plainly was the practice of the last Parricide, as it did appeare by his execrable discourse with the Diuines which were sent vnto him, to whom he shewed himself perfectly instructed in all the shifts and fallacies which Sophistry could vie of that subiect, whereas otherwise hee was very ignorant of all other knowledge and learning.

We doubt not, Madam, but the Pope, being well aduised would performe his duty, in damming (by his Bulles) such Murtherers and Assassins to the paines of hell, and causing (as he may with a word) these great mischiefs to cease, which cast a shame and reproach vpon the innocency of Christian Religion. For hitherto the power of such men at Rome, hath giuen some men occasion to say; That hee which doth not hinder nor prevent crimes committed by them, ouer whom hee hath all power, and whom hee may restrain by so easie a censure, he himselfe is the author, as the rules of iustice do teach.

The pretext which P. Cotton takes from the good of the Church, to giue power vnto the Pope to take away and giue Crownes is a counterfeite colour: for the same separation which our Lord Iesus Christ hath for euer made betwixt Religion & State, throughout the whole world, where he will haue his Gospel preached, we are bound (notwithstanding all Ecclesiasticall Censures, Interdictions, dispensations from the oath of Allegiance, or commandments from the Pope) not to take armes against our Kings, but to yeeld them all ciuill and temporall obedience, and to expose our liues for the defence of theirs. This is the Law of Nature, written in the hearts of men when they came into the world, the which the Sonne of God, taking our flesh vpon him, hath since confirmed, binding Christians more strictly then Pagans, who were led by the only instinct of Nature: and Priests more then Lay men, whom they should instruct in this holy doctrine, both by word & example. And much more Bishops then Priests, and most of all the first Bishop, for that his example to Christians should be of more force then all other Pastors of the Church.

And the King of Great Britaine, to warrant himselfe against these murtherers, was forced to require an Oath of Allegiance from his Subjects, for his ciuill and temporall obedience, and for the safety of his life, notwithstanding all Popish censures. An oath which the doctrine & practice of murtherers makes necessary at this day through all Christendome, to assure the Estates and liues of the Anointed of God, and to free the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, to all Kings and Princes, of that blame and hatred which this pestilent doctrine hath procured it. And to make it more fauoured with those Princes which hold a different religion. But this holy doctrine is more necessary in France, then in any other country, seeing the effects of the contrary fall chiefly vpon the life of our Kings, and the Crowne of France; and more in the minority of our King, then in his full age: this false doctrine should be refused, and the sauourers thereof reiectied, for that the practice of former ages hath euer taught vs, that when they will employ their censures against the temporall gouernment of Kings, they excommunicate the weakest.

For these causes, Madam, the Vniuersity of Paris, daughter to the Kings of France, doth most humbly beseech your Maiesty, and you my Lords the Princes & Noblemen of the Councell

A Councell, not to suffer the Iesuits, holding a doctrine of the Popes supream power ouer the Estates and liues of Kings, contrary to the doctrine which the Vniuersity hath alwaies maintained, to instruct you in Paris, much lesse to be incorporate in the Vniuersity, to make the doctrine and manners thereof as repugnant to the Estates of Kings, as their sect is, as may appeare by the writings of Peter Cotton, dedicated to your Maiesty, and deliuered daily in their name; and by the experience which is made in many parts of Christendome. And the Vniuersity shall pray for the preferuation and prosperity of the King, your Maiesty, and of you my Lords the Princes and Noblemen of the Kings Councell.

Afterwards the Iesuits presented a petition vnto the Court of Parliament, requiring that they might be rectiued into the body of the Sorbonne: whereupon it was answered, Let it be signified: At this signification the Sorbonne consented, so as they would submit. They demanded interpretation of that word, whereunto it was told them, that they must be subiect to the Rector, and to all the Statutes of the Vniuersity. But the decision of this cause was remitted to the opening of the Court againe at Saint Martins.

In Iuly the Court of Parliament amerced the Bishop of Paris in a pecuniary fine, for that rashly, and to the preiudice and dishonour of the sayd Court, he had past before them at the Funerals of the deceased King. This small formality bred bad blood, and many were amazed to see the Queene, and much more the Earle of Soissons to affect any party in this contention, especially against the Court of Parliament, who had bene so officious to them.

Hereupon (and it may be vpon some lighter cause) factions beganne to grow among the great men. The Earle of Soissons, the Duke of Elpernon, the Chancellor, Villeroy, and the Iesuits made one party: The Dukes of Bouillon, Sully, and Rohan, Des Digniers, with the Court of Parliament were the other. A strange alteration in Court, a strange mystery of State, being supported and assisted by the House of Guise. The Prince of Conde had written to them of this party, and especially to the Duke of Bouillon, that he would be wholly gouerned by their Councell, and by the first President. Monsieur de Barraut had bene sent to Brussels to hasten his departure. This cloud of factions being risen, it threatened a forme of combustions, considering the contrariety of humours of the Princes and Noblemen, and the incompatibility of their quarrels, vnder the government of a woman. There was then no speech but of parties and factions, and such as obscured the humour of the French, and the liberty of the present time, thought they could not be long in forme, before they entred into action. Whereupon they did renew and augment the Capitaines in all the quarters and ports of Paris, who tooke the oath of Allegiance to the King and Queene.

All the houses were visited, and commandement giuen them to be armed: all idle persons were commanded to depart, and the Guards at the Loure doubled. This grew vpon certaine threats, secret practices, and brutes of bad presage against them of the Religion. In the heat of these alterations, such as hated the Huguenots sought to trie the Peoples affections: But they answered; That if they wished ill to them of the Religion, they should doe it themselves, as for their parts they would not bring the publike quiet into danger. During these broiles, the Prince of Conde arriued at Paris, much more glorious in his returne, then at his departure. He entred into Paris, being accompanied with about 1500 horse, where were all the Nobility of the Court, and most of the Princes, which had gone forth to meet him. Among others, the Duke of Bouillon went vnto the frontiers: all good men hoped for much by his presence, to ballance the affaires betwixt these new parties. He came directly to the Loure, where hee was very well received by the Queene, who in testimony of her fauour, presented him with a goodly house in Saint Germaines suburbs, build by Gondy an Italian, and a rich cupboard of plate.

F But his comming did not pacifie these alarmes at Paris: it was daily feared there would haue bene some tragedy among the great men: which caused the Prince of Conde and the Dukes of Guise and Bouillon to keep guards in their houses two nights together, vpon some apparant aduice that they would force their lodgings. But it was the will of God to disperse this cloud: so as amidst these brutes all things continued quiet and peaceable, the people seeming to haue no will to stirre: for in effect all the Commonalties and Townes of the Realme in general, were not onely resolu'd to obedience, but so bonded to peace, as if any one should haue sought to yndermine it, it was thought he should not find any one retreat. These were the workes of God, and some fruits of their former follies. The carriage and power of the Duke of Epemnon were the chiefe causes of all these broyles and distruft, hauing foure thousand men of the Kings guard in the suburbs at his deuotion, being their Colonell, wherewith he did fortifie himselfe as he pleased. They of the Religion had their part in this feare, yet they continued their exercise, relying wholly vpon the assurance which the Queene had giuen them: who also assured the Noblemen of their protection, contenting them with great pensions, and other aduancements. The Earle of Fuentres made great preparatiues at Milan for warre, which put the Duke of Sauoy into a great alarme, but especially they of Geneva, who feared them both: whereupon they did sent for Monsieur de la Noue, being at Pontz, who went vnto them with leaue: they did assure both the one and the other from the Court as much as might bee, and they confirmed to the Duke of Sauoy the marriage of the Lady Elizabeth for his eldest son, with a dowry of 300000 crownes, and some small Seignurie during her life.

The Queene being settled in the Regency by a free consent of the whole State, Monsieur Pasquier, one of the Masters of Requests, a man of great learning and iudgement, did write a discourse of aduice vnto her, touching the preferaation of the State, during the minority of the King her sonne, in these termes:

¶ First

of the King.

M Adam: it is the worke of a discreet Pilot to prouide for an approaching storme during a still calme, and to foresee the remedie before the danger, or if he be surpris'd with the tempest, to oppose himselfe courageously against the fury of the waues and winds, to bring his ship to a safe port. Euen so should you during the calme wherein we are, think of all alterations which may grow both within and without the Realme, and to prouide a sic cure to hinder their course, and to oppose your selfe resolutely against their attempts: that would trouble this State, to preserve it from apparant shipwracke: whereunto it may fall, if the helme be not rightly governed. Whereupon I haue thought it my duty, to a King, and a part of those that are within this Ship, to contribute this my Discourse, which I most humbly beseech your Maiesty to receiue with the like deuotion, as it is presented.

We haue the King your Sonne very young, who is our lawfull Lord, nor giuen vs by chance, but ordained, yea pre-ordained of God, by a continuall succession, descent, and generation of Kings, receiued, nourished, and bred vp amongst vs. The first care you ought to haue of him, concernes his education, and breeding vp in good manners: for according to the good impressions he shall receiue in his tender age, hee will continue to the end; if bad, they will not endure the touch, but will soone change.

You must cause him to be bred vp in the feare of God, not with a partiall hand, which must be liuely printed in his soule, that it may be a bridle vnto him; to keep him in the ordinary course of reason. Let vs adde what wee please of humane wisdom to our opinions, they but are follies. Yet precipitations of our greatnesse, if the honour of God be not our guide. Wherefore this holy obiect must be a lesseon vnto him, whercon he must daily feed in this tender age, else all your designs in the conduct and direction of his life, will be built vpon sand.

This feare of God being grauen in his heart, he must withall be personall taught, that one of the first motions of a great King, consists in the obseruation of iustice, whereof he is a debter to his subjects, the assured ground of his Estate: the which he must be taught to see visibly, by the examples of happy success, which haue accompanied those who reigning iustly, haue maintained their subjects in all obedience. On the other side (the which God forbid) that he which holds another course of life, leaues not his Crowne to his posterity. Let him vnderstand that this Iustice must be distributed with an equal proportion (I meane according to their merits) to all his subjects, both great and small, and punish such (seuerely as abuse their greatnesse to the prejudice of the weaker sort): a severity which will purchase him much loue with the people: but also to recompence this rigor he must be mild, affable, and gracious to such as haue the losse of to beabout him. A good countenance, and an embrace of our King, to the Princes, Noblemen, and others of what quality soeuer, do nook commonly carry a generall discharge for all the bonds which they thinke he owes them. These proportions well mingled will produce another of no lesse worth, which is, that although he haue supreme power within his Realme, and that the common sort of Courtiers hold his will to be a Law, yet he will iudge by an instinct of Nature,

A Nature, that it is not meant of all that he will or may, but onely of that which hee ought iustly to will. For the law is made to giue perfection to the thing for the which it is made, and not to satisfy a disordered appetite. The King must in this case set a strong barre betwixt him and his opinion, lest he take for his deuiue, That which I will, is iust; but rather, I will it, for that it is iust. This maxime will frame in him the law of reason, not written in paper, but grauen in his heart, which will keep him company day & night; it will aduertise him & aduise him in all places & at all times, after what manner he should gouerne his subjects with iudgement. Any Prince that hath suffered himselfe to be transported with his owne passions, in doing that which hee ought not, there often happens that vnto him which he would not: and about all things he must haue a continuall care, not to make a difference and separation betwixt the affaires of State and those of God, who must bee the first and last end of his actions. You must accustom him in his young yeares, to haue an exact and diligent care of affaires, wherein he must be instructed as he growes, to the end that being thus framed, and coming to riper yeares, labor may be but a pastime to him: the maisters eye makes the field fertile, and the horse fat; so the knowledge which the Prince takes of his affaires, makes that his Councillors doe not gouerne them at their pleasures. Breed him vp, not in prodigality, but in a wise liberality, worthy of a great King: represent still vnto him, the knowing well how to vse this vertue: and how, where, and when it is necessary, his bounty will redound vnto himselfe, and the more hee shall giue, the more hee shall reape.

If you desire that he shall first please God, and then the people, let him wholly direct his heart to clemency, whereof he hath an admirable precedent before his eyes, by the memory of the deceased King his father, your honoured Lord and royal husband. It is a great wisdom, and fit for a great spirit, to winke (when occasion serues) at offences which are done vnto him, hauing so great a power, who may reuenge the least without controll. These be the vertues which our King should seeke in his tender age which will grow with him, and will by little and little so encrease, as they will one day make him reputed the true father of the people.

And for that in a publike fountaine the common interest is, that no man cast any filth into it: euen so, that no dishonest thing should fall into our King, the generall Spring of all his people: wherefore there must be a carefull regard had, when he enters into that heat of youth, that he suffer not his will to run head-long to voluptuousnesse, and that hauing power to doe what he please, he doth not that which hee ought not: for that the way of liberty to great vices is so easie and sweet, as it is almost insensible. For this cause, you must teach him in time, what honour and reputation he shall reape by a continent youth; and contrariwise how that God will be highly offended, if he abuse his supreme power in vnchastity. Although that all vices be naturally odious vnto God in all persons, yet is it more particularly in a Prince, for that he doth not so much offend in himselfe, as in his example. Cursed is he which glories in that which he should punish in another. An iniurie done to a priuate man, breeds in his soule such a liuely resolution of reuenge, as oftentimes it tends to the ruine and vtter desolation of an Estate.

You shall let him know the miserable effects of Couetousnesse, which produceth nothing of it selfe but a contempt of God, with an absolute will to make all things veniall, to the ruine of a King and his people. The object of vnlimited auarice in a King, giues great lustre to prodigality, which was held prodigious in another Prince. About all, if his natural inclination carries him to violent things, he may be withdrawne, letting him see, that cruelty is vnworthy of so mild a spirit as that of a King ought to be, and that the Prince which is infected therewith, hath nothing of a man but the shape. It is a vice much to be feared in a King, for it is in him as couetousnesse in old men, which encreaseth continually without any hope of decrease.

These are in effect the vices whereof a King should be free. These vertues and these vices will shew that there is not any thing so available for the generall profit and publike commodity of an Estate and Common-wealth, as a good Prince, nor any thing so hurtfull as a bad and vicious.

Hauing provided for that which concerneth our Kings person, wee must passe to that which belongs to his Estate. In this first encounter of affaires, that which you should haue in greatest recommendation, is the vnion of the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, great Vnion.

1610 " Noblemen, and then the people. When all shall be well vnited, there shall not be any King A
" or Prince, how mighty fouer, that shall dare to attempt against this Estate without his " vndoubted ruine.

" Vnion is your strength, Diuision your weaknesse. Vnion maintaines and preserues E.
" states in their greatnesse, Diuision vndermines and ruines them, without hope euer to rise
" againe. That King of Egypt meaning to teach his children the force of Vnion, and the " weaknesse of Dilcord, represented vnto them a bundle of arrowes, which they could not " breake being tyed together, but diuided, there was nothing more easie. This Estate is like
" vnto mans body, the which liues long by the accord and harmony of the foure humours:
" but when as any of these qualities seeks to command ouer the rest, the body falls into dis- B
" cases, and lo dyes. It is euen so of this Estate, if by your iudgement and wisdom you re" duce both great and small to one will, the same intention and the same desire to maintaine
" the Estate vnder the Kings obedience: you shall make it the feare and terrour of her ene" mies. But if the parts of the body be once dis-membred, if this perfect Vnion and corref-
" pondency of all the members doe not subsist by a mutuall and reciprocall entertainment,
" the corruption and desolation of the Estate will follow.

" To entertaine Vnion, let Princes and great men be called to Councel, in matters which
" concerne the State, and the greater they are by extraction of birth, the more precedence
" and prerogative should be given them, both in regard of the memory of their ancestors, C
" and of their owne vertues. From the greater, defend to them that hold the second and " the third ranks; and then vnto the meane, and so reward euery one according to his mer" it, with the charges and dignities of the Realme. It is one of the chiefe meanes to main-
" taine this Estate. But in this distribution of charges, flattery, false reports, malice or enuy,
" must not be admitted, lest they abuse you with false apparances.

" The most wholesome and best aduice will come from the common voice of the peo" ple. I speake of the Clergy, where are the wisest and most learned of France: of the No" bility, whereon depends the force, and of the third Estate intermixt with a great number of " vertuous and learned men.

Care of the Church.

" It is not sufficient to haue provided for the vnion of great men: but it is to be feared that " God will giue way vnto his fury, being wonderfully incensed against vs, for the great A
" buscs & manifold disorders which are committed as well in the Ministry of the Church
" as in the administration of Iustice. To pacifie him, and to diuert his wrath and indigna" tion, name men that are learned, and of a holy and vndeiled life, to spirituall liuings, who " may according to the duty of their charges, and the Kings Edicts, keepe residence at their " Benefices, to edifie their flocks: For there is not any thing that doth so much moue the " wrath of God, as to see his Churches prophaned, and to fall into the hands of such as are
" vowed to the temporall seruice of the Prince, and not of the spirituall. Whensoever it " hath bene practised, it is a certaine demonstration of the alteration and change of an E" state, and of their misery and disgrace which abuse it licenciously, whose affaires alwayes " decline euen vnto their ends.

Iustice to be obserued.

" Aduaunce men of knowledge, merit, and discretion, to places of Iustice: who may bee
" knowne and approued to be vertuous, louers of the publike weale, and not giuen to auar-
" rice. Doe nothing against iustice: take away the abuses which are committed through fa-
" uour and surpise in Euocations and Abolitions: cause the Royall ordinances to be obser-
" ued in euery point, without any alteration, and leaue suits to their ordinary formes in " law, not causing them to be iudged by Commissioner: Breake not the authority of the " holy lawes, let not their vertue be in paper, but in effect: for men will iudge of your boun" ty as they shall find your inclination to the obseruation or breach of the lawes. If you rye
" your selfe to maintaine them, you yeeld vnto the people that which you owe them: and " contrariwise, if you breake them, you deprive the people of that which you are bound to F " distribute vnto them, which be the cause of infinite miseries to the King and his subiects. Let " Iustice be equally and without partiality distributed.

" As in mans body nature imparts to euery member as much nourishment as is needfull,
" not suffering one to vsurpe any thing of another of the common nutriment: Euen so
" ought you with the like balance maintaine the Kings subiects, foreseeing that the sub" stance of one passe not to another, to the end that the whole body bee maintained with " equality. Remember that the meane within the Realme, is the Kings subiects, as well
" as

A as the mightiest: and therefore you owe him, in the place which you hold, the like iustice, A
" See that the aduancement of one may not be the disgrace of another. And consider that " the least haire makes his shadow against the Sunne-beames, and that the lustre of your au" thority which consists in iustice, will decay, when it shall not be vniuersall, to giue vnto
" euery one that which belongs vnto him: For this effect, giue care to all men: for notwith-
" standing that you are raised to this honor, yet must you with the like clemencie relieue the poore
" and the rich which come to be suitors to your Maiesty, to the end that euery one in the " time of his affliction may haue recourse vnto your bounty, fauour, and protection, to haue
" reliefe and succour. Remember, that God is about you, and as you shew your selfe in fa-
" uourable clemency vnto the people, so will hee bee vnto you: it were better to heare no " complaints, then hauing heard them to giue no ease vnto the complainants. And about all,
" Madame, remember, if it please you, that the Courts of Parliament, and other Soeraigne
" Courts, in their iurisdiccions are the fundamentall parts of the State, by the which our " Kings haue happily continued their Realme from father to sonne vnto this day. Where" fore you must haue a principall care to support these companies, and thinke that they are " the chiefe armes by the which during the minority of our King, his Maiesty and yours shal
" be wonderfully preserued against all those, that flattering themselves with their owne am" bition, shall make any attempt: the which I humbly beseech God may not happen.

Next to this, you must prouide for the generall and too true complaints of the vexa-
" cation of the people, by innouations, tributes, creations of offices, parties, and other like mis-
" chiefs, by the which in promising to re-vnite the reuenues of the Crowne, they doe a" lienate the peoples hearts, which is the Kings chiefe treasure. Wherefore by your wife-
" dome and gouernment, you shall iudge whether it be not needfull to ease them, if not of " all, yet at the least of a good part of these new impositions. And especially to abolish
" together that party so preiudiciall, which giues life againe to so many States, the which at " the time of their beginning were dead about 60 yeares since, whereof the not viving them
" for many ages teacheth vs, that they should by no means be reuiued. When I speake this
" (Madam) my meaning is, that a Prince should cuterat his subiects, like vnto Bees, and not " take from them both honny and wax: but to entertaine them alwayes in a good disposi" tion, and to suffer them to enioy part of the fruits of their labour: it is he that by his pain-
" full exercise entertaines and makes the rest of the Realm to liue in quiet. From him comes " trafficke, riches, gold, and tribute. It is a Spring which flowes continually, and is neuer
" dry: if the people cease from labour, all the body of the State will perishe.

Ease of the people.

" If you desire to maintaine the Realme, you must preserue the people, and accommo" date them: the which will be easily and speedily done, when as by viniting one vnto the " other, you shall not will any thing but what is pleasing to the people, nor they wish for " any thing but with your good liking. There must be a reciprocal communication betwix
" you and them: they must performe the duty of obedience, and you must shew that which " belongs to your wife command in your Regency. If you take vpon you this resolution,
" E you shall make them wonderfully affected to the Kings seruice, and the preseruacion of the " State: for they haue bene accustomed to doe for their King, as the body for the soule:
" they bring a mutuall consent to submit themselves to his will that leads them, that makes " them breathe and subsist: but if they be too much oppressed, they will doe like vnto those " which are tormented with burning fevers, who turne vp and downe continually, and can " find no place of rest, which is a certaine foretelling of the ruine of a State. So as it is need-
" full you should be carefull of their health. Haue onely this apprehension, that the Kings
" greatnesse depends of his subiects ease, and then to maintaine the Kings greatnesse, you " will resolue to haue the people rich and at ease: that is to say, such as they shall bee, such
" will the King be: the heart commonly feels the infirmities of the body.

F If the people be poore, he will be a poore King, (were his store-houses heaped vp with " gold and silver) his quality depending vpon that of his people, for that hee takes his name
" from the subiect. Will you haue them loue you? doe them good: for hee that entreates
" them ill, he may well haue the commandement of their bodies, but not of their hearts. Be " then (during this great charge which you hold) like vnto a goodly running riuer, which " brings profit to euery one: the fruit which you shall gather by good vantage of them, will be " of wonderfull encrease: for they shall not afterwards breathe but by your Maiesties bounty:
" tie: by which you shall frustrate the designs of such as would trouble the State, who can" not

not doe any thing without them : take the people from them, you leaue them naked, and A disarme them of all force. Oppose then a people against them freed from all extraordinarie imposts, experience will teach you, that with hand and heart, they will smother their enterprises in the breeding. It were fearfull, experience should let vs see what a discontented people linked to the ambition of great men can do, who neuer incense the subjects against their Prince, but vnder the maske of the Common-weale, whereof in effect they are the first corrupters.

Managing
of the treasure.

After that you haue eased the people of all these superfluities which did afflict them, keepe an account of the number of Prouinces within the Realme, and what subsidies, taxes, imposts, customs, aydes, tributes, and other publike reuenues, euery one doth con- B tribute, that you may certainly know what is raised yearly of the people, and then examine what the pensions, rents, fees of Officers, payments of souldiers, and other expences may amount vnto, to the end that by good husbandry you may so gouerne the Kings treasure, as the gylty hands may not retaine that which should come cleere into his coffers.
The receipt and expences seene and truly knowne, let not all the expences of the Kingdome (if you will haue it durable) exceed the Kings reuenues, otherwise it cannot long subsist.

Auoid warre all you can both at home and abroad, they can yeeld nothing but ruine, death, and confusion. Leaue not peace, vnion, and concord, which you enioy both within and without the Realme, which will bring infinit benefits, to the honour and quiet of C this State. Whosoever seekes to engage our King lightly in warre during his minority, shewes, that he seekes to liue in the troubles and confusions of the time, fearing lest his actions should be knowne; or else he desires to satisfie his ambition and couetousnesse with the hazard of the King and Realme : or to speake more plainly, that he desires to giue vent to his secret enterprises, which cannot burst forth but by colour of publike diuisions : and in a word, you must purchase peace at what rate soeuer, rather then to come to armes.
Whosoever takes armes in hand during the Kings minority, making shew to defend him, prescribes him oftentimes a law, to the prejudice of his Estate.

Touching ciuill warre, and home-bred confusion, be carefull and respectiue to auoid it for as inward diseases are more hard to cure then those which are exterior, and bring D a man by degrees vnto the graue : Euen so warre which begins in the bowels of a Realm, is much more dangerous then a foraine warre, for that it drawes it insensibly to ruine. If you desire to ouerthrow this Estate, vndertake a ciuill war, within few dayes it will bring you to the graue.

As for foraine warres, you should much lesse vndertake them, nor wish them : for it opens a gate, and admits a passage to strangers to practise the bad intents which they may haue against the King and his Citowne : shame which restrained them, will turne into furie, which will free them a passage to enter into France. Whereas if you keepe your selfe within the bounds of peace, not any one of your neighbours, (although he haue a desire) E will in regard of his honour, attempt against the King in his minority.

Fruits of warre.

What will be the fruits of either of these warres ? I will tell you : They will cause new impositions, new Edicts, which will consume the blood and substance, which the people haue yet remaining, and by this means you shall leaue the fields without labour, the poore without bread, the rich without means, and in the end bring this Estate to its last period.
The beginning and continuance of warre, gathers together a great superfluity of bad humors, which by degrees makes the body of a Monarchy fit to receive an alteration in all the members : For Warre is the mother and nurse of all liberty and impunity, the which doth dispend and exempt euery one from the subiection of lawes, and the commandement of superiors, which is the sole and onely means, by the which the bond and vnity F of people is dissolved.

Learn wisdom by our examples, and follow the way which hath bene made vnto you by the deceased King for twelve yeares together. He made triall what danger warre brings with it. Seeke peace both within and without the Realme : you shall thereby preserue the Estate, and you shall haue means to ease the people of a heauy burthen which they haue so long borne. Let your life be a liuely image of the happy condition of a people exempt from the calamities and miseries of warre. Where can you seeke war, to enioy a more absolute peace? war must not be vndertaken, but to keepe the people from affliction during

A during a peace. True it is, that although you haue peace with the Kings subjects, and all your neighbors, yet must you not keep it so strictly, as warre may not be vndertaken. And therefore if you finde it convenient, you may entertaine garisons vpon the frontiers, lest you be suddenly surprisid : All peace without Armes is weak.

Troublers
of the State

I will adde one exception to that which I haue formerly said, that there may be some one so rash, during the tender age of our King, as to stir vp the subjects to mutinies, either vnder colour of Religion, or of the common-weale, to make his own profit with the prejudice of our King. As a light disease increaseth and kils the body, if fit remedies bee not applied in time, so in this first motion of alteration, if you doe not employ force and authority to stay the course of such a mischief, it will set the foure corners, and the heart of France on fire. The first medicine should come from the soveraigne Courts, and therein you shall know of what importance and necessity they be, by whose Decrees such an one shall be declared guilty of high treason, whereunto you shall presently adde force to put it in execution with fire and sword, and follow him with such resolution, as he may be presently inuested wherefoeuer he hath shent himselfe, and that he may be taken there without mercy, to the end that by his head the rest of France may be diuerted from pronouncing of such foule offences : and that his ashes may make a remedy for posteritie. God forbid
I should presume any euill by any Nobleman in France, being assured of their general loyalties : yet I may say by the way, that the successe of one iniurie drawes on a thousand
C others : and on the other side one iniurie reuenged, suppresseth all bad designs.

Warre of Germany.

Some aduise you to succour the Germanes, others to remaine quiet : the first say, that the deceased King was bound not onely by word, but in effect : that not relieuing them now, the honour of France was engaged, that it was a worke worthy of a great King to suc-cure afflicted Princes, when as one more mighty will vsurpe their Estates, by some colour-red title : that not doing it, they might draw them into despaise to ioyne with him against this Realme : or for want of succouring them, to prepare the way to haue a great neighbour against vs, who by our negligence hath extended his limits to be a future scourge vnto vs. In which case we should haue nothing left vs but a late repentance. A lesson which is ordinary to the Princes and Potentates of Italy, who will not suffer a new Prince to grow great among them. Others say, that wee must balance all affaires according to the diuinity of obiects which are presented vnto our eyes : that what was good to a great warriour, cannot bee applied to his sonne in his tender age : that it is a goodly thing to succure afflicted Princes, but it is better not to trouble his owne affaires vnseasonably : that the death of the King his father hath freed him from all promises : that the rules of duty doe not bind him to giue succours, for that in matter of state, honour must be measured by that which is most necessary for the good, quiet and profit of him and his subjects : that in his youth he must feare a confusion, and an Anarchy which Armes may draw into France : and that in seeking to preserve another, we shall lose our selues.

To Conclude, it may happen that by our succours these foraine Princes may bee settled E in their countries. And on the other side, it may bee, that both they and our succours may be defeated : and that in this infortunate successe, there will be a port opened for the conqueror to enter into France : the which during the minority of our King, you must auoid by all means possible. A lesson which was well obserued by our great King Lewis the 11, who dying, aduised them to keepe the Realme in peace, and not to enter into any quarrell with the Britton, and the other neighbours : to the end that his sonne Charles the 8 being thirteen years old, his state might be in peace, till he came to age, to dispose of things at his pleasure. And long before him that wife Constan King of Orleance, tutor to Cloaire the second his Nephew, being but foure moneths old, thought (that not to expose his Realme to all the miseries whereunto an Estate is subiect) he must breed vp his little Ne-F phew, and preserve his Realme by all milde courses, dispersing with an admirable dexteritie all innouations that might grow in it, how dangerous so euer : And yet he, for his great ness, with that of his Nephew, might haue made head against any vnder-takers. And about all things you must haue a speciall care that Princes and Noblemen, may not be armed vnder any pretext which they shall borrow of the Maiestie of a King, so long as hee shall be in this tender age.

Madame, the reasons of either side are great, the which you must weigh in a iust ballance, to incline vnto that which shall be most profitable for the good and preservation of
the

1610 the King and his Realme, and take counsell with God what you haue to doe in this point: A
 " And above all things thinke that at this day, in a full assurance of all things in this Realme,
 " you must feare any thing.

Religion. Religion may alter the subjects wils: It pierceth the hearts of men vnto the quicke, and
 " caries them away with a violent and extraordinary motion, the which blinds the eyes to " all consideration of respect, duty and obedience, which they owe vnto their Prince. We " should all wish that there were not any but the ancient religion, wherein wee haue bene
 " baptized and bred vp: But the miseries past which had in a manner brought France to her
 " last period, should teach vs, what calamities doe follow vs, if the same maxime which the " deceased King hath established, be not inuolubly obserued: who by a wise aduice tolera- B
 " ting the exercise of the pretended reformed Religion, hath by the same means sctled the " Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Religion, in townes whereas it had not bene exerci" sed these forty or fifty yeeres. This subiect concerns the preservation of the State, where-
 " of Religion makes a part. And therefore you may not alter any thing. Allow vnto them of " the reformed religion, free exercise of their Religion, the Chambers of the Edict, and
 " the townes which haue bene granted them for their assurance: forget not any thing that " the deceased King granted them, as a Prince who knew well how much it did import
 " the State not to touch this string. It will containe them within the vow of obedience: C
 " Neither shall it be in the power of any, how great soeuer, to draw them from the duty
 " which they owe naturally to their King. It is a body so composed as it receiues no moti" on, but when any thing is attempted against the Edict, the which was made to preferre
 " them: Make no breach in this Edict, it is immouable, and the chiefe parts without al" tion. This body is not like vnto a clocke whereas the greater and lesser pieces moue all to" gether, one by another: here the greater haue no force, nor vertue, without the people,
 " what shew soeuer they make, as we haue sometimes seene, when they had an humour to " rise, from the which they were wisely diuerted by the people: And contrariwise, we re" member that the people of Rochel alone endured the extremities of warre without their " support, who haue alwayes maintained themselves in obedience, by the wisdom of the " Edicts of pacification.

Madame, entertaine these Edicts in euery point, and that which hath bene authorized D
 " by the wisdom of the deceased King; you need not then feare them that hold the chiefe
 " rankes amongst them. But breake them in any part, they be firebrands to inflame the hu-
 " mours of the people; the which would turne to the desolation of the State, I meane of both " religions: the one would draw with it the losse and ruine of the other, whereas the main" taining of both, adding thereunto prayers, fasting, modesty, chastitie, preachings, with a " holy life, will be the support of the ancient, and the ouerthrow of the new.

Preachers. The faculty of eloquence in the mouth of a Preacher, is a goodly gift of nature, the
 " which being augmented by long vse and study, giues light and ornament to the goodly " conceptions of his minde, which concerns the health of our foules. But if hee will abuse
 " the sweetnesse of his tongue, there is no plague so preiudiciall to a Realme, as this well E
 " speaking Preacher. It is a torrent which ouerflowes to drowne a multitude, his tongue
 " is a sword, whereon depends the life and death of those, for or against whom hee doth " employ it, he formes, he thunders, and confounds heauen and earth together, when as to " preuaile in his intentions he vnfittingly abuseth passages of the holy Scripture, by the ex" position whereof hee winnes what credit with them he list: There is not any thing
 " how incredible so euer, but with good words hee will make probable: and nothing so
 " rude and vnpolished, but he will make plausible with his eloquence: his speech in a " multitude is of as great force, as iron in an armie: especially with those who comming
 " to heare him, bring nothing but spirits of deuotion and obedience, whereof the Preacher
 " doth cunningly make his profit: He doth gouern their minds at his pleasure, and knowes F
 " how to moue their affections, and to incite their courages in such sort, as they forget all
 " feare of danger, and all bonds of benefites. Hearing of the senses, by means of the way, " brings great passions vnto the minde. To prevent the effects of such an instrument, you " must by your absolute command, forbid all inuicities in their Sermons, which be the fire-
 " brands of sedition; and that they follow their texts, and teach the subiect obedience to " his King, with vniuersity and concord, both of great and small. If hee doe otherwise, intreat
 " him like Anthony Fradin a Franciscane, who was banished out of the Realme by Lewis the " eleuenth,

A eleuenth, for that hee had exceeded the bounds of preaching, and disordered of the state of " 1610
 " the Crowne in his Pulpit.

Although we cannot force the lawes of Nature, and giue vnto the youth of our King, " The Kings
 " that great sense, iudgement and conduct which is requisite for the gouernment of his " Corona-
 " Realme, which onely time must produce, yet must you not attend the time of his full age, " 1610
 " to haue him crowned. He is our King, old or yong, you must alwayes apply vnto him
 " those holy Characters, whereas all the Princes of the blood, other Princes and Officers of " the Crowne must assist. After this let him make a progresse throughout his whole Realme,
 " to the end his subjects may know him, and yeeld him the oath of allegiance. The Princes
 " B preface at what age soeuer, is of so great merit and recommendation with his subjects, as " it doth wonderfully moue them to loue him. And yet Madame, herein it is necessarie
 " to make warre by the eye, and doe according to the disposition of affaires, not with-drawing
 " your selfe easily from the first, and chiefe City of France, the which you see by their teares
 " is wholly vowed to the seruice of their Prince.

You must not forbear to assemble the Estates, for the reason which they suggest vnto " Assembly
 " you, that they will bee some blemish to your greatnesse. It is quite contrary, the Estates " of the E" hauing confirmed it by publike Authority, will settle it fully. But I will tell you the reason " states.
 " why you should forbear to call this assembly. It would bee an Instrument for them that " would trouble the State to giue a forme vnto their practices, euery one would seeke to
 " C winne the Deputies by courtisie, presents, benefites, goodly promises and other fauours,
 " and all these priuate persons returning into their Prouinces, would serue as Torches to " kindle new fires and combustions. I know well there is not any Prince or Nobleman that " hath this proiect in his head, being all with one deuotion, vowed to the Kings seruice: but " they are men, and therefore you must take away all occasions of doing ill, or thinking ill.
 " Commonly the Estates assemble to provide for the present and future complaints of the " general of this Monarchy, and to reduce things to their ancient course. You know where " the disease lyes, prescribe the like remedy, as you haue done, if it had bene heard. To Pre" lates abate the tenths, these bee they who either by their doctrine or good example hold
 " the hearts of the Nobility and people tied to their Princes seruice. As for the Nobility, D
 " gratifie them, honour them, and put publike charges into their hands, they bee the Kings " creatures, who referre all their exploits to the profit and advancement of the head, from " whom they take their being and nourishment. As for the people, being the foundation
 " whereon this Realme is built, and the which being ruined, it is impossible it should subsist,
 " ease them, take away these new Edicts, Imposts and Subsidies: It is better to gratifie a peo" ple then to entreat them roughly. The force of diseases decline as the naturall vigor of the
 " the sicke body increaseth. But a people how rich, strong and vigorous soeuer it be, de" clines, as Taxes and Imposts increafe, we doe not perceive it but like vnto the going of the " hand of a Dyall, whose motion is not seene, but when it hath finished the course, nor the " losse and ruine of a people but in their fall. Thereby Madame, you shall both stop the " E mouthes of the three Estates, and of all those that shall make any motion to haue them cal" led, and withall you shall auoid an alteration, which time might breed.

Doe not disappoint the Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Officers, to whom the deceased " Penfions.
 " King gaue honours and penfions; Remember that hee gaue them not but to men of mer-
 " rit, and who had assisted him to recouer his Realme, and to settle it in peace and good or" der. Lewis the 11. a true patterne of wisdom, a little before his death, desired to see his " son, whom he had not seene in many yeares; about all things he aduised him not to alter any " thing in his Court, nor with them whom hee had aduanced to dignities. A comendement
 " grounded, for that after the death of Charles the 7. his father, hee had cut off the penfions
 " of Noblemen and other Officers, who had with the losse of their blood deserved what
 " F they enioyed: the successe of which Council had like to haue bene his ruine, and of the " whole Realme, by so many Malecontents. Hee would thereby teach his sonne that an in" considerate change is of very dangerous consequence.

Will you put a wise Council in practise? call all the Princes, generall Gouvernors, and " To call all
 " one or two Noblemen of euery Prouince, neere vnto the King and you, giue them penfi- " great men
 " ons that they may be able to maintaine themselves there, and countenance them indiffe- " to Court.
 " rently according to their qualities, to auoid ialousie, the mother of diuisions, and facti" ons. The benefites and fauours which they shall receiue from the King and you, will aug-
 " ment

1610 "ment the desire they haue to his and your seruice, and euery one in his Prouince will dis- A
"perfe such practises as may grow preiudiciall to his Maiesties seruice.

Intendants "To know all things that shall passe in the Prouinces, consider if it shall bee conuenient of Iustice. "to depure intendants or supraiours of Iustice, which shall report vnto you as occasion shall "require, what is done, and the complaints of all the people.

Alliances. "Keepe our King in good tearmes with the Pope, the King of Spaine, the King of Eng"land, the Archdukes, the Swisses, and all our other allies, renew the League with them. It "will bee a great and Soueraigne remedie to maintaine peace in this Realme, when as "you shall be assured that your neighbours will not practise any thing against the King nor "his State.

Paris and "The affection and fidelity which the Parisiens had vnto the seruice of their deceased B other townes. "King, is well knowne vnto you, by the last teares which all in generall powred forth to "witness vnto the King, and you, their wonderfull griefe for the losse which they haue re-"ceiued in the death of him, by whom they liued. As in a clocke one instrument makes all "the rest to moue. Euen so this Realme, according to the modell of Paris the other townes
"do commonly frame their opinions: you are assured of the Parisiens affection to the Kings
"seruice, the which they haue continued in his person by a continuation from the father
"to the sonne. Wherefore you must alwayes arme your selfe with their loue, to draw others "to doe the like. Establish Captaines, Lieutenants and Ensignes in all the quarters, which "shall be knowne to be honest men, and that breathe nothing but the Kings seruice, mixt C
"with some Lawyers, Treasurers and Merchants, who shall take the oath of allegiance in "your hands. These men will maintaine the Parisiens in their obedience, and if there hap"pen any vnexpected accident, you shall be assured the King hath there so many seruants,
"who will willingly imploy their liues to preferre his person, and maintaine their country"men vnder that yoke of seruice which they owe naturally vnto their Prince.

"Command that in Paris there be not so many strangers that professe armes, and that "matters may be reduced to the same estate they were in the time of the deceased King,
"euery Nobelman being for his owne particular as well assured now as he was then. A po"licy which it may be will be hard to digest, but yet it should be allowed of by euery good
"subiect: As for all other townes, entertaine them by Letters, making them often know how D
"desirous the King and you are to ease them, and to maintaine them in peace, that they bee
"carefull not to suffer themselves to be abused with false reports, which some wicked peo"ple may giue out for truth, which would but increase their miseries.

Audiences. "If you desire to content the Clergy, the Gentlemen, and the common people, admit
"any (if it please your Maiesty) that desires to speake with you, to your presence without a "Mediator, to the end the whole bond may remaine to you. Appoint certaine dayes to this "end, when as euery one may haue free access vnto your Maiesty (being assisted by such "Noblemen as it shall please you) to make their complaints. There will grow a double pro"fit thereby, the one is, you shall vnderstand matters truly, without any disguising; the "other is, that he to whom you giue a fauourable audience will go away content, although E
"hee sometimes bee discontented for that hee hath not obtained all that hee demanded.
"To passe at the mercy of such as haue liberty to giue, or refuse the entry, to them that "would complaine, is to sell the pernames of Princes, with a blemish to their reputation and "greataesse.

Councell. "About all things beware you follow not your owne opinion alone, in managing the "affaires of this Realme. Our wils are most commonly partial, which may diuert our iudge-
"ment from the right way. First take Councell of God, and let him bee the guide of your "actions; let them bring what maximes they please for the preferuation of the State, it is "a vaine wisdom, if God be not of the party: Then take aduice of men experienced in "many things, which may be full of discretion, age and wisdom, and which haue nothing F
"in their soules which age hath not made graue, constant and setled. Yong mens Councell
"is sometimes good, but that of the aged is most commonly better. And about all things
"labour carefully to know them from whom you shall take counsell, for many times vnder
"a vail of integrity, there lurkes disloyalty.

"Madame, all these discourses giue you power to gouerne this Estate well. I assure my
"selfe you haue also a will: Euery action is contained within power and will, and no man "can be deceiued of his expectation when hee makes both of them his end. God of his "mercy

A mercy grant you both, to guide all things to good, and to gouerne them in an equal course, 1610
"to the end they may haue a good and a happy end, which may tend to the increase of the "greatnesse of the King and State: Most humbly beseeching your Maiesty to take in good "part these Remonstrances, which are made by him, Who is,

Your most humble, most faithfull, and most obedient subiect and seruant, N. Palquier Councillor and Master of Requests.

B Ambassadors came from all parts to condole the death of the deceased King. Among The Duke of others the Duke of Feria came from Spaine, with a great traine. The Duke of Mont- Feris Ambassa-bazon being accompanied with two hundred horse, and foure Caroches, went to meet dour from him a League without Paris, and brought him to his lodging. At his first audience he was Spaine, comes serched by the Duke of Esguillon with twelue Caroches and many Gentlemen, where to Paris.
comming to the King, he told him that hee was sent from the King his Master to visit his Maiesty, and to offer him the like friendship and intelligence, as he had with the deceased King his Father, for whose death he had much grieved. The yong King, hauing heard his interpreter, answered him suddenly. I thank the King my Brother for his good will, I will remember him and you also: Seeing he desires it, he may expect from me all friendship and good intelligence, such as he had with the deceased King my father. And then he asked him many pretty questions of the King of Spaines health, the Queenes, the Princes and the Infanta which bred an admiration in the Spaniards, to see the Maiesty of the yong King, which seemed then supernaturall and extraordinary.

The Ambassador being retired, and the King set downe in his chaire, there comes suddenly a Church-man of his traine, thrusting through the presse, and cast himselfe at his Maiesties feet, making great signes of the Crosse, as if hee blest him, and crying out in his language, God blesse you my King, God blesse you my Prince, God assist you for euer, and make you alwayes prosper. Whereupon they enquired of him what hee was? And hee answered D them cheerefully, that he was a Nauarrois, his Maiesties most humble and most faithfull subiect.

Some dayes after the Lord of Wotton Ambassador for the King of Great Brittain, ari-ued at Paris, being sent to the same effect to condole, and to make all offers in his Masters name, of the cordiall loue and friendship: his comming was so pleasing as it bred a iealousie in the Chastilian Ambassador. The Marshall of Lauardin met him neere Saint Denis gate with about two hundred horse, and so accompanied him to Luxembourg House, within three dayes after the Prince Iennit, accompanied with a great troope of Gentlemen, went and serched him to his audience, where hee gaue and receiued much content: on Tuesday, he with the Ambassador Leager, dined with the King at the Tuilliers, after which hee re-ceiued the oath of the Queene (in the Kings presence) for the obseruation of the League, E with great solemnity in the Feuillants Church. Then after some priuate audience of the Queen, he took his leaue of their Maiesties to returne for England.

After all these condolences, it was resolved in requitt of these Ambassages, and to confirm the League which the deceased King had with those Princes, that Monsieur de Bellegarde, Master of the Kings Horse, should goe into Spaine, the Marshall of Lauardin into England, and the Duke of Elperon to Rome. And then they began to prepare for the Kings Coronation, which was appointed at Rheims on the 17 day of October, with that Pompe and State, that is vsuall at such soleme Ceremonie.

OF THE HISTORIE
OF FRANCE:

c From the death of HENRY the Fourth, vntill the Conclusion of the Peace made before Montpellier, in the yeare 1622.

LEWIS THE THIRTEENTH.
THE 64 FRENCH KING.

D After the detestable Murther of that great Monarch, his Sonne being seated in his Fathers Throne, and the Queene Mother choien Regent of the Realme, by a generall consent of all the Princes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, and confirmed by an Edict of the Court of Parliament of Paris: The clouds which seemed to threaten the State with stormes of confusion, were suddenly dissolued by the wisdom of the Regent, and the vigilancy and care of the Councell and Court of Parliament. Having performed the Rites due to the deceased King her Husband, her onely care was to entertaine peace in her Sonnes Estate, and to calme the wanes of so great a sea of publike affaires, and different passions, which were then amongst many great men: for the people breathed nothing but obedience; neyther did they thinke of any thing but to bewaile the losse of their well beloued King.

This famous Queene had no sooner reconciled a controuersie for the gouernment of Normandy, betwene the Prince of Conty, and the Earle of Soissons brethren, and heard an Opposition made to the most iust Decree of the Court of Parliament against Mariana's Booke; nor ended the Controuersies which had befallen at the Ceremonies of the Kings Funerall for their places; but new troubles befell her touching the Funerall Sermons which had bene made: some (according to the passions of such as had pronounced them) seemed to be Panegyrics and praises for the Iesuits: and others to bee Satyrs, vttered to their disgrace. The Iesuits hauing complained vnto the Queene of the Abbot of Bois, accused him, that in his Sermons, treating of the Question, Whether it be lawfull to kill a Tyrant; and refusing Mariana's booke and others, he had made an exhortation vnto the Iesuites, That they should hereafter haue a great care that no bookes should be published to the prejudice of France, vnder the name of their Society, nor with the approbation of their Superiours, if they would not willingly expose themselves to those dangers, which all their wisdoms, fortified with the authority of their most confident friends, could not auoid. These were the principall points of his accusation, whereupon they informed the Queene Regent that these words had like to have caused a sedition against the Iesuites. The Bishop of Paris had A charge to hear the Abbot, who answered in his defence, That neyther passion, nor hatred to the Iesuites, or any other, had moued him to preach in that manner, but the fearful horror and vnspcakable grieffe for the strange death of his good Master, and the probable doubt of danger to the King and Queene, whilst those damnable bookes of Marianne and others should haue course amongst men: which the Bishop hearing, he dismiss him with a gentle admonition to liue louingly with all other Preachers, and especially with the Iesuites, and continue to preach obedience due to the King and Queene, and to praise the great merits of the deceased King, not offending any man. He made the like answer to the Cardinall du Perron, and the Chancellor, who told him, that continuing to doe good service to God and the State, hee should neuer want the Queenes protection, nor the assistance of all her good seruants.

The Parisians are commanded to arme.

The Queene Regent hauing drawne the Princes of the blood, and many other great personages to Court to attend the Kings person, as you haue heard in the former part, she hauing a speciall care to entertaine them in one intention, and desire to maintaine the State in peace; they grew into factions and ieaousities, marching vp and downe Paris in great troops: which bred a feare of some alteration in the City. Whereupon commandement was giuen vnto the Parisians to prouide armes. New Captaines were chosen in their Towne-house, who tooke an oath to the Queene; and the people within eight daies were all armed, but they were forbidden to discharge any Peece after fixe of the clocke at night. They still cried out, we acknowledge not any one but the King and Queene. These murmuring proceeded from the great traines which the Princes & Noblemen had, some being followed by 100 horse and more through the streetes. But the Queene hauing discovered the cause of their ieaousities, hauing distributed honors to those whose merits were well knowne vnto her, and augmented many of their pensions, all those new gallants which had their dependances vpon the Princes which were in court, retired presently to their houses, and euery man returned to his old course as in the time of the deceased King, the Queen giuing them to vnderstand that they should be no lesse assured now then they were before. The Parisians in like manner who thought they should haue bene forced to goe to the guard of the Ports, had now leaue to hang vp their new armes.

54 Edicts and commissions reuoked.

The Queene hauing caused these first windes to cease which began to raise waues vpon the calme of peace, without vsing of any force: she resolved to cause iustice to reigne: Hauing recommended it to such as had the charge thereof, she sought to releue the generall complaints and greiuances of the subiects who had been vexed and oppressed by many Edicts and extraordinary commissions which the deceased King had granted by importunity. Whereupon on the 22 of Iuly, by letters patents in forme of a declaration, there were 54 Edicts and Commissions reuoked, wherewith the subiects had been oppressed; and diuers others were suspended vntill it should be otherwise decreed. This did to ease and content the people, as all France beganne to conceiue they were entering into a golden age vnder the Regency of the Queene: and the rather, for that she had caused the Sait to be farmed out, and abated a fourth part of that which it had bene sold for, and yet the vnder-takers diminished nothing of the accustomed rent.

The Queene continues the old Kings buildings.

The Queene also caused all the buildings begun by the deceased King to be continued, a worthy worke, and charitable in regard of the multitude of men employed therein: And as the deceased King before hee had ended one worke still beganne another: so during this Summer hee caused the buildings of Bois de Vincennes, and the Colledge royall to be begunne. The latter was a designe of the deceased King, but hee neuer saw the beginning of it. The King laid the first stone on the 28 of August, on the which these words were grauen, In the first year of the reigne of Lewis the 13. King of France and Nauarre, being nine years of age, and of the Regency of Queene Mary of Medicis his Mother, 1610. Underneath it were the Kings armes, and the Queene Mothers. At the foure corners his Maiesty did set foure Medails, two of Gold, and two of siluer and guilt, with the like Inscription.

Certaine Gentlemen executed at the Greue.

The Court of Parliament in the meane time was busied about the arraignment and condemnation of certaine Conspirators, so as on the fourth of September there were hanged at the Greue, by a decree thereof, the S^s of harrie a Poictiun, Chesbabin a Scotchman (who had liued 35 yeares in Poitou) and a sonne of his called Champmartin, convicted to haue made and published a Declaration, thereby to stirre vp the people of Poitou to a reuolt,

1610

A reuolt, and to induce them to take armes with them, to change the Estate into an Oligarchie, as it was said: France being ill gouerned as they conceiued. But their pretence was to make a shew of the publike good, and to fish in a troubled water. They had bene prisoners during the life of the deceased King, who would needs speake with them, especially with Larrige, who was a Protestant, and well knowne vnto his Maiesty, hauing caried armes for his seruice. Hee was discovered by some to whom hee had imparted this businesse, who help to take him. His Maiesty hauing bid many things before him, touching the affliction of his family, and commanded him to tell the truth with promise of pardon, so as hee would confesse the Author of the said Declaration: for that it appeared plainly by the style, that it was none of his owne inuention. The said Larrige answered, that not any but himselfe had set hand vnto it. You will not then (replyed his Maiesty) help to saue your selfe, and free your family from the dishonor which will grow by your punishment. Where haue you seene that disorder in the State, whereof you complaine in your Declaration? seeing you haue not parted from your house for these nine yeares space, nor come vnto my Court; neyther haue you receiued any discommoditie from me or my officers. Hereat hee stood mute. Whereupon the King sent him backe, and commanded they should make him dine, and that hee should sometimes eate with Endart and others who had bene familiar with him, to see if they might free him of that M. lancholy humor wherewith he was possessed; and discover if they could, the ground of the enterprife. But his Maiesty being dead, and hee continuing obstinate, they were all three convicted of reason, and troubling of the publike peace; for the which they were hanged, being held vnworthily to dye by the sword like Gentlemen.

All things being pacified within the Realme, the Councell assembled to resolve what should be done with the army which the deceased King had drawne together before his death; the which beganne already to march towards Germany: and consulting of the finishing of his designe, it was not held expedient to beginne a new warre in the time of the Kings minority; seeing that the best experienced Princes are many times troubled in the like cases. Whereupon it was resolved that the Marshall La Chastre should haue 10000 Foot, and 1200 Horse, with some Peecces of Ordnance, and lead them to Iuliers to assist the Marquis of Brandenburg and the Duke of Newbourg (two of the pretenders to the Estates of Iuliers and Cleues;) the deceased King hauing promised to assist them with whatsoever they should need to maintaine and defend them in their pretensions; but death would not suffer him to effect his promise. The Queene mother being prest by the Ambassador of Spaine to abandon the succors promised by the deceased King her husband to the Princes pretending the succession of the Estates of Iuliers; shee answered, Neuer speake of it, I will not abandon the Allies of France: the which she presently put in execution, and the Marshall La Chastre had the charge giuen him to lead those Forces, who at the first excused himselfe by reason of his age and other occasion: yet hauing receiued commandement from the Queene, hee obeyed. In the meane time Iuliers was besieged, and battered by the Forces of our King of Great Britaine, by the Prince of Orange, and the Estates, and by the Prince of Anhalt who ledde the Forces of the two Pretendants. On the 18 of August the Marshall came vnto the campe before Iuliers, and was lodged in his quarter on the other side of the Riuer of Roer, whereas the Prince of Orange had made all necessary re-trenchments for him. They fo pressed the towne with their battery and Mynes, as on the first of September the Capitulation was made for the yeelding thereof by Ranfsenberg who held it for the Emperour. The Conditions were. 1, That there should be no alteration in the exercise of the Romish religion; and that all Clergy-men should be maintained in their priuiledges, and enioy their goods and reuennues. 2, That the Gouverneur, Captaines, and Souldiers, should deliuer the Towne and Castle vnto the Princes of Brandenburg and Newbourg, with the Artillery, Munition, victuall, and instruments of war, vnspoiled after the accord made. 3, That the Gouverneur, Captaines, Officers, and Souldiers might depart with their full armes, horses and baggage, whither they pleased; and that they should be furnished with 150 wagons to supply their wants. 4, That they might march out of the Towne and Castle of Iuliers, with their drummes beating, Colours flying, matches light, and bullets in their mouths. 5, That the Archduke *Leopold*s Officers, and all Clergy-men, and others, of what condition soeuer, might depart freely with their baggage. 6, That the Gouverneur should deliuer vnto such as should be depured

by the said Princes, all Charters and Records, and not carry any away. 7, That the Magistrates and Burgessees should be maintained in their priuiledges: and such as would might depart with their baggage. 8, That the accord being concluded, they should suffer some one deputed by the said Princes to enter, to receiue the Charters, Artillerie, Munition, and other things before mentioned. 9, That the Gouernor should cause the Garrison of Bredeben to depart vpon the same conditions that were concluded for the Towne of Iuliers. 10, That the said Gouernor should release all the prisoners of the campe, paying their charges, as also all the horses which had bene taken during the siege. 11, That the Gouernor of Iuliers should be restored to the possession of all his goods, as they were then in being, with all priuiledges and immunities belonging thereunto; and B the said Gouernour should not be molested for any thing which had hapned during that war, he taking an oath of fidelity and obedience to the said Princes, as other Gentlemen of the Country had done, which oath he should be bound to take within foure moneths. 12, That it should be lawfull for the Gouernor, Capitaines & souldiers within the towne and Castle of Iuliers, to retire themselves whither they pleased, out of the iurisdiction of the said Princes, & of the generall Estates of the vniited Provinces, and that they might remaine there for the space of 40 dayes in all safety; so as those troopes and others seruing the Emperour should not commit any act of hostility, nor oppresse the subiects and Countries of the said generall Estates. 13, That they should deliuer two Capitaines who should remaine in hostage vntill the returne of the wagons and horses which should be C deliuered them for the conduct of their sicke, wounded and baggage. After the yeelding of which Towne, and some other small places, the whole Duchy of Iuliers remained in the possession of the Princes of Brandenburg and Newbourg, and the Marshall La Chastre returned with his troopes into France.

Death of the Kings wife brother.

Death of Monsieur de Vie Gouernour of Calais.

France was so generally afflicted for the death of their King, as many died with the apprehension thereof. The Abbot of Marmontier his bafe brother (hauing receiued the newes thereof,) tooke his bed and died within few daies after, so dearly hee loued him. In the year 1590, being then Bishop of Lectoure, hee came vnto the Kings Army with 50 men at armes; and passing by Tours, the deceased Cardinall of Bourbon blamed him for that he went armed to the warre with a troope of horse: to whom hee answered; I D haue not begun first, the deceased Cardinall of Guise hath bene a President for me; I haue more reason to carry armes for my brother, then hee had for his. Monsieur de Vie Vice Admirall of France, being returned from Calais, whither the Queene had sent him after the Kings death, to giue order to his Gouernment, passing by the place where hee had by chance scene the King dead, and calling it to mind, he was seized with such a sudden apprehension as within two dayes after he dyed. He was a braue Cauallier, whom the king made choice of at the battell of Iury to be Sergeant-maior of the Field, hauing bene but two moneths in his Court; afterwards he gaue him the gouernment of St. Denis: and it may well be said that by his care in the guard of that place, and his pleasing behauiour, hee reduced the hearts of an infinit number of Parisians to the royall obedience. His Maiesties pleasure E was, that for a memory to posterity he should carry a Flower de luce of gold in his armes. After the reduction of Paris, he was Gouernour of the Bastile: Amiens being recovered, the King gaue him the gouernment; and Calais being yeilded by the Spaniard, he would not trust that frontier place but to this trusty seruant. But forbearing to make any further mention of such as dyed for very griefe, being many, let vs come to the Kings Coronation.

The Kings Coronation.

As the Coronation is an Action the most important for the State, the most assured for the person of Kings, the most necessary for the continuance of their Reigae, and the most considerabke for the good of the Realme; so for these reasons, the Queene (desiring to shew her loue and affection to the King her Son) appointed a day for his Coronation at Rheims, to adorne his head with a glorious Diadem in the spring of his yong years: to which end the Royall ornaments which are kept in the Abbey of S. Denis for the Coronation of Kings were carryed thither. On the 14. of October, he made his entry into the Towne, where his Maiesty was receiued with great pompe and magnificence, the particularities whereof, as also the preparation which was made in the Church for that solemnity, I am forced for breuities sake to omit. The day before the ceremony, the King went vnto the Cathedrall Church to assist at Euen-song, and to heare a Sermon made by P. Cotton,

A P. Cotton, vpon the Diuine Institution of the Vnction, and Coronation of the Kings of France, and of Confirmation, which his Maiesty receiued by the hands of the Cardinall of Ioyeuse, to whom hee was presented by Quene Marguerite and the Prince of Conde. On Sunday the seuenteenth day of October, the King sent foure Barons vnto the Abbey of S. Remy to fetch the holy Oyle: They parted early in the morning with their Equires and Gentlemen, either of them hauing a banner with his Armes caried before him, causing a white Hackney to be led for the Prior of Saint Remy, who was to carry the said holy Oyle.

The Cardinall of Ioyeuse, who was to represent the Archbishop of Rheims, and to doe the office at the ceremony, came soone after into the Church with eight Bishops to assist him: where attending the coming of the Peeres, he sate him downe in his pontifical robes. As for the Bishops which assisted, two of them were attired like Deacons with Miters, two like Subdeacons with Miters, and foure with Copes and Miters. Soone after arriued the Ecclesiasticall Peeres in their pontifical robes; that is to say, the Bishop and Duke of Laon, the Bishop and Duke of Langres, the Bishop and Earle of Beauuais, the Bishop and Earle of Chalons, and the Bishop and Earle of Noyon. At the same instant there came from the Kings lodging, the Princes of Conde and Conty, the Earle of Soissons, with the Dukes of Neuers, Elbenf, and Epemon, who were deputed by the King to hold the places of the Dukes of Burgundy, Normandy and Aquitaine, and of the Earles of Toulouse, Flanders, and Champagne, attired in their Robes and Coronets, according to their qualities. Hauing done their deuotions, and saluted one another, they sent the Bishops of Laon and Beauuais to fetch the King, who departed presently in their pontifical habits, hauing certain reliques of Saints hanging about their necks, being conducted by the master of the ceremonies, all the Prebends of our Ladies Church marching in procession before them. Being come to the Kings chamber and finding it shut, the Bishop of Laon knockt three seuerall times, to either of which the Duke of Elguillon, great Chamberlaine of France, demanded, What would ye? The Bishop answered, Lewis the thirteenth, sonne to Henry the great: Whereunto the Lord Chamberlaine replied, He sleeps. Then knocking againe he had like answer. But at the third time, demanding what they D would haue, the Bishop answered, Lewis the thirteenth, whom God hath giuen vs for King. Then the doore was opened, & the Bishops entered with the chiefe Chanter of Rheims, and the master of the ceremonies: where they found the King laid vpon his bed, hauing his shirt slit both before and behind, to receiue the holy Vnction, and vpon it a waistcoate of crimson Sattin, slit also in like manner, and thereon a long robe of cloth-of-siluer. The Bishops seeing his Maiesty, he of Laon hauing finished a prayer, kissing their hands, they lifted the King from his bed, with all shewes of honour as to their soveraigne Prince, and then they led him singing to the Church doore.

Before him there marched first the great Prouost of France with his Archers; then the Clergy which had accompanied the two Prelates; the hundred Swissers of his Guard; the E Drums; Haultboies, and Heralds; the Nobility; the great master of the ceremonies; the Knights of the Holy Ghost, with their great order about their neckes, in the midst of two hundred Gentlemen of the Kings house; the Scottish Guard. Before his Maiesty went the Marshall la Chastre representing the Constable, carrying a naked sword, and hauing robes like vnto one of the Earles which were Lay Peeres: On either side of him went an Vsher of the Kings chamber, attired in white Sattin, carrying their Maces: next after came Monsieur de Sillery Chancellor of France in his robes; then followed the Marshall of Louardin, holding the place of Lord Steward: On the Kings right hand went the Duke of Elguillon high Chamberlaine of France, and on his left hand Monsieur de E Elgarde, master of the horse, holding his place of chiefe Gentleman of the Kings chamber. These three Noblemen were attired like vnto Lay Peeres Earles.

After some ceremonies at the Church doore, the King approaching neere vnto the high Altar, he was presented by the Bishops of Laon and Chalons, vnto the Cardinall of Ioyeuse, who represented the Archbishop of Rheims; who receiuing him said many prayers, whilst the King was at his deuotion. After which his Maiesty was led vnto his seat, with his officers and Noblemen about him, according to their degrees. In the meane time, all the religious men of Saint Remy came solemnly in procession, being accompanied by the chiefe of the towne, carrying Torchets of Virgin waxe in their hands. Their Prior was mounted vpon the white Hackney, hauing a foot-cloath of cloath-of-siluer, A carying the holy Oyle in a boxe hanging about his necke, being vnder a Canopy of cloath-of-siluer, borne by foure Monkes.

The Cardinall being aduertised of the arriual of the said Oyle, he went presently in his pontificalibus to meet it, with the eight Bishops which assisted him, and all the singing-men and Quiristers. But before they would deliuer it to the Cardinall, they made him (according to the custome) binde himselfe to restore it vnto them, the Ceremony being ended: the which he promised on the word of a prelate. After a prayer said by the Cardinall, hee shewed the holy Oyle vnto the people, and then set it downe vpon the high Altar with all reverence. Then being assisted by the Bishops of Laon and Beauuais, hee made this following request.

A request made vnto the King by the Cardinall. The Kings answer.

Wee pray and require you, that you would grant vnto every one of vs, and the Churches wherof we haue the charge, the Canonick priuiledges, and good Lawes, and Iustice: and that you will defend vs as a King ought all his Bishops and their Churches. Whereunto the King answered. I promise to preferre you in your Canonick priuiledges, as also your Churches: and that I will giue you good Lawes, and doe you Iustice, and will defend you by the help of God, according to my power: as a King in his Realme ought to doe in right and reason, to his Bishops and their Churches.

After this Answer, the Bishops of Laon and Chaalons lifted his Maiesty vp from his Chaire, demanding of the assistants if they did accept of him for their King: nor that this Acceptation is taken for an Election (the Realme of France hauing bene alwayes hereditary and successefull to the next male:) but for a declaration of the succession, obedience and fidelity which they owe vnto him, as their Soueraigne Lord, by the expresse commandement of God. Having bene acknowledged for their lawfull Prince by a generall consent of all the Orders, the Cardinall of Ioueuise presented vnto him the Oath of the Kingdome (which is the sacred bond of the fundamentall lawes of the State) the which he took publicly in these words, with inuocation of the name of God, laying his hand vpon the Gospell, which he killed with great reuerence.

The Kings oath vnto his Subiects.

I promise in the Name of Iesus Christ, these things to the Christians subiect vnto me. First, I will endeavour that the Christian people shall liue peaceably with the Church of God. Moreover, I will provide, that in all vocations these and all iniquities shall cease. Besides, I will command, that in all Indgements, equity and mercy shall take place: to the end that God who is gentle and mercifull may haue mercy on you and me. Furthermore, I will seeke by all meanes in good faith to chase out of my Iurisdiction, and the Lands of my subiection, all Heretikes denounced by the Church: promising by oath to observe all that hath bene said, so help me God and this holy Euangel.

The Kings Ornaments appointed for the Coronation were laid vpon the Altar, that is to say, the Imperiall Crowne, being close, and a middle one, the royall Scepter, the hand of Iustice, the Spurs, the Sword, his royall Roabe, with diuers others. On the left side of the Altar, neere vnto them, stood the Prior of S. Denis, who hath the keeping of them; and on the right side was the Prior of S. Remy looking to the holy Oyle. The Bishops of Laon and Beauuais hauing conducted the King vnto the altar, Monsi: de Bellegarde first Gentleman of his Chamber, tooke off his roabe of Cloth-of-siluer. Being in his waistcoat of Sattin, when the Cardinall had made certaine accustomed prayers and blessings, the Duke of Elguillon put on his Buskins, and the Prince of Conde (supplying the place of the Duke of Bourgundy Deane of the Lay-peeres) put on his Spurs, and presently took them off againe.

After this, the Cardinall blest the royall Sword being in the scabbard: which being ended, hee girt the King therewith, and presently vngirt him againe: then he drew it out of the scabbard, which hee left vpon the altar, & kissing it, said many prayers, wherewith that the Quier sung certaine Anthems. The King hauing received the Sword, kist it, and offered it to the altar whereon it was laid, in witness of his zeale and affection to the defence of the Church. Hauing offered the Sword vnto the altar, the Cardinall deliuered it into his hand againe, which his Maiesty received reuerently vpon his knee, and gaue it to the Marshall La Chastre, who held the place of Constable during the Ceremony: the Cardinall returning to the Altar to prepare the sacred vnction, after this manner: Hee drew out of the forenamed holy Violl with a needle of gold, a small quantity of oiliour of the

This Vnction being thus ordered, the tyings of the Kings garments were let loose both before and behinde, by the Cardinall and the Bishops of Laon and Beauuais: after which his Maiesty kneeled downe in his Oratory or Cloister, and the Cardinall with him, to craue the assistance of the grace of God for the preperation of France. The Lettany being sung, the Cardinall stood vp to say certaine prayers over the King, who was yet kneeling. Which done, the Cardinall set him downe as in the consecration of a Bishop, and holding in his hand the plate wher on the sacred Oyle lay, hee beganne with his right thumb to anoint the King in diuers places, viz: on the crowne of the head, on the stomacke, betwixt his shoulders, on both shoulders, and on the bendings of his armes. The Consecration and prayers being ended, the Cardinall with the two Bishops clofed vp his shirt, waistcoat, and other garments, in reuerence of the sacred vnction. Then the Duke of Elguillon high chamberlaine, presented to the King the three habits accustomed to be worn in the like ceremonies vpon his waistcoat, viz: a long tucket, representing a Subdeacon, a Surplis for a Deacon, and a royall Cloake in stead of a Cope, representing a Priest; which ended, the Cardinall anointed the palmes of his hands, and then put him on thin gloues, lest he should touch any thing with his bare hands, for reuerence of the sacred vnction: which gloues hee blest, and sprinkled with holy water, saying diuers prayers. The royall Ring being also blest by the Cardinall, (a symbole of loue whereby the King was wedded to his Realme) hee put it on the fourth finger of his Maiesties right hand, with the accustomed Ceremony. This done, hee tooke the Scepter from the Altar, and put it into his right hand for a marke of soueraigne power. Then hee tooke the hand of Iustice, which hee put into his left hand, it being a wand hauing on the top of it a hand of Iuory.

All which Ceremonies being ended, the Chancelor of France came vp to the Altar, with his face towards the King, and with a loud voyce called vp the Peeres according to their dignity and order, to assist at the Coronation. First, the Secular Peeres; and then, the Ecclesiasticall. This conuocation being ended, the Cardinall tooke the great Crowne from the Altar, and lifting it with both his hands over the Kings head, the Peeres came presently to support them; and then the Cardinall holding it in his left hand blest it. After this benediction, the Cardinall alone set the Crowne vpon the Kings head: whereunto all the Peeres put their hands. In crowning him, the Cardinall holding it still with his left hand, said many prayers, and blest the King: the which being ended, hee tooke him by the right shoulde, and (in the company of all the Peeres) conducted him from the Altar to his Royall throne, which was built on high at the bottome of the Quier, that he might be seene of all the people, holding still in his hands the royall Scepter, and rod of Iustice.

The Queene Regent beheld all these Ceremonies from a high Scaffold, hauing by her Queene Marguerite, and the Princesses of Coide, of County, of Montpensier, of Rohan, and diuers other Ladies. She was all this while disquieted for the Kings health, not being able to endure with patience to see his Maiesty bare headed vnder the Crowne, hauing his cap taken from him: which shewes that Crownes and Greatnes haue their discommodities as well as ordinary things and the poorest cottages.

The King being come to his royall Throne, attended by the Peeres, Princes, and Officers, according to their degrees; the Cardinall of Ioueuise holding him by the hand, caused him to sit downe, and prayed vnto God to confirme him in his Throne, and to make him inuincible and inexpugnable against all those which should vnjustly seeke to deprive him of the Crowne which was lawfully fallen vnto him. After which the Cardinall hauing said a prayer, being bare headed, hee made a low obysance vnto the King, and kissed him, saying thrice with a loud voyce, God save the King: and at the last hee added, God save the King eternally. All the Peeres did the like obysance vnto him one after another, and kist him with the like acclamation, and then returned to their seates which were prepared for them on eyther hand of the King. The people which were in the body of the Church, hearing the ioy of the Princes, began to cry out with a loud voyce, God save the King, being accompanied with all sorts of Musicke, Drums and Trumpets. Which done, the Heraldus who were in the bottome of the Quier, began to call forth many peeces of gold and siluer, which were purposely coyned, hauing on the one side the Kings picture crowned, and on the other side a hand coming out of heauen, holding a Violl with the sacred Oyle, with this inscription, Francis data munera cali. Thus much I haue thought good to write for the Readers better satisfaction touching the substance of the Kings Coronation, for that it hath not beene so particularly set downe in the life of any of the precedent Kings.

As for those things which followed during the Masse, the Kings going to the offering, his receiving of the Communion, and the royall feast made in the Archbishops Palace, I must be forced to passe over with silence, fearing I should be both tedious to the Reader, and wrong the History, being tyed to strict bounds.

The King desiring (according to the statutes of the Order of the Holy Ghost) to receive the Coller of the same Order from the Cardinall who had anointed him, hee came the day after his coronation to the same Church to Euen-song, being attended by the officers, Prelates, and Knights of the said Order in their robes, where the ceremonies required by the said Statutes, were exactly obserued. The King hauing his chaire of State in the Quier, came towards the high Altar, being led by the Prince of Conty, and the Earle of Soissons, all the officers of the Order going before them, where hee tooke the oath of the said Order (as head and Soueraigne thereof) in the hands of the Cardinall, laying his hand vpon the Gospell, which the Chancellor of the sayd Order held vnto him: which done, Atens: de Rhodis Prouost of both Orders, put on his robes, and the Cardinall put the Coller vpon his shoulders: the Seig: of Pileux sonne to the Chancellor, and Treasurer of the said Order, deliuered vnto the Cardinall a Crosse hanging at a blew ribbon, after which his Maiestie returned to his first place, where he was saluted by all the Knights: but before his coming from the Altar, the Prince of Conde was led vp by the Dukes of Espenon and Montbascon, where he alone was made Knight of the Order by the King.

These ceremonies being all ended, the King returned to Paris, where he was received by Atens: de Lioncourt Gouverneur of the City, the Prouost of Merchants, the Sherifes, and two hundred Burgeses on horseback, hauing before them three Companies of horsemen richly appointed, who attended him without Saint Anthonies gate, where the Prouost of Merchants made a speech vnto him, shewing the desires and vovues which his most faithfull subjects of his good City of Paris made vnto God, that hee would fend him all happinesse and prosperity during his reigne. In the meane time the Duke of Sully, great master of the Artillery, had drawne forth of the Arsenall 93 great peeces of Ordnance, which were planted vpon the Bulwarke at Saint Anthonies gate, with a great number of Chambers, all which saluted the King at his entry. After which the King came into the City with some troopes of horse, and all his guards, being attended by many Princes, Noblemen, and officers, in great state.

In the beginning of this ycare, Philip the 3 King of Spaine, had by his Edict banished all the new Christians called Morisques, being in number 900000 persons, vpon pretext that they had conspired against his Estate: for the execution whereof, hee published an Edict for which there was no preuention; so as all ships and vessels were stayed in the Portes of Spaine, of what nation soeuer, to transport them whither they would. Many past from Spaine to diuers ports of Barbary. But during the whole ycare at diuers times, there entred into France about 150000 persons of these Morisques: whereupon King Henry the fourth being full of charity and bounty, embraced this occasion, and made a decree touching their entry and passage in France: the tenor whereof was; That hauing beene aduertised of a decree lately made by the King of Spaine, carying an expresse commandement to all Morisques liuing in his Country of Spaine to depart within a short time, vpon great penalties, which he caused to be executed vpon them; and that by reason thereof great numbers of families of the sayd Morisques, were come into his Country; his maiestie hauing a good intention to vse all humanity towards them, for the receiving of them into his kingdome: that such as would make profession of the Catholike and Romish Religion, might remaine there with all safety; and as for the rest which would not, they should haue passage vnto his ports of the Leuant Seas, from thence to be transported into Barbary, or whither they pleased. For the execution of the Kings Edict, a Commission was sent downe to Augier, Prouost generall of Languedoc, to conduct them in their passage vnto the nearest Hauens of the Leuant Sea, where hee embarked at diuers times about thirty thousand which landed at Tunis in Barbary in safety.

King Henrys decree touching the Morisques.

A The Queene Regent being aduertised that there were 50000 Morisques of Arragon marching into France, and that there were already a great many of Grenadains in Prouence: their Maiesties being carefull of the preservation of the said Morisques, as well to preuent the complaint of their commissaries, as to hasten their passage into Barbary, by reason of the gricauances of the inhabitants of Prouence and Languedoc, touching the discommoditie of their stay, and the danger of infection through the misery whereunto many of them were reduced: Their Maiesties sent a master of Requests with commission to free those Countries of so many Morisques, and to cause them to bee transported into Barbary, without any wrong or iniury done vnto them; and to haue a care that the inhabitants of those Prouinces might liue in peace. The care of these embarkments was again committed to Augier, by a Commission, and Letters of recommendations from the Queene, dated the 19 of August 1610, wherein he discharged himselfe very faithfully, as it seemes by a certificate made by the Commissaries of the said Morisques; yet afterward they made great complaints against him, and others whom hee had employed in these embarkments: and one Lopez, Commissary for the Morisques, went soone afterwards to the Court to complaine vnto their Maiesties: and vpon a Petition presented vnto the priuy Councell, against Augier, and some inhabitants of Agde, he obtained a Commission to call them vp.

Augier appeared vpon the summons, giues in his defences in writing, causeth a declaration to be printed of al which had past in the embarkment of the Morisques, & protests that he had not medled with the impositions and taxes leauied vpon them, nor with the seizure of their goods, the searching of their Barks, nor the imprisonment of any one of them. He produced certaine certificates, shewing that hee had safely conducted 60000 Morisques through the Country of Languedoc, hauing caused them to be embarked at Agde with much care and diligence, and transported into Barbary with their goods in all safety. Lopez on the other side continuing his complaints, sayd that Augier, Ioseph Palmier, and Iohn Anthony Jordan, inhabitants of the towne of Agde, vnder colour of searching some vessels, to force the rich Morisques to pay for the charges of the poores embarkment, had caried away a great number of Royals of plate belonging to diuers private men: and that in these proceedings there had beene many thefts and exactions committed contrary to all right and equity. Vpon these complaints, the Councell sent the examination of the cause to the Court of Parliament, for the ease of the parties. Augier seeing this businesse to take another course then he expected, retired into Languedoc, where he lurked, and sought by all meanes to auoid the iustice of this Court. On the other side the procurer of the Morisques, pursued his complaints with all diligence, hauing obtained a personall adournment against Augier and some others: what succeeded wee may heare hereafter.

This ycare Cardinall Bellarmino had caused a Booke to be printed at Rome, entituled it, A Treatise of the Popes power in Temporall causes: It came no sooner into France, but they obserued many things therein against the temporall power of Kings. In this Treatise hee did strue to proue his pretended power of the Pope ouer Kings in temporall causes: in regard whereof, the Kings learned Councell sought out this Booke and presented it to the Court, with obseruations of such things as they found contrary to the soueraigne power of Princes ordained of God, especially in the Realme of France. And on the 26 of Nouember, Mons: Seruin the Kings first Aduocate, in the remonstrance which he made vnto the Court vpon that subiect, sayd; That all new bookes which taught that the Pope was aboue Kings in temporall things, should not be allowed; and that there were too many which presumed to write against Princes and temporall Estates, whereat not onely the sayd Princes, but all good subjects had reason to be offended: as of late the officers of the King of Spaine had beene against the writings of Cardinall Baronius, concerning Sicily, whereby they haue purchased a great deale of honour throughout the world: And we (sayd he) owe no lesse vnto our most Christian King, for the life, and for the honour of his Maiesty, and for the temporall of his Estates: yea if at any time it be holy, if it bee iust, if it be honourable, if it be an argument of courage and loue in the French to their King and Country, to hold the Maximes of truth, and to defend the freedoms and liberties of the Gallicane Church, truly it should now chiefly appeare, during the monage of our King, reigning vnder the happy regency of the Queene his mother, the which God com-

Oyle, with this inscription, Francis datamunera celi. Thus much I have thought good to write for the Readers better satisfaction touching the substance of the Kings Coronation, for that it hath not bene so particularly set downe in the life of any of the precedent Kings.

As for those things which followed during the Masse, the Kings going to the offering, his receiving of the Communion, and the royall feast made in the Archbishops Palace, I must be forced to passe over with silence, fearing I should be both tedious to the Reader, and wrong the History, being tyed to strict bounds.

Ceremonies observed when the King receiveth the Order of the Holy Ghost.

The King desiring according to the statutes of the Order of the Holy Ghost to receive the Coller of the same Order from the Cardinall who had anointed him, hee came the day after his coronation to the same Church to Euen-song, being attended by the officers, Prelates, and Knights of the said Order in their robes, where the ceremonies required by the said Statutes, were exactly observed. The King having his chaire of State in the Quier, came towards the high Altar, being led by the Prince of Conty, and the Earle of Soissons, all the officers of the Order going before them, where hee tooke the oath of the said Order (as head and Soueraigne thereof) in the hands of the Cardinall, laying his hand vpon the Gospell, which the Chancellor of the said Order held vnto him: which done, Atous de Rhodes Prouost of both Orders, put on his robes, and the Cardinall put the Coller vpon his shoulders: the Seig: of Pisseux sonne to the Chancellor, and Treasurer of the said Order, deliuered vnto the Cardinall a Crosse hanging at a blew ribbon, after which his Maiestie returned to his first place, where he was saluted by all the Knights: but before his coming from the Altar, the Prince of Conde was led vp by the Dukes of Elpheron and Montbason, where he alone was made Knight of the Order by the King.

The King returns to Paris.

These ceremonies being all ended, the King returned to Paris, where he was received by Atous de Lioncourt Gouverneur of the City, the Prouost of Merchants, the Sherifes, and two hundred Burgeses on horseback, having before them three Companies of horsemen richly appointed, who attended him without Saint Anthonies gate, where the Prouost of Merchants made a speech vnto him, shewing the desires and vowes which his most faithfull subjects of his good City of Paris made vnto God, that hee would send him all happiness and prosperity during his reigne. In the meane time the Duke of Sully, great master of the Artillery, had drawne forth of the Arkenall 93 great peeces of Ordnance, which were planted vpon the Bulwarke at Saint Anthonies gate, with a great number of Chambers, all which saluted the King at his entry. After which the King came into the City with some troopes of horse, and all his guards, being attended by many Princes, Noblemen, and officers, in great state.

The new Christians banished out of Spaine.

In the beginning of this yeare, Philip the 3 King of Spaine, had by his Edict banished all the new Christians called Morisques, being in number 900000 persons, vpon pretext that they had conspired against his Estate: for the execution whereof, hee published an Edict for which there was no prevention; so as all ships and vessels were stayed in the Portes of Spaine, of what nation soever, to transport them whither they would. Many past from Spaine to diuers ports of Barbary. But during the whole yeare at diuers times, there entered into France about 150000 persons of these Morisques: whereupon King Henry the fourth being full of charity and bounty, embraced this occasion, and made a decree touching their entry and passage in France: the tenor whereof was; That hauing bene advertised of a decree lately made by the King of Spaine, carrying an expresse commandement to all Morisques living in his Country of Spain to depart within a short time, vpon great penalties, which he caused to be executed vpon them; and that by reason thereof great numbers of families of the sayd Morisques, were come into his Country, his maiestie hauing a good intention to vse all humanity towards them, for the receiving of them into his kingdome: that such as would make profession of the Catholike and Romish Religion, might remaine there with all safety; and as for the rest which would not, they should haue passage vnto his ports of the Leuant seas, from thence to be transported into Barbary, or whither they pleased. For the execution of the Kings Edict, a Commission was sent downe to Augier, Prouost generall of Languedoc, to conduct them in their passage vnto the nearest Hauens of the Leuant Sea, where hee embarked at diuers times about thirty thousand which landed at Tunis in Barbary in safety.

The Queene Regents protestation for the Morisques.

A The Queene Regent being advertised that there were 50000 Morisques of Arragon marching into France, and that there were already a great many of Grenadains in Prouence: their Maiesties being careful of the preferuation of the said Morisques, as well to prevent the complaint of their commissaries, as to hasten their passage into Barbary, by reason of the grieuances of the inhabitants of Prouence and Languedoc, touching the commodities of their stay, and the danger of infection, through the misery whereunto many of them were reduced: Their Maiesties sent a master of Requests with commission to free those Countries of so many Morisques, and to cause them to be transported into Barbary, without any wrong or injury done vnto them; and to haue a care that the inhabitants of those Prouinces might liue in peace. The care of these embarkments was again committed to Augier, by a Commission, and Letters of recommendations from the Queene, dated the 19 of August 1610, wherein he discharged himselfe very faithfully, as it seemes by a certificate made by the Commissaries of the said Morisques; yet afterward they made great complaints against him, and others whom he had employed in these embarkments: and one Lopez, Commissary for the Morisques, went soone afterwards to the Court to complaine vnto their Maiesties: and vpon a Petition presented vnto the priuy Councell, against Augier, and some inhabitants of Agde, he obtained a Commission to call them vp.

Augier appeared vpon the summons, giues in his defences in writing, causeth a declaration to be printed of al which had past in the embarking of the Morisques, & protests that he had not medled with the impositions and taxes leauied vpon them, nor with the seizure of their goods, the searching of their Barks, nor the imprisonment of any one of them. He produced certaine certificates, shewing that hee had safely conducted 60000 Morisques through the Country of Languedoc, hauing caused them to be embarked at Agde with much care and diligence, and transported into Barbary with their goods in all safety. Lopez on the other side continuing his complaints, sayd that Augier, Ioseph Palmier, and Iohn Anthony Jordan, inhabitants of the towne of Agde, vnder colour of searching some vessels, to force the rich Morisques to pay for the charges of the poores embarkment, had caried away a great number of Royals of plate belonging to diuers private men: and that in these proceedings there had bene many thefts and exactions committed contrary to all right and equity. Vpon these complaints, the Councell sent the examination of the cause to the Court of Parliament, for the sake of the parties. Augier seeing this businesse to take another course then he expected, retired into Languedoc, where he lurked, and fought by all meanes to auoid the iustice of this Court: On the other side the procurer of the Morisques, pursued his complaints with all diligence, hauing obtained a personall adiournment against Augier and some others: what succeeded we may heare hereafter.

Augier called in question by the Morisques.

This yeare Cardinall Bellarmino had caused a Booke to be printed at Rome, entituled it, A Treatise of the Popes power in Temporall causes: It came no sooner into France, but they observed many things therein against the temporall power of Kings. commands vs by the mouth of his Apostles : wherein the Pope shall not be wronged, neither shall he have any cause of discontentment : which point had beene formerly contested by many grave and learned men, who have maintained, That the King of France doth not acknowledge any power or authority in temporall causes. And as for themselves who were bound to speake ; being of the Kings Councill, having examined Cardinall Bellarmines Booke, they should hold themselves blame worthy to have failed of their duties, if after the murder of their late Kings Henry the third and fourth by inhumane parricides or execrable monsters, inspired and stirred up by false doctrines, they should not cry out vpon all occasions, Against the Maximes and propositions which import the life, dignity, and majesty of the King, and the Queene Regent his mother : and the Iudges of this great Parliament should be inexorable, yea worthy of blame, not onely now but hereafter, when as the King shall come to age, if in stead of receiving this complaint as iust, they should suffer such pernicious writings to passe without a fit and severe censure. Whereupon hee concluded, that all men of what quality or condition soever, should be forbidden to receive, keep, print, or cause to be printed, this booke of Bellarmines, vpon paine to be declared guilty of high treason in the first degree : and all men enioyned, which haue or may haue, know, or may know, where any one is within the Realme, to declare it to the Iudges of the place, or to the substitutes of the Kings proctor general, to be suppressed exemplarily, as being a doctrine contrary to the dignity, authority, and soueraignty royall, and tending to cause the subject to revolt against the King, and to attempt against his life and Estate : And that inhibitions might be made vnto all persons vpon the same penalty, to write or teach in Schooles or elsewhere the like doctrine. The great Chamber, the Tur-nelle, and the Chamber of the Edict, being assembled vpon this motion, the Court made a decree against Bellarmines booke, according to the conclusion of the Kings Advocate, whereof the Popes Nuncio made many complaints vnto the Kings Councill, seeking by all means to haue this same decree suspended.

Death of Du Haillant Historiographer of France.

The second year of this reigne.
Hired and iealousies among the Nobles.

A decree to call all Noblemen and officers of the Crowne
to the Court.

I will end this year with the death and end of a famous Historiographer, who was much honoured by the French : I meane Bernard de Gerrard Seig: of Haillant, who died being 75 yeares old. Henry the third, to requite the paines hee tooke in the first booke of his French History, rewarded him with a place of a Secretary of the Treasury. Afterwards D having dedicated his History of France vnto him, the which he had collected out of ancient Authors, as the first body of a History attired in a French habit, hee honoured him with the place of a Councillor and Historiographer of France, the which he made a settled office, with a fee of 1200 Crowne a yeare. Since, he made a Treatise of the successe of the affaires of France, and other bookes. He had the office of Generalgilt of the Knights of the Order of the Holy Ghost, at the creation of this Order. King Henry the third loved him for that he was well scene in the History of France, for his freedom of speech, and for his quick answers and replies.

Since the Kings Coronation, which was in October last past, vntill the beginning of this year, hatred, enuy, ialousies and discontents began to grow amongst the greatest of this Kingdom ; some for preferment of governments, addition of offices and dignities, and for increase of fees and pensions ; others for gratuities given to some in secret, which before the end of the year did much disquiet and trouble both the King, Queene, and Councill, how to containe every one in his dutie, and in good correspondency one with another, for the quiet of the State, and the Kings seruice. And for that many vpon this subject, retired themselves daily from Court, and did not attend their Maiesties as they were bound by their births and callings, but kept the field with troopes of horse, (which bred a ialousie that there were some designs to the prejudice of the publike peace and tranquillity) the King being assisted by the Queene Regent his mother, with the aduice of many Princes, Dukes, Noblemen and officers of the Crowne, ordained in his Councill of State, F that all Noblemen, Gentlemen, and officers of the Crowne and House of France, bound thereunto by any wages or pensions from his Maiesty, should (within one month after the publication thereof) repaire to Court, there to attend, and to doe their personal seruice ; and in case of disobedience, to lose all their dignities, offices, priuileiges, fees, and pensions. And at the same time commandement was sent from their Maiesties to many towns, not to suffer any to enter so strong as they might prescribe them a law, yet wholly relying on their faith and loyalties, without any other prouision for their safeties.

A This decree being come to the notice of the said Noblemen which were absent, every man prepared himselfe to obey. In the winter-time all came to Paris, but with such traines as it did somewhat amaze the Citizens ; but the Queene to prevent all attempts which might trouble the peoples quiet, and seeing the daily quarrels and challenges among many great men, marching as well by day as by night, through the Citie and suburbs, followed by many Gentlemen well armed and mounted, shee sought to stay the course, and prevent the execution of many designs, commanding the inhabitants to haue their armes ready, to come forth armed at all seasons, vpon any, which should quarrell vpon any pretext whatsoeuer : the which did somewhat abate the courage of such as had a will to doe but cuill ; and yet their hatred growing through enuy and priuate ialousies, dyed not, vntill the Queene had taken away the cause by another means. For, considering that they who during the life of the deceased King, were kept in awe by the onely feare they had to lose his fauor, would hardly now yeeld vnto the King her sonne the seruice and obedience due vnto him for the many honors and fauors done them by their Maiesties ; and that he which was formerly content with ten, would not now be satisfied with any hundred ; and in a word, that all this mischiefe tended onely to make themselves great during the Kings minority : the Queene Regent had recourse to means not befitting the dignity of the King, to containe the authors of these crosses in their duties, to avoid a worse inconuenience which the necessity of the time did extort, distributing honors, offices, pensions, and gratuities among the Nobility : so as more Gentlemen of note and quality were gratified then by the deceased King ; and more companies of men of armes were entertained ; by which means all things seemed quiet : yet their discontents burst out againe ; for on the third of January the whole Louure was full of drawne swords vpon a light quarrell betweene the two first Gentlemen of the Kings chamber, Montf: de Belgarde Master of the Horse, and the Marquis d'Ancre ; the which notwithstanding was presently reconciled by her Maiesties commandement.

The Parisians
commanded to haue their armes ready.

This was no sooner reconciled, but an accident begot another ; but between other personages, between Princes of the blood, and between two brethren, to wit, the Prince of Conty, and the Earle of Soissons, which also engendred another, that without the Queen Regents preuention might haue plunged France into the like troubles it was in during the quarrels of the Houses of Orleans and Bourguindy. And thus they hapned.

On Munday the 10 of January about foure or fve a clock at night, the Prince of Conty going to the Louure in his Carrosse, with foure or fve of his followers on horse-back, met with the Earle of Soissons his brother, in his Carrosse also, being followed by eightene or twenty on horse-backe : and for that the street was encombred, one of the Carrosses must of force stay to let the other passe. The Gentleman of the Earles horse, not knowing the Princes Coach-man, would haue caused him to stay, commanding to goe backe with threats (as commonly they doe which accompany such Princes, and are many times the cause of great quarrels) which being heard by those which were in the Princes Carrosse, E he they commanded the Coach-man to put forwards his horses, and to passe on at what time they which were with the Earle told him, that it was the Prince ; he presently sent a Gentleman to make his excuse for the error, which had beene committed by the indiscretion of the Gentleman of his horse, beseeching him to beleue that it was without any designe, and that hee was his most humble seruant. Notwithstanding, the Prince in passing cryed out vnto him, To morrow we will try it out in our shirts. The Queene Mother (being instantly aduerted of what had past) sent to the Earle of Soissons, commanding him to keepe his lodging vntill shee had reconciled the businesse : And at the same instant the commanded the prince of Condé, and afterwards the Duke of Guise (who was brother in law to the prince of Conty) to visit the said prince the next day, and dispose him to an accord, F seeing that what had past was not done with any designe : and that the Earle of Soissons should send the party to him who had committed this indiscretion, to craue his pardon.

Prince of Con-ty and the Earle of Soissons.

Both went according to the Queenes commandement, but not together. The prince of Condé going in his Carrosse, with foure Gentlemen onely on horse-backe, encountered with the Duke of Guise at point Bussy, accompanied with an 150 horse coming from the prince of Conty ; he told him that hee had disposed the prince to refer himselfe vnto his iudgement for his satisfaction ; for the which he gaue him great thanks. The Duke caused his brother the Cheualier du Guise to accompany him to the prince of Conty, and to put him him in minde of his promise, he himselfe also offering to accompany him, but he refused it. So the Prince of Conty having confided to his Nephew the Prince of Condé what he had spoken to the Duke of Guise, that quarrell was ended.

But upon the report which was at the same instant made unto the Earle of Soifsons, that the Duke of Guise went through the City with 150 horse to braye him: that hee had past by his house to make shew of his troope: that all those which were with him had coats of male, and that he had caused fifty to be bought: that they had heard these words spoken by the Prince of Conty's followers, I am servant to the King, to the Queene, and to the Duke of Orleans. Finally, that all this was not without some project against him, considering what had past for the young Lady of Montpensier promised to the duke of Orleans, whom they of Bourbon desired as being of their blood and House; seeing the Duchesse dowager of Montpensier her mother was newly married to the Duke of Guise. This report I say bred a quarrell between the Earle of Soifsons, and the Duke of Guise. The Queene was suddenly advertised hereof, who sent Monf: de Vitry Captain of the Guard to remaine with the duke of Guise & his brethren, and to command them to keep their lodgings untill he had otherwise determined. About two of the clocke in the afternoon, the Earle of Soifsons came to the Loure to the Queene. A Councell was called, where there assisted the Constable, the Dukes of Elsporn, Sully & Bouillon, the Chancellor, President Laini, the Marshalls of Brissac and Boislauphin, with the M. of the horse.

The Constable demanded Justice of the Queene against the Duke of Guise, who had gone out of his lodging with 150 horse to braye the Earle of Soifsons. The Duke of Sully tooke the speech upon him for Monf: de Guise, and said unto the Queen: Madam, the demand which my Lord the Constable maketh unto you is very reasonable, and you owe justice to all your subjects, and especially to Princes of the blood: but you must understand whereof they complaine. There can nothing be alledged, but that the D. of Guise went out of his lodging with 150 horse to braye the Earle of Soifsons. I have not scene Monf: de Guise, but as far as I can learne from some of his with whom I spake even now, he went in the morning from his wives lodging by your Maiesties commandement, to try if he might dispole the Prince of Conty his brother in law to a reconciliation with the Earle of Soifsons; that without passing before the Earles lodging which was his nearest way, he had gone through S. Honoris street and so over the new bridge, with an intent that if he had met with the Earle, to have saluted him and given him the way, for that he hath no quarrell unto him but is his servant. Moreover, that the Duke of Guise seeing his company greater when he came from the Prince of Conty, then when hee went thither, he would not come directly to your Maiestie to give an account of what hee had done, but retired himselfe to his owne house. The Dukes of Elsporn and Bouillon confirmed the same.

This excuse was presently sent to be propounded to the Earle of Soifsons, to see if hee would rest satisfied. He refused foure of them which were in Councell, pretending their strict friendship and nere alliance with the Duke of Guise. In the end it was concluded that the quarrell should be ended by a discourse which the Queene should make, whereunto the Duke of Guise should answer. There were many difficulties on the forme of this discourse, wherein that day and the next were spent. Upon these alterations the Burgeses were commanded to arme in those quarters which were nearest to the Loure. Whether it were upon the leuaine of an old quarrell (although compounded) between the Earle of Soifsons and the duke of Sully, or for any other intention, the Marquis of Rhofny his sonne, the duke of Rohan his son in law, and all their friends which were many (for persons doe alwaies follow those that governe the treasure) went to the D. of Guise, who being assisted by them of his family, and those which were allied unto him, shewed himselfe with a great troope of Princes and Nobility, going to visit the duke of Maine, to demand his aduice touching the forme of the discourse which they would have him make unto the Queene. The Duke of Maine came unto the Loure and saw the Queene, who in the beginning complained to see that such a received pension from the king her son, did not assist him, but sided with the one or the other party. Her Maiesty knew well that this quarrell (if it were not reconciled) would have a fallall end; imitating the deceased King her husband, who would not suffer any quarrell in his Court vnderived; told the Dukes of Maine and Bouillon, that her pleasure was, it should be speedily ended: That

A the would have the honor of the Princes of the blood preferred, that whosoever attempted against them did as much as if they had affronted the King her sonne. The Duke of Maine besought her, that the honour of his House might not be committed to the iudgement of passionate men: that they and their friends had serued her Maiesty unto her Regency: that they had no interest but the preferation of the State vnder the lawfull authority of their Maiesties, and that he had rather see them all dead, then to see them faile in the respect & obedience which they did owe them. In the end they all thought it good that the duke of Maine should say unto the Queene for the D. of Guise, that which was contained in a writings which they had caused to be drawne, but in the absence of both the parties. The next day being the 14. of the month, about two of the clocke in the afternoon, the D. of Maine came to effect her Maiesties pleasure, where in the presence of the king, Queene, Princes & Noblemen of the Court, he spake these words for the D. of Guise. Madam, upon the opinion that my Lord the Earle of Soifsons hath had, that that which passed on Tuesday, hath given him some occasion to complaine of mee, I can assure your Maiesty, that I had no thought nor intention to grieve him cause, and should be very sorry to have done it, contrary to my selfe, if I had encountered him, I would have done him the honour which is due unto him, desiring to remain his most humble servant. Whereupon the Queen answered, I am glad of that which you say unto me, and rest satisfied. Hereupon the Prince of Condé presently charge to repaire unto the Earle of Soifsons, to acquaint him with what had past, and to command him to conforme himselfe to her Maiesties will: the which he promised to doe. And so this quarrell was ended by the Regents wisdom: and these Princes did afterwards make shew that they had forgotten it.

Within 3 daies after there grew another quarrell neere unto the Queenes chamber, but he that had committed the offence (although he were of quality) was glad to submit himselfe unto the Bastile, from whence the Queene soon after freed him. This example made them more wife and circumspect: And to the end that St. Germaines Faire, should not be an occasion to breed new quarrels, her Maiestie would not suffer it to be kept this year. But being told that many Merchants would breake and become bankrupt if it did faile: the answerd, it were better 500 Merchants were ruined (the which will not happen) then France should fall into combustion.

All things being reasonable well quiered and settled in France; In the beginning of this year, the Councell beganne to consult of that which might concerne the discharge and ease of the State, & of the kings subjects. First, there were propounded the complaints and grieuances of the Inhabitants and townes upon the river of Loire, touching the great discommodities the Country had suffered during the last troubles, by the Garison of the Towne and Castle of Amboise: wherefore to secure the Country and to free the Inhabitants from future feare, it was concluded in Councell to give unto Monf: du Gasi (who was Governor of the said Castle) a certaine summe of money in regard of his seruices, and to resigne it into the Kings hands.

E Next, they tooke into their considerations, the Citadell of Bourg in Bresse; their Maiesties being informed what great sums of money were yearly employed for the payment of that Garison; In regard whereof, and for that it had bene built by the Duke of Saoy, expressly to annoy France, for the losse whereof he was still grieved, and might well have some intelligences to surprize it; it was ordained (with the consent of the councell) That the Citadell should be raised to assure France on that side, and that the money which should be employed for payment of the garison should be given to Monf: de Boisse, who was governour thereof, both in regard of his disbursements, and recompence of his seruices, the which should no way incommode the King, but rather ease his coffers, by the sparing of so much money as was to be paid yearly to the Garison. This demanteling did free them of Lions, and the neighbour Countries from feare of future alterations.

About the same time, the French Ambassadour residing for the King with the Grisons, had charge to deliuer the reasons which did import France upon the new pursuite of the Venetians, for the renewing of their League with the Grison Cantons, before he should engage the Kings name and reputation: for calling to minde the accidents which had befallen those Cantons, after their first league with Venice, and had bene allowed by the deceased King, (whereof he afterwards repented himselfe, when as he saw it did preiudice his owne) and had plunged that Nation into great confusions and miseries, ries, the memory whereof was alwaies reuiued if they did but cast their eyes vpon the A Fort of Fuentes, built vpon the frontier of their Country, after the first League made with Venice, and vpon that occasion: yet their Maiesties desiring to fauour those commonalties, in imitation of the deceased King, gaue charge to their Ambassadour, that the capitulations of the first league should be perused before it were renewed, to reforme what might be preiudiciall to that of France, and that the Ambassadour of the said Canons residing at Paris, should confer with his Maiesties Councell touching the same.

Soone after the reconciliation of the Earle of Soissons, and the duke of Guise, the duke of Sully resigned his places of superintendant of the Treasure, and Captaine of the Bastile into the Queenes hand.

This bred admiration in many, to see a man of his worth and merit, dismissed without crime, having beene so faithfull a seruant to the deceased King his Master, and so good a Husband for the State. Men spake diuersly of this action, some said hee did it voluntarily of his owne free-will, and by the aduice of his friends, considering the harred this charge had gotten him in seruing his King and Country faithfully: and now finding that by the death of his Prince he had lost all hope hereafter quietly to execute his place, he gaue way to the will of the enemies of his prosperity, and desisted willingly, yea (as they say) by the Queenes aduice: who when as he resigned the keyes of the Bastile, and of the Kings treasure into her hands, made offer vnto him of a recompence in money, the which he refused, beseeching her Maiesty to keepe in memory the seruices which he had done C vnto France vnder the deceased King. After which he wrote this following Letter vnto her, the which I haue set downe verbatim, hoping thereby to giue the Reader much content, in acquainting him in what Estate France stood at the old Kings death.

Madam, among all the honorable conditions of a French gentleman, I haue alwaies most esteemed that, to be employed in the most important affaires of his Country; to gouerne them happily; and to obey the Commandments of his Prince. For many yeares I haue managed the chiefe of this Estate, with an vnexpected successe. I haue caried them from a deepe gulf of misery, to the height of all glory: And now Madam, I obey your expresse will and desire, I deliuer into your hands, the two goodliest markes of my good Masters fauour and bounty, the Bastile and the Treasures I held them during his life, I yeeld them D vnto you after his death; and will content my selfe, that the effects of my seruice remaine for euer grauen in the hearts of your subjects: Some one lesse faithfull then my selfe would fill all France with his complaints: but my perpetuall deuotion to the place of my birth, and to my King, strikes my tongue dumbe, and makes mee rather seeke the cause of so great a change in mine owne incapacity, then in any other consideration. One thing Madam much disquiets my minde: which is, your Maiesties absolute resolution to haue me take money in recompence of my offices; not for that I doe not conceiue how necessary this expedient is for the good of your seruices; but on the other side, it is so contrary to my demands, as notwithstanding all the power I haue ouer my selfe to please you, yet haue I not enough to accept thereof. Nay I am forced to refuse it, and to pretresse E contrary to my duty in this subject; my owne priuate interest before that of you Maiestie. Of all the meanes propounded vnto mee to leaue my charge, this should be most odious vnto me, and in truth Laboure it, and hold it to proceede from the malice of mine enemies, not from your Maiesties bounty: For Madame, why doe they not rather lay this pretext, vpon my fower disposition, vnsofiable, without gratification or dissimulation; or vpon the bad order I haue taken in my charges; or that I haue beene a bad husband in managing of the Treasure; and vpon the miseries which haue ensued; vpon the strong intelligence which I haue practised both within and without the Realme; and vpon the great care I haue taken to settle my selfe for the preservation of my fortunes? Why Madame, haue they not rather made choice of these grounds then of another, which hath F lesse shew of truth? For to publish that I euer demanded recompence for my office of the Treasure, other then the place of a Marshall of France, it can neuer bee truly maintained: The malice of mine enemies, nor pleasing of some of my friends, shall neuer be able to iustifie the contrary. And if your Maiestie charge mee, to haue my selfe made offer vnto you of all that I did inioy, I confesse it: I cannot deny but I haue often assured your Maiesty, that whatsoeuer depended on me was at your deuotion, yea my life it selfe. But truly Madam, I did not then thinke that to make such offers to his Prince, was a crime sufficient

A sufficient to dispossesse him of his dignities. If you conceiue it so now it is a Maxime which seemeth new to me: but this nouelty shall neuer make me repent to haue done my duty. Contrariwise I againe offer vnto your Maiesty, not onely my honours and goods, but my life it selfe, and that of my children, the which I doe not with condition; but to dispose of at your pleasure, yea, were it to honor my very enemies, if to take them simply from me may not content you. If my actions past haue serued for the increase of this Crowne, I will that my obedience shall shew the way to persueue it; and whatsoeuer mine enemies shall publish of my loue to what I hold, or howsoeuer other mens humors may perswade beliefs; yet Madam, it is true that I will abandon whatsoeuer my seruices B haue gotten mee, with more resolution and constancy, then another shall enioy them with pleasure: It shall suffice me to heare in my solitarie how your Maiesty shall daily make this Scepter more flourishing, maintaine good order in the affaires; and keepe treasure in your coffers sufficient to maintain this Estate, which doth chiefly subsist by the support of these two pillars. With this will I quietly entertaine my idle thoughts, and comfort my selfe in the losse of my good King, without being forced (if it please you) to accept any other recompence for my offices then the contentment to receive none, and the honor of your expresse commandement. Yet notwithstanding for your last resolution, and not to shew my selfe disobedient vnto your will, if your Maiesty haue absolutely decreed to doe the contrary: behold then the greatest fauour which I most humbly C beseech you to recompence mee withall, is; that it would please you to command my greatest enemies to goe instantly to the chamber of Account to verifie the profit or prejudice of my cares and watches for these 12 yeares; and if they finde not, that during this time vnder the power of my great King, I haue assisted much by my dexterity and labour to roote out the greatest confusion that euer was in the finances of France: That I haue besides the sparing of eight millions of Liuers yearly for the which they are accountable to his Officers, besides the payment of all the charges, of all the ordinary expences of the State, of all wages for Soueraigne Courts, of all men of Warre, Garisons, Embassies, the Kings Houise, Voyages, Presents, Rcompences, and a thousand other charges too long to reapeate: Besides all these ordinary great summes without the increase of any D taxes or impositions within the Realme, but diminished them. If they find not I say, that moreover, for the intertainment of three great Armies, whereof the one tooke Amiens, another reduced Britanie, and the third conquered Bresse and Sauoy. I caused about 12 Millions to be furnished extraordinarily. For the discharge of the debts of France grown by treaties and otherwise about 25 millions: for the payment of the debts in Swisserland, Germany, Italy, and England, about 30 Millions: for the payment of Pensions, within and without the Realme, about 28 Millions: for the furnishing of foraigne Prouinces about 8 millions: for the repairing of the Artillery, fortifications, waies and buildings about 8 millions: for the ease and reliefe of the poore, about 6 millions: And to deliuer in treasure into the Coffers at the Bastile, or to leaue in the custodie of the Treasurer, about 17 E Millions: To discharge many other expences which may bee easily verified about 20 Millions. If I haue not caused contracts to be past for the redeeming of the Crown-lands engaged, whereof the greatest part are daily executed, these redemptions amounting to about 40 millions. Finally Madam, if I haue not by my care and vigilancy practised all these courses of sparing: and if to continue the same duty towards France, I haue not alwaies offered vnto your Maiesty to lose my life, or to maintain the affaires in the same splendor, yea to represent them in a higher degree: If I haue not done all these things; and more, I then submit my selfe to receive for a punishment of my presumption, that recompence which you ordaine me in the losse of my honor and Offices. But Madam, if no one of these Articles be found false, but in that they are too sparing, and if my first affection F hath receiued no change, but is more fortified, suffer mee to endure the harme which is done me, and not to accept the good you offer me. Take my places without this heauie burden: or if you will of necessity honor me with some fauour, let it bee (if it please you) onely with the perpetuall remembrance of my fidelity; a fauour which I craue your Maiesty, not to be called againe to the painful toyle of affaires; but onely to suffer mee to liue in peace; in the memory of her who is the Regent of my Country, the liuing soule of my Master, and the mother of my King. And doubtlesse Madam, it is an honour, and the last acknowledgment which your Maiesty cannot iustly denie me: for seeing that all they whom whom I have offended in the execution of my place, labour to see mee deprived, with A greater reason they may well remember my seruices with triumph.

“ King and Kingdomes; to whom the happinesse of this estate augmented in new reueng-“ nces, and the Coffers of our young Master, filled by iust and lawfull meanes, is bound for “ the good order which I haue setled. I haue had great honours and receiued great re-“ compences for my industrious care; I haue had great power and authority vnder a B “ great King; but in a moment, in this bloody fall, I haue seene it all fall to ruine, in the “ same disaster: I haue seene all this ruine quenched which hath made many to threaten “ me often with ruine, whilst I endeauored the good of the State, and sought onely to get “ the fauour of my Master, not caring for great men, nor knowing how to seeke an applause
“ of the people, being still constant in this designe. But now depart from me all trouble“ some cares, I haue resolued to retire my ship into a safe Port: it may bee the State hauing “ lost me, will finde whereunto I was profitable, and the people will know it: then, but too “ late, fauour and affection will succeed hatred; but I haue not mine owne interest in such “ esteeme, as I desire to gaine by the miseries of my Country; But O God make the for“ tunes of this Kingdom alwaies to stand in good estate, that I may neuer see it ouerthrowne C “ and that it may haue no cause to lament me.

After this the Duke of Sully in the beginning of Februarie, left the Court of France, and retired himselfe of his Towne of Sully vpon the riuer of Loire.

The slanderous accusation of D'Escoman
condemned.

Let vs now turne to some memorable executiōs of Iustice. In the beginning of this year, there was a most slanderous accusation made by a woman, wife to a poore Gentleman, whose name was Isaac de Varennes, Seigneur of D'Escoman. This woman was crook't back't and lame, but of an actiue spirit; a great talker, subtle, cunning and of a great memorie, but of a lewd and vicious life. Being in pouerty & want, and newly gotten out of prison, she thought to frame an accusation whereby shee hoped to releuee herselfe and to advance her fortune. She had obserued that Queene Marguerit came often for deuotion D to Saint Victors Church, where this D'Escoman tooke occasion to speake vnto her, beseeching her to heare her, and that she would discouer some matter which did concerne the life of the King and Queene Regent his mother. Queene Marguerit remembering that she had seene her, and that shee had refused her seruice for her bad life, would not heare her; whereupon shee cryed out, that if she had designe, whereon depended their Maiesties liues should take effect, the blame should be laid vpon her: whereupon the Queene commanded shee should be caried to her lodging, where after dinner she heard her in pri-uate, where shee accused diuers persons of quality to bee guilty of the murder of the deceased King; which although the Queene held to be calumnious, yet presently she aduertised the Queene Regent thereof, desiring that some might be sent to heare what she said. II
She was afterwards committed to prison and examined by the first President, and vpon her accusation two were committed to prison: shee also charged the Marquis of Vernueil, and a Gentlewoman whose name was Tillet, that they were familiar with Ra-uillac, and acquainted with the Kings death: but vpon further examination and confrontation of them which were accused, her owne tongue discouered the slander, whereupon the Court declared Godin and Sauvage, (who had continued long in prison) and all others whom shee had accused, to be innocent of the most abominable parricide committed on the person of the deceased King: and condemned the said D'Escoman to end her daies mured vp betwixt foure wailes.

A Magician executed at Aix.

The Court of Parliament of Aix in Prouence, proceeded also criminally against a notable Magician or forcerer, called Lewis Gaufriay, a Priest borne in Prouence and beneficed at Marseilles. He was accused of Rape, seducing of Virgins, Impiety, Magicke, Sorcery, and other abominations, all which hee confessed vnder his owne hand, and was therefore arraigned, and condemned to bee deliuered into the hands of the executioner, and to be led through all the streets of Aix and before the Cathedrall Church, to doe penance his head and feet bare, and a halter about his necke, holding a burning Torch in his hand, and there vpon his knees to craue pardon of God, the King, and the Iustice: which

1611

A which done he should be led to the Preachers place in the said City, and there to be burnt vntill his bodie and bones were consumed to ashes and those to bee cast into the winde, and his goods to be confiscate to the King. That before his execution hee should bee put to the Racke, to draw from his owne mouth the truth of his complices; yet before the said execution they were to deliuer him into the hands of the Bishop of Marseilles his Diocesan, or in his absence to some other Prelate to bee degraded according to the accustomed manner. All which was duly put in execution according to the decree the last day of Aprill. Whilst the people expected his execution, a very modest Gentleman whose name was Esprade, who was contracted to a Presidents daughter, was stabbed and B murdered behind by Montauraux, a Knight of Malta in the sight of three thousand persons, and yet none could stay the murderer. A childe fell from a tree and was slaine:
and a young Gentleman was wounded by the same Knight with his dagger. These were the misfortunes which that wicked forcerer had foretold should happen to them which should come to see him die.

What happened at the execution of the Prisoner

The first President de Harlay, hauing serued the most Christian Kings faithfully, & sate in the seat of Iustice almost 29 yeares in the first Court of Parliament of France, whereof he was the head; seeing himselfe charged with yeares, his health impaired, and his sight de-cayed, he craued leaue of the Queene Regent to giue ouer this great charge, and entreated her to provide some other for the place. Her Maiesty vpon this request made choice of

C Monf. de Verdun, who was first President of Thoulouze, and caused him to be aduanced to that place, into the which he entered at the opening of the pleadings after Easter. I must needs confesse of Achilles de Harlay, that being inimitable in the wonderful expedition he vsed in doing Iustice, giuing audience rather to meane and poore people then to rich, he hath let the world know, that he hath neuer sought any other recompence for so great trauell for the common wealth, then the conscience to haue done well. In like manner the diuers gratifications and praises, which the good wits of Languedoc caused to be printed in the honour of the first President de Verdun, witness how much that prouince was grieved for the departure of such a personage; and that the good Iustice hee had done in the Parliament should be alwaies liuing in their memories. As soone as he came to bee D head of the Parliament at Paris, he suppressed the liberties which many officers of iustice and their Clarkes had taken, as well in the exercise of their charges, as in their apparell.
In like manner they which kept tabling Houses for Cards and Dice, were presently called in question, and many were committed to prison: whereupon the King made a declaration, by the which he did expressely forbid all persons of what qualitie and condition soeuer, to keepe any Tabling houses in any Towne or part of his Realme, nor assemble together to play at Cards and Dice: forbidding all owners of houses and others, to let their houses to any one which shall keepe gaming, vpon paine of an arbitrary fine, and other punishment; and to be answerable in their owne names for all the money which should be lost, and bound to make restitution. Inioyning the ordinary Iudges in euery towne to E transport themselves vnto such houses and places where they shall be certified that such Tabling houses are, or other like assemblies; to seize vpon such as they should find, together with their money, jewels, and other things exposed to play, and to distribute the said money to the poore of the Hospitall to whom he did adidge it; and in like manner to proceed against those gamesters, and against the landlords and housekeepers by the way of Process, as breakers of his lawes and ordinances. This in the beginning was very well observed, but soone after, some great personages dispensed themselves, which was not well done, for that their houses could not be searched by any officers with safety: so by little and little this wicked custome is in danger to creep in againe.

A defence of Monf. de Verdun first President at Paris

This yeare the second of May, the King being at Fontain-bleau, assisted by the Queene
F Regent his mother; vpon information that Chastelleraul, where his Maiesty had giuen leau for his subjects of the reformed Religion, to make a generall assembly of some deputies of euery Prouince, would be very discommodious for them; for that it was not able to lodge them, and that the Towne of Saumur, which is not farre off, would accommodate them better; his Maiesty desiring to entreat them fauourably, and for some other priuate consideration, by the aduice of the Queene Regent his mother, ordained, that the Assembly which had bene assigned at Chastelleraul, should bee transferred to Saumur; and to that end, commandement should be giuen to the deputies generall of them of the religion remaining in Court, to giue speedy aduertisement to all those which should bee A chofen Deputies in the generall assembly, to repaire to Saumur : in testimony whereof the King signed them a Briefe.

Noblemen entreated to come to the assembly.

Hereupon the Deputies of the reformed Churches came from all parts of France vnto Saumur, where the Assembly began the 27 of May, in the Towne-house. There appeared in this Assembly 70 Deputies, that is to say, 30 Gentlemen, 20 Ministers, 16 Ancients or Deputies for the Commons, and 4 Deputies for the Towne and government of Rochel.
There assisted at this Assembly, the Dukes of Tremouille, Bouillon, and Sully, vpon request made vnto them by many prouinces and by the Assembly : and the Duke of Rohan with his brother Mons: de Sabize, Deputies of Britany : the Earle of Penias, and *Mons:
de la Force*, entreated by the Prouince of basse Guyenne: Mons: de Chastillon, for basse Languedoc : The Marquis of Servieres, for high Guienne: the Seigneur of Belugion sent from the Marshal De laquiere: the Seigneurs of Parabel, la Boulay, Pleffis Mornay, & the Seigneurs of Villarnoul and Miranda, generall Deputies for the reformed Churches to remain in Court, with many other Gentlemen of good note.

Diuers brutes too hung the assembly at Saumur.

The holding of this Assembly did minister matter of talke among all the Townes of France, for the like had not bene scene, where there were so many Dukes and great Noblemen of the Religion, especially during the minority of a King : There was also a generall brute throughout all France, that they had obtained from the deceased King a generall establishment of their religion ; and that now they would of the fue articles C which were concluded amongst them at the assembly at Millaud, enioy those two which were not yet granted, that is to say, two places of surety in euery prouince where they had not any ; and that the tithes which they ought vnto their Curates, they would haue them employed in the entertainment of their Ministers : and moreover, that they had a designe to sweare a new vnion, to maintain themselves in the governments, charges, honors, and dignities, which they had receiued from the deceased King ; and that in all the places which they of the religion held, besides those which had bin granted them by the Briefe in the year 1598, they would maintain themselves in the vnion of their Churches.

The Prince of Conde lent to his government of Guienne.

A generall vnion made by there ordi-Cau dices.

The Queene Regent vpon these brutes, sent the Duke of Espernon, into his governments of Xaintonge, Angoulmois, and Lymouzin ; to giue order that no stirrs nor alterations might happen. The Prince of Conde had receiued commandement to goe into his government of Guienne ; and their Maiesties sent Letters to the Iurats of Bourdeaux, to receiue him with all honour due to such a Prince their Governour, which they performed accordingly, as you shall heare hereafter.

This first act made at the Assembly at Saumur, was a generall vnion of the reformed Churches, which the Deputies did promise and sweare to keepe inuolubly vnder his Maiesties protection, as it had beene agreed in precedent Assemblies ; and to procure the obseruation thereof in all places, and especially in those prouinces which had sent them, and in those places where they should remaine. Moreover, to propound and giue all aduice E in that Assembly, what they should thinke in their consciences to be conformable to reason and equity, and not otherwise ; and that laying aside all passion and bad affection, they should ayne at nothing but the honour of God, the good, quiet, and aduancement of the said Churches, the seruice of his Maiesty, and of the Queene Regent, and of all the royall issue, and the preservation of the Estate, with diuers other Articles, which for breuities Iake I must omit.

The Assembly, treating of an Article into the body of their grieuances, touching the maintaining of them of the religion, in the Estates, offices, honours, and dignities which they enioyed, and restoring of them which haue bene dispossessed : The Company exhorted the Duke of Sully, entreating of the recompence which had bene promised him for his places, to insist rather to haue it in safety and honour, then commodity and profit. F
They gaue charge to the generall Deputies of the Churches, humbly to beseech the King to giue contentment vnto the Duke of Sully : and they requested the Duke of Sully, and the Marquis of Rohofny his sonne, not to giue ouer those places which they yet enioyed ; namely, that of great master of the Artillery : and if in that respect or any other, he should be prest by any induc, vnlawfull and extraordinary meanes : It was decreed to make a demonstration that they held the Duke of Sullyes interest vnited to that of the Generall of the Churches, and to assist him by all due and lawfull meanes : whereof the Generall Deputies

A parties should haue charge in their instructions. Vpon the subiect of this decree, there was a speech made vnto the Assembly by the Duke of Sully, published to the world in these words.

The Duke of Sully's speech to the Assembly at Saumur.

My Masters, seeing it hath pleased this company to be informed by mine owne mouth, how matters haue past touching my Commission from my charges of Superintendent of the Treasure, and Capraire of the Basseille, I will endeavour to satisfie their desire, and yet not tire them with any long discourse, both for that my memory hath alwayes ayimed at substantiall things, rather then multitudes of words ; as also for that the matter requires I should represent it plainly and simply. I will tell you then my Masters, that I haue bene B aduertised from diuers Prouinces, that many Churches and priuate men my friends were wonderfully scandalized and offended, for that I gaue no aduertisement before I desisted from the execution of my places, neither haue since giuen them any accompt of the proceedings which haue bene held to that end : considering that the Queene had so much honoured them, as to write into diuers parts : whereof I humbly beseech you to excuse me, and not to beleue that I haue committed this error through negligence, contempt, C or forgetting the respect which is due vnto you ; neither yet vpon any presuming confidence of your loues towards me : But many lawfull causes haue inuited me to take this course, whereof I will offer two vnto you : The first, that they vied such precipitation, as it was impossible for me to demand aduice : And the second : That I could not write C but I must wrong the truth, or some persons to whom I will beare resp. &c. They haue also published, that I gaue ouer my places willingly. Whereunto I will answer, That I haue alwayes so inured my selfe to yeeld all respect and seruice to my Kings and Supri-ors, as I presently submitted my selfe to whatsoever they required of mee ; but rather through obedience then election. And as for the recompence of my places, if they had treated amiably with me, I would rather haue chosin a recompence in honour and safety, then in profit & viltie ; but I beleue in that respect things are yet as they were for whatsoeuer any one hath said, I will protest truly that I haue not receiued any kind of recompence, neither would I demand any without the aduice of this Assembly, whom I entreat to giue me counsell vpon foure points. First, if I shall leave matters in the estate they are in D without any further instance. Secondly, Whether I shall demand my reestablishment plainly.
Thirdly, Whether I shall submit my selfe to the recompence they haue offered me, and demand it. Fourthly, Whether I shall insist to receiue a recompence of honour and safety, rather then of profit. Wherein I will absolutely follow what shall be resolved by you. I beseech you my masters examine this businesse well, and consider whether it be to be held merely priuate, or to be annexed to the interest of the publike ; whether it bee depending on the Edict, and may be drawne in consequence, against all such as make profession of the religion, and so be held a breach of the same : For if you iudge that I alone haue the interest, this company then shall not need to trouble themselves any further, the which I referre vnto your wisdomes, not seeking to draw you to one resolution more then to another. Moreover,
E I will tell you freely, that I impute not any thing which hath past vnto the Queene ; for I know well, that if her owne inclination had bene followed, there had bene no alteration in my offices, or else they would haue giuen me a recompence to mine owne liking. I will not spend time to represent vnto you two points not to be contradicted. The first is,
The satisfaction the King had : the second, The estate wherein the affaires were when I was called thereunto, and how I left them. I doubt not but the oath of the vnion which I haue taken and signed, and the representation which I now make, will much encrease their spleens against me : I haue therefore iust cause to craue the full assistance of all our Churches, not that I desire they should proceed to any alteration ; for euen when I parted from Court,
I resolved to settle my minde to rest, without any complaint, or referring any discontent,
F neither yet to make any instance to be restored to my places, or to demand any recompence : For had I not bene aduertised, that many in this Assembly complained for that I had not acquainted them with these things ; and that at Court they did proiect to wrest from me some other of my places, or so to crosse me in the execution thereof, as I should be forced to leaue them ; I sweare vnto you that I would neuer haue attempted to speake in this place. And to let you know that I speake the truth, I protest here before God and this Assembly, that I am yet of that minde and fully resolved, if you thinke it good and profitable for the publike, neuer to make any instance for my reestablishment, nor for any

" any recompence; so as I may be assured to be left in peace, and that I may not be troubled
 " in the free enjoying of these places which remaine to my sonne and me; nor be deprived " of the gratifications which I have obtained from the bounty of my King and for my ser" vices. Preferring all my recompences to the Queene's good discretion and pleasure: My " protestations reiterated to be fully content and satisfied of her Maiefty, and to haue no
 " other designe, but the glory of God, the preferuation of the Church, the Kings seruice,
 " and the quiet of the State.

Adiutor of the Assembly touching the Duke of Sully.

This was Presented Janu.

These matters thus propounded by the Duke, they fell to consultation, how they might gine him content which might be profitable to all the reformed Churches. And as for the foure points wherein he desired their aduice; to the first, concerning his leaning matters B as they were, without any further instance; some said, that this proceeding was an action worthy the greatnesse and generosity of his courage. For the second, Whether hee should plainly demand restitution: they answered, That it would be now a vaine attempt, seeing the place was supplied by a great personage, endued with admirable wisdom and iudge-ment to manage his Masters affaires, who knew how to entertaine men more courteously, and that they found a great difference betweene the facility of his access, and the lower countenance of the Duke. Touching the third point, Whether hee should accept and demand the recompence which had bene offered him: some were of opinion, that hee ought in duty and modesty to submit himselfe to whatsoever it should please their Maiesties to ordaine.
 For the fourth, Whether hee should insist vpon a recompence of honour and safety, or of profit: C they sayd, It was in himselfe to speake freely to his friends, which of the two he had most need of. This was the opinion of some in the said assembly; but it was concluded by plurality of voices, to vnite the Dukes cause to the generall interest, whereupon they made a decree as you haue formerly heard.

Deputies sent from their Maiesties to the Assembly at Saumur.

In the beginning of this Assembly, the King deputed the Seigneurs of Boissife and Bullion, Councillors of State, to goe to the Assembly; who vpon the 7 of June came into the Synod, and deliuered their Letters from the King and Queene Regent, and then exposed the generall charge they had receiued from their Maiesties, saying, That they were ready to allow of the iust demands of the Assembly, according to the termes of the particular Articles, Briefes, answers of their Bills, and other expeditions done in their fauour: D to obserue and keepe euery thing contained in the same; and wholly and entirely to per-forme all which remaineth to be put in execution: and where any ambiguity or obscurtie should be found, to cause it fauourably to be interpreted to their aduantage. Requiring them, that according to the termes of the Briefe, by which the Assembly had bene required and granted; they would forth with proceed vnto the choice and nomination of the sixe Deputies which were to be represented vnto their Maiesties, of which they would retaine two to be resident nere vnto their persons, and which should receiue their petitions and demands.

The Seigneur du Plessis as President, hauing giuen thanks vnto the said Commissioners, with protestation in the name of the whole Assembly, That they would all be, and cuer remaine, most humble and faithfull in the obedience due vnto their Maiesties, they went home to their lodgings.

Many things past here touching their grieuances, whereon I may not insist, but leaue them to the Originall. And the Commissioners being returned to Court, the Assembly resolved to send certaine Deputies to their Maiesties, to present their said grieuances vnto them: for which seruice they made choice of the Barons of Caze and Courtomer, the Minister Ferrier, and the Seigneurs of Mirande and Armet. Whilest they prepared for their journey, and that their instructions, memorials, and Letters were adrawing, the Duke of Sully gaue the Assembly to vnderstand, that apprehending that the interest of private men would increase the Articles of their grieuances, as the concession would proue more difficult, desiring in no manner that what concerned him should any way pre-iudice the publike, nor stay the obtaining of things necessary: wherefore he thought it fit to intreat the Assembly to examine the points and Articles which might concerne his interest strictly, and to iudge whether they were such as they should insist vpon them, as matters absolutely importing the good of the Churches in generall: or if they were such as might cause any difficulty or refusal in the grant, they should suppress them: as concerning onely his particular, in which case, he held it more conuenient to moderate them or

A or leaue them out of their instructions, to the end it might neither preiudice the publike, nor him in particular: protesting, that as he had vowed to employ his person and life, and that of his children for the glory of God, and the good of their Churches: so he did now make offer of his honor, goods, offices and dignities, to be disposed of as they should think it profitable for the glory of God, and the good of the State: that he was absolutely resolved without any opposition or dislike to follow whatsoever that Assembly should conclude and decree: whereupon the Assembly gaue him great thanks for the affection hee seemed to beare to the aduancement and preferuation of their Churches, and for the example which he gaue to euery one to submit all priuate interests to the good of the generall: assuring him that they had resolved to entertaine all the resolutions which they had taken concerning him.

During this Assembly, there was a combustion in Paris on Trinity Sunday, at the enter-ment of a young child in Trinity Church-yard: which infant did belong to one of the Religion. The daies are then long, and a little sooner then ordinary before the euening was shut in, two Archers of the Watch leading the company, a Vinegar-makers boy began to throw stones at them, many others did the like, yea and his Master himselfe: they had no respect to the Archers nor to their words: the tumult grew somewhat great, one of the Archers was hurt, and some others: presently the officers of Iustice posted thither, and the Vinegar-maker and his seruant were committed to prison, and condemned C by the Lieutenant Criminel: the seruant to be whipped before the Trinity Church, and his master to stand by him. They appealed from this sentence: but it was confirmed and executed the first of Iuly.

The Deputies of the Assembly at Saumur, arriued at Paris, and presented vnto the King and Queene Regent their Letters and instructions, containing 57 Articles, which you may read at large in the Originall, being too long to insert here, for that I am limited to my bound.

The long continuance of this Assembly bred a great ialousie in all the Catholike townes of Poitou, Limosin, and beyond the Riuier of Loire, and the rather for that in the beginning of Iuly, the Duke of Sully was come to Chastelleraut, whereupon all the D townes of those Prouinces began to guard their gates. On the seauenth of Iuly, about 6 of the clocke at night, a horseman passing through Orleans, and seeming to make haste to bait his horse, he spake many things touching the Assembly at Saumur, and amongst the rest, that there were many Huguenots on horsebacke nere to Orleans, to seize vpon the Towne: As soone as he found that some which heard him tooke hold of his words, hee suddenly tooke horse and got out of the towne vnknewne: a Burgesse which heard him tooke such an apprehension of this gully, as he cried to armes in his quarter, reporting what he had heard, which ran like lightning throughout the whole towne, and all the townsmen presently went to armes, and made Barricades in diuers places: they remembered their troubles past, and feared to fall into the like disasters: whereupon they searched E the houses of them of the Religion: but they found them so disarmed, dreaming of nothing but peace, as they were afterwards ashamed to haue so lightly fallen into this suspi-tion. This taking of armes at Orleans made them of Chartres and of other townes vpon the Riuier of Loire to keepe strict guard at their gates for feare of surprize. These proceedings caused the Assembly at Saumur to giue order to Monsr. de Plessis for the leauing of 150 souldiers more: writing vnto their Deputies at Paris, to beseech their Maiesties not to take it ill, if the Assembly provided for their safety.

On the twentieth of Iuly, the Chancellor in the presence of the Queene, the Princes, and other officers of the Crowne, told the Deputies of the Assembly, that their demands were dispatched, and that among other answers, there was granted a continuation of the F places of surlerie for five yeares, with an increase of 4500 pound sterling for their Ministers:
 but for that the Assembly had bene chiefly granted them to proceed to the nomination of deputies which should remaine nere vnto his Maiefty to sollicite their affaires, the King would not suffer the answers to bee deliuered vnto them vntill they had made the said election.

The Assembly at Saumur being aduertised hereof by their Deputies, who feared that by the 25 of the moneth they should haue commandement to retire themselves: they gaue charge vnto their Deputies, humbly to beseech the Queene in the name of the Assembly,

sembly, not to command them to proceed to the nomination of the two general Deputies, before they had required an answer of their grievances, for that they had an expresse charge from their Churches, not to make the said election (which should be the last Act of the Assembly) vntill they had required content vpon their petitions. The Deputies hauing made this supplication vnto the Queene, according to the intention of the Assembly, on the 30 of July, they had Letters given them vnto the Assembly for an answer, letting them vnderstand that Monf. de Bullion should returne presently to Saumur, and carry the answer to their demands.

A Letter from their Maiesties to the Assembly.

Their Maiesties Letters did import, That they had willingly heard their Deputies, and taken in good part the testimonies and protestations of the fidelity, deuotion, and obedience of them of the Assembly: but in stead of presenting the names of fixe persons to choose two general Deputies out of them, they had deliuered their petitions, remonstrances, and grievances, the which although their Maiesties had good reason to reiect, vntill the nomination had bene brought; yet they had caused them to bee viewed, examined, and answered, as fauourably as they could possible: and had acquainted their Deputies with the chiefe Articles, to represent them to the Assembly, that being informed of their good and holy intentions, the Assembly might speedily resolute to discharge their duty, which was to send their sayd nomination of fixe persons, whereof their Maiesties were to choose two, into whose hands they would deliuer the answer of their demands, with all necessary expeditious; to the end the Assembly might then breake vp, as it was necessary for the Kings seruice, and the good of his subiects, lest their long continuance together, should breed some disorder in the State, and ielousie amongst the Kings subiects.

On the 14 of August Monf. de Bullion came to Saumur; the next day he entred into the Assembly, presented their Maiesties Letters and deliuered his charge: which was; That the Queenes pleasure was, they should name the said Deputies, to take away the ielousie, which their Assembly gaue vnto the Catholiques, vnto whom her Maiesty was bound to giue contentment as well as to them. Which done, he had charge to deliuer vnto them their demands fauourably answered. That her Maiesty could not giue them any more then what was specified in their answers, which had bene resolu'd by the Princes of the blood, and other Princes, officers of the Crowne, and Lords of the Councell, wherefore they should proceed to the said nomination: ending his discourse with these words, Your glory consists in obedience.

Whereupon Monf. de Pleffis, who was President, made answer in the name of the Assembly; that vpon the returne of their Deputies they had bene assured of their Maiesties good inclination towards their most humble and faithfull seruants of the Religion; whereof they had a new testimony, in that they were pleased to send vnto them a personage of such merit, of whose affection they had great confidence: as also they protested before him, that they were ready to employ their meanes and liues for their Maiesties seruice: but as for the rest, when as the company had conferred thereupon, they would acquaint him with their resolution: whereupon he retired.

Monf. de Bullion: last commandment to the Assembly in the Queens name.

After diuers conferences and contestations betwixt Monf. de Bullion, and certaine Gentlemen deputed by the Assembly; the one insisting to haue the Deputies named first, and the other to haue the answer to their demands: on the first of September the Assembly sending to intreat him to acquaint them with the answer hee had receiued from the Queene Regent: he made answer, That the businesse was of such importance, as he would deliuer it in the open Assembly. Whereupon on the third of September, hee presented vnto them a Letter from the Queene, who commanded them to obey, and to name their Deputies. After the reading whereof Monf. de Bullion said vnto them, You see the commandment which the Queene makes vnto you to proceede to this nomination: although that Soueraignes are not bound to giue an accompt of their ordinances, yet her Maiesties grounds her commandment vpon the example of the deceased King: and vpon that which hath alwayes bene practised with you since the Edict and the Assemblies of Chastellerault and Gergeau; as well for the nomination before the answer of your demands, as for the number of fixe: and as soone as you shall haue made this nomination, I will deliuer vnto you a Briefe for the prolongation of places, and your demands fauourably answered. Moreover, I haue charge from her Maiesty to tell you, that to the end you may haue all subiect of content, you may stay together for some dayes, to peruse and examine

A examine the answers: yea if there be any remonstrances to be made vpon the answers, or any grace to be required from their Maiesties; I haue commission to tell you, that in charging the two deputies which shall be chosen among the fixe therewith, the Queene will intreat you with as much fauour as possibly she can. I pray you satisfie her, seeing you haue promised to yeeld no lesse respect and obedience to the Kings minority and the Queenes regency, then you haue done to the deceased Kings.

Monf. de Pleffis made answer, that the Company vnderstanding their Maiesties pleasure, he thought he might with their approbation say vnto him; that they were all disposed to obedience, and that to this effect their wils were wholly vntied without any diuision. That their vniou had been very necessary, and that by meanes thereof, God had preferred the deceased King Henry the Great, and by him the Realme; and that hee himselfe had so well allowed of their vniou, that although hee had changed his religion, yet hee would that the Churches assembled at Nantes in his presence, should confirme and renew the said vniou, the which should alwaies bee for their Maiesties seruice, and the good of the Estate. In the end, after many demands and answers, and protestations made by the Assembly, alwaies to yeeld obedience to their Maiesties command (the which should be their discharge vnto the Churches, for that they pretended they had exceeded their commission); they proceeded to the nomination of fixe Deputies, with a declaration, that it was only to obey their Maiesties, & not to prejudice the rights of their Churches, nor to binde them hereafter to chuse about two: This nomination being written, was presently giuen to Monf. de Bullion, and hee deliuered vnto them their demands answered by their Maiesties, with a Briefe for the continuation of places of suerty. The answers to their greuances and demands being read in the Assembly, they were not found answerable to their desire and intention; whereupon they deputed some to Monf. de Bullion, to let him vnderstand, that they had receiued the answers to their demands with all honor, respect and humility, as proceeding from the will of their King and Soueraigne Prince; but they humbly besought their Maiesties not to take it ill, if they made a declaration that they could not accept of the said answers, being of opinion, that the Prouinces which had deputed them should not receiue that contentment which they expected. Whereunto he made answer, that the Queene had sent word to the Marshall of Bouillon that he had power to enlarge some Articles according to the aduice that he should giue her. Vpon the 9 of September, Monf. de Bullion hauing presented vnto the Assembly the election which their Maiesties had made of the Siegneurs of Rouuray and Milliere for the 2 deputies, he commanded them to separate themselves: letting them vnderstand, that their Maiesties had giuen him charge to say, that all their iust requests should be fauourably answered, and whatsoever had bene promised, paid. Whereupon the Assembly obeyed, and separated themselves; euery man returning into his Country; some contented, others not.

The Duke of Sauioy had drawne diuers troopes of souldiers together, which put his neighbour Princes in great ielousie, and bred diuers opinions whereunto hee would employ them; some were of opinion hee would besiege Geneva which hee claimes as his owne by inheritance: others thought that hee would enter into the duchy of Milane, as well in regard of his childrens pretention, being Nephewes to the King of Spaine, as for some other occasions: but the Italian Princes were alwaies watchfull that their neighbors should not grow great, seeing also that the Spaniard leauied men in Lombardie, fearing that by reason thereof Italy should fall into new troubles, they wrought so, as in the end of the last yeare their controuerfies were reconciled and the Country continued in peace. The Duke notwithstanding continued his Forces on foot, which made men thinke that hee had an eye to Geneva; for that he had bene aduertised that the townesmen had bene carelesse to maintaine their fortifications, and to renew their prouision of come yearly being spoiled; that they had small store of munition for warre within the Towne; and that they had not fixe peeces of Ordnance well mounted and fit to doe seruice. It was also thought that hee had some secret intelligence within the Towne: so as the brute was he would not be 15 daies in taking it: diuers French Gentlemen came vnto the Duke with many souldiers with an intent to shew their valour and skill at this siege. Gaucher a famous Capitaine of Luxemburg repaired vnto him with some troopes; and it was giuen out that Spinola himselfe should be at this siege; and that now the tree of protestants protestants Religion should bee plucked vp by the rootes, to the end it should bring no A more fruit.

This towne of Geneua had bene long vnder the protection of the Crowne of France: yet some more desirous of innovations, then of the honour and preservation of the State, sought not only to perswade poore ignorant people, but euen those of better iudgement, that the warre prepared against Geneua, did no way concerne them, nor that they should in any wise neede or hinder the Duke of Sauoyes proceedings, incited thereunto (besides his particular interest) with the zeale of aduancing the Catholike Religion, and his Holinesse seruice: seeking by such practices to terrifie their consciences which were not well settled, making a case of conscience of a matter of State, as if to succour their Allies, B (although of a contrary Religion) against the inuasion of foraigne Princes, whose designs cannot be restrained by any treaty, (how solemne soeuer) were a capitall crime against God, and worthy to be censured by the Church. They made vse of that false Maxime against such as opposed themselves, that it imported much the honour of this Crowne, to hold their promise to often and so solemnly sworne, That they ought not to keepe faith with Heretikes: and that this exception is alwaies of force. But the Kings of France who have bene euer Catholikes, did not hold the preservation of Geneua, which they have alwaies tooke into their protection, and comprehended it in all the treaties of peace which they haue made with neighbour Princes, to be a case of conscience, but a matter of State: C hauing found by experience, that this towne maintained in liberty, was sufficient to crosse the vaine hopes of the Duke of Sauoy, and of all those which should assist him: The which both Francis the first, Henry the third, and Henry the fourth, haue made knowne by diuers Treaties, Declarations, and Letters, how much the preservation of that towne imports the State of France.

The Queene Regent vpon these brutes of warre desiring to preserve this towne in liberty, as the deceased King had done, sent Monf: le Grand into Burgundy, and Monf: D'Alincourt to Lyons, to take order for the frontiers of their governments, and to aduertise her of the Sauoyards designs: she also sent Monf: de Barault to the said Duke, to let him vnderstand, that both he and other Soueraigne Princes his neighbours, were zealous of his Armes, being ignorant of his intent: the which was couered with a second per- D text: That the Duke of Sauoy would not trouble the peace, nor breake the treaty of Veruains: but he onely desired to restore the Bishops of Geneua and Loraine, the which put them of Bearne into alarme. In the meane time the Seigneurs of Lattouie, Bethune, Arnault, with many French Gentlemen, Captaines and Souldiers, came to Geneua to defend them of their Religion: Within short time they had 30 peeces of Ordnance mounted, and had made such trenches, halfe-moones, and forts without the towne, as it was thought sufficient to hold out a whole yeare, if the invader did not perish in the attempt.

The Seigneur of Barault being returned to the Queen without an answer conformable to her desire, she sent Monf: de la Varenne vnto him: The Beannois also sent their Ambassadors, who spake big words vnto him, telling him, That if he did not dismis- E se his troops, he should pay the charges of the warre, if theyooke armes.

Some write that the Duke assured both the one and the other, that he was not in arms to trouble the peace: and that he neuer enquired why neighbour Princes had souldiers in a readinesse in their owne Estates, being free for euery one to doe what he pleased in his country, not being subiect to yeeld an account to other Soueraignes his neighbors. Afterwards, seeing the French and Swislers discontented with his answer, and also considering his great charge was to litle purpose, he dismissed all his troops by a declaration which he caused to be published. The Captaines and Souldiers which came to him from diuers Countries, were forced to depart with losse, bearing their owne charges; and they of the Religion did the like from Geneua. Hereby it doth plainly appeare, that God hath F not created any thing in this world, that hath not his oppositie: and that the wisdom of the Queene Regent, and the speeches of the Beannois, stayed the Duke of Sauoy from beginning of a warre, which might haue set fire vpon all the Westerne parts of Europe.

During the Assembly at Summit, there was a general Chapter held at Paris, of all the Order of Saint Dominick, or Iacobins, whither all the religious of the said Order were summoned from all parts of the world, by the commandement of their Generall, which was Augustin Galamin of Brexignella in Lombardy, a Doctor of Diuinity, and at that time

A Chapter of the Iacobins at Paris.

A time Master of the sacred palace at Rome, who came thither in person with the Prouincials of all Countries, as from Peru, Mexico, the Philippines, and other remote parts, whose names I must for breuities sake omit. It beganne the Friday before Whitunday, and continued till the Friday after Trinity. They were in all about 400, who were nourished by the charitie and bounty of the King, Queene, princes, prelates, Noblemen, Ladies, and other charitable persons, which did assist at their preaching and Disputations. During this Chapter Father Michaels, Prouinciall of the Prouince of Occitana, demanded leave of the Generall to reforme himselfe with some other religious men of his Order, moued with the like zeale: which being granted, they got a house behinde S. Andrew des Arts at B Paris, where they beganne a more regular and reformed life: since, by the assistance and bounty of the Queene and other good people, they haue accommodated the Church and house of the Iacobins, reformed in the suburbs of Saint Honoré, where they now reside.

The Queene Regent, as you haue heard, had giuen commandement to the Iurats of Bourdeaux, to receiue the Prince of Condé their gouernour with all the honor due to such a Prince: being aduertised of his coming, they employed an infinite number of workmen, to make preparation for his entry, and especially of two goodly Nauall houses, cyther of which was built vpon two great boats, to receiue him at his coming to the Port of Lormont, with the Princesses his mother and wife. The 24 Companies of the towne did strue who should exceed other in armes and apparel: and all the chiefe townes of Guienne prepared to receiue him according to the Queenes commandement. The Nobilitie of euery prouince did accompany him as he went: and entering into his gouernment, Monf: de Roquelaur Lieutenant for his Maiesty in Guienne, receiued him with sixe or six hundred horse, and conducted him to Liborne, which was the first towne, whereas the Inhabitants met him in armes, and the Maior and Iurats caried a Canopy before him. The princesses came to Lormont, a litle league from Bourdeaux, where they entered into their Nauall house, being accompanied by many boats, with all sorts of musick, with the Captaines and Burgeses of the Towne, and 800 Harquebusers. They landed before Caste-Trompet, during the which the ships which lay in the Road, and the Caste saluted them with their Ordnance. Being landed vpon a bridge made for the purpose, they were conducted D with the Ladies and their traine, to the Archbishops palace in thirty Carosses, where they had a stately banquet for their reception. The next day two Iurats with a number of Barques went to conduct the nauall house for the Prince to the port of Lormont. After dinner the Prince embarked and landed, where Monf: de Roquelaur attended and saluted him, both as the Kings Lieutenant and Maior of Bourdeaux, presenting the keys vnto him, the which the Prince receiued, and deliuered againe vnto him. Then he was conducted to a high scaffold, where hee sat downe to heare their speeches, and to see the order of the entry as it past. First, the Iurats past, which came to salute him in their robes of crimson and white Sattin. The Vniuersity. They of the Presidiall Court, all on horse-back, hauing forty Sergeants before them. Then followed the Court of Parliament: the two E Presidents being in scarlet robes, and the Councillors in blacke; and before them twenty Vthers all on horse-back. The 24 Companies of the Burgeses of the towne on foot, well armed, and in seuerall lieries. There were moreover foureene or fiftene hundred horse. Then the Prince coming from the scaffold, tooke horse and went towards the Towne, being followed by the Seigneurs of Roquelaur, Thermines, Vailac, and many Noblemen of Guienne. Being come to the port, the Iurats presented him with a white Interier with rich furniture, wheron he mounted, the Iurats carrying a Canopy before him. In this manner he was conducted to the Cathedral Church, where the Cardinal of Sourdis receiued him, and conducted him to the high altar, where hauing done the vltiall ceremonies, he returned with him to the Church doore, from whence hee was conducted to his lodging. He visited the Court of Parliament, who receiued him with all the honour that could be done him. He was inuited with the Ladies to the Town-house, where the Maior and Iurats attended to doe them seruice. He was desirous to enter into Caste-Trompet, to see what reparations were necessary. This seruice as a Citadell of Bourdeaux, and commanded by Collonell Ornano with foure Companies entertained. At his coming in: the Capitaine who commanded in the Collonels absence, hauing deliuered the keys of the Caste into his hands, he presently went forth with all the garison: then the Prince visited the Caste both within and without, and gaue order for the fortifications which were to be made. After this, desirous to see the chiefe townes of his gouernment. He passed by A Nerac, Agen, Thouloufe, Montauban, Dacs, and in the end to Bayonne, in all which places he was entertained with much honor. Being returned to Bourdeaux, hee received commandement from the Queene to repaire to Court, which he did about the beginning of Nouember.

The deceased King Henry the fourth, had by his Edict forbidden Duels, and happily suppressed the liberty which French Gentlemen took to fight and kill one another, which often hapned vpon slight occasions. But as men alwayes finde some euasion to avoid the Law, they found also the inuention of encountering without challenge: whereupon his Maiefty made this Declaration to preuent these encounters: That if it hapned hereafter, B that any Gentlemen or others, making profession of armes, (who by reason of words or deeds, cyther for themselves, or for their friends, which may give any occasion of offence, or cause bitterness) doe afterwards meeting by chance, draw their weapons, it shall be reputed done of purpose, and held for a challenge, so as they shall incur the same punishment ordained by the Edicts of Duels against Challengers; and shall not be dispensed withall, notwithstanding any pretext or excuse whatsoever. This Declaration was verified by the Court of Parliament, and executed vpon certaine offenders.

A controuersie in Troys concerning the Iesuits,

About this time the Inhabitants of Troys, were ready to fall into a mutiny and combustion: some desiring to haue the Iesuits, and to giue them the Colledge of the Towne; and others opposing it. The Bishop, the President, and some few Clergy-men, and some Burgesses (especially such as had borne all the sway during the League) would haue the Iesuits. The Deanes and Chapters of S. Peters, and S. Stephens, the greatest part of the Clergy, the Councillors of the Presidiall Court, the Towne-house, and such as had assisted to draw the Towne to the obedience of King Henry the fourth, would none of them. This bred a great contention amongst the inhabitants: both parties sent to the Court: the Bishop, the President, and those of that faction, sent to let the Queene vnderstand that the Inhabitants of Troys desired to entertaine the Iesuits, and to beleech her Maiefty to be pleased that they might make a general Assembly to resolve vpon that business by the voyces of all the people assembled by their trades. This Messenger was sent away with all speed, to preuent such as might be sent in the behalfe of the towne; as it hapned: for Guichard a Councillor of the Court, and one of the Sheriffs (being deputed from the Assembly) coming to Fountain-bleau after Latrecey the Bishops Messenger, hee found the whole Court disposed to haue the Iesuits instilled in Troys. Finally, Latrecey was first dispatched; and made all possible speed to returne to Troys, to haue the Trades assembled for the reception of the Iesuits: but yet the matter succeeded not according to his desire.

The whole body and chiefe inhabitants of the Towne, hearing what had past at Fountain-bleau, and that they had giuen the Queene to vnderstand that the Iesuits were desired in Troys, they held a solemn Assembly, where it was concluded, that they should make an act of Disauow against such as had presumed to demand the Iesuits without warrant or power, and without the priuie of all the orders of the Towne: that this act should be carryed to Court, and that they should informe her Maiefty of the seditious preachings of P. Bisset a Iesuit; and let her vnderstand that it was to be feared there would some sedition hapen.

Deputies of Troys sent to the Queene.

The Queenees answer.

To this end certaine were deputed for the Clergy, Iustice, and body of the towne, to informe the Queene of the state of the cause. To whom the Queene made this answer, that they had giuen her vnderstand, that the Inhabitants of Troys demanded the Iesuits, but seeing they would none, shee would not force them; neither had shee any intent to establish them against the good liking, nor without the contents of the said Inhabitants.

This answer was the cause of new proceedings on cyther side. They which opposed the Iesuits, did set downe their principall reasons in writing. And the Iesuits faction did the like, with such animosity; as the towne seemed to bee threatened with troubles and sedition: there being some which were willing to take armes, and to be in action: the which caused the Maior and Sheriffs of the towne to haue recourse vnto Mons. de Praslin, Gouernor of the prouince, who repaired speedily thither, and by his presence and wisdome pacified all these heart-burnings and discontents.

A There was a notable Impostor at Paris, who (from a meane beginning) through his subtile cariage had gathered great wealth together; and after falling to keepe dogs, horfies, and entertaine Strumpets, he began to run the high way to destruction; and so at last resolving to play the Bankrupt, he tooke vp all the money hee could, but his intent being discouered, he was cast into prison, and they found that he ought about 30000 pound sterling, yet could not shew any losses hee had sustained, or debts due vnto him, nor ready money to pay his Creditors.

His wife seeing him in prison, and not able to moue him by her prayers to doe right to every man; for very griefe she tooke her bed. Being without means, she importuned B him to ayde her with some reliefe: but hee would not assist her with a peny, nor after her death giue any thing for her buriall, that he had no money; but it was the will of God to haue his peritrie and wickednesse knowne to the world, for a seruant of his stole from him 150 Crownes in gold; and hee complaining thereof, said, that hee wondered he had not caried away more, for aboute 600 Crownes in Pearle and Jewels, with a Watch well worth 40 Crownes, lay vnder the gold which he had taken.

The Court finding his fullhood and villany, condemned him to doe penance in the great Chamber, the Court sitting, being bare headed in his shirt, and vpon his knees, with a halter about his necke, holding in his hands a torch burning of two pound weight, and there to declare openly, That he had maliciously plaid the bankrupt, and diuerted his goods C to defraud his creditors; for the which he craved pardon of God, the King, and the Iustice, Lucardo his brother in law, a partner in his villany assisted at the said penance, and the said La Tour to be conducted into the Palace yard at the exchange time, to doe the like penance, and then to be tyed to a post by the necke, and there to remaine untill one of the clocke. Moreouer La Tour was condemned to serue the King in his Gallies for the space of nine yeares, and hee and Lucardo banished France for euer, and neuer to returne vpon paine of hanging without other forme of proceffe. Their goods were confiscated, their creditors being first paid, vntill which were satisfied, they were to remaine in prison and to pay all the charges.

The censure of the Court against La Tour, for so he was called.

The Abbot of Bois, of whom we haue formerly made mention, was committed prisoner at Rome, and as some affirmed had beene hang'd with his face couered: Men spake diuersly of the cause, some accusing the Iesuites to haue bene the moitiues thereof, for that he had first preached against them after the Kings death: others said, that it was at the suite of the Generall of the Celestins, for that he had left his order, and had not yeelded an account for the managing of the affaires which he had in charge. That he had in former times slaine a man at Auignon (the Popes Territorie) with his fist. Finally, they made many other pretexts. An error which is done by counsell, cannot be otherwise termed then a fault wisely committed: but this Abbot would neither beleue the aduice of his best friends, who dissuaded him from this voyage to Rome, nor the intreaty of his seruant who would not accompany him.

The Abbot of Bois imprisoned at Rome.

E This yeare was fatal to some great personages which dyed in hope of a better life. Newes came to Court of the death of Mons. de Viry, whom the Queene had sent into England for some affaires of State, where he died suddenly, being much lamented of the King and Nobles there. These newes did much grieue the Queene and Court for the losse of so worthy a man: but it was nothing in respect of the sorrow and mourning of them of his house, and of the Inhabitants of Bry in Champagne: His body was brought out of England with a goodly conuoy, aswell of his followers, as of many Noblemen and others which went to meet it: His sonne succeeded him in all his places, honours, and dignities.

Death of Mons. de Viry.

In the beginning of October, the Duke of Maienne died in the Towne of Soissons of a F feuer, hauing for the space of 12 yeares bene much afflicted with the Gout. This Prince was alwayes held religious and deuout, wise, courageous, master of his passions, very temperate in all his actions; yea and making ware against them of the Religion, they called him a Prince of his word, so carefull he was to keepe it. The good and bad fortune which he had, being Lieutenant Generall to King Henry the third in his Armies, is written at large in diuers Histories: as also what he did being head of the League against King Henry the third and fourth, with the commendation which all France hath giuen him, for that in those miserable times, he would neuer consent to haue it diuided. After his reconciliation, tion, he performed all duties of obedience and fidelity to the King: and euen after his death the Queene made great vfe of his counsell. He was free in the deliuey of his opinion: whereof his speech in open Councell to the greatest which demanded increase of their pensions, is a goodly testimonie; We must (said he) serue our King faithfully, without conditions, importunity, or demands; for it ill befits vs to seeke to draw profits from his Maiesties Minority, when as the very duty engrauen by God in the hearts of all good Subiects, bindes vs to doe him seruice. Of Henriette of Sauoy his wife he had foure children: two sonnes, the Duke of Elguillon (now Duke of Mayenne) and the Earle of Sommerue a goodly yong Prince, and of great hope, who died some few yeares before in Italy: and two daughters, Katherine married to the Duke of Neuers, and Rence a Virgin.

The first day of this feuer, this Prince said, I finde this will be my last, I must goe to God: the Bishop of Soissons comming to visit him, and hearing him speake aloud, Gone, gone, O Lord my God, he asked him, Whither will you goe Sir? And this Prince answered, to Heauen, to Heauen, gone, gone, O Lord my God: Father of mercy conduct me if it be thy good pleasure; the way of our felicity is assured in thee, for thou art the Way; the knowledge of this way cannot be obscure nor vncertaine, for thou art Truth; and the enioying of this way must needs be immortality, for thou art Life it selfe: Gone, gone then, Let me goe then to Heauen.

Having settled all things touching his Conscience, and protested of his humble seruice to the King and Queene Regent: hee called for his Sonne the Duke of Aignillon, who being on his knees by his bed side, hee said vnto him: Sonne, I giue you my blessing, with this condition, and not otherwise; that you shall employ your life and all your meanes, for the defence of the Catholike Romish Religion, and for the humble seruice which you owe vnto the King and Queene Regent, and for the good of the State. Then greeting that hee could not speake with the Queene, hee intreated the Bishop of Soissons to giue his blessing vnto his daughter the Duchesse of Neuers: then calling his other daughter vnto him, hee said vnto her, Daughter, I giue you my blessing, with this condition, that you shall alwaies haue the feare of God before your eyes, and honour and obey the commandements of your mother and brother: pray to God for me, and I will pray for you. Soone after, desiring often to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, his speech failed him, and hee left this mortall life for an immortal, on the 3 of October. The Duchesse of Mayenne, much afflicted with his sickness, fell also sicke, and after his death consumed away in teares and sorrow, which had no end but with the end of her life, which was within few dayes after; and so ended this great body of friendship diuided into two soules: they both being interred together, having but one funeral pompe. The Duchesse of Neuers their daughter receiving newes of both their deaths, continued for a long time speechlesse: griefe and sighes had so seized on her heart, as she could hardly be comforted by her friends. The Duke of Neuers was no lesse troubled: sorrow had wounded his heart, and the griefe that hee had not performed the last duties at the time of their departures, did much afflict his soule.

In the end of October, their Maiesties being at Fontaine-Belleau, the Duchesse of Loraine, and the Cardinall of Gonzague arriued there, where they had a very honourable reception. The Queene Regent was glad to see them, being the children of her deceased sister the Duchesse of Mantoua. In the beginning of Nouember the Court came to Paris, where after some daies stay, the Queene desiring to shew them the infants of France who were at Saint Germaine, all the Court prepared to goe thither with much ioy; but they came vnto the house of mourning through the death of the Duke of Orleans, who dyed the 17 of Nouember, being 4 yeares old and 6 months. A prince in his infancie indued with all perfections. He was carried directly from thence to Saint Denis, and laid neere to his father: for they hold there are no funeral pompes to be celebrated in Paris after the death of the Infants of France, if they haue not liued 7 yeares. The Queen was so afflicted for this death, as she could take no rest for many nights: and all France in generall did much lament it.

Monf: Le Maistre, first Physitian to the Infants of France, a learned man and of good repute, was taxed for the death of this yong Prince: his enemies blamed him, for that they say he had suffered an issue (which he had had two yeares in his neck) to be stopped: and some Physitians (who affected his place) furthered this slander by their practices.

This

A This false brute being come to the Queenes eares, did much afflict her: for some who had credit with her hauing reported it, terrified such as might deliuey the truth, vntill a great Lady presumed to tell her Maiefty, that without doubt it was some enemy to the Physitian which had raised this slander. Whereupon her Maiefty being willing to heare Monf: Le Maistre, he said vnto her: Madam, I most humbly beseech your Maiefty that I may not lose the honour of your fauour through flanders and false reports: and that I may not be entreated according to the desire of mine enemies, to the ruine of mine honor and reputation. For hitherto you haue heard none but mine enemies, who haue beene as ready to speake ill as to doe ill, whose lewd life is so well knowne vnto your Maiefty, as I shd not need to make any further repetition. But the onely cause of their hatred is, for that I opposed my selfe to the scandals which they raised against your Maiefties House. For this reason onely they haue imputed vnto me the death of my Master, who was so deare vnto me: and without respect of your Maiefty, to reuenge themselves on me, they haue told the mother that her child is dead by my error: a sauage fury, and vnworthy of reasonable men.

After he had made a long narration of the manner of the Princes infirmity, and of the Physitians proceeding in the cure, which I am enforced for breuities sake to omit: in the end hee concluded, Madam, you may hereby iudge of the malice of these slanderers, who haue not beene ashamed to lye vnto you, nor to afflict you without respect vnto the person vpon whom depends the preservation of so many people. And herewith abundance of teares stopped his speech.

The Queene hauing heard his Speech, told him she would further informe her selfe and afterwards declare what her pleasure was; which she did; and since continued the said Monf: Le Maistre in his place, in the seruice of Monf: D'Anjou, which office hee still hath; but the principall authors of this slander hee dismissed.

At the same time there was a great suit determined by the Court of Parliament, betwixt the Iesuits and the Vniuersity of Paris. It was begunne in the year 1603, when as the deceased King of famous memory, of his bounty, granted letters of re-establishment to the said Iesuits, in the chiefe towne of his Realme; and of his grace, gaue them (at the instance of the Siegneur of Varenne) leave to build a royall Colledge at La Fleche, by vertue of his letters patents giuen at Rouen, and verified by the Parliament. And in Iuly 1606, they obtained other Letters, giuing them power to make their residence at Paris in the professed House of S. Lewis, and in their Colledge of Clermont, allowing them Confessions, preachings, and other exercises of their Order, except publike Lectures, which for many good and iust considerations hee would not grant at that time: the Parliament of Paris did verifie these patents, with the clauses and conditions therein contained to be observed.

In the year 1609 the King being at Fountainbleau, granted vnto them by other letters patents, the publike reading in Diuinity in their Colledge of Clermont, which letters being presented to be verified, the Vniuersity and all the faculty of Diuinity in Paris, came and opposed themselves, so as they could not proceede.

In this year 1611, they obtained letters from their Maiefties, giuing leave to open their Colledge, and to instruct youth publicly in all the Sciences: which bred a great controuersie betwixt the said Iesuits and the Vniuersity: for hauing presented them to the Court the 23 of August to be verified, at the same time the Vniuersity required communication: and the third of September they presented a request vnto the Court, by which they opposed against the said Letters, and hindred the enrolment. Hereupon the parties had an assignation to appeare vpon the sixt following: on which day the body of the Vniuersity appeared; and Etienn with one other, assisted by their Advocate and Procurator. For where it was decreed, that the parties should precisely plead the next day; that all the Chambers should be assembled for the deciding of the cause; and that they should plead the doores being shut: but when they appeared, it was put off till the first day after S. Martin, appointing Martillien to be Advocate for the Vniuersity, and Montbolen for the Iesuits. The day being come, the Vniuersitie sued for audience; but the Iesuits hauing demanded delay, an order was made, that the parties should appeare the 26 of Nouember: at what time the Vniuersity came, hoping the cause should haue beene heard; but by the Queenes command it was deferred till another time, and the Vniuersity sent home. During this delay the Iesuits fetled themselves in their Colledges, and caused the youth to be instructed by interposed persons: whereof the Vniuersitie being aduertised, seeing the cause yet depending and vndecided, they made petition vnto the Court, that they might plead vpon their first opposition, the which was granted, and a day appointed on the 17 of December: at what time the chambers being assembled, the Vniuersity came with their Councell, and likewise the Iesuits.

at Antiliere speeches, pleading for the Vniuersity.

There assisted at the hearing of this cause, the Prince of Conde, with the Bishops of Beauuais and Noyon, Peeres of France, six Presidents, a Master of Requests, and 26 Councellors: La Martilliere hauing made a long relation touching the Vniuersity, in the end he charged the Iesuits, That both in Spaine and Flanders they had sought to plant Seminaries, both of English and Irish, which were fled out of their Countries; that they had drawn vnto them the best wits of those Nations; and that many great Families in France had lamented the losse of their children and kinsfolkes, which they had drawne vnto them. Then he accused them, That they did wrong to learning, to cut off and diuersifie Authors; That they were ignorant of the secrets of songes; and that they did not reade in the Colledges any bookes but such as were commended by their society. Afterwards, hauing spoken many things touching the faithfull obedience which all subiects owe vnto their Princes, he maintained that vpon the doctrine of the absolute power of correction of the temporall by the spirituall, taught by the Iesuits, they haue grounded their excommunications against Kings; interdiction of their Realmes, and discharge of the oath and obedience of their subiects, in case their naturall Princes should attempt any thing in their temporall against the Popes will, which he sayd was a schismaticall doctrine, and had beene condemned in France; alleging many examples and diuers Authors to proue that the rebellions, vlturpations, and attempts vpon the sacred persons of the Kings of France, proceeded from this wicked doctrine.

The conclusion of his pleading.

After many other crimes wherewith he taxed them, hee concluded in these termes: In the State wherein we liue, the Iesuits can haue no greater obstacle, then the bond to obserue strictly the conditions of their re-establishment: to hold them subiect to the Magistrate, like vnto other religious orders: not to endure their enterprises: to persueue all Bishops, Prelates, and Curates in their dignities: not to allow them any instruction of youth, lest they make a Monopolie thereof, and in the end forsake them in such sort as to become a Iesuite they will leaue to be French: and aboue all, not to abandon the authoritie of our doctrine vnto them, the foundation of the loue and fidelity of a Royalty, to receiue the instructions of a new Diuinity, deuised for the interest of their owne greauesse and priuate authority: wherunto they would add to our Beleeffe this 13 Article of the Faith: That all Crownes depend on the Pope, and that he hath power to depose Kings. He concluded for the Vniuersitie, that their Letters might not be allowed, and that they might be forbidden to reade, teach, or vse any Scholasticall function in the Vniuersity.

Montholan
pleading for the Iesuits.

The next day Montholan appeared for the Iesuits, whose pleading was very short. The discourse of the aduersary party (said he) was nothing but a faggot of reproaches bound vp together against the Iesuites, which deserue nothing but the fire. The testimonie of so many Popes, Emperors, and Kings, of the great benefit this Order brought vnto the world, as well in religion, as the instruction of youth: among others, that of the deceased King Henry the great, in his answers and Edicts made for the re-establishment of this Order in France, was sufficient to answer all the flanders which were objected against them. In his conclusion, his request was to haue the said Letters allowed, and their Colledge opened.

The Reſtor of the Vniuersity his Oration to the Court.

After *Montholan*s conclusion, the Reſtor of the Vniuersity made an Oration in Latine, not premeditated, as some write, to the great content of the auditors: the which being very long, I am forced to omit; only I will insert his conclusion, which was in these termes:

I am here my Lords, you reuerent Deities of this sacred Temple, the inuincible defenders of the French liberty: I conjure you all in the name of God, by the happy and fauourable shadowes of great Henry, who was sometimes father of this France, by his last Will, the which to breake were a sinne, a crime, a sacrilege; by the blood of our lawes which you haue in guard; by the immortal life of our most wise, most vertuous, and most powerfull Queene, to whom you are to giue all assurance; by this first Prince of the Royall blood here present, this most illustrious Prince, most worthy bud of the stem of Bourbons; by

A by the good which you owe vnto France; by the affection and honour you beare it; yea by your children whom this cause doth principally concerne: I conjure you euen by your selues, if you will be immortal, and engrauce your names in the Temple of memorie; Take away once for all, the managing of learning from these profane hands, and restore the command of studies to the Princeesse of Vniuersities, and the daughters into the hands of their mother: suffer not the blemish of new doctrines to couer the apple of Frenchmens eyes, and trouble their sights. Is it not better that the Vniuersitie should leape for ioy, at the very report of your names, and the remembrance of your praises, as they greene bayes to crowne your heads, and to graue your great merits in letters of gold; then that a new order of religious men, newly moulded, and of a new impression, who hold nothing of the French humor, and dispense with Monastical rules, to vaunt openly that their Societie had allowance amongst vs; that the Vniuersitie with all their learning, had beene ouerthrowne by your decrees; and that your breath hath withered this third blossome of the sacred Lillies?

If you haue decreed within your selues, to suffer the Iesuits to dispose of the Vniuersitie at their pleasures; at the least (my Lords) open your purple robes, receiue into your armes this Vniuersitie which is falling: receiue the sighes and last groanes of your mother, which is in an agonie, and growes towards her end: but happen what will, and let future ages wonder, That wee haue not failed the Common-weale, but the Common-weale hath failed vs.

The Reſtor hauing ended, Monſieur Seruin, first Aduocate generall made his remonstrance, which was very long, and concluded for the Vniuersitie against the Iesuits. In these pleadings they gathered foure points, which they taught and held: First, That the Pope was aboue the Councell: secondly, That the Pope hauing excommunicated a King, he might depriue him of his Realme: thirdly, That attempts and conspiracies against the sacred persons of Kings and their Estates, deliuered to the Priest in confession, they ought not to be reuealed to the Magistrate: and fourthly, That Clergy men were not subiect to secular Princes. Contrary to which foure points, they propounded to haue the Iesuits subscribe to these which follow. First, That the Councell was aboue the Pope: secondly, That the Pope had no temporall power ouer Kings, and could not by excommunication depriue them of their Realmes and Estates: thirdly, That Clergy men hauing heard of any attempt or conspiracie against the King or his Realme, or any matter of treason in confession, he was bound to reueale it to the Magistrate: fourthly, That Clergy men were subiect to the secular Prince or politique Magistrate.

The first President being in Councell, demanded of the Iesuits (who were eight in number) if they would subscribe vnto the doctrine of the Sorbon, especially in the foure points aboue mentioned, and cause their Generall to signe it. One of them (who they said was Prouinciall of France) answered, That amongst their statutes there was one which bound them to obserue the rules and orders of the place where they were during their abode, reading the passage in a booke which he held in his hand; and that they could not promise their Generall should signe that which was demanded; but they would write vnto him, and doe their best endeour. Montholan added, that they would be bound to obserue the doctrine of the Sorbon, and the lawes of the Vniuersity, for which their Heads should answer. And if they of the Sorbon (being their ancients) would signe the said foure articles, they would likewise signe them.

Hereupon the Court decreed, That the Prouinciall and they of his company plain-tiffs, who assisted at the audience, should presently subscribe the submission made by their Prouinciall to conform themselves to the doctrine of the Colledge of Sorbon, especially in that which concerns the preferuation of the sacred person of Kings; the maintaining of the Royall authority, and the liberties of the French Church, from all times obserued in the Realme: and in the meane time they did forbid the Iesuits to innouate any thing, or to attempt any thing to the preiudice of their Letters of re-establishment, and against the decree of the verification of the same: that they should not meddle either by themselves or any interposed persons with the instruction of youth in this City of Paris, in any manner whatsoever, or to vse there any exercise of Scholasticall function, vpon paine to lose their re-establishment.

The ciuill combustions at Aix la Chapelle, troubled the quiet of the neighbour Princes.

Troubles at Aix.

1611

The Protestants hauing expelled the Magistrates who were Papiſts, and seized vpon A the government of the Towne. Either party fortified themselves by their friends : the Catholikes sent to the Archduke Albert, and to the Elector of Cullen, who gaue them no great assistance; onely they sent Ambassadors to Aix, to labour a reconciliation. The Protestants sent to the Princes possesſing Iuliers, that they would be pleased to send them succours and some portion of note, to treat friendly of the differences betweene them and the Catholikes: which they did by the Earle of Solmes. The conditions they required, were; that some Protestants might hereafter be admitted into the Magistracie; That the exercise of the Lutheran and Caluiniſt religion might be allowed, the Iesuits expelled, and all that had past during the troubles forgotten. Soone after, the Archduke Alberts Ambassadors arriued, who pretending their Prince was protector of that towne, by vertue of an accord made in the yeare of our Lord 1600, he vsed some threats, which did not much please the Protestants of Aix, nor the Ambassadors of Iuliers; all which were not able to compound the quarrell.

Ambassadors
come from France to Aix.

Their speech to the Burgesses of Aix.

About the end of September there arriued the Marquis of Vieu-ville, with the Seigneurs of Brucil President of Metz, and Villars Hofman Ambassadors for the most Christian King and the Queene Regent, left this small difference should be the cause of some great warre, to the prejudice of their Estate. In a full assembly of the Magistrates and Burges- ses, they gaue them to vnderstand, that the most Christian King hearing with griefe of the late alterations which had happened in their towne and Common-weale: they had sent them to represent vnto them the dangerous inconueniences which might happen by their diuisions, which had filled their towne with confusion, the neighbour Princes with ieaousie, and the people with bad example; and to perswade them to lay aside all spleene and animosities, and to reconcile themselves vnto one another: laying before them the miseries which doe accompany the torrents of warre and ciuill dissention. And therefore my masters (sayd they) condemne not this good counsell, but receiue it with the respect and reuerence which is due vnto their Maiesties, and with the same good will which you haue shewed at our arriual into this towne. All things are yet in good estate if you will; for by the grace of God your troubles are not yet come to irreconciliable extremities. Leave first your hatred and spleene; lay aside your passions, and with quiet spirits consider of all the circumstances of times, places, and persons. Wee are now in peace almost throughout all Europe, and will you be the first to found the Trumpet, and to beginne the warre? your towne is situated in the midst of many Princes and Townes, who were lately in warre; would you that yours should serue as a Theater to adde a bloody Catastrophe to the Tragedies past? you are all in the same vessell, in the same inclosure, breathing the same ayre, vsing the same tongue, the same lawes and customes. Those whom you now repute for your aduersaries, are your fellow Citizens, your neighbours, your kinsfolke, your brethren and members of the same bodie. And although your opinions bee diuers touching matters of Religion, yet your wils should be vnited for the good of the Common-weale. Would you disgrace your Country, and teare in pieces the bowels of your mother? If you were bewitched with these impressions (which we cannot beleue) abandon all these pernicious counsels which will plunge you into a gulfe of misery; and embrace vniou and concord, which is the foundation and root of rest, the nurse of peace, the consolation of good Citizens, and a plentifull harvest of all good things. And to the end the businesse may be negotiated with more ease, you may if you please depute some of either side, peaceable men and not passionate, who may freely conferre with vs with all confidence and safety, and we will heare their propositions with patience, not as Iudges or Arbitrators, but as mediators of peace, and friendly Compositors: and we will endeavour by all means to end your differences by a common consent, and to all your likings.

An accord
made.

The effect of this Remonstrance was, that after some conferences, the Catholikes and Protestants of Aix, submitted themselves to the accord, which should be made by the Ambassadors of France and Iuliers, who laboured so in this businesse, as certaine Articles were drawn and signed by them; which Articles I am enforced for breuities sake to omit. But the Catholike Magistrate refused to signe them, being required: for that the Ambassadors of the Archduke Albert and the Elector of Cullen, returned soon after to Aix with an Imperiall Mandate, by which they said they were deputed from the Emperor to order what they should think good: which the Protestants seeing, they required the Magistrate against

A againe that the Articles concluded by the Ambassadors of France and Iuliers might be executed according to their tenor, and protested of nullity for all that should be done by the Archdukes and Electors Ambassadors. The French Ambassadors seeing that they had prepared the way for the Burgeses and Catholike Magistrates to enter into the temple of peace with the Protestants; and that the Senators made difficulty vpon some thornes which they imagined they had found therein: Hereupon they made a second Remonstrance, whereby they layd before them the dangers which would ensue by refusing of the said treaty, and how much they should offend their most Christian Maiesties, who had sent them to compound their differences in a friendly manner: and the rather for that they had beene aduertised it was with their consents, and should be againe by them of the declaration which they had giuen them in writing.

A second speech of the French Ambassadors.

If you ground your exercises (said the Ambassadors) vpon the said Mandate, the which (as you said) you dare not disobey: they will answer you, that you should haue attended vntill that his Imperiall Maiesty had beene aduertised of the said treaty, whereof the Mandate makes not any mention, or that hee should haue made declaration that hee could not allow of it. You shall of a iust cause which you had before, make an vnjust, the which will be blamed by all Princes and people which heare of it. The people will be confirmed in the complaint they make against you; that you will alwaies intreat them with rigour, and that you file all amiable composition, and desire nothing but severity without any mildnesse.

On the other side, if you accept of the said treaty, you shall doe nothing but what you haue done before: and yet you shall auoyde all these inconueniences, and doe no wrong nor prejudice either to the Emperours authority, the rights and priuiledges of your Towne, or your selues. For the said treaty being but prouisional and by way of Interim, would be no hindrance, but his Imperiall Maiesty may ordaine what he pleaseth: neither will it binde the hands of their highnes of Cullen and Brabant, whom he hath deputed; for that they are not prest to consent vnto the said treaty, nor their commissioners to signe it: and therefore nothing shall hinder them to doe what they please. By the accepting of this treaty, you shall preserve the amity of their most Christian Maiesties, who shall not haue employed their meanes and labour in vaine for so good a worke: as also of their Highnes of Iuliers, and of all your neighbours, who by this meanes shall be freed from the apparant danger of a most troublesome warre: you shall recouer your authoritie which is ouerthrowne, you shall gaine peace vnto your Country; you shall preserve the name and liberty of your Common-wealth, and you shall maintaine the Catholike Religion, which otherwise would be in great danger: and this great good will produce good effects, and wholesome examples throughout all Germany and Europe. Embrace not then winde and vaine hopes: but take a good and firme resolution, and accepting the treaty wherunto you had consented, winde the respect and honor which you owe vnto his Maiesty, who desireth nothing but your good, quiet, and tranquillity, seeing that you perceiue plainly it can breed you no prejudice, but all profit and commodity.

This second speech, although made in the French Kings name, yet the Catholike Magistrates would not resolve to returne into their places to take againe the reins of the politike Government: which the Ambassadors of France and Iuliers perceiving, to the end the Towne of Aix should not remaine without any Magistrate, they made choice of the chiefe amongst the Burgeses; to whom, with the consent of the Protestants, the administration of the Common-weale was committed. After which, the Ambassadors of France returned to their Maiesties, to giue an account of their Embassy; and with them there came to Paris Ambassadors from their Highnes of Iuliers, and the Burgeses of Aix. A little before, certaine deputies had come to the Court of France, who with the Archdukes Ambassadors, made instance to their Maiesties, that the accord made by the French Ambassadors at Aix might be dissolved: and that the Proscription of the Protestants made by the Emperor put in execution, which they laboured to obtaine before the Ambassadors returned: but their Maiesties being informed how all things had past: they told the Ambassadors of Iuliers and the deputies of the Burgeses of Aix, and gaue them letters, promising all fauour and succour in case the Archduke Albert should attempt any thing to the prejudice of their Highnes of Iuliers, and the Burgeses of Aix.

On the 4 of Nouember dyed Antonio Perez. Wee may say of him, that he had bene as much fauoured of Fortune, and by Kings and great Princes of Europe, as hee was after. A wards afflicted with misery, and reduced to extremity. It may bee seene in the booke of his relations, that being Secretary of State vnto Philip the 2. King of Spaine, hee had a great share in the loue and secrets of this King: we may see the occasion of his imprisonment in Spaine, and how he escaped and fled into Arragon: The taking of Armes of the people of Saragossa against the Inquisitors who would haue put him into the Inquisition: his flight from thence (it being besieged by the Spaniard) into Bearne, where hee was receiued by the Lady Katherine Sister to King Henry the Great: his passage into England and the reception he had from Queene Elizabeth: his coming to Paris, where as King Henry the Great caused him to bee lodged in the Queene Mothers Palace, giuing B him two Swissers for his guard, and a good pension for his entertainment. The execution of a Spaniard and his seruant by the hand of Iustice, who had attempted to kill him for 20000 Crownes: and the subtiltie of this murderer making shew to bee come into France to acquaint the King with a designe, which the Morisques had to reuolt. Behold hitherto many crosse of Fortune, but yet Perez not reduced to necessity: the Spaniard who (as Monsieur de Montigny said vnto the Marshall of Biron) neuer pardons an offence whilst the party liues, fought by all means to annoy Perez. A Gentleman belonging to the Ambassador of Spaine residing in the French Court, told him that if hee would leaue the Pension which the French King gaue him, hee should within 6 months bee restored to his goods and honours: the which was promised with much assurance, and confirmed by a Graund of Spaine. Passing from Paris in the year 1603, to goe into Flanders, he resigned his pension. Hee was also aduised to goe out of the Country to treat his peace, whereupon hee went to Calais, and so to Daquer, where hee receiued commandement to proceed no further: and the reason was, for that the Spanish Ambassador residing there, said, that if Antonio Perez came vnto that Court hee would depart. Perez thought now that there was no courtisie but in France, and from a King whom hee had in a manner disdained, reiecting the pension which hee had giuen him. From Calais he came to liue at Saint Denis in France, and although hee knew by experience that the promises of those of his Nation were without hope of any effect: yet the necessity whereunto hee was reduced for his entertainment, made him to seeke all D means he could to recouer the King of Spaines fauour. After this, hee came to lodge in the suburbs of Saint Victor at Paris, where his sonnes Don Gonçales, and Don Raphael came to see him, but without any means to assist him. Don Gonçales departed presently for Rome, and Don Raphael staid with him some time, during which Don Pedro de Toledo came extraordinary Ambassador into France, whom Perez went often to see, but hee had nothing but promises without effect, which made him to send his son into Spaine with letters and supplications to the Duke of Lerna: from whom hee had no answer but delays. They did write vnto him from Spaine, that he might treat with the Duke of Feria who was coming into France; but being come, he sent him word, that he had no charge to speake vnto him. He was danted with this answer, and said that hee saw E well he must end his daies in France, the which fell out accordingly: for being lodged nere vnto S. Paules, distressed for want of means, surprised with a greater feuer, he yielded his soule to God in the end of this year, and was buried at the Celestins.

I will conclude the year with an act of the Lord of Vatan, which as it was rash, so did it cause him to lose his life and honor. Vatan is a little towne in Berry, betweene Issoudun and the frontiers of Touraine, in which there is a reasonable strong Castle. During the troubles of the league, the two brethren of Vatan had giuen good testimonies of their valors in many combats, sieges, and enterprises for the kings partie: the eldest brother died at a siege, without children, and the younger brother remained sole heire of the Seigneurie of Vatan, having none but sisters; who remaining unmarried and committing little to the Court, liued nobly in his Castle: he was of the Religion, and much giuen to the Mathematickes, whereof hee caused a booke to bee printed when hee did the Act which caused him to lose both his life, honor and goods. Hee was a braue Gentleman, of a goodly stature, a keen haire, and long visage, but humorous and fantastical: and he was so firme a friend to his friends, as it cost him his life. And this was the cause:

Robin, generall Farmer of the imposts of Salt in France, aduertised that the Seigneur of Lausselle nere to Vatan, had store of false Salt in his house, whereof he made profit: he

A gaue charge to the Prouost Marshall of Tours to search his house for false Salt, and to seize vpon his person, and all those which should succour him. The Prouost hauing entered the house, and hauing found much false Salt, hee carried away Lausselle, with his brother, and a cousin of his: whereof Vatan being presently aduertised (for that he was his friend) he sent his steward presently after, to entreat the Prouost not to carie him away, promising to bring them forth whensoever he would: The steward hauing ouertaken the Prouost, whether he spake more boldly then he ought, or that he added some threats, or else for the full execution of his Commission, hee caried him away also prisoner. Vatan being aduertised hereof within few daies after, tooke horse with some of his followers, & by way of reprisall caried away one of Robins children from his house, whereupon he presented a petition to the Lords of the Councell, who decreed, that one of the great Prouosts Lieutenants should goe into Berry to informe of the fact, and the circumstances thereof; commanding all his Maiesties officers and subiects to be assisting vnto the said Lieutenant for the execution of the decree: to which end he had a Commission from his Maiestie.

The fantastick humor of Vatan made him beleue that they should haue sent a Gentleman to treat with him, being a Seigneur of qualitie, and not any of the Prouosts Lieutenants: who being come to Vatan, he sent him presently word that he should retire. But the Lieutenant hauing made a verbal proceesse according to his Commission, of all the rebellions of the Seigneur of Vatan, he returned to Paris; where all the proceedings being presented vnto the Councell of State, Robin obtained a decree, by the which his Maiestie ordained, that the former decree should be executed, and Vatan and his complices brought to the prison of Tour le Euesque, and his castle seized on: for the execution hereof, commandement was giuen to the Marshall La Chastre, and the Earle of Chiverny gouernor of Blois, to see this decree executed with such forces as his Maiestie should send, and if need were to cause the Canon to be conducted thither. The Grand Prouost went presently to see this decree executed, and sent to all the Prouosts of the neighbour prouinces to come vnto him: but the Queene hauing aduertisement, that Vatan had written to his friends, and made preparation to defend himselfe, and withall that he had some intelligence with Larrige and Chef bobin, who had bene executed for the enterprise of Poitou; these reasons made them to aduance the siege. And the Earle of Chiverny Gouernor of Blois, hauing receiued commandement againe, assembled foure or five hundred horse: The Seigneur de la Salle, a Captaine in the Regiment of the Guard, had the conduct of the foot, which consisted of 1200, with a companie of Swisse also: all which passed the Riuer of Cher with fixe Cannon.

Vatan being aduised by many of his friends to send vnto the Queene, to giue satisfacion vnto their Maiesties, and by the mediation of friends and kinsfolke to obtaine pardon for that which was past; or else to assure himselfe (as a great man wrote vnto him) of a shamefull death (if he were not resolved to expose himselfe to breach, and be slaine by the Cannon) with ignominy, enclined rather to his owne fantastick humor, which was so contrarie to all good aduice, as he staid and kept as prisoner with him a Gentleman his neighbour who came to admonish him to yeeld obedience vnto their Maiesties, and not vterly to vndoe himselfe.

The inhabitants of Vatan, seeing that they must of necessity receiue great losse, most of them retired into the neighbour townes. The Lord of Vatan being abandoned by all his friends and most of his vassalles, except fourscore or a hundred souldiers which were in his Castle, fought to defend the towne, but after thirteene volles of Cannon, seeing them ready to enter, he abandoned it, retiring with his souldiers into the Castle. The footmen entered the towne and lodged, and presently made barricados to defend themselves from the shot of the Castle. They say it is a humane thing to erre; to repent, diuine; but to be obstinate, deuillish. Vatan being blind, thinks that he hath not erred, and being summoned to yeeld, makes no answer. On the 14. of December the base Court was taken with 15 horses, and the next day the Cannon being planted and ready to shoot, two parts of his men abandoned him, and found means to escape on the backe side of the Castle: he then desired to parlee, and to yeeld vnto the Earle of Chiverny, entreating him to intercede for him vnto their Maiesties, the which he promised. Presently after, the bridge being let downe; they entered the Castle, where they apprehended all they found, and deliuered them them to the grand Prouost. Magny his Lieutenant being hurt with the Cannon, was presently beheaded, and some 20 hanged. At their coming into the Castle, Vatan was in a low Chamber, where Captain La Salle finding him with his sword by his side, he demanded it of him: you may take it from me, sayd he, but I will not give it you: which being done, he was committed to the guard of fixe fouldiers. This poore Nobleman thought it a part of great courage not to yeeld vp his weapon, and yet perceived not that he had committed an act of great baseness accompanied with despair, in yeelding himselfe aliae after so great an offence.

the Seigneur
of Vatan.

Hence he was soone after conducted to Paris, where his proceffe was made by the Court of Parliament, and he was condemned to lose his head at the Greue, and his body to be burned to ashes: his head to be caried to Vatan, and there to bee set ouer the gates vpon a Lance: it was ordered, that the Castle should be razed, and neuer to bee built againe: all his goods were confiscate to the King. Hercunto he answered nothing, but, Alas I must serue for an example: And the same day about 3 of the clocke in the afternoon he was executed. This was the end of the Lord of Vatan: his heart confessed his faults, his eyes wept for them, his tongue demanded pardon of God, and his death serued for a reparation of his crime.

Afterwards by the clemency and bounty of the Queene Regent, and at the suite of the Marshall La Chastre, and of the Seigneurs of Chasteau-neuf and Villeroi, the sister of the Lord of Vatan (who was to be his heyre) obtained from her Maiefty the gift of the confiscation of her brothers goods, so as the Castle was not razed.

Alliance of France proposed with Savoy by
the King.
Don Pedro de Toledo comes into France.

The deceased King some time before had resolved to make an alliance with the Duke of Sauoy, betwixt whom by means of their Ambassadors, there had bene some ouertures. During this time, in the year 1608, Don Pedro de Toledo arriued at Paris, being an extraordinary Ambassador for the Catholike King, whom many thought to come to treat of an alliance: others, that it was to discover if there were not some intelligence and priuate practice betwixt the King and the Duke of Sauoy, for that he made shew as if he would breake with the Catholike King his brother in law, for that he had not satisfied the said King in the articles of the contract past betwixt his Highnesse and the sister of the said King of Spaine. But every man knew that the affaires of the Low-countries, and the parties of peace held that year betwixt the King his master, the Archduke, and the general Estates of the vniited Prouinces, was the subiect of his Embassie.

The King expected to heare something from him touching this present alliance, but he spake nothing vnto him but of peace betwixt Flanders and Holland, saying that his Maiefty could doe much therein: And it is held for certaine, that if Don Pedro de Toledo had at that time made any ouerture, his Maieesty was ready to giue ear vnto it.

The beginning of the alliance with Spaine.

But to come to the beginning of these treaties, we must seeke the occasion further off; wherefore you must vnderstand that in the year 1609, Ferdinand de Medici, great Duke of Tuscane, vnle to the Queen Regent, being dead, Cosmo his son succceeded in his Estates. And as it is the custome of Florence vpon the death of the duke of Tuscane, to send extraordinary Ambassadors in the name of the new duke his successor, to al the soueraign Princes & great potentates of Christendome: & particularly to the King of Spaine, by reason of the homage and oath of fealty which the new Dukes of Tuscane are accustomed to renew to his Maiefty, at their coming to the Principality, by reason of the estate of Sienna annexed to the great Dukes Estates: he made choice of the Seigneur of Boty, Marquis of Campilla, a Knight of the Order of Saint Stephen, and high Steward of the great Dukes house; who hauing bene much employed to foraigne Princes about affaires of importance, he sent him his extraordinary Ambassador to the King of Spaine, to doe the said homage and fealty; who hauing performed the due of his charge to the Catholike King, finding a good opportunity, of his owne motion, without any commission from the Duke his master, he made an ouerture of the alliances betwixt France and Spaine, first to the chiefe Councillors of State, by whom he was aduised to speake vnto his Maiefty, which he did with such efficacy, grace and good successe, as he then beganne to hope of a happy end of the said treaty: And considering that this businesse was of great consequence and weight, he would proceed no further before he had aduertised the great Duke; sending a Poste expressly to Florence, who being well satisfied with the care and wisdom the Marquis had shewed in that businesse, allowed whatsoeuer he had done or should doe con-

A concerning the said treaties: and residing yet in Spaine, he sent him for his Ambassador extraordinary into France, to continue the said treaties of marriage with the most Christian King: where being arriued at Shroue-tide 1610, he was honourably receiued on their Maiesties behalfe into Paris; who for the respect of the great Duke, and the merit of his quality, caused him to be lodged in Gondies house in the Suburbs of S. Germaine.

The Marquis
is sent Ambasador into France to that end.

Soone after his arriual, he went to the Loure with a goodly traine, to salute their Maiesties, who hauing giuen him audience, he deliuered the subiect of his embassage, which was to let them vnderstand what reception the King of Spaine had giuen vnto him speaking to him of the alliance betwixt France & Spaine, as also how much the great Duke of Tuscane, the Pope, and all the Princes of Italy desired it. The deceased King (who had forgotten the desire he had to satisfie Don Pedro de Toledo if he had made any ouerture) thanked the great Duke for his good affection, telling the Marquis that he should haue time to consider of the businesse with his Councell, to giue him all contentment. After this first audience he retired to his lodging, whither the King went often to visit him, giuing him hope to satisfie the Dukes desire touching that which he had propounded.

But when as all things began to goe on in a desired course, death enuying our felicity, pulled from vs that great King, which was a let that things well begonne could not now take effect during the great alteration, and generall mourning of all good Frenchmen for the losse of their Prince.

The Kings death hindered the treaty of the alliance.

C All things being restored to their former estate, and France beyond expectation, enjoying the sweet calme of a happy tranquility, many disasters being nipt in the first budding; the said Marquis continued his designe begun with the deceased King, and propounded the same to the Queene Regent, who thought good to take counsell thereon, with the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Lords, and Officers of the Crowne, where it was approved by them all, and it was then held good to take a good resolution by a firme and full consultation: where with they acquainted the said Marquis in the beginning of the year 1611: who seeing the King and Queene to affect the beginning of this businesse, hee presently sent a Poste to the great Duke his master, to informe him of what he had done; and then into Spaine to the King, to assure him that their Maiesties in France were well pleased with the ouerture which he had made vnto them of the said treaties, and that the consent of his Catholike Maiefty was requisite, to giue some solid beginning to the said projected alliances.

The Marquis
continues his designe with
the Queene.

The deceased King had made the Duke of Rohan Gouvernor of S. Iohn D'Angely, giuing him for his Lieutenant a Gentleman of the Religion called Roch Beaucourt, who enioyed his charge without any molestation, vntill the vnhappy death of the deceased King: but after the generall Assembly at Saumur of them of the Religion, in the which there was some diuision, Roch Beaucourt was on their side, who fought to maintain themselves within the terme of the Edict according to the verification made in Parliaments: And of this opinion were the Marshall of Bouillon, and many of the Nobility, with all those whom they call iudicious, who conforming themselves to their Maiesties will, said that a ciuill warre was worse then all the miseries they could endure by an indifferent peace. These were contrary to the Duke of Rohan and the greatest number of the Deputies: who demanded the enioying of the Edict of Nantes, as it had bene drawne and set downe, but not as it had bene verified.

The proceedings of the Duke of Rohan
at S. Iohn D'Angely.

But to returne vnto this action: the Duke of Rohan, seeing Roch Beaucourt of a contrary opinion vnto him touching the Edict of Nantes, he practised meanes to put him out of S. Iohn D'Angely. Either of them desirous to maintaine his authority, Roch Beaucourt had recourse vnto their Maiesties, and the Duke of Rohan sought support from the reformed Churches, who maintained his opinion.

F The Queene had alwayes witnessed vnto the Duke of Rohan the fauour wherewith he had honoured him, as well in augmenting his pensions after the death of the deceased King, as in the Commission she gaue him for the leading of the Army of Iuliers, in case any accident should happen to the Marshall of la Chastre: and in the commandment he had for leauying of Swisses when as there was shew of a siege at Geneva. But the Queene seeing that from Britany (whither the Duke had gone to the Estates of that Province) he was returned to S. Iohn D'Angely, where he vsed diuers practices for the election of a new Maior: being also aduertised that the said Duke would, contrary to the priviledge of Maiors, take away the keyes: make him selfe master of the Towne, and thrust A out Rech Beaucourt and such as faoured him; the sent vnto the Duke to come to Court: which he presently did, and presented him selfe vnto their Maiesties: who gaue him good reception: but they let him vnderstand their intention particularly, with charge to conforme him selfe. The Duke could not resolute. He had left a seruant of his called Hault-fontaine to crosse Rech Beaucourt and the Maior: and finding his party stronger then theirs, sent word vnto the Duke, That all good men attended him with impatience.

He repaired late in an evening to the Queene, and told her that Monsieur de Senblize his brother was very sicke, and shewed his Letters. Some write that it was but a pretext: but howsoever, he posted into Poictou, where he continued eight dayes with his brother, B during the which many of the ir friends came to see them, and they went together to S. John D'Angely. Others on the contrary side say, that the Maior who had protested to be well pleased with his arrival and stay, had notwithstanding conspired with the partisans of Rech Beaucourt to thrust him out of S. John D'Angely, and that to this effect hee had caused them to arme vnder colour of a watch: but the Maior finding him selfe too weake stayed in the midst of his designe.

But omitting whatsoeuer was written in defence of either party, I will onely set down the particularities as they past. Their Maiesties being informed, that the Duke of Rohan was become master of S. John D'Angely, and had caused some alteration; they sent C Monsieur de Themis thither, to give them certaine aduice how all things had past during these factions; and to take order that if the Estate of the Towne could not bee reduced to a firme peace, yet at least by his wisdom to pacifie their quarrels, and to do whatsoeuer he should thinke necessary for the Kings seruice. But vpon the doubt, they had of some greater enterprises, they stayed the mother, wife, and sister, of the said Duke at Paris: and his Secretary being come from S. John D'Angely to informe their Maiesties of all these factions, and to acquaint them with many things concerning the Maiors behaviour whom he had deposed; they found them of as little force as his excuses, so as he was committed to the Bastile as the Seigneur of Themis had bene, being sent a little before by the Duke of Rohan to excuse the affront which had bene done to Capitaine Foucault. D Monsieur de Themis came to S. Johns, and seeing the affaires of the Town in the absolute disposition of the Duke of Rohan, he onely caused the old Maior to be restored for some few daies, after which all was in the power of the said Duke.

The Queene Regent (during the absence of the Prince of Conde, who went the last year into Guienne to take possession of his government) had treated long with the Earle of Soissons concerning the alliances by marriage betwixt France and Spaine: who had for his part liked of the first proposition which had bene made vnto the deceased King by the Marquis of Botry: the Prince of Conde did the like, being made acquainted therewith after his returne from Guienne, and all others who had knowledge thereof: holding it both profitable and proportionable for the Kings age and greatness. And although there were some remonstrances published, that the deceased King was resolved to make E an alliance with the Duke of Savoy, yet the Queene (a iudicious Princeesse) made it known, that she did not preferre this alliance for want of good will and affection to the Duke of Savoy and his House, nor for any other ends; but for the consideration of the merite of such an alliance, and the settling of peace betwixt these two Kings, profitable for Christendome, and more necessary for the present estate of the Kingdome, then at any other season: whereof the Duke of Bouillon had charge to satisfie his Maiestie of Great Brittain, whither they sent him expressly to performe that office: The like was done at the same instant to other Princes and allies to this Crowne: all which did witnesse their contents and approbation.

All things being consented vnto, betwixt their Maiesties and the Catholike King, and the consents exhibited on either part: the King of Spaine commanded his Ambassador, resident at Paris, to conclude the said treaties of marriage, the which hee did in the Kings chamber, in the presence of the King, the Queene Regent his mother, the Marquis of Botry Ambassador for the great Duke of Tuscane, and some officers of the Crowne.

Within few dayes after, the Ambassador of Spaine, in the name of the prince of Spaine sonne to the Catholike King, was made sure to his mistris the Lady Elizabeth of Burbon, the daughter of France: and the French King did the like for his part by the Ambassador

A bassador residing at Madrid for the Infanta of Spaine. This begot a thousand braue designs amongst the Nobility of France, Spaine & Naples, to celebrate these assurances: to the end they might testifie vnto the world how much they ioyed at these alliances. But this ioy continued not long, but was suddenly crossed by the Princes of the blood. For when the question was to enter into Councell touching the contract of marriage; being requisite that these Princes especially should confirme all the Articles & conventions mentioned in the said contract. The Prince of Conde and the Earle of Soissons made some deniall, and for that they were not willing to signe it, the Prince withdrew him selfe from Court, and went to visit his Houses; & Count Soissons went to his Government in Normandy: retreats which held all things in suspence, and much grieved their Maiesties, seeing the said Princes had so willingly yeelded to the first propositions: they went from Court in October 1611, and were absent 7 or 8 moneths.

The Princes retire from Court.

Notwithstanding the retreat of these Princes, they did not giue ouer their resolutions to celebrate these great Nuptials with running at the Ring, compleat in Armes, at the Quintine, Fire-works, and all sorts of Triumphs in Paris, among the other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and other Noblemen which were then in Court, all inflamed with a desire to publish to the world the glory of this alliance.

The day appointed for these triumphs was on the 14 of March in the Place Royall, a stately building made by King Henry the 4, being 72 fathome square, and environed with C many goodly pavillions. It was formerly called the Caste and Parke of the Tournells, before the which the Kings of France were wont to make their Tourneys, Combats, and running at Tilt in Saint Antonies street neere vnto the Bastile: But King Henry the second, being there vnforgottenly slaine with the splinter of a Lance; this Caste and Parke were afterwards vnfrequented and ruined, and in the end became a Market for horses. In this place Royall there were scaffolds erected for the King, Queene, Princes, Ladies and Noblemen, and a Citadell built with all manner of defences like to the Palladium of Troy: but all these triumphs were stayed for a time by reason of the death of the Duke of Mantoua, who was newly allied to their Maiesties; for the which the Queene was much afficted, retiring her selfe some dayes into her Chamber to mourne for his death. The D Cardinall of Mantoua, who had bene the year before at Paris, succeeded him. Soone after, a new day was appointed (through their Maiesties permission) for these triumphs on the 5 of Aprill: the Defendants having formerly published throughout all Paris their Cartell of defiance, to the end that no man should pretend ignorance.

Death of the Duke of Mantoua.

I must craue pardon if I make not a particular relation of euery circumstance; being tyed to strait bounds in the continuation of this History: but it shall suffice to vnderstand that the defendants were the Dukes of Guise, Neuers, and Cheureux, with the Lords of Bassompierre & Chastaigneray called the Knights of Glory, vnder borrowed names, who entred the Theater with a rich and stately equipage, hauing before them two triumphant Chariots, the one drawne by sixe Lions, the other by sixe Vnicornes.

The Defendaunts.

E The Assailants were in number 33, whereof the chiefe were, the Prince of Conty, the Dukes of Vendosme, Longueuille, Rohannois, and Rhets; the rest were, Marquisses, Earles, and Barons for the most part: they made their entries in ten feuerall troopes, but not equally diuided, being wonderfully rich in their furnitures and traines, euery troope hauing his feuerall Deuice, all which were very exquisite and rare. These sports continued three daies; at the end of euery daies triumph there were rare inuentions for fire-works, and shooting off of Ordnance; and to shew their generall applause, there were bonfires throughout all the streets of Paris, and in most good Townes of France.

The Assailants.

After all their ioy, feasts and triumphs at Paris, the Queene Regent was aduertised that the King of Spaine was somewhat amazed to heare of the difficulty made in France for the signing of the Contract: whereupon he sought by all faire & gentle meanes to cal back the Prince of Conde and Earle of Soissons Princes of the blood to Court: who after some refusal, in the end came to Paris; where being ariued, they presently satisfie the Queenes desire, and confirmed the contract of the said marriages vnder their hands, the which gaue great cause of ioy and content vnto all France.

The Princes of the blood called to Court.

There now remained nothing to bee done, but to signe the Articles which had bene formerly concluded: for the effecting whereof, their Maiesties sent the Duke of Mayen extraordinary Ambassador into Spaine, to confirme the contract of marriage betwene the

the most Christian King and the Infant of Spaine : and on the other side the Duke of A Pastrana was sent into France to doe the like betwene the Prince of Spaine, and the Kings sister. The Duke having sent his traine before by small iourneys in Bayonne, (which was the Rendezvous for all those which should accompany him into Spaine,) he went from Paris to Fontaine-Bellou to take leave of their Maiesties, from whence he parted in post on the 5 of Iune, and came to Bayonne on the 17, where he was attended by very many Noblemen and Gentlemen which did accompany him, besides those of his owne traine. To relate the severall intertainments in all places as he past would bee very tedious : I will onely touch at his reception at Lerma, which seems according to my author, to be very extraordinary. He came to lodge there on the 4 of Iuly, where B the Duke had given order to receive him with all the state that might be : for being descended from his horse in the bafe Court of the Castle, and going vp the staires, the Hall doore opened, at what time the Duke de Mayen, and those which did accompany him, smelt such a sweet sent of perfumes, as they all protested they had never done the like :

and opening the chamber doores they had the like perfume. The Hall and sixe chambers in the Castle were hanged with tapestrie of cloath of gold and silver, whose borders were embroidered with gold and enriched with rubies and emeralds. If the Duke of Lerma had caused his Castle to be richly furnished with hangings, stately beds, and moucables :
he had also given order there should be no want of victuals, for as they write, there had not bene in 50 years sene the like to that which was presented to the duke of Maien, C and in the name of the inhabitants of the Towne of Lerma, (although every man might see, it was the duke of Lerma care and prouision.) This was presented at the Dukes entry into the Castle : two Moores founding their trumpets went before, then came a number of persons attired like clownes, every two carying a long pole with all kinde of wilde-fowle, and amongst the rest great store of cunnies : After them followed 20 moyles with coverings of Turkie-work, the which were laden, some with Boraches of wine, others with veales, muttons, Turkie-cocks, Capons, Gammons of Bacon, comfitures and fruits.

A Present of victuals made vnto the Duke.

Being at Arande vpon Duero, Monf. de Vauclas ordinary Ambassador for France, came vnto him, who assured him that the Duke of Pastrana was parted from Madrid : whose long stay was the cause the Duke went on more slowly then he had resolved. D
During the dukes stay at Almeda and Barraias, his Catholike Maiesty sent the Marquis of Este to visit him, who accompanied him still vntill the day of his entry. The Ambassadors and all the Grandes of Spaine sent to visit him by their chiefe Gentlemen, with all kinds of complements and offers of seruice, vntill the day hee made his entry, which was on the 17 of Iuly in this manner :

First, there went before 65 moyles laden with trunckes and coffers belonging to the Noblemen and Gentlemen of his traine, hauing all blacke coverings. Then followed 134 moyles with the dukes baggage with coverings of blacke cloath, & his Armes in the middest, and at either corner a croffe of Loraine, conducted three and three in a ranke by their Muletiers clothed in blacke. Ten men mounted vpon Moyles, and ten Swiflers on foot E attired also in blacke had the conducting of them. After these came his Steward betwene two Controllers, hauing their chaines of gold in their blacke scarfes, and followed by 123 Officers and other Waiters all in black likewise. Then came 52 pages attired in mourning, conducted by the dukes Querry, and followed by their Gournour : then 217 Gentlemen in mourning also : 17 Barons, 7 Earles or Viscounts, 4 Marquesses, and the Prince of Tingri. The duke of Mayen alone vpon a horse which his Catholike Maiesty had sent him :
and Monf. de Vauclas ordinary Ambassador in Spaine, neer vnto him. Three Caroches covered with blacke, and another of Mon. de Vauclas made vp his French Embassie.

The duke of Mayen, being arriued with all his traine at Saint Barbaras neere vnto Madrid, he met there with the duke of Alua, accompanied with many Grandes of Spaine and F all the Nobility of the Court on horse-backe, which came to meet and receive him on his Catholike Maiesties part. In this troope were almost 500 horse, all richly furnished and in very good order. The principall which accompanied the duke D'Alua were, the dukes de L'Infantado, D'Albuquerque, De Maqueda, of Feria, of Montalto, of Penderande, of Elca, and of Villermosa, the Admirall, and the Adelantado of Castile, Don Pedro de Toledo, Don Christopher de Mora, the Earle of Laraies, and of Alualista. As soone as the duke of Mayen had espied them, he made a stand, and then the Marquis of Este which was by

1612

A by him told him all their names, which when hee had related, they fell to complement and salutations, without descending from horse-backe : which lasted so long, as it was almost seuen a clocke before they beganne to make towards the towne. Then the Caualliers of Spain mingled themselves with the French Gentlemen, each one ranging himselfe with them of his owne qualitie, and the Duke of Maien coming behind in the last rancke, had the Duke of Alua on his left hand. This entry was made at the port of Fuencarrall. All the streets of Madrid, the windowes, and the house-tops were full of people of all sorts.

The Duke of Mayen was conducted to the house of Marquis Spinola, and the Spaniards retired. From Wednesday vntill Saturday he was visited by the Ambassadors of all Princes and States ; by the Duke of Lerma, and the Cardinall of Toledo (who is not accustomed to doe that honor vnto any but the King,) and by all the Grandes and chiefe Lords of Spaine, accompanied with their kinsfolke and friends, every one striving to shew the greatnes of his House.

On Saturday Iuly 21, the Duke of Vieda came by the Kings commandement to accompany him to Court to his first Audience, he with all his Nobility and Gentry being mounted on horses from the Kings stable. Being come to the Castle, the Earles of Cabell, Rudio and Salazare, Stewards of the Kings house, met him at the entry of the Hall, and conducted him vnto the King, who was attired in a long Tacker of black bayes, and a long cloak of the same ; on his left hand stood the Prince his eldest sonne, and one the other,
C the Duke of Lerma ; behinde was the Marquis of Velado Lord Steward, with all the Grandes of Spaine bare-headed : The Duke having done his obeysance, the King embraced him, commanding him to be couered. After which he presented the King and Queens Letters, thanking him for the voyage the Duke of Feria had made into France to condole the death of the deceased King, and withall he did condole in their Maiesties name, the death of the Queene his wife : and hauing saluted the Prince (sitting by his Father) who embraced him, from thence he went to the Infanta's chamber, who was set vnder a cloath of Estate of cloath-of-gold, accompanied by the Countesse of Altamira her Gouvernesse and the Ladies of the Court. He had caused Madam de Vauclas to demand of the Infanta how she would command him to treat with her ; and vnderstanding her pleasure, he went D to kiss her hand as his Queene, and thence treated with him as her subiect. Three daies after hee presented a Letter on the Kings behalfe, which shee received with much content, and hauing read it, he said, Sir, if the King your Master doe not loue me for my beauty, yet at least he will loue me for my obedience. The rest of the time vntill the coming of Monf. de Piscanlx, he spent in visiting of Noblemen, and the like.

Monf. de Piscanlx being arriued at Madrid August 12, the Duke of Mayen presented him to his Maiesty, and to the Infanta. August 21 the Articles of the said Mariage were concluded betwixt the Duke of Lerma, in the name of the King of Spaine, on the one side, & the Duke of Mayen, the Viscount of Piscanlx, and the Baron of Vauclas, in the name of the most Christian King on the other. In presence of the Popes Nuncio, and many Dukes, E Noblemen and Councillors of Spaine. The Articles were these.

I. That with the grace of God, and a Dispensation from the Pope, by reason of the consanguinity & neernesse of blood betwene the most Christian King and the Infanta, The Arri-cles of the Mariage.
as soone as she shall come to the age of twelue years compleat, they shall cause their Mariage to be solemnized according to the Order prescribed by the Canons of the Catholike Apostolike and Romane Church, in the Court, Palace and house of his Catholike Maie-stie, where the noble Infanta the Lady Anna makes her residence ; and that by vertue of a Commission from the most Christian King ; which being done, the said King shall ratifie and accomplish in person, when the said Infanta Lady Anna shall come into France, his F Maiesty ioyning to her Highnes : and the said solemnitie of Mariage shall be performed either by speciall Commission, or in person, when as the time shall be set downe betwixt their Maiesties.

II. That his Catholike Maiesty doth promise and stand bound to giue to the said Infanta Lady Anna in dowry, and in regard of her Mariage with the most Christian King of France, and shall pay vnto his Maiesty, or to any other that hath authority from him, the summe of 500000 Crownes of gold, after the rate of eight shillings sterling the peece, in the Citie of Paris, a day before the Celebration of the said mariage.

[c 3]

1612

III. That their most Christian Maiesties shall binde themselves to assure the Dowry A of the said Infanta Lady Anna vpon good rents, and assured assignations, to the content of his Catholike Maiesty, or of such as he shall name to that effect: and in case the marriage be dissolved, and the Dowry in Law to be restored, then it shall be delivered backe againe to the said noble Infanta, or to him that shall haue commision from his Highnesse: and during the time the said Dowry shall remaine vnatisfied, her Highnesse, or her heires, or successors shall enioy the reuennue wherunto the interest of the said 50000 Crownes shall amount, which shall be payed by vertue of the said assignations.

III. That the said Noble Infanta Lady Anna shall hold her selfe content with the said Dowry, and shall neuer hereafter make any other pretence or claime vpon any colour B whatsoeuer; and that she shall renounce all actions and demands in good and due forme, and with all assurances and solemnities that shall be required and necessary; which renunciation she shall make before she is married, by present words.

V. That presently after the Celebration of the marriage, she shall approue and ratifie ioyntly with the most Christian King, and with the same forme and solemnity, as she did the first; and with such clauses as they shall finde to be convenient and necessary for the effect thereof: to which renunciation their Maiesties shall remaine bound as at this present. And in case they shall not make the said renunciation and ratification by vertue of this present contract by capitulation, the said treaties, renunciation, and ratification are held to be well and duly made, past and granted at this present, as if they were then C done: The which shall be made in the most authentike and effectuall manner that can be, to be good and of force, with all clauses derogatory of any Lawes, Iurisdiccions, Customes, Rites and Constitutions to the contrary; or that may hinder in all, or in part, the said renunciation, and ratification, the which for the effect aforesaid, their Catholike and most Christian Maiesties shall derogate, and doe at this present wholly derogate: And for the approbation and ratification which they shall make of this present contract and capitulation, they doe at this present as then meane to haue derogated to all exceptions about mentioned.

VI. That forasmuch as their Maiesties make these marriages, the better to continue and assure (by this strong bond) the publicke peace of Christendome, and the brotherly loue D which all men hope for betwixt their Maiesties, and in contemplation of the iust and lawfull causes, which the equality and conueniences of the said marriages doe perswade; by means wherof, and by the fauour and grace of God, all men may hope for a most happy successe, to the great good and increase of the faith and Christian religion; to the common good of the Kingdomes and subiects of the two Crowns; as also for that which concerns the good of the Common-weale and the preseruacion thereof: wherefore considering the quality aforesaid, and other iust reasons which may be alleged, their Maiesties conclude by contract, which shall stand in force as a Law for euer, in regard of their Realme, or any thing that shall concerne the publicke.

VII. That the Lady Anna Infanta of Spaine, nor the children borne of her, bee they E males or females, or their descendants, for euer hereafter in what degree soeuer they bee, shall not succeed in the Realmes, Estates, Siegneries, and Dominions which belong vnto his Catholike Maiesty, and which are comprehended vnder the titles & qualities mentioned in this present capitulation nor in any of his greatest Realmes, Estates, Siegneries, Prouinces, Ilands adiacent, Fiefs, Gouvernements; nor in the frontiers which he now holdeth, or that belong or may belong vnto him, within and without the Realme of Spaine, which heretofore their Catholike Maiesties and their Predecessors haue held and enioyed: nor into any part depending thereon, or that shall be hereafter gotten and added vnto his said Realmes, Estates and Dominions, or that may fall vnto him by any title F or right whatsoever, be it during the life of the said Infanta Lady Anna, or after her decease during the liues of any other descendants, in what degree soeuer: And in case they shall haue any pretensions by the lawes and customes of the said Realmes, Estates & Dominions to succcede in the same; in all the said cases the said Lady Anna doth at this present declare to be well and duly excluded, with all her children and descendants males and females, notwithstanding any pretence. To all which considerations in generall, vnto every one in particular, their Maiesties doe derogate, for that they doe contradikt and hinder the execution of this Article. And for the approbation and ratification of this presecr

A present Capitulation, they shall and do derogate, meaning that the Infanta and her descendants shall remaine for euer hereafter excluded from all succession in any of the States of the Countrey of Flanders, Countrey of Burgundy and of Charolois, with their dependances; which Countreies and Estates were giuen by his Catholike Maiesty to the Infanta Isabella, and must returne to his Catholike Maiesty and his successors. And further, they declare expressly, that in case the said Infanta remaine a widow (which God forbid) without any children of this marriage, that then she shall be free from the said exclusion, and be declared capable to succed in all that may belong or fall vnto her in two cases onely: the one, if remaining a widow of this marriage she come into Spaine: the other, if by reason B of state for the publicke good, and for iust considerations, shee marry againe with the good liking of the Catholike King her father, or the Prince of Spaine her brother, in which two cases she shall remaine capable to succed and inherite.

VIII. That as soone as the Infanta Lady Anna shall come to the fullage of 12 yeares, and before the celebration of the marriage, she shall promise vnder her hand-writing, by the which she shall binde her selfe and her descendants to the obseruation of her exclusion and of her descendants, approuing all as it is contained in this present contract, with all necessary clauses and oaths, and in swearing this present Capitulation, and the foresaid bond and ratification, which her Highnesse hath giuen and made, shee shall also make another like vnto it with the most Christian King, as soone as she shall be married, the which shall C be enrolled in the Court of Parliament of Paris according vnto forme, as also his Catholike Maiesty shall cause the said renunciation and ratification to be enrolled in his Councell of State: and in case the said renunciations and ratifications bee made or not made, from this present by vertue of this contract, and the marriage which shall follow, they shall be held as duly made and granted.

IX. That his most Christian Maiesty should giue vnto the Infanta Lady Anna for her Jewels to the value of fifty thousand Crownes of the Sun, the which with all others that she shall bring with her, she shall freely enioy without any difficulty, as the goods of her patrimony, the which shall belong to her Highnesse, and to her heyres and successors, or to such as shall haue right.

X. That their most Christian Maiesties, according to the ancient and commendable D custome of the royall House of France, shall assigne to the Infanta Lady Anna for her dowry twentie thousand Crownes of the Sun yearly, out of such lands and reuennues as shall haue execution of iustice, whereof the chiefe place shall haue the title of a Duchy or more; which lands and places so giuen and assigned, the said Infanta shall enioy by her selfe, or by her Commissioners and Officers, with the execution of iustice: and moreover, that the prouision of all offices being void, shall belong vnto her, as all Queenes of France haue vsually had: Provided alwaies, that the said offices shall not be giuen but to naturall Frenchmen, as also the gouernment and forming of the said lands, according to lawes and customes of the Realme of France: of which assignation the said Infanta Lady Anna shall E enter into possession, and enioy during her life as soone as she shall be a widow, whether she remaine in France, or retire her selfe to any other place.

XI. That his most Christian Maiesty shall giue to the Infanta Lady Anna for the expenses of her Chamber and the entertainment of her estate and house, a conuenient sum, such as belongs to the daughter and wife of so great Kings, assigning it vnto her after the accustomed manner of France, in giuing assignations for such entertainments and charges.

XII. That the Infanta hauing attained to twelue yeares of age, they shall marry by the Proctors which the most Christian King shall send, and the Infanta by words presently: the which being done, his Catholike Maiesty shall cause her to bee conducted at his F own cost and charges vnto the frontiers of France, with such attendance and traine as shall be fitting for the wife and daughter of so great Kings, where the shall be receiued by the most Christian King with the like traine and attendance.

XIII. That if the marriage should happen to be dissolved and broken off betwixt the most Christian King and the Infanta Lady Anna, and that her Highnesse shall pursue the King, it shall then be lawfull for her to retire without any hindrance into Spaine, or elsewhere at her pleasure, carrying away her dowry, Jewels, apparell, plate, and all other inuables whatsoeuer, with her officers and seruants, without any stay, let, or hindrance, directly directly or indirectly, enjoying the dowry and assignations which haue beene giuen her: and to this end, the most Christian King shall giue to the Catholike King and the Infanta Lady Anna his daughter, such Letters of assurance as shall be necessary, signed with his owne hand, and by the Queene Regent, and sealed with his seale: the which they shall assure and promise for them and their successors in the word of a King.

XIV. That seeing this present treaty of marriage had beene desired and advanced by our holy Father, and by his means brought to this estate, it shall be fit to entreat his Holiness (as their Maiesties doe at this present) to allow thereon, and to giue his Apostolicall blessing, and withall to cause this present contract to be inserted in his Bulls, together with his approbations which their Maiesties and her Highness haue made, and the writings and oaths which they haue giuen and taken.

XV. That both Kings shall approve and ratifie this present capitulation, and shall promise vpon the word and faith of a King to keepe it inuolably: for the effecting whereof they shall declare their Letters of ratification, after the accustomed manner one vnto another, within two monthes after the date of these presents, by their ordinary Ambassadors residing in the Courts of both Kings.

All which the sayd Commissioners did conclude and promise in their names, as is contained in this present capitulation, hauing bound their Maiesties and Highness to obserue and keepe it without any contravention, directly or indirectly: for so the said Commissioners haue promised by vertue of the authority they haue from their Maiesties, and to that end they haue set to their names, &c.

The Duke of Mayens second audience.

These Articles being past, the 22 of the said Moneth was chosen for the publication of the marriage, and for the second audience of the Duke of Mayen; the which for that it was very stately, even in the opinion of the Spaniards, who commend that which concerns strangers but coldly. I will briefly runne it ouer.

On the 22 of August, about five of the clocke in the euening, the Duke of Lerma came to the Duke of Mayens lodging, being accompanied by all the great men in Court, who were brauely mounted, and richly apparelled. Going to the palace, there marched 150 French Gentlemen, two and two; their apparell glistering with embroydery and rich stones. Their Pages went on either side bare-headed, their lueries being of veluet of diuers colours, with short cloakes, round hose, and long stockings, hauing their cloathes layed on with gold and silver lace.

On either side of the Duke of Mayen were twenty of his footmen clad in crimson veluet, hauing their jerkins, short cloakes, and panned hose embroyderyed with gold and silver, the lining of their cloakes and hose were of satin of the same colour. Then came twentie Pages bare-headed, and in the same livery. After this followed the Duke himselfe in a sute all embroyderyed with gold and silver, his ierkin and the pannes of his hose were cut vpon cloth of gold and silver, long white stockings, a short blacke cloake, with the same embroydery, white pumpees with two great iewels of diamonds in stead of roses, blacke veluet pantofles embroyderyed with gold and diamonds; his cap was of blacke veluet, with a very rich Iewell, and a band answerable vnto it; his girdle, bangers, rapier and dagger were all set with diamonds, and his cloake and garments had many iewels and chaines of precious stones.

His horse was in a manner couered with a foot-cloth of blacke Veluet, imbroyderyed like vnto his apparell; all the rest of the furniture was of blacke Veluet, couered with buttons and roses of Diamonds; for horses he had two great iewels, and for his reines hee had two scarfes of Cloth of silver cut and imbroyderyed with Gold. Then followed his Caroch of the same livery, drawne by six pyed horses, their harness being of Crimson Veluet embroyderyed with Gold. This was followed by two others of the same veluet, the

A the one hauing fixe gray horses, and the other fixe bay, and all the Coach-men were in Crimson Veluet imbroyderyed with gold and silver. After these followed 8 Caroches of the Kings full of French Gentlemen, very richly apparelled. In this pompe they came vnto the Palace, and stayed in a great Hall, whereas the Duke of Mayen being set betwixt the Popes Nuncio, and the Duke of Lerma; the rest of the Nobility being of either side, one of the Kings Secretaries of State read the conditions of marriage, which hee brought to the Dukes to signe.

From thence they went vnto the King, whom they found in his mourning habite vnder a Cloath of State, betwixt our Queene, attired in white Satin imbroyderyed with Pearle and Diamonds, and the Prince his son, clad also in white, with a short cloake & long stockings. The Duke being entred, hauing done his obeysance to the King, hee adressed himselfe first to the Queene, to whom hee did his complements for all France. After which, he spake vnto the King, and hauing saluted the Prince, hee went vnto all the Ladies, who came vpon their knees to salute the new Queene; after which he retired to his lodging, the streets being full of Torchcs and bonfires, with many Drummes, Trumpets and Hautboyes.

The Saturday following, the duke of Mayen being with the Queene, the King sent for him to haue him walke with him, which is a rare fauour; and it was the greater, for that the King caryed him through the City, discoursing with him of many things in French with great familiarity; which bred admiration in the Spaniards. At this time hee caused all the Frenchmen that were in prison, or in the galleys in Spaine, to be set at liberty. But omitting for breuity sake all other things that were remarkable during his abode in Madrid, we will now set him on his way homeward, hauing taken leaue of the King & yong Queene; but before his departure the Queene presented him with a chaine and a hat-band valued at 15000 Crownes, and with foure lennes of Spaine. The Duke of Ma-chera did giue him foure more with their caparasons of Satin cut in flowers, and the Duke of Alua presented him with two. He on the other side presented vnto the Infanta in the name of the King his Master a booke of precious stones all couered with Diamonds; after which, hee went out of Madrid in the same order they entred, but the mules had their couerings of Scarlet imbroyderyed with blacke and white, and his pages and other seruants were in lueries of the same colours. At the same time the Duke of Pastrana was sent into France by the King of Spaine for the same subiect: he parted from Madrid in Iuly, and hauing receiued all the honors and shewes of publike ioyes as hee past through France, they could deuise; he came in August to Paris making his entry on the 13 day, being met withall by the Duke of Neuers with 500 French Gentlemen: his entry was rich and stately: the King, the Queene Regent, Queene Marguerit, with all the Princesses and Ladies being in severall houses on our Ladyes bridge to see the Shev.

The Duke of Guise was sent to bring him to his first audience, being followed by a great troope of the French Nobility, who were very rich both in their owne apparell and the furniture of their horses. The Duke of Pastrana was all in blacke, but his cloake was enrich with diamonds & pearles. He had many Noblemen & Dons of Spaine with him, they were all in blacke, but their Capps and cloakes were garnished with stones; they had horses from the Kings stable, with foot cloathes of blacke Veluet. Euery Spaniard of more, to the number of thirty, marcht betwixt two French Noblemen. After this traine came two Groomes of the dukes livery, leading two Mules with their cloathes of Crimson Veluet, imbroyderyed with gold & silver, they were laden with Presents which the Prince of Spaine and the Infanta sent vnto their Maiesties: he had his audience in the great Gallerie, when hauing performed what hee had in charge to the King, Queene, and Madam, hee deliuered his Presents, and so retired to his lodging at 9 of the clocke at night, there being 120 Torchcs to attend him.

Hauing spent almost 15 daies in being visited by the Princesses, Cardinals, and all the great men in Court, and in visiting them and the great Ladies againe, after some feasts and a great dancing at Queen Marguerits, hee had his last audience in September, and took his leaue. The King sent him a Iewell of 20000 Crownes, and the Queene a pointed Diamonds of 4000 Crownes. She also sent a hat-band of stones to Don Francisco de Sylua the dukes brother of 3500 Crownes value, in requitall of a Bezar stone which hee had presented her with, being almost as big a kids head.

A false brute of
death.

In the beginning of October, Paris was put into a wonderfull feare vpon a false brute which went through the City that the King was slaine. This hapned about 3 of the clock in the afternoon, vpon this occasion; Some souldiers of the regiment which were then in guard set to quarrell nere vnto the Corps de Garde, so after words of reproach & threats they fell to blowes and drew their swords, in which one whose name was Le Roy was wounded, the rest crying out that he was dead; this cry Le Roy est mort, the King is dead, past into the cares of many like vnto lightning, who vnderstanding not the businesse presently, gaue it out that the King was dead, and that he had been slaine: The Parisians were all so amazed as they thought themselves to be ruined, beginning to shut vp their shops, and to take Armes for their preservation. The souldiers of the regiment ran from all parts to their quarters, to take armes, and to receive directions from their Leaders; where hearing that it was but a false brute, they were no further moued, but the people were still in feare: his Maiesty was then gone to hunt at Bois de Vincennes, and returned late to the Louure, where the Queene being aduertised of what past, she tooke Councell to send the King on horse-backe about the streets of Paris, with 3 trumpets, and his company of light hories: whereat the Parisians were much satisfied, and in the meane time they were apprehended that were the cause of this tumult, and committed to prison. As this yeare began with ioy & triumphs, so it ended with mourning & affliction: Their Maiesties being at Fontaine-bleau: Charles of Bourbon Earle of Soissons, a Prince of the blood, and Lord Steward of France, being retired (after the first solemnities of the Kings marriage), to his Castell of Blandy, he was surprised with a great sicknesse the 17 of October, and dyed the first day of Nouember in the presence of the Countesse his wife, and his seruants; he had married Anna of Montfay Lady of Lucé and Bonuefable, by whom he left one sonne and 4 daughters. The governments of Dauphin, Picardy and Normandy had been committed vnto him, he liued 46 yeares, & 27 daies: his body was interred in the ancient monument of the Bourbons at the Carthusiens of Gallion. The Court was very heauy for his death, and their Maiesties much grieved: all France lamented his losse, but especially the Prince of Conde his nephew; his son now Earle of Soissons succeeded him, and is at this day the second Prince of the blood, and the fourth person of the Houle of France.

Richers booke
de potestate called in question.

This yeare there had been a great controuersie among the Doctors of Diuinity of the Colledge of Sorbon, touching a booke composed by M. Edmund Richer Sindique or controller of that facultie, the which was entituled De potestate Ecclesiastica & Politica: and printed without any name either of Author or Printer: which booke was allowed of some, as profitable to the rights & liberties of the French Church: others thought it pernicious, as contradicting directly the Popes authority: whereupon the Colledge of Sorbon resolu'd to assemble the first of March (being their custome so to do the first day of euery moneth) to consult about the censuring of Richers booke. But the Court of Parliament being informed thereof, by the Kings Attorney Generall, they sent to forbid the Doctors of the said facultie, to censure the said booke, vntill they had proceeded legally according to the conclusion of the Kings Attorney Generall: forbidding them by a decree not to assemble or proceed any farther, but to appeare the next day in Court; where they were heard and examined touching that and all other such bookes: whereupon, after the conclusions of the Kings Attorney Generall, a decree was made that all the Copies of that booke should be brought to the Register of the Court; and that Richer the Author thereof should call in all the copies which he had dispersed within three daies, vntill the Court should bee satisfied in that which concerned the Kings seruice touching that subject. In the meane time the Bishops which were Suffragans vnto the Archbishop of Sens, examined the same booke and found it worthy of censure, and censured it for many erroneous propositions therein contained, without meddling with the Kings rights, or the liberties of the French Church: and they forbid all Christians which were vnder their iurisdiction to reade the said booke vpon paine of Ecclesiasticall censure: which censure was published throughout all Paris: whereunto the said Richer opposed himselfe and appealed from the said censure as abusive, presenting a petition vnto the Court that his appeale might bee allowed, the which hee obtained; and it was decreed that his letters should bee received: and so the said censure was to bee suspended, and the Bishops enioyned not to innouate any thing against the said Richer touching that subject.

A Proposition
in the Sorbon
to dye etc Richer from his place of Sindique.

A On the first of Iune following, there was a solemne assembly of all the Doctors of Diuinity, in the great Hall of the Colledge of Sorbon, in which there appeared 70 Doctors with the Sindique Richer. The Abbot of S. Victor, a Doctor of the said facultie, propounded in this assembly, that Doctor Richer had bene now very long Comptroller of the facultie, that they must giue him thanks and choose another; being necessary the facultie should haue many men acquainted with their affaires; and that if Richer should dye they had no tany. And to the end they might haue their voices free, he required that Doctor Richer might retire himselfe out of the assembly. Vpon this proposition D. Roguans Deane of the said facultie, said, that he had neuer seene in any ordinary assembly so many Doctors of Diuinity; that he should not be able to cause the order and dignity thereof to be obserued, if all the Doctors were not in mutuall concord: that hee had neuer seene any Sindique dismiss from his charge, if he himselfe did not desire it, or had giuen some lawfull cause of diffinition: that Doctor Richer had not done any thing vnworthy of his charge; but contrariwise, that the whole Vniuersity of Paris, and especially the facultie of Diuinity were much bound vnto him; and that they should rather studie how to commend him for his paines, then to dismiss him from his place: and therefore he could not propound vnto the assembly to proceed vnto the election of another Sindique.

After this, Richer began to speake for himselfe, alleging many things touching his premerment to that place, and how he had caried himselfe therein, opposing himselfe to the proposition which had bene made. Hereupon the Assembly was diuided. There were 43 Doctors which did adhere to the proposition of the Abbot of S. Victor, and 25 maintained the Sindiques opposition. This bred a great diuision among them, and of a private action became a matter of State: for being assembled in Iuly, the Court of Parliament sent vnto the Doctors to forbid them to make any proposition, and the Queene in like manner had by her Letters made the like injunction; the which was only done to suppress the differences and diuisions which might grow among them.

Notwithstanding these prohibitions, the Abbot of S. Victor with his adherents, desired to proceed to a new election, hoping to effect it on the first of August; but the day before, the Lord Chancellor sent an Vsher of the Councell vnto the Deane, commanding him in the Kings name not to treat in the Assembly, (which should be the next day) of the proposition made touching the election of a new Sindique of the facultie, for that his Maiesty would take order for it. But after so many pursuits, the Abbot prevailed, so as notice was giuen vnto Richer, that hee should no more oppose himselfe to the election of a new Sindique, for many considerations; and that it were better to be done with his owne consent then otherwise: whereunto Richer refusing to yeeld, two Vshers were sent on the first of September to the Assembly, bringing the Kings Letters Patents vnto the Deane & Doctors, enioyning them to proceed to a new election; which being read, Richer still opposed himselfe, protesting of nullity of all which had bin done against him, & persisted in his appeale: yet notwithstanding they proceeded to a new election; and by a generall consent, D. Filesac Curate of S. Iohn in Greue, was chosen Sindique: After which the Deane and many Doctors went presently to the Vshers, who attended to certifie their Maiesties and the Chancellor of their obedience to the said Letters.

After this it was concluded, that hereafter the Sindique of the facultie should not hold the place above two yeares, and that vpon the end of the first yeare, he should demand of the facultie if they were pleased hee should continue the next. And vpon a proposition made by Doctor Filesac, their new Sindique, it was decreed, that hereafter the Sindique should not write the Conclusions alone, but that euery yeare four Doctors should be chosen to assist him.

You haue formerly heard of the factions at S. Iohn D'Angely, their Maiesties imputing the fault to the Duke of Rohan, whom onely they blamed in particular, as they had declared vnto the generall Deputies of their subiects making profession of the Religion, to aduertise them thereof throughout all the Princes: and therefore they assured themselves to be equally assisted by all their subiects both of the one and the other Religion: they hauing the like interest for the reformation of this ad, which regards the generall good of the State, and in no sort any question of Religion, nor the obseruation of the Edicts, which their Maiesties would in that which concerns the towne of Saint Iohn D'Angely, and in all other things fully entertaine and obserue: whereof desiring their subjects should be well enformed, to the end that (as commonly men when they cannot hide A their fautes secke to colour them, and that there is no action but may finde some pretext if he will vse disguisings, although it be hard in a matter so plaine and manifest) no man may suffer himselfe to be deceived to his owne priuate losse, and that of the publike. After this, there were some Letters of abolition granted touching the particular Assemblies which they of the Religion had made in many Prouinces without the Kings permission; whereupon their National Synode which they had held at Prius, caused this following Declaration to be published.

Prius.

The reformed Churches of this Realme assembled in a Prouinciall Synode at Prius, after an oath taken, according to their custome, of their fidelities and most humble obedience to the commandments and seruice of their Maiesties: hearing by the report of many Deputies of Prouinces, that the Kings Letters Patents had bene directed to the Parliaments and Chambers of the Edict, containing an abolition and remission of pretended fautes committed in the conuocation of the priuate Assemblies of the said Prouinces: as also of that which hath past in regard thereof.

They declared, that the said Letters of abolition were neuer required, demanded, or sued for by them; being neither in deed, word, nor thought, culpable of the faults supposed therein; and that they are ready in generall and particular, to answer for their actions, submitting themselves rather to all kinds of punishments, then to suffer themselves and their posterity to be taxed with so shamefull an infamy, the which might hereafter C deprive them of the honour which they haue alwayes had to be held by all good Frenchmen and strangers, most faithfull subjects to the King, incorruptible and most affectionate to the good of the State.

Moreover, they declare, that they will not in any sort make vse of the said Letters, and that they disanow all consents and pursuits, if there were any, and such as haue demanded or approued them, contrary and preiudiciall to the sincerity of their intentions and their approved fidelity: protesting moreover to witness it by their voluntary exposing of their goods, liues, and honours, in the execution of the duties, seruice, and obedience which their Maiesties may expect of them, as from their most humble, faithfull, and obedient subjects and seruants.

at Rochel.

In September this yeare, there fell out a great mutiny and alteration in Rochel, begun by a multitude of the bolder sort, who trooped together to the number of a thousand or twelve hundred, with their armes: The Maior and chiefe of the towne, fought by all means possible to pacifie them, fearing lest some sinister euent should follow this great tumult: for they found the streets full of armed men, the corners of them barricadoed, and the chaires drawne: their chiefest quarrell was against the Seigneur of Courday who was a Councillor in the Court of Parliament at Paris, and one of the Sheriffes of Rochel: He was defended of a good Family; his father had bene Maior, and hee was allied to the best Houses. The peoples fury was such against him, and his danger so great, as seeing the designs they had against his person, hee entreated the Maior to cause him D to be conducted safely out of the gates; the which he did, but with very great difficulty, by reason of the incensed rage of this multitude, where the Maior had some affront done vnto his person.

The imaginary causes of the tumult.

The causes of this disorder were held but imaginary. First, They demanded reason of an outrage done vnto some of them the day before by Iames Vacher elected Maior, who had threatened them being armed in their Court de guard, to cause them to be caried to Paris with halers about their neckes: they would haue the towne purged from traitors and wicked men, who sought to perfwade the Queene, that they were no good subjects to the King. The Seigneur of Courday was not pleasing vnto them, as well for that which happened the yeare before, where they conceived he sought to make some innovations in their customes; as also for that his list comming was ill taken, being before the cessation of the Parliament, all things being quiet; as also for diuers aduertisements which they had received, that he had certaine Commissions, & among others, that of Intendants of the iustice, and some added of the government: but he gaue them full satisfaction therein, both in generall and particular before these troubles; so as men imagined they had no more thought of it. But it seemed that the causes of this tumult proceeded from that which followeth: for it was bruted amongst the people, that Monsieur de Courday and others employed by him,

1612

A him, had practised the voices of many of the body of the towne, to draw it from the vnion and correspondency which they had with the Churches of this Realme; a point which was so tickle, as that alone was sufficient to draw the people to any extraordinary action.

By a verball processe made concerning this tumult, they found that the onely cause proceeded from the Councillor de Courday, who had charge from their Maiesties, to hinder the calling of an Assembly, which some of the said Religion, (especially those which were not satisfied with the Edict of pacification, as it was verified in the court of Parliament) had resolved to hold on at Rochel without their Maiesties permission: and to haue an eye to any alterations which might happen: and to aduertise them of what was necessary for the maintaining of their subjects of both religions in peace in those Countries. But he being thrust out of the towne by this popular tumult, they held an Assembly by their owne authority, and drew many demands, as appears by their Declaration.

An Assembly of those of the religion at Rochel.

But the King being in Cancell, declared, that he would haue no regard to any instructions or articles that should be presented vnto him on the behalfe of that pretended Assembly, or of any priuate man which went thither to that effect, the Conuocation being vnlawfull and made contrary vnto the Edict, and without permission: But touching that whereof his Maiefty gaue good hope vnto Monsieur de Roumay before his voyage to Rochel, concerning them of the Religion in generall, most of which had bene granted by his Maiefty to the articles formerly presented, hee would cause it to be put in execution. C And as for the articles contained in their instructions which concerne particular men, his Maiefty had resolved and decreed, that if those his subjects of the reformed religion, whom it may concerne, returning to their duties, and those which are come to Rochel to assist at the said pretended Assembly, shall retire themselves into their Prouinces, they shall haue all Letters granted, and necessary dispatches made, to enjoy the effect of that whereof his Maiefty gaue hope vnto the Seigneur of Roumay before his departure. And concerning the other demands added to the Instructions since his voyage: his Maiefty declares, that hee cannot change any thing of the Edict of Nantes, secret articles, Briefes, Answers, and Declarations made by the deceased King; the which he will cause to be inuolubly obserued and kept, and make his subjects of the said religion, to enjoy all the graces, grants, and aduantages which haue bene granted vnto them thereby, and in the like manner as they haue done during the life of the deceased King, without any change or alteration: As also he would cause them to enjoy all such graces and concessions as had bene granted vnto them since his comming to the Crewe: And to that end there should be a generall declaration made presently by his Maiefty, for a further confirmation of the said Edicts, Articles, Briefes, and Letters, with Inunctions to all Officers, to suffer his said subjects to enjoy them fully and quietly. Which Declaration contained a forgetfulnesse of that which had bene done and past in prejudice of the said Edicts and Declarations, disanulling all pursuits and proceedings which had bene made. And to the intent this his intention and will should be more exactly obserued, he commanded the Marshalls of France of either religion to go their circuits throughout the Prouinces which should be assigned vnto them, as had bene anciently obserued, and according to the duty of their places; whom hee would cause to be accompanied by Iudges and such forces as should be necessary to countenance his good and faithfull subjects, and to punish such as should contradict the Edicts, and trouble the publike peace. This Declaration was signed and published the 15 of December.

A Declaration
touching the confirmation of the Edict.

Towards the end of the yeare, the Court of Parliament, Guardian of the rights and priuiledges of the Crowne of France, seized vpon a certaine pernicious Booke tending to the rebellion of subjects against Soueraigne power, written in Latine by Gasper Scoppius, F printed in Germany, and brought into France from Francfort Mart. The Court, finding that this booke (entituled Ecclesiasticus) contained an infinite number of execrable blasphemies and scandalous assertions against the glorious memorie of the deceased King Henry the Great, with other propositions tending to trouble the quiet of Christendome, against the safety, life, and estate of Soueraigne Princes: made a decree (the Chambers being all three assembled) that the said booke should be burnt by the Hangman publicly in the Palace yard, and inhibitions to all Printers and Booke-sellers, to print, sell, receiue, or publish it, forbidding all men of what condition or quality soeuer, to keepe or con- [f] scale ceale any of the sayd bookes : enioyning them that had any, that within foure and twenty A houres after publication of the said Decree, as well within the City of Paris by sound of Trumpe, as within all the Bayliwicks of that iurisdiction, to bring or send them to the Criminall Register of the said Court, and in other townes to the Registers there, to bee burnt ; and they which should oppoſe againſt this Decree, to bee puniſhed as Traitors.

Death of the Kings Schoolemaſter.

Among many great and learned perſonages whom God called this yeare to a better life, Nicholas le Febvre the Kings Schoole-maſter was one. He had beene choſen by the deceaſed King Henry to inſtruct the Prince of Conde, and the Queene Regent held him worthy for the King her ſonne, whereof he was moſt capable : hauing ſpent a yeare and B a halfe in this inſtruction, being in the Kings chamber to attend his charge, he was ſuddenly taken with a ſhaking and trembling of the heart, ſo as he was forced to flee preſently to his lodging, and to betake him to his bed : but finding at that inſtant that his life grew towards an end, he made a worthy preparation to death, before which he commanded his funerals ſhould bee ſimple and meane, making choice of his graue in Saint Innocents Church-yard : His pietie appears in his Teſtament, and by this Epitaph, which he him-ſelfe made.

Beccanus booke captured.

In the end of the laſt yeare, the Colledge of Sorbon (iealous of the greatneſſe, life, and ſafety of their Kings) had ſeized vpon a certaine Booke written by Beccanus, entituled :
The Controuerſie of England, touching the Kings power and the Popes. In the beginning of the laſt yeare, this Booke had beene reuiſed, corrected, and augmented at Mentz in Germany, being allowed by Henry Seuerus, Prouinciall of the Ieſuits, by the authority of Clauidius Aquavina, Generall of that Society : which Author ſaid, That the Pope is vniuer-ſall Paſtor of the Church, to whom Chriſt ſaid, Feed my ſheepe ; And that by the dogges are vnder-ſtood Kings and Emperours. Wherefore theſe Dogs whiſt they are faithfull and vigilant, muſt obey their Shepheard : but if they be ſloathfull and idle, the Shepheard muſt E preſently depoe them and driue them away.

It was therefore held neceſſary, to condemne theſe bad interpretations, and to provide for the ſafety of the Kings life, the quiet of his ſubiects, and the preſeruation of the Realm ; ſeeing and to prevent ſuch paricides as had beene committed vnder colour of Religion : ſeeing that vpon ſuch bad interpretations, a wicked wretch called Scoppius the Encomiaſt of Paricides had grounded himſelfe, to the end he might draw on others, ſaying in his booke called Eccleſiaſticus, I haue none but Turkes and Heretikes had lamented the death of King Henry the Great, or condemned the fact of Rauillac. Wherefore on the 7 of Ianuary, the Sor-bon deputed certaine Doctours of the faculty to goe vnto the Queene and Chancellor, to whom they repreſented ſummarily what had beene done in their Aſſembly, touching the perniciouſ propoſitions of Beccanus booke, and that they had beene aduerſed by their Sindique Fileſae, that the Cardinall of Bonſy by commandement from the Queene had given him charge not to cenſure the ſame booke, for that her Maieſty was reſolued to take another courſe. But for that this matter was of very great importance, the company thought good to let her Maieſtie vnderſtand, that they had ſurceaſed from all conclusions to witneſſe their humble obedience, vntill her pleaſure were further knowne. Yet the ſaid Faculty did much feare that their ſilence and delay might be ſo taken by poſterity, as if 1613

A if the Diuines of Paris had allowed of this ſeditious doctrine, and had condemned the decrees of their predeceſſors, by the which the life & ſouereigne authority of Kings is maintained ; wherein they referred themſelves to the Chancellors great wiſdome, but the whole body of the Diuines of Paris, deſired that their beliefe vpon his point might be manifeſted to the world. To whom the Chancellor ſaid, that he commended the care of the ſaid Faculty : that hauing read Beccanus booke, he held it moſt pernicious : and that it was neceſſary that the doctrine of the Sorbon ſhould be knowne to the world, to be directly againſt it, and that there ſhould be ſome remedy provided left this doctrine of Beccanus ſhould creepe in with more violence among the people ; wherefore hee was reſolued
B to bring them vnto the Queene, and to recommend the care of the ſaid Faculty vnto her Maieſty, as he did ; the promiſing to take aduice in Councell, and to reſolue them by the Chancellor. To whom the Doctours repaired the 12 of Ianuary, to vnderſtand the Queene's pleaſure, who told them that her Maieſty thinking that Beccanus booke had not beene common, & that there had beene but one copy or two in France, would iudiciously haue rather ſuppreſſed it by ſilence then otherwiſe, wherewith ſhee had acquainted the Cardinall of Bonſy, but being informed that it was in the hands of many, ſhe thought it fit to referre it vnto the fidelity and conſcience of the ſaid Faculty, ſo do as they ſhould thinke good ; and that their Decree ſhould be inſerted in the Registry of the ſaid Faculty, whereunto poſterity in the like controuerſie might haue recourſe.

C Yet afterwards Fileſae the Sindique, hauing red a certaine copie of a decree made by the Pope, containing the cenſure of the ſaid booke, made at Rome in an aſſembly of the Cardinals, the 3 of Ianuary this preſent yeare, for that there were found in this booke many things which were falſe, raſh, ſcandalous, and ſeditious reſpectively, and forbidden to be printed in any language vntill it were corrected : and for the better aſſurance thereof, hauing read ſome letters of Teſtimony from the Biſhop of Monte-pulciano the Popes Nuncio in France, he ſtayed the making of any Decree touching the ſaid pernicious pro-poſitions, aſſuring them that the Chancellor had forbidden it. Thus the controuerſie touching Beccanus booke ended, whereupon ſome were of opinion, that the word reſpectively in the Popes cenſure was put in of purpoſe as a terme of euaiſon, to ſhew that the Ieſuites doe not abſolutely condemne Beccanus doctrine, but onely in regard of the French, who were much offended therewith.

The incenſed fury and rage of the Nobility and Gentry of France running dayly to Ducles and Combats, ſometimes at the place Royall by Moone-light like madmen ; ſome time without Saint Honories gate or Saint Antonies : did in the beginning of this yeare much afflicte the King, Queene, and the whole Court. The Earle of Breſne and the Marquis of Neſle, hauing made many aſſigations to fight, were ſull preuented, and in the end reconciled by the Princes and Marſhalls of France. Among many men of note which had beene ſlaine by theſe combats ; that which did moſt afflicte the Queene was the encounter of the Cheuallier de Guife, with the Baron of Luſ Lieutenant General for the E King in the Duchy of Bourgandy : they meet in Saint Honories ſtreet, where the Che-uallier perceiving the Baron (whom he ſought for) to be in his Caroch accompanied by ſome Gentlemen, he aduanced willing him to come forth, and withall drew his ſword, gaue his cloake to one of his followers, left his horſe, and offered him the combat ; which the Baron de Luſ ſeeing, he preſently leapt out of his Caroch and put himſelfe in defence.
But at the ſecond thruſt the Baron fell downe dead vpon the place : which the Gentlemen of his traine perceiving, they made offer to defend him, but being hindered by the Cheualliers followers, they gaue way, and all they could doe was to put the Barons body into his Caroch, and to cary it ſpeedily to his lodging. The ſtreet was ſuddenly full of Noblemen and Gentlemen, which made men thinke there had beene ſome tumult and ſedition. The F Cheuallier retired himſelfe to the houſe of Guife, where the duke, the Prince of Ioinville, and the Archbiſhop of Rheims did much blame him in the Queene's behalfe, for that he had ſlaine ſo worthy a Gentleman, and ſo good a ſeruant to the King. Monſieur le Grand being then in Bourgundy, hearing theſe things, was much grieved. But I cannot expreſſe the wonderfull ſorrow of the young Baron de Luſ his onely ſonne, a goodly Gentleman ; who reſolued to be reuenged, though with the hazard of his owne life. To effect the which, about a moneth after, hee ſent a Gentleman called du Riſol to the Cheuallier with this following Challenge.

A Challenge
from the young Baron of Luz,
to the Cheuallier de Guise.

My Lord. None can be a more faithfull witnesse of the iust subiect of my griefe then your A selfe: and therefore I pray you most humbly to pardon my sensible feeling thereof. I inuite you by this note to doe me the honour that I may see your selfe with my sword in my hand against you, to renewe the death of my father. The effeeme I haue of your valour, makes me to hope that you will not obiect your quality, to auoid that whereunto your honour binds you. This Gentleman will bring you to the place where I am with a good horse and two swords, whereof you shall haue the choice. If this doe not please you, I will goe whither soeuer you shall command me.

The Cheuallier kills the young Baron of Luz.

The Cheuallier de Guise was in bed when du Riol brought him this Challenge, hauing read it, he arose presently, and du Riol holpe to dresse him: then sending for Mont-de Grignan, a Knight of Malta, he entreated him to accompany him; and so they parted without the priuity of any one. They went out of Saint Anthonies gate, and du Riol brought him to the place where the Baron of Luz was. The Cheuallier & Baron being visited by their seconds, and their doubtles off, all foure being on horse-backe, hauing taken the field, they began to aduance with their swords in their hands. At the first passado the Baron wounded the Cheuallier in the arme; but at the third the Cheuallier ran the Baron through the body, who falling from his horse had no other need but to care for his soules health. The Cheuallier ranne speedily to the two seconds, for Grignan had re-ceiued two wounds from du Riol who was not hurt, who seeing himselfe ready to be charged by two, the Baron lying along and neere his death, hee bethought himselfe of his retreat, recouering Charenton, and afterwards Bourgundy. On a sudden the field was full of Noblemen and Cheualliers, but they found no man but the Baron lying in the dust, whom his friends tooke presently vp: a lousse which afflicted the rest of his friends, and troubled the whole Court: But the Duke of Guise and his brethren were wonderfully perplexed, hauing heard that the Cheuallier was wounded to death, but seeing him return but lightly hurt, they were much comforted, and gaue God thanks for his escape. Hee kept his chamber for a time, as well by reason of his wounds, as for the displeasure the Queene had conceiued against him for the death of these two Noblemen, the father and sonne.

Halle.

In the same moneth Montigny-Halle a young Gentleman being in Paris, sent a challenge D to the Seigneur of Bethunes, Campe-maister to one of the French Regiments in Holland.
The place was appointed, they met, and Bethunes lost his life. He was much lamented for that he was a braue and valiant Gentleman. His friends made this Epitaph for him.

*Passenger, stay thy steps, beare reuerence to this tombe, Cyrus of Bethunes is here enclosed:
He had warre for his exercise, a Caesar for his master, and Offend for a Schoole: glory was his ambition, vertue his loue, and one onely God his feare. He cherished armes, respected the lawes, and honoured his Nation: yet armes haue taken him out of the world, the lawes haue abandoned him, and his Nation hath suffered him to bee lost. Goe weepe for the dead, complaine of the liuing, and content thy selfe.*

O God, what miseries (as a great Prelate said) doe these duels bring. Wee see Families made desolate, fathers lament the losse of their children, wiuers their husbands, France her Captaines and choice fouldiers, the King his Nobility (the ornament of his Crowne) and God his soules, whom Satan doth snatch from him. So many Edicts and Defences made by Saint Lewis, Henry the second, Charles the ninth, Henry the Great, and the King now reigning, against the inuention of encounters without challenge, could neuer suppress this deuillish course of combats and duels, which is to be reprobued as a most sauge thing, and neuer in vse among the Ancients, except it were in warre, that is to say, a subiect against the enemy by his Generals permission, or one Generall against another, to spare F
the subiects blood, whereof there are many examples in Histories.

The King seeking to prevent these mischiefs whereby his subiects might receive the benefit, with the aduice of the Queene Regent, the Princes of the blood, and officers of the Crowne, he confirmed all the former Edicts by his Declaration. And to take away all hope to obtain hereafter any thing from his Maiesty that might contradiet it, he declared with a firme and irreuocable resolution, that he would maintain the said Edicts in their full force, without any respect of persons: which his resolution he would haue made knowne

A vnto all the Princes of the blood, and other Princes and officers of the Crowne, and to all his Courts of Parliaments, subiects and seruants; and that he had no intent hereafter to grant any pardons or remissions for the breach of the said Edicts: and Declaration: forbidding them expressly, not to sue, entreat or mediate in those cases to his Maiesty, nor vnto the Queene Regent his mother, vpon paine of their indignation: forbidding them also to retire or concale any such offenders in their houses, or other places, or to giue them any support or assistance, but to discouer and deliuer them into the hands of iustice, if they were required by the officers, giuing them all ayd and assistance to doe it if they may. And this was the effect of the Kings Declaration: whereunto the Court added, That if any Letters of abolition were directed to the Prouost of the Kings house, and iudgement giuen by him, notwithstanding the said Letters, the proceeding should be void, and they should proceed against the offenders according to the Edicts and the Kings Declaration: neither should they which stood in contempt bee admitted to purge themselves, vlesse they paid the third part of the fines adiudged against them, to the vse of the poore that were that vp.

The Kings Declaration touching the maintenance of the Edict of pacification, being read in the Towne-house of Rochel, in the presence of the chiefe inhabitants, it was concluded by a generall consent, that they would obey his Maiesties will: And that they should forbid the continuance of the Assembly of those of the Religion come from diuers Prouinces into their towne. Vpon this resolution, there were some (which since the assembly at Saumur, were possessed with icalousie) made diuers conuenticles and secret as-semblies, where they propounded many things, and made diuers enterprises, whereof the Maieur was aduertised, assuring him that the tenth day of the moneth was appointed for the execution of many pernicious designs; and that many gentlemen were coming from
S. Iohn D'Angely towards Rochel, to support the vnderakers. The Maieur knowing the time when these Gentlemen should arise, and that their partisans should take armes;
he prevented them foure houres, and hindered their designs.

By the aduice of the chiefe Burgeesses (to prevent all accidents) hee, caused an alarme to be suddenly giuen, and seized vpon all the quarters of the towne by men able to stay such as had any will to mutine: then he caused all the Corps de Guards to sweare that they should not acknowledge any command but his, and made the townsmen to be all night in armes.

The next day being the 11 of January, hee caused an assembly of the townsmen to be made, where those of the Court of Iustice and men of all qualities assisted. There hee propounded, to haue a prohibition published vpon paine of death for any man to make any assemblies. This was not onely commended by a generall consent, but they did all swear to employ their liues and goods to haue it obscured, and to discouer such as should infringe it. Vpon this resolution, he caused this Declaration to be published by sound of Trumpet.

BY the Maieur and Captaine of this Towne. WHEREAS some desire to breed diuisions and dangerous factions among the inhabitants of this Towne, make Conuenticles and As-semblies both by night and day, vying seditious speeches among the people, assaunting many men of qualitie with inuious and slanderous reproaches: Wee doe expressly forbid all persons of what qualitie and condition soeuer, dwelling within this Towne, to make any Assemblies or Conuenticles either by night or day, vpon paine of death. Enioyning all those which shall haue knowledge thereof, to discouer it speedily, vpon paine to be punished as fauourers of the said Conuenticles: Wee also strictly forbid all the said inhabitants to quarrell or wrong one another either in word or deed: or to carie any Peece either by night or day, vpon paine of corporall punishment.

The day after this Proclamation, the assembly of the Deputies sent two vnto the Maieur being in the Towne-house, and protested vnto him that they would obey the Kings Declaration, and retire into their Prouinces, beseeching him to suffer some of them to continue in the Towne for their safety, vntill the Kings declaration were verified in their Prouinces: also that all those which were constrained to abandon the towne for that which happened therein on the fift of September 1612, might returne againe into their houses, to liue in peace and quiet. So the Maiors care and vigilancy made them yeeld obedience to his Majesties will, and procured concord among the Citizens, being much divided: as A also in the said tumult his wisdom did prevent the accidents of a popular fury.

The King continuing his care to provide for the disorders of his Estate, and seeing the excessive liberty in wearing of gold and silver upon their garments, the dissolution so common, and the charges so great, as many times they had more upon their backs then in their purses, he made an Edict this year, in March: Injoyning first of all the Clergie to wear decent habits, bestitting their profession; and all his other subjects to abstaine from all superfluities: forbidding expressly all persons in general vnder his obedience, what quality, sex, or condition soever, to wear any gold or silver of in their apparell, either good or counterfeit, in any sort or manner whatsoever, vpon the penalty of B 10 pound sterling; excepting the embroidery of saddles and furnitures for horses already made, the which should be tolerated for fixe moneths. He did also forbid all embroderies vpon garments, in what sort soever, were it in gold, silver, or silke, and the vse of Milan laces, vpon a penalty of a hundred pound sterling. Yet by this Edict hee did not forbid the vse of gold, silver, and embroderies in girdles, hangers, hat-bands, garters, roses, buckles, and supporters of womens ruffles, nor yet the gilding of rapier hilts, armes, spurs, bits for horses, and stirrups. He did also forbid the gilding of all Caroches or houses, were it vpon lead, iron, wood, stone, or plaster, or any other sort whatsoever, vpon paine of 100 pound sterling. He did also forbid all Noblemen and Gentlemen, to giue any Liucres of silke to their Pages or Footmen, but onely of cloath, and one lace about. In like manner all Taylors and Embroiderers were forbidden to make any such garments, vpon paine of thirty pound sterling for the first time, and double for the next offence. The King himselfe, and the Princes, to giue example vnto others to observe the Edict; forbore to wear any gold or silver in their apparell, wherein they were imitated by all the French Nobility, who shewed themselves very modest and obedient.

War betwixt the Dukes of Sauoy and Mantua.

All things being in peace both in France and abroad, there began a warre betwixt the Dukes of Sauoy and Mantua; for Francis Duke of Mantua and Marquis of Montferat, being lately dead without any issue male, leaving onely one daughter by the Duke of Sauoyes daughter, his brother Ferdinand succeeded him in the said Duchy and Marquisate: The Duke of Sauoy impatient to see his daughter and grandchild, to haue no better share in those Estates, pretending also a title to the Marquisate; hee resolved to retire his daughter and child from Mantua; and to that end he sent the Earles of Martinengue and Lucerne, and after them the Prince his sonne, to demand her of the Duke: who sent the Bishop of Diocesaria to the Duke of Sauoy, to acquaint him with his intention, which was, not to suffer his Niece of Mantua to depart for reasons of State.

In the meane time the Duke of Sauoy hauing leauied some forces, vpon a colour that it was for the preservation of his Estates of Sauoy, Piedmont, and Aste, and put them in garrison in all his townes, he resolved to surprize the Marquisate of Montferat, (being destitute of sufficient forces to defend it) before that the Duke of Mantua should bee able to send any succours: yea he had drawne many of the Nobility of Montferat to his party, E who promised to serue him in his enterprise.

The Duke of Sauoy leads his army into Montferat.

On the 22 of Aprill, the Duke of Sauoy being at Versel, he told the Bishop of Diocesaria, that he went forth that night to see some of his companies mustered; and that the next day he would resolve to accommodate the business for which he was come, but he did the contrary, for he went to the rendezvous which he had giuen to all his troops, and himselfe in person led them into Montferat, where he tooke Triuno by Pettard, and Albe by Scallido: After which they propounded to besiege Casal, and to force the Cittadell, the which being taken, there was not any other place able to make resistance in the whole Marquisate, which is a little Country, 3 dayes journey from the Alpes, lying between Piedmont, the Seignoury of Genua, and the State of Milan subiect to the King of Spain. So as the Duke of Mantua, to send succours to Montferat, must passe them through the Country which the Spaniard holds in Lombardy, so that it was to be feared, the Duke of Sauoy would soone preuaile in his enterprise: but God disposed otherwise.

About the same time the Queene Regent had concluded a marriage for the Lady Renee of Loraine, daughter to the deceased Duke of Mayen, with Mario Earle of Sancto Fiore, eldest sonne to Duke Alexander of France, and issued from the House of Visjins, which had beene alwayes much affectionate vnto the Crowne of France. The Duke of Neuers her brother

The Duke of Neuers goeth to succour Montferat, and enters into Casal.

A brother in law, tooke vpon him the charge to conduct her to Florence, where the marriage should be consummated: Embarking at Marfeilles, and landing at Saoune (a port belonging to the Seignoury of Genua) the Duke of Neuers vnderstood that the Duke of Sauoy had secretly with his army entred into Montferat, and that Casal was in danger to be lost, there being no commander nor sufficient forces to resist the Duke.

This Duke of Neuers who is of the House of Mantua, and nearest kinsman to the Duke, next vnto his brother Don Vincent, resolved to prevent this apparent danger with the hazard of his life; and hauing sent to recommend his sister in law to the State of Genua, (being afterwards conducted to Florence, and the marriage consummated) he tooke with him twenty men of his traine, and threecore Mariners, whom he caused to be armed, and with this company within two dayes he entred Casal.

The Duke of Sauoy aduertised of his arriuall, imagined that his enterprise would not succeed according to his designe; so as in stead of besieging Casal, he sent his Army before Nice de la Paile. And for that he saw all the neighbour Princes were in a wonderfull jealousy for his taking of armes in a full peace, he sent them a long Declaration of the causes: which were, the detension of his grandchild, and his old pretensions to the Marquisate of Montferat, entreating the Pope, Emperor, King of Spaine, and all other Princes to allow of this action. The Duke of Mantua on the other side made a full answer to this Declaration, the which I cannot insert at large.

C The Duke of Sauoy sent copies of his Declaration to all Kings and neighbour Estates, accompanied with his priuate Letters; writing also to the Seigneurs of Bearne, and the Sindiques of Genua; he entreated them not to be ialous of his taking of armes, promising that it was not his intent to offend them: but some doe write, that this promise of the Duke of Sauoyes, was like vnto that which Polipennus made to Vlisses, to cate him the last of all his companions. For if he tooke Casal as he had done Albe, hee would reuise his old pretensions vpon his neighbours one after another. Seeing hee is armed (they say) we must stand vpon our guard.

The newes of these armes in Montferat, being come to the French Court at Fountainbleau, they held the duke of Sauoyes quarrell vniust. Many Noblemen friends to the duke of Neuers, went to him to Casal, some by Marfeilles, to Saoune and Genua by sea, and others by Switzerland & Lombardy, & so came into Montferat. The Baron of La Roche of Daulphin a partisan, and (as they say) a pensioner to the Duke of Sauoy, and who liued much in his Court, had priuate intelligence with a Daulphinois of the towne of Romans, called Magnac, who followed the Councell of France, and solicited affaires, and had good access into the houses of the greatest in Court, making profession of the reformed religion, but in effect he was a spy, and pensioner to this Baron, as he was to the Duke. But the packets of Letters which Magnac had written to the Baron of La Roche, being taken at the Poste, and found full of intelligences concerning the State and matters of importance, he was apprehended and condemned as guilty of high treason, for the which hee E was broken on the wheele the last of May.

The French go to the Duke of Neuers in Montferat.

A Traytor executed.

The Baron of La Roche made no better end then Magnac, for being taken in the beginning of the next yeare, and brought to the Bastile, and afterwards to the Conciergerie, he was attainted and convicted for murdering a Church-man who came out of Italy with a packet for the King, for the which hee was iudged guilty of treason, and beheaded at the Greue.

But let vs returne to Montferat. All the Potentates of Italy went to armes, but none for the Duke of Sauoy. The King of Spaine commanded the Gouernor of Milan to leauy an army vnder the command of the prince of Afcoly, and to drue the Sauoyards out of Montferat with the hazard of a battell. The Duke of Mantua leauied souldiers in his Duchy, and the Venetians and the great Duke of Tuscane did the like for his succour. In the meane time the Duke of Sauoy had sent an army of fixe or seuen thousand foot of diuers nations, and a thousand horse to besiege Nice as you haue heard, thinking to find it as ill provided of defence, as the rest which he had taken; but he found that the Duke of Neuers his arriuall had assured the Gouernors, Captaines, and inhabitants of the townes of Montferat: and Don Vincent the Duke of Mantuas brother, and Generall of his Forces, came also to Casal with certaine Caualliers Mantuans. The Duke of Neuers conceiuing that if the Sauoyard should seize vpon Aqui and Ponsom, they would hinder the succour which which should come from France and Florence, heooke 30 Caualliers Mantuans, twenty A two Noblemen and Gentlemen French, and went and assured those places and others thereabouts, and furnished them with men and munition.

The Sauoyards in the meane time made their approaches before Nice with all speed, and had so thut it vp, as Capraine Via being gone forth with his company of 70 Carabins to bring munition into the Towne, could not enter, but was forced to go to Aiqui, being 7 miles distant from Nice, which the duke of Neuers resolved to succour, and to put halfe his troops into the towne, consisting of 250 Caualliers, 60 musquetiers, 60 Harquebusers, and 80 Pikes: but he was intreated by Don Vincents letters not to attempt it, for that the Spanish Army would come that night to Alexandria de la Paile vpon the Frontiers of B Montferat, and that the duke of Mantua Forces should ioyne with them, entreating him also to come, that being together they might relieue Nice without hazard. All these forces being ioynd on the 22 of May, they came within a miles of Nice, where they camped: these three Princes consulting which way they should charge the Sauoyards; Cont Guy of Saint George General of the Army of Sauoy seeing these Princes so neere, and ready to force him, hee sent word to the Prince of Alcoly in behalfe of the duke of Sauoy; That his Highnesse undertaking this war did not thinke that the King of Spaine would haue assisted the Duke of Mantua against him, who had the honor to be his brother in law: but seeing it was so, his only respect, and not any feare of the Armes of Mantua should make him retire: with protestation neuer to employ his Armes without the good will of the King of Spain. Whereunto the Prince of Alcoly made answer; That he had commandement from his Catholike Maiessty to succour Nice, and put the Sauoyard out of Montferat: But if their Generall caused them to retire, hee would not follow them, otherwise hee would bee the next morning in their trenches.

Nice raised.

Notwithstanding this offer of the Sauoyards Generall, they continued their battery all night, whereupon the Princes resolved to charge them the next morning in their trenches, and to force them to raise their siege: but hauing put their Army in battell and approaching neere vnto Nice, they saw the Sauoyards leaue their trenches and begin to retire, being aduertised of their coming: hereupon the duke of Neuers aduanced and entered first into the Towne, where heooke 200 foot of the Garison with the which he followed them, and so stayed them by skirmishes, as within a miles of Nice hee forced them to put themselves in battell as well to defend themselves being thus prest, as to attend their Cannon which was myred. Hereupon the duke presently aduertised the Prince of Alcoly and Don Vincent, intreating them to aduance with their troopes, the which they did, and put their Army in battell right against that of Sauoy within Musket shot. The duke of Neuers was very desirous to fight, and had drawn the Prince of Alcoly to be of his mind: but a Milanois being one of the Councell of warre to the King of Spaine said, that seeing he had given his word to the General of Sauoy not to follow them if they retired, he must now keepe it. The duke of Neuers replied, that the Prince of Alcoly was no more ingaged seeing they had failed of theirs; hauing sought to force Nice the last night: and moreover, they had now put themselves in battell in their presence, and therefore they ought to fight with them: but the Spaniards were of another opinion. And it was resolved that the Prince should send word to the General of Sauoy; that according to his promise he had given them time to retire, which they did not, but presented themselves before the D. of Neuers, and Don Vincent, who were so incensed as he could no longer stay them from giuing battell; that if hee retired not speedily, hee should consent vnto them (as hee was bound) to cut the Army of Sauoy in peeces, the which they would vndoubtedly doe if he retired not. Vpon the deliuey of this message, the Generall caused his Army to retire to Castellano a little Towne in Piedmont, foure myles from Nice, whither the three Princes went to resolve on the siege of Albe.

The Governour
of Milan grows ialous
of the duke of Neuers, and the French.

But the Governour of Milan soone changed the face of this designe, and the affection of those which were come to this warre to succour an afflicted Prince. He grew ialous of the French Gentlemen which were come to the duke of Neuers: and that the Seigneur of Bourg with a regiment of 2000 foot should come out of France into Italy to succour the duke of Mantua. Finally, this Governour said, that he would not suffer any French troopes in Italy, and that none should passe by the State of Milan; and that hee would ill intreat the first which came: that if the Seigneur of Bourg should passe into Italy,

1613

Italy, he would cause him and his Regiment to be cut in peeces. He sent to all the Spanish Gallies which were at Naples, Sicily and Genoa, to come and lye vpon those coasts, and to hinder the descent of all vessels which should bring any French to goe into Montferat. Yea some write, that it was bruted ouer all Italy, that the duke of Neuers drew the French into Montferat to seize on it for himselfe. The Duke of Neuers being aduertised of the Governours speeches, he sent him word, that if heooke him for no other but to be of his quality, the troope of French gentlemen which were with him, would be indeed held extraordinary: But when he should consider of what quality he was, as duke of Neuers, and of the House of Mantua, that of 120 gentlemen which were come vnto him, all of them B (except foure or fve of the principall which were come as friends to accompany him in this warre) were alwaies wont to bee of his traine: and that hee should bee well aduised not to ill entreat any which should come vnto him: for the least affront hee should doe vnto any one hee would reuenge it on his person or lose his life: for that in this action there was nothing concerning the interest of the King of Spaine his Master, but of one particular to another. As for his threats to cut the regiment of Dn Bourg in peeces if it came into Italy, the Duke sent him word, that he did not thinke hee had any such commission from Spaine, which were to do the King his Master bad seruice in speaking so freely. And that it was not possible for any man to hinder the most Christian King his Master to send succours vnto the Duke of Mantua his Cousin Germaine, and nephew vnto the Queene C Regent his Mother, to hinder the Duke of Sauoy from the invading of Montferat. As for the ialousie which he would put into the duke of Mantua head, touching Montferat, it was more then hee could effect with all his endeuours, their interests were too strictly vniued.

The Duke of Neuers need-age to the Go-uernour of
Mil. n.

Notwithstanding all these speeches, the Duke of Sauoy and the Governour of Milan concluded a Peace in halfe, for as they prepared to besiege Trino and Verfel, the two Armies of Spaine and Mantua being come to the Rendezvous, the Prince of Alcoly told the Duke of Neuers and Don Vincent, that a peace was concluded betweene the Duke of Sauoy and the Governour of Milan, the which he shewed them in writing to this effect: That as the Popes Summons, and to obey the commandements of their Imperiall and Catholike Maiessties, the Duke of Sauoy should within sixe dayes restore the places which he held in Montferat into the hands of such Commissaries as should be deputed by their Maiessties: that it is to say, the Prince of Castiglion for the Emperour, and the Governour of Milan for the King of Spaine, and that defences should be made to either part to commit any act of Hostility.

They that haue written of these warres said, that it was concluded in as great haste, as the Duke of Sauoy had begun the warre: yet the Duke of Mantua Agent at Milan durst not accept thereof, hauing no speciall commandement from his Prince; yet afterwards the Duke did allow of it. And although the Duke of Sauoy had promised to restore the places within fixe daies, yet hee did it not before that hee had received letters from the King of Spaine to presse him thereunto. After this restitution, the Duke of Sauoy would E not disarme, notwithstanding any instance that was made, before that the King of Spaine should cause the duke of Mantua to signe and to execute the foure priuate Articles which the Governour of Milan had yielded vnto, in signing the restitution: and that the Duke of Mantua seeing him still in armes, would be more tractable to accord their differences.

The Duke of Sauoy refused to disarm, and the reason.

The foure Articles were, First, That the two dukes should not pretend any damages one against the other by reason of the warre. Secondly, That the subjects of either Duke, which had followed a contrary party, should not be molested in their persons, nor goods. Thirdly, That a moneth after the restitution made by the Duke of Sauoy of the places taken by him in Montferat, the Princesse Mary should be deliuered vnto him by the Duke of Mantua, to be restored within 15 daies after to the Princesse Marguerite her F Moser. And fourthly, that within a short time after, they should treat friendly of all the pretensions and differences which were betwixt the two Dukes.

In Italy Monf: de Sonvre a Knight of both the orders, and Governour of his Maiessties person, was honoured with the dignity of Marshall of France, in the place of the deceased Marshall Fernaquins. It was thought the Duke of Sully should haue been aduanced, in regard of the good seruice hee had done to France, for that they said the deceased King of immortall memory, had promised him the first Marshalls place which should be voyd: yet euery man thought it wel bestowed vpon Monf: de Sonvre as a Nobleman most worthy to be be recompensed with that honor, for the great and commendable care he had had for the instruction & government of his Maiesties person : he continued little in that dignity, for presently after his advancement he resigned it into their Maiesties hands to be conferred vpon the Marquis of Ancres, as it was : and the King being at Fontaine-bleau, caused him to be receiued Marshall of France although it were not with the good liking of many private persons.

The Almanack
of Morgard.

By the Ordinances of the most Christian Kings made vpon the complaints of the Estates of Orleans and Blois, all Soothsayers, and makers of Prognostications and Almanacks, exceeding the termes of lawfull Astrology, should bee punished extraordinarily and corporally. A holy and iust law, but ill obserued, through the liberty which these makers of Preditions tooke, who not content to speake of faire and soule weather, busie themselves to prognosticate of the effects of Mars, and of the affaires of State : as it happened in the beginning of this year, in the which Neel Leon Morgard made an Almanack as he had done the year before, in the which hee spake much of warre : and yet France was as quiet and peaceable as it had been in 20 years. In his Almanack for this year, this Morgard seeking to be admired for his insolency and malice, assured, that the State of France should change : he touched the Kings person : and set downe the times, months and quarters, and he spake of many great Princes, altring only the letters of their names. This Almanack being sold on the first day of the year, was extraordinarily sought for by curious persons, who assured themselves that it was a Prophesie. And that which gaue it the more credit was, for that Morgard hauing set in the first quarter of Ianuary that a Martill man should play a bad prance with his owne sonne : It hapned that an aged man of the Suburbs of St. Germaine who had sometimes beene a souldier, flue his son thinking to kill a woman whom he entertain'd. The peoples murmuring of these new Preditions being imparted to the Queene Regent with a discourse of the wonders which he foretold : Her Maiestie held the author worthy of punishment, commanding the Officers of Iustice to make search for him, the which was continued for some daies in the end he was apprehended in Saint Honories street, and the Printer in like manner, who had fold the said Almanackes. Morgard was first caried to the Bastile, and afterwards to the Conciergerie. The Court of Parliament tooke knowledge of the cause, and examined the offenders, especially Morgard who at the first denied that he had giuen the said scandalous Preditions to be printed, the which was verified euen by the testimonie of such as had wrought vpon the said Almanack, who said that they had receiued those scandalous preditions in small papers from the said Morgard, and that being printed, hee instantly tooke them away againe : which being in the end confessed by the said Morgard, he was by a decree of the Court condemned to serue in the Kings Gallies 9 years, and was presently deliuered ouer to be chained to others. Before his going to Marseilles, hee cast diuers mens Natiuities, saying vnto some, That they had done him wrong to condemne him before he had spoken with the Queene, to whom if he had beene admitted, hee would haue told many things for the good of France. Some held that this Morgard was very ignorant in Astrologie, and that hee vnderstood not the Latine tongue. That by race hee was a Cutpurse, and that the year before he had beene a prisoner in the Conciergerie along time, being accused for many thefts ; yea some said that he had not made this Almanack, which was the subiect of many discourses that were published abroad, and of a feare, which for a time troubled the mindes of the French, vntill August, that their Maiesties went into Poitou and Britany, which was the month vnto the which this miserable wretch had limited the Kings life.

A decree against giant Duells.

Presently after the Feast of Christmas was past, Duells were more frequent amongst the Nobility then they had beene in former times ; there was no common discourse but of combats and encounters, which made the Queene Regent to aduertise the Court of Parliament thereof, to the end they might deuise some expedient, to diuert the course of such a mischief. The Court hauing taken deliberation thereon, made a very rigorous decree against the aggressors and acceptors of Duells & Combats : forbidding all persons to quarrell in publike or private, to goe to field, or make any assignations to fight, vpon paine (for all such as should infringe this decree) to bee held guilty of High Treason, and they and their posterity to be declared base and ignoble for euer : forbidding all persons to fauour them, or to receiue them into their houses or Castles, vpon paine of razing of the said

A said places : exhorting all Clergie men not to giue them buriall, and giuing power to all persons to cease vpon them, and to deliuer them into the hands of Iustice, allowing 25 Crownes to bee taken out of the fines of the Court, to euery one that shall ayde to seize vpon the said combatants : which decree was published in all the streets and suburbs of Paris, and set vp in many places.

In the beginning of the year, there appeared some discontents, which made France to feare and apprehend a ciuill warre. The Prince of Conde assisted by other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Noblemen, and Officers of the Crowne, retired from Court seeing the affaires within the Realme, some in confusion, and others in disorder : accidents which happen ordinarily during the Minority of Kings, and wherein the bounty and wisdom of the Queene Regent, had beene carefull during the time of her regency, as much as possible she could, to stay the course of such disorders throughout the Realme.

The Prince seeing how little he should preuaile to speak in Court of a generall reformation, he thought it fitt (by the aduice of some of his friends) to absent himselfe, and to consider of this important businesse : the which hee did in the end of February, going to Chasteauroux in Berry. The Duke of Neuers retired himselfe into his Government of Champagne, and the Duke of Mayen to Soissons : And within few daies after, the Marshall of Bouillon went from Paris. They which did adhere to this partie haue written in this manner,

The Prince of Conde and others discontented.They retire from Court.

C Men haue discoursed diuersly of the departure of the Prince of Conde, and of the Dukes of Neuers and Mayen from Court, and of their discontents : the which gaue occasion to the Marshall of Bouillon (who remained in Paris after them) particularly to informe the principall ministers about the King thereof, vnto whom hee signified that they had no other designe, intention, nor desire, but to remaine in that most humble obedience which they owe vnto the King and Queene : that the cause of their discontent proceeded not from any private interest, but only from the disorder and confusion, which since the death of the deceased King, had crept into the Government of the State : that to their great griefe, they saw it increase in such manner, as it would proue incurable, if it were not prevented in time : that the ranke they held in this Realme did oblige them, to represent these inconueniences to the Queene, to the end she might apply fit and necessary remedies : That to this end they were to meet at Meziens on the 15 of February with their ordinary traines, and there to aduise of that which they had to say ; that vpon these words of the Duke of Bouillon, they held a Councell and resolved to stay him, but hee went speedily out of Paris, hauing aduertised the Prince of Conde of his going towards Meziens, and of the other Princes and Noblemen : That on the 10 of February, the Duke of Longueville went out of Paris by night with a small traine towards Amiens, without taking leaue of their Maiesties : And that the day following at night, the Queene being aduertised that the Duke of Vendosme was of the said party, shee had caused him to be stayed in the Louure by the Captaine of her Guard, who appointed certaine Archers to

E keepe him in his chamber, where they put Barres of Iron to his windowes. Some to excuse this, said, that the Queene had beene aduertised that the day before this Duke had conferred long with the duke of Longueville, and that he prepared himselfe to scale away, as the other had done, whereupon moued with the care hee had of his fortune and reputation, for the loue of the deceased King, she thought it fit to stay him within his chamber in the Louure, to keepe him from disobedience, into the which hee might fall following the bad aduice which was giuen him. The Court was much troubled with the retreat of these Princes, and with the brutes which were dispersed : which caused the Queene to write to all the Courts of Parliaments, the Gouernours of Prouinces, and to Maiors and Sheriffes of Townes after this manner.

F MY Masters, I haue made no haste to write vnto you, touching the departure of the Prince of Conde my Nephew from Court, and of other Princes who retired at the same time, for that my Nephew hauing taken leaue of the King and mee, promised to returne whensoever he should be call'd, for the good of his seruice, and the others did the like. I conceived that their retiring was rather to visit their Houses, and to spend some time in the pleasure of hunting (as my said Nephew and the rest had often done) then for any other designe : Notwithstanding, hearing rather by common report then by any aduerfement from them, that they ſeem to haue ſome diſcontent: I haue done what I could A to informe my ſelfe more particularly, for the which they haue ſmall cauſe : for if they complane of that which concerns their priuate intereſt, I may ſay with truth, that both my Nephew, and all theſe Princes haue bene as much reſpected and honoured by the King my ſonne and mee, as they could with reaſon require. And for that which con-cernes the gouernment of affaires, all the Princes, Dukes, and Officers of the Crowne are admitted to Councils which are held to that effect. It is certaine that there is no bu-ſineſſe of importance, propounded, treated, or negotiated, but the ſaid Princes, and eſpe-cially my ſaid Nephew haue bene alwaies called, yea they haue often times bene determined to ſaid their company and preſence. And as for the diſtribution of fauours and B rewards, euery one of them in his particular, and thoſe which haue bene recommended by them, haue had ſo good ſhares as they haue no reaſon to complaine. If there be any queſtion touching the generall affaires, they haue bene ſo gouerned ſince the death of the deceaſed King my Lord, as it may well appeare we haue omitted nothing, that might ſerue to the good, greatneſſe, and reputation of this Crowne, hauing had a care to pre-ſerue the amities and alliances with all foraine Princes and States : the which hath ſucceeded ſo happily as they were neuer in better eſtate. And for that which is within the Realme, hauing giuen order (as euery man knowes) to haue all the Edicts of pacification carefully obſerued, and to maintain peace, vniyon and concord amongſt the ſubiects : and withall haue done what poſſibly I could for the eaſe of the people : and I may iuſtly ſay C my care hath bene ſuch, that althoughe wee haue bene charged with great and extraordinary expences, yet haue we notraiſed any extraordinary Impoſitions, but diminiſhed them in many occaſions. And moreover, wee haue maintained all the other orders and Eſtates in their authority and accuſtomed functions, ſo as I cannot coniecture what true ground the ſaid Princes or others may haue to complaine, either for the general or their particular. Notwithſtanding well conſidering how this retreat with theſe ſignes of diſcon-tent, and the brutes which are ſpredd and augmented vpon this occaſion, may produce bad effect, in the Prouinces, to the preiudice of the publike ; I haue deſired to take the moſt conuenient courſe to prevent it. And to this end hauing cauſed the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and chiefe Counſellors of State to aſſemble, I haue reſolued by their ad- D uice to ſend my Couſin the Duke of Ventadour, and the Siegneur of Boiſſie (a Councillor of State to the King my ſonne) to my Nephew the Prince of Conde, to inuite and intreate him to come vnto the King and mee, there to take the place and rancke due to his quality, and to giue vs counſell and aſſiſtence in all theſe occurrents, yea in the great and important affaires which we haue now in hand, the which I hope he will reſolute to doe at their coming vnto him, according to the promiſe which he made at his departure: And to make a full declaration of the truth and ſincerity of my actions paſt, and to ſeeke out the beſt means which may be to ſettle a good order for the good of this Eſtate hereafter, efpecially at the entry of the Kings Maiority, I haue thought it conuenient to call an Aſſem- E bly of the three Eſtates of the Realme, wherein they may take reſolutions fit for the dignity thereof. This I thought good to write vnto you touching the occurrents here, whereof I pray you to aduerſite thoſe which are within the limits of your iuriſdictions, to the end euery man may doe his duty in his charge, and be careful that all things may be contained vnder the Kings authority and obedience, and the obſeruation of his Edicts, according to the accuſtomed order without any inuouation or alteration, oppoſing themſelues to all ſuch as ſhall ſeek to trouble the State, giuing them charge to ſtand vpon their Guards, and not to giue way to any practices which may be amongſt them, to the preiud-ice of their owne peace and the Kings ſeruiſe : deſiring you to imploy the authority of your Parliaments in all things which ſhall import the publike and the Royall authority of the King my Lord and Sonne.

Vpon theſe alterations, and the feare of ciuill combuſtions, the Marquis D'Ancre (newly made Marſhall of France) being Gouernor of the Cittadell of Amiens, had left the Siegneur of Rubempré, to command there in his abſence ; but now he poſted thither to aſſure the place, drawing forth Rubempré, whom he put into Corbie: The Kings and Queenes companies of men of armes with the light horſe were ſent for and lodged in Creil, Saint Denis, and Montreuil-faur-Yonne; to the end they might be neere their Maieſties vpon all occurrents. The Duke of Ventadour and the Siegneur of Boiſſie, being

A vpon the way to goe to Chateauroux, thinking there to find the Prince of Conde, were aduerſified that he would croſſe Berry to paſſe the Riuer of Loire, and goe into Champagne; they ſent a man expreſly vnto him, to acquaint him with the commandement they had receiued from their Maieſties, and to know whither they ſhould goe to finde him : from whom they had no other answer, but that hee went to Meziers : ſo as they returned to their Maieſties, and the Prince continuing his iourney, with thirty or forty horſe paſt the Loire, and entered into Champagne, where he was receiued by the Duke of Neuers, neere vnto Vitry, from whence they went together to Châlons, and from thence to Meziers, whither at the ſame time came the Dukes of Longueuille, of Mayen, and of B Luxembourg.

The Marquis of Vieuville Gouernor of the Towne and Cittadell of Meziers, was then at Paris : and D'Eſcurrolles his Lieutenant was in the Cittadell with D'Amours, who vpon an aduice giuen them by the Marquis, prepared themſelues as well as they could, to hinder the Duke of Neuers entry into the Cittadell ; yea they receiued ſome Wallons.
But this place was like vnto many others, which in the time of peace want munition, and where nothing is required. The Duke of Neuers hauing ſent for D'Eſcurrolles to come and ſpeake with him, he reſuſed, and ſent him word he ſhould make no offer to come into the Cittadell : whereupon all the Princes reſolued to haue that by force which they could not get by ſure means. But vpon this reſuſall of entry, they doubted that D'Eſ-currolles had receiued ſome commandement from the Queene, whereof they deſired to bee ſatiſfied, and if it were ſo, to yeeld all reſpect and obedience. But D'Eſcurrolles and D'Amours hauing declared not onely to the Duke of Neuers, but alſo to the Prince and the reſt, that they had no commandement from her Maieſtie, but were onely aduerſified that the Duke of Neuers meant to doe them ſome affront. The Queene hauing giuen no command, they began to feare that it was ſome conſpiracy againſt the State, the which might extend not onely to the Cittadell of Meziers, but alſo to the perſon of the firſt Prince of the blood, and to others of the chiefe of the Nobility of France, for whole ſerieties it had bene provided by the good affection of the inhabitants of the towne. The Duke of Ne-uers as Gouernor of the Prouince (in whole perſon the Kings authority had bene con-D tained by this action) reſolued to force them to yeeld the obedience due vnto his Maieſtie, and preſently ſent la Broſſe vnto the Queene to aduerſifie her thereof, and to aſſure her that nothing ſhould paſſe in this action but for the Kings ſeruiſe and her Maieſties, whoſe commandments he attended to obey and execute them : Hauing afterwards repreſented vnto them which were in the Cittadell, what belonged to their duties, and the danger they might incur by this diſobedience, and the puniſhment they ſhould iuſtly deſerue: The place being deliuered into his hands, he preſently gaue aduerſification thereof vnto the Queene by this Letter.

Madam, I haue formerly informed your Maieſtie of the rebellion which hath bene committed againſt the Kings authoritie, by them of the Cittadell of this towne : Now E I informe you of the obedience which I haue made them to yeeld, hauing deliuered it into my hands : for the ſafety whereof I haue provided, to the end your Maieſty may be obeyed as you may expect from me, hoping that you will take into conſideration the diſobedience which the Marquis of Vieuville hath ſhewed me, in the charge which he hath pleaded the King to giue me in this Prouince : for that this example may draw a generall conſequence for all the Gouernors of this Realme. I humbly beſeech your Maieſtie to command ſuch iuſtice to be done as you ſhall thinke neceſſary for the maintenance of the Kings authoritie, wherein I may receiue that contentment which you ſhall thinke reaſo-nable, ſeeing that this towne is vnder my charge, and my proper inheritance, which makes my apprehenſion the more conſiderable.

This Letter could not ſo ſatiſſie the world, but they conceiued that the taking of the Cittadell of Meziers was contrarie to the Kings authoritie : for that the Lieutenants generall of a Prouince, and the Gouernors and Captaines of places of ſtrength, are giuen by the King, and not by the Gouernors of Prouinces. They ſay moreover, that the Prouin-ces in France are great, and did abound in good and ſtrong townes, which are ſo many Realmes: and that if the Gouernors in chiefe (which are all Princes or Noblemen of great power) ſhould put Commanders at their deuotion into places of ſtrength, it might breed diſobedience and trouble: Wherefore Kings had alwaies reſerued that power vnto themſ-felues: The which the Queene having obserued, to maintaine the Kings authoritie, it in- A cessed many great men both against her and the Kings Council.

Hereupon Monsieur de Praslin was sent to Meziere with Letters from the Queene, imposing a commandement to receive a Lieutenant of the Guards into the Citadell, giving him to understand, that their Meticities would come speedily to Meziere, to provide for all things that might concerne the Kings authority. They sent the light-horse into Champaign, and letters into the townes and garisons therabouts, to give all ayd and assistance to Monsieur de Praslin. They also dispatched Colonel Galatin into Switserland, to made a leane of his thousand men. They sent out many Commissions, to fill vp the Regiments which were entertained, and to leane new soldiers. And they made ready the Artillery B in the Arsenal: finally, at Paris they talked of nothing but warre. The Princes did also the like for their part towards Liege, Sedan, and Meziere, which was better furnished than it was before. And in the meane time the Prince of Conde sent a Gentleman to present this following Letter vnto the Queene, containing the causes for the which hee and the Princes which did assist him were assembled at Meziere.

" Madam, All my studie and care hath euer beene for the Kings seruice, and the good of " this Estate. I haue witnessed it during the life of the deceased King, by my forced absence,
" and since his death by my speedy returne vnto your Maiestie, concealing the griefe I had
" for the disorders which haue beene so frequent, to hinder the motions which might caule C
" a warre, which I haue held so dangerous and hurtfull to the minority of the King my " Lord, as I haue esteemed all other inconveniences tolerable. So as by the grace of " God, your bounty and my patience, we are now in the fourth yeare of the Kings mino" rity, in the which we see the increase of so great calamities and pernicious disorders, as " your bounty nor my patience will not be able to prevent the overthrow and ruine of this " Estate, prolonged hitherto by weak and shamefull remedies, if it had not beene wisely
" and vertuously foreseene by many Princes, Noblemen, Bishops, Officers of the Crowne,
" and seuerall Courts.

" We most humbly beseech your Maiestie to provide wholsome remedies for the dif-
" charge of the duty whereunto both you and we are bound to God, the King, and vnto D " France. A most iust request which we had made in person vnto your Maiestie, had we " not seene you enuironed and preoccupied by some few, who seek to reigne in confusion,
" the onely cause of our departure, and not your Maiestie, whose commendable intention
" we know, so much the more remarkable, for that the truth hath beene concealed from you
" by those which haue no other iustification, but to haue a little maintained peace, in the
" which they haue procured vs a continuall toile, by confusions and prodigalities, sale of " honor and reputation, in which they haue prostituted all the orders of this Realme, whose " continuance they haue misused by their owne lues, not caring what shall succeed. A rest
" not proceeding from their conduct, but from good Frenchmen, who louing peace haue
" endured all disorders, rather then to procure any troubles, not but that they saw your E
" Majesty was circumuenced; dauiding the administration of this flourishing Estate among
" a small number of persons, who haue for witnesses of their weakness, the losse of the repu" tation of France in foreign Countries, and their hidden designs, which in this flourishing " Estate (which was not accustomed to seare any thing) should be knowne and open, at the " least to the Princes and officers of the Crowne interessed in the Estate, whom they haue
" not made acquainted with affaires any further then they haue held it necessary, to give au" thority to their deliberations; bringing their resolutions from their lodgings to the Ca" binet, and neuer causing any one to be concluded in your presence: by plurality of voices:
" but covering them with the cloake of your Maiesties authority, from whose cabinet they " came to pronounce their decrees to the Princes, receiving their aduice for a shew, tending F
" onely to stirre vp enuie and diuision among them, fauouring some, and disgracing other,
" making two factions, to haue the one at their deuotion. Practices which proud disaste-
" rous to the French, begun suddenly after the Kings death, relieving the wholsome coun-
" sell of the deceased Duke of Mayen, who said, That it was not iust to make profit of the " minority of our young King: That we should not demand any thing, but serue him as we " are by nature bound: but contrariwise, interressing many private persons, to haue them at " their deuotion, they haue plunged the Estate into most dangerous hazards, contrary to all " vnuall

1614

A vnuall formes during the minority of Kings: In the which the generall Estates haue beene always assembled, which are so necessary as Kings haue called them in their maiorities for lesse disorders, then those at this present. I would to God Madam, it had cost me part of my blood, so you had called them presently after the Kings death; you had enjoyed the same or more authority, with the good liking of the Church, the Nobility, and the Commons: France had not lost that generous name of Arbitrator of Christendome, purchased so gloriously by the deceased King, a title which held the balance of the two great factions of Europe, protecting the publike tranquility: This losse is so much the greater & more lamentable, for that it seemes we are gone out of the way, which the deceased King had tracked vs: they had not razed the Citadell of Bourg, against the aduice of the Princes & Officers of the Crown, yea & against the Constables: they had not giuen 40000 pounds sterling as well for the razing as the recompence thereof: They had not precipitated the Kings Mariage and his sisters, vntill that the law of God, and all the orders of the Realme (the Kings maiorty approving) had approved it: These mariages had beene declared in publike, not by the reading of a writing, containing the reasons they had to hasten them:
but in demanding aduice whether they had beene profitable or no: The Parliaments had not beene interrupted, in the free functions of their places: The governments of Prouinces and of places of importance, had not beene giuen to incapable and vnworthy persons: They would haue sought to reconcile the Clergie with the Colledge of Sorbon, not to diuide them, nor oppress them by vaine and fruitlesse disputes in these times: The authority of Prelates and Clergy-men, had not beene violated, but maintained: They had not giuen any charge for fauour or money: the aduice of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne had beene first demanded, to be afterwards conferred by your Maiestie vpon worthy persons: Ambassadors had not beene chosen but by the same aduice: their dispositions had not beene vnkowne vnto all such as haue an interest in the good of the Estate:
No packer had beene receiued or read, but in the presence of the aforesaid: They had not suffered the enterprises made vpon Nauarre and Montferat, nor hindered the renewing of the league between the Venetians and the Grifons, so much desired and allowed of by the deceased King: They had not broken the mariage (proiected by the deceased D King) with the Duke of Sauoy, without mature deliberation: And by a full obseruation of the Edicts made for them of the reformed religion, they had taken from them all subiect of complaint: They had suppressed such among them as had surpassed the limits of their duties: They had not sowne diuisions among them, which making them carefull of their owne particulars, haue failed to bring the Common-weale into danger: They had not giuen thirty thousand pounds sterling to buy the Castle of Amboise, redeeming his Maiesties places with his owne money; they would haue cut off so many excessiue gifts to vnworthy persons: Few men had not ingrossed the chief dignities of the Estate, without the aduice of any Prince or Officer about named: The Estates or the Council would haue caled you of so many importunities, charging themselves with enuie, and you E with blessings.

Your Maiestie may consider, if you please, of these disorders; and thereby iudge of the necessity to call the Estates, to punish the wicked, and to recompence the good, which is the support of well ordered Monarchies: which being perieried, shewes in what danger this Realme stands. All the offices of Iudicature and of the Treasure, are growne to excessiue rates: There remains no recompence for vertue, seeing that fauour, alliance, and money, haue all the power: And the Treasure is so profusely bestowed, as 100000 pistols are not valued, yea they are employed about matters of no moment, to men that enrich themselves without any labour by the blood of the people. The complaints, clamours, and teares of the three Estates, smother in their hearts a hidden fire: The Church F hath lost her beauty: No Clergy-men are employed in Embassies, neither haue they any place in Council; and benighted men are ouer-charged with vexations and vniuert burthens: The Gentrie is impouerished and ruined by taxes and impositions of Sale: By extraordinarie Commissions to get money, all their commodities are made subiect to imposts; and all their titles are examined, bee they lost or burnt: The Nobilitie and Gentrie, the support of France, the terror of strangers, and the vanquisher in battles, which fettle Scepters and raise Crowns, is now made subiect to taxes, and excluded from all offices, for want of money, their lues and goods are at the command of other men,

"men, and they are deprived of the entertainment of menar armes and archers, anciently A
 "allowed them, and now they are become slaves to their creditors. The people cry out of "their burthens, which will be found doubled by a number of extraordinary commissions
 "since the death of the deceased King. All must fall vpon the poore to entertaine the rich.
 "The Princes and officers of the Crowne, on whom the deceased King did much relie, are "kept backe and ill intreated. They make me by their ordinary discourfes, and all the "Princes and Officers of the Crowne, which doe me the honor to concurre with me, to be "as it were troublers of the publike peace. They hold a Councell to stay the Princes and "Officers of the Crowne, though there be no crime, the which was concluded against the "person of the Duke of Bouillon, and the refusal made to the Duke of Longueville to goe B
 "vnto his gouernment, shewes sufficiently their violent proceedings, and that which was "done to the Duke of Vendosme, whom (not respecting what hee is to the King, nor the
 "loue which the deceased King bare him, being free from all crime, without any forme of "iustice, and without the aduice of any great personage of the Realme) they haue detained "prisoner. This is not vsuall in France, especially during the Kings minority; the which "we doe not belecue was done by any bad inclination of your Maiestie, nor a desire to doe
 "iniustice; wherefore we most humbly beseech you to cause him to be set at liberty to the "end that in continuing his good seruice to the King and State, hee may make prooffe by "good effects as he hath hitherto done, that hee neuer had any bad intention against his "seruice.

"They would perswade your Maiestie to arme, taking our absence for a pretext. Con- C
 "sider Madam, that we proceed by humble petitions and remonstrances, and not by armes,
 "and what cruelties would France giue vnto those, who (troubling the peace and tranquility
 "of this Estate purchased by the vertue of the deceased King) shall histake armes in hand:
 "France desired nothing but peace, and a quiet and iust reformation: shall it then be said "that bad counsell shall make you imprison them which be present, and arme against the ab"sent, who labour for to holly a reformation, and are faithfull subiects to the King, your selfe,
 "and the State, giuing you by this means such an amble subiect of glory? Consider of my "Letter, Madam, and you shall not find any thing which aymes at our priuate interst, nei"ther in our present or future intentions: you cannot take it ill if many be siurs vnto you D
 "for one thing, and all desire it; being bound by duty, and by the friendship which they
 "haue contracted by your command, to prouide for all the accidents aboue mentioned.

He causes
a generall
Assembly of the Estates.

"I humbly beseech your Maiestie, with the aduice of many Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and "Officers of the Crowne, soueraigne Courts, Clergy, and other Noblemen, as well pre"sent as absent, which haue seene and allowed of this petition, that you would grant an "Assembly of the Estates to be free and life, within three monthes at the furthest, and in "the meane time to keepe all things in a quiet estate; protesting for our parts that wee de-
 "fire nothing but the preservation of peace, and the good of this Realme, and that wee will "not attempt any thing to the contrary, vnlesse by the rash resolution of our enemies, (who "couering themselves with the cloake of State vnder your authority) wee be prouoked to
 "repell the iniuries done vnto the King and the State, by a naturall, iust, and necessary "defence.

"An humble petition which I make as first Prince of the blood, in the Estate wherein I "am, and without armes: notlike vnto those, who to make profit of such Assemblies, sei"zed vpon townes, armed both subiects and strangers, and made warre and peace for their "owne commoditie, to haue the place of a Lieutenant generall, of the gouernment of Pro-
 "uinces and Townes, and then sought to frustrate the Assembly, not caring for any publike
 "reformation. We doe also humbly beseech your Maiestie to suspend the mariages, as well "for the King, as the Lady his sister, until the Assembly of the Estates. And to shew that "our priuate interests haue no power ouer vs, wee will yeeld vp vnto the King at the free F
 "Assembly of the Estates (if the necessity of his affaires so require) all our pensions and
 "gratifications, contrary to the flanders of such as accuse vs to preferre our owne particu"lar before the publike: a slander of such as had rather kindle a fire in the middelt of France,
 "then to see their authoritie quenched, which shall be ouerthrowne by our good and iust
 "King, to whom wee humbly beseech your Maiestie to giue good instructions, and to take
 "from him the counsell of all partialities, which are giuen him against such as haue the ho"nour to be necesse vnto him, and his most faithfull subiects and seruants; and for his con-
 "tentment

A tentment to call home the Cheualier of Vendosme, and to entertaine about his Maiestie
 "for the care of his health, a man whose religion and integrity is well knowne.

"We also beseech your Maiestie to prouide sufficient money for the gouernment of the "frontiers, to be employed in the guard of those places: We acknowledge that our King
 "is giuen vs of God: we know the obedience we owe him, and will not faile in the least
 "point: we also hope that all the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, soueraigne Courts,
 "Clergy, and Lords, which are about your Maiestie will ioyne with vs in the same desire,
 "hauing altogether prepared for your Maiestie the way, the honour, and glory, to haue re"stored all the orders of this Realme to their ancient splendor and libertie, reformed the "State, and assured their peace, with as much commendation as if you had gotten another
 "B Realme; answering them generously which say, that an Assembly of Estates blemisheth
 "the Kings authority, that you haue made it firme and durable. Wee will serue and assist
 "you at the said Assembly, as it shall be thought profitable for the seruice of the King, for "France, and the preferuation of the royall authority, and of your Maiestie, being your most "humble seruants; and in particular I most humbly beseech you to beleuee that I am,
 "Madam,

obedient seruant and subiect, Henry de Bourbon.

The day after the deliuey of this Letter, the Prince sent a gentleman of his called Fief-
 "brown with a packet to the Court of Parliament, the which they would not open, but sent
 "it vnto the Queene by two Councillors of the Court, who led the gentleman with "them: the Queene looking only on the direction, sent them to the Chancellor, who found "in this packet a copy of the Queenes Letter, with this other vnto the Court.

M Y Masters, I know well that some will anticipate my iust intentions with many slan-
 "ders and false reports, contrary (I assure my selfe) vnto the opinion which you will
 "D conceiue, hauing conuersed with me and knowne me, that fearing to alter any thing by "my resolutions of that which I haue had to the Kings seruice and the good of the State, I
 "haue restrained my iust discontents, and as it were buried them by my patience. But yet
 "I would fatisfie you better, and giue you an accompt of my actions: to you I say, whom I "know to be the chiefe gardian of this Estate: and therefore I send vnto you a copie of "the Letter which I haue written vnto the Queene, by which I doe fully lay open the holy "affections which had moued me to retire from Court: for that I would nor adhere vnto
 "the abuses which are committed by such as manage and dispose of the Kings affaires and "of the State, demanding reformation by my most humble petition vnto the Queene, pro-
 "pounding the remedy vnto her, and requiring it as the first Prince of the blood, a subiect
 "E to the King, and one that hath the chiefe interest in the good of his Maiesties seruice: ha-
 "uing no other armes then my humble prayers to their Maiesties, as you may see by the "Copie which I send you: humbly beseeching you to assist vs with your Councell and "authoritie, in so iust and commendable an enterprize, as the most considerable for the "Kings seruice and the reformation of the State: In so doing you shall acquit your felues
 "of the due of your charges, and purchase honor and reputation, remaining had beene given since the Kings coronation. The Queenes complaint against the Prince of Conde, that he had not assisted her in the conduct of affaires: That he had not advertised her of the abuses whereon he grounded his discontent, and that hee should not absent himselfe from Court, and make a society of Princes and Noblemen: That the authors of these new troubles tooke the marriages of Spaine for a pretext; and conceale that which was treated of England blamed the Kings favourable dealings towards them of the Religion, and stirred up the people unto sedition, impatient to see the King grow up: That the alliance of Spaine had beene preferred before that of Savoy, by the Earle of Soissons aduice, and approved by the Prince of Conde and Duke of Bouillon, who was expressly sent to give notice thereof unto the King of Great Brittain: An answer unto the objections touching the enterprises of Navarre and Montferat, and the Fort of Fuentes: An invention to blame the Ministers of State, thereby taxing the Queene and her Regency: A commendation of the Ministers of State, ready to resigne their places at the Queenes command: her desire to reforme the Councell of State: The order which had beene taken, to the end the Prince of Conde might see what past in dispatches and the treasure: Icalousie for the Queenes entring into Councell touching the affaires of the Prouinces: The pretext why they demanded the generall Estates to be safe and free: That there was neuer any resolution to stay the Marshall of Bouillon, and that the Duke of Longueville had not beene hindred from going into his government: The reason why the Duke of Vendosme was stayed in his chamber in the Louure: An answer to that which was objected touching the Cittadell of Bourg and the Castle of Amboise: That she had alwayes followed the steps of the deceased King, suffering Clergy-men to enjoy their Benefices, and gratified the Nobility and Gentry: That the excessive prices of offices had not beene brought in since her Regencie, and that the impositions vpon salt had beene moderated during her government: An answer to the Prince of Condes complaint, that they sought to diuide the Colledge of Sorbon: The Queenes hope in the loyalty of the Nobility towards the King, whom she brings vp to acknowledge their merits, in imitation of the King his father: She enioynes the townes to stand vpon their guard: She saith that the Prince of Conde should not absent himselfe from the King, and countenance a diuision betweene the King and Catholike Noblemen: That he should abstaine from blaming the government of affaires, and not suffer factions and schismes to bee raised in the State: That hee should not incense the three Estates, nor delay the marriages of Spain which he had signed: Nor to interpret in the worst sense whatsoever was done to the Kings advantage, nor arme, nor draw in strangers: That he should looke well to the demand hee made of the Estates: That he should alter his proceeding and come unto the King with those which were ioyned with him. This is the substance of the Queenes Letter which deserueth a full relation, but I am forced to abridge some things fearing to exceed a iust proportion.

A Letter from the Cardinall
du Perron
to the Prince of Conde.

The Cardinall du Perron sent the Prince an answer to his Letter in these termes. Sir, the affection which I haue vnto your seruice, and the honor it hath pleased you to doe me, in aduertising mee of your commendable designs for the good of the King and Realme, oblige me to pray that the issue thereof may be as happy as the proposition is plausible. In truth it is a thing which I can lesse hope for then desire, if in the meane time you continue absent from their Maiesties, and doe not assist them as well with your presence as your counsell. There is no government of a State so absolutely perfect, and especially vnder the minority of Kings, that can please all, and wherein there is not some thing worthy of blame. But as an Ancient hath written wisely, there is no Prince so bad but is better then a ciuill war: so may it be said of the government of States, that there is no administration whatsoever, but is better then a ciuill discord. I know your intentions are faire from it, but I know also that the successe and euents are many times far different from the intentions. There will be many reports made of you to the Queene, and of the Queene to you, which your presence would prevent; Being absent they will grow bitter by the way, and fill your head with ialousies. You shall not be able to prevent it, but many seeing you diuided from the Court, and thinking that your separation proceeds from discontent, will make vse of the shadow of your name, to trouble the publike peace. My Lords, your predecessors, haue alwayes enjoyed much more happinesse and content, when they haue beene neere our Kings and in Court (which is the Firmament where

A such starres should shine) then when they were retired, and yet neuer any one of them had a greater share, either in authority, or in their Maiesties graces and fauours, then you haue hitherto had: it being the Queenes bounty, who hath alwaies fought to give content to euery one, and hath particularly studied by all means to oblige you. Your good aduice of reformation will be more easily executed when you are by her to assist her, then when you shall be in place where your absence being imputed to discontent, will cause many to take your good intentions for pretexes. France hath the remembrance so fresh, and is so weary with the miseries of fore-past troubles, that the first Article of all reformation must be the entertainment of peace, from the breach whereof, if they (by whose occasion it hath beene in former times broken) could haue scene the success: painted in a table, or imagined to how many miseries of State and Religion they had opened a gap, and what curses they haue incur'd both from God & men, they would rather haue desired to haue cast themselves into the fire, then to haue been the cause of the ruine of their country. I do not represent these things vnto you, as doubting that you do not abhor them, your good disposition, and your zeale to the good of Religion and the Realme gine too good assurance: But to beseech you to be carefull, lest many turbulent spirits and desirous of inuauation, abuse not the occasion of your absence to kindle a fire, which will be more easte to prevent then to quench; but in the end will vex them more which kindle it then any other. For God who distinctly protects the causes of Kings, Widewes, and Orphanes, will more powerfully protect them, when they shall be all three conioyned together, and you your selfe would be the first to expose your life for their defence. I pray God there be no need hereof: and you Sir to esteeme me, your most humble and most affectionate seruant, I, Cardinall du Perron. From Paris 13, March, 1614.

The Queene who was prepared with the one hand to warre, stretched out the other to peace; and according to her first designe, to seeke to pacifie this great alteration by mild and gentle remedies; she sent the President Thou vnto the Prince of Conde. He thought to haue found him at Meziers: but he was gone to Sedan with the Marshall of Bouillon: who returned with two Cannons which he brought from thence, the which and two others that the Duke of Neuers had drawne from Cassine, so terrified Descurolles, as he yielded the Cittadell of Meziers, which should haue held out against an Army Royall; if it had beene furnished, and the Cannons which were within it mounted. The President finding no man in Meziers but the Duke of Neuers, hee was forced to goe to Sedan, where he was well entertained by the Prince of Conde, and all the Princes and Noblemen which did assist him. The towne was full of the French Nobility and Gentry, to haue commission for the leauing of fouldiers, although the season was too shorpe to goe to field. The Princes hauing feasted the President, his integrity and sincerity had such power with the Prince of Conde, as he gaue him his word to come to Soissons, and there to enter into conference, to seeke out the means to restore peace & tranquillity to France, which this stirring had in the beginning much altered. The President hauing obtained what he desired, returned to Court the 27 of March. But attending the five Deputies which were to be sent from the King to Soissons, and the arrival of the Princes there; let vs see how the duke of Vendosme escaped from the Louure, and his first letters to the King after his coming into Britanie.

This escape of the duke of Vendosme is diuersly written: Claude de Malingre writes that he freed himselfe by a pleasant and witty inuention: In an euening seeing his wife visited by many great Ladies well attended on by their waiting women, he disguised himselfe in one of their habits, tooke a maske and slipped out among the Ladies and Gentlewomen without being discovered by his guard, gets into a Caroch, and so escapes: hauing changed his apparell he tooke horse and posted into Britanie.

F The French Mercury relates it in this manner: On the 10 of February the duke being guarded in his Chamber, he gaue it out that he would fast, for that it was Ember weeke; whereupon he retired into his cabinet with the Duchesse his wife. Soone after, some of his Gentlemen said vnto the Exempt or yeoman vber of the guard, who parted not out of the chamber, they fast here to day, but we fast not, will you come and sup with vs? The Exempt seeing the duke retired, followed them, hauing giuen charge to the archers which where in the great chamber to do their duties. The Dukes Chamber doore being shut, he came instantly out of his Cabinet, and caused a little doore to be broken open, which had bene beene dammed vp, by the which they brought wood to his chamber before his restraint. A Which done, passing ouer a heape of floggs and recouering the backe staires, he went out by the backe gate of the Louure, where hee found a foot man holding a horse, whereon hee mounted, being followed by one of his people which attended for him; and so he got our at a clocke at night by Saint Honories gate, and within few daies recovered Ansenis in Britanie. An houre after that his escape was knowne, (not discouering either the manner or the time) they shut the Louure gates, whilst they made a strict search through all the Chambers, in the Ditches, and in the Caroches which were before the Louure. Thus they write of his escape, which I leaue vnto the reader, but his escape was certaine.

The Queene had formerly written to the Court of Parliament of Britanie, and to the B Townes to stand vpon their guard, and not to receiue any one of what qualitie soeuer without the Kings expresse commandement. Shee had sent the Duke of Montbazan to Nantes, to gouerne there: so as the Duke of Vendosme being come to Ansenis, thinking to vse his authority as chiefe Gouernour of the Prouince, hee found the gates of all the great Townes shut against him: yet many of the Nobility repaired vnto him, and the Duke of Retz drew together some troopes from him. Being at his house at Ansenis much discontented, he wrote vnto the King, and complained of his vlsage in these termes.

A letter from
the Duke of Vendosme to the King.

Sir, Having since your Maiesties comming to the Crowne, caried my selfe innocently in all my actions; I haue bene intreated other wise then I should expect: my afflictions in the end haue me speake, and humbly to beseech you to giue redresse: leauing the former, to come to them which are more fresh: You know Sir the commandement the Queen gave me in January, in your presence, not to depart the Court, for what cause soeuer without your leave; although it were with the ruine of my household affaires which required then a speedy order, yet I obeyed: Eightene daies after, having made no attempt of disobedience, relying vpon the testimony of a good conscience, and the safety I did beleue was in Court, I was made a prisoner and guarded as your Maiestie knowes. Nine daies after, God taking pity of my innocent intentions, he set me at libertie, and in stead of a short and easie retreat, he inspired me to one which was long, and impossible, if hee had not as it were led me by the hand to bring me to my house, thereby to auoide the blame which your Maiestie might haue laid vpon mee, if I had retired else-where. This proceeding Sir, seemed fit to procure him peace, who shewed plainly that he breathed no other thing. I am so farre from the enioying of this desire, as I was no sooner arriued, but first I understood that Nantes, and consequently that the whole Prouince was in Armes against me: But brutes could not haue shaken my beliefe, if two of the Duke of Montbazans seruants had not fallen into my hands, whom I found seized of a Commission and two letters vnder the signet, to dispossesse mee of the gouernment of the Countie of Nantes, and to transerre my charge to the said Duke. Your Maiestie may iudge if this should not cause a grieue more sensible then death it selfe, for that I conceived thereby, that the like wrong had bene done me throughout my whole Gouernment, hearing also from diuers, that the other Lieutenants were ready to diuide my spoiles. In Court when I desired to depart for my domestick affaires, I was forbidden; after which I was made a prisoner; God hauing enlarged me and brought me to my house, his bounty is made a crime to me, and they haue stript mee of my gouernment. But this is not sufficient, they arme against me: I am not safe in any place. Sir, neuer had any man so much cause to demand iustice of his King. Releue me, I most humbly beseech your Maiestie, in all these afflictions: I haue serued innocently & profitably, I ought not to be dispossessed of my charge, I am in a peaceable estate, and therefore it is needlesse to arme the Prouince against me. By birth and many other great respects, I am more tied to your Maiesties seruice then any one within the Realme: This should giue a better Impression of mee then of those in whom they put all their confidence here. I hold of the deceased King your father, my honour, my goods, & whatsoever I haue in this world; he is liuing in your person: I am well grounded to beseech you, to entreat me as he did: besides the reputation of Iustice which your Maiestie shall purchase, your Prouince of Britany shall be restored to peace, the consequence may extend farther, and I shall be able to serue you with life and goods in all occasions, where I shall haue the honor to be employed, which I will attend with patience, and execute with the fidelity,

From Ansenis 1 of March,

Of your most humble, most obedient and most faithfull seruant and subiect, Cesar de Vendosme.

The Kings letters to the Parliament of Britanie.

A They conceived by this letter that the Dukes intention was conformable to that of the other Princes: and vpon an aduertisement giuen vnto the Queene that he had caused Blauet to be taken & fortified, and that he was become master of Lambale, and of many other places in the Duchie of Ponthieure belonging to the House of Merlaur, they sent other letters to the Parliament of Rennes dated on the 5 of March, forbidding all persons to leaue any troopes without commission and expresse commandement from his Maiestie; giuing authority to the Earle of Vertuz Gouernour of Rennes, to haue a care that no troopes should be raised in that Countie of Britany without commission, and especially that the company of his base brother the Duke of Vendosme should not assemble vnder the Cornet of his said base brother, vpon paine to be declared guilty of high treason. The Court made a declaration according to the tenor of these letters; and withall enioyned all Noblemen, Gentlemen, and all other the Kings subiects to repaire presently with their Armes and equipage to the Kings Lieutenants in that Prouince, to serue the King vnder their commands.

The Duke of Vendosme seeing all the Countie in Armes against him, and that his first letter vnto the King had preuailed little, hee was much amazed, for that some had informed their Maiesties that he did arme in Britany, (as in truth there were some troopes of Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others which did assist him) and that he had fortified Blauet against the Marquis of Cocuure, refusing him to enter into the same Fort. These reasons made him to write againe vnto his Maiestie. In the which he complains, First, that they had giuen their Maiesties to vnderstand that he was in Armes, and that hee fortified Blauet, to the end they might inuade him with their Forces in that Countie. Touching which points hee would satisfie their Maiesties. Secondly, That as for his Armes hee knew not whether they grounded themselves vpon his traine, or vpon his actions: if on his traine, hee confessed he had bene alwaies assisted with a good number of Nobility, and that in other voyages he had not bene lesse accompanied: If vpon his actions, it were to be desired that Rennes and other townes in Britany were as peaceable and quiet as his, all then should be in better estate. He concludes in these termes. Sir, to acquaint you with the true cause of these combustions: there is a rooted faction within the Prouince, which hath reduced it to this estate, a worme which will kill the tree if you endure it any longer. The head of it hath been alwaies impatient to endure his superiours, hauing found the like members; who doth not know the practices that he and they haue held these foure yeares to vsurpe my place: from this spring they draw the aduertisements that I am in Armes: but to what end? to haue the head of this faction sent with an Army, and to make vse of your Maiesties name and Forces, to commit all the insolencies which factions are wont to doe when they haue power. If I had no respect but to mine owne particular, I would not endeavor to diuert this designe. I am come of too good a stocke to apprehend and feare my priuate enemies whatsoever. But Sir, I cannot endure without complaining that by their practices and impostures, they still seek to moue your Maiesty to choller against mine innocency, and against the continuance of my obedience. Vpon this second protestation of seruice, I beseech you most humbly to re-establiish mee here in the exercise of the charge which I hold of the deceased King your father; not to honor therewithall, (in attending this effect of Iustice) those which haue in times past borne armes against him, and which are now my irreconcilable enemies, and to hinder them from troubling with open warre the peace of this Prouince. In a foraine warre, Kings may teape honor and profit, but in a domestick all the losse falls vpon themselves. If your Maiesties armes haue no other obiect but me to worke on, it shall suffice to honour mee with your commandements: My perfect obedience shall giue good testimony, that I haue nothing in my hart more firme, then the inuolable quality of your most humble and most obedient subiect and seruant, Cesar de Vendosme.

The Duke of Vendosme sends letters to the King.

France was amazed at this brute of Armes, and the people troubled, yet all stood firme for the Kings seruice: vpon this assurance that their Maiesties had of the fidelity of their good subiects, the Queene resolved to treat louingly with the Princes: and to this end on the 6 of Aprill they sent the Duke of Ventadour, the Presidents Jannin and Thou, with the Siegneurs of Boissile and Bulion as deputies from the King, to conferre with the Princes at Soissons. The Prince of Conde hauing left Sedan in the end of March, with all the Princes which assisted, hauing about 4000 foot; French, Wallons, and Liegeois; and and fixe or seven hundred horse, he arrived there on the 5 of Aprill, the duke of Mayen having put a great garrison into the Towne for their safeties. On the 14 of Aprill the Kings Deputies entered into conference with the Princes in the Castle of Soissons, where as all the Princes in generall and particular professing to love their Majesties service, and the quiet of the State, before all humane duties, they demanded to have these three points granted. First, The continuation of the Estates. Secondly, A stay of the Kings marriage, and of the Lady his sister. Thirdly, A disarming on either side. After which they would treat of the safety and libertie of the said Estates, and of all other assurances. The Queene desired to maintaine peace. The second demand touching the stay of the marriage, was that whereon they made some question, touching the time, how long it should be delayed: for the Princes demanded till after the assembly of the Estates, whereunto the Deputies vnder their Majesties pleasure would not consent, but vnto the time of the Kings Maiority. They would have peace, but with security, in preferring his Majesties authority. In the end the said three Articles were concluded with this condition; That the surseance of the Marriages should be untill the Kings Maiority, and that it should not be inserted into the Articles of the peace which should be published, but that the Queene should promise it by a letter which she should write to the Prince.

The three Articles agreed.

During many goings and comings from Paris to Soissons, the Kings Army which was drawne together in Champagne was increased with 6000 Swissers leauied by Galatin; so as they prepared both for warre and peace at one instant. Some held that the Prince of Conde grew into ialousie; and it was said, that all the Princes being now in Soissons, an enterprise vpon them would have been more easie: The Lorraine Regiment of Vaubecourt had commandement to goe lodge in Vitry, and the King Army was to go towards Saint Manchould. This made the Prince and his Army to leaue Soissons, hauing written a letter vnto the Queene, thanking her for that shee had granted the three points aboue mentioned; and sending her word, That he had intreated the Dukes of Mayen and Bouillon to remaine at Soissons, giving them power to finish the treaty with her Majesties Deputies, to agree of the safetie and libertie of the said Estates, together with the points which concerne the disarming, and the estate wherein the King and Queenes persons, and of the other Princes and Noblemen which assisted him should remaine, untill the Conuocation of the Estates.

The Prince of Conde going towards Vitry, had advertisement, that the Kings troopes were entred the Towne. The Duke of Neuers with his traine alone, and eight of his guard went towards Rethel, and so to Saint Manchould. Bonconville Gouverneur of the Towne and Castle, with the chiefe inhabitants, hearing of his approach went to meet him. The Inhabitants besought him not to enter into Saint Manchould; telling him that they had receiued letters of command from their Majesties not to suffer any one of what qualitie foeuer to enter into their town without a new commission from her Maieftie: they intreated him to beleue that they were his seruants, but the subiection & obedience which they did owe vnto the King, was of more force. The Duke told them that he would enter into his Castle; that he would not endure, that they should refuse him entry into the Townes of his Government, nor into his owne inheritance. Finally, the Inhabitants falling vpon their knees, could not diuert him from his resolution. These being returned vnto the Towne, they made report of the Dukes intention, which stricke a great terror among the people. Bonconville retired himselfe into the Castle, which is diuided from the Towne by the river of Eync. The Duke of Neuers being thus refused entry into the Towne, hee threatened to raine them within 24 houres: and they seeing how few men they had; spent the time in consulting what they should doe. The Duke desirous to find a way to enter into the Castle, hee was surprisid with a darke night and the river not to be waded through, so as he was forced to take vp his lodging at a house which is vpon a little hill neere vnto the Towne, where he past the night. In the meane time the Prince of Conde vpon aduice he had had from him, advanced with his Army, and came before Saint Manchould at two alocke in the morning: Which when the Inhabitants knew, they were much more astonished, and especially those who had propounded not to receiue the Duke. So seeing themselves betwene the Castle and the Army, they had no other helpe, but early in the morning to send vnto the Duke, to intreat him not to remember that which had past the day before; and to haue a care to the preservation of their towne.

The

A The Prince of Conde mediating their peace, they entred into Saint Manchould, whereof they assured themselves. The Lieutenant of the Iustice, and some other Inhabitants, retired themselves vnto the neighbour places where there was any Garrison for the King.

These newes that the Princes were become Masters of Saint Manchould; and that there was some difficulties grown in the conference of Soissons, touching a demand made of the Castle of Amboise for the Prince; the Queene resolved to draw all her Troopes into the body of an army, and to giue the leading thereof to the Duke of Guise. This troubled many men, who besought her Maieftie to forbeare her resolution, for that it might reuiue quarrels, which peace had buried in forgetfulness.

B Hereupon the Queene sent Monsieur Vigner to the Prince, to moue him to hasten the treaty of peace: who being returned, reported that the Prince besought their Majesties that the Deputies which were at Soissons, might aduance vnto Rethel, whither he would also come: and that there should be no fault in him, nor in them which assisted him, that the treaty were not concluded. Whereupon the King sent new letters of Commission to his Deputies for the finishing of this treaty, and the Queene Regent wrote vnto the Prince of Conde touching the treaty of marriage, in this manner:

Nephew, you may remember that the resolution taken for the marriage of the King my sonne, and of my eldest daughter, was imparted vnto you, and to the deceased Earle of Soissons, as also to the other Princes and Officers of the Crowne which assist you; as well as to those which now attend the King: yet you haue demanded a stay thereof untill the Kings Maiority; I haue beene content herein to accommodate my selfe to your desire, seeing that the time of this Maiority is so neere, and that the nature of the businesse, and the course of affaires giue me this leasure: hauing also resolved with your aduice, to assemble the generall Estates before the said Maiority, whereof I thought good to assure you by these presents, being confident that herein you will shew your affection and fidelity to the King my sonne and me.

C According to the Kings commission, the Duke of Ventadour and the other Deputies went to Rethel, but the Prince of Conde entreated them to come to Saint Manchould, the place being more commodious: Their commission tying them to no certaine place, the Deputies went thither, where all difficulties which might contradiet the peace were reconciled, and the Articles following concluded: The which being signed, the Prince, the Kings Deputies, and all the other Noblemen, went to giue God thanks, and from thence to a Feast.

Articles agreed by the Duke of Ventadour Peere of France, and Governour for the King in Languedoc, and the Siegneurs of Tannin, Thou, Boisfist, and Bulion all Counsellors of State, and Commissioners deputed by his Maiefty by vertue of a commission dated the first of May last past, To the Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, as well in his owne name, as of other Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and Noblemen which haue assisted him, be they present or absent.

Articles of peace concluded at Saint Manchould.

E I That the Generall Estates of the Realme, shall be called and assembled in the Town of Sens, after the accustomed manner, by the 24 of August, in the which the Deputies of the three Orders which shall assist, may with all liberty propound whatsoeuer they shall thinke in their consciences to be profitable for the good of the Realme and ease of the subiect; That thereby his Maieftie, with the aduice of the Princes of his blood and of other Princes, Officers of his Crowne, and chiefe Lords of his Councell, may make some good lawes and ordinances, to containe euery man in his duty: to fortifie the lawes and Edicts made for the preservation of the publike tranquillity: and to reforme the disorders, which may giue iust occasion of complaint and discontent to his good subiects.

II. As for the Marriages with Spaine, the Queene Regent hath written her letters vnto the Prince, touching that subiect, whereby he hath receiued contentment, so as it shall not be needfull to make any mention thereof in this Article.

III. The fortifications of the Citadell of Meziers which are towards the Towne, shall be dismantled and defaced: and that, vpon a Petition made by the Duke of Neuers, that it would please his Maieftie to assigne vnto him a summe of money to helpe to build him a house in stead of that which hee had in the Towne of Meziers, which was ruined and demolished when the said Citadell was built; It hath beene agreed that he shall haue an assignation of such a summe as shall be thought fit, to his good liking.

IIII. The

IIII. The Fort of Blauet which hath bene seized on during these late alterations, A and which they have begun to redifie & fortifie, shall be razed, and left in the same estate it was in before the surprisand that hereafter there shall not be any Capitaine or Garison in the same; and in like manner all other new fortifications made in Britanie by whomsoever vpon this occasion, shall be ruined.

V. And to prevent the ruines and oppressions which the people suffer by souldiers, as well French as strangers, which have bene leauied since the first of Ianuary last past, and are dispersed into diuers parts of this Realme, whether for his Maiestie or the said Prince, they shall be discharged, and the strangers conducted out of the Realme by Commisaries deputed by his Maiestie and the said Prince, within twelve daies after the signing of these Articles: and as for the French, they shall be inioyned to retire to their houses within 12 daies after notice given them, vpon paine to be punished as Vagabonds. B

VI. His Maiestie to gratifie the Prince, vpon his request and instance made vnto him, and the assurance which he hath of his affection to his seruice, hath willingly granted the Towne and Castle of Amboise vnto him vnto the conclusion of the Generall Estates; and for the guard of the said Castle, 100 men in Garison.

VII. The Duke of Vendosme being absent, yielding the obedience which is due vnto his Maiestie, for the causes contained in this present treaty, his pleasure is that the said Duke shall be restored to his Government, charges, honors and commands, to enioy them as he hath formerly done, and that all inhibitions made by letters patents, shall be disannulled by the like letters directed to the Court of Parliament of Britanie, in such sort as they may proue no whit preiudiciall vnto him. C

VIII. And touching that which he hath caused to be represented, that he had obtained the consents of the Estates of Britany, for the leauying of such money in the Countrey as was necessary for the entertainment of his guards; his Maiestie hath bene pleased to confirme and allow of that which the said Estates had done in that behalfe.

IX. As also having regard vnto the Petition presented vnto him on the behalfe of the Duke of Retz, that he would bee pleased to entertaine the number of souldiers in Macheou and Belle-Ile, as it is contained in a Briefe granted by the deceased King; it is agreed that the said souldiers shall be continued for 4 yeares. D

X. The enterprize made vpon Hennebont to the preiudice of the Seigneur of Camore, who is gouernour thereof, shall be repaired, and he restored to his charge, as hee was before these alterations.

XI. All Garisons put into any Townes or places of this Realme by reason of these present motions, since the first of Ianuary last, shall be discharged, except 100 men which shall be entertained at Meziers, vntill after the Assembly of the generall Estates, and 200 for the like space in Soissons, whereof the Duke of Mayen is Gouernour, and all other places shall remaine in the same estate they were in before.

XII. Letters Patents shall be directed to all Courts of Parliaments to be verified, by the which his Maiestie shall declare, that he hath bene duly informed, that the said Prince E and other Princes, and Officers of the Crowne, of what quality and condition soeuer, which have followed and assisted him in these alterations, had no bad intention against his seruice, with all clauses necessary for their safeties and discharges, that they may not be called in question hereafter, and that they shall be restored to their Offices, Estates and Dignities, to enioy them as they had formerly done.

XIII. And in like manner his Maiestie shall write to all Princes, Estates, and Common-weales, allied to this Crowne, and men of quality shall be sent expresse vnto them, to let them vnderstand what he had found concerning the innocency and good intention of the said Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and Noblemen which had assisted them.

XIIII. His Maiestie doth also grant, in regard of the charges which the Princes and F other Noblemen have bene at, by reason of this alteration, to giue presently vnto the Prince of Conde, 45000 pounds sterling, to be diuided by him amongst the rest as hee should thinke good.

XV. In consideration of the above-mentioned Articles, which otherwise had not bene granted by his Maiestie, the said Princes, Officers of the Crowne and Noblemen, doe renounce all leagues and associations with whomsoever, as well within as without the Realme, with promise neuer to make any more hereafter.

XVI. His

A XVI. His Maiestie doth also grant in consideration of the great and worthy seruices done vnto this Crowne, as well by the predecessors of the said duke of Neuers as by himselfe, to giue him all necessary expeditions for the reuerfion of the Gouernment of Champagne in the name of his eldest sonne. This treatie was concluded the 15 of May 1614, and signed by the Prince of Conde, the Kings Commissioners, and the other Princes and Officers.

These Articles were brought to the King and Queene, who signed and ratified them, sending them presently backe vnto the Prince: whereupon they resolved to separate themselves. Two daies after, the Prince retired to the Casteauroux, the Duke of Neuers B to Neuers, the Duke of Mayen to Soissons, the Duke of Longueuille to Amiens, and the Duke of Bouillon and the Duke of Luxembourg to Sedan. Thus God turning the Princes hearts, made them to preferre the publike, before their priuate interest, compounding all things mildly, by a speedy and full resolution to the content of all good men. For the Prince fearing that his too long absence, ill interpreted by some, might open/contrary to his intentions/ the way to some dangerous faction in the State, to the preiudice both of the King and people, he wisely resolved (and by his example, all they which did assist him) by his returne to free them from all ialousie and mistrust, which his absence had bred.

The Queene in like manner, to make it knowne that she could not grow distrustfull of C those in whom before she had neuer seene any signe of infidelity or disobedience; iudging by their resolutions to peace, of their faithfull intentions, full of affection to the Kings seruice: and to take away all causes of ialousie, these thought good to make knowne vnto the publike what assurance she had, by a letter she sent vnto the Court of Parliament, giuing them to vnderstand what had past in this treaty; and what satisfaction the Princes had giuen the King and her by their obedience; and that now all distrusts should cease: wherefore there was no further necessity, for the inhabitants of Townes to continue their guards, nor to forbid the entry to any; but that all things should remaine in the same estate they had bene in before these alterations.

Before their departure from Saint Manehold, the Marshall of Bouillon said vnto the D President Iannin, that neither heretofore, now, nor hereafter, his owne particular should euer crosse or hinder that of the publike, desiring him to take that assurance from him, and to undertake for him to all those which should say the contrary. The Prince said also vnto the President, I giue all the iniuries which some haue sought to doe me, vnto the publike, and it rests in their Maiesties to giue me the effect of the treaty. I offer to add to my helping hand (as all they will doe which haue assisted mee) with a heart free from all bitterness, to heare from whomsoever an ouerture of the meanes that may bring all things to a good end: assure your selfe Sir, I desire not the ruine of any one for my priuate hatred, vntill I finde that it may deliuer the State from some approaching ruine. The Seigneur of Vignier returning to Court, he brought this letter which the Prince sent to the Queene.

E Madam, I haue heretofore receiued so many testimonies of your fauour wherewith it hath pleased your Maiestie to honor me, as I hold my selfe infinitely bound: yea those which it hath pleased you to shew me in this treaty with his Maiesties Deputies, haue againe so stridly obliged me, as I can no longer forbear to make a most humble acknowledgement thereof vnto your Maiestie, whom I humbly beseech to beleuee, that my inclination hath alwaies bene to yeeld all seruice and obedience vnto you. Consider if it please you with what freedom I haue alwaies caried my selfe, yea in the last moneth of January; and had not the malice and practice of mine enemies bene, who by false reports remoued me from the honour of your presence and fauour, matters had bene carried otherwise for the good of the Kings seruice, neither had all these disorders hapned: F but seeing by the grace of God, and your Maiesties wise conduct they are now ended and suppressed, I most humbly beseech you so to prouide by your authority, as wee fall not hereafter into the like disorders; assuring you that for mine owne particular I will doe all that is in my power for the seruice of the King my Lord, and that of your Maiesty, &c.

The Queene having receiued this letter sent to assure him of all fauorable vices, and that Monsieur D'Esures should cause the Castle of Amboise to be deliuered vnto him.

All Garisons put into any Townes or places of this Realme by reason of these present motions, since the first of Ianuary last, shall be discharged, except 100 men which shall be entertained at Meziens, vntill after the Assembly of the generall Estates, and 200 for the like space in Soissons, whereof the Duke of Mayen is Gouernour, and all other places shall remaine in the same estate they were in before.

XII. Letters Patents shall be directed to all Courts of Parliaments to be verified, by the which his Maiestie shall declare, that he hath bene duly informed, that the said Prince and other Princes, and Officers of the Crowne, of what quality and condition soever, which have followed and assisted him in these alterations, had no bad intention against his seruice, with all clauses necessary for their safeties and discharges, that they may not be called in question hereafter, and that they shall be restored to their Offices, Estates and Dignities, to enjoy them as they had formerly done.

XIII. And in like manner his Maiestie shall write to all Princes, Estates, and Common-weales, allied to this Crowne, and men of quality shall be sent expresse vnto them, to let them vnderstand what he had found concerning the innocency and good intention of the said Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and Noblemen which had assisted them.

XIIII. His Maiestie doth also grant, in regard of the charges which the Princes and other Noblemen haue bene at, by reason of this alteration, to giue presently vnto the Prince of Conde, 45000 pounds sterling, to bee diuided by him amongst the rest as hee should thinke good.

XV. In consideration of the aboue-mentioned Articles, which otherwise had not bene granted by his Maiestie, the said Princes, Officers of the Crowne and Noblemen, doe renounce all leagues and associations with whomsoever, as well within as without the Realme, with promise neuer to make any more hereafter.

XVI. His

XVI. His Maiestie doth also grant in consideration of the great and worthy seruices done vnto this Crowne, as well by the predecessors of the said duke of Neuers as by himselfe, to giue him all necessary expeditions for the reuerfion of the Government of Champagne in the name of his eldest sonne. This treatie was concluded the 15 of May 1614. and signed by the Prince of Conde, the Kings Commissioners, and the other Princes and Officers.

These Articles were brought to the King and Queene, who signed and ratified them, sending them presently backe vnto the Prince: whereupon they resolved to separate themselves. Two daies after, the Prince retired to the Castelaux, the Duke of Neuers to Neuers, the Duke of Mayen to Soissons, the Duke of Longueuille to Amiens, and the Duke of Bouillon and the Duke of Luxembourg to Sedan. Thus God turning the Princes hearts, made them to preferre the publike, before their priuate interest, compounding all things mildly, by a speedy and full resolution to the content of all good men. For the Prince fearing that his too long absence, ill interpreted by some, might open (contrary to his intentions) the way to some dangerous faction in the State, to the preiudice both of the King and people, he wisely resolved (and by his example, all they which did assist him) by his returne to free them from all iealousie and mistrust, which his absence had bred.

The Queene in like manner, to make it knowne that she could not grow distrustfull of those in whom before she had neuer seene any signe of infidelity or disobedience, judging by their resolutions to peace, of their faithfull intentions, full of affection to the Kings seruice: and to take away all causes of iealousie, shee thought good to make knowne vnto the publike what assurance she had, by a letter shee sent vnto the Court of Parliament, giuing them to vnderstand what had past in this treaty, and what satisfaction the Princes had giuen the King and her by their obedience; and that now all distrusts should cease: wherefore there was no further necessity for the inhabitants of Townes to continue their guards, nor to forbid the entry to any; but that all things should remaine in the same estate they had bene in before these alterations.

Before their departure from Saint Manchild, the Marshall of Bouillon said vnto the President Jannin, that neither heretofore, now, nor hereafter, his owne particular should euer crosse or hinder that of the publike, desiring him to take that assurance from him, and to undertake for him to all those which should say the contrary. The Prince said also vnto the President, I giue all the iniuries which some haue sought to doe me, vnto the publike, and it rests in their Maiesties to giue me the effect of the treaty. I offer to adde to my helping hand (as all they will doe which haue assisted mee) with a heart free from all bitterness, to heare from whomsoever an ouerture of the meanes that may bring all things to a good end: assure your selfe Sir, I desire not the ruine of any one for my priuate hatred, vntill I finde that it may deliuer the State from some approaching ruine. The Siegneur of Vignier returning to Court, he brought this letter which the Prince sent to the Queene.

Madam, I haue heretofore receiued so many testimonies of your fauour wherewith it hath pleased your Maiestie to honor me, as I hold my selfe infinitely bound: yea those which it hath pleased you to shew me in this treaty with his Maiesties Deputies, haue againe so strictly obliged me, as I can no longer forbear to make a most humble acknowledgement thereof vnto your Maiestie, whom I humbly beseech to beleue, that my inclination hath alwaies bene to yeeld all seruice and obedience vnto you. Consider if it please you with what freedome I haue alwaies caried my selfe, yea in the last month of Ianuary; and had not the malice and practice of mine enemies bene, who by false reports removed me from the honour of your presence and fauour, matters had bene carried otherwise for the good of the Kings seruice, neither had all these disorders hapned: but seeing by the grace of God, and your Maiesties wise conduct they are now ended and suppressed, I most humbly beseech you so to prouide by your authority, as wee fall not hereafter into the like disorders; assuring you that for mine owne particular I will doe all that is in my power for the seruice of the King my Lord, and that of your Maiestie, &c.

The Queene having receiued this letter sent to assure him of all favorable visage, and that Monsieur D'Esmaes should cause the Castle of Amboise to be deliuered vnto him.

Death of Henry of Montmorensi Constable of France

Anne de Montmorensy who died of his wounds receiued at the battell of Saint Denis in the year 1567, there had bene no Constable in France; vntill the year 1595, when as Henry the fourth advanced him (being sonne vnto Anne de Montmorensy) to the dignity of Constable: In his youth he was called D'annule, and vnder that name at the battell of Dreux, he tooke Lewis Prince of Conde prisoner. He was afterwards made Marshall of France; and after his fathers death had the gouernment of Languedoc. Hee had borne Armes in Piedmont. During all the ciuill warres vnder King Charles the ninth, hee did many military exploits against them of the reformed Religion: but during the time of Henry the third he would neuer come to Court. In the beginning of the league 1585, as the most ancient Marshall and first Officer of the Crowne, he ioyned himselfe with Henry the fourth (who was then but King of Nauarre) and Henry Prince of Conde, against the authors of the league. The good seruices hee did to the state during this war, and since the time of peace in the time of his honorable age vnto his death, are written at large by the Histories of these times, and therefore I will forbear to make any farther repetition. His sicknesse was somewhat long, and his son Mons. de Montmorensy Admirall of France came to see him and assisted at his death: to whom hee gaue goodly admonitions for the instruction of his young yeares: among other things, hee recommended two vnto him: the one was to bee alwaies faithfull and obedient vnto the King, and watchfull for the good of the State and aduancement of the publicke weale, as those goodly charges did binde him to doe. The other was that being dead, they should not make any funerals for him, but only cary his body to the graue, being followed by him and his household seruants, and but with fixe Torchcs, the which was obserued in euery point as hee had ordained: yet much against his sonnes will, who for the loue hee bare to the memory of his Progenitor had a great desire to prepare him a funeral pompe according to his quality, and to haue his body conducted out of Languedoc to Montmorensy nere to Saint Denis in France, there to be laid in the sacred monument of his Predecessors. Hee left foure children, one son, and three daughters, the 2 daughters of the first venter are married, the one to the Duke of Ventadour, and the other to the Earle of Auvergne now duke of Angoulême: by the second marriage he had one sonne, now duke of Montmorensy, Admirall of France and Gouernor of Languedoc, and his third daughter is married to the Prince of Conde: by his third wife he had not any children.

Death of the Cheualier de Guise.

In this month also newes came to Court of the lamentable death of Francis Paris of Loraine, Cheualier of Guise, and Lieutenant generall for the King in Prouence. This generous and maiestieall Prince, who aimed at nothing but honor and glory, going from Arles to the Castle of Bux, which is but five leagues off, he would needes giue fire to a Cannon, which bre. king, a peece wounded him so in the face, as hee died within 2 howers after: feeling himselfe thus wounded, he refused all remedies, and contented this life to chuse better, crying out, let no man speake vnto me of liuing longer. The Duke and his chiefe bretheren were wonderfull by assisted, so were the Prince of County, and the Princesse his sister. The Duchesse Dowager of Guise continued too without any consolation. All France lamented the death of this generous Prince, and their Maiesties did witness (especially the Queene) how much they grieved for his losse.

Swear booke condemned by the Court.

The King, Queene, and Court being gone to Saint Germane in Lay, the Court of Parliament had fazed vpon a booke which was pernicious and preiudiciall to the French Monarchy, intitled, Dispositio fidei Catholicae & Apostolicae aduersus Anglicanae sectae errores, and the author whereof, was one Francis Suarez a Doctor of Diuinity in Granada, and a Lesuite by profession. printed first at Coimbra in Portugal by permission of the Prouinciall, in the year 1613: which booke the Kings Councell had verified in Court by the conference of the abstract which they had in hand printed from the originall. And it is to be noted that this booke though most pernicious, had been allowed not only by the Prouinciall of the Lesuits in Germany, and commended by the Prouinciall of Portugal, but also called by the Bishops of Coimbra, Alguar, and Lamea, by vertue of a Commis. given by the B. Don Pedro de Castille Vee Roy of Portugal, and Inquisitor generall of the aith, with a note made by Don Fernand Martinez Bishop of Algarbe the which is worthy of censure.

When bringing the conclusions into the Court, and representing an extract of some speciall offences they required that the propositions and maxims contained in the said booke of Suarez should be declared contrary to the ancient Councils, and to the decrees

A crees of the Court, scandalous, and tending to incite subiects and others, to attempt against the persons of Kings, Princes, and Christian Potentates, and that the booke should be forbidden to be sold, or for any man to haue it, keepe it, teach or dispute of such Maxims, vpon paine of high treason: Whereupon this Decree was made.

The great Chamber, the Tournell, and the Edict being assembled, and hauing scene a booke printed at Cullen, entituled Francisci Suarez Granatensis de societate Iesu Doctoris Theologi, Defensio fidei Catholicae & Apostolicae, aduersus Anglicanae sectae errores: containing many propositions contrary to the soueraine power of Princes ordained by God, and the quiet of their Estates, and that it is lawfull for their subiects and strangers to attempt against their persons. The conclusions of the Kings Attorney generall being heard: the Court doth declare the propositions and maxims contained in the said booke to bee scandalous & pernicious, tending to the subuersion of States, and to induce subiects to attempt against the sacred persons of Kings, making mention of King Clouis, and Philip the Faire, the which were false & calumnious. Wherefore the Court ordained, that the said booke of Suarez should be burnt in the Palace yard by the Hangman; forbidding all Printers and booke-sellers to print or sell them, and for all men of what condition soeuer to haue them, or for any other to write or keepe any such bookes. Moreouer, it was decreed, that Ignatius Armand Rector of the Iesuites in Paris, Cotton, Fronton, and Sirmond should come the first Court day, and be giuen to vnderstand, that contrary to their declaration, and the decree of their Generall, in the year 1610, Suarez booke had bene printed and brought into the Court, being contrary to the Kings authority & the safety of his person & estate: and that they should be enioyned to cause their Generall to renew the said Decree, and to haue it published, whereof they should bring an Act within fixe months, and provide that no bookes containing such damnable and pernicious propositions should be made or put forth by them of their society: and that they should bee enioyned in their sermons to preach the contrary doctrine vnto the people, otherwise the Court would proceed against the delinquents, as guilty of treason and troublers of the publicke peace.

In this month of Iune newes came to Court that the Marquis of Bonniuet (hauing certaine Troops of Horse in Poictou) had committed great spoiles, and that hee had ruined part of the suburbs of Poictiers, and some farmes belonging to the Bishop of that place, and that many of his men being disbanded, committed infinite acts of Hostilitie within the Country.

On the other side their Maiesties were informed that the Duke of Vendosmes souldiers in Britany did the like, to the great discontent of the Prince of Conde, and the said Duke, and to the great oppression of the poore people: whereupon their Maiesties resolved in Councell to make a voyage into Poictou and Britany thinking that the Kings presence would disperse and scatter (as it were) all these petty cloudes and threatnings of warre.

The Prince of Conde hauing taken possession of the Towne and Castle of Amboise, according to the Articles of the treaty, went into Poictou, visiting his houses, and hindering what he could, that those troopes which had followed him vnder the Marquis of Bonniuet should not oppress the poore people. He came to Chastelleraul whether many of his friends came to visit him, where remembering that hee had receiued some cause of discontent against the Bishop of Poictiers, being informed that hee had spoken vnworthily of him, and that to satisfie his promise vnto President Jannin, to forget all iniuries, he would in regard thereof assure them of Poictiers of his sincere intentions: whereupon he gaue charge to Monsieur de Larrie to carie Letters of assurance to the Towne-house, giuing them to vnderstand, that all things were pacified by the treaty: that hee had reconciled her Maiesties fauour, and that for his part all discontents were forgotten: yet could he not pisse ouer with silence the words which the Bishop had spoken against him: which Letters were receiued by the chiefe of the Towne from de Larrie, but some of them hauing not heard the Letter read, or not well vnderstanding the sense, advertised the Bishop of the Princes complaint, whereat both he and some of his friends were offended: so as on the 22 of Iune, de Larrie walking with a Gentleman called la Blanchardiere and one Footman, they were encountered by a troope of 40 or 50 men with short peeces, who were led by a Scholler called Bous, and countenanced by Saint-George, the Bishops kinsman: these approaching nere to de Larrie, asked if it were not he which had brought the letters from the Prince against the Bishop of Poitiers. These two gentlemen finding they A had an intent to assault them, drew their swords for their defence, but presently the others discharged their peeces, and wounded de Latrie in diuers places: they also slue his Footman and a Townesman which was neere them; after which they retired to the Bishops Palace, and de Latrie was led to the Maiors house there to be dressed: where hee entreated Blanchardiere to take the paines to goe and informe the Prince of this accident, whom he found returning to Amboise, to whom he related the tragedie and the truth of the fact.

The Prince finding himselfe wronged in the person of de Latrie thus wounded, fearing that he should hardly get out of the towne with his life, he resolved to goe himselfe and to free him from this danger: But to take away all cause of ieaousie from their Maiesties, B and the towne of Poitiers, he dismissed all the Nobilitie which was with him, entreating them not to follow him to Poitiers, and so onely with fifteene horse he approached neere the towne, with an intent to enter in person, and carie away with him the person wounded. Being come within two leagues, hee met with de Latrie, who had got forth by policy, yet notwithstanding he would goe on to be informed of the wrong done him, and the outrage vsed to the party in doing that which he had in charge: Being within so paces of the gates, he heard of some mutinie within the towne, for the wrong done to de Latrie, wherin the Bishop did also intermeddle, who being aduertised of the Princes approach, and seeing two factions among the people (the one maintaining the fact of Saint George, the other the Princes interest, & of his friend wounded) apprehending also what might hap- C pen if the Prince entered, he resolved to take the government of the Towne into his hands and to keepe the Prince from entering, to whom he sent word that it was not good for him to enter, the which he would oppose. This message was deliuered vnto him by a young man called Beaulieu de Persac, yet notwithstanding the Prince went vnto the gate, where he found one called Berland, who told him he had charge from the Magistrates of the Towne to refuse him the gate, shutting the barre against him, neither could they get any better satisfaction from this resolute souldier. The Prince went away with much discontent for this refusal, for with this Berland there was another with his pistoll charged and the cock downe, and ouer the gate was a Captain called Malaguet with certain souldiers, who by his commandement discharged their peeces, and hurt some of the princes traine. D

The Prince retiring to Chastellerault, hee made his complaint vnto the Queene, sending a Gentleman expresse with Letters, by the which hee demanded iustice for his friend which was hurt; for the refusal which was made to receive him; and for the inso-lency of their Porters: But he complained especially of the Bishop, as the author of this tumult, from whom he demanded a satisfaction due to his qualitie: and that information might be made against Saint George, at the suit of de Latrie, whom he protested to assist with all his means, seeing that he had beene wounded in doing him seruice.

About this time the Duke of Rohannois, Gouernour of Poitiers came thither; hee was receiued by the Maior, Sherifes, and some Burgeses, who conducting him to his lodging with all respect, he was invited to supper by the Maior, whither the Bishop of Poitiers came to visit him, entreating him to forget the attempt which had beene made in his charge at the Princes coming, whereunto the Duke did willingly consent; beseeching him that hereafter he would not attempt the like; and going to conduct him out of the Maiors house, he found him attended by eleuen horsemen with their pistolls, and about 400 foot carrying short peeces vnder their cloakes. The Duke being with the Maior and Sherifes, he was aduertised that vpon his arrival the streets were barricadoed; where-vpon he resolved with them and others, to forbid any barricadoes to be made, or chaires to be drawne without his commandement, enioyning them to pull downe all the barricades which had beene made, and in case of any alarme to goe vnto the rendezuous appointed, there to receive the Dukes commandement. The which was published the next morning, being the 26 of Iune, and the same day after dinner he went to visit the Bishop, where they resolved that hee said Duke with the Maior and Sherifes should send la lal-letiere vnto the Prince, who had beene with him the day before, from the inhabitants, to whom he had promised not to offer to enter into the Towne before her Maiestie had so ordained. The like he confirmed vnto the Dukes messenger: But the Bishop hearing that the Prince came within a league of the towne, he sent vnto the Duke to haue Saint Cyri-ans gate shut, to whom the duke made answer, that he held it not fit, being but three clocke;
but

A but he would take such order, as there should happen no inconuenience, whither he went to give order for the sure guard thereof.

In his returne to his lodging he was aduertised, that they did arme about the Bishops Palace; whither going with some of the chiefe Burgeses, and being before the Palace, they found the chaires drawne, and lockes put vnto them; seeing many men armed, he demanded the reason of it, and why they had drawne the chaires: to whom they said, they had seene many horsemen without the towne and neere the suburbs: The Duke answered that he had beene without, but could not see any one which might annoy them, and that being their Gouernour, he would be the first which would oppose himselfe against any which should attempt against the Towne; that they should vse more moderation, and not arme so rashly, and at the same time he caused the chaires to be vnlocked.

The Duke saw many signes of a popular sedition; the Captain who had the guard of the port of Pont Ioubert, hauing abandoned his charge, let downe the Portcullis, and retired with all speed to the Bishop who had sent for him. The Duke returned in his Ca-roch by the Bishops palace, to see if the people were still in armes, where hee found the chaires drawn and lockt againe; and de Roumay coming vnto him, told him that the Bishop could no longer containe the people, whereupon he entreated him to cause the locks to be opened that he might passe; which done, after some long attendance for that the Bishop kept the keyes, he past to the Bishops gate, where he entreated one to goe vnto the Bishop in his name, and to tell him that he held it strange to see the streets chained, and the people armed: then going himselfe out of his Caroch, and seeing a great number of armed men, he began to tell them they did ill to arme so lightly, and that it was not for the Kings seruice to lue after that manner, and to vse such violent and seditious courses:
a souldier being in the midst of the presse answered, that they would doe it notwithstanding standing his command: whereupon he instantly saw a number of other souldiers coming out of the Bishops palace, with Pikes, Muskets, and Harquebuses, and then he heard one cry out, Behold the Traitors; and thereupon they thrust at him with their pikes and holbars, which his people that were about him, and the Gentlemen which did accompany him, defended as well as they could, yet he was touched a little on the nose, so as hee bled: He was presently conducted by some that were with him into the palace, where he found the Bishop in the head of a great multitude, armed with his Curasse, and a pike in his hand; to whom the Duke said, Why Sir, what courses are these, to seeke to murder good men, and such as haue the honour to be as I am, without any subiect? where haue they learned to serue the King after this manner? whereupon, about 150 which were armed in the Court, would haue quarrelled with the Duke, telling him, that they were not to obserue any other orders then such as had beene accustomed. Hereupon one of his friends wished him to retire into an vpper chamber, and to speake little, otherwise hee might be in danger.

The chiefe of the towne were suffered to come vnto him, who testified their griefes for the iniurie that was done vnto him, and offered to die with him, rather then hee should haue any wrong. There was he forced to sup and to stay till after midnight, hoping still they would suffer him to depart vnto his lodging, the which he could neuer obtaine, har-uing not any private friend there, by whom hee might demand safety of this mutinous multitude to goe to his rest; for all that were now with him were the Bishops friends, and diswilled him, saying that the people would not suffer it, and that there was no safety for him but there, the which it seemed he was forced to beleue, for that the Sergeant Maior hauing by his commandement giuen charge to the fix Captaines to bring two squadrons out of every Company to the old market place, there to vnderstand his Maiesties intention, and in what manner they should guard, Pidoux one of the fixe Captaines answered F that it should not be so, and that the Bishop was not placed there to discharge his Ecclesiasticall function alone, but to gouerne the towne and to execute his priuate commission, adding thereunto in the presence of the Mayor, that all men did conceiue the Gouernour should haue shewed the speciall authority hee hath from the Queene, to command ouer vs;
but seeing hee hath not done it to the whole body, they were not resolved to obey him.
Then the Maior and Sergeant Maior told him, that seeing his commission had beene once published and enrolled, and he installed in the place, he had not any need of new Letters.
But the Duke found the effects of his words: for about midnight one Esnard acted like a Sergeant of a band, came vnto him with twenty musketers, and some halberdiers (having A been first with the Bishop) and said, I come in the behalfe of 2000 men of this towne, who are very sorry for the danger you have bene in, and offer themselves for your preservation, knowing that you are a good servant to the King, and their Gouverneur; yet they desire to obey you vnder the authority of the Bishop of Poitiers: They are your servants, and will acknowledge you, desiring notwithstanding to serue the King after their owne fantasies, that is to say, to draw their chaires when they please, at the found of the Bishops drums, which are his bells; saying moreover, that there were traitors in the towne, whose counsell they would not haue him to vfe.

During these speeches, Boux (he which had assaulted de Latrie) came vp accompanied B with many others, who in the Bishops presence spake many words vnto the Duke to moue him; but he obseruing the aduice which had bene giuen him, and seeing him to be the author of the sedition, and that the Bishop did in no sort blame him, he held his peace, resolving to suffer all indignities, having but foure Gentlemen with him, without any other armes but their swords against five hundred townsmen which were armed within the palace: And to finish the worke, they caused him to retire into a chamber to sleepe, setting two Sentinels at the doore, and a Corps de guard at the staires foot, and another in the garden right against his chamber window, commanding them to shoot, if they saw any one present himselfe: They also set two other Corps de guards, the one in the Bishops Court, the other at the gate.

The next day about nine a clocke, the Duke (seeing himselfe vnable to doe the King any seruice, and for his owne safety) desired to retire himselfe out of the towne, being conducted by some of the chiefe Burgeses; and it was happy for him, for all the streets were barricaded, and he past by their fauours which conducted him.

The Marquis of Cœuure sent to the Duke of Vendôme with the Articles.

The Queene Regent, after the treaty of Saint Manehould, sent the Marquis of Cœuures into Britany to the Duke of Vendôme, who signified his consent by a declaration which he signed. But presently after the Marquis returned to Paris, the Queene was aduertised by Letters from Britany, that the Dukes troopes continued their hostilities, and that by the intelligence of the Seig: of Aradon, Gouverneur of the Towne and Castle of Vannes, he had entred the same towne: And that it seemed thereby he had no entent to keepe the treaty, whereupon he wrote presently vnto the Queene, to giue her an account of the whole businesse: That having by a declaration vnder his owne hand, deliuered vnto the Marquis of Cœuure, promised to obey the Articles concluded, he thought hee had right to enioy the benefit of his re-establishment, vnto which her Maiesties bounty had restored him in case of obedience, and by consequence to enter into the townes of his government: That notwithstanding the decrees of the Parliament, hee was well grounded to demand entry of the Seigneur of Aradon: That being neere to Vannes on his way to Blauet, Deputies were sent vnto him in the inhabitants name to offer him entry into the town, where he entred, the inhabitants being in armes, receiving him with all honour and respect: That he had found the towne in the guard of the inhabitants, and so had left it; not fearing to E put his person into their power, having none with him but his guards, and some of the Nobility, among 500 men that were armed: That to free them from all doubt of his sincere intentions, he had declared vnto them publicly his full submission to her Maiesties will, promising presently to dismisse his troops; whereupon hee entreated her Maiesty to take his entry into Vannes as an action of a Gouverneur, restored by her bounty and his obedience, &c.

The Kings Declaration in fauour of the Prince of Conde.

Their Maiesties having resolved the voyage of Poictou and Britany, the King in his Councell thought it fit in fauour of the Prince of Conde, and according to the Articles of the treaty of Saint Manehould, to cause a Declaration to be published, by the which his Maiesty did discharge the said Prince and all other Princes and Noblemen which had ioined with him from all search, and from all that might be imputed vnto them by reason of the last troubles and alterations; suppressing thereby the memory of all that was past, during the said troubles, by meanes of his said cousin, and of the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, Noblemen, and others, which had assisted, followed, or favoured him, were it in the leaving off troops, taking of places, intelligences, and negotiations both within and without the Realme, or any thing else whatsoever; being sufficiently informed that their intentions were not against his seruice, nor the good of the common-wealth: forbidding any

1614

A any pursuit to be made against them in regard thereof, and commanding that they should enioy all their governments, honours, and dignities in like manner as they had done before the said alteration: which Declaration was verified the first of Iuly by the Court of Parliament.

After this Declaration, their Maiesties being ready to begin their progresse, the Prince of Conde being aduertised hereof, wrote a short letter vnto the Queene concerning the Duke of Vendôme, and the tumults in Poitiers. The Prince of Conde's Letter to the Queene

Madam (said he) I was euen now aduertised, that without any other considerations, the Duke of Vendôme hath obeyed you, the Marquis of Cœuure is restored to Blauet, B and that in euery circumstance, and in all places he hath freed me of my word giuen at S. Manehould: so as the voyage which they haue perswaded you vnto, is altogether vnprofitable for Britanie, and it rests onely in you, Madam, to finish the disarming, in making your word compleat. There remains ten thousand pounds sterling, to send vnto the Duke of Vendôme, if it please you, being necessary to make him finish his disarming. I beseech you then that you will command it to be speedily sent vnto him. If your Maiesty come into these parts, it is to affaile me, for that I haue demanded iustice. I beseech you, Madam, bee not caried away with these counsels, and belecue not (as some would haue) that I would be the meanes to haue the assembly of the States broken off, so much desired by those which are about you. In a word, Madam, feare hath no power ouer me, C and beleuee that I haue in my hands wherewith to persueue my selfe from all oppression. But the loue I beare vnto my King, the Estates, and vnto your person, shall make me attend Monsieur de Mayen to giue you all content, assuring my selfe your Maiesty will command I shall receiue that which is due vnto my quality. And so, &c. This Letter was written from Dussay neere Poitiers, Iuly 16.

The King being come to Paris, and giuing order for his voyage into Britany, his Maiesty receiued a Letter from the Prince of Conde, written from Lusignan, by the which he complained againe of the Bishop of Poitiers, and demanded iustice for the outrage they had done vnto his friend in that towne, for want whereof he protested to be reuenged: That he was their Maiesties most humble servant, and was ready to vndergoe all D their commandments, yet he could not forget nor passe ouer in silence what they had done vnto him in that place, nor returne out of Poictou, before he were satisfied for that affront: Finally, he besought him that iustice might be done, and that hee might receiue contentment. But without any answer, their Maiesties resolved to depart within two dayes, so as the regiment of the guards, and three companies of Swisse marched presently away: They gaue warning to all their Maiesties officers to be ready, and in like manner to the Councillors of the Grand-council.

The Councillors of the Court of Parliament, and of the other Courts, went vnto the Louure, to yeeld vnto their Maiesties that whereunto their duties did binde them. The Citie of Paris, carefull aboue all other of the sacred person of their Kings, fearing to lose E this glorious Sunne of France, from whom they borrowed all their lustre, sent their Prouost of Merchants and their Sheriffes, to beseech the Queene Regent, not to suffer the King to goe out of Paris, promising to guard him, and to answer for him with the hazard of their owne liues, assuring her Maiesty that the Kings good subiects should receiue much contentment by his stay; fearing that his person being yet young and tender, might receiue some preiudice in his health, by the vndertaking of so long a voyage: which their petition vnto their Maiesties, they said, proceeded from the loue and common consent of all their good subiects of Paris.

desire the Kings stay.

But the Queene gaue them wisely to vnderstand that the voyage was of great importance: That the affaires of the King would be in bad estate, if it were not speedily vnder- F taken; to stay disorders, restrain the liberty of troops, cut off the way to recruits, ease the people, assure the townes, restore the commerce, settle officers, cause the King to be obeyed, restore honour to the Magistrates, relieue iustice, heare the peoples complaints, helpe the oppressed, assure the fearfull, reconcile quarrels, and to giue peace vnto the prouinces, vpon whom did fall the choller of those Princes which are yet absent from Court: That the Duke of Montbazon, the Marquis of Cœuure, and the Earle of Vertus, whom she had sent thither, could not preuaile: the Kings presence was therefore necessary to disperse these petty clouds: That there was no feare for his Maiesty in that voyage, that hee

he would returne soone to their comforts, bringing peace and rest to all his good subiects. A The Parisians at that time promised their Maiesties that nothing should passe within the City, nor thereabouts, but for the Kings service and contentment, that they would answer for the City during the said voyage, and keepe it if need were, but it was not held necessary, and they were only commanded to haue a care that no faction should arise within the City during their absence: and so they tooke their leaues of their Maiesties.

The King begins his voyage.

On Saturday the 5 of Iuly, the King departed with his company of Light-Horse, and soone after the Queene, with all the Princes, Noblemen, and Ladies of the Court, and all the Officers, leaving Monf. de Maufan, who led his company thither. Paris B was left to the custodie of the Inhabitants, under the command of Monf. de Lion-Cort their Gouvernor, and of Monf. de Grioux Prouost of Merchants: and the Citadell & Towne of Amiens, in the guard of the Marshall D'Ancre. In lesse then three dayes, Paris was emptied of about 30000 persons, for all men that had any businesse or suites, either before the Councell of State, or the great Councell, were forced to follow the King in his voyage to sollicite their causes. The first Towne where their Maiesties stayed for their traine was Estampes, where the inhabitants made shew of their publike ioy in receiuing their King: but I may not stand to make particular relation of the reception the King had in all the Townes as he past in this voyage, hauing much matter of farre greater importance to treat of.

The Duke of Mayen sent to the Prince of Conde,

The King came to Orleans, where the Inhabitants met him in Armes, and receiued their Maiesties with all the honor they could deuise: they stayed there eight daies, as well to attend the Prince of Condes answer, as to heare how matters went in Britany and Poitou: for before their going from Paris, their Maiesties had resolued (according to the Princes owne letter) to send some one to conferre with him: the Duke of Mayen had offered himselfe to this employment, promising so to acquit himselfe, as hee assured their Maiesties to perswade the Prince to come vnto the King, wheresoeuer he should bee, to yeeld him that whereunto his birth and quality did binde him. The Duke vpon this promise parted from Paris, with some Gentlemen of his Houie, thinking to finde the Prince at Chastelleraulx or at Lusignan in Poitou, but hee was forced to goe to Chasteauroux, D whither the Prince had retired himselfe, hearing of the Kings coming. Others say it was, for that the Duke of Neuers had intreated him to christen one of his Children, but howsoeuer, there the Duke found him, where hauing spent some dayes in conference with the Prince, he could draw no other reason from him, but that hee would neuer come to Court before the King had done him iustice for the wrong he had receiued from the Bishop of Poitiers, and that they had giuen contentment to the Duke of Vendosme, for the 10000 pound which was yet vnpaid by the treatie of Saint Manehould. The Duke of Mayen seeing him thus constant in his resolution, was forced to returne to their Maiesties without any effect, comming to Orleans on the 13 of Iuly, to whom he related the businesse as it had past, and assuring them that he could not perswade him to come to Court, E he vnclesse he had the contentment about mentioned: that for his part hee had vied all the meanes he could inuent, to make him forget the action of Poitiers, but hee tooke this affront done by the Bishop so to heart, as he said he had no power to resolue, vntill hee had drawne such reuenge from the King as he desired, promising to come vnto his Maieftie as soone as it should please him to doe him iustice. Whereupon seeing hee would not yeeld to the intreaties of the Duke of Mayen, they thought it not fit for the Kings dignity to send againe vnto him, but to proceed on in their journey, to comfort the poore afflicted people, and to assure the Prouinces troubled with ciuill combussions.

The Kings
troops aduance towards Britany.

The Marshall of Brissac went on with 6000 Swisses, and led them to the frontiers of Britany, being a lamentable thing to heare of the spoiles, murders, and acts of hostility, F which were daily committed in Britany by the troops of the Duke of Vendosme, and by those of the Marquis of Bonniuet in Poitou: the Marshalls of Lauardin and Boisdaulphin, and with them the Marquis of Sable, Monf. Praslin and others aduanced with the horse being about 1200: and withall Monf. de Ramburge was commanded to make ready his Regiment, which he did in lesse then fifteene daies, hauing 2000 men well armed ready for the Kings seruice, which troopes lay nere vnto Nantes, attending his Maiefties command.

Letters for the restoring of the Duke of Vendosme to his Gouernment.

A During the Kings stay at Orleans, he made a declaration directed to the Court of Parliament at Rennes, for the restoring of the Duke of Vendosme to his Gouernment of Britany, and for the free inioyng thereof, and of all his Charges, Honors, Captainships and Estates as hee had done before the last troubles: and also, for the difanulling of a decree which had beene made against the Siegneur of Aradon, concerning that which had past at Vannes, forbidding them in any sort to molest him or any other for any thing which had past in the Prouince of Britanie by reason of those late alterations.

About this time the generall Estates were assigned at Paris, and published through all the Prouinces of the Realme. The Magistrates of this great City gaue notice to all the B Inhabitants of what quality or condition soeuer, that they might freely and with all liber-tie bring or send vnto the Town-house what complaint or grievance they thought good, the which they might deliuer into the hands of the Prouost of Merchants or Sheriffes, or to their Deputies to be put into their instructions.

Publication of the generall
Estates.

At the same time there past through France an Exhortation in forme of letters, directed to the Governours of Prouinces, by way of aduice giuen to the three Estates of the Realme, speaking to either of them in particular. And for that they containe some things worthy obseruation to moue a people to obey their King, and not to giue care to such as seek to trouble the State, I haue set them downe in their order.

To the Clergie.

C MY Masters of the Clergy, obserue well this aduice, there is not any one of you but
M doth remember in euery point the Articles of the last league, made by many Princes (and with the Kings priuety) at Peronne in the yeare 1534, the which in shew was goodly and plausible, and so fauourably embraced of all the world, as it seemed (especially to those of your coate) the Angell of God should confound him that would contradict it.
What followed after 14 yeares of barbarous and intestine warres, without intermission?
What hath the wisdom, policie, and purse of Popes, of the Consistorie of most of the Princes in Italy, yea in a manner of all you preuailed? Nothing, as you know, but the ad-uancement of heresie, the ruine of temples, many communitie de priuie seruice, D the shamefull punishment of some religious men, the sudden death of the chiefe authors, the poerty of all the Clergy of France, by the sale of their lands, and such a confusion in the gouernment of your affaires, as the suites continue yet. It is a wonder how these miseries were suppressed by the generosity of the deceased King, who hath repaired your Altars and restored the Masse in many strong townes where for many yeares it had bene intermitted. You enioy againe your Benefices and houses, from whence the Cannon had chased you. All these disorders grew from this League, the fatal spring of our miseries, which made France so feeble, as, if his Maieftie had yeelded any thing to the opposition which was made against him at his comming to the Crowne, we had bene now strangers in our owne Country. But he being assisted by God and serued by his good seruants E treated with his disobedient subiects, and with strangers in the yeare 1598.

To the obseruation of which treaty you are especially bound, hauing comprehended you as fauourably therein as you could desire, as well for your reliefe, as for the maintenance of your authority and freedoms. My Masters, in recompence of this great Princes paines, he hath left you this precious treasure of peace, which he hath purchased with his own blood, to the end you should adde to your helpes (as the first member of this French Monarchy) to preferue it carefully. Shew your duties then by your pietie and good instructions, making the Kings tender age an ample subiect to practise your fidelities; and yeelding vnto the sonne what you owe vnto the father, also vnto your Country that which you owe, imitating the zeale and wisdom of your predecessors, that by your F example euery man may doe his duty.

To the Nobilitie.

M MY Masters of the Nobilitie and Gentry, honor the Princes because of their quality which is the most eminent amongst men; and if you haue the honour to bee nere them in any good esteeme, neuer leaue them: If you doe not apparently perceiue them to decline from their duty vnto the King their Soueraigne Lord and yours, for in this case the necessity of the Estate dispenceth you of your faith. You my Masters who are the fineces

1614 "newes of this State, her strength and defence; did you finde your felues any thing bettered A
 "during the said League, to haue run ouer all France sweating in your armes in the compa-
 "nie of strangers, onely to support some of the said Princes, and for their particular seruic-
 "ces; forgetting inconsiderately what you did owe vnto your King and this Crowne? Is "your honor increased? are you or your children aduanced to the chiefe places of the State?
 "Are your names become any whit the more famous? Are your goods increased? Are "your debts paid? haue you not rather made your condition worse then better? The last
 "peace concluded at Veruins in May 1598, hath it not made you repent that which "is past, and acknowledge openly, that nothing but blame, reproach, feare and shame apper-
 "taines vnto rebels and seditious: It hath also taught you by experience, that there is no B
 "greater misfortune, nor more to be auoyded, then that which separateth children from "the fathers obedience, and the Nobility from that of the King: when this comes to passe,
 "God suffers his iudgments to light vpon men without respect of age, kindred, or qua"lity, by inhumane murders, whereby some of the chiefe houses of your body are ex"tinct, by surprisles, sieges, ruines and burning of houles, rauishing of wiues and virgins,
 "spoil of your goods, your fields left waste, & gaord with your blood: a general famine the "remembrance whereof is so fresh, as you may easily ghesse what you are, & what you haue "endured, and what you may: obseruing well what is past, and the present, there is no per"swasion, pretext, or ambition of any man shall euer deceiue you, nor make you forget that "the most wicked condition of men, is to haue home-bred quarrels, and cursed be hee that C
 "shall raise them. These Princes whom you haue so much affected, whose fortunes you
 "haue so long followed, haue they not abandoned you, and made their owne peace with the
 "the King? They haue only obtained pardons for some: haue they had any other care to "releue you (for so many ruines which you haue suffered in your houles) by any honest
 "gratifications? when you haue had any occasion to vie them to your quarrels, (whereof
 "you haue too many) or for your ciuill or criminall suites, or for any other affaires, haue they
 "not assisted you coldly? If you haue at any time craued their support vnto the King, for "any government or place of command, haue you not bene better satisfied with his Ma-
 "iesties reception, with his liberly of speech, and his facility to yeeld vnto your demands,
 "then with those which presented you but for fashion sake. D
 "Finally my Masters, what support and fauour you haue receiued heretofore from "the said Princes, the like must you expect hereafter. So as they please their owne passi"ons, and attaine to their owne ends by your assistance, they care not what may happen "for your particular, (they embrace you if they haue cause to imploy you,) and if you in-
 "treat them they know you not, they haue no Angell to open the doores when you are
 "prisoners for their sakes, they bring your heads to the blocke to preserve their owne.
 "A Marshall of France, a great Captaine (if euer there were any) lost his being, decei-
 "ued by strangers: Let the King feaze vpon your lands, they will not giue you any of "theirs to recompence your losses. One of the first Presidents of a Soueraine Court
 "hath bene in a manner brought to beggary, and yet they which were the causes of this E
 "pouerty, pitty him! see then others.
 "Moreover, represent vnto your felues, that the King is in his Minority, that hee is but
 "thirteene yeares old, that you are his Tutors and Guardians, and therefore your ser-
 "uice should neuer faile him, both for this consideration, and for the strict bond which "euery one of you hath to the memorie of that great Captaine the deceased King his "father; who by his vertue and incomparable courage, hath purchased for euery one of "you, with Armes in hand, in open field, in the sight of Paris, and elsewhere against "rebels and strangers, the honour to haue bene the preseruacion of your Country; bee
 "so still vnto him according to occurrences, lest that you lose that glorie.
 "Finally, seeing that in our priuate actions, wee desire not to admit of any superiour to F
 "command ouer vs, being Masters of our owne conduct: doe you so in like manner,
 "without expecting any prayers or intreaty from the King, and haue an especial care that
 "no pretext whatsoever may make you stray from your obedience: fly all procurements
 "as dangerous rocks. Wee haue it selfe cause to complaine, that vertue, experience, good
 "seruices, yea and loyalty, are without esteeme and ill intreated; by reason of the sale of all "Offices and charges within the Realme; which kinde of husbandry or couetousnesse,
 "the forepassed warrs of the League, of the public weale, and of the reformation in "the conduct of affaires haue brought in, and you know the reason. Yet

A Yet let vs proceed in our complaints as our predecessors haue taught vs: let vs present our humble petitions when as we shall haue the honour to be called; whereof the Queene Regent hath assured vs, and that they shall be willingly heene and yeelded vnto by the King, her Maiestie, and the Councell, so as they bee modest and reasonable: It is not in vs to prescribe a reformation, but to craue it, and following this course we cannot erre.

To the People.

Good people, I will tell you that no gratifications from their Maiesties haue made me to write thus vnto the Clergie, the Nobility, and your felues: for as touching my fortune, Collatus sum in obscuris sicut martini faculi: but as a humble subiect to their Maiesties, zealous of my Country, and fearing lest it should be hereafter (as we haue seene) the B scorne and pity of all our neighbours, yea and of Barbarians, hath induced mee to contri-buite to the continuacion of peace, as euery good and naturall French man ought to doe:
 you doe willingly giue eare to all that is spoken of the affaires at this day, and you doe greatly apprehend the alarmes that are giuen you: I assure you there is reason, and I doe aduertise you that you are the most interessed: if you labour not resolutely to quench this fire whilst it kindles, or lies smothered, you shall be first of all set on fire; and if it increaseth you shall serue (as you haue done heretofore) for matter to make it continue: Consider of all inconueniences which may happen, and assure your felues, that both in field
 C and towne, you shall be the marke wherat the choller and intolence both of friend and enemy, of French and stranger will aime. Remember that the contempt which you made of the royal authority, the respects you had to the heads of a faction, who had blinded your eyes, and corrupted you by their flatteries and pretexes of Religion, or of the common weale, and had so prodigiously diuided you, haue furnisht matter for all the tragedies which haue hapned in France, and in our sight, whereof there yet remaine through their continuance, and your wilfulness, wounds almost incurable; whereof there is some amendment by the wholesome remedies applied by the deceased King a most excellent Physician, who hath preserved the life of our Country, and like a good Captaine recoured this lost Monarchie, the which by the helpe of God shall bee continued by his Maie-D stie, if you alone continue constantly his most faithfull subiects and seruants, and to binde you more strictly therunto, set before your eyes, your miseries past, the infinite toyle, and the dangers, and clemency of Henry the fourth, of whom we may say,

*Quarui Henrico parem?
 Nemo est nisi ipse.*

And that Lewis his sonne, hath neuer done wrong to any of you; who for our happines approacheth neere the age wherein he may doe good to all cause himselfe to be respected, and punish the seditious: in doing this you will soone lay aside Armes, which doe but debauche you from your labour, and will frustrate the designs which may bee practised vpon your facility and accustomed inconstancy. There haue bene occasions offered to E after the peace, since the lamentable death of that great Prince Henry the fourth, if the Queene Regent had not courageously and wisely prevented it, which we now enjoy by her care and vigilancy. Be not for your parts to inconsiderate as to lose the fruits; and renouncing all disloyall practices, let vs make our felues capable of the peace we now enjoy, purchased with so much blood: First by our deuout prayers vnto God, that hee would preserve the King, of whom by humane meanes depends the health of vs all: by amendment of our liues, and by an exemplary obedience and fidelity to their Maiesties, to the end that this flourishing Realme be not come in peeces in our time, and that wee be not accused by our posterity, to haue bene the instruments to such lamentable effects, as may happen by the renewing of troubles: or too negligent wherewith we may reproach F our forefathers, for that they had not rooted it vp in the beginning as you see. There was neuer Regency more free from warrs and lesse troubled with theues (which might hinder the safetie of commerce) then this: let vs all assist her Maiestie with heart and affection, to the end she may goe on from good to better.

To the Officers of the Crowne.

Y ou my Lords the Officers of the Crowne and of Iustice, who are the eye, the mouth, and the right hand of our Prince, and the Adreere of the State: Giue good counsell

to his Maiefty vpon all occurrents which shall be offered; looke you faile not your felues; A cause the lawes and ordinances of this Monarchy to bee duly obserued, and by the same lawes punish all those which shall offend, without exception, or acception; for commonly the punishment of a wicked and peruerse man, doth assure all good men, and terrifie others.

During their Maiesties absence from Paris, on the 19 of Iuly there was commandement given to all the inhabitants of the City and suburbs, to haue their armes in a readiness, and to issue forth vpon the first warning should be giuen them; which grew vpon a report that the Prince of Conde should come vnto the City: And as this continued (seeing also many arriuē daily with horses and baggage) it made the Magistrates of the towne B to giue a fresh commandement that euery one should stand vpon his guard.

The King hauing past through Orleans, Blois, Tours, and Saumur, and receiued all the honors which could be deuised by his good subiects: coming neere to Chastelle-rault, the Prince of Condes troops retired themselves in small companies without armes, stafes, or stick, fearing the maieesty of him whom they had offended in molesting his good and naturall subiects, and namely the Marquesse of Bonniuers troops, which escaped by diuers wayes, hearing of his coming: who without doubt would haue punished them seuerely: considering the complaints, teares, and cries of the poore people, which came vnto his Maiesties eares, for the indignities which they had caused them to suffer, and for the great spoiles which they had committed in Poictou, to the great griefe of the Prince C himselfe: yet they could not so speedily retire themselves, but that some of them were met withall by some of the Regiment of the guard, who hauing heard the complaints of the poore people, charged them and chased them like theues and robbers as they were.
Neere vnto Chastellerault, they met with a great cart laden with all sorts of armes which the Marquis of Bonniuet had caused to bee transported out of Poictou, which cart was stayed, and the armes laid into a certaine castle in Poictou, belonging to the Duke of Longueville. They also found many Magazines in diuers places where armes lay hidden, all which were seized vnto the Kings vse, and laid with the rest, the Regiment of the guards, hauing commandement to diarm all such as they should find armed to any other designe then the Kings seruice, and to seize vpon such as they should find to keepe the D field, to make them giue an account of their intent in bearing armes.

The King came to Poictiers, where his Maieesty was much desired, and where the Inhabitants did yeld all duties of obedience, and did strue to make it appeare that they were most affectionate to his seruice: The Bishop and Magistrates of the Towne, made relation of the tumults past, and gaue him notice of all such as had bene faithfull to him, during the brutes of warre; beseeching his Maieesty to take in good part that which had been done for his seruice, & to pardon such as had caried themselves with too much zeale and heat for the defence of the City. The King staid long there, causing a new Maior to be chosen, and other officers to the peoples content, and the safety of the towne: And during his abode there, he receiued the humble submissions of the dukes of Rohan and Sully, E and of the Seigneurs of Parabel and la Boulay, Gouernors of Nyort and Foutenay: the Duke of Sully testifying in the name of all the Province of high and base Poictou, that his Maieesty might rest assured that he had none there but good and faithfull seruants: That what had past was to their great griefe, and that for his part he had done his best endeauour to hinder the spoiles made by troops, and the great liberty of souldiers, which did molest the subiects, and annoy the country. The Earle of Roche-faucault was then made Lieutenant Generall for the King, and Gouernour of Poictiers.

The Maior and Magistrates of Rochel sent certaine Deputies thither, to make offer vnto his Maieesty both of the keyes of the towne, and of their hearts, affection, and seruice; F which did so content the King and Queene, as thereby they tooke occasion to hope for a good and durable peace for France: for at their Maiesties presence in an instant, all those troops which the Marquis of Bonniuet had in Poictou, did melt away like snow against the Sunne.

During their Maiesties stay at Poictiers, Francis of Bourbon Prince of Country died at Paris in his Abby of Saint German de Pres: his long sickness had taken from him all desire to liue any longer, enduring such continuall paines in his body. The princeesse his wife being absent from him, was in continuall care for his languishing infirmity, so as he could

Death of the Prince of Country at Paris.

1614

A not rest but in feare, still apprehending the houre when she should heare of her husbands death: who dying the third of August, posts were presently sent to aduertise the Princeesse his wife, which newes she receiued two dayes after being in her Chamber at Poictiers;
the heauinesse and melancholy she was in the day before, did preface this sinisterr accident, which being confirmed, she lamented the death of this good Prince with many teares and sighes. Their Maiesties being aduertised thereof were much grieved, and it gaue the houle of Guise a new occasion of mourning, to whom they were allied by their sisters marriage.

The King hauing pacified all things in Poictou, and freed the Country of souldiers, there remained nothing but Britanie, where the affaires of the Province growing desperate, required his personall presence, for which effect their Maiesties parted from Poictiers to Angiers. The duke of Vendosme hauing some intelligence of his approach, he called all his troopes to Port Pelerin, which is betwene Chynon and Ancenis neere to Nantes vpon the riuer of Loire, vpon a pretext of a generall Muster; whither all his companies (being about 2000 foot) came, and the duke himselfe arriued soone after with some troopes of horse, who speaking to the Commanders & Captaines, he told them he would vaine and dismishe his troopes, commanding the souldiers to deliuer vp their Armes:
giuing to euery one a peece of money: And whereas they cryed out of the small recompence they had for assisting him, and that they were forty they were no more employed for his seruice: he answered them, that he had not taken armes but to prevent some reuolt C in Britany against his person, and to force the obedience due vnto him in that Country, and to haue the King serued vnder his commandements: and that seeing now it pleased his Maiesty to come thither in person to settle all things, and to command as absolute Master, there was no any further need of Armes; that there were no enemies but the enemies of his King, and therefore nothing to be feared where he should be: That he thanked them for their assistance, and intreated them earnestly to retire speedily, if they would not bee taken and hanged by the Kings people who approached, the which they did with such haste as in few dayes all were vanished out of sight.

Their Maiesties drawing neer to Nantes, the D. of Vendosme with all the Nobility he could draw together within the Country, came to meet him, where deliuering his sword D vnto the King, he craved pardon if any thing had past by this occasion in Britanie, contrary to his Maiesties pleasure; at which time the King receiued him very graciously, remit-ting all wherewith he might bee charged by reason of the leauing of souldiers, and the complaints of the Inhabitants of the Province, saying vnto him, Goe and continue in doing me good seruice, and I will loue you for ever as my brother. Whereupon the King gaue him new letters of reestablishment, and an abolition of all violences which had been committed in Britanie. After these assurances and acts of submission giuen vnto the King by the D. of Vendosme, their Maiesties came to Nantes, and caused an Assembly of the Estates of Britany to be held there, which he did many times honor with his presence, and also the D.
of Vendosme in his behalfe: where they treated of many things concerning the affaires of E the Prouinces. This Conuocation was very profitable and necessary for the Country, where the King redressed many grieuances, and granted most of their petitions.

Before the said Estates, the King sent his regiment to Blaut, with the Swisses and the regiment of Rambour, for that it was reported there was some resistance in that fort, but they found nothing but obedience, and all things yielded to the Kings seruice. It was restored to the Marquis of Coeuvre by the commandement which the Duke of Vendosme had giuen to him which kept the place: and for that the Inhabitants of the Country complained that the said Fort of Blaut (if there should be any war) might annoy the Prouince and be preiudiciall to the Kings subiects keeping them in awe: the King with the aduice of the Queene Regent and the Princes and Lords of his Councell, ordaine that the said Fort F of Blaut with diuers others in that Prouince, should be razed to the ground; for the effecting whereof the Swisses should remaine there, with the regiment of Rambour, and 12 souldiers out of euery company of the Guards. This done, their Maiesties parted from Nantes hauing settled the affaires of Britany, and returned to Paris, to giue order for the holding of the Generall Estates of France being assigned there.

In the meane time the Prince of Conde leues Cheateauroux, passeth into Poictou and came to Amboise, resolving to returne to Court, forgetting his discontent and the aduice of Poictiers, and giues assurance to their Maiesties, that he would be at Paris as soon as they.

they. The duke of Vendosme, after the Kings departure from Nantes, went before to Paris, to be at his wifes lying in, where hee arrived about the 8 of Sept. and stayed there untill the King made his entry into the City. The King having past by Angers, Mans, Chartres, and other good townes, being received with all the ioy and applaue which could be, came about the midde of September to Paris, where the Citizens received his Maiestie without the suburbs, being about 12000 foot, richly armed, and so hee was conducted to the City, where there were rare deuices at his entry, which for breuities sake I must omit. And about the end of September, the Prince of Conde arrived at Paris being accompanied with about 300 horse, where of some stayed in the suburbs of St. Germain, and the rest followed him fully, he entered by St. James Gate and went towards the Louure to salute their Maiesties: he mourned for the death of his vnkle the Prince of County: the Parisians were full of ioy to see this Prince reconciled to the King, which made them hope it would breed a peace of long continuance. Being vpon the new bridge, he was told the king was gone to Bois de Vincennes to hunt, which made him turne towards S. Anthonies gate, where he met the King, who seeing the Prince his cousin, caused his Caroch to stay, and gaue him place by him, being very glad to see him, and so they went on to the Louure, where having left his Maicity, he went to salute the Queene, and then retired to his house. Soone afterwards were the Funerals of the Prince of Cony in the Abbey Church of Saint Germain, with a pompe fit for the quality of his person. At which assisted the said Prince, with many Dukes, Prelates, Noblemen, and great Ladies, with the Courts of Parliament and Accounts, and many others.

During this month of September, there was an Assembly of the Parisians in the Bishops palace, where there assisted many Burgesses and others of good quality, vpon the election of the deputies of the said City, to present the peoples complaints vnto the next Assembly of the generall Estates. The day being come, there was some dispute among the Burgesses, touching the said Election, so as some departed out of the Hall and went their way, but in the end all was pacified and concluded to content, where they made choice of men which were worthy and capable of such places.

Before the Assembly of the generall Estates, it was concluded in Council, by the aduice of the Queen Regent, the Princes of the blood, and of all the other Princes and Noblemen D and Officers of the Crowne, to haue the King declared of full age, according to a fundamentall Law made by King Charles the fifth furnished the Wife, and verified by the Court of Parliament; by the which it was ordained, that the Kings of France having attained the full age of thirteene yeares, and entering into the fourteenth, they should take vpon them the soueraigne government of the State: whereof they gaue notice to the Court of Parliament that this royal action should be celebrated at the Palace in the golden chamber, where they prepared to receive their King a Maior, as they had accustomed to doe in the like solemnity. The day for the solemnizing of this act, was appointed on the 2 of Octob. but the day before he caused a declaration to be made in the presence of the dukes and Lords of his Council, for confirmation of the Edicts of pacification, against Duells, E combats, and encounters: A prohibition for all his subiects, to enter into any Leagues and Affociations both within and without the Realme, and for his Officers and pensioners, to receive any wages or pension from any one but himselfe, forbidding all swearing and blasphemy, with an intent to haue this Declaration verified the next day in Court, as the first act of his Maority, he sitting in his seat of Iustice.

The next day all things being prepared at the Palace, and the Regiment of the Guards placed on either side the street from the Louure vnto the Palace: The Lord Chancellor being followed by many Councillors and Masters of Requests, went vnto the Palace, and were receiued by some Councillors in their robes, deputed to that end, who conducted them into the golden Chamber.

Afterward the Queen arrived, being followed by the yong Ladies her daughters, Queen Margaret and other Princelsses and great Ladies; then the Cardinals of Rochefaucault, Perron, and Bonifi, came to assist at this Ceremony, as Peeres of France, according to the Kings command. About tenne of the clocke, his Maiestie went vnto the Palace, before him there marched his Company of light horse, the Archers of his Guards, and the Swisses; then came his Maiestie richly attired, being followed by the Duke of Aniou his brother, the Prince of Conde, the Earle of Soissons, the Dukes of Guise, Elbeuf, Elpernon.

A non, Vantadour, and Montbazou, and seuen or eight hundred Noblemen and Gentlemen, richly attired. Being come into the Chamber, euery one tooke his place according to his qualitie and the order prescribed him: being all set, the King who was vnder a rich cloth of Estate, beganne to shew himselfe vnto his Court of Parliament, and to speake these words.

My masters: being by the grace of God come to the age of my Maority, I thought good to come into this place, to let you vnderstand, that being of capable yeares as I am, I meane to gouerne my Realme by good counsell, with piety and iustice: I attend from all my subiects the respect and obedience which is due vnto the Soueraigne power and Royall authority which God hath giuen me: They must also expect from me the protection and fauour which they may attend from a good King, who aboue all things affects their good and tranquility. You shall vnderstand my pleasure more amply by my Chancellor.

His Maiestie hauing thus spoken, the Lord Chancellor made an eloquent Oration vpon the subiect of the Kings maority, shewing them how much France was bound to thanke God, that during his Maiesties minoritie it had enioyed a sweet and happy peace, vnder the glorious and royall command of the Queene his mother, who by her great wisdom had conducted all things to a happie end, during the time of her Regency, of which charge he had so worthily acquitted her selfe, to the Kings honor, her owne glory, and the contentment of his subiects, as France will for euer yeeld her the praises due to her incomparable vertues.

After this, the Queene rising from her seat, and aduancing towards the King, she made a short speech, saying, That she deliuered into his Maiesties hands the reines of his Empire, desiring him, together with the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, to haue for euer in remembrance, the care which he had taken in the administration of the publike affaires of the Realme. After which, the King did rise from his royall Throne, and marching two or three steps towards the Queene with his cap in his hand, he said: Madam, I thank you for the great paines you haue taken for me; I pray you continue to gouerne and command as you haue done heretofore: I will and meane that you be obeyed in all things, and that in my absence you be the chiefe of my Council. This being ended, Monsieur de Verdun the first President, made a long and learned Oration touching the maoritie of the Kings of France, whereby he gaue much content to that noble assistance. After whom followed Monsieur Seruin, the Kings Aduocate generall, whose rare inuention vpon that subiect, rauished that royall Assembly with admiration. These speeches being ended, there followed a Decree of the Kings Maoritie, with the aduice of the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, Councillors of State, Prelates, and other persons of qualitie, which were there present, the which was prouounced by the Chancellor: And then the Declaration made the day before in Council (as you haue heard) was verified by the Court, the King sitting in his seat of iustice. After all which, the King returned to the Louure.

Within few dayes after, the Dukes of Neuers, Sully, and Rohan, came to Paris with their ordinary traines, and the Deputies of Prouinces arrived daily, according to his Maiesties Letters sent throughout all the Governments of his Realme, to appeare at the generall Assembly of the Estates, which should be soone after held in the Augustins Conuent. But before we enter into it, we will make mention of a memorable structure or building which was this yeare concluded of.

The King and Queene his mother, continuing the desire which the deceased King had for the beautifying and enriching of his Citie of Paris, and hauing beene aduertised that he held it necessary for the ease of the other bridges, and the beautifying of the City, that there should be a bridge built to passe the riuer of Sein from the Tournelle to Saint Paul, they receiued the propositions of diuers persons which would undertake the worke vpon certain conditions. Among all which, finding none more profitable then those of Christopher Marie, a Burgesse of Paris, hauing had the aduice of the Treasurers of France, and of the Prouost of Merchants, and Sherifffes, there passed a contract on the 19 of April this yeare, betwene his Maiesties Commissioners, and the said Marie, vpon diuers Articles: And vpon the 11 of October the King and the Queen his mother laid the first stone of the said bridge.

By the first Article concluded at Saint Manchould, the Generall Estates were to be held at Sens, and the day was appointed on the tenth of September. But the King and the Queene his Mother, being forced to goe to Poitiers, and into Britanie, in the moneths A of July, August, and September, it was deferred vnto the tenth of October following.

The King hauing performed the first Act of his Maioritie in Parliament, and the greatest part of the Deputies of the three Estates of France, being come to Paris, his Maiestie on the 13 of October caused it to be proclaimed, that his pleasure was, the Assembly of the three Estates should be held at Paris, and not at Sens: And that the Deputies which were arrived, should assemble themselves; the Clergie at the Augustins: The Nobilitie at the Franciscan Priests; and the third Estate at the Towne-House. But after their first meeting, the Nobilitie and Commons befought the King (to the end the three Houses might more easily conuerse together, to suffer them to hold their assemblies in the two other Halls of the Augustins, that they might be neere vnto the Clergie, where the three Houses in the beginning sent their Deputies to salute one another according to their vsuall custome.

The Presidents

Orders chosen.

The day of the Overture of the Estates, they made choice of their Presidents. For the Clergie (as Malingre writes) was chosen the Cardinal of Ioyeuse, Deane of the sacred Colledge of Cardinals, Archbishop of Rouen, and Primate of Normandie; Mercure affirms, that the Cardinal of Sourdis, Archbishop of Bourdeaux, was elected to that place. For the Nobilitie they made choice of Henry de Beaumont Baron of Sennecey, Gouernour of the Towne and Castle of Aulonne; and Robert Mirou Councillor of State to the King, President of Requests in his Court of Parliament: and the Prouost of Merchants for the Citie of Paris, was chosen President in this Assembly for the Commons. I will not trouble the Reader with the names of the Deputies, nor the places from whence they were sent, being in all about 470. Whilst the Chambers for the three said Orders, were by the Kings commandment making ready, they also prepared Bourbon House, for the King, Queene, Princes of the blood, and other Princes, Lords and Officers of the House and Crowne of France, to receive the Orations, Complaints and Grievances, and to resolve thereon with the aduice of the Lords of his Councell. In the Hall of this house where the King should sit, there were scaffolds built, & none were suffered to enter there during the Kings sitting but such as were qualified.

The beginning of the assembly of the Estates.

The Estates began the 27 of October; And the Deputies being all in the said Hall, according to their ranks and qualities: the King being in his Royall Throne, assisted by the Queene his Mother, and Monsieur his Brother, by the Princes of the Blood; and other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Cardinals, Prelates, and other Officers of the Crowne, Councillors of State, Secretaries, and Masters of Requests of the Kings House, eury one being set according to his degree; His Maiestie beginning to speake, said, That hee had not desired the Conuocation of the Generall Estates, and an assembly of all the Orders of his Realme, but to reforme the abuses and disorders which time had bred in all sorts of men: That he would ease his people, as much as possibly hee could, and that his will should be more amply declared vnto them by the mouth of his Chancellor.

The Kings
Speech to the Estates.

The Lord Chancellor making a speech which was much commended and admired by the Royall and noble Assembly. He gaue them to vnderstand how much their Maiesties had been grieved for the abuses, disorders, and corruptions which they had found, were crept into all the orders of the Realme. And that now they were much pleased to see so many good men assembled in that place, ready and disposed to take paines to discouer vnto him who is the onely Physician of France vnder God) the miseries and most dangerous maladies of the Estate: That they should expect from his Maiestie all that good which naturall subjects may attend and hope for of a good King, who loues and affects the quiet of his people: wherefore his Maiesty for his part, did attend from them all assistance and fidelitie, who being charged with the complaints and grievances of the people, they should represent them with all libertie; but especially with all purity and equity of conscience, as the charge of their deputation required, being chosen to propound the good and the ease of the people. Whereupon the Deputies of the three Orders, in presence of his Maiestie, and that Noble assembly, made their answers, protesting by their feuerall Orations (which for breuitie sake I omit) that they would neuer aime at any other end, then the dignity of the Realme, the good and quiet of the Estate, & the ease of the people.

The Deputies
labour to abolish the Sale of Officers.

After this assembly at Bourbon House, whereas all the said Deputies tooke a solemne Oath to performe all that did belong vnto their duties and charges: They then began to labour

1614

A labour seriously about their instructions; and the first thing which was resolved by all the three Orders, was the abolition of the sale of Offices of Indicature, and others which tend to the oppression and ruine of the people. In the beginning there were some of opinion; that the Sale of Offices of Iustice (which they vse in France) was not so prejudiciall & dangerous, as the common sort did beleue, and many reasons and arguments were produced on either side: but notwithstanding hauing been concluded in the end of November by the three Chambers of the Estates, that the Sale of Offices should be abolished, by reason of the vexations of the subject which grew thereby. The remonstrances hauing bin made at Bourbon House: his Maiesties pleasure was, that the said Sale of Offices shal be extinguished, according to that which was required by the generall instructions of the three Orders; so as some new Impositions of money might be laid vpon salt and the Aydes; whereunto the third Estate opposed, saying that then this Sale should be abolished at the poore peoples charge, who should receiue discommoditie without any profit: Whereupon they drew a Petition, which all the chiefe of the Deputies did signe, which was presented vnto the King by Monsieur Philbert Lieutenant General of Bloys in this manner:

The Petition of the Commons.

Sire: Your most humble and most obedient subjects, the Deputies of the third Estate of France, hauing had an aduertisement of some new leauiques, and Imposts, as well vpon the Salt, as the Aydes; wherewith they propound vnto your Maiestie to ouercharge this Order, to extinguish the Sale of Offices required by all our instructions; and also to pay the Deputies of the other orders, contrarie to the accustomed formes; they hold themselves bound by the duties of their places and deputations, to make their humble remonstrances vnto your Maiestie touching this subject, wherein if they should file, they should not onely abandon them which rely vpon their trust, and haue committed their interest vnto them; but also violate the faith which all do owe vnto your Maiesties seruice, if they should dissemble the notable preiudice you should receiue therein, by the alteration of the hearts and affection of your people, who without doubt would impatiently beare it (their miseries and calamities being already extreme and lamentable) If they should reape by the assembly of the Estates, thornes in stead of fruit, and ease which hath been so often promised them. Your Maiestie may iudge, if you please, what hope of good there is, if the sale be extinguished at your poore peoples charge; & that they receiue great preiudice, without any present or sensible profit; there being nothing more true then that this order hath no more interest in the abolition then the rest, and yet for one Clergie man or Gentleman which sends to the Garniers for Salt, there are 2000. of the Commons which furnish themselves there, so as they may iustly thinke they are ouer-charged and oppressed in this assembly, for the benefit and contentment of the other orders, although they may glory, that they haue contributed as much zeale and affection as the others in all occasions for your Maiesties seruice, and the peace & tranquillitie of the Realme. But (Sir) there is a meanes to recompence your casuall Parties, full of Iustice, vpon the demands which the three orders haue commonly made, so as no man shall haue cause to complaine.

It is the taking away of excessive pensions, granted to men of all orders, conditions, and qualities, to the great oppression of your People, the wasting of your Treasure, and discontent of many of your Subjects, who thinke themselves lesse bound to your Maiesties seruice, seeing the affection and fidelitie of others, better rewarded then theirs. There are other lawfull meanes of husbandrie and sparing, represented by the generall instructions, whereby your Maiestie may draw great summes of money, the which shall not be bathed in the Teares of your poore people, whose Deputies thinke they cannot returne with honour and safety into their Prominces, if they carrie not backe sufficient Testimonie, to witness that the overcharging of this order (which it seemes some seeke of purpose) hath not hapned by the fault and negligence of the said Deputies. They most humbly beseech you, that as the Kings your Predecessors haue alwaies by their bounty & iustice taken in good part, the remonstrances and complaints of their Subjects, yea, and their opposition to the Execution of their Edicts and Declarations obtained by surprize, it would also please your Maiestie to accept of this most humble Petition, with the opposition of the said Deputies: Not to the Execution of your will & pleasure, who haue not yet ordained the said new leauiques, but to the reception & allowance of the aduice which is given you, & that vpon the said opposition the ouertures may be received, as prejudiciall to your Maiesties seruice, & tending to the oppression of your people: that it may be lawfull for your Deputies 1614 " to have their petition entred into your Councell booke, and that they may haue an Act thereof, to serue them as a discharge and iustificacion, not onely with the Townes & communities which haue sent them, but also with your Maiestie, who shall find by the euents, that you haue not in this Assembly, nor euer shall haue more, faithfull seruants and subiects, then those (who hauing caried themselues courageously, for the preseruacion of your sacred person and authority) endeavour to continue the hearts and loue of your people, who will continually pray for your Muiesties greatnesse and prosperitie.

His Maiestie hauing heard their petition, made answere in these words. I will ease my people as much as possibly I may: I haue vnderstood you well, and will conferre with the Queene my mother and Councell, Whereupon the Queene said vnto the Deputies, that they were much incommodated, might take their charges, and retire themselues. Presently after in fauour of the said petition, the King made a declaration for the ease of his people. This Petition was presented at the conclusion of the Estates.

A Combat of two souldiers.

Whilst they were labouring in the generall Estates for the good of France, the Duels were reuiued, not onely among Noblemen and Gentlemen, but also among priuate souldiers and others, so as in this month of Nouember, two yonger brethren of the regiment of the guards, hauing had some dispute in their Corps de guard, they went presently to the field to decide their quarrell by the sword, who being not releued soone enough by some of their fellow souldiers which followed them, the one of them was slain by his companions, which being done in the iurisdiction of the Abbey of Saint Germain de Pres, the Bailiffe of the said place came thither with his Sergeants, and tooke vp the dead body, and wrested him that had slaine his fellow out of the hands of certaine souldiers, carying both him and the dead body vnto prison.

The Duke of Espernon hearing hereof, and that the two souldiers had not bene deliuered to the Prouost of the Guards as to their ordinary Iudge, hee resolved the next day to cause him to be deliuered into his hands; giuing charge to the Marquis of Lauallette his sonne, to take the two companies (which should that day goe out of Guard) and to march to the suburbs of Saint Germaine, and make them deliuer the prisoner and the dead body willingly or by force. Being there, they went to the Bailiffes lodging, who being absent, they commanded the Laylor to deliuer them, but he refusing it, they forced the prison and tooke them away, carying them to the suburbs of Saint Marcell. At the same instant the Bailiffe of Saint Germaine went to the Court of Parliament, to complaine of the affront which had bene done him by the Duke of Espernon, saying they had forced his prison, and therefore he required Iustice.

The Parliament incensed against the Duke of Espernon.

The Duke of Espernon being informed that the Court of Parliament would take notice of this businesse, hee came in the afternoone accompanied with many Noblemen to the Palace, to giue an account vnto the Court of that which had past. Being entered into the great Hall, there were some insolencies committed by the Gentlemen of the Dukes traine, the which hauing much troubled the Parliament, considering the reuerence and respect which is due vnto that place: The Court meant to take information thereof, and to lay the fault vpon the Duke of Espernon: being ready to informe against him, aswell for that which concerned the fact committed in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, as for the insolencies done in the Palace. To pacifie all this, the Duke of Espernon had recourse vnto the King, and obtained of his Maiestie a letter vnder his signet, directed to the Parliament, by the which they were enioyned to surcease for two daies, aswell for that which had bene done in the suburbs, as in the Palace. The letters were brought into the Court by Mons^r de Pralin, the 24 of Nouember, whereunto obeying, it was ordained that day in Parliament; That the Court (hauing received the Kings letter of Signet, brought by the said Mons^r de Pralin, obeying his Maiestie) had decreed to surcease for two daies to determine of that which had past in the suburbs of Saint Germain, and of the rest which followed; and they humbly besought his Maiestie to consider that they could not doe iustice to priuate persons, if it were not done to them for a contempt committed against his Maiesties authority.

The Saturday following being the 29 of Nouember, the Duke of Espernon came to the Parliament with the Duke of Ventadour, being sent expressly by his Maiestie to assist the said Duke, who informed the Court, that the King was very well pleased with that which had bene done in this action: That he thanked the company, and would thanke them

A them more when the Court should depute any to goe to his Maiestie: That the Court had bound him vnto them, (if Subiects may binde their Prince) and that the Duke of Espernon should come presently to make his excuse, and reparation; that in regard of the place which is due vnto him, the King for certaine considerations thought it good, that he should haue the place of Duke and Peere.

The Duke of Espernon said: My Masters, I did not thinke my actions should haue bene mis-construct, hauing so long serued Kings, especially hauing had the honour to be thirtie yeares of this bodie, which is the greatest and most illustrious of the Realme: I came the day after, that which had past in the Suburbs of Saint Germain, to satisfie this companie, which I found not assembled, so as I could not effect my designe: And since I haue endeouored to come twice, and would haue come sooner, if I had not thought the companie would haue taken it in ill part. I most humbly beseech it to beleeue, that knowing the honour and respect which I owe it, being of my age, and growne gray in the seruice of Kings, that I would now haue any other intent: You know that after that calamitie which hapned, that seemed to threaten France, I alone of my qualitie came to offer my seruice to this companie. As for the two last actions, the first I leaue to the Kings Censure: And for the second, if you haue conceiued any bad opinion, I humbly beseech you to forget it. And if any one findes my stile somewhat rude for the delicate eares of the companie, I humbly intreat you to excuse a poore Captaine of Footmen, who hath alwayes endeouored rather to doe well, then to speake eloquently, and to beleeue that to maintain the honour of this companie, I would employ my blood and life.

Whereupon the first President said vnto him: seeing it hath pleased the King to impart his grace and fauour vnto you, vsing his mildnesse and Clemencie like vnto his Predcessors, hauing commanded this Companie, as well by his Letters, as his owne mouth, to receiue your excuses and satisfactions. The Court censuring fauourably of the actions of an Officer of the Crowne, Duke and Peere of France, of the Age, Qualitie, Valour, and Merits that you are. Touching that which hath past in the Suburbs of S. Germaine, and at the Palace, hath receiued and willingly allowed (by the Kings expresse commandement) of your satisfactions, and will alwaies be mindfull of your seruices, hoping that hauing done seruice to the King, you and your posteritie will hereafter yeeld the same as yee ought to Iustice and the Lawes: And the Court doth forget for this respect wharfoeuer hath past of importance, that may concerne you. And by the same Decree it was ordained that the Prisoner should be sent backe to the Prison of S. Germaine, which was done: where hee continued long; but in the end at the suite of the Duchesse of Vantadour, he escaped, not without great difficultie.

The Ecclesiasticall Order, vpon the report of so many Duels made in the face of the Loure, and of the Estates, resolved to make their complaint vnto the King by their Deputies, to the end there might be an exact obseruation of the Edicts made against them. The Charge whereof was giuen to the Bishop of Montpellier, who hauing audience of their Maiesties, deliuered this Speech. The Prelates and Clergie your most humble Subiects, assembled in this Towne by your authoritie, come to complaine of the publicke scandal of Duels, which doe miserably blenish the honour of your Realme, doubting not but this mischiefe doth touch the hearts of the other Orders, or rather that France mourning, laments the losse of her worthiest children. But these complaints doe more properly belong to the lips of the Clergie; who seeing that whilest the French powre forth their most generous blood in quarrels, the soules committed to their charge goe downe to Hell: And that they haue not bene so dearly redeemed by the blood of the Innocent, to be so fatally spilt in Duels with the guiltie. We know well that this fury is inspired by him who is called in holy Scripture a Murderer from the beginning, who maliciously makes the Image of Honour to shine in these barbarous actions, vpon which the French Nobilitie do naturally commit Idolatry, to raise it to credit, as he doth vpon Altars polluted with murder and blood, to receiue in sacrifice their bodies and soules.

Many Nations are curled and to be lamented in this preiudiciall action to France, shame, full to Nature, contrary to God, and doth dangerously charge your Maiesties conscience. First of all, France is wondrously weakened by this excess: and as the great losse of blood quencheth the vigour of the bodie, makes the visage pale, and the functions of Nature slow and languishing: so Duels which spill so much Noble blood, weaken this

„ this Estate, deface the liuely colours of her face and beauty : and this weaknesse may A „ giue great advantages to our enemies. To say that this action is an exercise of Valour, „ which may forſeife it in making of Souldiers, or that the reparation of an iniurie cannot „ be done but by Armes, without a blemish to him that is wronged; it doth contradiēt the „ iudgement of Henry the Great your Father, whose memorie shall bee blessed in all Ages, „ who by his Armes and infinite Victories had purchased the title of the true Iudge and so-„ ueraigne Arbitrator of Honour; who by his Sacred Edicts, declared those actions contra-„ rie to true Honour, whereof he detested the use, as a Brutish fury. In truth the action is „ neither glorious, nor worthy of Honour, which the violence of a passion may draw from „ the most fearefull. All France is equally generous, seeing wee see no man refuse the B „ Combat: We cannot say that it is an infallible mark of Honour, being so common to „ all. But as Metals haue some things which resemble them; so vertues haue vices which „ counterfeit them. The vertue of Valour being properly a settled temper of a iudicious „ spirit, alwaies equall and vniforme, which takes time to look into dangers without pertur„ bation, and condemnes them, or surmounts them by some designe worthy of commenda„ tion, the which shall neuer belong to the blind and vncertaine actions of Duels, which we „ may call a transport of fury. Wee cannot thinke of the fearefull accidents which accom„ pany this madnesse, and not detest it; neither can wee speake of seconds without trem„ bling, and curse the time wherein they are borne, seeing it makes vs see so many Mon„ sters. No friendship hereafter can be so safe and holy among the French, (which vertue C „ vnitheth and bindeth with an honourable cymment) but before they are aware, they shall „ finde themselves ingaged in this mischief: for being inuited by the principals of the „ quarrell, the one on the one side, the other on the other, the friend must kill his friend who „ hath neuer offended him. It serueth to no purpose to bee modest in words, temperate in „ actions, courteous to all men, faithfull to his Prince, and exceeding vertuous, if freeing „ himselfe from the subiect of all quarrells, he must haue a share in other mens. I would here
 „ be silent, to heare Nature speake, who complains that the French confound the condition „ of Friends, with that of Enemies, and breake the sacred bond of friendship, and humane „ societie, which the most barbarous Nations honour with some religious respect. But it is „ not Nature alone which complains, Heauen also thunders ouer our heads: And we that D „ are especially ordained to expound his Word, denounce vnto your Maiestie his wrath, by „ reason of this crime, which continueth before your face, before that of all the Orders of „ your Estate, and in the sight of heauen and earth.

„ The blood which was found in all the Cisternes of Egypt, into which the Waters of „ Nilus were changed, was not only the first of the ten plagues wherewith the Realme was „ afflicted, but a preſage of the ſubſequent. And we feare that this blood ſpilt in ſo many „ parts of France, which pollutes most of the Noble Families, with murders and punish„ ments, will not onely bee a dangerous wound vnto your Estate, but also a fearefull „ threat of the heauens bloodie rods. Pithagoras drew certaine Letters and Characters „ vpon a Looking-Glasse with humane blood, the which appeared presently in the bodie E
 „ of the Moone. It is more certaine that what ſwords write here below with blood pow„ ered out in Duels, appeares in heauen, which growes red with wrath, and will doubleſſe „ reuenge this barbariſme. If your Maieſtie, aſſiſted with the Councell of the Queene your „ Mother, of incomparable wiſedome and pietie, doe not prevent this miſchief by ſome „ ſubſtantiall remedie worthy of the moſt Chriſtian King and eldeſt ſonne of the Church.
 „ It doth much offend God, to ſee his workes deſaced which haue coſt ſo deare, and the „ ſoules to be carried away, for the which he hath made ſuch tryals of his power, & ſhewed „ ſo many miracles of his loue: And it grieues him to ſee them loſt with the blood of men:
 „ and the rather, for that in his being ſhed, he hath firſt conſecrated the diuine myſteries of

„ All theſe complaints are not onely addreſſed vnto the eares, but alſo vnto the conſci-„ ence of your Maieſtie, whom God hath here eſtabliſhed to command, hee is a free and „ liberrall diſpenſer of his graces, but he requires a ſtriſt account. You are ſeated in your Fa„ thers Throne, but he that giues Kingdomes, doth make you anſwerable (with thoſe „ which aſſiſt you) for the good of your Subiects. We doubt not of your Maieſties holy in-

A ſhould hold our peace. They haue not onely paſt all bounds of ſtate, but of ſhame like-„ wiſe: They make a triumphant ſhew hereof both about, and within this Citie of Pa- „ ris, in view of the Louure, with a ſhew of warrantize, and they ſeeme to bee lawfull for „ that they are become publique.

I beſeech your Maieſtie conſider of how many euils you make your ſelfe guiltie, al„ though that your age ſeemes to fauour your innocencie. The people haue not onely tranſ-„ ferred their common rights into their Kings perſon; but alſo their publique faults, when „ they are diſſembled or ſuſſered. Wherefore God who doth often reuenge the Princes ini„ quitie vpon the Subiects; ſo doth hee ſometime puniſh the Prince for the crimes of his „ Realme. I beſeech you thinke that you are borne to ſaue the people made ſubiect to the ob„ edience of your Scepter, euen when as they ſecke to loſe themſelves; if you abandon „ them, and France be goared in her owne blood, ſhee will ſoone bee abominable before „ God, and be viſited in his wrath. Showers of blood haue preſaged horrible calamities „ where they haue ſalne, we muſt apprehend the like during your raigne, if your Maieſtie do „ not cauſe theſe abominable Duels to ceaſe, which produce ſtreames of blood. I beſeech
 „ you repreſent vnto your ſelfe the Soule of Henry the Great your Father, who beholdeth „ theſe diſorders from the higheſt heauens: for if any thing would trouble the reſt of the „ bleſſed, without doubt this furie would alter his felicitie. God gaue vs him as a laſper „ Stone, to ſtanch the blood which flowed from Ciuill Warres; and ſeeing that Duels drew „ C it in a full peace from this bodie to weaken it. He made rigorous Edicts, to prevent this „ miſchief, and confirmed it by the ceremonie of a ſolemne vow. What can his thoughts
 „ be, ſeeing France which he hath ſaued and crowned with his victories, to become madde „ againſt it ſelfe; deuouring her owne children: wee muſt beleue that they diſpleaſe you,
 „ and them which aſſiſt you with counsell: but you muſt make it knowne to all France, that „ this crime is not onely condemned in the Louure, but condemned, ſetting honour at liber-„ tie which remains captiue in the Center of this brutiſh paſſion. Honour, which is the „ recompence of vertue, is by this meanes become the portion of barbariſme: I beſeech
 „ your Maieſtie arme your Arme which is your Juſtice, with the rigor of Ordinances both „ Diuine and Humane, to the end this Monſter may be encountered both from heauen and „ D earth: if your Subiects herein violate your Edicts, doe not you violate them: if they for„ get your reſtraints, remember the puniſhments; for in theſe deſperate diſeaſes, it is an „ extreame crueltie to be pitifull.

The Prelates and others of the Clergie (preſt by their duties) could not be ſilent, but it „ makes them to complaine againſt this ſcandall, which loſeth ſo many ſoules, and diawes „ vpon our heads the wrath of God. And for the diſcharge of their conſciences, they deſire
 „ that it may be written in the eternall memorie of France, that hauing foreſcene a dange„ rous tempeſt approaching, they haue giuen warning vnto the people: and ſeeing God „ greatly offended, they haue made it knowne vnto your Maieſtie. They beſeech you to „ looke vpon this France weeping, which ſtretcheth out her armes vnto you, and conſpires
 „ E you to prepare ſome ſpedie antidote againſt this poiſon of Duels, which doth ſuffocate
 „ it. So many ſubiects as your Maieſtie ſhall ſaue by theſe remedies, ſo many immortal „ crownes will the ſet vpon your head. It will bring peace to Families, aſſurance to peace, „ force to France, conſolation to the Church, and ſoules to God, which will prolong „ and bleſſe your daies, making your raigne to flouriſh, equall to your zeale and royall „ pietie.

The King and Queene heard this Prelates ſpeech with great attention; to whom the „ Chancellor made anſwer, that their Maieſties were very deſirous to employ all kinds of „ remedies to prevent the diſorders which they ſaw in Duels, and that they would take in „ good part all aduiſe ſhould be giuen them vpon this ſubiect; That beſides the deſeased „ Kings Edicts which were very ſtriēt; his Maieſtie had made another in the yeare 1613.
 „ (the which he deliuered vnto the Biſhop) ſaying, let your Order ſee it, that they may adde „ whatſoever they ſhall thinke neceſſarie, and giue their aduiſe thereon, the which their Ma-„ ieſtie will alwaies take in good part. After which the Clergie drew certain Articles touch„ ing that ſubiect, and preſented them vnto the King.

The Generall Eſtates laboured about their grieuances, and about the fifthenth of De„ cember, there was one Article which cauſed a great diſtraction, betwixt the Clergie and stance of this Article, concluded by the Commons being their first, was: That it should be declared by the said Estates, and set down as a fundamentall Law; That the King did not hold his Realme of any but of God & his sword, and that he is not subiect to any superior power vpon Earth for his temporal Estates; and that no booke should bee printed containing any doctrine against the Person of Kings, touching the question too much debated in these times, by men put vp with presumption and rashnesse, who make questions whether it be lawfull to kill Kings: which question shall be forbidden to propound, dispute, or write of. And if hereafter there bee any bookes found like vnto those which haue bin condemned by the Court of Parliament, the said bookes shall bee publicly burnt in destruction of such Writings, which may draw weake spirits to the like attempts, the sole approbation whereof is full of horror. And to prevent such damnable propositions, the whole order with the Author thereof should be punished and banished the Realme without hope of returne.

The Clergie being aduertised of this Article on the twentieth of December, and that it had past the House of Commons, without any contradiction, they conceived that the Commons had put their Sickle into their Haruest; that it was a case of conscience, which concerns faith and Religion; and that it was propounded by some persons that were desirous of innovations, and were not well grounded in the faith; whereupon they desired to haue that Article withdrawn, the which some which were of greatest credit amongst them undertooke, and to that end they sent the Archbishop of Aix, who came the same day to the House of Commons, and made a learned speech to this effect.

My Masters, although that we all tend to the publique good, yet these three Orders haue some particular ends, and we must not thinke it strange if they haue diuers apprehensions; for that their professions differ: but this difference should end in a good Harmonie, and come vnto the Kings cares in a pleasing tune. If there bee in the Articles of the Clergie any particularities concerning Iustice and the Treasure, it is not fit they should be concluded before they are imparted vnto you. And in like manner if in your Articles there be any propositions found which concerne the Church, it were requisite you should communicate them vnto vs. Truth is waiering, and Truth which was the Sonne of God, had need of the support of men: That hee being the Sonne of God did rely vpon the Church, and the Church vpon him. Iunice super dilectum suum. If the Son of God would make choise of this support, it is fit that priuate men should be tyed to the same Church, that they should bring all their Vowes vnto it, and depend immediately vpon it. You shall therefore communicate that vnto vs which you treat of concerning the Church. I inuite you vnto it, being not lawfull to remoue the Altars, nor to touch the foundation of the Church without vs. We are of the same Countrey, and the same Blood, and inclined to the same ends, Pietas ad omnia, and this Pietie should be so deare vnto vs, as we should not seeke to deforme this Ecclesiasticall bodie, lest wee make the Holy Ghost (who is the Author of peace) sad. The Proposition which I make vnto you is general; some few daies since, there was an Article presented vnto vs, which we haue reiected, for that it did not concerne vs: In like manner, if there be any Article among you which doth belong to vs, you ought to impart it.

After complements and thanks giuen, the President Miron made answer, that they vnderstood him not, and that they could not satisfie his proposition vntlesse hee did expaine himselfe more particularly. The same day it was resolved in the House, that the Clergie should be giuen to vnderstand, that the Commons had inserted nothing in their Articles concerning the Doctrine of the Church, and that if it had been so, they would haue acquainted them therewith: That touching the policie of the Church there had bin something treated of, and set downe in their Articles, and that it had been concluded not to communicate it vnto them, to auoid tediousnesse, to the which the King would make answer at his pleasure.

For the carying of which message vnto the Clergie, there were certaine Deputies chosen, and Monsieur de Marmiesse an Aduocate of the Parliament of Thoulouse was appointed to deliuer the Speech: who comming to the Clergie on the 22. of December, hauing made a learned Speech, he concluded, saying, That the King hauing called the three Estates of the Realme, had married the three Orders together, to bring forth felicity and happinesse to France. Discord falling among vs, hath sought in the beginning to stirre vp emula-

A Speech to the Clergie from the Commons.

A emulations, and enuies, and to diuine (by the difference of the qualities of the three Orders) those which were vnted by loue to labour for the common weale. You know that three small words spoken in the Chamber of the Nobilitie by the Deputies of our order, hath heretofore alienated their hearts and affections from vs, and busied all the three Chambers about a dispute of qualities, as much vnprofitable as preiudiciall to the State; and you know what difficultie you had to reconcile those two Orders. Wee must therefore auoid all occasions to fall into like disputes, be it with the Nobilitie, or with you; the which cannot bee auoided, if all the Articles bee communicated vnto the three Chambers. It is not for any desire we haue to insert into ours, any thing that shall bee bitter, or offensive: contrariwise we will exactly weigh the least words, to the end there may be nothing which may giue you iust offence. The dignitie of your Order, which exalts you above all others; the Characters imprinted by the hand of God vpon your exalted heads, which makes you to be reuerenced of all; and the ranke which the Prerogative of your Places, and the Dignitie of your Charges doe worthily giue you in France, commands our respect and honour towards you. If we finde in our consciences, and by the charge which we haue, that we are bound to require some reformation in your order, and not to speake against any in particular: we will doe as Plutarch saith they did in old time, which would demolish the Houses which were nere vnto their Temples: they suffered those parts to stand which were next adioyning, lest they should touch any thing which was Sacred: Or as the Eagle, who taking vp Ganimede, by the commandement of Iupiter, touched nothing but his clothes, lest hee should hurt this well beloued of the gods. Wee in like sort will vse so much discretion in the drawing of our Articles, which shall concerne this first and sacred order of the Church, as wee will neither wound the Church, nor her Ministers. We will only touch the Robes and exteriour actions of those who blemishing the beauty of this venerable body, may cause (with too much scandall) a shame vnto Religion, and a hearts grieft to all good French men, who desire to fee their Church in his Puritie, Honors, Prerogatiues, and Authoritie: And vpon this assurance we beseech you to allow of our resolution, to the which we haue not brought any thing but a pure and sincere affection.

The day following, the Bishop of Montpellier came to the House of Commons, and required communication of the said Article; and hauing made an eloquent discourse vpon that subiect, in the end he demanded why that order did not impart this proposition vnto them, and that they could not refuse the communication of the Article, to the end that all together might make one, the which should be set in letters of gold vpon the Front of their Remonstrances. But they must not mingle it with other propositions which are in question between France and her neighbours. That there were two powers, the one Temporall, the other Spirituall; that they sought to confound them, when as the one was deriued from the other. That both these authorities had but one Fountaine. That their orders should labour to entertaine concord, and reconcile these two powers, and doe as the Ancients did, who puld the Gaule out of the beasts which they sacrificed. That resolving vpon this business they should free their hearts from all thoughts of ialousie and emulation, and with writings full of mildnesse and peace, conspire ioyntly for the publique good; not only looking to that which is before their eyes, but (extending their thoughts further) consider of the consequence of many things, which in the beginning seeme plausible, and yet in the end will proue hurtfull. That this Article (as it was drawne) would cause a Schisme, and it may be, kindle a warre not onely in France, but throughout all Christendome. So it would be a rending of that Vesture without seame, which is so carefully to be kept whole. That this order ought not to be caried away with the first persuasions. That his purpose was not to plucke vp at once, that which was feared. That this order had not power to doe it, for that a melancholy spirit could not be so staid, if he were not inuited by the Author of the Church. That they must not thinke their order was able to hinder this pernicious designe, and that they must hope for the end from them. That they must referre affaires of so great importance concerning the life and preferuation of the King vnto vs.

The Commons hauing resolved to communicate the Article vnto the Clergie, the Seigneur de Marmiesse was presently sent with some other Deputies, to execute this resolution; who presenting the Article vnto the Clergie, made this speech: My Masters, we ſhall ſeek in vaine to preferue our priuate fortunes, if we ſuffer the publike to be loſt, A ſeeing the danger of priuate men cannot be auoided, but by the ſafety of the Generall. But with leſſe reaſon ſhall we endeavour for the ſafety of the State, if we be not careful to preferue the ſacred Maieſtie of Kings, which are the ſoule of States. There muſt bee ſo ſtriſt a bond from the particular to the Generall; and from the Generall to the King, as the vnion may be made in his ſacred Perſon; and that the other parties being tyed vnto it by the bond of reſpect and obedience, may maintaine and preferue themſelues in their being. The happineſſe of the Realme, and the fortunes of priuat men, are ſo vnited to the fortune of Kings, and God (of whom Monarchies are the handy-workes) hath ſo ſeared them, as no harme can come vnto them, but it drawes with it the loſſe of our Houſes, and B the ruine and ſubuerſion of the State; whereof we haue too many lamentable and vnfortunate examples.

The Deputies of the third eſtate (terrified with the remembrance of what is paſt, and ſeeking greater dangers which threaten them, if theſe parricides be not refrained, if they be not contained in the dutie of reſpect and reuerence due to Kings, theſe ſicke ſpirits, who (pre-occupied by falſe opinions, and troubled with vaine Illuſions) ſeek in the death of our Kings, Hell for themſelues, and miſerie for France) haue drawne an Article, the execution whereof (warranting the life of our Princes, from the ſnares which they lay for them) will maintaine (as they thinke) peace within the Realme.

We haue not acquainted you heretofore with this Article, no more then with the reſt C which we haue concluded, for the priuate reaſons which I deliuered vnto you ſome daies paſt. But ſeeing you deſire to ſee it, and that you haue ſummoned vs therunto by the Biſhop of Montpelier, we come to tell you, that as the walles of Iericho fell at the ſound of the Priests Trumpets, ſo we bow vnder the voice of that Reverend and learned Prelate; and being urged by his eloquent words, contrarie to our fiſt reſolutions, we offer vnto you the communication of this Article, whereof we bring you a Copy.

We will not diſcours vnto you on the ſubiect thereof, our Company hath forbidden vs, concealing that in ſo important a buſineſſe; in ſo reaſonable an action, and ſo profitable for the generall good of France, you will bee as well diſpoſed to recieue and fauour D our holy & commendable intentions, as we to diſcours vnto you of the occasions which moued vs to draw this Article, and the reaſons we haue to maintaine it. We will onely ſay vnto you, that in deliuering this Abſtract, we would imitate a ceremonie obſerued by the Ancients in their ſacrifices. They were accuſtomed to caſt the tongues of the Beaſts ſacrificed to their gods, into a purifying and no conſuming fire: euen ſo we as Deputies bring our vowes into this generall aſſembly for the good of France, that in dedicating our ſelues to the ſeruite of the Publike, we haue conſecrated vnto it both our hearts & tongues in giuing you this Article. Let vs caſt the tongues which haue dictated it into the Fire of this Deuotion; of this Charitie; of this ardent affection, which you haue for the good, glory, and peace of this Eſtate.

The affection then which you beare vnto the preſeruation of Kings, ſhall ſerue as a fire, E not to conſume, but to purifie theſe tongues. Nor to abrogate, (for you haue already promiſed by the mouth of the ſaid Biſhop that it was not your intention:) but to poliſh this Article; to the end that as gold caſt into the fire, (although it loſeth his forme, preferueth his ſubſtance) ſhewes more beautifull, more rich, and more poliſhed then it was before: euen ſo this Article coming out of your hands, without any change or alteration in the ſubſtance, would carry a command of greater authority, by reaſon of your adiunction, ſtronger imprecations, and ſeuerer puniſhments, then thoſe we haue ſet down, to containe every man in his dutie. This is all we haue to ſay vnto you in the behalfe of our aſſembly, who attend your reſolution touching this ſubiect.

In the beginning of the yeare the controuerſie reuiued, touching the Soueraignty of F the Kings of France which had continued about three weekes of the laſt yeare. On the ſecond of Ianuary the Cardinall of Perrou was deputed by the Clergie to the Houſe of Commons, touching the ſubiect of their fiſt Article, being accompanied by many Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and about 60. Gentlemen of the Chamber of the Nobilitie which were ſent to aſſiſt them. Being carried into their Chamber, by reaſon of his indiſpoſition. He began to ſpeake in the praife of Juſtice, and the government of the Church, concluding in the end that they ſhould continue vnited together for that which concerned

A ned the ſafety of the Kings life. And as for that which concerned the doctrine of the Church, the Article ſhould be wholly referred to the diſcretion of the Church, and in ſo doing that the third eſtate would reſt contented, that this Article ſhould bee taken out of their inſtructions.

Whereunto Preſident Miron made answer, concluding after this manner. I will aſſure you that this company neither hath, or euer will haue any intention to wound the Church in the reſolution of this Article, the which they cannot retract; neither yet to touch the holy Sea, nor enter into diſpute, touching the power of our Holy Father the Pope; that he hath all ſoueraignty but in ſpiritual things onely, and therefore out of our knowledge and iuriſdiction: And if his authoritie and obedience, which we acknowledge which all Chriſtians owe him in ſpiritual things (not excepting Kings) were loſt or called in queſtion, it ſhould be found as well fortified among vs, as in any one order. For he reſides the body of the Officers, and Soueraigne companies, alwayes found in faith: the which hath contributed much to the maintaining of the Church, as we will alwayes doe. But wee will haue a care to bring in this mixture of power, whiſpered by ſuch as ayme at nothing elſe but to diuide vs, and thereby to diſperſe vs, and in the end ruine the one by the other, whereof we haue but too many examples, whole wounds bleed yet among our neighbours. The intention of this Company hath been to maintaine the Independancy of our Kings Crowne, which cannot be juſtly taken from him by any power. That C his Holineſſe hath not this power; That the Church hath neuer pretended it: that thoſe which write the contrary, may be puniſhed as guilty of high Treason, by the ſecular Judge: intending not to make an Eccleſiaſtical Law of this propoſition, as appertaining not thereto, but a rule of Policy, which obligeth all the ſubiects of his Maieſtie of what profeſſion ſo euer. Yet notwithstanding if there be any words in our Article, which may giue you occaſion to ſuſpect, that wee goe about to meddle with the iuriſdiction of the Church, We declare that theſe words which ſeeme to containe this reproach, haue not bene inſerted, to aſſume vnto vs the power by our owne authoritie, to declare it damnable, or contrarie vnto Gods Word; but by relation onely. As a Father which inſtructs his children in that which he learned in a Sermon, cannot be accuſed to haue put himſelfe D into the Pulpit, or to take vpon him the Miniſters authoritie: So when we declare that to bee damnable, and contrarie to Gods Word, the which is contrarie to our Propoſition; wee vtter that which wee haue learned in the Decrees, Canons, and Statutes, which wee haue had from your ſelues, and which wee hold of the Church, to be held and kept by vs. When either of vs ſhall tranſgreſſe any of them, we abuſe them, and from hence comes our appellations as of abuſe, becauſe it is abuſe when a man tranſgreſſeth that which hee hath ſubmitted himſelfe vnto. It is not then by way of enterprize, nor by a preſumed power that wee doe this, but by obedience vnto the ſame Decrees, Canons, and Eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions, and by the executive and not ordinarie power of them. Wee conſtrain that to be obſerued, which was eſtabliſhed by your ſelues, betwene you and vs.

Our Article is not any more then a repetition of the ſame: and being good as the company reſolued to leave it in their inſtructions, what inconuenience is there to ſpeake it? and if there be none, what danger is there for all of vs to ſwear and aſſume it? and yet the ſubſtance of the Article remaining, if there bee any words which trouble you, ſetting downe in writing what you require of vs, I thinke wee ſhall agree together, without altering any thing of the ſubiect of the Article, and the company will all ſtrive to giue you contentment with the ſame ſhall obedience which they haue witnessed from the beginning of this Aſſembly, and the which they will alwayes ioine vnto the reſpect, honour, and ſeruite which they haue made, and doe againe make profeſſion to yeeld vnto you.

F Vnto this the Cardinall replied, that the Clergies intention was not to accuſe any of that company or others of ſlander. In the end he gaue thanks vnto the Preſident, and the third Eſtate in general; concluding, that it did not belong vnto them to interpret, reſolve and conclude, in the like caſes of doubtfull queſtions when they are offered. That it was incident vnto the Clergie, who are the Judges to determine them.

perious power, and that they might attempt against their Sacred Persons, whereby there might grow great inconueniences; the preuenture whereof was very necessary. They required that all former Edicts vpon that subiect might bee renued. Whereupon the Court, (all the Chambers being assembled) ordained that the Decrees made in the yeare 1561, and in the yeare 1594 and 95; and likewise in the yeare 1612, and 1614; should be kept and obserued according to their forme and tenour: forbidding all men of what condition to euer, to infringe them, vpon the paines contained in the same.

The Clergie
complaines of the Court of Parliament.

This Decree did much trouble the Clergie, as if they had attempted against their spiritual, and Ecclesiasticall power, vpon a consideration thought out of policy. Whereupon they resolted that the Cardinall of Sourdis, assisted by some Cardinals, Arch-bishops, Bishops, and other of the Clergie, should goe presently and make complaint to the King; for that the Parliament would limit and restrain the liberty of the States and meddle with affaires which were treated of by them, humbly beseeching his Maiestie to stay the course of the said propositions and Decrees. Which being done, the Cardinall du Perron taking vpon him to speake concerning the said Article and Decree, sought to perswade his Maiestie, that it did import his good and that of the State, to let this businesse no more talked of, and that all might bee suppressed and disallowed without any further question of any matter therein contained. The next day the King being in Councell to aduise how to suppress these differences, the Prince of Conde

The Prince of Conde
argued in your Councell these hundred years,
and worthy of your presence.
There is question of two points of most great consequence;
the one hath respect vnto Gods honour,
the other blissment of the Catholique,

and Romane Church;
the other, the safety and preseruacion
of your estates.

Sir, I thinke the businesse here present, is one of the most important that hath beene argued in your Councell these hundred years, and worthy of your presence. There is question of two points of most great consequence; the one hath respect vnto Gods honour, the other blissment of the Catholique, Apostolique, and Romane Church; the other, the safety and preseruacion of your estates.

Certainly, Sir, your Maiestie may rightly terme your selfe the greatest King in the world, who hold your Crowne but of God alone, before whom the more powerfull you are, the more you should bee submisse, being subiect to the Pope who is head of the Church in spiritual things. But in that which concerns your temporal, the subiection of your Subjects; the obedience which is due vnto you; and the sacred respect which they must yeeld to the preseruacion of the Lords Anointed; the spiritual power hath no command. That although you were an Hereticke or an Infidell, yet they owe you obedience in that which is merely temporall. So making a long discourse vpon the Ordinances which had beene made against the Popes enterprises, vpon the authoritie of the Kings of France; in the end he concluded, Lying, Sir, these reasons make me to admire the wisdom of your Parliament: who by the Testimony they giue you of their fidelity, binde you for euer and all France, to esteeme them faithfully, courageous, and incorruptible Magistrats, who are the true preseruers of holy Decrees, and from whom there proceedes nothing but Oracles of infallible truth. Magistrats who make you to bee reuerenced, seeing that your person alone in France, is exempt from their iurisdiction. I speake onely for the Kings interest; for I hope hee shall liue many ages, and Monsieur his brother in like manner, so as by a multitude of children wee shall see our selues assured of a seiled pace. Yet seeing that rough cures were neuer good, I am of opinion to forbid any further dispute of this question, in regard of the Clergie, and the third Estate, and to retire it to your selfe, suffering them to draw their Articles as they please; and whereas your Maiestie shall answer the remonstrances, we shall then see by your wisdom, our ancient Maximes confirmed. And for that the Clergie and the Nobilitie are concerned that the Decree of Parliament doth preiudice their libertie, I hold it fit your Maiestie should forbid the signing and publication thereof.

A Decree in Councell
touching the Article of the third Estate.

Whereupon there was soone after a Decree made in Councell, whereof the effect was, That the King hauing heard of the differences which had hapned in the Assembly of the three orders of the Estates of this Realme, touching an Article propounded by the house of Commons, & a Decree made by the Court of Parliament vpon that subiect, hauing heard the remonstrances of the Deputies of the Clergie & Nobility; His Maiestie being in Councell, assisted by the Queen his Mother, the Princes of the blood and other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crowne, & others of his counsell, for good & great considerations hath called in, and doth call in vnto himselfe the foresaid differences: hath surceased, and doth surcease the execution of all Decrees and deliberations which haue hapned thereupon. Doth expressly defend and forbid the said Estates, to enter in to any new deliberation vpon that matter, and vnto the said Court to take any iurisdiction or knowledge thereof, or to proceed to the signing and publication of that which had been decreed.

The Clergie seemed not well satisfied with this Decree, both for that it made mention of differences betweene the three orders of the State, (the Clergie and the Nobilitie concurring well together) as also for that they had no full answer to those points which they had propounded to the Councell. Whereupon they sent certaine Deputies to the Lord Chancellor, giuing him to vnderstand, That the Clergie could not in any sort proceede to any business before that his Maiestie had commanded the House of Commons to suppress the Article propounded by them, and presented to the Chambers: And forbidden the Court of Parliament, and other Soueraigne Companies, hereafter to enter into any deliberation concerning the doctrine of the Church, nor to iudge or determine vpon any Question depending thereon; As of the Popes authoritie, referring to himselfe in this last point to treat with his Holinesse, with the aduice of the Prelates of his Realme.

The Clergie hauing by their Deputies made a new Petition vnto the King touching these points. On the sixt of Ianuary his Maiestie sent the Marshall of Brisac vnto them to let them vnderstand; That to giue satisfaction vnto the complaint which they had made against a Decree of the Court of Parliament, the King had caused the Printer to bee committed to prison, for printing a Decree which had not beene signed. That touching the Article of which there had beene so much debate, the King had called it to himselfe to determine thereof with the aduice of the Clergie, and therefore the King had cancelled it: And that if the Clergie had drawne any Articles vpon that subiect, his Maiestie would be well pleased therewith. Touching the complaints which they had made against the Court of Parliament, they should let them in the front of their Bills, and his Maiestie promised to answer them fauorably. And whereas the Clergie desired to see a particular Estate of the Kings Reuenues, as the Nobilitie and Commons had in like manner done; his Maiestie was ready to send it vnto them, but his desire was they should make choise of a small number. Finally, the King intreated them to prepare the Bill of their Grieuances, to the end he might make answer thereunto, whereby the assembly might grow to an end, the continuance whereof held many mens mindes in suspence, and bred sinister opinions and apprehensions, the which it was expedient to suppress, to settle all things in peace and tranquillitie.

The Marshall
of Brisac sent to the Clergie.

I cannot insit vpon all which past touching the Article propounded by the Commons, nor make any ample relation of the Popes Brieves to the Clergie and Nobilitie, giuing them great thanks for the opposition they had made vnto the said Article, and intreating them to continue in their good zeale, hauing much other matter of importance to treat of. They were againe pressed by the Duke of Vantadour in his Maiesties name, to make haste to present their Grieuances, if it were but to free the Realme of the impatience it suffered by this long delay. Whereupon on the 30. of Ianuary the three Orders resolted by pluralitie of voices, to beseech his Maiestie; First, that the Princes and Officers of the Crowne should alone iudge of the answers which were to be made to their generall Grieuances. Secondly, that if his Maiestie desired that any other of his Councell should assist, that he should be intreated to giue a list of their names, and that five or sixe of the Estates might be named among them. Thirdly, that three or foure of the Deputies of either Chamber might assist in Councell, when the said answers should be resolted. Fourthly, that the Estates should not be dissolved, vntill after the said answers. And fifthly, that their Orations and thanks should not be made vntill after the said answers.

Demands of the three Estates.

Their Maiesties hauing been informed of this deliberation, made complaint vnto the Cardinall of Sourdis, saying, That they were innovations which could not be allowed; which being reported to the assembly, Cardinall du Perron being present, said, That in truth he found in the said demands many inconueniences & difficulties. Whereupon they all resolted to conform themselves to the Kings will, & to yeeld him all obedience; yet afterwards being moued by the Deputies of the Nobilitie, they ioyntly made a Petition againe vnto the King. That with the Princes and Officers of the Crowne there should be only fixe of the ancientest of the Councell to assist and to give their aduice touching the answers of their grievances; and secondly, that the Estates after the presentation thereof, might still assemble themselves until they had received their answers. Whereupon their Maiesties hauing given a fauourable Audience vnto the Deputies, made answer, That they were desirous and resolu'd to give all content vnto the Estates: But this could not be but vpon the deliuerie of their grievances, the which they desired might be speedily done, at the furthest by Thursday next. That after the said Presentation, and when as they should treat of the answers, if any occasion were offered why the Estates should meete, they would prouide for it.

This answer being deliuered to the three Chambers; in that of the Clergie some said; B That the Kings seruice, the good of his Estate, the necessitie of affaires, and the impossibilitie to resolu'e vpon their most important propositions (if the Estates did not assemble and assemble after the presentation) were strong reasons to moue them to make a third Petition to their Maiesties.

Discourses among the Clergie, touching the Kings answers.

But most of them considering, that they should but offend their Maiesties by importunitie, in asking farther instance vpon that subiect: That the Lords of the Councell said that the demand they made was of bad consequence, and that they would neuer aduise the King to grant it; That it was not fit the Estates (who should fortifie his Royall authoritie) should be an occasion to weaken it, yea although it were for an aduantage; which cannot bee of so great importance, as the least diminution of the royall authoritie. That the Estates should be very carefull, not to purchase to themselves any blame or reproach; especially the King being yong, it did infinitely import to fortifie his authoritie, and not to shake it. Many other reasons were deliuered to moue them to obey his Maiesties will. Whereupon the Clergie resolu'd to content themselves with the said answer, and to perswade the other Chambers to conforme themselves to their resolution, that hauing obeyed the Kings commandement, they might labour seriously to draw their demands into forme to be presented on Monday the 23 of February, the day which their Maiesties had prefixed for the conclusion of their Estates.

The Clergie demand the obseruation of the Councell of Trent.

On the 19. of February, the Bishop of Beauuais was deputed from the Clergie to the House of Commons, to intreat the company to ioyne with them in their demand vnto the King for the Councell of Trent, and the obseruation thereof. This Bishop made a long and learned discourse touching the said Councell, and in the end concludes, that it would please that order to ioyne with the Clergie in their demand vnto the King, for the publication of the Councell of Trent within this Realme.

The answer of President Miron.

President Miron answering his Speech, desired them to consider, that it was a thing neuer heard of in France, to haue a Councell published, how Oeconomically foue; nor is there any mention thereof in any Registers of Parliament. The true publication of Councels consists in the obseruation and execution thereof; as for example, many things contained in the Councell of Trent, are practised amongst vs, and yet not necessary to expresse the name; it being neither Trent, nor Basill, nor Constance which haue made the Councels, but the resolution of the Fathers which were there assembled.

We are of opinion (with your good fauours) that it is not now expedient to intangle our selues in that Question, whether the Councell of Trent should bee published or not. It is almost threefore yeares since this Councell was held, and hath remained in suspense since that time; that we hold Councels in France in forme of Decrees. To shew that the Councell of Trent, should not be receiued and published in France before any other, there haue bene many oppositions made by our Kings, Chapters, and Communitie of France; the discussion whereof deferred a second assembly of the Estates; and if my Masters of the Clergie would haue sent their reasons in writing in the beginning of the Estates, the business might haue been inferted; the which cannot bee now F done, our grievances being perfected, and ready to be presented vnto the King.

The diuersitie of times wherein we liue, imports a necessitie both to you and vs, to reiect the publication of this Councell, rather then to embrace it: yet my Masters may if they please submit themselves thereunto, in practising their resolutions, and cutting off pluralitie of Benefices, and reforming other abuses, for the which it doth prouide; humbly thanking them for the zeale they made shew of, to the increase of Catholique Religion: whereunto they like obedient children would willingly submit them-

The Clergie send a vnto the Commons

A themselves, whereof they should haue further assurance by their particular answer, which was, that the time was too short now to meddle with that Question.

Notwithstanding the Clergie sent againe to intreat the House of Commons to ioyne with them and the Nobilitie, touching the publication of the said Councell of Trent. The Article contained a demand of the said Councell, without prejudice to the Priuiledges and Liberties of the French Church; not the interest of the State, for the which his Maiestie should be intreated to moderate the said Councell. President Miron made answer vnto the Bishop of Beauuais; That the Company could not now receiue the said Councell. That they embraced the faith contained therein, yet could they not yeeld to that B which concerned the Government, for that it was preiudiciall to the interest of the State. That the Masters of the Clergie might obserue the said Councell among themselves, and give the first example, & that they which had two or three Benefices might quit them vnto them which had none, desiring the Clergie to allow of their reasons and excuses.

But before we come to the conclusion of the Estates, I will relate an accident, which bred an alteration betweene the Nobilitie and the Commons. In the first of Februarie, the Deputie for the Nobilitie of high Limosin hauing given the Bastina'de to the Lieutenant Vzerche, one of the Deputies of the House of Commons for base Limosin, there was a great rumor among the three Chambers. The Commons complained presently vnto the King, who sent the knowledge of this action vnto the Parliament. The Chamber C of the Nobilitie hearing of this complaint, they presently sent five Deputies to the Clergie to complaine likewise against the Commons: for that embracing the quarrell of a priuate man (a pretended Deputie of their Order) they would make it generally, and haue recourse vnto the King, without giuing aduice thereof vnto the other two orders, who (it may be) might haue found means to compound the difference, and give contentment to both parties. The Clergie hauing deputed the Bishop of Agon vnto the Commons vpon this complaint, to aduertise them that their Chamber had bene intreated by the Nobilitie to ioyne with them in a Petition which they would present vnto the King, that he would assume vnto himselfe, the knowledge of this difference, or send it to the Estates there to be compounded. Whereupon the commons deputed fixe of their or-

D der vnto the Clergie; the Lieutenant of Bloys deliuering the Speech, who said, That their Chamber intreated them to consider, that their quality and condition, & the foulenesse of the wrong done vnto one of their body (and no pretended deputie as they would haue him) could not permit them to depart from the course which they had taken. That being Deputies from all parts of the Kingdome, to seeke among other things the means to settle the authority of Iustice, it shall be a very shamefull and dangerous precedent if: so great an indignity, committed in sight of the Louure, in the Kings presence, and of the generall Estates in the Capitall Citie of the Realme, and in the face of the Parliament, should remaine unpunished, or disguised, by any accommodation or conuenience.

The Speech of the Deputy of the Commons, touching the quarrell.

That the crime was of that quality, as they neither could nor ought to haue recourse vnto E the Chambers for satisfaction, as in former alterations & combustions, where there was no question but of words ill vnderstood, & interpreted in another sense then they had been spoken, and wherein if their Chamber would haue shewed as great a feeling as the Nobilitie did, they might haue had as much subiect; and yet they made a great complaint vnto his Maiestie. That in truth if the question had bene betweene the two Chambers, as in other actions, there had been reason to communicate it, and to demand aduice and remedy thereof from the third; all three being as it were bound to this correspondency. But their complaint was for a wrong done by a priuate man, the which they assured themselves, the Nobility would not maintaine nor iustifie, hauing no interest therein, but were rather bound to seeke a condigne punishment for his offence, who had violated the safety F of the Estates, and so much wronged one of the Orders; the interest not onely concerning their Chamber, (although it hath had the better part, for that the partie wronged was one of their body;) but all the Chambers together. And therefore that they could not doe lesse then to ioyne with the Commons, to demand iustice and reparation; at the least, that they would be pleased, that the prosecution might be made in Parliament, whither the King (out of his owne motion) had sent the knowledge thereof.

The Cardinal of Sourdis who did then reside, made answer, That their Order had bene much grieved to heare of any alteration betweene the Chamber of the Nobilitie with the Commons, and that concerning two private persons, having had no particular knowledge of the truth thereof, but what they had heard by common report, and as the Deputies of the Nobility had given them to understand, that the offences were treproall. Whereupon without any further information of the ground, yet with intention after knowledge of the truth, to blame the Offender, and to procure a just reparation of the offence, for many considerations, and particularly fearing the two other Chambers should be at strife, they have endeavored to seek out some reconciliation: and that hereafter their house would neuer doe any thing, but with the same purpose and affection, not to prejudice any man, but onely to procure the peace and correspondency of the Houses.

The House of Commons having in the meane time followed the suite in the Court of Parliament, there was a Decree made, by which he that had stricken, was condemned to lose his head, and to pay two thousand Frankes for recompence vnto the said Lieutenant, which Decree was set in a Table at the end of Saint Michaels Bridge on the 16 of March.

Although this quarrell and offence were great, yet hapned there one on the fift of February a farre more important, between the Seigneur of Rochefort, a Gentleman of the Prince of Condes, & Monsieur de Marcellac, a Gentleman belonging vnto his Maiestie, and the Queene his Mother, because their Maiesties followed the suite themselves to haue iustice done for the wronging of their seruant, and the Prince did all he could to vphold Rochefort. There is a long discourse of the Originall of the quarrell between these two Gentlemen when they were both belonging to the said Prince in the yeere 1613. Wherefore we will onely set downe how all the three Houses went vnto the Loure, vpon the aduice which their Maiesties had given them of what had past betwene them and the said Prince.

On the Saturday the 17. of February in the morning, the Presidents of the Estates made each of them his report in their severall Houses (as they had bin informed by their Maiesties) that the Seigneur of Rochefort, accompanied with six Horse-men, and six or fixe tall foot-men, did set vpon the said Marcellac, in Saint Honours street, wounding him with swords and staves: whereof his Maiestie being aduertised, he sent vnto his Attourney General that he should make information, and prosecute the Law: which the Prince of Conde hearing of, and being yesterday in Councell, had much speech with the Queene touching that subiect, among which hee often said, That hee found it strange that they would subiect him to the Law like other men: that Rochefort had done nothing but by his commandment, and that hee did know it.

Whereunto the Queene answered, That he bore too good a mind, and that hee had no such conceit of him. These words bred many replies wherewith their Maiesties were somewhat moued: yea, the King being ready to speake, the Queene stayed him, and after the Prince was gone he told her, Madame, you haue done me much wrong to binder my speech.

There Maiesties being desirous to informe the States of what had past, being resolued not to endure any such actions of any man how great soeuer, but to protect their subiects, and especially their household seruants: Vpon report hereof, the three Chambers were much moued, and euery one in particular made shew of their griefe. Either of them resolued to goe vnto their Maiesties, to make offer of their fidelitie and obedience; and to let them understand, that notwithstanding the Princes auowing of the fact, they beought the King that iustice might bee done for such outrages, wherewith their Maiesties seemed to be much satisfied for these demonstrations of their affection and loue.

In the meane time informations were made against Rochefort for the Kings interest, the Prince represented his request vnto the Court, pretending many things against Marcellac, who he said had been his household seruant, and had done him bad seruice: That he had commanded the first of his followers which should meete him to giue him the bastinado, which Rochefort had done who had found him first. The Queene hauing heard of this request, and that the Princes intencion was to discharge Rochefort, she sent for the Presidents of the Court, and told them the whole proceeding, and for that they had objected that Marcellac was of base condition, the said, He hath serued the King well, and I know he is a Gentleman descended from the House of Grand-Scin, in the Countrey of March: the King tells it you, and I assure it, therefore he should not be thus entreated. Hereupon the

The three Estates goe to the King about this business.

A the Parliament decreed that Rochefort should be apprehended having absented himselfe, and for that it was giuen out that he was in the Princes House, he hearing thereof protested that it should bee open vnto iustice, but the others would not enter but by order of the Court: whereupon by his commandment all the chambers of the house were opened vnto them which came to search for him, but they found not Rochefort. This action, importing much the publike peace, Queene Marguerite and the Countesse of Soissons went vnto the King and Queene, telling them that the Prince was their most humble servant and would fauour their desires. The Queene answered that she complained not, and that if the King were satisfied, he should be in like manner. After this the Prince came to the Loure, where finding the King in the Queenes Cabinet, he besought him, to forget what was past, to whom his Maiestie said, I doe it with all my heart, and I assure you that you shall be alwaies welcome vnto me.

This alteration being thus pacified, there remained nothing but Rochefort is busynesse, the which was ended by letters of abolition which were verified by the Parliament. Marcellac would not oppose himselfe, desiring rather to end their quarrell by combat, then by any other meanes. For as soone as his wounds were cured, hee sought all meanes to challenge him, whereof the Prince being informed, hee forbad Rochefort in the presence of many Noblemen to receiue any challenge from Marcellac either by word or writing.

But lets now returne vnto the conclusion of the Estates appointed on the 23 of February: There had bene on the 19 of February complaint made vnto the Chamber of the Clergy, touching the estate of the Catholike Religion in Bearne; that the two Bishops were oppressed; That the exercise of the Catholike Religion was not restored, with many other disorders; especially a great insoleny which had been lately committed at Milleau; whereupon the three orders sent the Archbishop of Lions with their Deputies to their Maiesties to craue reparation of these disorders, and execution of iustice for the restoring of the Bishops to their dignities. At the same time, the Agents for the Reformed religion made many complaints vnto their Maiesties, & to the Chancellor, touching that which had hapned at Balesta, where they had ruined the Temple which those of the Religion had caused to be built in a place which had bene giuen by the Edicts of pacification for the exercise of their Religion. They demanded that the knowledge of these two causes concerning the Edicts might be transferred to the chamber at Castres, as it was where afterwards there past decrees, but to the content of neither party.

The 23 of February being come for the conclusion of the Estates, the three Orders came to Bourbon Hall, which was prepared as it had bene in the beginning; but the disorder was great by reason of the multitude of people which were suffered to enter. The Bishop of Lison for the Clergie, the Baron of Senefsey for the Nobility, and President Miron for the third Estate, made long and learned Orations to giue his Maiestie thanks, and deliuered their grieuances. The chiefe points of the Clergies complaints were,

I. That excessive expences and immense gifts and pensions bred most of the miseries which ruined an Estate; that such gifts did hurt more then profit; that the peoples misery flowed chieffy from this fountain; being certaine, that the increate of expences made the receipts increase: and that the more they spent, the more they were forced to draw from the people who were the onely Mynes of France.

II. That the sale of Offices had bene put in practice to supply the necessity whereunto the State had bene reduced by profusion and excess of expences.

III. That they depriued Clergie men of their chiefe honors, were it in Councell, or in the employment of affaires: That when as Prelates had bene employed by their Princes, the French Church was full of Maiestie, whereas now they were so fallen from their ancient splendor, as they were scarce to be knowne: For they were so farre from seeking any aduice of Clergie men in that which concerned the Estate, as it seemed they thought the honor which they had to serue God, made them incapable to serue their King. If it were lawfull for any to enter into Councell, it was onely for formes sake, the which appeared plainly for that they were receiued with such contempt, as it was sufficient to be a Layman, to haue place and precedency before them.

IIII. That Clergie men giuing willingly the tenth of their goods, they suffered them to be disposed of the rest, either for that they were dedicated to the world, and not to God, or for that they wanted faith and were sworn enemies to the Church: That they suffered suffered the enemies of the faith to pollute sacred places by their prophane burials : and that contrary to the Edicts, and all reason, they held by force the Churches of Catholics, hindring diuine seruice to deliuer the inuentions of men.

V. That there being no meanes to oblige the Nobility, by ordinary wayes besitting their profession, they had extended themselves so farre, as to part with that which was Gods, and to recompence them to the preiudice of the Church : so as it seemes but a slight matter to giue away an Abbey to a Lay Gentleman, or to put it into their hands, which are of the contrary Religion: but in the meane time that it was true and easie to be seene, that the losse and ruine of the Church came from hence, for so much as the presentation of the greatest part of the Cures of France are annexed vnto Abbeys, which was the cause that being so possessed by persons of such condition, it was impossible to haue any good Pastors (who notwithstanding are the true pillars which vphold the Church and maintaine it in reputation.) It being euident, that a Courtier, or any other, more tied to earth then heauen, hath little care to chooseth one of good conuersation : and that the enemies of the Church tryumph, when ignorant men, and of scandalous life are placed therein. And although there might be more reason to grant pensions out of Benefices vnto Lay men, then to giue them the Title to enioy in their owne names, or by interposed persons : yet there were no equity to giue them part of the fruit, which did not participate of the paines.

VI. If to come from pensions to reuerfions, who would thinke it iust to giue a successe to a man that is liuing, exposing his life to the mercy of him that should profit by his death : That Councells had condemned this practice as most dangerous : That King Henry the third, at the last Assembly of the Estates had bound himselfe by a solemne oath to abolish it, and had reuoked all reuerfions during his reigne.

VII. That the Clergy should be free from all Taxes and other impositions; prayers being the true tribute they should draw from Churchmen.

VIII. That the Ecclesiasticall authority was so distinct from that of the secular Magistrature, as S. Cyprian was bold to witness, that the enterprizes vpon the Church and the conceits of the Tribunal of Bishops, gaue enry to Schismes, and broke the bond which vnited all the children of Iesus Christ in his house. That it was most certaine that a Prince could not better teach his subjects to contemne his power, then by suffering them to attempt against that of the great God, from whom he holds his.

IX. That of late in a full peace they had troden downe him that should be adored, not onely by men but of Angels : so as they had great cause to say with Ieremie, Let our faces be covered with shame and ignominy, for that strangers pollute the sacred temple of the great God : and with greater reason to apprehend for this Realme the horrible punishment wherewith he hath threatned them who haue filled that with abomination, which was particularly affected for his inheritance. These were the chiefe heads of the Clergies complaints, wherunto they annexed the remedies, on which I will not insist.

The President for the third Estate (for there was nothing published of the Nobilities grievances) said, That the two chiefe pillars which had alwaies supported the State, were Piety and Iustice. That there remained nothing in France but the name and shadow of these two vertues. That Piety was banished by the defects of Prelates, there being many Bishopricks destitute of Bishops, and many flocks without Pastors, and yet the rottenness were gathered by supposed names or stewards: That most part of the titular Prelates fled residence, concerning the ancient Ecclesiasticall Lawes. That as the authority of Bishops had become much impaired; so pietie had become abolished and banished. That the Cures which were subiect to Bishops were reiecte, for that they were so poor, as a man of mean knowledge would hold it a shame to be called vnto them : and if they had any good Reuenues, they which disdaind not the ridle to receiue the fruits, supplid the execution of the charge with some poore and ignorant priest with small wages. That in halfe the Abbeys of France, there were not Abbots with Canonically rides, but the Abbeys were held by Receiueurs, Gentlemen, or men of other qualities. That multiplicitie of Benefices held by one man, open Simony, and disguised by pensions referred, were the cause of all the miseries for which God afflicted France.

That there had crept into the order of the Nobility so much excesse, such contempt of Iustice and Iudges, so many contrauentions against the Kings Lawes and ordinances, and Disorders in the Church.

Disorder in the nobility.

A violences against the weak and feeble; That at this day their chiefe actions are consumed in excesse play, in superfluous expences, monsters and prodigies of this age, which darken the ancient luster of this Order.

That the delays, euasions and shifts of Iustice to make sutes immortal, were infinite, and had no bounds by the malice of the parties, which innocently blemished the honor of the Iudges. There were few sutes either ciuill or criminall if any great man or rich were interested, which past not through all the iurisdiccions of the Realme, by reason of euocations too frequent : for the onely iudgement of a competency before they entered into the ground of the cause, so as the accessories (smoothing the principle) in the end the plantife and the defendant found themselves ruined; and the reason of these disorders was the multiplicity of Courts of Iustice, and the excesse number of Officers & Iudges, who were not rewarded nor punished according to their merits. Having afterwards represented the inhumanities of souldiers which held the field, he besought the King for the reestablishment of Policy and trade : to cause the Treasure to be well gouerned: to abolish pensions : to ease the poore people of Taxes : and to reduce all to the same estate it was in, in the year 1576. He then directed his speech vnto the Queene Mother.

Madam, God hath committed this Realme to your care and vigilancy, wherof you haue acquitted your selfe worthily during your Regency, to the content of all good men: And seeing the King doth againe referre the Gouernment vnto you, as it hath pleased him to declare vnto vs, having charge to beseech you to continue this holy resolution, guided by your good aduise and wife counsels, to the discharge of so many impositions which oppress the people, set downe at large in our remembrances, to the end that being our iust and lawfull Prince, hee may not desire more in his soueraine fortune to be seene great, then iust and mercifull; mingling together by your example, two things, which are very diuers, power and modestie : and that his subjects swimming as it were between loue and reuerence, may behold him as their Father, their Benefactor, and author of their safeties, by the ease so many sorts of impositions, as can hardly bee numbered; and by the same meanes to free them from the oppression of souldiers : That none but sufficient men may haue the commissions to lead them who may answer for them: That the Parishes exempt from lodging, may contribute to the charge of others, without difference of land belonging to any degree, seeing they are all your subjects equally contributable to the charges of the Realme. That to this effect the Collectors of subsidies in Parishes where they lye, shall carry a note of their charges vnto the Iudges, to be equally diuided among the rest : That the Commisfaries which lead them might be answerable; and if they themselves lye at discretion (as many now doe) that they may be punished with death. That information may be made against Commisfaries, who haue bene so audacious leading of Companies to cause themselves to be defrayed by the people. Moreover, forbid day works which oppress the people as much as taxes, a poore man being forced to leaue his seed time, and to abandon his harvest, to go and worke for a Gentleman : That this act might be declared base and punished with all rigor; and oppose your selfe generously against all oppressions. It is the surest meanes to retaine so many heads with one, and to reduce mildly vnder the common yoke of obedience this great turbulent and diuinit multitude. So we hope your Maiesty will suffer your selfe to be mildly forced by our perswasions to the entertainment of our iust petitions. For as in an absolute Prince, it is a great happynot to be forced, so it is a most miserable thing not to suffer himselfe to be perswaded.

After the conclusion of the Estates, the King suffered all the three orders to assemble, so as it were not at the Augustins or in any other publicke place, but only in the houses of the Presidents of either Order, with charge not to make any new propositions touching the affaires which depended of the Estates. The King for a more speedy dispatch of answers to their grievances, had caused them to be drawne vnto three Chapters, and had appointed three seuerall companies to peruse them and consider of their answers. Vpon this diuision, the three Orders of Estates made choice of particular Deputies to conferre with the said Commissioners, where the first Articles were first viewed and examined.

On the 24. of March the King gaue the chiefe of the three Orders to vnderstand, that he desired they should come to the Loure, where being assembled in the great Gallery, their Maiesties assisted by their Councell, the Chancellor speaking to the Estates said, That the King and his Councell had seene their Grievances; That the multitude, diuersity and importance importance of the Articles represented therein, did not permit their Maiesties to make answer A vnto them so soone as they thought to haue done and much desired. That for this occasion, and to the end that the Estates might receive the testimony of their good wills in their principall articles, and upon which they most insisted and were most affected vnto : That their Maiesties were resolved to take away the sale of Offices, and establish good order in all which depended thereon : To reestablish a Chamber for review of the Treasure, and to cut off Penfions : And all in such order and forme as the Estates should haue occasion of content. For the rest of their grivances which were very many, they should be answered with all possible speed.

By the abolition of the sale of Offices, the King was to lose 150000 pounds sterling yearly in his casual profits: whereupon there was a proposition made to lay three shillings B vpon the bussell of salt in Countries subiect to imposition, and an equiualent proportion in others, the which should cease after ten years. Many of the Clergie and the Nobility liked of this proposition : but the third Estate held it very prejudiciall for their Order; whereupon they presented a Petition vnto his Maiestie for the stay thereof, as being hurtfull to his Maiesties seruice, and tending to the oppression of his poore subiects, whereof I haue formerly made mention.

In the Spring, newes came from Spaine touching the reception of the Commander of Sillery, whom his Maiesty had sent to cary a New-year's gift to the French Queene : It was said that at his entry into Madril, the Duke of Lerma was sent by his Catholike Majesty, to receive him with extraordinary ceremonies, being accompanied by many C Grands, and other Noblemen richly appointed; who conducted him to the Palace, where he went to salute his Maiesty, who received him with all shewes of loue and affection: After complements done, the King tooke him by the hand, and led him to the Infanta's Cabinet, to whom hauing done his obeysance, he declared vnto her the subiect of his Embassage, and the King his Masters affection vnto her: After which, he presented in his Maiesties name, a rich bracelet made of Diamonds & other precious stones curiously wrought with certaine deuices, a present valued at about 40000 Pound sterling, the which she received with great admiration and ioy; and after she had put it on her arme, she tooke it off againe, and placed it in her bosome, to shew the great affection she bare vnto his Maiesty: After which hauing taken his leaue of the King, and of the Infanta, hee was conducted to his lodging, where he was dayly visited by the chiefe of Spaine, and entertained with all the sports and deuices they could, to testifie their publike ioy.

Death of
guerite.

Soone after, towards the end of March dyed Queene Marguerite in her Palace in the suburbs of Saint Germaine. As the deceased King Henry the third her brother had bene the last King of the Royall house of Valois, so this Queene was the last of the Princesses. This branch of the Royall house of France had reigned 261 years, from Philip of Vallois, who was King in the year 1328, vnto the death of Henry the third, which was in the year 1589.

Hauing lye sixe daies vpon a bed of State in her Palace Hall, her body was afterwards conducted to the Chappell of the reformed Augustins, where it lay vntill that the affaires of the Kingdome were settled, after which they made choice of a place for her interment. The Queene Mother had a care to giue content to her creditors, and to most part of her Officers and household seruants, as she had recommended it before her death.

On the 27 of March, ten Presidents and Councillors deputed from the Chambers of Inquest, that is to say, two from either Chamber, came vnto the great Chamber of the Parliament, to intreat the first President to assemble all the Chambers to consult and determine vpon the Remonstrances which they had long before resolved to make vnto the King : the which was granted, and presently performed.

Being all assembled, the President of the first Chamber of Inquest said, that they had de- F manded this Assembly touching that which the King had promised to the Court of Parliament a little before; That he would giue no answer to the grivances which should be presented vnto him by the deputies of the three Estates of the Realme, nor make any resolution, before he had heard the remonstrances of this Parliament. That he held it a fit time to aduise now what the Court should doe in this point, considering in what estate the affaires were.

Vpon this proposition they began to deliberate after their accustomed manner; but being not able to conclude, it was deferred vntill the next day being the 28, where after much

the Court.

A much debate, a Decree was concluded in these words : The Court, all the Chambers be- ing assembled, hath decreed, under the Kings good pleasure, That the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne hauing place and a deliberative voice therein, being at this present in the City shall be invited to come into the Court, there (with the Chancellor and all the Chambers assembled) to aduise vpon the propositions which should be made for the Kings seruice, the ease of his subiects, and the good of his Estate.

This resolution was caryed that night vnto their Maiesties as some say in grosse, and not in the same tearmes it had bene let downe, and by one of their owne company. Some illaffected vnto the Court, whispered in their Maiesties eares, that the Parliament sought to meddle with the affaires of State, enter into knowledge of the government thereof, and giue counsell vncalled. That it was an apparant enterprize against the Kings authoritie, and did touch the Queenes Regency, which they would controll. Their Maiesties were much incensed against the Court vpon this report, which they held to be true : whereupon they sent to one of the Princes and some Peeres, forbidding them to go to the Parliament if they were invited; the day after the King sent for his learned Councill, to whom the Chancellor said, that the King had sent for them touching the decree of the Parliament, wherewith their Maiesties were much discontented, being given to understand, that the Court had ordained, that the Princes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne should be invited to the Parliament, to take aduice touching the government of the

C Realme : whereunto Monsieur Seruin the Kings Aduocate answered, That they had not heard so much; but they had understood, that the Court had assembled to witness their good and sincere affection, hauing for their onely ayme and vow, the safety of the King and the State. Hereupon the King and Queene entering into their Cabinet, the Queene said vnto them, That they had bene aduerted of diuers speeches which had been in this assembly, by the which the Kings authority had bene wronged, and that it was a strange enterprize : whereunto the Aduocate answered, that they had not bene present at this resolution, being retired after they had required that which was necessary for the Kings seruice, and concerned the publike : but they had bene summoned to propound that which they held profitable and fit in this season for his Maiesties seruice and the good of

D the State, where without any further ouerture, they besought the Court to remember that they had formerly propounded what they might doe, hauing not yet seene his Maiesties Declaration vpon the remonstrances and petitions made vnto him by the Deputies of the three Estates : whereupon the Court had resolved to giue aduice vnto his Majesty of that which they thought concerned his seruice : the which they had not done to attempt against his Royall authority, but onely with an intention to make an ouerture for the good of his seruice, and ease of his subiects : and also to insuffle the constant fidelity of all the Officers of his Parliament, in the presence of the Princes, Peeres, and others which should then assitt with the Lord Chancellor. And after a long discourse of the integrity and good intention of the Court, he besought his Majesty to hold them for his most E humble and faithfull subiects and seruants.

After this, the Councill was presently assembled, and the Procurer and Aduocate commanded to enter into the Councill Chamber, to whom the King said, I say here you shall heare what I will resolve: whereunto they answered, Sir, we are at your feet to obey you, and hauing the honor to be of your Councill, will do what better it shall please you to command vs in any other action : But the question being touching a resolution taken in your Parliament, seeing we are of that body, it may please you to dispence with vs from being in a place, where if any speake against the Parliament, we neither ought nor can endure to heare it; but are bound to speake for the authority of the Decree. Whereupon the F King finding their excuse reasonable, commanded them to withdraw into the lesser Cabinet, where hauing attended an houre or more, in the end they were called in to whom the King said (in presence of the Queene and Chancellor) I haue sent for you to giue you that in charge which I haue refused on in my Councill, which you shall deliver on my behalfe to my Court of Parliament, it being my will that you should be the messengers :

Then Monsieur Seruin besought the King to excuse them, and to commit those words of the discontent which it seemed he had, to some others, letting him understand that they were at his feet to do him most humble seruice, when he should command: but they were also dayly at the doores of the iudgement of the Court; the necessity of their charges tying them thereunto, to require that which concerned his seruice, and to second the good intentions of his Parliament; whom they had alwaies found full of trust, courage, and good affection, necessary for the preservation of his authority and State. But notwithstanding all their fute, and the excuses they could alledge, they were commanded to deliuer vnto the Court the reasons why his Maiesty had himselfe wronged by the Decree of the 28 of March.

Three reasons declared in Councell
against the decree of the Court.

The first, That the King being in Paris, the Court of Parliament ought not to haue assembled to consult of affaires which concerne the State, nor inuite the Princes, Peeres, Nobles, and others hauing place in Parliament, before they had acquainted his Maiesty therewith.

The second, That the King being declared of full age by the Lawes of France, although all his other subiects were Minors at his yeares, yet God hauing imparted vnto him greater graces then to other men, he should be held for more vertuous: and that his power was not lesse then that of his Predecessors.

The third, That this Conuocation ordained by the Court, although that the Chancellor were required to assist, could not be done by the motion of the Parliament or otherwise; but by his Maiesties Letters Patents, it depending of his sole and souereigne power. After which, he commanded them to bring him the Originall of the Decree, forbidding the Court to proceed any further in the execution thereof.

This charge being deliuered to all the Chambers by the Kings Councell, they retyring themselves; the first President propounded what was to be done concerning this charge; where after much consultation they resolved to deliuer the Decree into the hands of the Kings Councell, who came vnto the Loure on the last of March; and being admitted to his Maiesties presence, Monf. Serin said vnto him: Sir, we owe vnto your Maiesty the obedience of faithfull subiects, having received the commandement you gave vs, we acquainted the Court of Parliament with your pleasure, whereof we are to give you a faithfull account. We haue acquainted them with your words: the which being heard, we observed in them all in generall a wondrous full griefe, to see your Maiesty incensed against them, remembering that they had alwaies given examples of obedience to all your subiects, not thinking that they should incurre your indignation. In the end, letting them understand, that you would about all things maintaine your authority, and labouring with the Court that they would make a good resolution for your Maiesties content, we haue bene charged by the Court to bring you the Decree made on Saturday last, vnder your good pleasure; and to let you understand that they hold nothing so deare or in so great recommendation, as the preservation of your Soueraigne power and fauour, without the which all your Officers of this Company, your most humble and most affectionate louing seruants, cannot execute their charges honorably nor profitably: They most humbly beseech you to receive the Decree made with an upright heart, and with no intention to attempt any thing against your authority.

The King and Queene seemed to be well content with these words, With the Kings good liking, and his Maiesty taking the Decree into his hand, said, That he would looke on it and acquaint the Court of Parliament with his pleasure. They thought that matters should haue so rested: but they were aduertised that three Presidents of the Inquests coming into the Court on the 9 of Aprill, desired that they would consider if it were not fit to beseech the King, that hee would bee pleased to giue an answer vnto his Parliament, and to let them know his pleasure according to his promise; that it was fit and necessary to know it; and that it were not good that the resolutions of the Parliament should remaine without effect.

Hereupon the Presidents of the great Chamber with foure of the ancient Councillors, with many Presidents and Councillors of the Inquests and Requests, were sent for to the Loure: being brought into the Kings Chamber, he said vnto them: My Masters, seeing you would know my answer vpon your Decree, which my Councell brought mee: the Lord Chancellor shall deliuer it vnto you. Who presently began thus, That the King being aduertised how that some of the Parliament desired to vnderstand his answer, notwithstanding that he had bene aduised for good and reasonable considerations to deferre it: yet he had giuen him in charge to say vnto them: that he was much offended at the enterprise which the Parliament had made vpon his authority, being of full Age: and moreover, in his Capitall City to haue sought to assemble the Princes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, a thing

A a thing without all president, without reason, and without apparance, the which no Parliament had euer done before. That his Maiesty knew well, that the power and iurisdiction of the Court was limited, and as they tooke no knowledge of Accounts, nor of the imposts of salt, so Kings haue alwayes referred to themselves, the knowledge of the affaires of their Estate: That the Parliament should remember the answer made vnto the Duke of Orleans, in the time of King Charles the eight, by the President De la Vaquerie, whose seruices and memory had bene commended by Kings: And the sensible feeling and dislikes which King Lewis the twelfth, and Francis the first did shew vpon a far lesse attempt. And of the rigour of a Decree which was made during the Reigne of Charles the ninth: For that in a matter of lesse consequence, they would contest against his authority: whereupon the resolution of the Court was cancelled, and the execution published, the doores being shut. That this Parliament being the first of the Realme, should employ her authority which she holds from Kings, to maintaine that of the King, and not to seeke to suppress it, being of full yeares and in his presence, whereat although hee were much offended, yet hearing that it had past by the plurality of voyces of the yongest and last admitted, and that the ancientest were of a contrary opinion; he was well satisfied with them, and intreated them to continue, assuring them that he would not forget that good office. And for that the Parliament should haue no colour to excuse the Decree, for that they had referred the execution to the Kings will, hee was well aduertised of the Decree, the first day it was resolved on; and of that which had bene corrected, and newly added to assuage his displeasure, all which notwithstanding gaue him no full satisfaction. Wherefore he prohibited the Parliament the execution thereof, to assemble any Princes, or Peeres, or to deliberate any more thereupon. Then the King began to speake and said, My Masters that which the Chancellor hath deliuered vnto you, it is that I speak it. To morrow I will send you my answer in writing; In the meane time I forbid you to proceed.

Whereupon the first President made answer: Sir, wee are much grieved that since your happy coming to the Crowne, hauing so faithfully serued your Maiesty, the deceased King Henry the Great, and the Kings our fouerigne Lords, since the first erection of your Court, to see that our seruices (so well knowne to all the world) should bee so ill interpreted as to be taken for enterprizes against your authority; and that you are offended with vs. We are assured that if it were lawfull for vs to reply after a displeasure testified by your owne mouth, and signified vnto vs by your Lord Chancellor, we could with all honorable respect, to your Maiesties content, and the satisfying of all those that assist you, represent, that your Parliament hath neuer concluded any thing, but the Kings haue allowed it: and for the which (in stead of dislike and sinister construction) wee haue alwaies receiued praise and commendations, yea during the reignes alledged by my Lord Chancellor. But for that we are called by your commandement, hauing no charge from the Parliament, we will not faile to present vnto them what it hath pleased you to pronounce by your owne mouth, and by the Chancellors. In the meane time wee most humbly beseech you to take the Decree in good part, as made, not by the aduice of the last of the Company, but by the generall voice and consent of your whole Court, where vnto yong and old haue equally contributed; and to hold it rather an excessse and abundance of a good, sincere, and true intention to your seruice, rather then any presumption against your authority. Then the Queene said, I know well that the young men first propounded this aduice, and that they haue caused it to passe by plurality of voyces: I blame not the Court, but thanke the Ancients, and all those which opposed themselves; I will employ my credit with the King my Sonne, to take knowledge of them, and to require their good will. The first President answered, Madam, we most humbly beseech you to beleue that we haue all participated in the Decree, and that you would be pleased to forget the contrary report, and to honor them equally with your fauour to the King.

The Court of Parliament being informed of his Maiesties pleasure, notwithstanding continued in their first resolution, to draw their remonstrances, and to present them in writing to the King; whereof his Maiesty being aduertised, he sent the next day being the 11 of Aprill, to command the Presidents and some ancient Councillors to come to the Loure; where in the Queenes presence (the Chancellor being absent) he said, that hee had sent for them, hearing that notwithstanding his prohibition to make any remonstrances A concerning the affaires of his estate, yet they had depured some of euery chamber to draw them; touching the which, the Queen his Mother should let them vnderstand his pleasure. The Queene repeating the Kings words, said: that it was a thing had neuer bene attempted, and that he did forbid them. That if the Parliament should presume to do it, the King would be displeased, he is (said she) your King and Master, who will vse his authority if you contradict his will: wherunto free added, that it was a faction of men ill affected to his seruice, and which thought to do things against his will: and withall she said in choller that the would be reuenged. Whereunto the first President answered, that he would aduertise the Court of Parliament thereof.

His report being made, they tooke aduice what was fit to be done, and in the end resolved, that according to their former deliberation, the Chambers should bring their instructions to be viewed by the Presidents and some Councillors of the great Chamber, to draw the remonstrances which the Court had resolved should be made. But for that they were not presented vnto the King before the 22 of May, wee will insert some particulars which past in the Moneths of March and Aprill. B

During the Assemblies of the Estates, there was a great contention and dispute in the Chamber of the Nobility betwene the Catholike Deputies and them of the reformed Religion; for that the Catholike Deputies had propounded and caused it to be resolved that the King should be intreated to maintain the Chatholike, Apostolike and Romish Religion, according to the oath which he had taken at his Coronation. The Deputies of the reformed Religion made great complaints thereof; whereupon the King made a Declaration on the 12 of March, which was verified in Court the last of Aprill. It contained, That the Catholike Deputies had made this request vnto the King, to witnesse their zeale and affection to the Catholike Religion, and not to offend any person: the which they had protested both in particular, & all together vnto his Maiefty, desiring the obseruation of peace established by the Edicts: being fully perswaded by experience of what was past, that violent remedies had but increased the number of those which were strayed out of the Church, in stead of teaching them the way to returne: and that vpon this protestation his Maiefty (to free them from all bad impressions which made profession of the reformed Religion with a pure and innocent zeale free from all factions; as also the pretext of any which would seeke to trouble the quiet of the Realme) declared and commanded, that all Edicts, Declarations, & priuate Articles made in fauor of them in the reformed Religion, as well by the deceased King his father as by himselfe, should be kept inuiolably, and the breakers thereof punished as the breakers of the publike peace. The Agents of them of the Religion, having besought the King to name them a place where they should hold their Assemblies for the chusing of new Agents, which they did vually euery three yeares: they had first a Briefe to assemble at Gergeau: but afterwards the place was changed, and the assembly was held at Grenoble. C

The Kings Declaration

Edict of pacification.

We will now returne to the proceedings of the Parliament, who having prepared their Remonstrances, gaue charge vnto the Kings learned Counsell to go vnto the Lord Chancellor, to demand audience of the King, for the deliuey thereof in writing as it had been decreed. Who having deliuered their charge, returned answer that his Maiefty would giue them audience the 22 of May: when as the Chambers being assembled about three of the clocke in the afternoon, there went 6 Presidents, and 12 Councillors of the great Chamber, and a President; and 3 Councillors of euery chamber of Inquests and Requests, with the Kings learned Council, being in all about 40 persons. Being come to the Loure, they were conducted by a Capitaine of the kings Guard by a priuate staires into the Council Chamber, for otherwise they could hardly haue past by the ordinary staires, the presse so great. In the Council Chamber were the King and Queene, assisted by the Dukes of Guise, Neuers, Vendosme and Espernon, the Lord Chancellor, the Marshals of Ancre, and Souure, with many other Lords and Officers of the Crowne, and other Councillors of State. The first President having done his obeysance vnto the King, spake on this manner: That hee had charge given him to represent vnto his Maiefty most humble Remonstrances on the behalfe of his Court of Parliament, and not to deliuey vnto him the motiue of the Decree which was made the 28 of March: That they most humbly besought him to beseege that no other will nor intention had moued them thereunto, but the

A the necessity of the Estate of the Realme, and a great, good, and sincere affection which it hath alwayes borne, and doth still to his seruice; and to the good and quiet of his Estate: wherem it would not giue place to any whatsoever, and whereof it had alwayes yielded to good and faithfull testimonies as greater could not be desired: That it did not enuy the greatnesse, riches, fauour nor dignity of any person, nor malice any. That it had neuer failed in the fidelity due to the Kings seruice, and had alwayes this Maiefty for its soveraigne Lord and only Master, beseeching him to receiue them with a good eie, as comming from the most deuour, faithfull, and obedient company that liues, Whereupon hee presented it vnto the King, who deliuered it vnto a Secretarie of State, and then his Maiefty commanded the Parliament to retire. But before they went forth the first President said, that hee had charge humbly to beseech his Maiefty, that the Remonstrances might be presently read, the which was done very distinctly, and heard with great attention by all which were in the Chamber. And for that they were very long, and would take vp too much roome; I must intreat the Reader to satisfie himselfe with the chiefe points and heads thereof, which were; B

A Declaration of the causes of the Parliaments Complaint, That the Parliament of Paris, was borne with the State of France, and holds place in Council with Princes and Barons, which in all ages was neere vnto the Kings person. That the Parliament had alwayes dealt in publike affaires. That some Kings which had not liked of the remonstrances of the Parliament of Paris, did afterwards witnesse their griefe. That Popes, Emperors, Kings, and Princes, had voluntarily submitted their controversies to the iudgement of the Parliament of Paris, reasons which had moued them to the Decree of the 28 of March. Of the disorders which were in the State, and the remedies. Not to suffer the Kings soveraigne power to be made doubtfull and problematicall. To entertaine the ancient alliances. To dismisse from the Kings Council such as had bene of late yeares aduanced by fauour. To punish the Kings Officers, with reueue gifts or pensions. To maintaine the Officers of the Crowne, and the Gouernors in their authority and functions. Not to giue any more reuerfions of any charges & governments. To forbid the sale of the Offices of the Kings House, and of the Infants of France: Not to commit any charges and governments vnto strangers. To forbid the Kings subiects to haue any intelligences or communications with the Ambassadors of foraigne Princes. To preferre the French Church. To reforme the multiplicity of new Orders of religious men; & to haue a care to the nomination of Archbishops, Bishops, and Abbots. Not to admit strangers to Prelacy. with the Parliament, who contrary to his restraint had meddled with affaires of State. A That the Parliament would deal in reformations, and dispose the Government and the Treasuries; and that shee had not so little iudgement but that she knew they had an intent to call her Regency in question, the which all the Orders of the Realme assembled in one body of State, and the Parliament it selfe had commended. That they could not speake of the Government of the affaires of the Realme without touching her. That shee was well advertised that these Remonstrances had not bene allowed by the whole body of the Parliament; that there were sixe Presidents aswell present as absent which had opposed them, and that there were onely six or seven Presidents and Councillors which were the motives. That hereafter the King would no more endure it. That she would have every man know and might boldly speake it; That there was B neuer Regency in France more happy then hers. After which, pausing a while and seeming much moved by her countenance, shee commanded the Lord Chancellor to make the Kings answer.

Whereupon the Chancellor said, That France was a Monarchy, where the King alone commanded, holding his Realme sovereignly from God: That he had Lawes and Ordinances by the which he was to gouerne them, and for the which he was not to give an account to any man: That it did not belong vnto the Parliament, to controll his gouernment: That the Kings of France had distributed the charges and functions of the Realme distinctly: To the Chambers of Accounts matters of Account; To the Generals of the Iustice, the Aydes, whereof the Parliaments might not iudge: And with grea- C ter reason the Parliament of Paris might not intermeddle with the conduct and direction of his Estate, and that they might not undertake more then the King would suffer them. It was true that Kings in great affaires had bene accustomed to take aduice of the Court of Parliament, and he did beleue they might doe great seruice: but it was when it pleased him: That when their authority was vnited to the Kings will it was excellent good, and he would alwayes aduise the King to vse their Counsell: not that they should giue it of their owne motion, without the Kings pleasure: That the Parliament had bene carried infensibly to a resolution which did much blemish the Kings authority: That the time it selfe was very opposite, when as they laboured about the grieuances of the Estates, the which being sent vnto the Parliament, they should then haue found a subject to effect: that D which they haue now done out of season: That out of doubt the Parliaments Intention was good, but to speake truly there was a defect: That he had formerly said it was done without reason, but now hee said it was without president; having expresse commission to say both the one and the other, for that it cannot bee found: (the King being in Paris) that the Court of Parliament of their owne motion, hath assembled the Princes, Dukes, Peeres and Officers of the Crowne, whereof hee would no other prooffe then the presidents produced in their Remonstrances. That touching the euocations whereof they complained, there had bene none granted without Deliberation of the Councill, and that was to stay the Parliament from taking knowledge of their controuerfies, which had kinfmen in their company. As for abolitions and pardons, he could assure them, that E hereafter none should passe, the Councill being so ordered, as it should be a very difficult thing to effect: And as for the dissolving of the Decretes of the Parliament, it had bene done when as the Parliament attempted to iudge contrary to the restraint of the Council, who held their iudgements for no Decrees: That they had caused the Councill to cease, to treat without intermission about the grieuances of the Estates, and that being now vpon that of Iustice, his Maiesty had commanded to take their aduice: That the Parliament did not obstrue the Ordinances concerning the reception of Councillors, admitting many brethren and neere kinfmen into one Parliament: That they neither could nor ought to complaine of the Queenes Regency, which hath bene so happy, as neuer Hi- storians haue observed the like; during the which, France hath abundantly enjoyed all good blessings: That the Queene was not to giue an account of her Regency, but to God onely: and if she would do it vnto the King, his Maiestie would giue her thanks: That no man could preferre vnto the King what Councillors hee should enertaine; That he had thought good to make vse of those persons whom the decessed King had chosen, by whom he hath bene well serued.

President Iannin spake, that having managed the Kings Treasure vp-rightly, with such as are employed therein, he thought

1615

A hee should worthily incurre blame, if hee should not speake some thing concerning his charge, for the which he would answer before the severest Iudges: And that hee wonderd to heare himselfe blamed, not by a multitude, who interpret of another mans actions lightly, but by a company of graue & wise men maliciously informed of the managing of the Kings Treasure. That the question they made was to him, and not to the Queene who was not bound to giue an account of their Regency but to the King. And to enter into particular, that after the kings death, the Duke of Sully had continued the Command of the Treasure, vnto the warre of Iuliers, and had set downe the expences, hauing left in the Treasurers hands, but 350 Pounds sterling. To say that the kings reuenues are augmented since his fathers decess, it cannot be verified, but contrariwise there hath bene 200000 Pounds sterling abated vpon the Imposition of salt, and 400000 pounds sterling, increase for the necessity of affaires. As for the money in the Bastile, what necessity the Estate hath suffered, yet hath it not bene toucht: but to stay the course of these last alterations, and for the voyage of Poitiers.

And whereas they sayd, that in the time of the decessed King, they layd vp yearly 200000 pounds sterling, that it was not so, they bringing in onely 80000 pounds. That it was a dangerous thing to touch a disease and bring no remedie for it. That they should name particularly such as had bene the cause, who should be presently abandoned by all good men, and he himselfe would be the first should doe it. That in truth it were expedient to cut off the great expences and vnecessary charges: that his duty bound him to speake it.

After this, some of the great personages there present began to speake, and the President was ready to answer, but the Queene imposed silence; whereupon the Marshall D'Ancre approached neere vnto her, and deliuered her a little booke, which gaue her occasion to say vnto the President: You suffer scandalous libells to be sold, against the Kings honor and mine, and doe no iustice: hold, read this booke, intituled Cassandra, the which she deliuered to one of the Secretaries of State, who read some leaues which were noted; whereunto the first President made answer, that three dayes since hee had caused a strict search to be made among the Printers, but could not yet discover any thing: whereup- D on the Duke of Epernon said that it was not those poore men they should punish who sought nothing but to get their liuing. This libell which was called Cassandra they made to speake as a Propheticke, saying, That the King should not alie himselfe by marriage out of France, with this exclamation, what thinke you to doe French men? you make Bon- fiers and spend the nights in Maskes and Dancing, in hope of these pretended marriages. Doe you thinke thus to reconcile two Nations which haue bene alwaies enemies? the water and fire will sooner mingle themselves together and so produce their effects, then the French will agree with the Spaniard. This was the opinion of some malecontents, but this libell was answered to the full.

The day after the deliury of the Remonstrances, there was a Decree past in the Council of State both against them and the Decree of the Parliament, wherein making a long relation of what had past, in the end it concludes, That the King desiring to prevent such disorders and vnde enterprizes hereafter, had againe disannulled, reuoked and declared voyde the said Decree of the 28 of March, forbidding the Parliament hereafter, to meddle with affaires of State, but when they should be commanded. And to the end the memory of this enterprize and disobedience might be extinct, his pleasure is, that the said Decree, together with the Remonstrances shall be cancelled and taken out of the Registers; and that the Register shall be bound to bring them to his Maiestie instantly after notice of this Decree, or else to lose his Office; his Maiestie promising as speedily F and as fauourably as hee can to provide for the complaints and grieuances contained in the informations of the Generall Estates, which hee causeth to be viewed and examined daily, not onely in that which concerneth iustice; but also the Clergy, the Nobility, the ciuill gouernment, and the Treasure, the Editions whereof shall be sent vnto the Parliament, and to all other Parliaments and soueraine Courts of the Realme to verifie them, and to make such remonstrances as they in their consciences should thinke profitable for the publicke, and then he would willingly see them, take them into consideration, and would haue as great a respect as should be requisite to winnesse to the King his Maiesty would haue for the good and sake of his good subjects.

The Speech of the Kings learned Councell
to his Maiesty.

The Court of Parliament in general, complained much of this Decree: and the Kings A learned Councell was sent for three severall dayes together to the Louvre; First, to heare the reading of the said Decree in Councell: Secondly, to enioyne them to cary it, and to cause it to be read in Parliament: and the third time, to know of them what diligence they had used concerning that which had beene given them in charge. They all three humbly besought the King and Queene, to excuse them of this charge, being fitter for other men to cary the message then themselves; but no excuses would serve, the Queene telling them, that the King would haue it so, that he desired to preferre his authority, and that the Kings commandements and hers might bee executed without excuse or delay. Whereupon the Kings Proctor generall said vnto the Queene, Madam, you make vs cary B a Torch which will kinde a fire, the embers whereof will continue long, and we feare the euent. What euent replyed the Queene? but that the people will mutine? No Madam said he, but an alteration of the good affections and deuotions of the Kings good subiects and seruants, and the dis-vnion of the greatest companies of this Realme, who administer iustice, which makes Kings to raigne. There was a long contestation about this refusal, yea the Proctor generall fell vpon his knees before the King, beseeching him not to force them to this seruice but to haue regard vnto what they were, and that the quality which they held in the Court of Parliament might excuse them: but the King cryed still, no, no, I will haue it so, and the Queene also: whereupon they were forced to obey.

On the first of Iune, Monf: Seruin deliuered what they had in charge from his Maiesty, C and withall they gaue their aduice vnto the Court, how they might compound this businesse with the Kings fauour and the honor of the Parliament: which was, That the Court should depure some amongst them to the King and Queene, to let them vnderstand, that by their remonstrances, the Parliament had no intention to thinke or speake of the King or Queenes actions, nor of her Regency and government: to reiterate their great submissions which they had already made, and to make protestations of all seruice, obedience, fidelity and respect: which done, they did verily beleue their Maiesties would rest satisfied. All the Chambers being assembled, the businesse was taken into deliberation, and in the end it was resolved according to the aduice of the Kings Councell. Vpon the second of Iune in the afternoon, the Kings Councell were sent for to the Louvre, to whom the D Queene said, that the King could not heare any thing of the execution of his will, or that the Decree made in Councell had beene read and inrolled: whereupon Monf: Seruin gaue her to vnderstand, that the Parliament was resolved to performe all the duties their Maiesties could desire, and to giue all the satisfaction they can vnto their King, namely concerning the three points which they had desired.

First, That they had neuer thought to speake of the King, nor of his actions.

Secondly, Neither of the Queene mother, or of her Regency and Government: but had greatly commended her wisdom, care, and affection to the good of the Estate, and quiet of the Realme, yea since the Kings Maiesty.

Thirdly, That they had not attempted against the Kings authority, by the Decree E whereof they complained, and that they did neuer beleue that they had any other authority but what had beene put into their hands by their Kings, neither that they could haue any soueraine power in this Realme but the Kings: so as they could not attempt any thing of themselves, neither could they subsist without his: That they breathed nothing but obedience and faithfull affection to his seruice, and a generous desire for the preferuation thereof. Not withstanding this protestation, the Queene said, That the King gaue charge his commandement should be executed, and that the Decree should be read and inrolled vpon paine of disobedience: wherewith the Court being made acquainted by the Kings Councell, the Chambers being assembled, there was much consultation touching their proceeding, and in the meane time the Queene sending againe for the Proctor generall, and the Advocates, said vnto them, That hearing the Court had past a Decree, to make such submissions vnto the king as were due vnto him, with a testimony of the honor which they bare vnto her, the execution of which decree was expected, and that when the Court should begin, the King would giue such answer as euery one should rest satisfied.

They making a new protestation of the Courts fidelity & affection to the Kings seruice, with the reuerence & obedience they did owe vnto their Maiesties, finding that the King and Queene by their good countenance (confirmed by their words) had made demon- stration

A stration of their will and intent, whereby the Court might assure themselves of all the good that might be expected from a King which takes pleasure in wife and faithfull seruants: This they thought good to represent vnto the Court, that knowing what had past, they might resolve by their wisdomes of what they should hold fit for the Kings good and seruice. Whereupon the Court being assembled, they decreed to make their humble submissions vnto the King and Queene; after which, matters remained as they were before, the Remonstrances and Decree continued in the Registers Office, and the Decree of the Kings Councell was not inrolled.

During these busineses in France, the Warre reuiued in Sauoy, betwene the Catho- lique King and the Duke, vpon certaine differences; the King pretending a Title to the County of Aste in Piedmont, & the Duke challenging his deceased wifes Dowry in the Duchie of Millan. The last yeare they had great forces in field on either side, but by the mediation of the Popes Nuncio, and the Marquis of Rambouillet Embassador for the French King, there was a suspension of Armes for foure moneths, either party withdrawing his Armie; wherat the King of Spaine was not altogether pleased with his Gouernour of Millan, for that he had granted the Duke so long a truce and drawne his Armie out of Piedmont, to oppress his owne subiects in the Duchy of Millan: whereupon he commanded him (by his Letters written this yeare in Ianuary) to march with all speed into Piedmont for the lodging of his Armie there; to chastise the Duke of Sauoy, for the reputation of his Armes, and the execution of his commandements.

These Letters were surprised by the Duke of Sauoy, but the rigour of the winter, and the abundance of snow, hindered all warlike attempts vntill March, and in the meane time they prepared their forces. The Duke of Sauoy being aduertised that the Gouernour of Millan, leauied great forces, and made all warlike preparations, with an intent to besiege Aste, and Versell, he fortified himselfe from France, Lorraine, Swisserland & Holland: and in the Spring both the Armies went to field, where there were many sieges, encounters, and militarie exploits; the particularities whereof I must leaue to the Original.

The Commander of Silery being sent into Spaine to carry a New-yeares Gift to the D Infanta, from the Christian King: He had also the affaires of Sauoy in charge, to the end he might procure a peace, and know the King of Spaines intention touching that subiect. The Marquis of Rambouillet being aduertised of his Negotiation, hee sent to demand audience of the Duke being at Aste. But the Duke thinking it not fit (considering the state of the warre and his affaires) to treat of a Peace in Aste: he sent him word that by the ninth of May he would be at Valfenera, which was ten miles off, where hee would giue him audience.

At his coming thither, the Marquis told the Duke, that the Commander of Selary had brought from Spaine, that the Catholique Kings intention was, not to take any satisfaction, nor submission from him, but that he should presently disarm, retaining only such troopes of Souldiers as shall be necessarie for the guard of his places, and for the safety of his estates and Countreys. That the said Duke should referre all the controuersies he had with the Duke of Mantua, to the Emperours iudgement; with promise not to wrong the said Duke of Mantua, nor to attempt any thing but by a ciuill course for all his pretensions. That in doing this, all the places which the King had taken from him should be restored. And if the Catholique King should attempt to wrong him, or his estates, the most Christian King did promise to undertake his defence.

The Duke of Sauoy hearing of the King of Spaines intention, he held it fit to consider thereof before hee should make any answer, telling the Marquis that hee had a desire to conferre with the Prince his sonne, his Councell, and the Embassadors of Princes which were with him touching that subiect; and that on Saturday following, hee would meet him at Quires, and there acquaint him with his resolution. The Gouernour of Millan lying with his Armie before Aste, in the meane time on Whitsunday, there was a truce concluded for three dayes, during which truce, the Marquis of Rambouillet went vnto the Spanish Campe to treat with the Gouernour of Millan for the conclusion of a Peace. This truce gaue good hope thereof. The Spanish Armie suffered much, having bene fixe weekes in one place in great scarcitie of water: they held their enemies Towne besieged but on one side onely, without hope of forcing it: yet both the one and the other were very circumspect not to be surprized during this Treatie of Peace. The Gouvernour of A Millan having made a new Trench, and placed 36. Gabions thereupon, hoped there to make his batterrie, and thence to lay upon the new Fort of Saint Peters, which the Sauoyards had made. But the 21 of June, an hour before day, the Marquis D'Yrfe with 800 foot, followed by 500 others, and 200 horse conducted by the Earle Guy of S. George went and fired the said Gabions, and the Sauoyard entered into the Spanish Trenches, where there were many slain on both sides: the Earle Guy was shot into the shoulder with a Musket, and two Spanish Captaines were slain. This action was like not only to hinder, but even to breake off the Treatie of Peace: yet it was apparently seene, that the Spanish Armie decayed dayly; and on the contrarie the Sauoyard increased with Gentlemen and Souldiers, which (notwithstanding proclamation to the contrarie in France) found the means to get thither.

The Ambassador of France, was very desirous, seeing he had brought the Sauoyard and Spaniard so neere the Temple of peace, that they should enter the same; and to this end exhorted the Duke of Sauoy to signe the Capitulation the same day: which hee did that evening. On the morrow, the Ambassador went vnto the Spanish campe, to cause the Gouvernour of Millan to signe the two promises of observing the points of the accord: which were of this tenour:

Articles of a Peace between the King of Spain, and Duke of Sauoy.

That for so much as the most Christian King by his Ambassador had invited him; as also his Maiestie of Great Brittain by Sir Dudley Carleton, and the Swiflers by their Ministers effectually exhorted him vnto peace, for the publicke good of all Christendome:

His Highnesse for the reverence and respect he beares vnto their Maiesties, and the Common-wealth of Venice, and the desire he hath to satisfie them, and all the world of his good will and love vnto the peace and tranquillitie of the Christian Common-wealth, according to the desire of the above-named Princes and States, is content, and promisseth to disarme himselfe within one month after publication of these presents. And not to retaine out of his whole Armie, above foure ordinarie companies of Swiflers for the assistance of his Estates, and defence of his places, and as many of his subiects as shall suffice for their safeties.

He promisseth also, not to offend the Duke of Mantua: and touching their differences and pretensions, his Highnesse shall not attempt any thing by force against the said Duke, but shall proceed civilly by way of Iustice before the Emperor, in regard whereof the Marquis of Rembouillet promised in his Kings name, that the vassals and subiects of the Duke of Mantua, which have caried Armes, and serued his Highnesse of Sauoy in the last warre of Montferrat, shall be secured for their persons, and restored to their goods, to enioy them as before the warre.

All places shall be restored after this disarming, withall the Artillery, Armes, and Munition which was found in them, with all prisoners taken on either side: And in case the Spaniards (contrarie to the Tenour of this Treatie, and the Word given by the King of Spaine to the Christian King) shall directly, or indirectly, seeke to trouble his Highnesse in his person, or Estates, his most Christian Maiestie shall take their protection vpon him, and shall give him all necessarie aide for his defence. The execution of the retreat of both Armies, shall be made in this manner:

The manner of the Armes
retiring.

The Marquis of Rembouillet shall intreat his Highnesse to draw 2000 foot out of Aste, and at the same instant hee shall write to the Gouvernour of Millan, and intreat him to withdraw the King of Spaines Armie from those places where it now lies, and cause to retire as fast as Croix Blanche: After which, the Marquis shall againe intreat his Highnesse to retire the rest of his Armie, retaining only a sufficient number for the defence of his Estates. And the same day that this shall be effected, he shall make request vnto the Gouvernour, to retire with all the Catholique Kings Armie out of his Country. And the said Marquis did promise vnto his Highnesse in his Kings name, that the Gouvernour of Millan presently after they had disarmed, should so dispose of the whole Armie, as neither his Highnesse, nor any other Prince should have cause of ialousie, neither should they demand in the Catholique Kings name, any passage for souldiers through his Highnesse territories, during the space of fixe months next ensuing.

His most Christian Maiestie shall presently command the Marshall of Deslignieres, and all the Gouvernours of Prouinces which confine vpon his Highnesse Estates, having effected what he ought, (in case the Spaniards should faile on their part) to assist him with all their forces, without expecting any other order or commandement from Court, and notwithstanding any prohibition they haue formerly had. That the Swiflers and Vassals shall haue free traffique in the Duchy of Millan, as they had before the Warre.

That his most Christian Maiestie should pardon all his Vassals, and Subiects, who contrarie to his proclamations had seru'd his Highnesse in this occasion, restoring them to their honors, pensions and entertainments, and granting them all necessarie Letters of abolition according to the custome of France. His Highnesse had three moneths time to give aduice to his friends and confederates to forbear from all Acts of hostilitie, yet if any thing should be done during the said time, it should not prejudice the peace, his Highnesse restoring those things which should be taken; and giving satisfaction to the parties interested.

And all the said things (except the order which shall be given to the Marshall D'Anvers, and other Gouvernours of France) shall be effected by his Maiestie, after his Highnesse disarming: the said Marquis promising in his Kings name to see the contents of this Treatie duely observed, as well for that which doth concerne the most Christian King, as for that which depends vpon his Catholique Maiestie, and to cause all to be ratified by his most Christian Maiestie, within twenty dayes after the conclusion of this Treatie, the which was signed on the 21 of June, by the Duke of Sauoy, the Marquis of Rembouillet, and the Agent for France: His Maiesties Ambassador of Great Brittain did also signe this Capitulation, with these words. That if they should faile on the King of Spaines behalfe, or would directly, or indirectly vnderake against his Highnesse person, or his Estates, that the King his Master would take them into his protection, and give them all necessary aide for his defence. Signed Dudley Carleton.

The Ambassador for the State of Venice did the like, promising that if after his Highnesse of Sauoy had disarmed, the Spaniard should faile in the conditions promised, and should offer violence vnto his Highnesse, to visite themselves for his defence with the Crowne of France, and with other Princes which had subscribed to this Capitulation. Signed Reinier Zeno.

After all this the Marquis of Inojosa Gouvernour of Millan, promised vnder his hand to performe the Articles of this Treatie. Thus these warres were ended by the mediation of the French King, without arming, or oppressing his subiects with the ruines of warre. He made himselfe as it were an Arbitrator between these two great Princes; protected the Estate of Sauoy, and stayed this Duke from attempting any thing by armes in Montferrat, against the Duke of Mantua.

There doe many times grow ielousies, and afterwards quarrels, betwixt the Gouvernours, and the Kings Lieutenants in one Prouince. The Duke of Longueuille, Gouvernour of Picardy, and the Marshall D'Ancre (who was the Kings Lieutenant there, and Gouvernour of the towne and Castle of Amiens) were in no good termes. There hapned many things in the beginning of this yeare to increase their quarrell. The Marshall D'Ancre had resolved to settle himselfe in Picardie, and especially in the Cittadell of Amiens, where hee had caused certaine houses to be beaten down neere the bridge, which diuides the Cittadell from the towne by a Channell of the River of Soame, the which hee cauled to be so accommodated, as he might draw it when hee pleased. This Bridge did increase the ielousies betweene the Duke and the Marshall, and betweene the Inhabitants of Amiens, and the Cittadell. The townefmen complaining that they could not goe in and out on horsebacke by the Bridge at their pleasure. All these distrusts betweene the Duke and the Marshall made them propound an exchange of the Government of Normandie, for that of Picardie, the which the Duke would not accept. In June the Duke and the Inhabitants of Amiens had resolved to breake the chaines of the Bridge, called Pont Dolent: for the effecting whereof, the Duke came downe accompanied with thirty horse, setting certaine Lock-Smiths on worke to breake the chaines, but they were interrupted by some which came out of the Cittadell, which caused an alarme within the towne and Cittadell, so as all went to Armes. Whereupon the Duke to auoid any further inconuenience, resolved to depart, sending word to the Gouvernour of the Cittadell, that although he had not aduertised him of his intention to breake that Bridge, yet he had sufficient authoritie to doe it as Gouvernour of the Prouince. They told him that without doubt those which had resisted, would be disauowed by the Marshall. That upon this occasion they were of aduice, that he should suffer the Duke of Longueville to breake the Bridge in his presence, by which means they should pacifie all their formes: That after his departure they might repaire it againe if the Marshall did so command. Hercleque hauing in a manner yielded to this aduice; they sent word hereof to the Duke: and du Thier, (who had made all this opposition) was inuited to retire from the Bridge into the Cittadell with his souldiers. Whereupon hee went to the Gouernour, who propounded the resolution vnto him with all the considerations: to whom hee answered, That hee had vnderaken to keepe and make good the Pont Doleint, or there to die; that they might not abandon it, without committing the greatest basenesse which could be imagined, and vnworthy of men which bore Armes; And hereupon returned to the Bridge; where hauing spoken with the souldiers, they promised to assist him with the hazard of their liues. Whereupon the Gouernour aduertised the Duke of Longueville, entreating him not to attempt any thing, considering du Thiers resolution. The Duke to auoid some greater combustions, refused to giue ouer his designe, and retire himselfe to his lodging. The newes hereof being come to Court, du Thier was commended; and afterwards aduanced to a command of Horse.

The Prince of Conde & other great men retire from Court.

Their Maiesties hauing resolved to part, about the end of Iune, to goe into Guienne; all things being prepared in Paris for the mariages. The Companies of Horse being called to accompany them this voyage. And the continuing the ancient Councillors of State, for the government of affaires. All these things I say increased the Iealousies and discontentes of the Prince of Conde, and other great personages which had assisted him in the former alterations, taking diuers pretexts to retire themselves from Court. The Prince of Conde was the first. Some write that hee held himselfe much wronged by the Seigneurs of Dole, and Eulon Councillors of State: and that he had protested he would no more returne to Court while they fate in Council.

The Duke of Bouillon Letter to President Lamm.

In the beginning of Iune; The Marshall of Bouillon wrote this following Letter to President Lamm, which treats of nothing but matters of State; and shewes reasons for their discontentes.

Sir, I had written vnto you, but receiued no answer. I doe not thinke that all libertie is yett lost, but that they which haue place and Office in the Kings Councill, may communicate what they hope for, or that which is contriued in the affaires of State, that by these communications they may finde out the moanes which are offered to carry them to more profitable counsels, and to free them from those which may hurt and weaken the royall dignity, which is the ground-woke whereon this Estate hath her chiefe support. I haue seene the remonstrances of the Parliament, and the Decree of the Kings Councill: by the which it seemes his Maiestie is much offended with the Parliament, ordaining that the Decree and Remonstrances shall be cancelled and brought out of the Register vnto his Maiestie. Being none of the Robe to vnderstand their formes, I will make a brieue relation of the thing: which is, concerning the aduice which that great and honorable company giues vnto the King of many things importing his seruice. They forcing nothing, neither in the time, nor in the forme, which his Maiestie and the Queene would hold for the redressing thereof. His Maiestie seemes to referre these remedies to the answer of the Estates grieuances; which Estates as you and I know, had little or no libertie, and lesse satisfaction to carry into their Princes; which leaues small hope that in their answers there will be any contentment for the publique. The ouerture made by those Remonstrances will giue his Maiestie occasion to satisfie many bad Censures, which haue bene made of the successe of affaires, seeing that the ouerture to the remedies is ill taken. That we see notable changes in their resolutions, as of the annuall Rent called Paulette, and the sale of Offices, which they did allow, and promised solemnly to the Estates; yet since they haue confirmed both, and left them as they were before. They command the Generall Deputies of them of the Religion, to take a Brieve for their assembly at Gergeau, and yet without any cause or motion of them of the Religion, they transferred it to Grenoble. These examples, shew the change of Councils. They speake also of the execution of the marriage, by which it seemes they will augment the feares of such as loue the Estate; the progresse whereof hath bene communicated to few or none of those who principally ought to haue knowledge thereof. Wee see daily many Commissions sealed, and dispatched. The Duke of Sauoy more and more oppressed. The King of Spaines forces

A forces a foot in many places, and so shall likewise those of France bee leauied. And why so? but to violate the Kings right, and that of the State, in fauour of his most flourishing enemies? Who sayes it is not good the King should marry? or that the Infanta is not the greatest Princeesse in Europe? Who knows not that the mariages betwixt great personages should marry the persons, but not the Estates, and that in this regard no man hath dilikt of this alliance? But the proceedings and preparations make many feare, that it will engage vs in our former miseries, trouble vs, and make vs lose our ancient Allies, and vnite vs to those which will draw vs from the greatnesse of our Estate, to the exaltation of theirs; from our rest to troubles; and from the ballance which France hath alwayes held in the affaires of Europe, to a forced coniunction with Spaine. The feare of these inconveniences is lawfull, and the desire of the remedy which should be bred in all true Frenchmen, to pray vnto God to inspire the Queenes heart, to diuert it as it seemes easie. If they would with the greatest part of the State deliberate of these things, and take aduice to remedy them, not sparing any one whom they shall finde to be Author of these bad counsels: They shall know them that loue their Maiesties, and the State, and not by the false colours which are giuen by daily slanders, the which are more credited then truth. And for that I know I am more assaulted then any other, I desire to make my actions knowne to the world. They say I make leaues of souldiers, it is vnture; but if I should assure my selfe by my friends, what should I doe, but every man in France doth the like? What can I thinke when they leaue forces in France for the Kings seruice, and I am not employed to haue the chiefe command? If they employ not me and other good Frenchmen, Is it not a signe that these forces shall serue to support factions contrary to the State. If this be so, why should I suffer my selfe to be oppressed, hauing committed no basenesse nor treacherie? Sir, you that loue the King and the Estate, be a means they may cast their eyes vpon the remedies, and vpon the length and diuersitie of accidents, to the end they may aduance the one, and recoyle the other, to the which I will contribute faithfully, and courageously what lyces in me without any consideration of mine owne particular. I will not omit the refusal of that which is due vnto me, in regard of Sedan, and for the protection thereof, which shewes that they neglect the Kings right, and a thing of great importance, the which (notwithstanding these bad affections,) I will preferre with the helpe of God for the Kings seruice, and good of France, and that no fraud or power shall diuert me.

To this Letter there was an answer published vnder the name of an ancient Councillor of State, wherein he said, That they which gouerned the State, were the cause of the abuses and disorders, that the Fountaine of all the miseries of France, proceeded from the discontent of great men, who thought they were not fauoured enough. That few busineses concerning the generall good of the Estate had been concluded, without the aduice of the greatest which were in Court, especially of the Prince of Conde. That their Maiesties desire was to reforme the Councill, if there were any necessity. That they stirred vp the people to rebell, rather then ease them. The state of the reuennues since the Kings death, and the great expences to maintaine the Kings autoritie, and to preserve France from ciuill Warres in the last alterations procured by the Prince of Conde. That the publishing of the Remonstrances of the Parliament, had bene done by some which fauoured designs preiudicial to the State. That the King had more interest to maintaine the autoritie of Iustice, then any of his subiects. Hee makes answer to the Marshalls complaints, touching the change of resolutions in Councill, and of their Maiesties care to maintaine the alliances of the Crowne of France. That it should be a shame for the King to deferre the execution of the mariages. Their Maiesties holie desire to maintaine peace amongst Christian Princes. That the Princes leauied men secretly.

F Their Maiesties had resolved to be at Bourdeaux vpon the eighth of September: but the insupportable heate, and some affaires of State, stayed their departure vntill the 17 of August: and in the mean time the King had inuited the Prince of Conde by word of mouth, to giue him so much contentment as to accompany him in his voyage, and afterwards hee sent the Countesse of Soissons and the Duke of Neuers to perswade him; but seeing that he was gone from Saint Maur to Clermont, he dispatched the Seigneur of Villeroi vnto him. First, to presse him to satisfie his desire, and to returne to Court to accompany him to Bayonne. Secondly, to learne the cause of his absence: for his Maiestie desired fired that he (being the first Prince of his blood) should have the honour to conduct Madame the Kings Sister, and to receive the Princess of Spaine his promised Spouse. But he made answer that before he returned to Court to accompany the King in his voyage, they must provide for the reformation of some disorders which were in the State, that is to say: 1. Upon the assembling of the Kings Council. 2. Touching the Remonstrances of the Parliament: and 3. Touching certaine points which concerned his owne particular, and that of his friends: This being reported vnto their Maiesties by Monsieur de Villeroi, they tooke aduice for reformation of the Kings Council, and gaue an extract of their intentions vnto him vpon that subiect, and sent him the second time vnto the said Prince, who having presented them, and deliuered his charge, the Prince seemed to allow of the Kings intentions, touching the reformation of his Council: but touching the other points, which were represented vnto him, he said hee could not resolve any thing before hee had conferred with his friends: whereupon he departed presently from Clermont to Couchy, for two reasons: the first (as they said) was, for that it was easie to surprize his person remaining any longer at Clermont, there being many companies of men at Armes and light-horse lying thereabouts: and the second was, to meete with the Dukes of Longueville and Maine, the Earle of Paul, and the Marshall of Bouillon.

Monsieur de Villeroi sent againe vnto the Prince of Condé.

Monsieur de Villeroi third Voyage to the Prince of Condé.

The King desirous to give content vnto the Prince, and to take from him all subiect and pretext of his absence from Court, he sent the said Villeroi backe the third time, to testifie vnto him his Maiesties loue, where they entered into conference, the which if it had not bene interrupted, it was thought would have given content both to the King and Prince. But his Maiestie considering that time did presse him to beginne his voyage of Guienne; and to be at Bourdeaux the eighth of September, whereof they had aduertised the King of Spaine, they resolved to part on the first of August, their Maiesties giving warning vnto all, which should attend them to prepare themselves: whereof they thought good to aduertise the Prince, and other Princes and Noblemen which were with him, giving the charge vnto the Seigneur of Pont-Chartrain a Secretary of State, commanding him to ioyne with Monsieur de Villeroi to present the Kings Letter vnto the Princes: who comming to Couchy on the 27 of Iuly, acquainted Monsieur Villeroi therewith. But he perswaded him to forebare the delierie, for that hee was vpon the point to reconcile the Prince vnto his Maiestie, and that all would succeed well, if the conference were not interrupted: notwithstanding Pont-Chartrain told him that the King had resolved to depart within sixe dayes, and that hee had given expresse commandement to aduertise the Prince thereof, and to deliuer him his Letters, the contents were as foll oweth.

Pont-Chartrain brings Letters to the Prince.

Coult 1. I have often made you acquainted with my desire, that you should accompany me in my voyage to Guienne, for the accomplishment of my marriage, and have inuited you to come vnto me for that subiect; yea, I haue let you vnderstand my good intentions touching certaine points, whereof you desired to be satisfied, before your returne, as well concerning the generall, as other things: to which end I haue often sent Monsieur de Villeroi vnto you, by whom you might be assured of my affection, & loue, and of the Queen my mothers vnto you. Notwithstanding, I haue not yet heard your intention, there being nothing but excusations and delays on your part: wherefore being pressed to depart, I send the Seigneur of Pont-Chartrain, to acquaint you with my resolution, meaning to depart on the first of the next month without delay; and to inuite you againe on my behalf, to come and accompany me, and to hold the ranke which is due vnto you by your qualitie and birth; or tell them (if contrarie to my hope) your intent be to make any difficultie, and to deny mee this content, to the end I may be fully satisfied, being the chiefe subiect of his voyage: referring my selfe to that which Monsieur de Villeroi, and he shall deliuer vnto you, I pray God, &c. The Kings Letter to the Prince of Condé.

The Prince taking occasion to breake off the Conference vpon the Kings sodaine departure: by his answer he besought him to haue patience, vntill that hee had given order for these Articles aboue mentioned, otherwise he could not assist his Maiestie in the said voyage. This was the tenour of this answer.

Sir, vnderstanding by the Letter, which your Maiestie hath been pleased to write vnto me, of your sodaine resolution to vndertake your voyage of Guienne; and the commandement you made me to come and assist your Maiestie; I was of opinion that this hastie depart-

A departure (before you had settled the affaires of your Estate, and provided for the disorders which have bene presented vnto you, as well by the generall Estates, as by your Parliament of Paris) was a continuation of their bad counsels which are the Authors, whom I haue not heretofore named in my most humble Remonstrances, to the end I might not displease you, nor the Queene your Mother, hoping they would forebare to abuse your Maiesties bounty: but seeing they continue to make vse of your authority for a pretext of their pernicious designs, and violent Counsels, too publique to be any longer suffered; seeing they employ them to the subversion of your Estate, to the weakening of your Crowne, the ruine of your House, and of other Princes, Officers of your Crowne, and chiefe of your Nobilitie; I am forced, Sir, after long patience to present vnto your Maiestie (with the humilitie of a most humble subiect) the iust reasons which stay mee from obeying your commandement. I will tell your Maiestie, that when I was retired to Creil, it having pleased you to send Monsieur de Villeroi with commandement to come vnto you, making offers that your Maiestie would aduise to settle some good order in the publique affaires of your Realme: I made him answer, that hauing bene eight moneths at Paris, where I had sene the beginning, progresse, and issue of the Estates such as it was, the practices which were vsed to corrupt the Deputies, and to frustrate their deliberations, and resolutions: The Parliament insulted vpon, and vnworthily intreated, for that they desired to serue your Maiestie: my life, and the liues of many other Princes and Lords of qualitie put to compromise; for that wee deliuered our opinions freely in your counsell, touching those things which were presented for your seruice, and the good of the Estate, I could not returne with dignity nor safety, vntill it should please your Maiestie to provide for the reformation of your Councils, and the publique disorders contained in the remonstrances of your Parliament. Whereupon it pleased you to send him backe againe to Clermont, with a more ample commission, we conferred together touching the reformation of your Council, and the orders which hee had charge to shew mee: and as for the Remonstrances of the Parliament, I did forebare to deliuer my opinion, vntill I had conferred with other Princes, and Officers of your Crowne, which concur in the same opinion with me; as Monsieur de Villeroi hath given your Maiestie to vnderstand, who not disliking of this treatie, had thought good to send him backe to this place; where being arrived this morning, we were already entered into conference, touching the said Remonstrances, so as matters seemed to bee vpon termes of a good accommodation, whom as the Seigneur of Pont-Chartrain arriving, hee deliuered mee your Maiesties Letter, and acquainted mee with your sodaine departure, the which depriveth the publique of the fruit which they expected by the issue of this conference, makes matters impossible to bee executed by reason of your haste: and by this means increaseth the disorders which are in your Estate, whereof I am constrained to name the authors vnto your Maiestie, which are, The Marshall D'Ancre, the Chancellor, the Commander of Sillery, Dole, and Bullion, who had bene onely aymed at by the remonstrances of the Parliament, on whom I beseech your Maiestie to doe publique Iustice; ordaining that the complaints made against their actions may bee verified, and that they may bee proceeded against by ordinarie course, according to the vsuall forme; as also for the assassinate or murder, committed some few dayes since vpon the person of the Seigneur of Prouille, Sergeant Maior of the Towne of Amiens, by an Italian Souldier of the Cittadell, ordaining that hee may be deliuered into the hands of the ordinarie Iudges, to proceede in his tryall as hee is wicked an adulterer.

And vntill the orders for the reformation of your Council may be made and executed, the Remonstrances of the Court examined; the disorders contained therein provided for, and Iustice done as well on those persons whom I haue now named to your Maiestie, as of the said Italian Souldier: I most humbly beseech you to excuse me, if I cannot attend you in your voyage: the which otherwise I would and will without any difficultie, if it please your Maiestie to provide for these things before your departure. Remaining your most humble, &c. Henry de Bourbon. From Concy the 27 of Iuly 1615.

By this answer their Maiesties conceived that the Princes designe tended, to stay their said voyage, and to lose the commoditie for this year, the which was sufficiently verified by the refusal the other Princes and Noblemen with him, made to assist the King in this voyage. Whereupon their Maiesties being frustrate of this content which they expected from the said Princes; and that they all declared themselves to bee discontented, the which might breed some combustions within the Realme; It was resolved in Councell to aduertise the Gouvernours of Provinces, commanding them to provide for the safety of their townes, to the end that no troubles might happen to the prejudice of the Kings service, and the peace of the Realme. Whereupon Letters were sent into all Provinces, commanding the Gouvernors of Townes, Places, and Castles, not to give entry vnto the said Princes; That they should keepe a strict guard during their Maiesties voyage: Nor receiue any but such as had expresse commission from his Maiestic.

But before I proceed in this publike action of the Kings voyage, I must relate an excess committed at Amiens, wherof the Prince of Conde makes mention in his Letter. The Iudge criminall of Amiens, had caused an Italian souldier of the Cittadell to bee hanged for wounding an Apothecaries seruant. The Marshall D'Ancre being at Paris, and receiving aduertisement thereof, was wonderfully offended, vowing reuenge; and that hee would cause the Iudges nose and eares to be cut off. Hee wrote in choller to Hottelogue, Gouvernour of the Cittadell, who excused himselfe and laid the fault vpon Prouille, Sergeant Maior of the Towne. On the two and twentieth of Iuly Vincen Lodouici the Marshalls Secretarie came vnto the Cittadell to pay the Souldiers. Prouille hearing thereof went from the Towne to visit him, where making many excuses for that which was past in the execution of the Italian Souldier, hee rooke his leave, and retired. Vpon the way neere vnto Pont-Dolent, hee was met by Alphonso, another Italian Souldier of the Cittadell, who at his first approach gaue him two stabs with his dagger and slue him, and then fled into the Cittadell. The iustice took vp the dead bodie, and vpon the complaint of his kinsfolke and friends, they demanded of Hottelogue the Souldier Alphonso to proceed against him. But Hottelogue made answer, that it was a businesse of great importance; That both he and the Souldiers of the Cittadell remembered the execution of the Italian Souldier which was hanged: An execution held by all men to haue bene rashly done, and that it had bred ryots betwene the Souldiers of the Cittadell and some inhabitants. Wherefore to maintaine the peace, and to take away all occasions of combustions, he must aduertise their Maiesties of what had past in the death of Prouille: That Alphonso was not to be tryed before the Criminall Iudge of Amiens being a Souldier. That he had caused him to bee put in prison, and that according to their Maiesties commandement, he would deliuer him to the Prouost Marshall which should be appointed for his tryall. That Alphonso protested he had no premeditated designe to offend Prouille; who meeting him had vsed some words of contempt against his Nation: whereupon they growing into choller, Prouille stricke him with his fist, and he had slaine him.

The kinsfolke and friends of Prouille pretended on the other side, that it was a murder they committed of purpose, & commanded by the Marshall D'Ancre and his wife. That Alphonso had bene at Paris, and was returned but three dayes before. That before the fact hee had bene seene walke an houre together alone like a melancholy person, hauing some bad designe: and that Prouille would rather haue stricke him with a cudgell which hee caried then with his fist. Lodouici was sent speedily to Paris to aduertise the Marshall of what had past; who deliuering the Gouvernours Letters vnto him being in bed, hee sate vp, swearing a great oath, that it was too much, that he should haue giuen him a slash ouer the face, or done him some affront, and not to haue slaine him. But afterwards by the Marshalls commandement, the Gouvernour tooke him out of prison and conducted him himselfe into Flanders.

This death of Prouille hapned when as the Duke of Longueville went to the Assembly of Coucy, where the Prince of Conde received newes thereof. They all conceiuing that the occasion which was offered by the discontent of the people of Amiens vpon this accident, would aide them much to expell those which were in the Cittadell of Amiens. Whereupon the Duke of Longueville was to returne the next day to Amiens to entertaine such as hee thought were incensed against

A against the Cittadell, and that according the disposition of affaires, the Princes would draw all their forces into Picardy, to assure themselves of Amiens, and of whatsoever else they could get by force or intelligence; but the Queene hauing notice hereof, shee sent Nerefant to command in the Cittadell of Amiens, and Longueuil governed the Towne.

The Duke of Longueville being returned from Coucy to Amiens, the Towne and Cittadell were full of practices, reports, and distrusts. The Duke going out of Amiens on the Saturday morning, the second of August, came backe againe the same night, hee had giuen out that he was gone to hunt the Stagge; and those of the Cittadell beleebed he was gone to Corbie, and that the place was at his deuotion, as well as the heart of Rubempre; that it was the Rendezvous of his friends, that from thence they might with more conueniencie make them Masters of Amiens, and the Cittadell. The inhabitants in the meane time were in feare, apprehending that their Towne would be made the Theater where the Duke and they of the Cittadell would Act their Tragedies. Some of the people which did affect the Duke offered to make a Corps de Garde before his lodging. But they of the Cittadell being armed with the Kings name, and his Letters Patents; by which they were forbidden to receiue the Duke of Longueville into any Towne of his government of Picardie; they sent for the chiefe of the Clergie, the Magistracie, and the Inhabitants into the Cittadell, to whom hauing read the said Letters containing his Maiesties pleasure, they all protested to continue constant in the Kings obedience.

The Duke of Longueville hearing of all this; as hee was at dinner on Sunday the thirteenth of August, hee was informed that the Captaines and Souldiers of the Cittadell were arming and preparing themselves for some designe. Whereupon his people calling to Armes, they seized vpon a Port, by the which hee retired to Corbie. The Duke hauing receiued this affront, wrote his Letters of complaint vnto the King, informing him, that the Lieutenant and Souldiers of the Cittadell, had suborned two Traitors to draw him from Corbie to Amiens, saying, that it was very necessarie for the Kings service, and the preservation of the Towne, that he should go speedily: the which hee did in the night, being onely accompanied with three horse. Being arised, the people offered to make a guard before his lodging, the which hee refused, being as free from feare, as hee was from guilt. That being the next day at dinner, they of the Cittadell beganne to cry to Armes, telling the people that there were 1000 horse at the gates which came to surprize them, seeking by this means to draw them into a mutiny, where assuring themselves that I would come (how soeuer accompanied) they meant to surprize me; but being aduertised thereof by one of the partie (an honest man then the rest) he seized vpon a gate where he attended their coming; but they seeing they could not execute their pernicious designe, they sent him a Letter in his Maiesties name, by the which he had declared him guiltie of high treason, & forbidden all the townes of his government to receiue him. That he had retired to Corbie, whither his friends had come vnto him to preuent the like designe, and not to suffer these men to get so great power & authoritie in Picardie, as in time to come his Maiestic should be no more obeyed; to preuent the which, hee would willingly employ his life. Befeeching his Maiestic that hereafter he would not engage himselfe in their interests, nor suffer them to abuse his name and authoritie; but to doe as Kings his predecessors haue done, which was, To make themselves neuters in particular quarrels, to the end that hee might the more easily oppose himselfe against the violent designs they had vpon his life and fortunes, and that afterwards hee would willingly sacrifice both the one and the other for his Maiesties service.

After the declaration of the Kings will, which was sent to all the townes and countries of his obedience, to forbid the Princes entrance, and that their Maiesties were resolved to depart without any delay. The Prince seeing they would haue no regard vnto his remonstrances, resolved to warre; but before hee would take Armes, hee caused a declaration of his designs to be published, the which hee sent to the King and Queene, and caused it to be printed and dispersed ouer all France and foraine countries. The chiefe points whereof are.

That hauing often acquainted the King and Queene mother, with the miseries and disorders which afflicted France; and multiply dayly. Some about the King, and verting this nourishment into poison, made the remedy to bee the entertainment of the A disease. 1. He complains, That demanding iustice for the abuses & disorders within the Realme, they sought to oppress him by Armes, and the Kings forces. 2. That such proceedings against humble suitors, innocents, and unarmed, having beene publickly detected, there were yet some good men about their Maiesties, which stayed the execution of so pernicious a Councell, and then they propounded a conference, which was concluded at Saint Maneould by a goodly resolution, for the assembling of the generall E- states of the Realme, the wholesome remedie for domestique wounds. 3. That they did expect a happy successe of the said Estates, and farre other then did appeare by the event; the remedies which they had applied were made fitter to nourish and enter- B raise the disease, then to cure it. 4. That they had made practices throughout all the Prouinces for the election of Deputies; that they had called none to particular conuoca- tions but whom they pleased; and that the libertie of election had beene wholly sup- pressed by Monopolies, threats, and violencies. 5. That they had sent instructions throughout the Prouinces, of that which they would have inserted in their Bills, the which in many places had beene drawne, and neuer imparted to the bodies of Townes and communalties, as well of the Nobilitie, as of the people; so as the Estates assembled had nothing but the name, for that the people hath not yet found any ease by them, nor conceiued any good hope, but many prefaces or more miserie. 6. That the house of Commons (which was the greatest part of the assembly) desiring (according to the C affection they beare vnto the King) to provide for the safety of his person, by a reme- die held fit by all good men; they had beene commanded to silence, by a Decree of the Kings Councell, as if the safety of the life of Kings had beene a scrupulous proposition, and not worthy to moue debate: so as by this silence or base preuarication, they have consented to the setting of so dangerous a mischief against the sacred persons of Kings, as to cause the Article to be drawne out of the instructions of the Estates, which menti- oned a search of the detestable murder committed on the person of the deceased King of happy memory, whereof the bloody wound cryeth for vengeance before the ius- tice of God against the treacherous authors of his death. 7. He complains that an Italian Souldier of the Cittadell of Amiens was so audacious as to assassinate pub- D likely the Seigneur of Prouille, Sergeant Maior of this frontier Towne, and no ius- tice hitherto done; and yet in the meane time many Gentlemen haue beene rigo- rously pursued for slight causes, being sensible of the treacherie of their household ser- uants, which hath been held a great offence, for that they had affected the said Princes seruice, and hee had taken their protection. 8. Hee said they had vsed all art and inuentions to leauy money of the people, and that there had beene thirtie five or forty Edicts sealed to that end. That this money was not appointed to come into the Kings Coffers, nor to supply the publique necessitie of the State, but to glut the in- satiable couerousnesse of some private persons. 9. That these things and many o- ther of the like nature, too boldly attempted, had beene made manifest to the Estates, E who hauing nothing remaining but the name of their ancient Dignitie, it was not law- full for them to propound any thing without the consent of those which are the au- thors of disorders; and if any good men (not defiled with corruption, and in whose hearts there remained any sparke of the vertue of our Ancestors) haue started for griefe, and cast out the last sobes of their dying libertie, they were put to silence, and by this means the little good which was expected from this assembly was smothered. Moreover hee said, that being resolu'd to goe and exhort euery one to lay- aside priuate interests, and to bend their affections to the good of the Kings seruice, and the ease of his people, and to expose himselfe first of all to the censure of the E- states, and to awaken their fidelitie and diligence, to doe their endeavors for the lay- ing open of the causes and authors of so many miseries; to propound the reme- dies, and to beseech the King to punish the guiltie; hee had notice giuen him, that the King forbade him to goe to the Estates. 10. Hee complaineth that ha- uing forborne to enter into the Estates, to the end there should no fault be imputed vnto him (but that his too great affection vnto the Kings seruice, and the good of the State is made a crime) they would haue seised vpon his person, and of other Princes, Of- ficers of the Crowne and Noblemen, who cannot endure to see the Maiesty of their King 10

A so miserably troden vnder foot, nor the shamefull and licentious prophanation of all things: And for that the people could not be perswaded that such violencies had beene commanded by his Maiestie. It was concluded in concell to disfigure the Parisians, to change the Captaines of quarters; to take away the chains of their streets; to weaken the strength of the Towne; and to lodge Swifles and other Souldiers there. 11. He said that as these Estates had yielded no fruit, but pensions and aides to many Deputies of corrupt consciences, and a doubling of miseries, and apprehensions to the poore people. The Court of Parliament of Paris (which hath alwayes yielded so many testimonies of her fidelitie for the preservation of this Crowne, which watcheth continually for B the Kings seruice; and hath alwayes to profitably directed her Councells to the good of the Estate) had in March last decreed vnder the Kings good pleasure, that the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and other Officers of the Crowne, which haue place and voice in the Court, should be invited, to aduise vpon the propositions which should be made for the Kings seruice; the ease of his subjects, and the good of his Estate: they sought presently to perswade his Maiestie that the Parliament had attempted against his authoritie, and by diuers practices to make the iust intentions of this company to be suspected; yea to moue him to indignation. Whereupon the Parliament hauing presented their humble remon- strances, whereby they layed open the miseries which did afflict the State, and discouered those which were the Authors: which made euery good man hope to see a speedy refor- C mation of the affaires, & examples of iustice in the punishment of the culpable: But they made a Decree in the Councell of State, declaring the Parliament incompetent, to repre- sent vnto the King the miseries & disorders which multiplied daily to the oppression of his subjects, and ruine of his Estate, terming them calumnious, & enterprisers of disobe- dience against his Maiestie, ordaining that (to extinguish the memory) they should be taken out of the Registers of the Court & brought to his Maiesty. 12. He complains that they suffer some Councillors of State to vsurpe all the power of the kingdome, & to change all things as they list; peruert the lawes and order of iustice; to abuse and tread downe the Parliament, suppress all honest true Frenchmen, and the Kings faithfull seruants, all the D Court depending vpon them which can giue Pensions, and Benefices, Offices and govern- ments, and dare offer violence at the gate of the Loure, in the Kings Chamber, and in his presence. 13. He saith that the world sees, that since the alliances with Spaine, what contempt they make of forraigne Princes and Neighbourhood, and of the ancient friends & allies of this Crowne, and the great aduantages the Spaniards haue gotten in diuers places, witnesse the taking of Aix and Wesell, and many others vnjustly detained by the Mar- quis Spinola in the Countries of Cleues and Iuliers. They know that this alliance is not onely of persons, but of Councells. They see that the King goes to mingle his affaires with a Prince which is in his full vigour; opens an entry for him into all the parts of his Realme; communicates his counsels vnto him to rectifie his, for the government of his Estate: and they are not ignorant that the Queene his wife will haue her affections, her E fauourites, and her designs. That shee will haue power to bring in Spaniards into the greatest governments of the most important places, as they had seene Italians since the Kings death.

That they were in alarme for the Kings sudden departure, to see them without ne- cessitie (the affaires of the Realme being in so bad an estate) secke to force Nature, and to hazard the health of his person, by the accomplishment of this marriage; the which might be deferred to another season, to auoid the dangers and inconueniences which are to be feared. In the meane time the King should grow in age, and in strength of body and minde; the affaires in better estate; His subjects more content; his neighbours and allies better assured, and his person in better disposition to marry. Hee should no more depend F on the ambition, couerousnesse, and peruerse affections of any one. Hee should be mode- rator of his owne will, and hold the reines of his Empire. Hee should be wife to free his people from miserie; strong to resist his enemies, and powerful to assure his ancient Al- lies. He should be flourishing in peace, inuincible in warre, his Realme filled with all blef- sings from heaven, and abound in all earthly felicities.

That they of the reformed Religion, who desire nothing, but rest vnder the benefit of the Edicts, complained also of this marriage, during the Kings tender age, as tending to their ruine; and also of the refusall made by the Nobilitie in the Estates, to demand the maintenance of the Edicts of pacification, the which ought to bee obserued as a fundamentall law of state. And also of the reception and obseruation of the Councell of Trent, sworne so solemnly within these few dayes by the Clergie, assembled at Paris, in view of the King and of his Councell, to the great contempt of his authoritie, and the honour of his Crowne, a thing neuer heard of before, and which had not been practised in France or elsewhere. Wherefore the Prince affirms that these reasons haue bound him humbly to beseech the King before his departure to prouide for the reformation of his Councells, and the disorders of the State. In the meane time to prevent slanders, and to informe the world of the integritie of his intention, hee addes what he thought fit for the satisfying of all Kings, Princes, Estates, and Nations of Christendome; and of the iust and necessarie reasons which moued him to retire from Court.

14. He saith, that since the Kings maiorieitie, and the assembly of the generall Estates, he hath benee alwayes neere vnto his Maieslie, to testifie his humble obedience by his preference and actions; confessing that he hath benee receiued with all testimonies of honour and fauour, when he hath benee silent of the publique miseries and calamities; and contrariwise ill intreated whensoever he came to touch this vicer. Euery man knew the affronts he had receiued; and that notwithstanding this contempt, (very sensible to a Prince of his quality and courage) he had continued eight moneths in Paris and although he had been often excited by his duty, prouoked by the cry of the publique; and urged by the violence of the cull it selfe, yet had hee alwayes patiently attended and tryed all means, vntill all men saw his preference grew more contemptible, then profitable. And to take away all occasion from such as were wont to calumniate his actions, hee restored into the Kings hands (in view of the Estates) the Towne and Castle of Amboise, which had benee giuen him by the Treatie of S. Manchould; to make knowne vnto all France, that he desired no other security but that which depended on his own innocencie, the fauour of their Maiesities; and the loue of all good men.

That they had vsed his Maiesties name, and sent the Siegneur of Saint Geran to forbid him to goe into the Parliament, vpon diuers occurrents, for the good of the State, with commandement to arrest him if he did not obey this violence, proceeding from the same counsaile which had often resolved put him in the Bastile, with the other Princes and chiefe Officers of the Crowne, which were vnto him. In the end (seeing that he exposed himselfe dayly to all sorts of dangers) he had retired himselfe to his houses for his more safety. After which followed the conferences with Monsieur de Villeroi and the Seigneur of Pont-Chartrain, as I haue formerly written. 15. Hee complains that vnder colour of this conference, they had a designe to surprize him in Clermont, hauing caused many companies of men at Armes and light-horse, to aduance and lodge thereabouts. But now it was no wonder if they had broken off the said conference, and negotiation begonne by Monsieur de Villeroi, seeing it did serue but for a cloake to a wicked and pernicious designe, the which they would since haue disguised.

With this Declaration the Prince of Conde, with the rest of the Princes and Noblemen which assisted him, publish a Proclamation, containing, That they had no other end but to yeeld all humble obedience due vnto his Maieslie, and the Queene his mother: That they did not consent vnto, nor participate with any of the pernicious Councells which were vsed in the government of this Estate. That they detested all factions, enterprises, and intelligences against the Kings authoritie; and that they desired to see a reformation of the State; the people relieved; iustice to raigine; the good to bee defended from all violence; the bad to bee punished, and things to be restored to their ancient splendour and dignity, by a generall reformation of so many disorders, and by the iust punishment of those which are the Authors. In the end, they entreated and exhorted all men of what condition or quality so euer, that call themselves Frenchmen, to assist and aide them in so iust a cause, coniuring all Princes and foraine Estates to doe the like, and not to suffer such good and loyall subiects to be suppressed by such a conspiracie. Cency 9. August.

The Prince sent this declaration with a Letter vnto the King, beseeching him to take it in good part, if he sent the said Declaration vnto all his Courts of Parliament, and other assemblies, and to all Princes and Estates, his allies and confederates; to the end that euery one might know whereto his actions tended, which had neuer any other end, but the good of his estate, and the preferuation of his Crowne. Hee wrote also

The Prince's protestation.

The Prince writes to the King.

A also vnto the Queene mother, by the which he gaue her to vnderstand, That his fidelity, birth, and courage, bound him to complaine of a Letter sent vnder the Kings authority vnto all the townes of France, forbidding them to open him their Gates: Madam, take good aduice, reiect that which is giuen you, seeing by the euent they are found ruinous. Excuse me (said he) if I oppose my selfe vnto the cull, observing my obedience to the King, and the respect due vnto your Maieslie; I send vnto the King the declaration of the iustificatiō of my actions past, and what I shall haue to doe hereafter, which he will communicate I hope vnto your Maieslie. He sent also this Manifestation vnto all the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, and to each one a Letter of almost one tenour.

B As for the Letters which the Prince sent vnto the Parliaments, he besought them, Not to endure (during his Maiesities tender age) those Ministers of State, which made a pretext of the Kings name to ruine the ancient Maximes and fundamentall lawes of the State, for the preferuation whereof their Court had benee established; Ioyne (said he) your designes with mine, which tend but vnto the publicke good, without any particular interest; this I protest and swear vnto you, which I beseech you to beleene. It is written, that all the Soueraigne Courts to the which hee wrote, sent the packets forthwith vnto his Maieslie without opening them.

On the thirtieth of Iuly, the Prince had sent the Seigneur of La Hay to the Assembly of the Reformed Religion at Grenoble; and he likewise sent to the Maior and Sheriffes of C Rochell, writing as followeth.

My masters, I send vnto you the Seigneur of Gruyolle, to let you vnderstand, that I haue likewise sent vnto the Assembly at Grenoble, and to enforme you particularly of that which hath past in the conference betwixt me and Monsieur de Villeroi, and the resolution which I haue thereupon taken; by the which I inuite you to ioyne your selues to my holy intentions, as well for the preferuation of the State, as to maintaine your selues in particular. It concerns you. The assistance that my Father and Grandfather haue alwayes had from you, makes me to hope for the like counterfeite from you, seeing that I haue the same affection to serue you. His Letter to the Assembly at Grenoble was to the same effect.

D Their Maiesities being aduertised of all these proceedings, and that the Prince continued discontent, yea that he meant to take Armes, it was resolved to prouide for the safety of the Townes and Prouinces of the Realme, especially for the Isle of France and Picardy, whither they sent many Commissions to leaue souldiers, and the Regiments of Ramburge and Nauarre were set on foot. The towne of Soissons (being the chiefe retreat for the Princes) their Maiesities were enformed that it was easie to surprize; there being yet no souldiers within it; and that the chiefe inhabitants would countenance this enterprise, if their Maiesities would send some souldiers of the Regiment of the Guards to execute it. They made this action so easie, and the profit so great, (for that it seemed if this Towne were taken from the Princes, they should be forced to lue in peace) that one night they drew 800 men out of the Regiment to doe this execution. But as in ciuill warres there is alwayes some friend in the Cabinet, by whom they discover their conclusions; so the Duke of Mayenne (being aduertised of this designe) put so strong a Garrison into Soissons, as the troops (finding it was discovered) returned to their lodgings. Afterwards, the Duke put those out of the Towne whom he suspected to affect their Maiesities seruice, and to haue any credit within the towne.

All things now prepared to armes on either side, the Marshall D'Ancre leaues Paris, and comes to Amiens on the sixt of August, where he began to raise 600 horse, and 4000 foot for the preferuation of Picardy. Hee presently aduertised all the Gouvernours and Maiors of Townes of their Maiesities intention, contrary to that of the Duke of Longueville: all assure him of their fidelity to the King. Hee of Ardres (who was held to affect the Duke) remained a neuter during these confusions. But the Gouernor of Chastelet followed the Princes party, contrary to the promise he had made. The Marquis of Bon-neuer fought to fortifie himselfe in Estaples, but it was without effect: So as in all Picardy there was not any but Ruberpré in Corbie, and Harancourt in Chastelet, that declared themselves of the Princes partie. There were great leauies made in Picardy for both parties. The Prouost Marshall of Amiens being commanded by the Marshall D'Ancre to goe with eight men at armes of the Queenes Company and his Archers, to seize vpon a Gentle.

Gentlemen who leaued Souldiers for the Princes. Hee came thither, found him in his house, spake with him, and yet suffered him to escape; the Prouost returned to Amiens, thinking to excuse himselfe, saying, he could not execute the Marshalls command, without killing of the Gentleman, and that hee had no commission to take him alive or dead; wherewith the Marshall was much discontented, and causing a gibbet to be set vp, he told the Prouost that he should be hanged, for an example to all others to serue the King faithfully. The Prouost was in great feare of his life, although he were not committed; but the Noblemen which were with the Marshall interceded for him, and obtained his pardon, for the which he gaue them thanks.

The Marshall of Bois Dauphin Lieutenant general of the Kings army.

Being resolved in Councell to raise an army, the Marshall of Bois Dauphin was made Lieutenant General of the Kings Army (which should consist of 1500 horse, 8000 French foot, and 2000 Swisses) in the Ile of France, Brie, Picardy, and Champagne, during their Maiesties voyage, to stop the passages of the Riuer, and to oppose himselfe against the Princes attempts: They put new Garisons into the townes vpon the Riuer of Seine and Marne, forbidding them to suffer any to passe without authority from the King or the said Marshall. The Bridges of Nante were broken by the Kings commandement: and in the meane time the Princes lay still at Coucy, Corbie, and Soissons, without any apparent shew of leauing any troops.

It was decreed that their Maiesties should part from Paris on the 17 of August, and that the Duke of Guise should conduct Madam the Kings sister, promised vnto the King of Spaine, to Bayonne; and receive the Infanta which should be married to the King, which was a great honor to the Duke. They drew much money out of the Exchequer, for the extraordinary expences of this voyage: and the Assembly of the Clergy (which was then held at Paris, to heare the accounts of their Receiver general) promised to giue their Maiesties 44000 pound sterling.

The Magistrates of Paris sent to the Louure.

Before their Maiesties departure, the Prouost of Merchants of Paris, with other Magistrates, were sent for to the Louure, where they receiued commandement to haue a speciall care to all things which past within the City and thereabouts during the voyage: to looke into the dispositions of all men: to prevent seditions and tumults: to hinder practices & factions: and to be watchful, that there should be no leauies of souldiers, nor transport of armes or munition for warre, but for the Kings seruice: that their Maiesties left the guard of the Citie to the fidelity of the Burgeses vnder the authority of Monsieur de Lion-cour their Gouvernor, and of President Miron Prouost of Merchants of the same City: and to assure and comfort the Parisians during the Kings absence, his Maiestic said that he left with them Monsieur his brother, desiring them to guard him carefully.

The King departed from Paris.

The day for the Kings departure being come, hauing taken the oath of fidelity from the Magistrates of the Citie, the Court of Parliament, and some other Officers, he went out of the City by five of the clocke in the morning. It is written, that some dayes before, he had sent word to Monsieur le lay, one of the Presidents of the great chamber, that he desired to make vse of his seruice in this voyage: But hee excusing himselfe by reason of his indisposition, their Maiesties grew ialous of him, which made them loath to leaue him in Paris during their voyage. Wherupon two Exempts or Yomen vthers of his guards, with 15 Archers of the body, went in his Maiesties name vnto the President, and told him that hee must resolve to depart presently, for that the Kings pleasure was hee should follow him in this voyage. They found him laid in his bed, ill disposed and sicke, yet notwithstanding any excuse, they caused him to rise suddenly, and going out of his house, they put him into a Caroch drawn by sixe horses, and let downe the windowes, and in this manner he was conducted by twelue or fiftene horse to Amboise, and there put into the Caste vnder a good guard.

President lay carried away.

The Queene mother parted after the King, and the Noblemen and officers in like manner: but about three of the clocke in the afternoon, Madam the Kings sister went out of Paris in great state. The Prouost of Merchants and the Sherifes of Paris (hauing the honor alone to accompany the Daughters of France, when they goe out of Paris to accomplish the promise of their marriages) prepared themselves to performe this duty vnto the Lady, and to take their leaues of her: they sent commandement to the 16 Captaines of the quarters, to come to the Towne-house by two of the clocke in the afternoon, with twelue Burgeses out of euery quarter on horse backe: and the like charge was giuen vnto the

A the three Companies of the Archers to be there also on horsebacke. All being ready according to the accustomed order, the Prouost and other officers being attired in their liveries on horse back, went to the Louure, where hauing saluted the Lady, she came forth and entered into a Litter, open on all sides, and richly embroydered with gold and siluer, and so she passed through the streets of Paris with great ioy and acclamations, they wishing all happinesse to her voyage and mariage.

The day after the Kings departure, President La Hayes wife came to the Court of Parliament, complains of her husbands imprisonment, and craues their assistance and fauour in her distresse; at whose instance there were certaine Councillors of the Court deputed to goe vnto the King to know his pleasure: who had no other answer from his Maiestic, but that he meant to vse his seruice in that voyage: but the cleare sighted iudged it should be but to the Caste of Amboise, where they would lodge him; which they conceiued was done, both for that he had great credit in the Parliament, and was very familiar with the Prince of Conde, who came often to visit the President during his abode in Paris.

Now after the Kings departure they beganne to draw their Forces together, and to frame their camps. The King is at Meaulx. On the 20 of August, the Marshall Bois-Dauphin being in Paris, gaue order for ammunition bread for his army, consisting then but of 4000 foot, and 7 or 800 horse, but there came presently vnto him many Commanders, C Noblemen, and Captaines; among others, Monsieur de Pralin, the Barons of Vitry and Monglas, Colonel Gallatis, the Baron of Busy, D'Amboise, Bassompierre, La Marke, Rembure, and diuers others: In the meane time the Princes leauy new troops about Noyon, and Soissons, Corbie, Abeuille, Sedan, and Mezieres. This great preparation to armes on either side, doth amaze and terrifie the poore people with the euent of the warre: The villages in Picardy and Brie are abandoned, and they retire their goods into Townes and Castles: about Paris the peasants carie away all they might lose, yea the very suburbs of the City was left empty both of people and goods; fearing that if the Prince should aduance with his army towards Paris, or neere vnto it, to find a passage; his troops would spoile euen vnto the very gates, which apprehension continued from the Kings departure vntill the end of October. They put strong Garisons into Saint Denis, Saint Cloud, and other places, as well for the assurance and commodity of the City of Paris, as to guard the passages of the Riuer of Seine against the Prince.

Troops leauied for the King and Princes.

The Prouost of Merchants and Magistrates of Paris, sent to Corbeil, to know if they needed any Forces for the preferuation of their Towne; who gaue them thanks for their care, but refused any helpe; saying that the place had at other times defended it selfe against greater attempts, and that now the danger was not so much to be feared, as they must haue recourse to Garisons and new Forces, onely to guard the passage of a Riuer.

Paris and other townes fortifie themselves.

They fortifie themselves euery where, apprehending the danger to be greater then it was. Paris labours in the reparation of her wals; repaires the chaines within, keeps good E guard at their gates; keeping nine open, they shut vp sixe. Saint Denis doth neither solemnize Hooliday nor Sunday, the inhabitants are so busie continually about their fortifications. The Reliques and other pretious things, referred in the Treasury of the Abbey, are for more safety sent to Paris: so great was the brue of warre in the Ile of France.

In the meane time the Duke of Montbazon leauies troops in Normandy for the Kings seruice; assures them of Rouen; puts Garisons in places of most importance where need required, especially towards Picardy and the sea coast. In Champagne the Marquis of Vieville the Kings Lieutenant there, with Dandelot and others, obserue the Prince of Tingre; and hinder his surprizes, yet they could not prevent it, but that his souldiers being about foure hundred foot, and three hundred horse, spoiled the Champagne country, F vntill they were defeated by the inhabitants of Troyes, who slue many of them.

The Duke of Montbazon assures Normandy.

The Prince relying vpon his friends promises, leaues Coucy and retires to Soissons, where he finds the Dukes of Longueuille and Mayen, who had disarmed the inhabitants, feted a good Garison, and made himselfe master of the place. The Prince was receiued with all honor and respect, being followed by many Noblemen and Gentlemen.

About the end of August the Marshall of Bonillon came to Soissons with good numbers of horse and foot: he brought artillery with him, and good store of munition, especially of armes for their foot; but it was not sufficient for their new leauied souldiers: for for the Prince found men enough, but they could hardly recouer armes: the King hauing giuen commandment throughout all the townes, that they should not suffer any to passe but for his seruice. They got some quantity out of Paris, but without the knowledge of the inhabitants: for being once discovered that the Prince had any intelligence in the towne for the recouering of armes, the Gates were more strictly guarded, and eu-ery thing searched that went forth.

The Duke of Bouillon made Marshall of the Camp.

The Marshall of Bouillon being come to Soissons, hee was made Marshall of the Princes campe: All the armie is muffled, and within few dayes Noyon was wholly reduced to their obedience, where the Camp was assigned, and all commissions deliuered for the leasing of men. As soone as the Princes campe was settled at Noyon, the Kings Forces, B commanded by the Marshall Bois-Dauphin, prepare themselves to march, and to stop the Princes passage.

The Kings Declaration against
the Prince of Conde and his associates.

In the meane time their Maiesties goe on their voyage and come to Poitiers, where on the tenth of September the King made a Declaration, whereby he deputed the Prince of Conde, with the other Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and all which did assist and adhere vnto their designs, of all their honours, Estates, offices, governments, pensions, priviledges and prerogatives, which they had from him or his Predecessors: declaring the said Prince and all his adherents, disobedient, rebels, and guilty of treason: commanding all his souveraine Courts and others, to seize vpon their persons and goods; if within one month after the publication thereof in the Court of Parliament, the said Prince C and they which did assist him, did not acknowledge their faults, and come or send vnto him to performe that effectually which belongs vnto their duties: and in regard of gentlemen and priuate subiects, if they did not make declaration and protestation enrolled in some of his Courts, and did not abandon all actions and enterprises contrary to his authority and seruice.

This Declaration brought vnto the Court of Parliament at Paris to be verified: There were diuers opinions by reason of the Prince of Conde the third person of France: some were of opinion they should write vnto the King, and lay downe the reasons and confiderations why the Court could not proceed to the publication and enrolling thereof: that it should be sufficient to forbid the taking of armes without the Kings commission: D and to enioyne all the Princes to goe and attend their Maiesties persons to doe their seruice.
Others said, that the rebellion being so plaine and apparant, they should sinne against the Maximes of State, if they should not follow the Kings will. So the 18 of September it was verified, and a decree published and fixed on the corners of the streets of Paris.

The proceeding of the two armies.

Their Maiesties coming to Poitiers on the fourth of September, they stayed there vntill the third of October, for that the young Lady fell sick of the small pox. In the meane time let vs obserue what passed betwixt the two Armies. The King on the one side, and the Prince of Conde with his friends on the other, made leauiques of souldiers in all the prouinces of France: But the King had the aduantage at the bridges of Riuers and of Townes, which made his army the stronger, and much hindered the Princes from pass- E ing the Loire, and those Lords which had leauied troops for him beyond the riuier of Seine from ioyning with him.

The taking of the Siege of Friaize.

During these leauiques it happened, that Friaize one of the Princes Gentlemen, being at Chartres in Beausse, was there taken, with commissions to leauy companies for his seruice:
being thus seized on, hee is caried to Paris, imprisoned, and deliuered our vnto the Parliament, to bee proceeded against: the Court deputed certaine Commissioners to make his processe, and it was bruted through all Paris that hee should bee executed; but many good and particular considerations stayed the Parliament from further proceeding.
Before this resolution of the Court, the Prince being aduertised in what danger Friaize was in doing him seruice, laboured to free him: He wrote first to the Marshall of Bois- F Dauphin, demanding his friend detained prisoner, promising to doe the like by the first which should fall into his hands: To whom the Marshall answered, That hee could not hinder iustice, nor giue any pardons, the which was referred to the King and the Parliament. Whereupon the Prince wrote particularly to the Court, setting downe the causes which had moued him to take armes, which he said were for his Maiesties seruice, the preservation of his Estate, the good of the publicke, and the reuenge of the deceased Kings death. Then making relation of the taking of this Gentleman, he concludes thus; And

A to the end I may haue no cause to complaine, I beseech you to entreat him in such sort, as I may haue no occasion to liue otherwise then I haue propounded, resoluing hereafter to make all those which shall fall into my hands to endure the same which he shall suffer.
I shall be much grieved to come to these extremities. But seeing the enemies of the State are resolved to all rigour, I will doe the like, and will make reparaill of the goods and persons of such as shall meddle in this businesse, if the fortune of the warre put them into my hands.

In the beginning, the Princes army was about 1500 good horse, as well men at armes, light horse, as Carabins; and about 4 or 5000 foot, but most of them ill armed: with two B Culuerins, and two field pieces. The Duke of Longueville had in his troope which hee brought out of Picardy 4 or 500 horse, and 1500 foot. The Seigneur of Montbarot was his Marshall. The Duke of Mayen had 3 or 400 horse, and some foot: The Viscount of Tauannes his brother in law was Marshall of his troops. These two troops made the foreward. The Princes troop consisted of 3 or 400 horse, and that of the Duke of Bouillon of 300 horse, and 800 foot, the which were well armed. Some write, that these Princes being at Noyon, concluded:

The estate of the Princes
army at Noyon

I. That as their armes were leauied for the good of the State, the charges should bee borne by the money which was ordained for the maintenance of the Crowne: That they should appoint places for the receipt of the Kings money, wherof the Marshall of Bouillon should haue the direction as well as the conduct of the army.

The resolution of the Princes.

II. For that the townes of Roie and Montdidier did hinder the free passage between Noyon and Corbie, the army should approach, to the end they might make some attempt vpon those townes.

III. That from thence they should march into the Country of Beauvoisin to put garisons into the Castle of Clermon, and the towne of Creil vpon Oyle, and there appoint the receipt.

IV. That from thence they should crosse into Vexin, to force some one of the Bridges vpon the Riuier of Seine, that they might ioyne with the troops which the Vidame of Chartres had leauied in Beausse and thereabouts, and that they should send for the Duke
D of Luxemburg to come with his troops which he had leauied in Champagne.

V. That to winne the hearts and affections of the Parisians, the army should not approach neere vnto the City, and preserve all their Countie houses.

VI. That they should march with what speed they could into Guienne, to ioyne with the Earle of Saint Paul and their other friends, to the end they might hinder the execution of the marriages, and take from their enemies the government of the State.

With this resolution the Princes army passeth the Riuier of Oyle, and lodgeth about Roy and Montdidier, but they preuailed nothing; the townes being well supplied with mgn; wherupon they turned head towards Clermont. In the meane time the Marshall Bois-Dauphin (who was stronger in foot and Cannon then the Princes, but not in horse, E for that his troops were not yet come vnto him) put good garisons into all the townes, bridges, and passages which are vpon the Riuier of Oyle, and at the same instant hee put a garison into Creil. The Princes being aduertised that all the bridges vpon the Riuier of Seine from Paris to Rouen were strongly guarded; they altered their first designe, and resolved to secke their passage through Champagne ouer the Riuers of Marne, Seine, and Yonne, which was a great march for their army, yet notwithstanding it encreased daily.

On the 17 of September, 4 or 500 souldiers of the Regiments of Piedmont and Picar-die, were charged by the Duke of Mayen, with the Princes Cheualerie, who defeated them, and put them to runne, where some were slaine vpon the place, and many drowned in the Riuier of Thierin: some Commanders, with many souldiers, were taken prisoners; F all which the Prince released, except those which would follow his party: In which defect they got armes for 200 souldiers. The Marshall Bois-Dauphin hearing that the Prince had a desire to passe the Riuier of Seine at Pontoise or Poissie, came and encamped at Daumartin; and fearing lest he should attempt to surprize Saint Denis, thereby to annoy Paris, the Parisians thought good to send 200 men to fortifie the garison, the towne being of so great guard. But the Princes went and passed the riuier of Elne at Soissons, and thereabouts, and marched directly to Chasteau Thierry, which they did inuest, causing part of their armie to passe the riuier of Marne, which was then so low as they might easily wade

wade through. The Kings army made haste to relieue this towne: but the Marshall of A Bouillon hauing discharged some volleys of Cannon, the inhabitants were so amazed, as they forced the Gouvernor to yield to a composition, which was made the last day of September. The Prince being entred, he exacted a good summe of money from the inhabitants. The Marshall Bois-Dauphin hearing of this towne, he imagined that the Princes would turne the head of their army towards the riuer of Seine; where vpon he sent garisons to Montreault-Yonne, and other townes where there were bridges, but the riuers were so shallow, as they might easily wade through them. The Kings army lying about Sezanne in Brie, multied about 10000 foot, and 2000 horse. The Princes army marcht vp on both sides the riuer of Maine, as if they meant to inuest Espemay: the which did so amaze the inhabitants, as they yielded suddenly; where the Prince also leauied great summes of money.

The Marshall of Bouillon hauing receiued a commission from the Prince, appointed Espemay for the receipt of the Kings reuennues from the hands of the Kings Receiuers: and thereupon gaue warrant to two of his guard to force the said Receiuers to deliuer such money as was due by them, vnto one whom he had appointed for the receipt thereof. The Princes gaue it out, that they would besiege Rheims, but they presently marched towards Nery vpon Seine, where they passed their Cannon through the riuer with much ease; then turning towards Yonne, the Kings army past those two Riuers at Monstreau, to hinder their attempts against Sens, Joigny, & Auxerre. They thought the Prince would attempt Sens, where the inhabitants did much affect him, by reason of his neighbourhood. The army came to Marigny, whereas the Duke of Luxemburg (called Prince of Tingry in his fathers life time) joined them with 300 horse. The Prince comming within a league of Sens, heard that the Marshall was entred, and that the Kings army was thereabouts: whereupon the army marched vpon the riuer of Yonne, and passed at diuers Fords neere vnto Joigny; so as they which had leauied troops for the Princes betwene Seine and Loire, had good meanes to ioyne with them. The Duke of Luxemburgs troops lying at Chanlay neere to Joigny, were inuested by part of the Kings army; and in the end (after some volleys of great shot) forced to yield by composition, where they lost all their horses and baggage. The next day being the 22 of October, the Princes army forced a small towne called Espoungny, and spoiled it. It is written, there were great violences and rapes committed, whereof the Prince and Duke de Mayen being aduertised, they caused two souldiers to bee hanged. The two armies were neere together about Bony, where there was some appearance of a battell, if the Princes had not marched away in the evening, and past the riuer of Loire at Neufuy, by three Fords; at what time the Duke of Luxemburg (who for the losse which he had at Chanlay could not follow them) hauing obtained a passport from the Marshall Bois-Dauphin, retired into Champagne with many others which did accompany him. And at the same instant there were 600 Retiers (which had crossed through Champagne from Sedan) came to the bankes of Loire, and waded through it, and then ioynd with the Princes army in Berry.

The Marquis of Renell, Gouvernor of Vitry, hearing of their march, without any further discouery of them, went to charge them with certaine Carabins, they (who had double the number and were all old souldiers well mounted and well armed) had some put to rout these Carabins: where the Marquis was slaine vpon the place. He was a valiant Gentleman of the House of Amboise, whose death was much lamented. But it is commonly said, an ill fortune comes not alone, for this death was the second which the House of Amboise receiued during this warre: for in September past, certaine Cheualiers of either army meeting neere vnto Clermont, charged one another, in the which Buffy d'Amboise was slaine on the Kings side, hauing aduertured himselfe too farre: His death was much lamented by the Marshall Bois-Dauphin and all the Commanders of the army.

Matters doe not alwaies succeed according to the desires of Kings, Princes, and great men. The Princes had a conceit that their friends in Guenne of either religion should haue so much power and credit, as to procure their Maiesties to end their voyage at Poitiers: but they were deceived. For they entred into Bourdeaux the 7 of October. Madam parted the 21 to goe to Bayonne, and from thence came to the Riuer of Bidassio to accomplish the exchange of the marriages, and all without any lett, as you shall heare. On the other side their Maiesties, (who had great confidence that the Assembly at Grenoble would

A would end to their contents, and that the Marshall Desiguieres had credit enough to hinder their diuisions) found the contrary to their expectation.

The Assembly hauing still craued the assistance of the said Marshall by their Deputies; he came on the 21 of October into the said Assembly, saying vnto them, That their Maiesties Letters were full of shewes of their loue and fauour, and that those of the Dukes of Rohan and Sully gaue testimony of the vnion and correspondency which they would haue in the resolutions of the said Assembly. But whereas it seemed they had resolved to retire from that towne by reason of the Letters which they had receiued from their Deputies at Court, whereby they had no great hope of any good answer to their requests and grieuances; he would by no meanes aduise them to it, before they had receiued the answer and the Kings commandements. To say, that after your retreat from hence you will goe and continue together in some other place, as they did a little before the Edicts of Nantes: I must answer, That there was no settled peace for them of the Religion, who liued vnder toleration in those times: but to take that liberty now, were directly to breake the said Edict, and to ruine the Churches: neither could they doe it without the consent of their Prouinces, and the Kings permission: it were a marke of distrust where there is no cause; it were a signe of lightnesse by an vnlawfull change, wherewith they should offend his Maiestie, and make him thinke that his subjects of the religion (who haue alwayes bene a pattered of perfect obedience) proiect an open rebellion without any lawfull cause. The offence his Maiestie shall receiue will be very sensible, and there will not want men to aggrauate the crime, especially those which seeke authority by armes, and to haue the chiefe command. They haue talked of the stay of the marriages: It is now too late: the King is too farre advanced, and the Prince is in the remotest part of the Realme, who doth not any thing capable to deferre it: Nay it seemes hee hath giuen ouer this instance, to content himselfe with the obseruation of the ancient Ordinances which doe not allow strangers in the Councell, nor to hold any offices or benefices in the Realme.

These marriages being accomplished, there is no doubt but the Queene will be tractable for to content the Prince vpon the rest of his demands; whereof there had bene some speech as Tours, to send the Seigneur of Rigac to the Duke of Bouillon: and the Duke of Neuers, who holds himselfe neuter, is ready to employ himselfe in this treaty: besides that, as the Prince is resolved not to attempt any thing; so the Marshall de Bois-Dauphin is commanded not to aduance, which makes men thinke that there is no cause to despair: wherefore they must containe themselves within the bounds of discretion, and not to draw vpon the Churches the hatred of the troubles of the State.

The Assembly must wisely foresee what it may obtaine according to the condition of the present estate and our owne: Wee must measure our felues to that which wee may, and not to what wee would; to that we may get, and not to that which we thinke due vnto vs. If we march alwayes by declinings, without doubt wee shall fall into the precipice of warre. Behold the inconueniences which will follow, and cannot bee auoided. We would haue our vnion appeare, and it will bee disioyned more and more: for there will bee a great number of them of the Religion found, who (being wise and well aduised) would neuer consent to their owne ruine. The Deputies to whom peace hath bene especially recommended, will bee disaduaied at their returne: and they will be demanded why they haue concluded of things whereof they had no Commission to giue their opinions. The King shall bee counselled to take the way of rigour, or of mildnesse: if of clemency, in suffering them, which containe themselves to liue vnder his Edicts, hee shall with-draw from them that take armes, most of the men by whom they should bee assisted; and so hee shall haue an easie conquest of the rest: If of rigour, in forbidding the Exercise, and all entreating them of the Religion, who haue no retreat, there will bee lost in one day two or three hundred Churches: The Iesuits will set their feet vpon their throats; they will lose no occasions to make massacres, finding the people flinch against those whom they hold the authors of the warre. All good Frenchmen (who would pittie vs, and grieve for vs, if wee were persecuted without cause) will then desire and hate vs as turbulent persons which cannot be content to live in rest and quietnesse. A

And what can be the cūent of this warre? They must iudge whose many years have taught them great experience. They will consider the difference betwene necessary armes, and those which are wilfully vnderaken: betwixt the resolution of one of the Religion pressed and persecuted, and one that may live at quiet. They will remember how often our fathers and we have sighed for such a liberty as wee now enioy: they will observe that there is no Estate in Christendome, vnder a Prince of a contrary Religion, where it hath the like: the Gospell generally preached; the Ministers partly entertained at the Princes charge; many places given them for their safety, and the garisons paid by him, and chambers erected to doe them iustice: In the which if there be any defect, wee must not exceed the bounds of conscience or wisdom, of conscience in taking armes, which cannot be blest of God but when they are iust; nor iust, if they be not necessary. Of wisdom, in hazarding against stronger and better prepared Forces then ours, a certain condition, vpon a weak hope of some small aduantage.

Some one will reply, that our condition is not secure by reason of the alliance with Spaine: whereunto I will answer, That a Prince which takes his neighbours daughter, doth not marry his Councils, neither will hee willingly set fire on his Estate to doe him a pleasure: Wee haue leisure to see the storme come, and to prepare for our owne preservation.

Finally, hauing continued constant in our duties, if they seeke to deprime vs of our religion, or to take that from vs whereon our liberty and safety depends, purchased by the blood of our fathers and our owne, and granted vnto vs by that great King the restorer of France: we shall enter into this carriere full of iustice and true zeale; finde againe in our breasts the courage and vertue of our ancestors; wee shall bee supported in our iust defence by all good Frenchmen; assisted by all Princes and Estates which loue the true religion, or the good of this Estate: and in a word, we shall bee fauoured with the blessings of God, whereof wee haue heretofore had good experience in our armes, and which will bee to the glorie of his Name, and the spirituall aduancement of our Churches.

His conclusion was, That he wished them to forbear from all violent courses, if a iust necessity did not force them; and that they should attend in that place for those which they had sent vnto his Maiestic, to vnderstand his pleasure; which was not onely his aduice, but also many other Noblemens of the said religion.

The Assembly
goes from Gre-noble to Nismes.

Within some dayes after, contrary to this graue aduice, the Assembly left Grenoble, and went to Nismes in Languedoc. Men spake diuersly of this translation made of their owne motion, contrary to the Kings will. Some write, that the practices of the Prince of Condes agents were the chiefe cause: afterwards the King sent them word, that he would allow of the continuation of the said Assembly at Montpellier: wherevpon the Deputies would not yeeld; saying, That the same reasons which had caused them to retire from Grenoble, presented themselves at Montpellier: that is to say, a Gouverneur for the King, and a Soueraigne Court, which might diuert them from their resolutions.

The King goes
from Poitiers.

This change of the Assembly was nothing pleasing vnto the Marshall Desdignieres, to whom they sent their Deputies to entreat him not to abandon the body of the said Assembly, assuring him that hee should alwayes find amongst them the rancke and respect which was due vnto his quality. To whom hee answered, That hee would continue alwayes vnited, notwithstanding the displeasure hee felt by their change.

Madame the Kings sister being recovered, they parted from Poitiers the third of October. It was expected there would haue bene some opposition made vpon the passing of the river of Dordone, there being many good townes of safety vpon that riuer, which were held by the Protestants, and many great men were on the Princes party, as the Earle of Saint Paul, the Duke of Rohan (who should haue bene their leader) the Marquis of La Force, Gouverneur of Bearne, the Seigneurs of Boisse, Faus, and Pardillan, with many other Lords of Guienne, all which should ioyne together, and make

A make the bodie of an Armie of one thousand horse, and foure thousand foot: But their Maiesties were resolved to force a passage, hauing twelue hundred horse, with the Regiment of his Guards, in which there were aboute three thousand men, and the Swisses.

The King being at Angoulesme, the Countesse of Saint Paul had so laboured with the Earle her husband, as shee reconciled him to their Maiesties, and Fronic and Caumont were assured for their seruice: The Earle came afterwards to Bourdeaux to their Maiesties.

During the Kings abode at Angoulesme, there fell out an accident which troubled B them. The Earle of Candale, eldest sonne to the Duke of Espernon, had ioyned himselfe to the Duke of Rohan, and made profession of the reformed Religion. This did much trouble the Duke his father (whom they of Rochel held for their capital enemy) and hee was so inwardly afflicted, as he fell dangerously sicke. Thus the Earle of Candale left the King, and embraced the party of the Princes, and of the Assembly at Nismes, contrary to his fathers will.

The Earle of Candale ioynes

Princes.

Whilest the King aduanceth from Poitiers to Bourdeaux, the Prince of Conde comes to his house at Chasteauroux, where hee findes aboute two thousand foot, and neere twelue hundred horse, which his wife had caused to be leauied for him in Berry: There the Visdame of Chartres ioyned with his troops, and the Marquis of Rhosny came to visit him, and assisted him with some horse: Whereupon being thus fortified, hee marched into Poictou. The Marshall of Bois-Dauphin seeing that the Prince had past all the riuers and was farre aduanced, resolved onely to follow him, and to keepe the townes from surprize: being in Poictou, he sent vnto the King to know his pleasure, who commanded him not to hazard any thing, but to hinder the Prince from entering into the Countrey of Angoulesme.

The Princes
army fortified.

The Prince being camped in Poictou, hee required them of the religion to ioyne with him, sending first to Rochel, and letting them vnderstand, that his taking of armes was for the peace of their Churches, the tranquility of the Estate, and the reformation of disorders, demanding ayd from them for the warre which hee had begunne. To whom they D made answer, That they could not ioyne with him in that warre, seeing it would be found a bad example and of perillous consequence, which would draw after it, both the Kings indignation against them, and the curse of the whole Countrey, which might iustly blame them for renewing a cruell ciuill warre, to their great charges, who liue in peace vnder the power and benefit of the Edicts: all which they would leaue vnto his Excellencies consideration; for whose particular contentment they would not spare their liues, goods, honors, and fortunes, in any thing wherein his Maiesties seruice and the peace of the State should not be interested.

The answer of the Rochellers
to the Prince.

Their Maiesties being come to Bourdeaux, it was resolved, that the Espousals should be solemnized vpon the eighteenth of October, the which was performed with great ceremonies in Saint Andrewes Church, where the Duke of Guise did espouse Madam the Kings sister, in the name of the Prince of Spaine: and the same day the Duke of Lerma was to doe the like for the King with the Infanta at Burgos.

Their Maiesties being informed that the Duke of Rohan, with the rest of the reformed Religion (which had taken armes) had past the riuer of Garrone, to stop the Ladies passage, they sent La Brosse, (an Ensigne of the Kings Guard) to know why they were armed, and to what content. To whom they made answer:

1. That hauing sent many souldiers leauied in many parts of the Realme, and none of them employed, they had bene forced to arme for their defence. Moreover, they had bene aduised by the Assembly of Grenoble, to put themselves in defence, in case F their Deputies (which they had sent to the King) should receiue no contentment vpon their demands.

2. That they had bene assured their Deputies were sent backe without any content: and that there was no regard had vnto the Princes Remonstrances, nor to those of the Court of Parliament of Paris, as they had humbly besought their Maiesties by their Deputies.

3. That it was published in diuers parts of the Realme, that by the meanes of these mariages betwixt France and Spaine, they would ruine all those of the Religion: and

and that this iust feare had caused them to arme, without doing any act of Hostilitie. A This report made, they held it not fit for their Maiesties dignitie to send againe to the Duke of Rohan and his associates, but to hold them as sworn enemies against the Kings seruice, and the publicke peace: That they should prouide for the Govern- ment of Bearne, and other places which the Marquis of La Force held; and that they should make a Declaration against all them of the Reformed Religion which had taken armes.

The King sent to the Gouernors of Tartas, Acqs, and Montmarfan (three townes which are lying in the way to Bayonne) to assure them to his seruice: The Gouernors of these three townes desired their Maiesties by their Letters, that they would not doubt of their fidelity, nor of the inhabitants deuotion: which made them iudge that the Princes parti- fans hauing no retreat, the passage for Madam would be safe: the Earle of Grammont, Gouernor of Bayonne, hauing also sent to assure their Maiesties that he would serue them in this voyage with 200 horse, and 1000 foot.

After the Espousals, it was resolved that Madam should part on the one and twentieth day, being conducted by the Duke of Guise, who also had the command of the army, which consisted of 4000 foot, 1200 horse, and foure Cannon; besides the Earle of Grammonts Forces which should meet with them. Upon this resolution Madam takes leave of the King and Queene, of the Princesses and the whole Court, where there was much weeping for her departure. The King conducted her halfe a League out of the towne: C the Queene betooke her to her chamber very heauy for the Ladies departure; where shee remained in priuate two dayes. The Lady arrived at Bayonne the second of Nouember without any disturbance; whereof they presently aduertised their Maiesties.

In the meane time the Marshall D'Ancre lay not still in Picardy, hauing leauied an army of 3500 foot, and 600 700 horse: He caused two Forts to bee built neere vnto Corbie, where Ruberpré commanded with two Regiments, which much annoyed the towne of Amiens.

In Clermont Marancourt commanded for the Princes, with a Regiment of eight Com- panies, which did much oppress the neighbour Provinces by their leauying of taxes. This made the Marshall resolute to take this towne from the Princes: whereupon D he sent Nereffan with certaine Companies of horse and foot, to force the bafe towne by Petard, who coming neere vnto Clermont, found that the enterprise was discovered; yet he resolved to goe on, and in the end rooke the bafe towne, where they barricadoed themselves, attending the Marshall D'Ancre with the rest of his troops and artilerie, who being come, and his artilerie planted, the besieged yielded by composition, and retired to Noyon.

During these ciuill combustions, the poore Peasants were wonderfully oppressed by the soldiers, and forced to pay their taxes double, by the receipts which were erected by the Princes in the Provinces of Picardy, the Ile of France, Champagne, Auxerre, Berry, Tour- raine, Poitou, and part of Anjou, sending out their garisons to take the richest Peasants in euery Parish, whom they kept prisoners vntill they had paid the tax of the whole Village.

Monsieur de Plessis Gouernor of Saumur (continuing in his Maiesties obedience) made a Decree, by the which hee commanded the Parishes to set vpon those rebels which sought to leauy the Kings money, forbidding all Gentlemen to assist them, vpon paine to be made liable to taxes.

Let vs returne now to Bayonne. On the sixt of Nouember, Madam the Kings sister came to Saint John de Luz, and at the same time the Catholike King with the Infanta arrived at Fontarabie. The riuier of Bidaso or Margari makes a diuision of France from Spaine, at a place called Andajo which is a League from Fontarabie, and two from Saint John de Luz. There the exchange was made betwene the two Princesses. But I cannot in- sist vpon the particularities, which were very stately: hauing a very copious subiect to treat of.

The Assembly at Nismes, thinking that they of the religion in Guienne, should ioyne their Forces with the Earle of Saint Paul, sent Letters to their Churches, to encourage them to take armes and to ioyne with the Prince. Whereupon the King made a Decla- ration against them of the Religion, with this Prouiso, That if within one month after the publi-

A publication thereof, they make declaration in the Registers of the Bailiwicks where they remained: That they would desist from all enterprises, and doe him faithfull seruice, and in no sort assist or fauour those which shall persist in their rebellion; and deliuer vp such places as they had surpris'd: He then tooke them into his protection, forbidding all his subiects to wrong them in word or deed, by reason of that which had past. But if after the time expired, they still continued in their rebellion, either in carrying armes, or as- sisting and fauouring them that doe: he would haue them punished as guilty of treason, and troublers of the publicke peace and that the townes and communalities which should adhere vnto them, should lose all their liberties and priuiledges which had beene granted B vnto them.

The Kings Espouse being entred into the Realme, he wrote vnto her in these termes: The Kings first Madam, Hauing no meanes according vnto my desire, to meet you at the entry of my Realme, for to put you in possession thereof, as of my affection to loue and serue you: I send Luyues vnto you, to salute you in my name, and to tell you that I expect you with impatieny, to offer you both the one and the other: I pray you receiue him fauourably, and beleue what he shall say vnto you. The Queens first

The Queene mother did also write vnto her, to assure her of her affection, in tearmes of a good mother, and a great Princeesse.

Madam my Daughter, The King my Son, hauing made choice of Monsieur de Luyues, as one of his most confident seruants, to congratulate your happy entry into his King- dome, and to let you know with what passion and desire you are expected by him: I would not lose the opportunity to let you know, that I participate in the same desire to see you, for the comfort I shall receiue in mine owne particular, and to confirme by mouth the cordiall loue I beare you: I pray you beleue what hee shall deliuer on my behalfe. The Queens Letter.

The Seigneur de Luyues met with the Queene at Bayonne, and was receiued with as honourable a reception as could be desired, to shew the loue and affection shee bare vnto the King, in his person, whom she knew was much beloued of his Maiestie. The young Queene entred into Bourdeaux.

On the 21 of Nouember, the King with his whole Court went out of Bourdeaux to D meet with the Queene his Spouse, three leagues without the towne, where shee was recei- ued in wonderful great state: after which the Nuptials were celebrated in the Cathed- dral Church.

During their stay at Bourdeaux, there happened an accident which much troubled their Maiesties, and gaue a great affront to the Parliament of Bourdeaux, by an eminent person. A Gentleman called Hault Chastel, a prisoner at that time in the Towne, being condemned to lose his head for many foule crimes, there was great fute made vnto the King for his pardon, and a Lieutenant of the Guards was sent vnto the prison, to stay the execution. Hereupon the Court sent Deputies to their Maiesties and the Chancellor, to enforce them of the fact; so as they had commandement to doe iustice, and the Guards E were commanded to retire: whereupon they meant to execute him that euening: but a Iesuit which had him in confession, said, that he had so many crimes vpon his conscience, as it would require three houres to admonish him, and therefore they must deferre it till the next day; neither could the Executioner be found, they being both corrupted to make this delay. The Court being risen, the Cardinal of Sourdis came presently on horse- backed, booted, and his Almoner before him with a Crosse, accompanied with thirty or forty Gentlemen of note, whom hee had not acquainted with his intent; and holding a paper in his hand, commanding neere the Palace, he cryed out, A Pardon, a Pardon, God saue the King: but he found the Palace gate shut, the which hee commanded to be forced by such as were about him: the like hee did to the prison; where finding the Keeper, hee F would haue forced him to deliuer the keyes; who vpon his refusal was slaine, his keyes being taken away, Hault Chastel was drawne out of a hole and set at liberty, conducted to the Riuier, and put into a boat. The Cardinal also retired himselfe by water, to a house of his a league from the towne.

Vpon this violence the whole Court went vnto his Maiestie, to make complaint of this attempt, and to beseech him that vntill this affront were repaired, the adherents pun- nished, and the condemned man restored, they might bee dispensed withall from doing any act of iustice to any of his Maiesties subiects. An insolence committed by the Cardinal of Sourdis.

The King did let them vaderstand, that his pleasure was they should proceed against the Cardinall and his adherents, by the vsuall formes, for the repairing of such a crime, and that he would countenance them by his authority: but he would also haue them continue in doing iustice to priuate persons: whereupon warrants were giuen out for the apprehending of the party and many of the complices. Thus you heare the History of a new spirit, who going among prisoners, raised one from death, and put to death one that was liuing, whereby in the Kings presence he abused his name and authority, to commit a violence vnworthy the thoughts of a man of his quality. Hereupon the Court made a decree, enioyning all the inhabitants of the towne, and others which had seene the said force and murder, and which knew the persons which had committed or assisted it, to come and depose the truth, and reueale their knowledge to the Commisaries deputed by the Court, and vpon their refusal to bee punished as authors and fauorers of the said crime of treason, and enemies to the King. In like manner they made another decree for the apprehending of the Cardinall, and diuers others mentioned therein.

The Duke of Guise made Generall of the Kings armies.

Articles concluded betweene the Princes and the Assembly at Nismes.

On the 27 of Nouember, there were two actions past worthy of obseruation, the one was in the Councell at Bourdeaux, whereas the King made the Duke of Guise Lieutenant general of both his armies, which he meant to draw into one, giuing him all power & authority by his Letters Patents, to lead and conduct his troops in his absence. The other was at Sanjay in Poictou, whereas the Prince of Conde and the Deputies of the Assemblies at Nismes signed their Accord, whereof the chiefe Articles were: 1. To write themselves, and to demand an answer to the first Article of the third Estate: and to make an exact search for all those which had participated in the murder of the deceased King. 2. To hinder the reception of the Councell of Trent. 3. To prevent the inconueniences which might happen vnto the Estate, by the accomplishment of the alliances with Spaine. 4. To procure a new Councell of State about the King. 5. Not to lay downe armes before the King had granted the demands of them of the Religion. 6. To provide that they of the religion which had taken armes might bee restored to their goods, places, and pensions. 7. Not to giue eare vnto a peace without a common consent. 8. That there should be a correspondency of Councell betweene the Prince and the Assembly at Nismes. 9. That the direction of all money leauied in the towines which were held by them of the Religion, and the disposing of their armies should be managed by the Assembly at Nismes. 10. That there should bee a provision made of new places of safety in those Prouinces where those of the Religion had no retreat. 11. To allow free exercise of the same Religion in the armies and towines held by the Princes. 12. That provision should bee made for them of the Religion which were fled from their houses.

Men spake diuersly of this accord: some said, that the Prince made himselfe in effect protector of them of the Religion, although he had not taken the title, for that King Henrie the Great had in his life time abhorred it, and was watchfull they should haue no other protector but himselfe or his successors: he knew the importance of this protection better then any one of his Realme, and said that it tended onely, to make an Estate within the Estate.

Some on the other side said, that the Prince had put himselfe vnder the protection of them of the Religion: that he had bound himselfe to serue them well, and not to make any peace before the King had granted them that which had bene often reiected. That they finding the necessity the Prince had of their succours, and to make his retreat during the winter into their towines of safety, they had forced him to accept of any conditions they pleased.

The two armies in Poictou.

Both the Armies are now in Poictou, where the poore people are much oppressed, and the King was dayly expected with the other Armie, lead by the Duke of Guise, so as it seemed all their quarrels should be decided by Armes in Poictou. In the meane time the Prince hauing taken Tonny-Charante, he visited Saint John D'Angely, Rochel, and some other Townes where he was receiued with much respect.

Many sectes persuade the Prince to demand a peace of the King.

In the most violent heate of warre, there are alwaies some men of qualitie which imploy themselves to make ouertures of peace. There were some Noblemen of either religion desiring to draw the Prince therunto, and spake vnto him, as of their owne motion, but they preuailed not. Men doe sometimes seeme to reiect that which they desire most, and

A and whereof they haue most need; either to preferue their reputation, or get the better composition. Some write that the Prince passing neere to Chastellerault, a Capuchin letting him to vaderstand the disorders and violences which his Souldiers committed: I am more grieved (said he) then any man in France; but I haue bene forced to haue recourse to Armes for my safety. The Duke of Neuers seemed to haue continued a Newer in his Towne of Neuers, and yet it is reported that hee had fauoured their passage of the Riuer of Loire, and fortified their Armie with some part of the troopes which hee had raised vnder the Kings Commissions. Yet hee did not openly declare himselfe for them; but went from Neuers about the midst of Nouember towards Bourdeaux, where B hee arrived about the beginning of December, as well to salute the Queene, as also to beseech the King to giue him leaue to conferre with the Prince, and to dispose him & the rest to demand a peace of his Maiestie: with which designe their Maiesties were well pleased. He had a great interest in these Princes, for he was a deare friend vnto the Prince, and the Marshall of Bouillon; the Duke of Longueuille was his Sisters sonne; and the Duke of Mayen his wiues brother.

Some write that at the same instant Sir Thomas Edmunds Ambassador Leiger for his Maiestie of Great Britaine residing in Court, told their Maiesties that the King his Master would neuer aduow the Princes taking of Armes. That the Marquis of Boniuet being sent into England by the said Prince to negotiate for succours of men and money, hee had for his answer; that His Maiestie would neuer goe against the peace, alliance, & good neighbourhood which was betweene the two Kings and Realmes of France and England. That the King his Master, hauing bene alwaies careful to maintaine peace in his owne Kingdomes, hee could not but desire the same in the Estates of neighbour Kings his allies, whereunto he would giue his best assistance. That hee had receiued commandement from the King his Master to acquaint his Maiestie therewith, and had charge to repaire vnto the Prince, to dispose him to demand a peace: The which the King tooke in good part.

It is written that the poorer sort of them of the Religion had their braines so troubled with an imaginary perfection, as it was bruted in many good Townes of France, that vpon the first alteration they would set fire on their houses, and come forth with their Armes to sell their liues dearely. The wisdom of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, seeking to prevent the causes in time, decreed that they of the reformed Religion should bring their Armes into the Towne-house, to take away all subiect of sedition and trouble, and to free many from feare which grew through their owne weaknesse, or some bad designe. Vpon this Decree, the two Ministers of Bourdeaux desired to retire themselves, and aduised others to doe the like. Two Aduocates called Saint Angell, and L'Auergnac, professing the said Religion, presented a Petition to the Parliament, to the end those Ministers might be inioyned to continue the exercise at Beze: which was decreed accordingly, vpon paine to be punished as Troublers of the publique peace: and the Iurats E had charge to haue a care that they of the Religion might goe and come safely. Notwithstanding this Decree the two Ministers retired from Bourdeaux: The one to Toineux, where the Duke of Rohan remained; and the other to Rochel.

Let vs now see what passed in Champagne after the Princes had left it about the end of October. The Marquis of Vicuaille the Kings Lieutenant in that Prouince about Rheims, and the Seigneur of Dandelot, being also Lieutenant towards Langres, hauing leauied some troopes of horse and foot: the Marquis went and tooke Neuchastell: and finding that Mery did much annoy the Riuer of Seine, and the inhabitants of Trois, (who desired to be freed) he came thither with his troopes, and treated with the inhabitants, who promised to furnish him with foure Cannons, & powder for five hundred shot, with F eight or nine hundred good men. The Seigneur of Poitrincourt, (being at his House neere to Mery, and aduertised of the Marquis his enterprize) gathered together his friends, and with some souldiers of the Regiment of Nauarre, which were in Garison at Nogent and Bray, hee went on the fift of December and lodged in the base Towne of Mery, where hee found no resistance, for that Lamet the Gouvernour kept no guard there.

The same day the Marquis arriued with his troopes and Cannon before the high town where after the eighth shot, the besieged demanded composition, which was granted, and and they departed the next day with their Armes and baggage. Some write that Poitrin-court having a designe to make himselfe Gouverneur of Mery (as hee had beene during the League) seeing that the Marquis of Vieuxville as the Kings Lieutenant in that Province would place one of his owne; he resolved that night with his friends, to make himselfe Master of Mery in the morning. You must understand that betwene the base Towne and the high there was a little streame of water, which at that time might be easily waded through. Neither were there any walles betwene the two Townes but onely Baricadoes.

Poitrin-court
slaine at Mery.

At the same time when as the Seigneur of Reaux, appointed by the Marquis, entered into Mery to effect the capitulation, and Lamet with his men on horsebacke ready to depart; Poitrin-court couered with a Target, having a naked sword in his left hand, and a Pistoll in his right, and followed by his friends past the water, and entered into the towne by the Baricadoes, crying out, God save the King and Poitrin-court, and at the same time hee caused the souldiers of the Regiment of Navarre to enter by the gate, thinking they would have seconded him, which they did not, but stood still in battell in one of the streets without moving, which saved their lives. The Marquis his troope seeing this attempt, and that they cried, kill, kill, did likewise advance with the like noise, so as the skirmish grew hot, in the which Poitrin-court was slaine, with some hundred of his followers, and his sonne was taken prisoner. These bee the effects of civill combustions; where we have scene an old Captaine, who after imploiment at Sea, and having beene present at divers goodly actions, comes to die neere unto his owne house.

Major.

The Marquis having left a Garrison in Mery, returned his Cannon to Troys. After which, the Seigneur of Dandelot came likewise to Troys to borrow their foure Cannons, with the which hee tooke the Castles of Brienne, with the townes of Rosnay, Pongy, and others.

Ruberpre as you have heard, had left the Kings service to follow the Duke of Longueville, and the Princes. About the end of this year Le Heaume his Sergeant Major, (whom the Marshall of Bouillon had recommended unto him, being of the reformed Religion) having intelligence with Helincourt, and other Captaines, hee met Ruberpre in the open street, and told him, that he had intelligence with the Marshall D'Ancre, so as hee might stay no longer in Corbie, whereupon he led him to the gate, and thrust him out of the Towne, where he continued foure houres, shaking of an Ague, without money, and not knowing whither he might safely retire himselfe. Le Heaume and Helincourt having assured Corbie, and seized vpon that which did belong to Ruberpre, they sent him one of his horses, with some money, to retire where he pleased. You may easily iudge how hee was perplexed, fearing to fall into their hands, which kept the Marshalls forts. Being in this distresse, hee took his way towards Soissons, where the Princeesse Dowager of Conde, and the Duchesse, mother to the Duke of Longueville remained. Afterwards Helincourt did also expell Le Heaume out of Corbie.

The Chevalier of Vendome comes to Rome.

This year the King had resolved to send a solemne embassy to Rome, to yeeld his filiall obedience unto his Holinesse.

The Chevalier of Vendome, Grand Prior of Tholouse, was chosen to execute this charge in the Kings name: having beene five yeares at Malta, hee received commandment from the King to returne into France, and to passe by Rome; there to performe the said obedience, where his reception and entry was with very great state, and done in three severall dayes; that is to say, the day of his first entry, where he was met by the Dukes of Brachiano, Santo Iovanni and County; the Prince of Sulmona the Popes Nephew, with an infinite number of Cardinals, Prelates, and Noblemen, being himselfe followed by many Noblemen and Knights of Malta of the French Nation: and this was performed on the second of September. On the fourth hee made his second entry into Rome in State: and two dayes after, hee was conducted to the publique Consistorie, where hee performed the Ceremonie of the Kings obedience.

In the Kings Armie there hapned a great disaster, namely, the Duell of the Barons of Vitry, and Montglas: their quarrell chanced vpon a slight occasion, and beganne in the presence of Monsieur de Guise, and many of the chiefe of the Armie, comming forth of the Duke of Guises Chamber. Monsieur de Montglas taking exceptions at some words which Monsieur de Vitry had spoken unto him, he challenged him, who thinking that he

But Monsieur de Montglas still offering him the Combate; and he making many excuses and intreaties not to fight with him, as having beene alwayes great friends; in the end they came into the field in Xaintronge, where after some encounters, Monsieur de Montglas was slaine, to the great griefe of the chiefe Commanders of the Kings Army. His body was caried to the Castle neere Provins in Brie.

In the meane time the Prince came from Rochel to Saint Iohn D'Angely, where at the instant request of his Maiesties Ambassador of Great Britaine, and of the Duke of Neuers, hee resolved to a peace, and sent the Baron of Thiangeto his Maieity with this Letter B following.

Sir, I haue heretofore presented vnto your Maieestic, by my most humble Remonstrances, the disorders and miseries, which threatened your Realme, and haue besought you with humilitie & respect, which a faithfull subject owes vnto his King, to direct them by your wisdom, and to apply fit and necessary remedies in time; left being neglected, the mischiefe grow incurable: wherein I neuer had nor will have any other end or intent, then the preservation of your Estate, and the publique peace. Whereunto desiring to apply all my actions, and to seeke out all possible means to attaine thereunto; for the aboyding of those miseries and calamities which a civill warre doth procure; I was determined before the arrival of Sir Thomas Edmunds the K. of Great Britaines C Ambassador, and of the Duke of Neuers, to doe my dutie, and satisfie the desire and request of the Deputies of the Religion (assembled by your permission) to send vnto your Maieestic some man of qualitie, humbly to beseech you to give peace vnto your Realme, so necessarie, and so much desired of all your subjects: and to take into consideration (if you please) the remonstrances presented vnto your Maieestic, by the generall Estates, the Court of Parliament and my selfe: and to that end to call into your Councell the ancient Councillors whom the deceased King your father had so profitably employed, who are not interested in the said remonstrances, and desire nothing but the good of the Realme, &c.

The Princes
Letter vnto
the King.

With this Letter there were certaine Articles presented vnto the King to treat of the D Peace, on the behalfe of the Prince of Conde, and the assembly at Nismes. 1. The Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, and they of the religion ioynd with him, desiring peace, humbly besought the King to give it vnto his subjects. 2. That if it pleased the King to grant conference, and to send his Deputies, the Prince and they of the Assembly at Nismes will send on their behalves. 3. The Prince humbly besought the King to grant a Brieffe to them of the Assembly at Nismes, to transport themselves to some place neere vnto the Court. 4. The Prince desires that the Ambassador of Great Britaine may be present to be a witnesse to this Treatie. 5. That the Countesse of Soissons, and the Duchesse of Longueville might be also called to assist. 6. That the Prince might know the place and the persons whom his Maieestic would employ; and what should become of both Armies during the Treatie. The difficultie was vpon the second Article, touching the Deputies of the generall assembly at Nismes, for they would not heare them, nor read their letters in this qualitie. In the end the Baron of Thianget told the King, that he could not returne vnto the Prince, before the Deputies of the Assembly had presented their Letters and had audience. This was granted as to Deputies of the Assembly at Nismes, and not of the generall Assembly of them of the reformed religion: so as in the beginning of this year 1616. the King being come to Roche-Foucault, they had audience and presented their Letters, which tended onely to peace.

Articles touching the treatie of peace.

On the 8 of January, the Duke of Neuers, and the Baron of Thianget returned to the Court being at Poitiers: and to agree vpon the time, the place, and the circumstances of the conference, the Marshall of Brillac, and Monsieur de Villeroi deputed by the King, parted from Poitiers, with the Duke and Baron, to goe to Frontenay le Conte; whither the Prince had promised to come, and these following Articles were concluded. 1. That the King was pleased to enter into conference with the Prince, and all others which had ioynd with him, and assisted him of both religions. 2. That the conference should be held in the Towne of Loudun, by Commisaries deputed from his Maieestic, to treat with the said Prince and other Lords, and should begin on the tenth of February next. 3. And that nothing might trouble so good a worke, if was thought good with the Kings good pleasure, to haue a suspension of Armes through all the Countreys of his Maiesties obedience, and likewise in the souerainety of Sedan and Raucourt. To begin in regard of the Prouinces of Poictou, Xaintonge, Angoumois, Bretagne, Anjou, Touraine, and Berry, on the day that the present Articles shall bee ratified by his Maiestie, of whose will the said Prince shall bee satisfied by the thirtieth of this month. And in regard of other remote Prouinces, this suspension should begin the day of the publication thereof, and end the first day of March following, whereof the Prince should at the same time aduertise such as commanded in any places for him. 4. That his Maiestie should be humbly intreated to send speedy commandement for the publication of the said suspension of Armes: and that in the meane time all prisoners taken on either side, after the thirtieth day of this present month to be set at libertie. 5. That no fortification should be made during this suspension in any towns or places, taken since the first of September last; nor any souldier leauied within the Realme. 6. And to hinder alteration by nearnesse of the Armies: it was agreed, That his Maiesties troopes should retire beyond the Riuer of Vienne, and not approach within eight Leagues of Loudun. But as for the Garisons which might be held necessarie for the safety of the townes and places on this side the riuers of Vienne, and Chain, which might giue some cause of ialousie, there should be a list giuen vnto the Prince of the numbers which should bee employed. 7. The like Article was concluded touching the Princes Armie which should not approach within fixe leagues of Poitiers. 8. That the Prince might lodge some troopes in Loudun and thereabouts for the safety of the conference. 9. That the troopes might retire if they pleased, hauing leaue from their Generals in all safety, so as they aduertise the Gouernors of places where they past, and did not march about twenty together. This Accord was confirmed by the Kings Decree. Signed the 23 of Ianuary.

A strange accident at Tours in the Council Chamber.

The falling of Saint Michaels bridge at Paris.

Great mortalitye vnto the Kings returne from Bourdeaux.

profitless consumed during his suspension. See A. 14. c.

After this, the King came to Tours, during the extremity of the cold, where on the nine and twentieth day the Councell being assembled, the Floore of the Chamber began to sinke, so as many Noblemen and great Personages fell with it, in the which the Earle of Soissons, the Duke of Espemon, with many Noblemen were hurt. The Queene Mother was on the other side of the Chamber, conferring with the Chancellor, and some other Councillors of State and fell not, which gaue great content to all the Court.

This newes being brought to Paris increased their sorrow, for the same night of the 20 day: the Riuer of Seine hauing bene frozen; there comming a thawe, the Ice brake and caried away many boates laden with Wood, Corne, Wine, Salt and other Merchandize of a very great value; a part of Saint Michaels bridge fell into the water, which caused great losse, but none drowned but one Maid-servant: the other moiety of this bridge fell in Iuly following; so as they were forced to make another of wood towards the Augustins, whilest they built the other of stone.

The season of the year, was violently cold, during the Kings passage from Bourdeaux to Tours; whereof they write extraordinary things. That between Poitiers and Chastelleraut, there were Coachmen scene to fall downe dead from their Coaches; that there died of many groomes and seruants to Princes and Noblemen, that being at Tours they were forced to make new traines; and such as escaped, some lost an eare, some fingers, some toes which were frozen off. That in the Regiment of the guards which consisted of three thousand men, there died about a third part as well of cold, as of burning Feuers. That without any combat there was dead in the Kings Armie, and the Princes about 10000 souldiers, which had so infected the Country from Bloys to Ancenis (which is 50 leagues) as there died afterwards about 10000 other persons, and of the best families. The King lost at Tours his Schoolemaster, the Queene her Physician, and Dole a Councillor of State, with diuers others left this life.

The conference was now beginning at Loudun; yet the suspension of Armes was not generally obserued. In Guienne, La Force and Grammont continued the warre one against another; and the Duke of Vendosmes troopes committed great Acts of Hostility. Many Townes of Anjou, Maine, Pearch, and Britanie were forced to contribute money vnto them. Whereupon the Court of Parliament at Rennes (seeing him vnwilling to discharge his troopes) made a Decree against him, giuing leaue to the countrey people to set vpon them. This made him to write a Letter vnto the King, which gaue their Maiesties no great content, but made them coniecture, that the Prince (notwithstanding all his protestations)

A testations) had some secret intelligence with the Duke of Vendosme, who should play the Newter during the conference, and by that meanes obtaine by force the advantages they desired. Vpon this occasion his Maiestie did three things. First, he caused many of his troopes to passe the Riuer of Loire, hearing that the Duke of Vendosme was gone towards Britanie with his troopes. Secondly, he caused eight Cannons to be drawne out of Paris with munition, and conducted to Orleans to be employed as occasion should serue; and thirdly, his Maiestie sent an Herald to the Duke of Vendosme, who found him in the Castle of Chantocé in Anjou on the eighteenth of February. He was conducted into his Castle by two of his guard, comming to the gate, heooke his coat of Armes, and so went into the Dukes Chamber, who was accompanied by many Gentlemen and others. The Duke hauing his hat in his hand, and the Herald couered, he said vnto him:

An Herald sent vnto the Duke of Vendosme.

To you César of Vendosme: I command you by the King my Soberaigne Lord your Master and mine, and all your adherents, that presently you lay downe Armes, and dismisst the troopes which you haue leauied, and come vnto his Maiestie; and all those which assist you to retire to their Houses; and for want herof I pronounce you a Rebelle, and guilty of Treason, and as such an one, to be pursued by force of Armes. To whom the Duke made answer, I am a most humble seruant to the Master whom you serue, I will conserue with these Gentlemen which doe meet the honour to assist me, and then giue you my resolution.

After dinner he said vnto him, That he was a most humble seruant to the King, and that the Armes which he had taken were ioynt to the Prince of Condés intentions, to reuenge the death of the deceased King his Father, to which end he would employ his life, goods and friends.

The Dukes answer to the Herald.

This Declaration stayed the Kings troopes from further proceeding, vntill the conference at Loudun; the which began on the tenth of February, according to the Treatie made at Fontenay. There came for the King, the Countesse of Soissons, the Duke of Neuers, the Marshall of Brillac, Monsieur de Villeroi, President Thou, and Monsieur de Vicq Councillors of State. For the Prince besides himselfe, there were, the Princeesse his Mother, the Duchesse of Longueuille, the Dukes of Longueuille, Mayenne and Luxemburg, with the Marshall of Bouillon. Soone after came the Dukes of Rohan, Sully, Tremouille, and the Earle of Candale: Sir Thomas Edmunds Ambassador for his Maiestie of Great Britaine assisted also, and the Assembly of Niimes was transferred to Rochel. The Prince presented thirty Articles, whereby it was coniectured that the peace could not be so soon concluded, and therefore the truce was prolonged till the 15 of March. In the meane time the Duke of Vendosme came to the Conference to be comprehended in the Treatie, and present his complaints.

The conference at Loudun begun.

The Kings Deputies had giuen answer in writing to the thirty Articles; but for that there was some contestation touching three which were suspended, the truce was againe prolonged vnto the 15 of Aprill: the chiefe question being about the razing of the Citadell of Amiens towards the towne; but in the end the Kings Councell gaue the Prince to vnderstand, that the King would not haue the Citadell razed, and that the Marshall D'Ancre would deliuer it into his Maiesties hands, to giue the government to some one that should not be suspect vnto the Duke of Longueuille, Gouernour of Picardy. The interests, advantages, and assurances which the Prince and his associates desired: and the contentments which they had secretly demanded, caused a new prolongation of the Truce, vntill the 25 of Aprill, during the which the priuate Articles were often sent to Tours: in the end the King caused the Castle of Chynon to be deliuered vnto the Prince. They promise him the Tower of Bourges, and Berry, with 1500000 Franks for the charges of his Armie. For the satisfying whereof, there were impositions raised vpon the Salt, and other Merchandize.

The Castle of Chynon deliuered to the Prince. 150000 pound Sterling.

Some held this peace to be dearely bought by the King, and that a warre had bin more profitable and honorable: but the Estate of the Kings affaires being considered, it was resolved to giue the Prince what he should require for his content. There was no speech now but of Peace, the Court was full of ioy, & the Princes drinke to the King and Queenes health, and protest to doe their best endeouours for the entertainment of the said peace.

But in the meane time the Prince fell dangerously sick at Loudun. Their Maiesties sent to visit him, and the truce was prolonged vntill the 15 of May, as well by reason of the Princes

At the end of the General Estates in the year 1615 there had been a great dispute between the Deputies of the Nobility of both Religions, for that the Catholics had concluded in their Chamber, that petition should be made unto the King, That he would preferre the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, according to the oath which he had taken at his Coronation : which was in these termes : I will endeavour with my whole power, faithfully to expell out of my jurisdiction, and the lands of my subjection, all which shall be declared Heretiques by the Church. They of the Religion made great complaints hereupon, so as the King made a Declaration of his intent ; but they not satisfied therewith, the King was intreated to make a second this year the twentieth of Iuly, whereby he declared, That his intent was not in the oath which he had taken at his Coronation, to comprehend his subjects of the Religion living in his Realme under the benefit of his Edicts, the which he would have innuoiably observed.

On the 19 of June, a Shoemaker called Pycard, Sergeant of the quarter neere to Saint Michaels Bridge, going into Saint Germaines suburbs, was beaten with cudgels by two Groomes, first on by the Marshall D Anores Gentleman of the horse, & then was in danger of death. This action was so followed; as the parties which committed this insolency were hanged. Some said that he had beene thus intreated in reuenge of that which had past at Port Bushy, the day before Palme Sunday where he was in guard, and had stayed the Marquis D Anere from going into the suburbs without a Passport from the towne according to the order; whereupon the Marshall was forced to returne to the Louvre. Others affirmed that this Shoemaker was much affected to the Princes party, and had vied no respect in this action, so as he was growne so proud; as he spake scandalously of the Marshall in all places where he came, the which the Gentleman of the Marshalls horse hearing, could not endure, but had caused him to be beaten as a seditious Detractor.

his place.

The Earle of Armerique, having bene eleven yeares and eight moneths prisoner in the castle, the King caused him to be set at libertie, and gaue him his sword againe, for which hee yielded thanks vnto their Maiesties. Their pleasures were that the Duke of Nemours should reside vnto him the place of Colonell of the light-horse, which had bene given him by the imprisonment of the said Earle. What a strange alteration, to see him that was a prisoner, and neuer thought to be freed at libertie, and within three weekes to command the Kings troopes?

About this time Don Lewis Morder y Paconcelles Bayliffe of Acre, and extraordinary Ambassador for the great Mafter, and all the order of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, came from Malta to Paris. Many great perfonages went to meet him, and the King cauled him to be lodged, defrayed and ferued by his Officers. On the day of his audience he came to the Louure with two and twenty Caroches : where making an honorable relation of the great Mafter, and of the Knights of the Order, hee befoight his Maieftie, that as heere to the vertues of his predecessors, as well as of their Estates, so he would continue the effects of his love, and not suffer the Duke of Nevers to diminish the order of the holy Sepulchre from this of Ierusalem, considering their long possession, and the

A Donation made by Pope Innocent the 8, with the generall content of all Christian Kings and Princes, as well of the dignity of great Masters, as of all the lands which they held in their countries. He also let him understand, that this order of *S. Besides the Ports of the Ilands which did import much the shipping which did traffique into the Levant. Moreover, he said, that by the erecting of this new Order, the French Knights should have the greatest loffe, if they holding the most important charges, yea, the great Masters being most commonly Frenchmen, in the end be con-

† Marshal Brizola
7 sent to Poitiers

Rokhsari, a Gentleman whom the Prince of Conde affected much, came to Paris, & went to salute their Majesty on the Princes behalf; telling them that hee would bee sodainly there: but withall he besought the King, that the 33 Article of the Edit of Loudun, touching the inhabitants of Poitiers, who had retired themselves by reason of the rumile might be observed. Hereupon the King sent the Marshall of Brissac thither. By the Article they were to enter into their charges, as well Militarie, as Iudicature. The common Councell of the towne increased his Majesty that they might not enter into their military charges. Hereupon there were many voyages made to the Prince; so as in the end the Militarie charges were excepted, and the Articles put in execution.

Viscount Dencaster comes to Paris.

The Prince of Condé arrived at Paris the 20 of July : all the Princes and great men of France came thither in a manner at the same instant, amongst the which the Dukes of Vendôme, Rohan, Sully, and Tremouille, with the Earle of Candale, the Prince of Orange, brother in law to the Prince, with Count John of Nassau came to visit him. They sent Ambassadors to all the neighbour Kings, Princes and States, to advertise them of the Peace which the King had given unto his subjects. And his Maiestie of Great Brittain sent an extraordinary Embassage by the Lord Hays, Viscount Dancaster, and now Earle of Carlisle, to his Maiestie, to congratulate his marriage, who came with many Noblemen and E Knights, and a very honorable traine. He was received almost as farre as Saint Denis by the Prince of Ioinville, and many of the French Nobility. He was conducted to his first audience by the Duke of Guise, accompanied by many great Personages, during his abode in Paris he was much feasted, namely, by the Marshall of Bouillon, the D. of Nevers, the Prince of Conde, and others. But a tumult which hapned at Peronne, and the Prince of Condes detention, made an end of their feasts, and bred a great alteration in Court.

הוא כדלהלן:

The Entry which the inhabitants of Peronne gave vnto the Duke of Longueuille into their towne, and to put out Fauls, a Gentleman of Gascoine, Lieutenant to the Marshall D'Ancre, Gouvernour in particular of Peronne, Roy, and Mont-Didier, and what followed of these towne in the year 1610, he made Fauls his Lieutenant in Peronne; who lodged in the Caffe; and the Garison in the towne, who had for Capitaine Rame Balgnekille, who had in his company 150 fouldiers. In Iuly there was a brute dispersed, that the Marshall with his Lieutenant Fauls, would lodge 1000 men in Garison there, of those which should come out of the Cittadell of Amiens: that they would tyrannize ouer them; *F*ilisthy their wiues and children, and ruine their towne. They seeme amazed, and fend to aduise the Marshall D'Ancre, who was then going to his gouernment in Normandy. But whilst they advertised the Duke of Longueuille of their affeccion: irritating him favour their request vnto the King, for the entertainment of that which the deceased King A Henry had promised them when they left the league: That they should haue no Governour but one of the Country a good Catholique. The Duke sent them word hee would see them shortly, perswading them not to suffer any Garison to enter. The chiefe Magistrates were willing to receive the Duke, whereunto their Governour opposed, protesting that he would maintaine the Marshalls authority with the hazard of his life, and not to suffer the Duke to enter into the towne. Whereupon they resolved to send to Court, to aduertise his Maiestie, and the Prince of Conde: but before their Deputies departed, they resolved to summon Fauols to shew the commission he had to refuse the entry of the towne vnto the Duke of Longueuille, which summons Fauols derided. So the Deputies departed. B Soone after they held an Assembly in the towne, where it was concluded, not to suffer any Gentlemen or Souldiers, friends vnto the Governour Fauols, to enter into Peronne, vntill their Deputies were returned from Court. After many things which past that I must omit, the Duke of Longueuille entred into Peronne, with great applause of the chiefe Magistrates.

The Duke of Longueuille enters Peronne

The Castle is yielded vnto him.

Monsieur d'Ancre is sent to the Duke of Longueuille.

Fauols is left with goods at Peronne, and was imprisoned at Rouen.

A resolution to seize vpon the Prince of Conde.

On the sixteenth of August, Monsieur Mangot, a Secretarie of State, was sent with Letters from the King to the Duke of Longueuille, but hee arrived not before the Duke was Master of the Castle, and had given it in guard to the Baron of Bernieules, the which was done by the souldiers who were perswaded to yeeld: the Capitaine and other Commanders being resolved to defend it, and to attend the Kings troopes which were coming from Paris vnder the leading of the Earle of Auvergne. Monsieur Mangot, having presented C his Letters, he said vnto the Duke, That euery man blamed and condemned that which had beene done at Peronne, both by him and the Inhabitants. To whom the Duke answered, That there had not been any thing done against his Maiesties service; but onely to suppress the contempt which Fauols and Rames had made of him and of his quality, as Generall of the Province, contrary to his Maiesties expresse will and intention, and the Treatie of London. Morcuir, he assured himselfe, that the King would not take it ill, his service being no way interested, nor the generall of the State, it onely concerning him, and the Marshall D'Ancre in particular, who would not acknowledge him in his quality of Governour Generall, and that he hoped his Maiestie would not make himselfe a party in priuate quarrels, as hee had formerly most humbly besought him by his Letters.

The same day Fauols with his wife and family were thrust out of Peronne about fixe of the clocke in the euening; having thus lost his goods and fortune: thinking to goe and excuse himselfe to the Marshall D'Ancre, he was committed to prison at Rouen vpon this Maxime; That the Capitaine which hath the guard of a strong place importing the State, and suffers it to be lost, should lose his life; yet afterwards he was set at liberty.

The Prince being returned to Paris, there was a councill held touching the businesse at Peronne. It was held that they should not aggravate any thing: and that matters might be reconciled, the Marshall of Bouillon was sent to Peronne to that effect; who vpon his returne vnto their Maiesties, reported, that the Duke of Longueuille, & those of the town besought the King to giue them leaue to name three Gentlemen of the Country, one of the which his Maiestie should choofe to be their Governour; or that he would confirm the Baron of Bernieules, whom the Duke had already put into the Castle. This demand did nothing please their Maiesties, thinking it a blemish to the Soueraignty. The Earle of Auvergne approaching with his light-horse, and part of the Regiment of the Kings guard, thought to lodge in Mount Saint Quintin neere vnto Peronne: but hee found that the Duke of Longueuille assisted by many of his friends and souldiers, which had beene sent vnto him, had seized vpon the place, and made it with a strong Garison. The inhabitants of Peronne, were then annoyed not onely with the Dukes Garison within the Towne, but also with the Earles troopes which lay about it.

Vpon these combustions there was a resolution taken in the Queenes Cabinet to seize vpon the Prince of Condes person; it being giuen out that hee was the author of these Broiles; that a greater designe would burst forth, and that they meant to seize vpon their Maiesties persons. Wherefore they perswaded the Queene Mother, that if hee would saue her selfe & assure the Kings person, she should lay hold on the Prince, vnder whose name & authority this conspiracy was plotted. Some write that shee refused to this remedy with griefe, & detested in heart the pernicious counsels which had ruined this

A this great Prince, and had thrust him headlong into these miserable designs, which forced the King to intreat him lesse worthily then his qualitie required, and that for her particular she desired.

The execution of this resolution was on the first of December; the Prince coming to the Louure to assist in Councill. The day before in the euening, the Queene Mother had sent commandement to the Marshalls of France, the Campe-Master of the Regiment of the guards, to the Collonell of the Swisses, and to the Capitaines of light-horse to attend the King the next morning. All came, and the Queene saw the Prince enter into the Councill Chamber. Monsieur de Themines had received commandement to haue his two B sonnes still by him, and to giue order that a dozen of his people whom he did best trust, should walke in the Court to be employed vpon occasion. D'Elbene, Lieutenant to the Duke of Anions company of light-horse, had the like charge. They draw their people together, and were led into a Chamber where they found the King and Queene alone: the King gaue to euery one of them a Halbard, saying, I doe not giue you these Armes to offend any man, if you doe not see that Themines and D'Elbene are forced to draw their swords, and that there is resistance made to the execution of my command. All hauing promised to live and dye in the fidelitie which they ought him, they were brought into a low Hall, whither the Prince should be brought as soone as he was arrested. All the Capitaines which were in guard about the Louure were commanded to stand at their guard. The Baron of C Thianghes who walked in the Court, and seeing this stirring, hee coniectured there was some designe: and for that there was none of the Princes in the Louure but the Prince of Conde, he doubted of some enterprize against his Person, which made him goe to the Councill chamber doore, where were many Councillors of State.

The Queene Mother who was ready to execute this great designe, had a watchfull eye to all occurrences: she sent a Gentleman to the Councill chamber doore to see what became of the Prince. The Baron of Thianghes seeing him come, said vnto him; you come to call the Prince vnto the Queene. To whom he answered, pardon me, Sir, I haue some businesse with a person who is there within, but I feare me he will not come out so soon. Wherefore I will leaue my Lackey here, to desire him that I may haue the honour to D speake with him before he goe from the Louure. Hereupon Thianghes became the lesse suspitious: yet he stayed at the Councill chamber doore, vntill the Prince came forth, and drawing neere vnto him told him in his eare the ialousie which hee had. But the Prince little regarding this aduice, passed along through the Swissers Hall, with the keeper of the Seales, the Marshall of Brisac, and the President Iannin, and so entered all foure into the Queenes Chamber, where the King was leaning in the window with many Lords about him. The Queene was in her Cabinet. The King turning vnto him as he entered, said, Good morrow Monsieur le Prince, I am going a hunting, will you make one? To whom hee answered, Your Maiestie, if you please will excuse me: Hereunto the King replied, I will goe tell the Queene my mother that I goe to hunt the Roobucke E after I haue heard Misses. Adieu Monsieur le Prince.

The Kings Speech to the Prince of Conde

The King being entered into the Queenes Cabinet, Themines came with his two sonnes out of an entry, who approaching neere vnto the Prince, said;

My Lord the King being aduertised that you giue care to many Counsels, contrarie to his service, and that they will make you embrace designs ruinous to the Estate, and to your owne condition, hee hath commanded mee to seize vpon your person, to keepe you from falling into these accidents: and at the same time his two sonnes came on either side the Prince, who said to the Seigneur de Themines: Me? He answered, I you my Lord. Then said the Prince, You know my qualitie: Themines, I know the respect I owe you; but I know also the obedience I owe vnto the King. Hereupon the Prince desired to speake vnto the King, and F to iustifie himselfe before their Maisties. Themines said vnto him, My Lord, let us goe whither the King hath commanded me to conduct you. The Prince offering to retire backe, and turning towards the Noblemen which were present, said, Is there no man heere for mee? but they stood gazing at this contestation, like transformed Statues; they were amazed to see the first Prince of the blood thus arrested, but knew not the cause. Then Themines said vnto him, My Lord, heere is no place to make resistance. The Prince seeing himselfe prest to goe out of the Chamber, desired againe to speake with their Maisties, for he had no will to goe forth, vntill that Themines had assured him, that neither he nor any other had charge to wrong him. In the end suffering himselfe to be led into a Hall which was prepared for him : and seeing D'Elbene (whom he loued not) with so many men with Halberets, he said, Alas I am dead, for he had a great apprehension of death, the which D'Elbene pacified, saying, That all they whom hee saw there were Gentlemen and no murderers, who had not any other commandement from the King but to guard him. He spake not any word against their Maiesties, but stood long silent, seeming much grieved for the change of his liberty into captiuitie.

The Princes flee
from Paris.

At the same instant all the guards were set vpon the approaches of the Loure, and they which were walking in the Court were put forth. The newes hereof was soone brought vnto the Princes his associates. They were sodainly dispersed like a Cove of Partridges before the Hawke; they apprehended the danger, but were ignorant of the cause. They which were sent to seize vpon the Duke of Vendosme, found that in coming to the Loure he had bene aduertised, and was escaped by Saint Honorie suburbs, posting towards La Fere (a towne which belonged vnto him, as the inheritance of the Dukes of Vendosme) so as they could not ouertake him. The Marquis of Cœuure, gouernour of Laon, vncle by the mothers side to the Duke of Vendosme, went to aduertise the Duke of Mayen of the Princes arrest. Hereupon there was no other talke but of going to horse-backe, all flee away in small troopes. They goe and meet the Marshall of Bouillon neere vnto Charenton, being gone forth that morning to the preaching. At the rising of the Palace, President le Jay remembering Amboise, desired rather to take the fresh aire of the fields by Saint Anthonies gate, then to remaine in Paris.

The Princes flee

Conde: he goe moue the people.

The newes of this arrest being brought to Conde House, in the Suburbs of Saint Germain, where the Princes Mother remained, she presently tooke her Caroe and went to our Ladies Bridge, thinking to moue the people, some of the Princes Gentlemen did the like, crying, To Armes my masters of Paris, the Marshall D'Ancre hath caused the Prince of Conde, the first Prince of the Blood to be slaine, To Armes good Frenchmen to Armes. But there were very few which made any shew to stir: which the Princesse seeing, she returned to her lodging, where many Noble men, and Captaines came to take aduice whether they should arme and goe directly to the Loure for the Princes deliuerie. It was proposed, that there might be some Burgeesses well affected would ioyne with them, and so together they might make an attempt. You may doe it said one of them: but consider that the Magistrates of Paris, with the common people will bee for their Maiesties, and then what shall become of vs, when as the Kings guards shall hinder our approach to the Loure, and at our backs they shall draw the chaines: before wee goe to this dangerous attempt, it shall be good to sweeten the multitude with the spoile of the Marshall D'Ancre lodging, and thereby breed a desire in them to follow vs.

The Marshall
D'Ancre house
spoiled.

This aduice was allowed, and presently executed. The Marshalls House was neere vnto the Palace, which the Queene was building, and Conde house was in the same street. Some of the Princes household seruants, hauing encouraged certain Mafons and other labourers which wrought in the Queenes buildings. They goe and breake open the gates, with such fury, as the Porter and other seruants were glad to saue themselves by the Garden. They went into the Halls and Chambers; some cast goods out at the windowes, others filled their pockets with gold, siluer, and what they found most precious. The first which carried any thing into the Citie, serued as Trumpets to aduertise the multitude that the Marshall D'Ancre lodging was vpon spoile.

In the afternoone Monsieur de Lioncourt, Gouernour of Paris, with the Knight of the Watch came thither with their Archers, thinking to stay this Spoile, but they found some of the Princes people armed with their Pistols, and encouraging the multitude, and one of them flew Adonville with a shot: whereupon the Gouernour retired. The multitude was so great, and to greedy of Spoile, as they hurt one another, yea, some were crucified in pieces with that was throwne from above. All good men trembled at this action, and detested their counsell which had taught the people the way to spoile.

spoiled.

In the meane time the Duke of Mayen and the Marshall of Bouillons troopes encreased, marching towards Picardie. The Duke with some others were of opinion to returne to Paris, and to ioyne with them of their faction, but the Marshall of Bouillon was of another opinion, saying, Our proceffe cannot be decided but when the doores are open, they that

A have bene accustomed to iudge when the doores are shut let them goe to Paris, if they desire to creep vnder, I hold that the way to Soissons is the safest for vs.

The Prouoft of Merchants hauing bene at the Loure to know the Kings pleasure, he vnderstood that the Prince was onely in custody, the which was presently made knowne to all the quarters where many had shut vp their shops, commanding all the Coronels and Captaines to see the peace maintained, and to forbid them to arme but vpon commandement. The Duke of Guise being at his house, was presently aduertised of this accident: He sent the Prince of Joinville his brother vnto their Maiesties, to know the cause; and soone after, Monsieur de Pralin came from the King vnto the Duke, who about foure of the clocke in the afternoone retired out of Paris, with the Prince his brother, following the Duke of Mayen their Cousin towards Soissons.

Guise, and the Prince his brother

Court.

During these actions, Monsieur Theminis, his sonnes, and D'Elbene, entertained the Prince: they asked him if he would care, but he refused it; yet in the end he was content so as his officers might bring it: whereupon it was agreed, that one should come and serue him, and not depart; and that his officers should prepare his diet and bring it to the chamber doore. Monsieur de Luynes came to visit him from the King, and La Motte from the Queene mother. He demanded if the Marshall of Bouillon were taken, and spake many things of him. The Queene mother hearing that Rochefort (a Gentleman whom the Prince affected much, and whom he had made Gouernor of the Caste of Chynon) was gone thither, with an intent to hold it by strength, and to draw together the friends of that partie; she caused the Prince to signe Letters and to adresse them to such as hee had pur into Chynon and the Tower of Bourges, that they should resigne those places into the hands of those the King should ordaine: which hee promised to doe, and afterwards performed.

The King and Queene send to visit the Prince.

Night hauing caused them to stay their spoile in the Marshall D'Ancre house, hauing left nothing but the rafters, Iron, and some Lead, they came in troopes to make an end, and carie away all, which was a fearful sight. About nine of the clocke, this rascall rable fell vpon the house of Corbinelly the Marshalls Secretary, the which within an houre and a halfe they emptied of all the goods, siluer, plate, or whatsoever was portable. They threatened the neighbour houses, and they were consulting to goe into the City, and to doe as much to the Colledge of Marmoutier, where the Abbot (brother to the Marshall D'Ancre wife) was lodged: This aduice was caried to the Loure. They of the Suburbs of Saint Germaine were presently commanded to arme: the Lieutenant Criminal with his Sergeants to goe into Saint Iames street, and Monsieur de Creguy to the Marshall D'Ancre house, with the three Companies, which should be relieved from their Guard at the Loure, which he effected accordingly. These spoilers saw themselves presently shut vp betwene the Kings Guards and the inhabitants of the suburbs who were in armes; yet they thought it good to giue them a free passage, with commandement to retire, and not to returne any more, vpon paine of punishment; for they desired to pacifie and not to exasperate things.

The Marshalls
secretary house
spoiled.

Thus from Thursday till Friday at noone, the Marshall D'Ancre house and his Secretaries were spoiled and ruined, so as there remained nothing but foure bare wals, without couering. The losse was very great in pictures, guildings, marbles, apparell, linnen, moueables, tapistry, mettals of gold and siluer, plate, with many goodly curiosities, which great men haue in their cabinets: all which did nothing profit them which were the authors. There was an intent to make criminall searches by the ordinary Iustice, but it was thought best to proceed ciuilly and by way of excommunication. There were some Curats which so detested this act, as many of the petty thecues brought what they had stolne to the Commissarie of the Quarter, or cast it into a Waggon which was appointed to F that end.

Their Maiesties seeing themselves ill assisted by their ordinary Guards, they sent commandement to the Earle of Auerngne, who lay about Peronne, to returne speedily with his troopes to Paris: the which he did. The long and faithfull seruices of braue Cheualiers haue for their reward honors and great military charges. So the King knowing the good and faithfull seruices which the Seigneurs of Theminis and Montigny had done vnto the Estate, he made them Marshalls of France. In the meane time they prepared a Chamber, the windowes barred with Iron, about the great Hall in the Loure for

The Duke of Guise being at Soissons, wrote vnto the King, and the Duke of Neuers from Charleville, they desiring to be certified of the cause why the Prince had bene stayed. The Duke of Guise wrote in this manner :

The Duke of Guise's Letter to the King.

Sir : I haue receiued from Monsieur D'Amant the Letter which it pleased your Maie-stie to write vnto me, and haue heard the credit which you haue giuen him, testifying the continuance of the assurance which it pleaseth your Maieftie to haue of the fidelity of my seruice, the which I will continue without any exception. Hearing of the Princes detention, I sent my brother the Prince of Ioinville to know the cause, the which I could not, neither by him nor any other that came vnto me: holding this businesse of such consequence, as if the grounds be not very cleere, and the proofes infallible, they may involve in the like proceedings your best seruants, as I am and will alwayes be : and knowing the departure of Monsieur de Mayen, he gaue me occasion to come to this place, where I most humbly beseech your Maieftie that I may know what the Prince hath committed against his dutie and your seruice : to the end I may haue meanes to enforme your ser-uants, and to iustice them to continue their seruice vnto your Maieftie, and to free them from the imputations which they may take, being engaged by bad Counsels in some preiudicial action. I will euer rest your most humble and most obedient subiect and seruant, Charles of Loiraine Duke of Guise.

The Duke of Neuers Letter to the King.

The Duke of Neuers wrote in another style in these termes : Sir, When I came vnto this frontier, to take my way directly towards the Emperors Court, according to the commandement and commission I had from your Maieftie ; I receiued the Letter wherewith it pleased you to honour mee : by the which I vnderstand of the arrest which hath bene made of the Princes person, vpon an aduice which you sent mee word was giuen you, that some meaning to attempt against your person, and that of the Queene mother, desired also the Prince to ioyne with them in that bad designe : I must confesse these newes bred a great amazement in me, considering the good disposition wherein I left the affaires, which made me hope to see a peace firmly settled : in the negotiation whereof, hauing had the honor to be one of those which was employed, to give the assurance which was necessary to such a treaty : I held my selfe more bound then any other, to desire the entertainment thereof : so as if since the treaty any one be found culpable to haue attempted against your Maieftie, they can neuer haue a greater enemy then my selfe. But in like manner I thinke it necessary as well for your Maiesties seruice, as the satisfaction of the publike, and the content of all good men; that this businesse may bee speedily manifested, and that the truth may be knowne both within and without the Realme. In the meane time I will delay my iourney for a season, and give all necessary order for the towns of this Province, according to the commandment which you haue giuen me, wherein I will not faile, but will alwayes remaine your most affectionate and faithfull seruant, Charles of Gonzague of Cleues.

The King re- solves to raise three armies.

This Letter did not much please, but doubled the ieaiousies which they had of the Dukes carriage. Yet the King was willing that all men should know wherefore he had detained the Prince of Conde, not by particular Letters, but by a Declaration verified in Parliament, sitting himselfe in his seat of Iustice. And in regard that the Princes and Noblemen were retired to Soissons, and that such as the Prince of Conde had put into the places in Berry, and in Chynon in Touraine, seemed to haue a will to take armes, it was resolved in Councell to leaue three armies, the one to bee led by the Earle of Au-uergne towards Soissons, the other by the Marshall of Montigny for Berry ; and the third by the Marshall of Souuise to goe into Touraine : But these armies could not bee raised without money, and the Kings Treasure had bene exhausted during the second ci-uill warres, wherefore they had recourse vnto extraordinary meanes : among the which, if as lesse burthenfome, it was decreed that an Edict should bee made touching the sale of many Offices.

The Kings De- clation touch- ing the Prin- ces detention.

The Kings coming to Parliament was appointed on the 7 of September : all things were made ready according to the vsuall manner, and the King came vnto the Palace about 10 of the clocke, with the like state hee had bene accustomed in such actions ; the particularities as well thereof as of the Kings sitting in the seat of Iustice, I must omit, to auoid tediousnesse.

After

A After some short speeches made by the keeper of the Seales by the Kings commandement, and the first President, he caused a Declaration to be read concerning the seizure of the Prince of Conde, and the Princes and Noblemen which were retired : wherein he said that he was forced to publish vnto the world the iust complaints which he made, as well against his Cousin the Prince of Conde, as the Princes, Noblemen, and others, which did adhere vnto the pernicious designs which had bene practised against his person and state : That they had lately risen vp in armes, vnder colour to hinder the most honorable alliance which he could make in all Christendome, and to reforme his Estate by the ruine thereof : That by the treaty of Loudun, he had granted vnto his Cousin, whatsoever hee demanded, and had not onely left vnto him the Government of Berry, but did redeme all places of strength which were within the Province : That hee had giuen him great summes of money, either by way of gratification, or for the dismissing of his troops :
 That the charges of this war and of the treaty amounted to about twenty millions : That to content his cousin the Duke of Longueville, he had drawne out of Picardy and the Cittadell of Amiens such as commanded there, to place one who was pleasing vnto him : that he had giuen vnto the Prince what part he desired in the managing of the State, and especially the direction of the Treasure : that notwithstanding the abundance of his graces and fauours, they could not restraints their disordered wils, who found no rest but in the trouble of the Estate, and put all their hope in his ruine. Morouer, he complained, that both before and since the Princes arrival there had bene many nightly Assemblies in his City of Paris and elsewhere, at the which there assisted diuers Princes and great personages, yea and some of his Officers, whereof some of them were since retired, iustifying their crime by their sight.

Two millions sterling.

After which he said that they had practised to debauch his people, and to moue them to sedition, and to winne the Colonels, Captaines, and such as had charge of Armes, vpon diuers pretexts : That they had seized vpon the towne and castle of Peronne, the resolutions whereof had bene taken neere his person, and although he had great reason to be incensed for this excess, yet he had accommodated himselfe to al the propositions which had bene made to reconcile the businesse quietly : That notwithstanding his bounty and indulgence, they had drawne foure companies of foot into the towne ; the which did very much displease all such as had any respect vnto his authority, that a Princesse very so-ally allied to those which were interessed in that action, moued with compassion of their fortunes, had giuen aduertisement to the Queene his mother, of the designs of the vnder-takers, and that they should haue a care of themselves, for that their Councels tended to seize vpon his person and the Queene mothers, and so to canton themselves throughout all the Provinces : the horror whereof had bene so great in the hearts of some of them, that euen his cousin the Prince before his detention had ingenuously confessed to the Queene mother, that hee had assisted at the said Councell ; and that in truth they had cause to suspect him : adding withall, that they were bound to him as much as to their owne fathers : That one of the greatest of the Realme had bene at one of the said Coun-cels (as he confessed to the Queene mother) in which they treated of the seizure of his person, and the government of the State, with many other aduertisements to the like effect. That the Ambassadors of foraigne Princes had giuen him aduertisement by writing, and perswaded him to be carefull of his person : That they leauied men in all parts of the Realme, without commission or pretext : That for these and many other considerations, he had resolved to prevent this imminent danger, and to assure himselfe of the person of his said cousin, whom he had lodged neere vnto him in his castle of the Loure, with as honorable vlsage as could be desired in such a case. In the end, by his Declaration he confirmed the treaty of Loudun, with a pardon to all those which were culpable and had assisted themselves, if they came within fifteene dayes and demanded it.

Complaints for the seizure of Peronne.

That they meant to seize vpon the King and Queene mother.

These are the reasons suggested in the Kings Declaration for the Princes detention. I will not presume to examine the truth of them, but will leaue it to the iudicious Reader ;
 but howeouer, it was verified by the Court of Parliament.

The King being desirous to suppress all causes of further alteration, sent the Seigneurs of Boissie and Chanvallon to Soissons, being aduertised that the Dukes of Longueville, of Vendosme, and Mayen, the Marshall of Bouillon, and the Marquis of Capua, should meet with the three brethren of Guise, to conferrre of the meanes to pacifie these combuctions.

buftions. On the 14 of September, there was a Proclamation made, commanding all Gentlemen and others of what qualitie soever, belonging unto the Prince of Conde or the Dukes of Vendome, Mayen and Bouillon, to depart out of the Citie and suburbs of Paris within 24 houres: forbidding all the inhabitants to lodge them or assist them with any victuals, vpon paine of confiscation of all their goods; except such as shall make protestation to liue and dye in the Kings obedience, and vnder the authority of his commandements, and that had relinquished all intelligence with the said Prince and Dukes. The King prepares for peace on the one side, and for warre on the other, in case hee bee not obeyed. He sendeth into Swisserland to make leuies. Foure field-pieces and two culuerins, with their munition, are drawne out of Paris to goe to Meaux: The Earle of Auergerne parted the next day, and makes it the rendezuous for the Kings army. They put garisons into the townes vpon the riuier of Marne: Vaubecourt with his Regiment of Loraines, was lodged about Chalons; and D'Elbene was put into Espernay.

During these preparations to warre, there was a new cause of discontent given to the Duke of Neuers. Being at Rheims he sent Marailles vnto the King with Letters dated the fifteenth of September, complaining that he had refused him the gates of Chalons, one of the chiefe townes of his Government. He complained by his Letters, that hauing receiued commandement from his Maieftie to take order for the frontiers of that Province, and to visit the other places of his government: hee vnderstood that commandement had beene given vnto the inhabitants of Chalons to refuse him entrie into their towne, if he should present himselfe, the which he said did much amaze him, considering the contrariety of two dispatches; by the one vnto himselfe, he did assure him hee would commit vnto him the conduct of his army; and by the other hee deuiued him of the exercise of his charge: the which had made him to examine himselfe whether his actions had giuen any iust cause of jealousy to his Maieftie: then making a long repetition of his seruices, he concluded in these termes; I find, Sir, with much griefe, that my seruices haue beene waiged by those which now giue your Maieftie counsell, and who are afraid that my good endeouours about the peace might procure me that happinesse which they desire to di- priue me of, fearing to encounter their losse in peace by the discouerie of their violent counsels, and pernicious designs. This onely consideration in my opinion hath made them to doe me this affront, your Maieftie will pardon me if I call it so, being so assured of mine innocency, the which I hope God will in time make knowne vnto you, when you shall please to take the paines to enforme your selfe more particularly of these affaires, and of those which are your true and faithfull seruants, amongst the which I think my selfe to hold one of the first ranks, as being alwayes your most humble and obedient subiect and seruant, the Duke of Neuers.

Thenewes in Court were verry variable, one day peace, another day warre. The Seigneurs of Boissile and Chanvallon deputed from the King, being come to Soissons, the three brethren of Guise vnderstood by them the intentions of their Maiefties, vnto which they conformed themselves. Then they began to treat with the Dukes of Vendome and Mayen, the Marshall of Bouillon, Marquis of Cœuvres, and others, of the meanes to preserve the peace in France. The season of Winter which approached; the intelligences of the Princes out of frame, by the detention of their Hosts, the small preparations which they then had for warre; and the King on the contrary being in armes and ready to set vpon them, were the principall causes which made them make choice of peace. Finally, the Princes and those which were vntied vnto them in Soissons, propounded thirteene Articles, which the duke of Guise returning to Paris on the 24 of September, presented vnto their Maiefties, he being receiued by them with much content. That night the Prince was conueyed to the Bastile. The duke of Guise returned to Soissons to acquaint the Princes with his Maiefties pleasure, who came back again on Michaelmas day, & the day after, the King resolu'd in Councell touching the Princes' demands, which were as followeth.

I. That the treaty of Loudun, with all the priuate Articles, should be obserued & speedily put in execution: as well in that which concerns the Prince of Conde, as other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, and all others which were comprehended therein: and if it pleased the King, that the sieges of the towne and castle of Chynon, and the tower of Bourges might be raised, and they which commanded in those places, maintained in their charges.

A. Anf: His Maiefties intention is, To entertaine the treaty of Loudun, and to cause it to be faith fully executed: but touching the Prince of Conde, hee refuseth that to himselfe, to dispose as hereafter shall be thought fit for the good of his seruice.

II. That the Declaration which it shall please his Maieftie to grant vnto the said Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crowne, and others, shall be published in all the Parliaments of his Realme, and other inferior Courts, as hath beene accustomed, and to that end Letters should be sent vnto the Parliament.

Anf: Granted.

III. That the summe of 100000 crownes promised by the Treaty of Loudun, and assigned vpon the impositions of the Riuer (which haue not beene established) shall be supplied, all difficulties ceasing, for that the said Princes haue advanced the money for the dismissing of their troops.

Anf: It hath beene satisfied by the first Article. And if the Assignment be not good, it shall be otherwise provided.

IV. That the garisons in such places as the Duke of de Mayen holds, shall bee encreased with 200 foot, and the companies of men at armes and light horse, entertained according to the treaty of Loudun, to be put in garison in such places as the Duke de Mayen should thinke fit for the Kings seruice.

Anf: His Maieftie grants to the D. de Mayen the sum whereunto the payment of the said 200 foot may amount, for the three moneths remaining of this year, and for the next year following: as for the companies of men at armes and light horse, they shall be entertained as hath beene assigned by the said Treaty. And the said companies of men at armes shall be paid two quarters of this present year, and three of the year following, and after that manner successively.

V. That the payment of pensions, estates, and appointments, and the entertainment of the garisons and companies of horse of the Duke of Mayen, shall bee assigned vpon the generall receipt of Soissons, and of the taxes, customes, and imposts of the said generality, by the accustomed order of the Treasure, and that for this present year, and the next following.

Anf: His Maieftie cannot particularly affect any receipt for the payment contained in the said Article: notwithstanding it shall be so provided for, as the Duke of Mayen shall haue cause of content.

VI. That the summe of 10000 Franckes, granted heretofore to the said Duke for the fortification of such places as he holds, may be continued for two years. 1000 pound sterling.

Anf: In setting downe the estate of the fortification, his Maieftie will haue regard vnto the remembrance contained in this present Article.

M. II. That the commission to assemble the States of Britanie this present year, may bee sent to the Duke of Vendome, according to the promise which was made vnto him at Loudun.

Anf: The expeditions for the said Assembly being already sent, his Maieftie cannot alter any thing for this year, but when as the Duke of Vendome shall come to receive his Maiefties commandements, he will then giue him all occasion of content, and grant him the Assembly of the said Estates for the next year.

VIII. That the Duke of Vendome may haue an assignation of 30000 pounds sterling, which was promised him by the treaty of Loudun, in recompence of his Government of Nantes: offering in lieu thereof to giue ouer the place.

Anf: The Duke de Vendome being with his Maieftie, it shall bee aduised vpon with him within the time of the Assembly of States the year following.

IX. That the company of light horse of the said Duke, shall serue where the said Duke of Vendome shall appoint them, and hold most expedient for the Kings seruice.

Anf: The said companie of light horse were created as all others, to serue neere vnto his Maieftie, but the directions and commandements of his Maieftie touching the said companie, shall be addressed to the said Duke of Vendome.

X. His Maieftie, if he please, shall ordaine the entertainment of 100 foot, to keepe a garison in the towne of La Fere.

Anf: His Maieftie hath granted vnto the said D. of Vendome, the sum vnto which the payment of 100 footmen will amount for 3 moneths remaining of the year now expiring; and the next year wholly. The same summe to be paid like vnto the rest of the garisons of the kingdom.

XI. His

Theſe Anſwers were ſent to Soiſſons, the which were thus vnder-written: We haue received the Articles and Anſwers above mentioned, by Monsieur de Boiſſie, by the expreſſe commandement of the King, and to obey his will. Made at Soiſſons the 6 of October. 1616.

After this, they treated at Paris for the pacifying of the alteration which had bene at C Peronne, where it was concluded, that he whom the Duke of Longueville had put into the Caſtle, ſhould reſigne it vnto the Viſcount of Blencourt, whom the King had advanced to that government: and that it ſhould be at the Dukes diſpoſition to put whom he thought fit into the Caſtle of Han for his Maieſties ſervice: And thus all things were pacified touching the action of Peronne. After which the King made a Declaration vpon the Articles granted to the Princes: ſhewing that (vpon his proper motion, full power, and royall authority, with the aduice of the Queene his mother, and the Princes and Lords of his Council) neither by any general or particular words contained in his former declaration concerning the Princes detention, he did not meane to comprehend the ſaid Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, Lords, Officers of ſoueraigne Courts, or other perſons of what quality and condition ſoeuer, which went out of Paris on the day of the arreſt and detention of the Prince, and ſince vpon that occaſion, which had made knowne vnto him their good intentions, and the reſolutions that they haue ever had to remaine in his Maieſties obedience: but would that they ſhould enjoy his graces, fauours, rewards, honors, and governments, and to exerce their charges as they did before, notwithstanding any interdiction and Letters patents granted to the contrary: and alſo is pleaſed that his Ediſt lately made at Loudun ſhould be obſerved; and that his ſubjects comprehended in the general, particular, and ſecret Articles granted in fauour of that Ediſt, ſhould enjoy the effect of the ſame. After this, there was a declaration made to confirme that which had bene concluded touching the buſineſſe at Peronne.

The firſt of the Articles which the Princes retired vnto Soiſſons preſented vnto the King, importeth, That the ſieges before the towne and caſtle of Chynon, and the tower of Bourges, might be raiſed, and theſe which commanded in theſe places maintained and kept in their charges. But the King vpon this firſt Article, referred vnto himſelfe to ordaine what hee ſhould afterwards thinke fit for the good of his ſervice. Therefore he ſent the Marſhall of Montigny with Letters vnto Bourges to eſta bliſh him Gouvernor of Berry in the abſence of the Prince, who arrived there on the 8 of September; and on the morrow ſummoned La Lande, who commanded in Tower of Bourges, to deliuer it vp for the King: La Lande requeſted ten dayes ſpace to aduerſe Rochefort who had placed him there, which was granted him, vpon condition that the ſaid Marſhall might intrench himſelfe before the ſaid Tower, which hee did; and beſides, ſet vp his gabions, and planted his peeces ready for battery. After ten dayes, La Lande reſuſing to yeeld vp the Tower, the Marſhall of Montigny reſolved to beat him out: and to that end, the tenth day about ten of the clock at night, being aſſiſted by many of the Gentlemen of the Country, and inhabitants of Bourges, he made an ouerture in a wall, and brake downe the garden gate of the Tower; and from thence at fixe a clocke in the morning, made a breach in the Tower that one man might paſſe: which La Lande ſeeing, he alſo ſhot foure volles of Cannon from the

A top of the Tower cleare ouer the Towne, and then craved to paſſe, which being granted, this compoſition was, That he ſhould come forth with his ſuſtained ſouldiers, with their armes and baggage, without carrying with them any munition or armes belonging to the ſaid Tower. A while after, the inhabitants of Bourges ſent to beſeech his Maieſty that this Tower might be raiſed: But the King ſent Capitaine Dauphin, an Exempt of his Guards, to command therein.

Soone after, the Seigneur of Rochefort who had gotten into Chynon ſome two hundred horſe, foure hundred foot, and great numbers of catſell among others, foure hundred Becues, ſeing himſelfe almoſt beſieged by the Marſhall de Saunoy, and that eighty Cannon were coming from Towers, he reſolved to obey the Letters which were preſented him from the Prince his maſter. They write, that he would not accept of any recompence for his coming forth, but retired home to his owne houſe. D'Elbene was made Gouvernor of the towne and caſtle of Chynon by the King.

Theſe remained yet to reconcile the difference betweene Monsieur D'Efpernon and the Rochellers, renewed ſince the detention of the Prince. The Rochellers pretend by priuiledges, confirmed (as they ſay) by many Kings, to haue exemption from Governours in the Towne and Country of Rochel, in which they compoſe the Country. And the Duke of Efpernon alledgeth the contrary, being Gouvernor for the King in Xaintonge and Aulins. Now vpon the common brute of the Princes detention at Paris, the Rochellers ſent ſome ſouldiers to ſeize vpon a Caſtle called Rochefort, which is in the Country of Aulins and vpon the Riuer of Charente, where they placed a garriſon. The Duke of Efpernon hearing hereof, took in for an enterpriſe vpon his Government, and reſolved to make the Rochellers know that there was no other Gouvernor but himſelfe in the Country of Aulins. Hereupon he aſſembled his troopes, and came out of Augoumois into Aulins, where he put a ſtrong garriſon into the Caſtle of Surgeres, which is but foure leagues from Rochel. In briefe, it ſeemed by the leauiſes made on both parties, that they would come to armes, but they proceeded not, either party publiſhing his pretensions in writing.

Vpon complaint made vnto the King of the Duke of Efpernon carriages, his Maieſty ſent ſpeedily one Capaine Bourgogne, with two Archers, to command them of Rochel to deliuer the Caſtle of Rochefort into his hands: who hauing deliuered his charge vnto the Maior and Towne, and ſhewed his Commiſſion and priuate inſtructions, whereby he had charge to goe vnto the Duke of Efpernon, and to command him in the Kings name to retire his ſouldiers from Toney-charante, and other places. The Rochellers obeyed preſently, but they let him vnderſtand, that ſince their firſt complaint, the Duke of Efpernon had ſeized vpon the Caſtle of Surgeres, an extraordinary paſſage to bring all commodities to Rochel: That ſeing the Kings pleaſure was, that the Duke of Efpernon ſhould retire all his men of warre, it was reaſon he ſhould withdraw them which he had put into the Caſtle of Surgeres: they entreated Capaine Bourgogne to make the like Remonſtrances to the Duke of Efpernon, and to perſwade him to performe as much as his Maieſty had commanded the Rochellers: Which being found ſound and reaſonable, hee went preſently to Rochefort, which was deliuered into his hands without delay. Whereupon he went to the Duke of Efpernon, being at Xaintes, to acquaint him with the Kings commandement, from whom he returned to Rochel on the ninth of October; telling them that he would not obey, nor retire his men from Toney-charante nor Surgeres; That he had no commandement but to withdraw them out of the Champion Country, and not from any place where he had lodged them: Morouer, that he was Gouvernor of the Country of Aulins, and that he would take poſſeſſion of his Government: That what he had done at Surgeres was as a Gouvernor, and that he would enter into all the Government of Rochel.

Vpon this report, the Inhabitants of Rochel ſent to his Maieſty to beſeech him to ſtay the violence of the Duke of Efpernon: but ſeing that he augmented his garriſon at Surgeres, brought in munition and victuals, and cauſed them to labour daily at the fortifications, they grew iſouſ that he would not be ſo ſatiſfied, but it might be hee would attempt againſt their towne: whereupon they began to aſſure themſelves of all their friends to repaſſe the Dukes violence, to haue the King obeyed, and to defend themſelves.

The Duke of Efpernon challenge was held vniuſt, pretending that during the reign of Henry the third (when few things were denied him) he had ioyned to his government of Xaintonge that of the towne of Rochel, and the Country of Aulins : whereof they of Rochel had neuer knowledge, neither did hee euer attempt to take possession of the gouernment of the towne or country: against the which his pretention they had priuiledges farre more ancient then his pretended prouisions : the which being confirmed by all pre-cedent Kings, the sayd towne of Rochel was freed from all gouernors and garisons.

The King being aduertised of these alterations by the Depuries of Rochel, he let them vnderstand by his Letters, that he was resolu'd to send Monsieur Bossife Counsellor of State to end the differences betwene the Duke of Espernon and them, touching the Castles of Rochefort and Surgeres, and in the meane time hee enioyned them not to attempt any thing which might aggrauate this businesse, giuing the like commandement B to the Duke of Espernon. But after much contestation, the Rochellers retired their men out of the castle of Rochefort which was razed; and the Duke of Espernon abandoned the Castle of Surgeres.

These tumults being past, there was a calme peace throughout all the Prouinces of France: There was no speech but of Aduenturers which resolu'd to passe the Alpes to see the warres which grew hot betwene the Sauoyard and Spaniard in Piedmont, and the Duchy of Millane.

The Princes retired to Soissons, had in their twelfth Article entreated the King to take into consideration whether it were expedient for his seruice to maintaine an army newly raise d: but a part was dismissed, and the rest were lodged in diuers garisons of Cham-pagne, vnder the commatid of Monsieur de Pralin. The Duke of Neuers going sometimes to visit the Marshall of Bouillon at Sedan, made the King to send some troops to that frontier. They sayd that there was some new designe: That the Marshall of Bouillon desired to manage this warre, and that the Duke of Vendosme being in La Fere, had drawne certaine armes from Sedan: Finally, there was no speech in Court but of practices within and without the Kingdome.

In Nouember the Duke of Neuers wrote vnto the King, making great complaints against the Marquis of Vieuville Gouernor of Rheims, for that hee would not suffer the Duchesse his wife to enter into the town, who came thither in her Litter great with child, attended onely by her Gentlewomen and Officers, but was forced to lodge in the Sub-urbs, and could not haue the vse of her bed and baggage, which was entred an houre be-fore into the towne: That this adion was an affront and a discourtesie done vnto his wife. Some say, the Duke of Neuers had no cause to complaine of the Marquis of Vieu-ville, in regard of the Kings ialousie, hauing forbidden them of Chalon to receiue the Duke into their towne; and that the Marquis had written vnto the Duchesse of Neuers, that he was very fory he was forced to entreat her to giue him time to expect the Kings answer touching her passage or the Dukes through Rheims, the which he attended within two houres: which shewed that he had no priuate interest, but that he obeyed the Kings pleasure.

The same day the Duke of Neuers had sent vnto the King, he dispatched Capitaine Ref- fies to seize vpon the Castle of Sii in Rethelois, belonging vnto the said Marquis, which he did. The Duke gaue charge to his Proctor generall in the Duchy of Rethel, to make an information of that which had past at the refusal which the Marquis had made vnto his wife at Rheims; and to make a seizure of all his lands in the said Duchy; for that hee had not done his homage, nor paid the duties he ought since his fathers death: which was done accordingly, and a Capitaine put into the Castle of Sii to guard it. On the 21 of Nouember Bourceton, an Exempt of the Guards, deliuered the Kings Letters to the D. of Neuers; by the which he let him vnderstand, that what the Marquis of Vieuville had done at Rheims touching Madam de Neuers entry into the towne, was by his commande-ment: That the Duke should deliuer the Castle of Sii into the hands of Bourceton, and that if he would not withdraw those which were within it, he had giuen order to aduance some troops to force obedience. The Duke made answer, that the Souldiers which were in Sii by his command had abandoned it, and that if there were any guard at that present, it was by order of the Iustice at the request of his Proctor generall. Bourceton transports himselfe to Sii, he summons Capitaine Perroche to depart: who answers, that he was ap- pointed there by the Iustice; which he taking for a refusal, made a verball proceffe, and so returned: which added, more fiewell to the fire of their ialousies, as you shall heare.

The Marshall
D. de la Roche places many Officers of State.

A The Marshall D'Ancre and his wife, to the end they might absolutely dispose of the affaires of the Kingdome, had counselled the Queene mother to change and displace the ancient Officers of the Crowne, and Ministers of State which serued the King, to bring in such as they pleased: continuing still their designes, on the foure and twentieth of No- uember they caused the Seales to be taken from Monsieur du Vair, which were giuen to Monsieur Mangot: the Bishop of Luçon was made Secretary of State in the place of the Seigneurs of Villeroy and Pisieux: and Barbin had the generall controll of the Treasure, which President Lamun had exercised. These changes did astonish many vpon a report that the said Marshall and his wife had a desire not only to change all the Kings Council, B but also many principall Officers of Soueraigne Courts. There were many discourses written touching this dismission, which were full of viturh; wherefore they caused to be printed this following Answer which Monsieur du Vair made vnto two Counsellors of the Parliament, whom they had deputed vnto him, before they would verifie the Letters of Prouision for Monsieur Mangot.

He answered, That he held it a great fauour that the Court would send vnto him be- fore the verification of the Letters of his succesor, Keeper of the Seales of France: The which hereceeded rather as a testimony of that companies loue, then for any need they had of any further consent from him. For that wherefoeuer they should see this com- mandement from the King, they might instantly presuppose a ready and absolute obedi- C ence on his part. That he thought the whole course of his life should be a sufficient war- rant of this belief, both to them and all others which had knowne him. That there were many in that honourable company with whom he had seru'd the King and State faith- fully and courageously, in the most dangerous and miserable times that euer threatned this Monarchy with ruine. That hee had bene sent from them to the extremities of the Realme, to the administration of the most desolate Prouince in France, gaped after by strangers, full of quarrels, seditions, and diuisions. That after twenty yeares he had left it so peaceable, so obedient, and so wealthy, as it had no reason to enuy any other. That nei- ther at the death of the deceased King Henry his good Master, nor in the two troubles which haue followed and afflicted this Estate, there had bene no alteration, neither had D any man offered to fall from his obedience. That he had had the honour to see strangers from all the extremities of Europe, Asia, and Africa, at the feet of Iustice, who had returned from them, blessing the name of their Kings, and commending the lawes of France. After which he had bene called to the greatest charge of the Realme, beyond his merit and desire, whereof he had thrice excused himselfe, beseeching their Maiesties to cast their eyes vpon some one whose age and strength were more able to beare so great a burthen, and whose spirit might more easily apply it selfe to a courtly life. They refused him this grace, and by an absolute command forced his obedience, to make knowne by experience that he had iudged better of himselfe then any other; for after fixe moneths, his manners and his proceedings in the execution of that charge, had bene found so disproportionable E and so vnfit for the age, as they could not endure them: whereupon their Maiesties re- quired the Seales of him againe, which he more willingly gaue vp then hee had receiued them. They haue committed them, sayd he, to a personage of much more vertue and de- sert; by whose administration he hoped France should receiue rest and remedy of those calamities which threatned it. In which hee could doe no lesse then greatly praise their goodnesse and wisdom, to haue at once provided for their affaires and cased him. And so his intent was to retire himselfe, to pray vnto God for the prosperity of their Maiesties, as hauing no other meanes to serue them: yet contented enough if hee may continue in their fauours: Which he said, because he was aduertised that certaine persons (as malicious as cunning and ill affected towards him) had written a Discourse in his name full F of words which they beleueed might incense their Maiesties against him. Whereupon he besought the Court to assist him in the discouery of the authors, and to interpose th: se- uerity of Iustice for their punishment.

Hauing nothing then remaining after fise and thirty yeares seruice and so much paines and labour, but the honour to haue serued well and faithfully, and caused others to obey; no man should imagine that hee would vpon this subiect blemish the glory of his obedience, and not submit himselfe to the wills of his Masters, what preiudice soeuer hee might receiue. Wherefore hee entreated them to make report vnto the Court, who had done him the honour to send them : That he neither hath A nor neuer will haue any other will then that of their Maiesties : That hee will be euer content with what it shall please them to ordaine in any thing which did concerne him, and in any condition whatsoever : Hee did with all his heart the encrease of their power and establishment of their felicity. And touching their company, seeing he had now no society with it, to thanke them personally for the honour they had done him, and to witness the loue he beares them, the memory of his name assures him, that thinking thereof sometimes, they will finde that neuer any man entred into the charge which he now leaues, that hath more desired to preferre the authority which the lawes of State giues it, and the respect which their integrities deserue.

The Baron of Quemadene Gouvernor of Fougères, going to the Estates of Britanie which were held at Rennes, slew the Baron of Neuet, and then left the towne with his traine, and retired to Fougères; the quarrell grew for precedence, which did much trouble these Estates. The Marshall of Brifac, the Kings Lieutenant in Britanie, who had been sent to hold this Assembly, drew his friends and some forces together to besiege him in the Castle of Fougères, drawing Cannon out of Saint Malo : Quemadene on the other side (although he was beloued of the inhabitants of Fougères) hauing some good friends to assist him, had well strengthened the place : But the King hauing heard of this trouble, sent three Exempts of his guard one after another, vnto Fougères; the last with a commandement vnto Quemadene, to yeeld vp the Towne and Castle into his hands. C So Quemadene was counsell'd to leaue the Castle, and yeeld vnto the time, which he did, and his wife afterwards gaue vp the guard of the place into the Exempts hands, according to his commission.

Vertau Treasurer generall of France, put out of Châlons.

The last of November, Vertau, Treasurer generall of France in the generality of Châlons, was put out of the towne by the commandement of Monseur de Pralin, the Kings Lieutenant in the Government of Champagne. The occasion hereof was, for that on the six and twentieth of November the said Vertau being come to Châlons, the Earle of Tresmes, who was Gouvernor, being aduertised thereof, complained vnto Monseur de Pralin, and vnto the body of the towne, of some words which the said Vertau had vsed of him, such bitter words, as hee could doe no lesse, if he met with him, but to endanger D his life. Hereupon Monseur de Pralin, to hinder all sinister accidents, sent for Vertau, and said vnto him, I must tell you that the Earle of Tresmes hath bene with me, and hath made great complaints of you, I feare if he encounter you in the streets he will doe you some affront: wherefore I would entreat you to absent your selfe; and if you will not doe it willingly, I will enforce you: for I haue no desire that any new accident should happen in this towne, there being too many in the Province. Vertau hearing him say he would put him out by force, grew obstinate, saying, That he would not commit such an error, being the Kings officer, to goe voluntarily out of Châlons, without his Maiesties expresse commandement. Hereupon Monseur de Pralin replied, You shall not goe out of your selfe, but I will write presently vnto the King of what hath past, and you shall carie the Letter: if his pleasure bee E you shall remaine in this towne, you may returne, it imports not me; I onely feare they will doe you some displeasure.

In the meane time the Earle of Tresmes hauing solicited the Townsmen to put Vertau out of Châlons, the Lieutenant of the towne, accompanied with tenne or twelue of the Councell, went to enforce Monseur de Pralin that Vertau was still in his chamber, after whose departure there past many words betweene him and Vertau, and the Lieutenant of the Queene mothers company, who perswaded him to goe out of the Towne: but they could not preuaile; only he said he would depart the third of November to make his visitations in the Election of Espernay. The next day Monseur de Pralin meeting Vertau neere vnto the Towne-house, they fell into such contestation, as hee caused F him to be caried by three of his followers out of the gates into the suburbs, where the next day he tooke poste to make his complaints vnto the King.

The Marshall of Bouillon Letter to the King.

Notwithstanding the Kings Declaration vnto the Princes in September last, yet still there remained some iocalousies: Marshall of Bouillon seemed discontented, as appeared by his Letters to their Maiesties, which were published to the world, whereunto was annexed the Kings answer. The Marshall in his Letter to the King complained, That hauing bene alwayes an humble seruant vnto his Maiesty, as hee had witnessed by

A by his Declaration the last of September: he had hoped that he should haue tasted the effects of his fauour by the execution of the Treatie of Loudon, especially for the protection of his souerainety of Sedan: That hitherto he had tasted no fruits, but contrariwise they fought to misconstrue his actions, and to giue bad impressions vnto his Maiesty, for that he prouided carefully for the safety of a place of such importance, to the end he might preferre himselfe and his for his Maiesties seruice, and the good of France, in whose protection it had continued aboue fixscore yeares, and to take from his neighbours the desire they had to attempt against it, and by that meanes to encrease their limits (with his ruine) vpon the frontiers of his Realme, whereof they made apparent show; B there being no kind of bad viage but they suffered, which came vnto that place through the Archdukes countries, or by rigorous prohibitions, the passage being stop, contrary to the common liberty of commerce: That it seemed his Maiesties Ambassadors did contribute, yea were the chiefe motives, being well enformed of the bad offices they did him daily in diuers places: That this gaue him iust cause of distrust, seeing himselfe also enuironed with great Forces, and extraordinary garisons, the which they had lately without any apparent necessity, caused to aduance to his frontiers of Champagne, with an intent to annoy him rather then to assist him if he were in necessity; whereupon hee humbly besought his Maiesty to provide for it by his wisdom and authority, according to his royall protection; and to giue him leaue to vie those lawfull meanes which Nature allows to euery man for his owne defence. C He also wrote a Letter to the Queene mother to the same effect.

The King made answer vnto this Letter: That there had bene nothing done in his Prouince of Champagne but by his commandement: neither had he done any thing to the preiudice of the treaty of Loudon, nor of his declaration of the last of September: but that he himselfe and the Duke of Neuers by their departures, haue bene the first which haue broken that treaty: That they had sent into Holland, and diuers places of Germany to discontinue his affaires: To haue bought vp great quantity of armes, and passed them ouer with many souldiers vnto Sedan: That they were his actions, and not the interpretations giuen him, which bred his distrust and discontentments: That if his Ambassadors haue not yeelded vnto his desires, but rather haue bene contrary, they had done but their dutie: That they haue not bene matters of commerce, but acts of hostility, which seemed to tend to some other designe then the safeguard of his place, seeing he hath not bene assailed either by any of his or any other to his knowledge: that his jealousy was the more augmented by hearing of the leaues in Champagne, and forces put into many of his places, and that by night; so as many of the inhabitants of the towne of S. Manchoire were glad to abandon the same, for that they were affectioned to his seruice: that these reasons had made him resolute to send forces into Champagne to prevent the enterprises which might be made against his authority, and the quiet of his subjects, and to see execution done vpon the commissions which hee had sent to enforce E against the breach of his ordinances: that he was content to giue them respite which had erred, hauing no other end but to reduce euery man to his duty, wherein hee had vsed greater moderation then was ordinary, so as hee had no cause to complaine nor distrust, nor any pretext to couer his actions, the which hee would haue him to forbear: And whereas he desired to haue leaue to vie the lawfull meanes which Nature did allow him; he wished him to explaine himselfe more intelligibly; and in the meane time he did aduertise him, that the lawfull meanes which he could expect to preferre himselfe, were to adresse himselfe vnto his Maiesty, from whom hee must attend the preferuation of that which he enjoyed by the grace and bounty of the deceased King, in carying himselfe as he ought to doe, whereof he doubted not, &c.

F In December this yeare there was a resolution to change the Prince of Condes Guards, the causes were onely knowne to their Maiesties, but the execution was after this manner: They gaue Vence (who had the guard of the Bastile euer since the deceased Seigneur of Chasteauvieux had bene made Capitaine and Gouverneur) to vnderstand, that it was resolved to change all the Princes Guard, asking his opinion by what meanes they might bring Du Thier (who commanded the Queene Mothers Light Horse) with twelue of his companie to effect it. Vence made answer, That it was easie to bee done, if they came one by one without armes armes to aske for him, where they should haue entry to speake with him, and hee would A bring them into his Cabiner of armes, where they might furnish themselves. As for du Thier, he might come to visit him and dine with him. This enterprise was held easie, and they were admitted into the Bastile. Vouze shuts them into his Cabinet, and gives each of them a petronell : Du Thier dines with him : about three a clocke in the afternoon, they told Conté (who had the chiefe charge of the Princes guard) that there was one to speake with him from the Queene mother : coming downe, one of Vouze his people, who attended expresse in the court, told him, that the party which asked for him was in the other court without the draw-bridge, who going thither found not any one, and coming backe, the bridge was drawne vp ; so as he was out of the Bastile and knew not B whom to speake vnto. In the meane time Du Thier with his companions came forth well armed : they went to the Princes chamber, assuring themselves of his guards, and of Conté his seruant. In the beginning the Prince was troubled, du Thier told him he had no cause. After many speeches the Prince said vnto him, Their Maiesties haue twice done me the honor in changing my guards, to acquaint me with their pleasure : doe me this fauour as to tell them that I beseech them to doe the like now. Thus the Prince had a new guard, and Vouze went vp to the battlements of the Bastile, telling Conté (who was without the draw-bridge) that he desired him to goe vnto the Loure, where he should vnderstand their Maiesties pleasure, & that he had done nothing but by their commandement : after which, Conté retired, and they put the old guards and his seruants out of the Bastile. C There yet remained thirty or forty French souldiers, with their Captaine, in the Bulwark which looks towards the fields, but Vouze commanded him to goe and speake with the Queene mother, who returning presently drew forth his souldiers, in whose place they put so many Swisses who were daily changed.

Saint Manehould yielded
to the King.

Their Maiesties were then discontented with the Duke of Neuers, for that he had put 500 souldiers into Saint Manehould ; for by this meanes he couered Mezieres and Sedan ; held a great part of the Country in subiection, stopped the passage to Verdun and Loraine, and made shew that he would approach to Chaalons, which is but sixe leagues from S. Manehould : whereupon Monsieur de Pralin, who commanded the Kings forces in Champagne, had commandement to recouer Saint Manehould : and the President Commartin D Iudge of the army, was sent to make their proccesse, which should bee found armed in Champagne without the Kings commission.

On the 26 of December, Bouconville who commanded in the Castle of Saint Manehould, thinking that Monsieur de Pralin had bene gone towards Rethel, he sees him with 2000 men betwene the Castle and the Towne, who presently summons him by a trumpet to come and speake with him. On the other side, the commanders of the Duke of Neuers garison which were within the towne, seeing the Kings troops at their gates, would haue perswaded the inhabitants to take armes ; but they made answer, they could not doe it, being the Kings subiects. Hereupon they grew amazed, and Bouconville entred into treaty, where in the end it was concluded, that he should remaine still Gouvernour of E the Castle, vpon promise to continue faithfull in his Maiesties seruice. There were 600 Swisses put into the town, and the Duke of Neuers men departed with their baggage, and were conducted to Rethel, and the inhabitants of Saint Manehould were well pleased to see themselves thus freed.

The warres

The warres beganne againe in Italy betwene the King of Spaine and the Duke of Sa- uoy. Don Pedro de Toledo being made Governour of Millane, not onely kept the army still on foot, (saying, that he was not bound to disarme by the treatie of Alste) but leaued great Forces, and made extraordinary preparations. The Venetians grew iousal for that they were then in warre against the Archduke Ferdinand of Grete, a prince of the House of Austria. The Duke of Sauoy stood vpon his guard : He sent his complaints against the King of Spaine, to the Pope, the French King, the King of Great Britaine, and the Venetians, who had signed the treaty of Alste, and promised to assist him, if hee should invade his Estates. He sent to the Marshall D'Elziguieres, to summon him to effect the seventh article of the said Treaty : the Marshall vpon these summons goes to Thurin, where the D. of Sauoy gaue him a royal reception : hauing long stayed there to enforme himself of the truth of the Dukes iousalities, & finding that Piedmont had need of a speedy & powerfull reliefe, he returned into France to make a great leauy of horse and foot, and to draw the

A the Duke of Nemours who was at Nici, to aduance the leauy which hee made for the Duke of Sauoy.

During their preparations to Warre, the Pope sent Cardinall Ludonice, and the French King, the Baron of Berthones, to mediate a peace betwene them : many propositions were made, but in the meane time the Duke of Sauoy, and the Duke of Nemours (being both of one house) fell at iarre, being both in Armes : the Duke of Nemours hauing intelligence with the Spaniard ; but being weakly assisted by them, and in some extremitie, by the mediation of Monsieur le Grand, Governour of Bourgundy, and some other Councellors of State, who had commandement from the French King, to make a reconciliation B betwene two kinsmen so nearely allied in blood : in the end a peace was concluded betwene them to their great contents ; whereby the Duke of Sauoy had no enemy, remaining this year but the Spaniard.

To conclude this yeare we must make mention of the death of a memorable man. A Charles de Harlay, who had bene first President of the Parliament at Paris. Much was written of his life and death, to preserve his happy memorie, and to serue for an example to those who may and ought administer iustice religiously. This great personage was borne in the year 1536, at the age of two and twenty he was made Councillor in Parliament, at 36 President : and at 46 K. Henry the third made him first President, by the deccasse of Christopher de Thou ; wherein he continued vntill the yeare 1611, that age & sicknes tooke from him all habilitie to labour for the publike. His fidelitie and affection to the Kings and Crowne, hath bene much commended by the world ; vpon the words which hee spake the day of the Baricades to the head of the league in the Palace garden : It is great pity said he, when the servant chaseth away the Master, My soule is for God, my heart for the King, and my body in the hands of violence to dispose of me as they please. His constancy was admired in the Prison of the Bastile, speaking to such as had him in guard : My time is not yet come, but when it happens we shall speake together and neere. And when they told him that he would bee prevented, and that they would take his life from him, hee replied ; I haue neither head nor life, which I preferre before the love I owe vnto God, the seruice which I owe vnto the King, and the good which I desire to my Countrey. Finally, his manners, his commendable actions, his reuerend grauitie ; his brieue and succinct speaking ; his hands which neuer serued but to hold the ballance of the foueraigne iustice of France, and to be as a sword, to preserve the good, and to punish the wicked, his eyes which neuer regarded the condition and qualitie of parties ; and his eares which could neuer heare flatterie, haue purchased him the Title of the most excellent and worthiest man that euer fate vpon the seat of iustice in his time.

President of Harlay.

The iousalities begonne the last yeere increased dayly. In the beginning of the yeare, the Marshall of Bouillon made a reply vnto the Kings answer. By the which hee excuseth the visits betwixt the Duke of Neuers and him, in regard of the nearnesse of their Houses, hauing seene no declaration against him which might diuert him. That hee did not E thinke in so doing, to haue giuen any iust cause of distrust, nor to contradict the treatie of Loudun, as it seemes his Maiestie would inferre by his Letters, vntill that all ciuill iouserie were interdicted amongst his subiects, and reputed for a crime. Neither had hee found that hee had attempted any thing against the respect which was due to his Maiesties authoritie within his Government, nor obserued in his words or actions any thing but fidelity and affection to his seruice. That touching the summes they had of his intelligences in Holland and Germany ; he said, that his Maiestie might easily informe himself of the truth, by the Princes and Estates of Germanie, and the Low-Countries, who were strictly allied vnto his Crowne, whereby he should finde that the alliance he had with the said Princes, had neuer made him desire any thing from them, but the onely continuance of F their friendship, the which also his enemies would draw into suspicion. That whereas hee had bene charged to buy Armes, and draw many Souldiers into Sedan : and that it had bene verified by Letters which he had written to some of his Ambassadors, his answer was, that if they were produced they would verifie the truth : which was, that in the beginning of Nouember, he had written to Monsieur Pericard, Ambassador for his Maiestie at Brussels, to vnderstand from him, if since the Declaration made the last of September there had bene any commandement from his Maiestie, to hinder the passage through the Archdukes Countries for those which came into his Territories, and to mo-

left them, and ill intreat them, as they did then, and haue since continued: desiring to A know if it were with his Maiesties priuie and command; if not, he intreated him to employ the authoritie of his charge to hinder it hereafter, seeing it concerned the publique good, and his Maiesties seruice. That if he had informed any other thing to his Maiestie, he would accuse him openly of slander and falshood whereof he could conuince him by his owne Letters. That if for the preferuation of his place, against the enterprizes of strangers, he had been forced to doe as his enemies had suggested; he did not think he should incur any blame with his Maiestie, neither could they take it for any act of hostilitie. And yet they should not finde any other Garisons in his places, then those which had been accustomed for the guard thereof, and which his Maiestie had giuen him hope to entertaine. B That whereas they would maliciously perswade his Maiestie that many Souldiers had gone out of Sedan, and were lodged in diuers places of his Realme; hee said it was so grosse, as he could not thinke that any man would be so indiscreet, as to maintaine so manifest an inuaspure, which might be easily verified. Touching the Baron of Peche, he had no knowledge of his businesse in the Towne of Leige when he was murdered; neither could it be iustified that he had euer employed him in any sort whatsoever. That hee humbly besought his Maiestie to let him vnderstand his pleasure what hee should expect touching the protection of Sedan, seeing that the designes which strangers haue proieded against it, continued, and bound him to provide in time for his safety. And touching the explaining of himselfe, for that which hee had formerly written touching the lawfull C meanes to defend himselfe; he said, that nature teacheth euery man to preferue his owne, and bindes him to leaue it to his posteritie. That if any one seeketh to oppress him by violence; if he be in subiection, he hath recourse to his Soueraigne, who is to protect him from all oppression: if he be onely in protection, hee addresseth himselfe to him which hath promised it, who comming to abandon him, hee useth such meanes as hee may finde elsewhere, to oppose a iust defence, to an vnjust violence. That he had the happinesse to be borne his subiect, and in that qualitie could not but attend from his Maiestie alone the preferuation of that which he held in France by succession from his Ancestors. That hee had also the honour to be vnder the protection of his Crowne, by reason of the Soueraignie of Sedan, and the places depending, hauing bin alwayes confirmed since Charles D the eighth, and religiously entertained by Kings his predecessors, hoping that his Maiesty would not breake it now in fauour of his neighbours, which neither loue France, nor the greatnesse of his Estate, and suffer him to want meanes to preferue it for his seruice, as he was bound. He concludes, that the necessitie of his preferuation, made him to beseech his Maiestie, That hee would be pleased he might use the meanes which nature allowes euery man for his owne defence. If he were assaulted, hee would oppose the assistance of all his subiects and friends, and of those whom the interest of blood bound naturally vnto him; and that he would not omit any thing to defend himselfe, yet without doing any thing which might preiudice the seruice which he ought vnto his Maiestie and France, by the Treatie of his protection, or to the duty of a faithfull subiect vnto his country, &c.

The Duke de Mayne writes to the King.

The Kings answer.

After this, there came a Letter vnto the King from the Duke of Mayenne, sent by the Baron of Linieres, by which he complained of enterprizes made against his life, and the places of his Government. He besought his Maiestie, to cause exemplary iustice to be done vpon one whose name was Fauger, who had been corrupted with money to vndertake that wicked designe to kill him. He complains also of the Ministers which were about him. To whom the King made answer: That the preferuation of his subiects was so deare vnto him, and especially of those which were of his ranke, that if hee did contribute as much for his part, as the King would for the punishment of the crime, hee should without doubt receive all the contentment he could desire. That hee would easily beleue it when he saw that his Parliament, (which doth iustice to all the world, and hath the interest of the Peeres in singular recommendation) takes knowledge thereof. And that with so much care, as they haue already ordained that the cause shall be examined and iudged in the place where you are; to the end that being found culpable, hee may receive the iust punishment due vnto the enormitie of so detestable an attempt. The which would be vnadvisedly executed if he would, there being no meanes to auoid it but his flight, which he might prevent being in his power, causing him to bee safely conducted to Paris, where hee would not onely see him punished as he deserved; but all others which had been

1617

A been the instigators of so pernicious a designe. That he would neither suffer any enterprises to be made against the places which his subiects and seruants kept for him, nor against their liues. And therefore containing himselfe within the bounds of his duty, hee might assure himselfe that nothing should preferue the townes hee held more safely, then his authoritie. In the end, he coniuers him to second the protestation of his innocencie with so good effects, as he might not be grieved to haue troubled the profitable designes hee had for the Realme.

On the seventeenth of Ianuary following, the King made a Declaration against the D. of Neuers, the which was verified in Parliament. Where, after a long repetition of all the supposed crimes and disobediences of the said Duke; in the end it concludes, that for the causes therein mentioned, after view of the informations taken by his Commisaries, and other his Officers in the Province of Champagne, with the aduice of the Queene Mother, and his councill of State; he declared the said Duke and all which did assist him in his disobedience, false from all honors, dignities, offices, governments, penitions, priuiledges, and prerogatives, which they had from him or his predecessors, all which he did instantly reuoke: declaring the said Duke and all his adherents, disobedient, rebels, troublers of the publique peace, and guilty of Treason; if within fifteene dayes after publication thereof made in his Court of Parliament, the said Duke did not acknowledge his fault, and come vnto him to performe effectually, and personally, that whereunto hee was bound by duty, and discharge the Garisons which had bene placed by him or his adherents, without order or Commission from his Maiestie: And in regard of Gentlemen, and other his subiects; if within the said time they did not present themselves vnto the presidiall Court where they had their residence, to make their Declarations; and did not abstaine from all actions, and enterprises, preiudiciall to his authoritie and seruice, and to his ordinances and Declarations. But in so doing, the said Duke & all that had assisted him, should be free from punishment, and receiued into his good grace and fauour.

The Kings declaration against the Duke of Neuers.

In the beginning of this year, newes came to Court that many Souldiers trooped together in the Countries Thimerays, Perche, Mayen, and vpon the frontiers of Normandie, which ioynes vpon those Provinces, countenanced as well by the Nobility, who had openly caried themselves for the Princes in the second ciuill warre, as by others who had behaued themselves as Newters. But the King to prevent such practices, sent the Earle of Auvergne thither with two Cannons, and foure thousand souldiers, who assured all those Countries by the Garisons which he put into diuers places.

Troopers in Perche, Mayen, and Normandie for the Princes.

The Duchesse of Neuers parting from Rethelois, crost Champagne, and came into Nyuernois, where she began to leaue souldiers for the Kings seruice (as shee said) vnder husbands auhoritic. And the Marshall of Bouillons Lady went this winter from Sedan to Touars, and from thence to Turenne, which ministred a great subiect of lealouise.

In the end of the moneth, the Dukes of Neuers, Vendosme, Mayenne: the Marshall of Bouillon; the Marquis of Crauure, President Le Tay, and other Noblemen of their party, made a kinde of an Assembly at Soissons, where they resolved to make open warres to seize vpon the Kings reuennues; and to fortifie those Towns and Castles which they held in their Governments. They also sent into diuers parts both within and without the Realme. The Duke of Neuers Letter in answer of the Kings declaration made against the said Duke, was drawne in this assembly at Soissons the last of Ianuary: and the Remonstrances of the said Dukes and Marshall, which aymed directly at the Marshall D'Antre and his wife.

An Assembly of the Princes at Soissons.

The D. of Neuers, vpon the Kings declaration, wrote vnto his Maiestie, assuring him, that he would let him see by infallible prooves, the vntruth of all the disobediences mentioned in the said declaration: by the which they pretended to make him guilty, with such spleene, as euen his thoughts and intentions were not freed from crime, in the iudgement of those passionate spirits. But the testimonie of my conscience (said he) shall for this time suffice, vntill it shall please God (who is the soueraigne iudge) to giue you more knowledge of the truth, and my integritie: the which I hope your Maiestie shall know plainly to the confusion of slander, when it shall please you to heare mee; and that I may iustifie my selfe in your presence; or if you thinke it good in the Court of Peeres, who are my naturall Iudges, in regard of the ranke and dignity, which by birth I haue the honour to hold within your Realme. To this end, Sir, I am come to this place, place, being ready to attend your Maiestie, to yeeld you all obedience, and the humble A seruice which I owe you, and to discharge the souldiers which I haue put into my houses to defend them, and to prevent the secret enterprizes which are daily practised; whereof the president of those which haue bene executed giue me iust cause of distrust. But for that, Sir, the whole power of the government of your Estate, is now in the hands of the Marshall D'Ancre and his Partisans, whom he hath drawne neere vnto your Maiestie, and into your Councils, to the end he may doe all things at his pleasure, and be sole Arbitrator of the life, goods, honours, and dignities of your subiects; hauing to that end diminit your ancient Councillors, and taken away the Seales from Monseigneur du Fair for his integritie.

 Being also apparant, that he makes your authoritie seru as an instrument to my ruine, abusing (with wonderfull contempt, and insupportable audaciousnesse) your Maiesties B name, to exercise the violence of his passions, as well vpon mee, as all others whom he thinks may be an obstacle to his vnstable couetousnesse, and ambitious designs; vsur-ping within your Realme an absolute power, to dispose, establish, and change all things at his pleasure; all things being possible vnto him, although vniust, so as he may doe it by corruption or force, treading vnder foot the Lawes and Magistrates. And for that no man can haue any assurance, seeing that the publique faith hath bene violated, by the infraction of the treatie of Loudun; I most humbly beseech your Maiestie, to giue me necessarie assurances, both for my person and houses, and to provide by your authoritie, that the Marshall D'Ancre, nor his partisans may hereafter take any knowledge of that which C concernes me, they hauing no other end but my ruine; to the end iustice may be done me by indifferent iudges, and not passionate. That it would please you to call the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and ancient Officers of your Crowne and Councillors of State, whom your deceased father employed in his greatest affaires, to whose iudgement bee it in your presence, or in the said Court of Peeres, I will alwayes submit my selfe most willingly, according to the lawes and accustomed formes of your Realme, to make my innocencie knowne, and the integritie of my actions, to the confusion of those who through malice and slander haue disguised them to your Maiestie. I presume that out of your bounty you will not deny me the securitie which all your subiects ought to expect from your Maiety, if it please you to consider, that if the Marshall D'Ancre had power to force you against D your owne intention, to violate the publique faith, hauing now by the means of his partisans, the hand, the Seale, & the Treasure of your Maiestie, with your forces and Armies at his disposition; he will haue power enough to oppress my innocencie, and make you approve my ruine, and to signe my condemnation against your will: whereunto I thought it not fit to expose my selfe, remaining your most humble obedient subiect and seruant: Neuers.

The King
 makes a declaration against
 the Princes.

In February following, the King made a Declaration against the Dukes of Vendosme and Mayenne, the Marshall of Bouillon, the Marquis of Cœuvres, President Le Lay, and all others which did assent there: conformable to that which he had made against the D.
 of Neuers, and of the same Tenour, and therefore I doe forbear to make any more men- E tion thereof.

The Remonstrance of the Princes.

After this Declaration, the Princes made a Remonstrance vnto the King: in the which after their humble submission made, and assurances of their fidelities and seruice to his Maiestie; They said, We know well that the mischief is concealed from you by them which doe it, who labour to make them odious to your Maiestie which complaine. And the miserie of France is such, that hauing the whole power of your Estate in their hands, they make you to hold your most faithfull seruants for enemies. But the violence of their tyrannicall behauiour is come to that excess, as it can not be suffered. The complaint thereof is generall, every one sees and feels the miserable effects, and their practices can no longer hinder the voice and grievance of the people from sounding in your eares, to moue your compassion for their ease, and your iustice against the Authors of so many calamities, which all men know, and publicly detest. It is the Marshall of Ancre, Sir, and his wife, with his adherents, who by their couetousnesse are the sole cause of the miseries which we feele: of the disorders which we see, and of worse which we feare.
 He hath by his practices since the death of the deceased King, drawne vnto himselfe the whole administration of the Realme: hee hath made himselfe Master of your counsels; of your Amices; & of your Forts. He hath suppressed the lawful liberty of the remonstrances of

A of your Parliaments. Hee hath caused your chiefe Officers to be imprisoned; and is the cause of the violence done to the first Prince of the blood; hauing by this audacious action, violated the publique faith of the Treatie of Loudun: of the obseruation whereof depended the peace and tranquillitie of your State. We humbly beseech your Maiestie to take the Duke of Neuers into your protection, against the extraordinary proceedings which haue bene made vpon false pretexts and slanders; he being a Prince of one of the most famous Houses of your Realme, who loves his Countie, hath no other zeale but your seruice; and doth not acknowledge any other lawful authoritie but yours. He hath complained of some wrongs done vnto him by a private person his vassall; and that in B contempt of the dignitie of his charge, they haue not allowed him the free exercise of his government. He hath prosecuted the execution of some feodall rights in his lands, by the ordinarie course of iustice. And not to suffer that to be lost, which his Predecessors had left him by succession, seeing secret enterprizes ready to be executed vpon his houses, he hath provided as he ought to defend them, vnder your authoritie, and for your seruice: and these things so necessarie, are imputed vnto him for a crime of Rebellion.
 To the end, Sir, that we be not reproached to haue bene so little affected vnto your Maiestie, so vngatefull to our Countie, and so vnfaithfull to our selues and our possessions as to hold our peace; seeing the prodigious fauour of this stranger giuing the governments of your places; disappointing the ancient and chiefe Officers of your Coun-cell and Parliaments; wresting from them Titles of Honour, which their age, vertue and merit had purchased, to put into their places his creatures, vnworthy persons without C experience for the conduct of an Estate, and men borne to seruitude: We beseech your Maiestie to provide by convenient means for the disorders of your Estate; to cause the treatie of Loudun to be obserued, and to call into your Councils the Princes of your blood; with the other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, ancient Officers of the Crowne, & Coun-cellors of State, whom the deceased King had employed during his reigne. We shall then haue the happidest to yeeld you with all safety the humble seruice and obedience which we owe you, as your most humble, most faithfull and obedient subiects and seruants:
Cesar de Vendosme, Henry de Lorraine, Henry de la Tour,

D After this, the King made another declaration to satisfie his subiects touching these Combuitions. Although (said he) that the Rebellion of the Dukes of Neuers, Vendosme, Mayen and Bouillon, authors of the Letters which had bene brought vnto his Maie-stie from Soissons, the seventh and fourteenth of this moneth of February, made them vnworthy of any answer; yet for the desire he had to satisfie himselfe in satisfiing the publique, he had resolved to confirme such as might haue receiued any bad impression by their practices: and to let the world know, that vnder pretext of their particular preservation, and the good of the State, they haue no other end but to seeke their great-nes by his ruine. These two Letters (he said) which contained many points, might be reduced to two chiefe heads. The one is to perswade, that there is no safety neere the King, E whereby they would inferre, that they cannot obey the commandments which his Maie-stie makes them to come vnto him. The other is to blemish the Government of his Estate: the which they did, accusing it of violence and iniustice, and threatening this Monarchy with an inevitable subuersion, thereby (vnder colour to preserve it) to moue the people to fauour the resolutions which they had taken to make warre against their Prince. To these two points there was a long answer made by the Kings commandement, and signed by him on the 15 of February. To the first, he said that Kings assured Sanctuaries for those which acknowledge them and repent them of their faults: that their word is inuiolable, and their faith the most assured signe of a Royaltie. That to thinke otherwise were a crime. Touching the second, he said he did not wonder if they (whose F disobedience was so great) blamed those to whom he had committed part of his affaires, and whose integritie and sinceritie was so well knowne vnto him, that they taxed any whom his Maiestie employed, and who caried themselves courageously for the maintenance of his authority, and the settling of his affaires: The which (he said) appeared plainly in that they now commended and desired those whom they blamed being in Court, and of whose dismissal they themselves were the cause.

An accord being made as you haue heard, betwene the Duke of Nemours and the Prince of Piedmont, eldest sonne to the Duke of Sauoy, he repast the Mountaines, by Val d'offe, and entred the Lands of the Prince of the Masseran, which is diuided from Pied. A recent, by a little River called Eppo. Don Pedro de Toledo Governour of Millan, fearing this itome, which would fall vpon the Prince of Masseran, offered him men to put into his Townes; but the Prince (fearing that if he drew in Spaniards, hee should not so easily get them forth) made answer that he had no need. Finally, Masseran being inuested by the Prince of Piedmont, was forced to open his gates. Then he went and belieged Circueur which after some resistance was taken by assault, and the Castle yielded by the Princesse of Masseran, who was within it. After which, hee went and charged the Spaniards lying in their Trenches, which he forced; and thus Don Tancade de Luna, Governour of the Castle of Millan, with many others, which was about Guardella, and Guardabazon.

The Marshall D'Esquignen passing into Piedmont with ten or eight thousand horse and foot, ioyned with the Duke of Saouys Armie, and vpon the second of February went to besiege Saint-Damien, which after a breach made, they tooke. After which hee recovered other places. The taking of Townes and Ports from Princes and Noblemen which were vnder the protection of Spaine, caused many (which feared the like danger) to seeke their preservation from France. Amongst the which, Anthony de Grimaldi Baron Bueil obtained Letters of Protection from the French King and Crowne of France for security for him, his Wife, Family, Successors, Goods, Lands, Seigneries and Subiects.

But let vs now returne to France. The King being aduerted that there were many Townes in Thimerais, Pêche, Mayen, and other adiacent Prouinces, which belonged vnto the Princes and others which did adhere vnto their party; and that there were many Gentlemen in those Countreys, who attended but a command from the Princes assembled at Soissons, to goe to horsebacke, and to crosse the Kings affaires in those parts, wherein the said Princes might annoy his Maiestie in three places at once. First, in Pêche, and those countreys which are betweene the Rivers of Seine and Loire. Secondly, in Nyuenois towards the head of the River of Loire, where they held two Bridges, Desfort and Neuers. And thirdly in the countreys of Soissons, Laon, and Reims, where betweene the Rivers of Aisne, Oyse, and Meuze, they held the Townes of Laon, Coufay, Richemont and other places. Vpon the River of Aisne, the Townes of Soissons, Chastell, Portien, and Reims. Vpon Oyse, Noyon, Chantilly, and La Fere. Vpon Meuze, Meziers, Donchery, and Sedan. In the country of Vallois, the Castle of Pierfont: and in Tirache, vpon the Frontiers of Chambrésis, Casteller, where the Seigneur of Haraucourt was Governour. Their Maiesties resolved first to assure those places which might annoy them betwixt the Rivers of Seine and Loire. They sent for the Baron of Melclau, Governour of the towne and Castle of Verneuil; hee sent his wife, by whom hee had commandement to deliuer it into the Kings hands; which after some delay hee performed: and Longueval a follower of the Marshall D'Ancré was put in his place, for that the Towne is in the Government of Normandie.

The Earle of Auvergne by the Kings commandement, went into those parts with three thousand horse and foot about the end of January, putting garrisons into diuers places for the King; namely, into Senoches in Thimerais, Chastellaneuf, La Forteau, Vidane, La Loupe, and Nogent le Rotrou. From thence he came to Mantes, where hee was receiued with great honour, and some Gentlemen came vnto him, making protestation to remaine most humble subiects, and obedient to their Maiesties commandement. They which were in the Castle of Pierfont for the Marquis of Cœuvres, began to runne into the government of the Ile of France, taking the ordinary Coaches which went from Normandie and Picardy to Paris, and carrying away the passengers prisoners. Thus the warre began: A part of the Earle of Candales company who was for the King, was defeated by the Duke of Vendosmes horse, and Vaubecour charged some Carabins of the Duke of Neuers troopes. There were many discourses published against the Marshall D'Ancré vpon these alterations, and some were put in prison vpon diuers subiects. It was furnished that the Gibbets which had bene set vp in the publique places of Paris, were to hang such as should speake against the Marshall D'Ancré. Others said, that they were by a Decree of the Court, to hang such without any forme of Iustice which had been banished for their thefts, and yet robbed nightly in Paris, whereof there had bene great complaints.

Their Maiesties resolved to raise three Armies: the one vnder the command of the Marshall

A Marshall of Montigny to goe into Nyuenois. The other vnder the Earle of Auvergne, to set vpon those Townes which the Princes held in the Ile of France. And the third was to bee commanded by the Duke of Guise, assisted by the Marshall of Themines, to goe into Champagne against the Duke of Neuers. Having drawne his forces together, hee inuested the Castle of Richemont on the first of March. The Duke of Neuers had put Captaine Felmes into it with three score souldiers, who the first three dayes defended it gallantly: but the Artillery being planted, and hauing made two hundred shot, hee demanded composition, the which was granted, and hee and his souldiers departed with their drums beating, and matches light, and then the Castle was dismantled. After this B Rozoy was also yeelded.

Richemont
yeelded and dismantled.

The fire of Ciuill Warre did not onely flame in diuers Prouinces of France; but the Princes also hundred out their complaints against the Authors of all those miseries, as they said. They published a solemne declaration, and protestation, for the restoring of the Kings authoritie, and preservation of the Realme, against the conspiracie and tyrannie (as they termed it) of the Marshall D'Ancré and his adherents.

Protestation of the Princes
against the Marshall
D'Ancré.

They said that by the Treatie of Loudun, they promised vnto themselves a serious reformation of all disorders, by the obseruation of the Lawes. And when as the said Princes were at Court, without requiring any other assurance then the publique faith, and the inuolable word which Sir Thomas Edmunds, Ambassador for the King of Great Brittain; the Countesse of Soissons, and the Duke of Neuers had giuen them, on the behalfe of the King and Queene Mother: the hope and assured peace, made them forget the miseries of warre, every one containing himselfe in his dutie, and the respect due vnto the lawes. But this good disposition, was interrupted and crost by the pernicious counsell of the Marshall D'Ancré, and his adherents; who finding no safety in the setting of Iustice, hee resolved to make tryall of his power, by violating the publique faith, thereby to plunge the Realme into new troubles, and combustions, having attempted by the most horrible conspiracie which can be imagined against the person of the first Prince of the blood, and of other Princes, Dukes, Peeres and chiefe Officers of the Crowne, to oppress them all together with the State, who hee thought would bee an obstacle to his ambitious designs.

And to giue colour to so audacious an enterprize, they vsed false accusations; and vpon pretext of the said Princes absence which were retired from Paris, they published by their instruments, that they had a designe to attempt against the persons of the King and Queene Mother; and that they sought to perswade the Prince to ioyne with them; whereupon his Maiestie had bene aduised to assure himselfe of his person. And to giue some satisfaction to the world, they caused the King to goe in person to his Court of Parliament, to publish a declaration, by the which the Prince and the other Princes and Officers of the Crowne were declared guilty of treason.

E That being ashamed of such an vnjust course against innocent persons, finding that their frauds beganne to bee discovered, and that the Princes had resolved to represent vnto the King the iust causes of their absence, and to let him see the falshood of the slanders and bad impressions which those conspirators had giuen of their fidelitie and the sinceritie of their intentions; To prevent the which, they caused a declaration to bee published contrarie to that of the last of September; by the which the King better informed, declares that he holds them for his good, faithful, and affectionate subiects and seruants; not consenting nor participating with the facts contained in the former declaration; and that his meaning was the treatie of Loudun should be executed; laying by this meanes (but very vnjustly) all the accusation vpon the Prince, to make him onely culpable: they haue let the world see that it was onely a pretext and a testimonie of their passion, but no proofe of any crime. That hauing failed of the execution which they pretended (the which fell onely vpon the Princes person) they had still continued their bad intents; employing both poison and sword but in vaine, and that the declaration made the last of September, and the Treatie of Loudun had bene but a pretext to decieve them, if they would haue suffered themselves againe to bee surprized by their disloyalty and treacherie. That after the conference at Soissons, and the Declaration of September; they had continued their enterprises; kept the field with their troops; leaued new Regiments; drawne Suiffers into France without any apparant necessitie, to oppress the said Princes; and to execute the designs of the Marshall D'Ancres, whose intent was to kindle a new warre in France. And for that the season of the year was not fit to make any open attempt, they lodged their troops in all places, which might give any ieaousie to the Princes; who lay still without any alteration, although they had no power in their Governments, nor were paid that which was due vnto them, as well for their pensions, as the entertainment of their Garisons established long before for the safety of the said places.

[q] and

That knowing how much the mediation of the Duke of Neuers, had preuailed at the conclusion of the Treatie of Loudun, by the assurances which hee gave on the behalfe of the King and Queene mother: and apprehending that a Prince of his qualitie, would haue a iust feeling of their disloyaltie, and the breach which they had made of the publique faith; they drew their Maiesties into ieaousie of his fidelitie, and by insolent and extraordinary proceedings, sought to draw him to resolutions contrarie to his dutie and intentions; to the end they might haue some pretext to make him culpable. Norwithstanding hee had suffered all patiently, vntill they had executed some enterprises vpon his houses; attempted against his person, and imprisoned his friends and seruants, whose faith they could not corrupt. This necessitie bound him to augment his Garisons, to preserve himselfe, Saint Manchould giuing him iust cause of distrust.

This transported them with such fury, as they presently caused a declaration to be published on the seuenteenth of January: by the which vpon false and slanderous pretexts, hee was declared guilty, if within fiftene dayes hee came not to his Maiestie; whose commandements hee had benee always ready to obey. That coming to Soissons to that end, hee had beforesh his Maiestie by Letters within the time prefixed, to giue him indifferent iudges; not suspect, nor passionate, with necessarie assurances for his person and Houses, seeing there was no free access vnto his Maiestie; for that the Marshall D'Ancres and his adherents, had caused the publique faith to be broken, as you may reade more at large in his Letter.

That the Dukes of Vendosme, Mayenne, and Bouillon, had by their Remonstrance beforesh his Maiestie not to suffer the innocencie of the Duke of Neuers to bee oppressed, by the violence and iniustice of the Marshall D'Ancres. But the Bishop of Luçon, Secretarie of State, with Mangot and Barbin (confident Ministers of the Marshall D'Ancres tyrannie) had suppressed these Letters and Remonstrances, to the end they might not come to the Kings knowledge, abusing his name and authoritie with wonderfull contempt, to oppress his good & faithfull seruants. That on the thirteenth of February they had published a Declaration: by the which the said Dukes and diuers others were declared guilty of Treason; and at the same instant they vied all acts of hostilitie against them and their seruants, to make them thereby irreconcilable, and to bring matters to the extremity of warre. That besides all the aboue-mentioned indignities and causes of mistrust, they had attempted against the life of the Duke of Mayen, which was discovered, being ready to bee executed; that the proofes were manifest and verified in the Proceffe. That the murderer had benee practised with money, and sent to that end to Soissons, by Desfontis a creature to the Marshall D'Ancres, and the ordinarie executioner of his violencies.

That notwithstanding all these iust causes of distrust, which had forced the said Princes to fortifie their places; to leauy men, and to entertaine them with the Kings money, hauing no other means; to the end they might preserve them vnder his authority, and for his seruice, yet they were persecuted by the rigour of Armes; and they beganne to take, burne, and ruine their Houses; necessitie forcing them to oppose themselves to this oppression. That to the end hee might settle his tyrannies in the Kings Councell and neere his person, hee had caused the Seales to bee taken from Monsieur du Vair; and dismissed with contempt the Kings ancient Councillors, who forth their integritie, had the testimonie of all good men, because they opposed themselves

A felues to that which they know preiudiciall and pernicious to the State, and had brought in others of his faction, pensioners to strangers, men of base and infamous qualitie, ignorant and mercinarie; and by a new example, of a Bishop had made a Secretarie of State against the Lawes and Canoniall constitutions: Of a petti-farmer, or vnder-taker, a superintendent of the Treasure; to the end he might be sole Arbitrator of all the affaires of the Kingdom; to dispose of peace and warre, yea, of the life and goods of priuate men; to resolve what he pleased without contradiction; and to make all things passe vnder the law of his will.

Finally, that hee had vsurped vnder the Kings name (like vnto the ancient Maires B of the Palace) an absolute authoritie within the Realme; and had not left vnto his Maiestie the title and Image of the Royall Dignitie, hauing drawne to himselfe the whole government of the State, the which hee exercised with such tyrannie, as it was not lawfull without crime to open their mouths to complaine. That he smothered the libertie of the generall Estates, and Soueraigne Courts, by violence or corruption; the two chiefe means hee vied to oppress iustice, and reduce France to a miserable seruitude.

That hee had benee so audacious as to make a chiefe Officer to bee violently carried out of the capitall Citie in view of the Parliament of Paris; and to cause him to bee shut vp in the Cattle of Amboise, without any kinde of proceffe, accusation, or prooffe C of crime, imploying therein the Kings name and royall authoritie.

That his designs proceeded yet further, tending to an alteration of the State in fauour of strangers, by the ruine of the Princes of the blood of the House of Bourbon, which onely remained of the Royall race, at that time wholly at his disposition. That the King nor his brother were not safe in his hands, seeing that both hee and his wife, by an impie and curiositie (punishable by the lawes) had enquired of the continuance of their liues. That they had consulted with Magicians, vpon the time of their death; the which it might bee they had limited by their incantments and sorceries, being certain that vnto this end hee entertained Monsieur Allo the Physician, and the Abbot of Saint Mahe that abominable Monster, the honour of whose D death did shew what his life was. That it was well knowne that in the Assemblies of the generall Estates, hee had sought by his partisans to haue a Law enacted; That the Princes of the blood should bee no more admitted to the government of the State; the which was reiecte as contrarie to the Lawes of the Realme, which admit them in this right, and exclude women and strangers; And since, seeing the Prince armed to defend the Kings authoritie, hee made vse of this occasion, to haue him declared guilty of Treason, with a blemish to his posteritie: The which the Court of Parliament finding vniust and against the Lawes, obserued in the like cases; resolving to acquaint the King with the reasons why they could not verifie the Declaration, hee found such insolent Ministers of his passions, as hee caused a false Decree to E be supposed and published, attempting by an insupportable presumption and fraud, that which neuer had benee heard of in that reuerent Company, whose resolutions had benee alwayes holy and inuolable. And when as the Officers who understood this falsehood would haue discovered it; hee caused them to be threatened to lose their places, and to be banished from their houses.

And the better to make knowne that hee had no other end, but the ruine of the Estate; hauing thus diuided, and weakened it within; hee made it a lawfull excuse to abandon the ancient allies and confederates of the Crowne abroad: denying succours and assistance at neede, which by the Treaties solemnly sworn with them, they might expect.

To this end hee had caused the protection of the Soueraignie of Sedan to bee refused to the Duke of Bouillon, the which had beene alwayes held necessarie for France; by reason of the situation and strength of the places which depend thereon. That it had benee carefully kept from Charles the eighth, vntill that day, with promise of assistance, and protection against all their enemies, and had benee comprehended in the Treaties of Peace betwene France and Spaine. That Barbin had benee so audacious, so treacherous and vnfaithfull to the King and France, as to say vnto certaine persons without exception: that they must abandon this protection; as they they had done Weafell and other places belonging to the succession of the Duke of A Cleues.

For these reasons and others mentioned at large in their Declaration, they said that they were assembled together, for the restoring of the Kings authoritie, their soueraigne Prince and Lord, and the preservation of the State; according to the duty they did owe vnto the Crowne; called thereunto by the publique clamours; pressed by the violence and feeling they had of the common miserie, and the necessitie of their private preservation, against the conspiracie and pernicious designs of the Marshall D'Ancre and his adherents: against whom as troublers of the peace and tranquillitie of the Realme; breakers of the publique faith, and enemies of the State and House of France, B they opposed their iust Armes, and against them alone. Inuiring all true-hearted Frenchmen, by the naturall bond which they owe vnto the Kings seruice; the preservation of their Country, and their common libertie, to ioyne with them, and to assist and fauour them in their necessarie defence.

After this, the King sent a declaration to the Court of Parliament, enioyning them to proceede against the Dukes of Neuers, Vendosme, Mayenne, Bouillon; the Marquis of Cœure, and President Le Jay, with all rigour, and against their memorie and posteritie, according to the Lawes: commanding them to confiscate and vnite separably vnto the Crowne, the Duchies, Earledomes, Seigneuries and Lands which they held within his Realme, and Countries of his obedience; the which was verified by C the Court.

Wee will now returne to the exploits of Warre. On the one and twentieth of March the Baron of Heurteuau was beheaded in Paris. Hee thought not to die, and could hardly resolute. They said hee had beene accused to haue had a designe to surprize a place in Normandie for the Princes, and that vnderhand hee had leauied Souldiers. The King had made Proclamation throughout all France, not to leaue any Souldiers without commission vnder his Great Seale, vpon paine of high Treason.

The Prouost Marshall likewise in many parts of France, hanged vp as many souldiers as they found in Armes, which were not vnder Capitaines with the Kings Commission, which kept many at home that would haue gone to serue the Princes; who D were also reported not be strong enough to keepe the field vntill their Reiters were come vnto Sedan: all which was done to hinder the succours of such as were willing to ioyne with them.

On the twelfth of March, there went fixe Cannons, and ten Companies of the Regiment of the Guard from Paris vnto the Kings Arme, commanded by the Cont D'Auergne, which he had assembled about Crespie in Valois.

The Duke of Mayenne who was retired to Soissons where hee prepared for a Siege, issued out with good numbers of horse and foote to surprize Monsieur de Robans quarter, which was in Villiers Casterles; which to effect, hee left his foot on the foote nere adioyning, to fauour his retreat and with his horse charged and forced their entry, where E after they had rifled the Stables, finding the Kings people to haue taken the alarme, and ready on horsebacke to receive them, hee retired vnder couert of the forest, and his foot companies vnto Soissons, with the losse of fise of his company, and as many prisoners.

The foure and twentieth of the said moneth, the Castle of Pierrefont was inuested by the Earle of Auvergne. It was commanded by Capitaine Villeneuve and the two brethren of Malortis, for the Marquis of Cœure. It was thought this siege would haue continued three moneths: for that during the League this Castle had endured eleuen hundred Cannon shot without breach making. At the first, the besieged made shew of resistance: but seeing themselves battered with foure Cannons (with which their defences were beaten downe, their Port broken, and some little breach made) F they be thought themselves of composition.

Capitaine Villeneuve came forth on the first of Aprill to salute the Earle of Auvergne; and on Sunday the second of the moneth, the besieged parleyed and were licensed to retire with their Armes and baggage; which they did at eight of the clocke that night.

The seven and twentieth of March two great vessels laden with twenty Cannons and great quantitie of all sorts of Munition, parted from Paris, to goe, vp the River of

A of Oyse to Compeigne, and from thence to the siege of Soissons, whither (it was said) the King would goe: but vpon the Remonstrances and requests of the chiefe Companies and body of the Towne of Paris, (although the Collonell of his guard was already gone) it was concluded, that his Maiestie should still remaine at Paris, and not goe to the siege. About this time newes was brought the King, that the Marshall of Montigny had taken many places in Niernois, and Douzibis into the Kings obedience, and that hee had seized on the person of the Prince of Portian, second sonne to the Duke of Neuers.

The first of Aprill the King had newes of the rendring of Chateau Portian. The B Duke of Guise having taken Richécour and Rozoy, hee went on the fifteenth of March to inuest Chateau Portian: hee planted a batterie of foure Pieces, and discharged some Volleys of shot, which did not much amaze the besieged. The Seigneur of Ville-aux-bois being Gouverneur (seeing himselfe besieged) gaue aduertisement to the Duke of Neuers, being at Rethel two leagues off, who presently sent two hundred Wallons, which entered as the batterie began, which continued vntill some of their Ordnance were spoiled; so as the Duke of Guise was forced to send to Chaalons and Rheims for more Cannon. The besieged were still relieved with men, victuall, and munition from Rethel, by reason of the passage of the Riuier. The Duke attempting to force the Suburbs by Pettarde, and failing, he continued his batterie; where having made a reasonable breach, the souldiers C retired into the Castle, and the townne was yielded by the inhabitants; and the next day the Castle demanded Parley, and yielded the same vpon certaine Articles to the Duke: and among others, That they should depart with their Armes, Baggage, Drummes beating, Matches light, and Bullets in their mouths, and their ensignes wrapped vp.

The D. of Guise being aduertised on the first of Aprill, that there was three hundred horse and some foot of the Princes, lodged in the suburbs of Laon, called Vaufoulan and thereabouts, hee refused to charge them, although it were fixe leagues off. Hee parced about fixe of the clock in the evening with foure hundred horse, an hundred Carabins; and the Company of his guards. Hee came neere to Laon at two of the clocke after midnight; commanding ten of his Guards, twenty Carabins, and an hundred Light-horse to D leaue their horses, he gaue them charge to force the first Barricado of the suburbs; where they slue the Sentinell, and recovered the place of Armes without any resistance. This surprize by night amazed the Princes men, who retired into the Townne after some losse on either side.

The King being aduertised that there were certaine Capitaines of the reformed Religion which leauied men in the country of Seuennes for the Princes, which should crosse Velay, Viuarais, Forest, and Bourbonnois, to come into Niernois, the Seigneur of Saint Chaumont had commission from the King to leaue troopes of horse and foot in the Country of Lionois and the neighbour Prouinces, to ioyne with the Marshall of Montignies Arme. But it was thought these succours of Seuennes were too farre E from Neuers, and would goe to smooke, as they did.

The Prince of Gniulle was sent into his government of Auvergne, to leaue troopes to haue an eye to the practices which were made in the countries of March, bafe Lymosin, and the neighbour Prouinces by the Duchesse of Bouillon, who solicited a generall assembly of them of the Religion, to incite them to take Armes. And in the end of March, the King was aduertised that many of the Religion sent as Deputies of fixe Prouinces, had met at Roehel, and had resolved to hold a generall Assembly of all their Churches; and that they would fend their Deputies to his Maiestie for league. These Deputies had no good answer in Court, yet notwithstanding they continued their resolution; for the which they published certaine reasons which I may not set downe in F particular.

The breaches of Chateau Portian being repaired, the Arme advanced on the eighth of Aprill towards Rethel, a great Towne, well peopled, and rich, as the Capitall of the whole Duchie, the which the Duke had manned with a strong Garison. They made their approaches, planted their batteries, and had made a sufficient breach, meaning to give an assault the next day. But the Duke of Neuers hearing in what estate the Towne stood, sent the Seigneur of Marolles vnto the Duke of Guise, to make certaine propositions vnto him, to hinder the spoile and ruine of this Towne. The Duke of Guise gave a willing care vnto it at sixe of the clocke at night, and gaue him leaue to enter into Reibel the next morning, to acquaint the souldiers with what he had charge from the Duke of Neuers; appointing him to returne by noone; and in the meane time there was a truce. At the returne of Marshall the Capitulation was made, and the towne yielded vpon very honorable conditions.

Troopes coming out of Germany.

The King receiuing aduertisement that the Reiters which came for the Princes, vpon the Marshall of Bouillons credit, were entred into Lorraine, being about 1200, with eight hundred Carabins, either of them carying two short Muskets: and that they of the Count Ringraue, which the Earle of Saint Chomberg Nauileuil had leaued for the King with certaine Lands Kenets, advanced towards the frontiers; the Duke of Guise B receiued commandement to goe and receiue them; and to hinder the entry of the Princes Reiters into France.

Reasons why the King resolues to besiege Soissons.

Their Maiesties resolved to besiege Soissons; for the which they pretended some reasons: For that the Duke of Mayenne after the losse of Pierefont had no place of retreat on this side the Riuer of Aisne but Soissons. As for Noyon, Coufisy, and Chauny, which are the three townes of his Gouernment, which hee held beyond the Riuer of Aisne; Soissons being taken, they had not bene able to resist the Kings forces; but would come and submit themselves to his obedience. To goe first and besiege one of the other three places, they should giue the Duke of Mayenne, and the other Princes meanes to ioyne together in Soissons, from whence they might C vpon all occasions attempt vpon the Kings Armie, and make roades to the gates of Paris.

Soissons besieged.

The Princes being assured, that their resolution in Councell was to besiege Soissons: they fortified it with what horse and foot they could. The Duke of Vendosme sent him his Inginer with two hundred Souldiers. Finally, the Duke of Mayenne resolved to defend it with 1200 foot, and about three hundred horse. The Earle of Auvergne inuested the Towne on the twelfth of April. Hee tooke his quarter on the other side of the Riuer of Aisne neere Saint Val, which they of Soissons during the League called their Citadell, being diuided from the Towne by the Riuer, and defended with three great Bastions, Trenches and halfe Moones. On the other side of the Riuer where D Soissons stands, he lodged the foot and horse, as well French as Liegeois (which were sent by the Marshall D'Ancre).

During the siege the Duke of Mayenne, with some troopes of horse and foot, went forth by night with two pieces of Ordnance, and forced one of their quarters where they slue fifty men, disarmed the rest, and tooke many prisoners with three ensignes, then hauing burnt the quarter called Presle, they returned into the Towne; Monsieur de Mayenne carying with him Buffy Lamet, his three Ensignes, and about two hundred Souldiers, hauing lost but eight of his owne. This Militarie exploit was much commended euen by his enemies. The continuall raine had much annoyed the besiegers; yett they continued their trenches in such fort, and so restrained the besieged, as they E imagined Soissons might bee taken: the Earle of Auvergne hauing planted two and twenty Cannons in diuers places; so as in all mens opinions Soissons could not hold out long.

The clouds were gathered together, and the storme ready to fall vpon the Princes, who had nothing left them but despair, and the integritie of their intentions, which they protested to be innocent. But God who holds the hearts of Kings in his hand, and gouernes the motions of these inferior Orbes at his pleasure, had resolved in his diuine Councell to crosse these great designs, and to quench the fire of these ciuill combustions, when there was least hope of quenching it but with the ruine of the Princes; whose honors were blemished with the feueritie of Edicts; their persons and liues exposed to the rigour of the lawes, and their Lands and Seignuries confiscated and vnted to the reuenges of the Crowne. But God (I say) meaning to free France from this ciuill warre wherein it was engaged, and could not be ended but with the losse of many great personages, who had resolved (as they said) to dye in their Armes at a breach, rather then to fall vnder the tyrannie of the Marshall D'Ancre, changed the face of the affaires of France in the twinkling of an eye, by the death of the said Marshall, which hapned on the 24 of April about ten of the clocke in the morning.

1617

A The Marshall D'Ancre being gone into Normandy, as well to finish his fortifications at Quille-beuf, as to pursue the verification of his gift of a wood of timber trees, sought by all means to draw vnto him the Nobility, the Kings officers, and all such as he thought might any way assist him. Some could not loue him, others following the course of the time did adhere vnto him: whereupon the children of Rouen in counterfeiting him, said one to another, Sir loue me and I will doe you fauour. But vpon three points, that is to say, 1. The refusal he had of the verification of his gift of Timber trees, against the which Monsieur de Fleury great Master of the Waters and Forests of Normandy opposed himselfe. 2. Vpon that he sought to establish a Master of Requests intendant of the Iustice B within Rouen. And 3. Vpon a report that he meant to put one of his creatures into the old Palace at Rouen, and to repaire Saint Katherins Fort; they write that he was aduertised to beware of the Letany, Afurore Normannorum: whereunto hee answered, I will make them cate their fingers which shall contradict my will. Whereupon being at Ponteaudemere neere to Quille-beuf, vpon an aduice which he receiued from Paris, that he should returne speedily to Court, he tooke his journey, and leauing Rouen, past at Pont de Larche. Being arriued at Paris, his people spake openly, that he was come for two reasons: first, to remoue from about his Majesty many persons in whom he did not trust, and to place others which should be confident vnto him: and secondly, to haue Letters of commandement to verifie his gift of timber.

The Marshall D'Ancre goes from Quille-beuf to Paris.

C The King, who for the reasons specified in Letters to the Gouvernors, had made shew to be ignorant of the Marshalls designs, was againe aduertised, that passing at Pont de Larche, he had offered the Gouernment of some places in Normandy to certaine Captaines, so as they would take an oath to be for him against all men, without this exception, Forlesse I see a commandement sealed from the King. They also shewed him Letters written to the Marshall by his confident, whereby he found that their designe was onely to entertaine warre in France; to continue their authority in the Gouernment of the State which they vsurped. Kings should not doe any thing without counsell, especially in matters of consequence. The French Historiours report, that King Henry the great sayd vnto his Councell, Do not make me seize on the Marshall of Biran, if you doe not hold him D worthy of death. So the King said vnto them which shewed him these Letters, Before I cause this man to be apprehended, take aduice of such, and let me know it. They deliuered their aduice vnto the King; that for the good of his Estate, he should take knowledge of his affaires. They sayd, that the voyce of the people against the said Marshall, was the best and most faithfull counsell a King could haue, to resolve himselfe in an action of that importance: and that the time and occasion seemed to fauour this arrest. In the end the King resolves, and commands the Seigneur of Vitry Captaine of the Guards of his bodie, to seize vpon the Marshall D'Ancre, and to cause assistance in case of resistance. Finally, that he should take him aliuie or dead. The difficulty of the execution was, first, for the great traine of Noblemen which did still accompanie the Marshall, besides his E household seruants, with twelue of his Guard, who were souldiers of action of five and thirty or forty yeares of age, attired in his livery, and were alwayes about him, were hee in Caroch or on foot. Secondly, the place where he should be apprehended: and thirdly, to know the houre and time of his comming to the Loure. They resolved that he could not be more conveniently arrested, then betwixt the great gate of the Loure and the Court, where the passage is long and narrow, when they haue past the draw-bridge. The Marshall D'Ancre was lodged neere vnto the wals of the Loure without the Castle, towards the Riuer side. Some dayes were spent betwene the resolution and the execution. One day he tooke Phyllicke; another, he came not out of his Cabinet: so as you may easily iudge if they did not feare the enterprife had bene discovered: the dispute hee had F during that time with his wife, with the question some asked him, what reception he had of the King, made many thinke that he had some aduertisement of the enterprife, but withall they did beleue that it could not be executed.

The King resolves to seize vpon the Marshall D'Ancre.

On Munday the 24. of April, about ten of the clocke in the morning, the Marshall D'Ancre leauing his lodging, came on foot to the Loure, being followed after his accustomed manner: the great gate of the Loure was opened for him, and shut againe as soone as he was entred. Monsieur de Vitry (who was at the entry of the Court, with his followers and Archers which should assist him) seeing the great gate open, demanded who entred?

entred: they came and told him it was the Marshall D'Ancres: whereupon he aduanced A presently (being assisted by his followers armed with Pistols) to meet him, and coming to the entry of the inner bridge, presenting his staffe, he sayd vnto him, I arrest you in the Kings name: wherat the Marshall stepping backe, as if he would resist, sayd, Mee? which they who accompanied Monseur Vitry seeing, discharged three Pistols vpon him; the one stricke through his heart, the second into his braines, and the third into his belly, so as he fell downe dead without speaking word. A Nobleman also close by him talking with him, fell downe on the other side, but was not hurt; they which did accompany him slip away, seeing him dead. This being done, he was carryed halfe dragged into the Porters lodge: his goodly scarfe, and his rich Diamond, with whatsoeuer he had good B about him, were soone laid hold on. The noyse of the three Pistoll shot put the whole Loure into alarme: the gates were presently shut, and they which commanded the companies of the French Guard, seized vpon all the approaches vnto the Loure. According to that which had bene resolved, there was a generall cry of God saue the King, through the whole Loure. In the meane time Monseur de Vitry went vnto the King, and his Maiesty receiving him with a good eye, and embracing him, sayd, Goe and giue order that the mischiefe fall on none but himselfe: therewith the King was entreated to shew himselfe at the window to the Nobility, and others which were in the Court, who desired to see him: he shewed himselfe with his hat in his hand, the which made them to renew their acclamations; so as the Noblemen which were about him were forced to cry C out The King thanks you. And this was all which past at the Marshall D'Ancres death.

By the Kings commandement the Seigneurs of Villeroi, and President Jannin came presently to the Loure. Monseur de Liancourt went to horse to take order for the City gates, and to tell the people that the King was in health, because there had bene a brute which ran through Paris like lightning, that there had bene a tumult at the Loure, in the which the King was hurt. Those which accompanied him, told every man that the Marshall D'Ancres was slaine, wherat the people seemed to reioyce. Monseur D'Ornano hauing also commandement to take some Archers & to go & aduertise the Court of Parliament, he came soone after they were risen: the Archers coming into the great Hall with their Pistols about their heads, and crying, God saue the King, it was strange to see D how the multitude was amazed, euery one seeking to flye out of the doores, one falling vpon another, so as they stopped the passage. Monseur D'Ornano went to the first President, and told him what had hapned at the Loure, whereupon he went with two other Councillors to Court, where he vnderstood the Kings pleasure. As soone as the newes of the Marshall D'Ancres death was knowne in the Palace Hall, there was such exclamations of ioy, as they which had lost their square caps and hats in falling, rising vp againe cryed, God be thanked we haue a peace. Monseur Mangot came to the Loure by the Kings commandement, to deliuer the Seales into his hands. Barbin was met vpon the way, and caried backe to his house, and there guarded by certaine Archers, and afterwards committed to the For-l'Euêque. The Bishop of Luçon was commanded to keepe E his lodging. The Marshall D'Ancres wife was brought prisoner to the Loure, and put into the same roome where the Prince of Conde was lodged vpon his first arrest. Two of the Councill of State were appointed to take an Inuentory of the Marshalls goods, and two other for Barbins and for his papers.

The Kings Letters to the Governours of Prouinces touching the Marshalls death.

The same day the King sent Letters to the Governours of Prouinces, to aduertise them of the Marshall D'Ancres death, and of the reasons: For that since his fathers death, the said Marshall and his wife abusing his Nonage, and the power which they had gotten with the Queene his Mother, had procured to vsurpe all the authority, to dispose absolutely of his Estate, and to deprime him of the meanes to take knowledge thereof: so as he had nothing remaining but the bare name of King; and that it was a capitall crime for his officers and subiects to see him in priuate, or to entertaine him with any serious discourse. F That God letting him see the imminent danger of his person and State by that vntrestrained ambition, if he should haue made any shew to apprehend it; he had bene forced to dissemble his inward resolution by his exterior actions, vntill that God by his bounty should prepare him meanes and opportunity to preventie. And withall considering that besides the danger of his person, the publicke hatred they bare to the Government of those men, had so altered and incited the minds of his Subiects, as a generall confusion

A was to be feared, if he deferred it any longer. For which iust considerations, he had commanded Monseur de Vitry to seize vpon the said Marshall, who being wonderfully well followed, and seeking to make resistance, was there shot and slaine. That he had caused his wife and some of his instruments to be committed, and had entreated the Queene his mother to rest contented if he did hereafter hold the Helme of his owne Estate, and seeke to raise it from those extremities wherinto the bad counsell she had followed had plunged it. In the end he entreated them to giue notice of this action throughout their Governments, and of the reasons which had induced him thereunto.

The body of the Marshall being taken out of the Porters Hall, was all that afternoone B in the little Tennis-court of the Loure, vntill nine of the clocke at night, that it was commanded to be buried at Saint Germans of l'Auxerois. He was woound vp in a course foule Table-cloth, tyed at both ends with a riband; he was carryed without light or prayers, but very low, there being but a Priest, the Clerke, and Graue-maker present; they laid him vnder the Organs, and his Coffin vpon him, and then plaisted vp his graue, so as there was no shew that any had bene intombd there: the next day about tenne of the clocke, about three hundred Lackayes, with a multitude of people, came to S. Germans Church, where vnderstanding the Marshall had bene interred vnder the Organs, they found meane (whilest the Chanoines were gone in procession) to open the ground, where they tooke out the cover of a Coffin of wood, and finding nothing within it, they thought themselves deceived of their hope; but hauing notice giuen them that the body was vnderneath it, they tooke out the Coffin, where they found it groueling; then they began to draw it out, crying, Come out Cullion: hauing vnburied him, they dragged him to the end of the new Bridge, and there hung him by the feet vpon an old gibbet: hanging thus, they cut off his nose, eares, hands, and members; others stricke him with their Swords and Staues: they pulled off hayre and beard, and after he had hung there halfe an houre, they tooke him downe, and dragged him through the streets, striking him with staues, and crying God saue the King: and if any as they passed put not off their hats, they compelled them with blowes to cry, God saue the King. Some laughed at all this, others blamed this action although they were glad of his death: Thus they dragged him to the Bastile, then drew D him backe to the Vniuersity, and from thence to the Suburbs of Saint Germans, where they beganne to burne the body before his owne house with straw, and some few faggots they had snatched vp as they went along; but being angry that it burned not according to their wils, they dragged him againe to the new bridge, forcing the Merchants, which had wood vpon the Wharfes, to giue them some to make an end of burning this miserable carcase. They made all the Princesses, Ladies, and Gentlewomen which passed by to vnmaske themselves and cry, God saue the King, forcing them to giue money to buy wood: the like they did to the Princes and Noblemen. In the end seeing the bones were long before they were consumed, they cast them into the Riuer.

On Saint Markes day there was a Proclamation made by sound of Trumper, whereby E all the Marshall D'Ancres seruants were enioyned to depart out of Paris within foure and twenty houres, vpon paine of death: And the same day her Brother, who by his fauour had bene aduanced to the Archbishopspricke of Towers, the Abbey of Marmoustier, and many other Benefices, fearing the fury of the multitude, elaped by the backe gate of the Colledge where he was lodged, and retired himselfe into a Monastery. His Armes were afterwards taken downe from about the Colledge gate, and those of the Cheualier of Vendosme set vp as Abbot of Marmoustier.

The new Councillors which had gouerned the State for the space of five moneths, were either guarded in their lodgings, or committed to prison, the King sending for all the ancient Officers of the State, who had bene displaced by the Marshall D'Ancres F meanes, to come vnto him, and to execute their places. The first day of Councill being the 27 of April, they which were in the Court of the Loure, seeing the Chancellor of Silbery, the Seigneurs of Villeroi and Jannin, Monseur du Vair, Keeper of the Seales, with Chasteau-neuf, and others come forth, they blest the King, hoping that his teigne would be happy, seeing he began by the establishment of his Councill, and that he would not employ any but such as had faithfully serued the Kings and State.

The same day the Earle of Suze came to the Court, and presented vnto the King the keyes of Soissons, which the Duke of Mayen had sent. They vnderstood from him, that the

The Duke having received newes of the Marshalls death, that day in the evening, he gave thanks to God, being vpon the Rampiers, and advertised the besiegers thereof, who soon after received the newes: That the next day he had given entry to all those of the Kings Army that would come into Soissons: That they had generally made Bonfires: That there was now no difference among them, visiting and embracing one another lovingly: That the Duke prepared to come to serve his Majesty, with the Dukes of Nevers and Vendosme, who had entreated him to stay for them: That he was about to dismiss his troops, beseeching the King to command his Army about Soissons to retire. Vpon the same day the Duke of Longueville (who in this last warre had not leaved armes, neither had he come to Court in regard of the private quarrell betwixt him and the Marshall D'Ancre) came from Picardy to Paris, and went to salute the King. Nine dayes after he married the young Lady of Soissons.

The Queene
mother returns to Blois

Vpon the fourth of May, the Queene Mother parted from the Louvre to goe to Blois, well attended by her seruants and Guard: many Princesses and Ladies conducted her vnto Burg la Roine. Some write, that the King came into her Chamber to bid her farewell, to whom he vsed this speech, Madam, I come hither to take my leave of you, and to assure you that I will have a care of you as of my mother: I haue desired to ease you of the paines you haue taken in my affaires: It is my resolution not to suffer any one but my selfe to command within my Realme. I haue given order for that which is necessary for your voyage, and commanded La Courbe to accompany you: you shall heare from me at your coming to Blois: Adieu, Madam.

The Princes
come vnto the King.

The Queene Mother having made a great obeysance vnto the King, she said something vnto him touching the care which she had taken of his person and affaires during her Regency, desiring him to remember her paines and trauell, and that she was his Mother. Whereupon the King kissed her, and with a great reuerence tooke his leave, and retired. The same day the King, Queene, and Monsieur, with a great troop of Nobles, went to Bois de Vincennes, where they continued eight dayes. The Dukes of Vendosme, Nevers, and Mayenne, came vpon Ascension day thither, and did their duties to his Majesty.

Du Transil excused for attempting to kill the Queene mother.

Du Transil, who had beene committed to For. l'Éueque, was by the Kings commandement sent vnto the Concergerie of the Palace, where he was confronted with the Seigneurs of Luynes and Bressieux, and vpon the tenth of May hee was broken vpon the wheele, & his body burnt at the Greue, and this was his sentence: Alonso du Transil, born at Grenoble, for hauing attempted against the life of the Queene the Kings mother, is attainted and convicted of Treason, and condemned by the Court of Parliament, to haue his members broken, his body and proesse burnt, the ashes to be cast into the winde, and his goods to be confiscate to the King. They which had knowne him, sayd, That he was a man of bad life: that hauing bene of the Reformed Religion, and a Souldier to the age of thirty yeares, he made himselfe a Catholike, and then a Capuchin; but the Capuchins discouering his lewd life, had chased him away, and taken the habit from him in a Prouinciall Chapter: that since, he had bene a spy in Sauoy, and vnto his dying day a Bawd, a corrupter and feller of virgins: finally, that the least of his offences were a number of murders, at the which he had assisted. He commonly caried vnder his cassoocke a short sword, broad, and well pointed, and had the shew of a bold vnderfaker. Going to his death, he had a smiling countenance, and seemed like one that had his spirits transported, as many conceiued, seeing him in the Chappell when his sentence was pronounced: for as soone as it was read, he rose vp, and thrusting forth his arme hee said vnto them, feeke my pulse, and see if there bee any alteration in mee since I heard my sentence of death.

The Kings Declaration in fauour of the Princes.

On the twelfth of May, there was a Declaration made in fauour of the Princes which had absented themselves from the King, during this last ciuill warre: Shewing that the ready obedience which the Princes and others which had assisted them, had yielded to his commandements, gaue a sufficient testimony that the onely desire of their preferuation, and to prevent their ruine which was practised by the insolent, violent, and pernicious designs of the Marshall D'Ancre, had forced them to retire themselves, and to secke their safety by armes (although vnlawfully) for that the said Marshall (contrary to his intention) had made vse of his Forces to oppress them: But being sufficiently informed of their good intentions towards him and his Realme, and of the desire they had to employ their

1617

A their lides for the maintenance of his greatness and authority: and that they were displeased to haue leauied souldiers, or done any act contrary to their duties: hauing protested that they would neuer haue attempted it, if they had not bene forced to avoid the total ruine of themselves and their Families: out of his clemency and royall bounty, entreating them fauourably in pardoning their faults which they had committed, Hee declared that he held the said Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crowne, and all which had assisted them, for his good and royall subjects and seruants: and that he would haue the remembrance of what had happened in these last alterations suppressed and abolished: Prouided, that they should containe themselves within the bounds of their duty and respect, and that they should presently renounce all leagues and affociations both within and without the Realme: in regard whereof he restored them to all their lands, goods, honors, dignities, charges, Estates, offices, and pensions, to enioy them as they had formerly done.

Thus the third Ciuill warre had an end. The Kings Forces were dismissed. The Earle of Auerngne, who commanded the Army before Soissons, returned to Court the eighth of May: and the same day President le Tay went to the Parliament. The Deputies of the Assembly of them of the Reformed Religion at Rochel, coming to Court, the King gaue them this answer by his Chancellor: Follow those courtes which all good subjects ought to hold in that which they desire to obtaine from their King: Prepare your Petitions: and Grieuances with all speed, and when as you haue chosen Deputies to present them to his Majesty, dissolve your Assembly, and let every man returne into his Prouinces: and the King promised to answer your Grieuances fauourably in all that shall be conformable to reason and iustice. Vpon the two and twentieth of May, the King made Monsieur de Vitry Marshall of France, and he was received by the Parliament of Paris, being accompanied thither by a goodly troop of Noblemen: and presently after, the Duke of Guise hauing discharged part of the Army, and put the rest into garrison, returned to Paris.

The Gouernors and Captaines which the Marshall D'Ancre had put into the Castles and Fortresses of Caen, Quille-beauf, Alençon, Verneuil, Falaise, Pont de Larche, and other Townes of Normandy, hauing given ouer their places and charges vpon their first summons, into their hands whom the King had sent with commiſſion to that end: All France beganne to enioy general peace, and Iustice and the Lawes to haue force and authority. And the King hauing resolved to proceed against the memory of the Marshall D'Ancre, and against his wife and their adherents, by the ordinary course of Iustice, hee gaue commandement to three Councillors of State, being Masters of the Requests, to informe against the Marshalls wife, and to examine their officers and household seruants, the which they beganne in the Louvre on the 26 of April, and on the 2 of May she was conducted to the Bastile, where they continued their examinations; which being finished, they sent it to the Court of Parliament, who hauing proceeded in the proceſſe, shee was brought on the 11 of May to the Concergerie, at which change shee was somewhat amazed; and for that they had left her but two Archers to guard her. The chiefe charges in the proceſſe were collected into foure heads: The first was treason against God: The second, Treason diuine and humane mixt: The third was Treason against the King: And the fourth was the murder committed vpon the person of Prognille, Sergeant Maior of Amiens. The Sentence did import, That in regard of the impieties of Conchini, in his life time Marquis D'Ancre, Marshall of France, and of Leonora Galigai his widow, their enterprises against the Kings authority and his Estate, secret negotiations with strangers, casting of Artillery, changing the Kings Armes, and setting his owne vpon the said Peeces, employing the publicke Treasurie to their owne private profit, and transporting it out of the Realme without the Kings permission, as also for the murder of Prognille; Sergeant Maior of Amiens, they were condemned as guilty of diuine and humane Treason; and for reparation, the memory of the said Conchini condemned for euer, and Galigai to lose her head, and her body to be burnt, and all their lands to be incorporated to the Crowne; his house to be razed, and his lands which did not hold of the Crowne, to be sold, and the money to be put into the Kings Officers: Prognilles widow had 2400 pound sterling, adjudged her out of his goods confiscated, one third part for her selfe, the other two parts for her children; and likewise there was to be extracted out of his confiscation 4800 pound sterling for a fine, to be employed in pious vices, the reliefe of prisoners and other other necessities. His Secretaries Vincent Lodouici and Anthony Montanbert, were set A at liberty, with charge to present themselves when the Court should call for them.

Vpon the eight of Iuly, sentence of death being giuen against her, it was resolved shee should dye the same day: in the afternoon the Porter (according to custome) brought her vp into the Chappell, where the Iudges would question her, and said vnto her, Gowe Madam, this is the last time, you shall goe from hence this day; Shee dreamed not of death, thinking she should be onely banished, so as she went reasonably well pleased from her chamber to the Chappell; where entring, and seeing they commanded her to pull off her maske, she beganne to enter into an apprehension, saying, What a world of people! for indeed the Chappell was wonderfull full. The Register comming to her, willed her B to prepare her selfe to heare her sentence: they caused her to kneele downe, and as soone as she vnderstood, And the sayd Galigai to haue her head stricke off vpon a scaffold, shee stood vp and cryed out, Ayme, I am with child: so as they could not make her to heare the rest of her sentence. The Executioner presently seized vpon her person, and foure Diuines came to comfort her: they also sent for some certaine Midwiues and Surgeons to search her, for that she pretended to be with child, which was but counterfeit. After this, shee was conducted to the place of execution, where she spied asure off a Gentleman belonging to the Commander of Silley, whom she called often by his name, and entreated him to tell the Chancellor and the Commander, that she prayed them to forgive her, for that she had greatly wronged and persecuted them; making him with instance, promise C not to forget her entreaty. Being vpon the Scaffold, she entreated all men to forgive her whom she had offended, telling the Register, that what she had sayd against the Chancellor when she enjoyed the Queene mothers fauour, was not true: After this preparing her selfe for death, her head was stricke off, and both it and the body cast into the fire and burnt.

Some haue written, That her name was Leonara Dory, and that she had taken the surname of Galigai but since her comming into France. That her Father was a Ioyner, one of those who after the manner of Florence, went vp and downe to seeke worke with his tooles: That she was not foster sister to the Queene mother, as it was supposed: That at the age of tenne yeares she was taken to serue the Marquis of Striua, and the Queene mother, who was then but Princeesse of Florence, seeing her of a quick spirit and a iouiall humour, would haue her seruice.

On the eight of Iune, the Seigneure of Barrault, Vice Admirall of Guienne, had a great fight at Sea with diuers Pyrates, whose names were Blanquet, Gaillard, Trelebois, and Ponteville, who commonly retired themselves into the Islands, and about Rochel, being resolved to make themselves masters of the mouth of Garonne, and to rob all Ships that went and came to Bourdeaux. Having drawne together foure Ships, and foure great Pinaces, with the which they lay in the mouth of the Riuer nere vnto Royan, where they began to molest all passengers. The Parliament of Bourdeaux being enformed hereof, they sent to the Marquis of Aubeterre Gouvernor of Blay, and to Candelay Gouvernor of E Royan, to summon them to serue the King against these Pyrates: finding them well disposed, they sought to speake with Blanquet, but could not. Whereupon they went to Rochel, where the Mayor and Sherifffs protested they were very fery that Blanquets Ships had bene rigged in their Hauens; notwithstanding, they were ready to serue the King against him and his adherents: And withall they sent one of their Sherifffs with Letters of credit both from the Towne and the Princeesse Dowager of Conde, (who was then there) to draw him to his duty, hauing in his company Laumont an Exempt of the Scottish Guard. Being aboard Blanquets Ship, Laumont commanded him to cease his exactions, and to retire himselfe speedily, deliuering him also a Letter from the first President of Bourdeaux, full of good admonitions: But Blanquets answer and his companions F was full of contempt against the King, his Iustice, and the Mayor and Sherifffs of Rochel, vnto also great threats against the towne of Bourdeaux. Laumont hauing made his report at Bourdeaux, the businesse was propounded in Parliament in the presence of the D. of Espernon and the Marshall of Roquelaure, where it was resolved, that they should speedily arme some ships to set vpon these Pyrates, and that the charge should be giuen to Barrault, Vice Admirall of Guienne. Whereupon he made choice of nine Ships and Pinaces, which being armed, manned, and victualled, they fell downe before the Towne of Blay.

A Blay. Having received directions from their Admirall, as well for the fight as for the conduct of 150 great Merchants Ships which followed them to be defended from those Pyrates, they set sayle towards the Port of Royan, right against the which Blanquet lay with foure Ships and foure great Pinaces: who perceiving that they made towards them, weighed Anchor and put to Sea; the Vice Admirall still following them, vntill the night approaching, and a tempest forced him to cast Anchor.

On the eight of Iune, the Vice Admirall hauing conducted the Merchants nine or ten Leagues into the Sea, and hearing that Blanquet with his Ships had gotten into the Riuer of Sudre, which was of hard access, and dangerous for great Ships; hee thought they B could not now auoid the Combat. Whereupon he called for the Pilots, employing them which had most frequented that Riuer to make the way, when as suddenly the winde and tyde were fauourable vnto them, so as within a short space, the Pyrates discovered the Kings Fleet comming towards them with full sayles, wherupon they cut their Cables, and hoyle vp sayles to get to Sea: But Blanquets Ship, which was the first, fell presently aground, not being able to recover the Current by reason of the violence of the winde. Three others being about a Cannon shot off had the like fortune. These bad beginnings amazed some of their Souldiers and Mariners, so as they sought to save themselves by swimming, and in their Boats. Blanquet, on the other side (thinking that the Vice Admirall would also runne aground, or cast Anchor, for that he could not come neerer him by C reason of the contrary winde, and shallownesse of the water) prepared himselfe courageously to fight: and having giuen order for all things, hee shewed himselfe armed in the fore-castle. The Vice Admirall cast Anchor nere vnto him; there were two other Ships came within Cannon shot to set vpon the other Ships which were runne on ground, and presently the rest of the Fleet followed to charge those they found in front. The Vice Admirall set vpon Blanquet, and came within twenty paces of him, but could approach no nearer, lest he should haue runne on ground: The fight was very furious for about an houres space in the end, the Vice Admirall sent a Capitaine with some souldiers to board Blanquet, the which they performed resolutely, notwithstanding his great resistance; where he was taken, being hurt in the left arme with a splinter, with sixteene of his men, D which were left vntillaine, being all caried to the Vice Admirall Ship, Gaillard, one of the Pyrate Capitaines, was taken at Land flying away, and caried backe to the Vice Admirall: All their Ships and Pinaces were taken, being abandoned by their men, only two got to sea.

After this, the Vice Admirall returned in triumph to Bourdeaux, with his prisoners, and six Vessels more then he caried forth. The Court of Parliament fell presently to worke about their proceesse, and in the end Blanquet and Gaillard were broken vpon the wheele, and their heads set vpon the Towers next to the Port, and sixteene Mariners were hanged.

About this time, the Clergy of France made their ordinary assembly at the Augustins in Paris, which they vsually doe every two yeares. The Bishop of Malcon, one of the Deputies, made an Oration vnto the King on the second of Iune, in the presence of many Princes, Dukes, Councillors, and Officers of State, which comprehended two complaints. 1. He made relation of the grieuances of the Catholicks of Montpellier: and 2. hee insisted vpon the restoring of the Romish religion in the Soueraignty of Bearne. Touching the first, he sayd, That the Bishop of Montpellier desiring to reforme a small Couent of Iacobins, and to bring in good men of that Order, with the approbation of their Generall, and the authority of the Court of Parliament: The inhabitants of the Towne not onely opposed themselves, but also thrust out those which liued before in the Couent. In like manner that about the same time, the Bishop hauing (according to the duty of his charge) F provided famous Preachers for the Catholicks in that towne for the time of Lent, they would not suffer them to enter, notwithstanding a Decree of his Councill, and the commandement of the Gouvernor of the Province, tending to a manifest disobedience. Secondly, that in Bearne they had deprived the Catholicks of the exercise of their religion, & of their Churches: that they had dispossessed the Clergy of all their goods, & had employed them to the entertainment of Ministers, penions of Schollers, & profane vses. Whereupon there was a Decree made in the Kings Councill, Iune 15. by the which the free exercise of the Romish Religion was restored in all the Townes, Borrowes, and Villages of Bearne, [r] and and the Clergy-men as well secular as regular, within the sayd Country, had a full release of all their Goods, Lands, Seigneuries, Tythes, Rents, Rennuues, and other Rights of what nature soever, being in his Maiesties hands, without reservation or exception. And in like manner he did maintaine his subiects of that Country, making profession of the reformed Religion, in the exercise thereof, and of all that depends thereon, as well for their Wages, Pensiones, Almshouses, and Ecclesiasticall Discipline: all which being at this present assigned vpon the Rennuues of the Clergy, his Maiesty doth assigne vpon the clearest Rennuues of his Demesnes, as well of the Country of Bearne, as of other Duchies, Earldomes, and Seigneuries formerly re-venited thereunto.

At the dissolving of this Assembly of the Clergy, they being accustomed to take their leave of the King before they separate themselves, and to make their Remonstrances of the disorders which might have crept into the Church; the Bishop of Ayre was deputed among other to make this Speech vnto the King.

His first complaint was against that detestable butchery (as he termed it) that infernall law of cursed Duels, which France baptized (in imitation of the Pagans) with the name of honour; but in truth, and according to the iudgement of God and his Angels, it was a rage and madnesse of men, the shame, contempt, and mockery of Christianity, of the Saviour of Kings, and of Diuinity it selfe. Having discoursed long vpon this subiect, hee entreated his Maiesty to giue him leave to continue his speech with as much liberty as he brought verity, loue, and fidelity. These wretches, (said he) who like enraged Lyons teare one another in pieces in Duels, Sinne but once; they are onely guilty of their owne crimes; but your Maiesty (who is bound to hinder all, and to punish all) if you faile in this duty, you Sinne alone with all; you make your selfe culpable for all; and will draw vpon you alone (if you doe not prevent it) a burthen of the iustice and vengeance of God, insupportable to an hundred thousand, and whose waight doth crush downe and ruine eternally. That the Church demanded not the law, but the execution of it; not by threats, but by punishment; not by a prescription which doth the sicke no good, but by some wholesome letting of blood, which will stanch this flux of blood in your Estate.

The second complaint of the Church, was, That whereas his Maiesty was bound to giue them Fathers, he gaue them Children: That the name of Abbot signified Father, and that a Bishop required more care, wisdom, affection, and fatherly authority: That notwithstanding, France was filled with Bishops and Abbots, which are yet in their Nurses armes, or vnder Regents in Colledges. Nay more, the abuse goes before their being; they are Fathers before they be Children, Abbots before they are borne; they know not yet whether they be males or females, and yet all the world knows they are crowned with Miters: monstrous Hermaphrodites, not onely against the law of Nature, but euen against God, the Author of Nature, which it behoues your Maiesty to prevent.

That secular and lay Pensiones approached nere to this sacrilegious disorder: it is a Tribute which the Church payeth (saith he) to the world which persecuteth it, and is sworn enemy to his Epouise: it is that cursed ranfome which doth evidently denote her captivity; and yet, contrary to the nature of a ranfome, doth not deliuer her. And that which most afflicts vs, Sir, is this, That others hauing the profit, your Maiesty is like to pay the interest, at that day when nothing will be remitted, and that the inexorable Iudge will make the mightiest Monarches of the world to tremble with the feare and horror of a punishment a thousand times greater then death it selfe.

That the Soueraigne Courts by their Decrees attempted vpon the authority which was committed to the Clergy, in that which concerned Ecclesiasticall Discipline, and the government of the Church.

We haue formerly made mention, how that the Baron of Quemadauc, Gouvernor of Fougieres in Britanny, had slaine the Baron of Neuet at Rennes during the Assembly of the Estates, for the which he was forced to goe to Paris to iustifie himselfe in Court, and to deliuer the Castle of Fougieres into the hands of an Exempt of the Kings Guard, who during his absence, should exercise his charge of Gouvernor. Now whether it were that he doubted of his cause, or for some other designe; in the Month of Iune, this Quemadauc parted from Paris, and went into Britanie, and surpris'd the Castle of Fougieres, making himselfe again master thereof. As soon as the King heard hereof, he commanded the D.

A of Vendosme and the Marshall de Vitry, to repaire with all speed thither before Quemadauc might be aware thereof, which charge they so affectionately performed, as they found him rather dreaming on what he had done, then on what he had to doe. Hee excused himselfe vnto them; and they promised him to employ their credits to restore him to his Maisties fauour. They brought him through Normandy to Paris, where he was committed to prison, and his proccesse made, by which he was condemned of treason, and of the murders committed vpon the Baron of Neuet, and of the Senechal of Chastillon in Vandre-lois, with other crimes. He was executed accordingly, notwithstanding all the suit made by his friends and his wife, who call her selfe at his Maisties feet to craue his pardon: but the King answered her, it is Iustice which makes Kings to reigne, I owe it to my subiects, and in this case I must preferre Iustice before Mercy: as for his goods which are confiscate vnto me, I giue them you.

The warre continued still betwene the King of Spaine and the Duke of Sauoy, notwithstanding all the Propositions of peace which had bene made in the end of the last yeare, by the Popes Legate and the Ambassador of France. In the beginning of the yeare the Spaniard had but ill successe; for the Prince of Piedmont had taken two Townes from the Prince of Masseran, a partizan to the Spaniard, and had defeated some of their best troops in the Valley of Sezia: and on the other side, towards Montserrat, the Duke of Sauoy, with the assistance of the Marshall D'Esquigueres, tooke Saint Damian, Garennes, and Albe. Yet the Gouvernor of Millane seemed more inclined to warre then peace. He leauied men in all places, and made great preparations to enter the Duke of Sauoyes Country in the Spring. At that time there was an aduice made by a Spaniard vnto his Catholick Maiesty, touching the means of making a peace with the D. of Sauoy, wherein he sets downe many reasons for the continuance of the warre; and in the end concludes, That if the D. of Sauoy doth not deliuer for caution and assurance of the peace, the Forts of his Country, by the which he may attempt vpon the Duchy of Millane, and doth not put them into the hands of his Catholick Maiesty, a peace could not be made: That no assurance could be giuen but those Forts, notwithstanding all that the Popes Nuncios did propound: But they should continue the warre, and not attend untill the French King came of age, or that the Duke of Sauoy had provided for the defence of his Countries: That about all things he should consider, what an opportunity was now offered him to make his way to the Imperiall Monarchy, and how fully God had diuerted the Councils of King Henry the fourth: That France was now gouerned by a woman; Italy without good Commanders; Germany full of dissensions; the Turke so weakened by his wars in the East; finally, all things were so impaired and confused, as there was not any one able to redress the power of the Catholick King.

It seemed this yeare in the Spring, that things would succeed fauourably according to the desire of Don Pedro de Toledo, Gouvernor of Millane, against the Duke of Sauoy, the Marshall D'Esquigueres being returned into D'Auphine, and the Ciuill wars so kindled in France, as his Highnesse of Sauoy could expect little helpe from thence: so as Don Pedro hoped to take two of the goodliest places belonging to the Duke, Verfel vpon Seiza, which is a frontier to Millane; and Aste towards Montserrat. Verfel was speedily besieged with 16000 foot, and 4000 horse; and 32 Peeces of Battery, and on the 23 of Iuly they yielded vpon honorable conditions. The Duke of Sauoy seeing so powerful an enemy in his Estate, who fought to take from him his best places, he sent to all the Kings, Princes, and Common-weales his allies, to be assisted with men: but he found not any one in case to doe it but the French King. After the death of the Marshall D'Ancres, his Maiesty during the Month of May, was busie in discharging of the troops, as well French and Liegeois, as Germanes, which had bene leauied by either party; retaining onely one Regiment of F. Lancknets, which the Queene Mother had caused to be leauied by the Earle of Schomberg, his Maiesty refusing to send them into Sauoy, and therefore he commanded the Marshall D'Esquigueres to ioyne his Forces with them, and to passe the mountains speedily. In August the Marshall with the Duke of Rohan, the Earles of Candale and Schomberg, Mont de Termes, and many of the French Nobility with their troops came into Piedmont, who being ioynd with the D. of Sauoyes Forces, they set vpon Felizan, in the which were 2000 Trentains of the Spaniards army lodged, which they forced and slew or took all that were in it that bare armes. After which the Sauoyards took None & la Rocque which was abandoned by the Spaniards, Lombards, Neopolitanes and Suiffes : which being persecuted by some of the Scouts of the Army, they were pursued by the French Carabins, who overtook them : where after some small resistance, they yielded. After these exploits, the Duke with the Marshall returned to Afte, from whence they sent their newes to Paris :

Wee haue defeated in fixe dayes five thousand of the best men the Spaniard had in his army, some of which were slaine, others taken prisoners, and the rest sent home to their houses : in this short space we haue also gotten fiftene Ensignes, and one Corner, hauing forced five places, conquered many Borowghes, with a large extent of the Country, and by this meanes deliuered the Towne of Afte from a siege which threatened the totall ruine B thereof, and many Citadels and places of strength, which did greatly annoy it.

The King hauing taken vpon him the government of his Estate, desiring to bee assured of him that should haue the keeping of the Prince of Conde, this year in May hee committed him to the guard of the Baron of Perfan, brother in law to the Marshall of Vitry, with the command of the Bastile. The Princeesse of Conde besought the King she might see her husband, and lue with him, the which his Maiefty granted : which act of hers was much commended, and God fo blest her, as soone after her coming thither, she grew with child ; the which did much ease the Princes griefe for his detention.

The Prince of Conde and his Lady consulted to Boe de Vincennes.

On the 15 of September, they were both conducted vnto Bois de Vincennes, still vnder the guard of the Baron of Perfan, who commanded in the dungeon where they were lodged, a farre better ayre then the Bastile. This change of lodging did much please them, the Lady hoping that she should be more conveniently lodged at her lying in : but she was deliuered before her time of a sonne still borne, which did much afflict him.

The King calls an Assembly of the chief of his Realme.

In October the King sent forth his Letters for the assembling of the most famous Personages of France, as well of the Clergy as of the Nobility, and the Officers of his Parliaments, by their aduice to provide for the Remonstrances and Grievances exhibited by the generall Estates assembled in the year 1615, which had not bene yett done, by reason of his voyage into Guenne, and the alterations which followed : To settle an order in his Councils ; and the managing of his Treasure : The reformation of the abuses which were crept into all the orders of the Realme : and generally touching all which should D be found necessary and expedient for the good and ease of his subiects, the safety of his Estate, the honour and dignitie of his Crowne, and the settling of a firme peace within his Kingdome.

And to the end this holy worke might bee more famous and commendable, he commanded all the Princes, Cardinals, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of his Crowne, to be there present, to heare their aduice touching that which should be presented by the Assembly, protesting before God, that he had no other end but his honour, and the good and ease of his subiects : coniuering those he should call, and commanding them expressly, that without any other respect, feare, or desire, to please or displease any man, they should with all freedom and sincerity, giue those Councils which they held in their consciences to be most wholesome and convenient for the good of the Commonwealth.

The Assembly held at Rouen.

About the end of Nouember, the King came from the Caste of Gaillon (where hee had spent some time in hunting) to Rouen, the Assembly beginning the fourth of December in the Archbishopps Palace : This Assembly was very stately, where there assisted all the prime men of the Kingdome of all degrees. At the beginning there were two speeches made, his Maiesties was short, but in royall termes, vpon the content hee had, hoping that this Assembly would giue him Counsels profitable both for himselfe and his Estate : commanding the Chancellor to deliuer his pleasure more at large, the which he performed with so fluent a discourse, as the whole Assembly (wherein were the greatest Personages and the best speakers of France) gaue him this commendations, that he could F both doe well and speake well.

The Assembly beganne five dayes after, during the which his Maiesties caused this Act to be made : First, The nomination of those which hee would haue to preside the said Assembly. Secondly, His pleasure vpon the strife arising betweene the chief of the Parliaments and the Nobility, about their places. Thirdly, By whom the Propositions should be exhibited to the Assembly. And fourthly, The forme which should be observed in deliuering their opinions.

His

A His Maiefty for many good considerations importing the good of his seruice, established the Duke of Anjou, his only Brother, President in this Assembly, the more to honor it, ioyning with him the Cardinals of Perron, and Roch-Foucault, the Duke of Montbazon, and the Earle of Brissac Marshall of France. That the Propositions which should be made in the Assembly, should be presented in writing vnto Monsieur, or his Adiuncts, by the Proctor generall of the Parliament of Paris. That in matters which should be pronounced touching the Clergy, the Presidents should cause them of the Clergy to deliuer their opinions first, and such as they should thinke fit for the opening of that business. That in that which concerned the Nobility, the Nobles should first speake. And B in matters of Iustice, the Officers and others of that ranke should first giue their aduice. As for the Treasure, the Chambers of Account, and Court of Ayds should be first heard. There was some question about their sitting : the Nobility saying, that they were the second Member of the State : That their seats ought to be right against the Clergy, and that the Presidents of Parliaments were but to represent the third Estate. Whereunto they answered, That it was no Assembly of the Generall Estates : That they were sent for by his Maiefty to giue their aduice touching the Propositions hee desired to make : That they were no Deputies of the Prouinces to the Estates ; neither were they euer deputed to the generall Estates ; and whensoever they assisted at the beginning or ending thereof, it was in quality of Councillors of State : That there was no reason the Nobility should precede, they hauing iurisdiction ouer them.

1617

Debate touching places in the Assembly.

The Nobility not satisfied with this Act, procured Letters Patents from the King, by which he declared, That moued with the good affection which he had alwayes borne vnto his Nobility (whom he knew to be his right arme) his intention was not in this Conuocation to hold an Assembly of the Estates : That hee had appointed them their seat about his person, and of those whom he had appointed to preside in the said Assembly, as most honourable and fit for the action : as well at the beginning of the said Assembly, as the continuation, without any prejudice to that which had alwayes belonged vnto them in the generall Estates, that is, the second place next to the Clergy, the which hee would haue maintained.

D On either side of the Presidents of the Assembly sat the Nobles, being thirteene Gentlemen of speciall note, chosen for their wisdomes. There were eleuen of the Clergie in their places, whereof foure were Archbishops, the other Bishops : and lastly, sat the Heads of Parliaments, there being two Presidents of Paris, with the first Presidents of Tholouse, Grenoble, Disjon, Rouen, Aix, and Rennes, with the Proctors generall of the said Parliaments : beneath them on the right hand, were the Presidents of the Chambers of Accompts of Paris and Rouen, with their Proctors generall : and on the left hand, the Lieutenant Ciuill of the Viscountie of Paris : Behind the Presidents of Parliaments, were the Presidents of the Courts of Ayds of Paris and Rouen, with their Proctors ; with the Prouost of Merchants of Paris. He that was chosen by the King to be Register E of the Assembly, had his place in the middle. President Iannin Super-Intendant of the Treasure, with the foure Intendants, coming twice into this Assembly, tooke their places directly before the Register. Monsieur de Rhodes, Great Master of the Ceremonies, stood behinde the Presidents. Behind Monsieur Chaire, and a little more retired then the seat of the Nobility, stood his Gouverneur, the Capitaine of his Guard, his vnder Gouverneur and Secretary. This was the order observed in this Assembly touching their sitting.

The manner of their sitting in the Assembly.

The Assembly hauing giuen his Maiefty thanks for their election, and for his religious intentions, they proceeded to their Propositions. The first was touching the managing of the secret affaires of State, which could not bee divulged without great prejudice thereunto. Although the King in his Maiority may, like vnto his Predecessors, F commit the managing to whom he pleaseth ; yet his desire had bene to giue the greatest part to the Princes and great Personages of his Realme : whereby many difficulties had risen.

Touching the government of the secret affaires of State.

First, the great number of those of that quality, whereof no one thought to be excluded, and yet in this great number, liberty (so necessary in affaires) could not be kept, and the multitude of opinions would cause delays and confusion.

Secondly, that the difficulties which were growne among the great men of the Realme

were

1617 were such, as there had been no means for them to sit in Councell together.

Thirdly, that it didd seldom happen but the aduertilements which came from within or without the Realme, concerned the interest of some one of this great number.

Fourthly, That to many Princes and great Personages which could not giue their necessary attendance, by reason of their Governments, Charges, and particular Affaires, the managing of the State would bee interrupted. That for these reasons his Maiestie had bene forced to leaue the managing of affaires to those Ministers whom his deceased Father had employed. Notwithstanding, causing all dispatches, aduertilements, instructions, and resolutions, to be daily read in his presence, and of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne: they haue free liberty to assist in his Councils, and to participate in the affaires which were there treated.

And for that his Maiestie desired to giue vnto the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, all the honour and respect which might bee in the Government of the State, and managing of his affaires; His pleasure was, the Assembly should aduise if they could find out any better or more contentment means then that which hee had obserued for the conduct of secret affaires: whereby without interest of the State, and prejudice to his Maiesties seruice, he might satisfie the desire of priuate men.

The Assembly humbly thanked the King, that it had pleased his Maiestie to demand their aduice vpon so important a businesse, which wholly depended vpon his pleasure. Notwithstanding, to obey his commandement, the Assembly was of opinion, that they could not giue him better aduice, then to continue (if it were his pleasure) the same order hee now held in the managing of his secret affaires, and by the aduice and counsel of the same persons which were employed. There were in all twenty Propositions deliuered vnto them: but because they are very long, and would take vp too much roome in this briefe Continuation, I must entreat the Reader to rest satisfied with the Heads of them.

The second was for an order and reformation of the Council, concerning causes which were litigious; and of the Council of affaires. 3. What persons should haue place and voyce in his Councils. Of the Decrees of the Council. That Decrees in Soueraigne Courts should not be reuoked. 4. Of the Council of State and Treasure, wherein they should treat of breaches of the Edicts: Petitions concerning the affaires of the Clergy: Differences which should happen for Offices: A Iudication of Farmes, Bridges, and publicke Workes: Abatements and Diminutions: Orders for the refreshing of Munitions in Frontier places: Petitions for the leauing of Money, Taxes, and Rents of Farmes. 5. What should be treated of in his Priuie Council, as Petitions, Reuocations: and for the ordering of Iudges in matters of question, concerning their Iurisdiction Requests against the Decrees of the Council, and opposition to the expedition of Letters of Prouision for Offices. That Differences for Benefices in the Kings Nomination, should be sent to the Grand Council. Of the charge of Masters of Requests. Of the Council of Warre: and the preheminnence of the Marshals of France in the sayd Council. 6. Reduction of the Expences of the Kings House, and of the entertainment of men of Warre. 7. Cutting off of Pensions, and the suppression of Treasurers of Pensions. 8. Of the exemption of Taxes, and of Letters of ennobling. That the King should forbear to giue any great gifts in present money, but reward seruices done, with Offices and other Charges which were in his disposition. 9. That it should be prohibited to sell any Offices or Places in the Kings House, in the Warre, or Governments. 10. Of the Reuerfions of Charges, Offices, and Benefices, and of the reuoking of the said Reuerfions. 11. Of the means to settle Monasteries and Abbies, and that they may be hereafter supplied with Religious men, and no Commendatories. 12. Of simple and rurall Priories, which haue no charge of soules, depending on Abbies and other Monasteries, and held by men most commonly, vnprofitable for the seruice of GOD, who by Resignations, made them hereditary to their Houses. 13. That the Pope should bee entreated not to receive the Resignation of any of the said Priories, and to ordaine, that when any fell voyd, they should bee re-vnted vnto the Monasteries whereon they depended. 14. To haue the Ordinances obserued, touching Artillery, Armes, and Munition. 15. That none should arme either by Sea or Land, without Letters signed by a Secretary of State; and in that which concerned

A concerned any Land-seruice by the Gouvernours of Prouinces; for the Sea, by the Admirals of France. 16. Not to communicate with fo-aine Ambassadors without the Kings permission. 17. Of the disorders in Commitments, the which are Letters of priuilege, which the Kings seruants and others of the Infants of France obtaine, to call any one from the remotest places of the Kingdome, to come and plead before the Masters of the Requests. 18. Of the alliances and kindreds which are crept, contrarie to the Ordinances, into Parliaments and Soueraigne Courts. 19. Of the means to prevent the oppressions which are committed by some, as well in Soueraigne as Precidiall Courts. 20. To reuoke the Paulette or Annuall right, and to take away the sale of Offices. The aduice of the B assembly to these Propositions, was giuen on the 26 of December 1617.

During this assembly at Rouen, Monsieur de Villeroi died, being 74 years old; a great Personage said, all the griefe we haue for his death is, that we finde not written in our bookes what he know. He was made Secretarie of State by King Charles the ninth, in the year 1566. And it may be said, that during the space of fifty and three years, there were not any affaires in France, no treaties of Peace, Alliances, Mariages, or Reunions, wherein he employed not himselfe with such dexteritie, as the foure Kings which he had serued, had giuen him great commendations. And King Henry the Great was wont to say of him, that the affaires of France, were the affaires of Monsieur de Villeroi. That hee laboured continually, and was neuer weary of well-doing. I know not, said this great King C (when as in the year 1605, they brought him word that Monsieur de Villeroi was sicke) which of the two liues were more necessarie for my Estate, either mine or Monsieur de Villerois.

The last yeare the King had bene aduised to vnite the Soueraigntie of Bearne to the Crowne of France. Whereupon they of the reformed Religion in the said Countrie, vnder the name of the generall Estates of Bearne, called extraordinarily together in the Towne of Pau, on the second of February 1617, caused a Decree to bee published, by the which they pretended, That the Country of Bearne was a Soueraigne Seigneurie, distinct from any other Soueraigntie or Realme; and that the Inhabitants thereof, who in the beginning governed themselves by their Lawes and Customes, did make choice of their Lords to bee continued in the same, they hauing no power to change, correct, or reforme them, but with the consents of the States of the said countrie. And that therefore his said Maiestie cannot (vnder correction) vnite the said Countrie vnto the Kingdome of France, without the consent of the said States, without infringing the principall marke and ground of the said Lawes and Liberties, which are dearer vnto them then their owne liues. That the said Estates may not transfere vnto posteritie so fundamentall a change of State; as that which should happen by the said vnion, which was reproued by the deceased King Henry the Great of famous memory, when he made the vnion of the ancient Demesnes vnto the Kingdome of France. Therefore the said Estates doe giue expresse charge vnto their Sindics to oppose themselves to all dispatches and Letters Patents which should bee sent, and all Acts made in the Countrie for the establishment of the said vnion. That there should be deputed certaine of both Estates to aduise of some remedies, and to vphold their oppositions, and if need were to demand a generall assembly of the States to provide for the same. And that the said Estates taking leaue of Monsieur de la Force the Kings Lieutenant generall, should report vnto him the aforesaid busines, beseeching him to giue aduice thereof vnto his Maiestie, as of a matter much importing his seruice. This Decree was signed as well by the Nobilitie, as the second Estate, in their assembly, the second of February 1617. Some write that this Decree was an enterprife vpon the Kings Soueraigntie in Bearne, vnder the name of States, which neither had nor could haue any iurisdiction or power to make a Decree; and that it shewed the bad intentions of such (as being farre from the Court) endeououred to stirre vp troubles vnder pretence of Religion.

We haue before made mention of the Kings Decree, for the establishment of the Romane Catholique Religion in Bearne, and touching the restitution of Ecclesiasticall goods: And how the King before he made the said Edict, had written vnto the Ministers of the reformed Churches of Bearne, to send their Deputies to the Court to see the proceedings for the restoring of the Ecclesiasticall reuennues, whereof his Maiestie had made graunt. The Apologie of the said Churches saith, That vpon the receipt of this Letter, they they had a very great assembly at Orthes, in July, where it was resolved, That it was better to dye then to receive the said Graunt, and make restitution of the Ecclesiasticall goods, which would ruine the Religion & state of Bearn. That in this assembly it was decreed to send vnto the King the Seigneur of L'Escun, to beseech him in the name of the Churches, to permit, that the Deputies required by his Maiestie, to see the proceeding of the reestablishment might be chosen by an Assembly of the three Estates of Bearn, and the Deputies of the reformed Churches of the Prouinces of high Languedoc, & low Guienne. That being come to Court, and hauing taken by the way at Rochel, the Maior & Sheriffs Letters to present vnto his Maiestie; He had audience at Saint Germanes in Lay, the seuenteenth of September. The said Apologie, faith also, that Monsieur de la Force, as Gouverneur of Bearn brought him in, and that the generall Deputies of the reformed Churches of France, which accompanied him in this audience, said vnto the King: That if the other Prouinces might haue assembled without offence to his Maiestie, as those of Rochel, they would haue presented Letters from all of them, beseeching his Maiestie to giue audience to Monsieur de L'Escun, who hauing done his obeisance, spake thus vnto his Maiestie.

Monsieur de L'Escun spake
to the King.

Sir, the Lawes and customes of men differ one from another. But it hath bin alwayes honorable for every country to obserue their owne: whereof your subjects of Bearn haue bene more carefull then any other. And they haue had this particular fauour from heaven; That for these three hundred yeares and more, that they haue been subject vnto your Maiestie, and your Predecessors, their fundamentall lawes haue been so religiously obserued, as no one of their Soueraigne Lords hath ever made any alteration in the State, without the aduice and request of all the orders of the State. To which end, your Maiestie hauing commanded by Letters to the Ministers and Ancients of the reformed Churches, of your fouraigntie, to send Deputies to see the proceedings for the restitution of the goods of the Clergie; being desirous to yeld the humble obedience which they owe vnto your commandements, without breach of the fundamentall lawes of the Estate, vnder which they are borne and bred; they haue giuen mee charge to cast my selfe at your Maiesties feet, humbly to beseech you, that it would please you, that the deputation may bee made by an Assembly of the Deputies of all the Orders of the Estate, together with them of the reformed Churches of high Languedoc, and bafe Guienne; seeing that by your Maiesties permission they treat their affaires ioyntly with them. And for that there were certaine Petitions, presented vnto your Maiestie and Councell the last yeare which are vnanswered, they humbly beseech you, that you would bee pleased to vouchsafe them your accustomed iustice; and especially, touching a Petition, whereby your Maiestie was intreated to command, that information might be made against the Authors of a scandalous Libell, called the Monke, very preiudiciall to the safety of your Sacred Person, and the rights of your Soueraignty, the which they seeke to make subject to the Realme of Arragon; whereby your Petitioners apprehend, that they will in time make them subject to the rigour of the inquisition of Spaine, and draw them from the mildnes of your naturall subiection and obedience, to captiuate them vnder the yoke of a foraine command, then the which they had rather endure a thousand deaths. For the preventing of which danger, they humbly beseech your Maiestie to allow of their supplication, and they will continue their vovs and prayers to God, for your health, prosperitie and long life. To whom the King made answer, I haue vnderstood you well; I will conferre with my Councell, and you shall haue my answer.

The Kings
Edict for the restoring of the Clergie of Bearn.

Soone after in September, the King made an Edict, for the settling of the Romish religion in Bearn, and the restitution of the Church-livings, the which they shall freely enioy, from the Feast of the Purification in the yeare 1618, from which time his Maiestie should bee freed and discharged of the summe of 2400 pound sterling yearly, and other summes, graces, and benefits, wherewith he had gratified them by way of annuall pension, commanding Monsieur de la Force, his Gouverneur and Lieutenant generall in his Realme of Nauarre and Soueraignty of Bearn, to see the execution of his will effected: yet not meaning in any sort to alter or diminish the graces and fauours which his deceased Lord and Father, and himselfe had conferred vpon his subjects, inhabiting the said Soueraignty, of what quality or condition soeuer, which were paid their wages, appointments, pensions, or gratifications, out of the reuenues of the said Clergie.

The

A The Seigneur of L'Escun and his fellow Deputies, hearing that this Edict was concluded and adrawing, they presently aduertised the reformed Churches of Bearn, who in the name of the Estates made a Decree on the tenth of November, by the which they concluded, that the Graunt of the restitution of the Clergies Lands, caused many grieuances against the liberties of the Country. Wherefore in case the prouisions for the said restitution should be presented, or any Commislarie, or other sent to proceed to the execution, they should aduise of the remedies, whereby they might make their opposition, and obtaine reparation of the wrong done by the Graunt thereof against their Lawes and Liberties. Notwithstanding, the Edict of restitution was verified in the Parliaments of B Thoulouse and Bourdeaux in December following.

But for that the Ministers complained, that his Maiestie had assigned their pensions out of the Countrie of Bearn, although that by the Decree of restitution, the Demesnes of Bearn were expressly mentioned: vpon a Proposition made in the Councell of Nauarre, by the Seigneur of Plessis Moray, the King being present, it was decreed; that for as much as in the Edict of restitution, there was no mention made of the Demesnes and Reuenues of Bearn, which were more then sufficient to free the said charges, which amounted yearly to the summe of seuen thousand and eight hundred pound sterling: And to the end that they who had the interest, should not doubt of his Maiesties goodwill and meaning, that they should bee duly paid their wages, pensions, appointments, and entertainments, which were formerly assigned vpon the Church-lands, should bee hereafter payed, out of all the Reuenues ordinarie, and extraordinarie, as well of the Demesnes of Bearn, as of those which his Maiestie had already affected by his Edict of restitution, the which should not be diuerted by himselfe or his successors to their preiudice, vpon any colour or pretext whatsoever.

In the famous Assembly at Rouen, the two last Propositions were, touching the reuocation of the Annuall right or Paulet, and the suppression of the Sale of Offices, which troubled the mindes of many Officers.

There were many propositions made to the Kings Councell for the one and the other. To proue that this Annuall right was profitable; they said, that the deceased King Henry the Great had established it; & it had bin approved by all the orders of the State. That this right brought vnto his Maiestie 100000 pound sterling yearly. They pretended that it was necessarie, and that it had giuen the King affectionate Officers in these last alterations, and made them depend vpon him alone. That it supplied the place of other impositions, and was paid only by the rich. That there was no inconuenience to exclude the poore from publique charges, neither was it necessarie that euery vertuous man should be an Officer. That it was profitable for the King to haue rich Officers, whose wealth was a warrant of their wisdomes; and that they were alwayes enemies to Factions. That the sale of Offices had been forbidden: but all their Lawes had proued vnprofitable. That it had bin alwayes vsed in France. That the King could not know all vertuous men in his Kingdom, and that the expedient propounded, of a roll wherein all well deservuing men should be written, was ridiculous, and an intution of Courtiers. That the Annuall right had made Officers grow old in their places, and gotten much experience. That to take away this Annuall right, wold chase away the ancient Officers. That the children succeeding in their Fathers Offices, were also bound to succeed to their virtues. Many other reasons were produced touching this subiect. But all their propositions were reiected, and his Maiestie made a Decree, by the which he did reuoke for euery the dispensation of forty dayes, granted to many of his Officers, in paying the Annuall right, wherunto they were taxed. Referring notwithstanding to acknowledge the vertue and merit of his Officers, who had discharged their places, with the reputation of integritie and sufficiency, to be it in their life time, by advancing them to higher places; or after their deaths, in gratifying their Widowes and children, out of the price of their offices, in case they dye before the forty dayes be expired. And touching the interdiction of the Sale of Offices, although his Maiestie had an intent to prouide for it, holding it necessary for the publique good: notwithstanding, to gratifie his Officers, and to giue them some time to accommodate their affaires, and also to haue meanes to finde some grounds for his Maiestie to make good his casuall reuenues: Hee was pleased to deferre the effect of the interdiction.

The Kings Decree for restoring the Jesuits to their public Lectures.

We have formerly made mention of the contestations between the Vniuersitie of Paris and the Iesuits, who required to be admitted to teach in their Colledge at Paris. For the which the generall Estates had bene suitors vnto the King. Whereupon, the matter being called in question before the Councell of State, there was a Decree past the fifteenth of February this year, in fauour of the Iesuits; by the which his Maiestie did call vnto himselfe and his Councell the instance depending in the Court of Parliament of Paris, betwixt the Iesuites on the one part, and the Rectour, Deane, and Proctors of the Vniuersitie on the other, in regard of the said opposition. And hauing respect vnto the Petition of the States, and the publique interst; He ordained that the Iesuites should hereafter, make their publique Lectures in all sorts of sciences; and all other exercises of their profession in their Colledge of Clermont, as they had formerly done, and on such dayes and houres as shall be most convenient for their schollers; which Lectures his Maiesties meaning was, should be presently reestablished, without any opposition; with this Proviso, That they should obserue the rules of the Edict, and submit themselves to the Lawes and Orders of the Vniuersitie, as his Maiestie should ordaine. And his pleasure was, that the said Iesuites should be put in full possession of the said Lectures, by two Councillors and masters of Requests, or other Councillors of the Soueraigne Court, being first required by vertue of this Decree, and Letters of Commission, who shall transporth themselves vnto the places, notwithstanding any opposition, or appellation whatsoever; and if any hapned, his Maiestie reserved the knowledge thereof to himselfe and his Councell, forbidding all Courts to take notice thereof. This Decree was executed accordingly, and the Iesuites put in full possession of their Lectures.

The burning of the great Hall of the Palace at Paris.

On the fourth of March hapned that fearful fire of the great Hall of the Palace at Paris. About two of the clocke or more after midnight, the Sentinell at the Louure, next vnto the Riuier, saw as it were a circle of fire ouer the cowering of the Palace Hall. Soone after, the singing men of the holy Chappell, and some neighbours, by reason of a cry of fire which was made, saw this circle, which increased by little and little, and of the bignesse of a Hoghead. The watchmen who ordinarily keeps the gate of the Palace Court was vp at midnight; they knocked at one of the Hall doores; they cried out fire; but the Houfe-keeper and his seruants being in their first sleepe heard nothing of all this.

About halfe an houre after, some singing men and Merchants, who came running at the cry, forced open a little doore neere vnto the holy Chappell, by which they entered into the little Hall, and from thence they got into the great, where they saw the fire onely in the top of the rooffe, and beneath in foure of the Merchants shops. By this time the Keeper and his seruants were awake, who came to open the gates. The winde being Southerly, the great rooffe which was of dry wood and varnish, fell suddenly on fire, the girders and rafters began to fall vpon the shops, the Proctors seates, and the Chappell which was made of wood, and newly varnish; in the which there was aboue a hundred and fifty pound weight of Waxe-lights and Torchcs, which did so fire all the lower part of the Hall, as the Keeper had not leisure with his seruants to enter into his Houfe to saue his goods. The Merchants who came running to presteue what they had, were glad to retire for feare of the burning Timber which fell from the rooffe; about foure of the clocke the rooffe towards the Consultations fell, and soone after that of the midst, and about siue of the clocke the rest towards the Prison.

Vnto the Register came running at this cry, and entred into his Office, by the Kings garden, and saued his bookes of Records, and what else was there; as likewise the Registers of the Treasure, and what belonged to the Kings Councell. In the meane time the first President, and Atensur Seruin Aduocate generall, being lodged within the wals of the Palace, ordained what they thought fit to hinder the course of this fire. The Colonell of that quarter put the Burgesies in Armes for feare of some disorder. The Fire continuing and caried by a fourtherly winde, fell vpon the lodging of the Requests of the Houthold, of the Register of the Treasure, of the first Chamber of the Inquents, and the others Court, all neere vnto the golden Chamber, which were burnt and consumed in lesse then halfe an houre. It rained still on, and got the passage towards the Mercers gallerie and Court of Aydes. Then began there a great and fearfull cry, as well of the Prisoners who would haue saued themselves by force, (but the Proctor generall caused the chiefe of them to be conducted to other Prisons by the Provostry as by the Merchants who

caried away their goods, and cast their shops and stalles downe the staires, to take away all combustible matter. The Fire grew so violent, as it blew Slates ouer the Riuier of Seine, and the Tower of the great clocke was set on fire with a burning brand, the which was speedily recovered to saue the rest. Hauing vncouered those rooffes which were in danger of fire, they fell to quenching it; after which they caried away all the Timber & rubbish which lay in the Hall, lest it should endanger the vaults vnderneath.

The next day the Court assembling, they made a Decree concerning their Papers, Proccesses, and Registers which were wanting, inioyning all men of what condition so euer, that had taken and caried any away, or found them by accident, or otherwise, to deliuer them presently vnto Iohn du Tillet, Register of the said Court, or to his Deputie, without any fraud or deceit. And withall, they did forbid all Merchants, Apothecaries, or others, to buy directly or indirectly, any Parchments or written Papers: but if any be brought them, to retaine them, and acquaint the Iustice therewith: They spake diuersly of the cause of this accident.

Some would haue it to proceede from some pan of coales shut vp in some of the Mercers shops. Others, say that it was the Houle-keepers fault, who negligently in shutting of the doores, had left the end of a Torch vpon a Mercers shop, whereby the rest were set on fire.

There had beene a Peace concluded in Italy, betweene the Archduke Ferdinand, and the Venecians; thus rested nothing to settle a full peace in those parts; but the execution of the Treaties of Asse and Pavia, with the Sauoyard.

The Most Christian King who had vndertaken the performance of these Treaties, sent Monseur de Motene, to assist the Baron of Bedunes, to the end that all Townes and places taken on either side might be restored. But Don Pedro de Toledo made so many difficulties, and delays, as some wrote his Maiestie was forced to say vnto the Duke of Monteleon, Ambassador in France for the King of Spaine; The opinion which they haue given the King of Spaine your Master, that I cannot goe out of my Realme, but I shall leave it full of troubles and diuisions, is the cause of the delays of Don Pedro your brother in law, to content my cousin the Duke of Sauoy: but I will haue him know, that although my estate should be abandoned to fire and sword in my absence, yet nothing shall hinder my resolution to passe the mountaines in person, to force Don Pedro to hold his word with me, and to performe the promise which I haue made to the Duke of Sauoy.

The Kings speech to the Ambassador of Spaine.

After many journeys, according to the Treatie of Pavia, the Duke of Sauoy, beganne first to restore the places which he held from the Duke of Mantua, and the Prince of Masseran. And then Don Pedro deliuered to him, Saint German and Oncgle. These restitutiones and others were made by degrees. And on the fifteenth of Iunc, Versell, the most important of all was restored to the Duke of Sauoy.

A Peace concluded betweene the King of Spaine, and the Duke of Sauoy.

After this, his Highnes began first to send backe his Prisoners with Passports, and an honorable conuoy; some to Felizan, and others neere vnto Millan; as Don Pedro's Nephew, and the sonne of Don Iohn de Vines, Ambassador for his Catholique Maiestie in Italy: And then Don Pedro did the like. So as there remained nothing for a full execution of the Peace, but a publication for the restitution of priuate mens goods, which had serued either party: the which the Duke of Sauoy performed accordingly on the eighth of Iuly. After which, the like was performed in the Duchy of Millane, and in Montserrat: So as the Peace was fully settled in Italy.

It is written, that on the fourteenth of February this year: The Lord Chancellor dismissed the Seigneur of L'Escun, Councillor in the Court of Parliament of Pau, and Deputie for the reformed Churches of Bearne, in the presence of the generall Deputies of the reformed Churches of France, and the particular Deputies of base Languedoc. Telling him in the Kings name, that his Maiesties pleasure was they should not make any assemblies within his country of Bearne, to those ends which were mentioned in their Petition of the fourteenth of September; That is to say, That the Deputies desired by his Maiestie to see the proceeding in the restitution of the Church-lands, should be chosen by an Assembly of three Estates of Bearne, and the Deputies of the reformed Churches of high Languedoc, and base Guenene.

They of Bearne called an assembly at Caste-laux.

The reformed Churches of Bearne being assembled at Pau, received Letters from L'Escun of his dismissal. Whereupon the States being at that time assembled in the same same town, resolved to call the Deputies of the Councils of three Prouinces of France A next adjoining to Bearne, that is to say, high and bafe Languedoc, and bafe Guienne, to meet at Castel Laloux on the first of May.

1618

Forbidden by
the King.

The King aduertised of this Conuocation, sent Letters to the Parliament of Bourdeaux, and the Chamber of the Edict at Nerac to proceed against the Authors thereof, and against all such as should assift them, as breakers of the Edict, and troublers of the publique peace. So as the Gouverneur and Consuls of Castel-laloux, and such as had the command of other Townes in Guienne for them of the Religion, refused the holding of the same assembly.

The Kings
Declaration
against the Aile by at Orthes.

The Deputies of Bearne & they of bafe Guienne, and high Languedoc, being come to B the place appointed on the first of May; and seeing the refusal was made to hold the Assembly, they went to Tonnus, where they had the like dismission. Hereupon they consulted together, and resolved to goe to Orthes in Bearne, on the five and twentieth of May, and there to hold their Assembly with all libertie; taking an oath amongst them, not to speake any thing vntill the day. His Maieitie being aduertised that they had assigned their assembly out of the Iurisdiction of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, hee made another Declaration, verified in the Court of Parliament at Paris, on the five and twentieth of May, and in the Chamber of C. sties, commanding all Iudges to proceed against them, which should be found the Authors, and which should assift at the said assembly in Bearne, and in all other assemblies forbidden by the Edicts, as breakers thereof, and troublers of the C publique peace.

Notwithstanding all these prohibitions, the assembly held at Orthes; and they sent Letters to the generall Deputies of France, residing in Court, charging them to present the Assemblies Letter vnto the King, and to beseech him to answer them fauourably in their Petition made by the Seigneur of L'Escun; and in case of refusal to desire a generall Assembly. Hereunto they made answer: That they would not receiue their Letter coming from an vnlawfull Assembly. As for them, they would heare them alwayes as generall Deputies, and not as having commission from the said Assembly.

About the same time, Monfieur de, Councillor of State, & Master of Requests, deputed Commissarie by the King, for the execution of the Edict of restitution, parted frō Court, D & arrived at Pau, the 9 of Iune, where hauing delivered vnto the Proctor generall the Edict of restitution with the Decrees of the Courts of Parliament of Thoulouse, and Bourdeaux, to be enrolled in the said Parliament of Pau, and executed: they write that during his abode there, they stirred vp the schollers, and others, to commit many insolencies, and to speake many opprobrious words vnto him at his lodging doore; the which Monfieur de la Force the Gouverneur, nor the Court of Parliament, did in no sort punish, but only restrained them. It is also written that the Deputies of the Estates, and the reformed Churches of Bearne, presented their requests vnto the Parliament, to be admitted opponents vnto the Edict, and verifications presented by the Proctor generall, and that the Bishops of Oleron, and L'Escar should giue their request of Recusation against the Seigneur of L'Escun, Councillor in the Parliament, Deputie for the said Churches, as being party.

Decree of the Parliament of Pau, against the Edict of restitution.

The matter being heard, there was a Decree made by the Parliament, by the which it was said; That in regard of the Edicts, Letters Parents, and Declarations enrolled in that Court, granted as well by his Maieitie now reigning, as by other Kings his Predecessors, in fauour of their subiects of the reformed Religion dwelling in that Country: there was no meanes to proceed to the verification of the Edict concerning the restitution. But his Maieitie should bee humbly intreated to leaue matters as they were, for the good of his seruice; the settling of his estate; and the goods of his subiects: enioyning notwithstanding all the inhabitants of that Country, of what Religion so euer, to retire to their houses, and to liue in p. ace, vnitie and concord.

The Kings
In iunction to the Parliament
of Pau.

The King being informed of all these proceedings: it was resolved in Councill to send another Iussion to the Soueraine Court of Pau, wherein making repetition of the Errors had been committed; he enioynes them expressly, (notwithstanding their Decree of the one and twentieth of Iune) to proceed without delay to the publication and inrolling of the said Letters Parents, and Edicts of restitution: and the full execution thereof, for as much as should depend of them; and notwithstanding that he had by his Edicts more then plainly satisfied all those which might either directly or indirectly be interested in

1618

A in the said restitution; yea, with such losse and disadvantage to himselfe, as hee was not only dispossest of all the reuenues which he had in Bearne, but also of a good part of his neighbour-Countries. Yet he declared, that if after the verifying of the said Decrees and Edict, there should be any one found which pretended any losse or prejudice thereby, which deserved consideration and recompence, he would receiue their complaints, and giue them full satisfaction. Withall he gaue commandement, they should make their proceffe, which had come in armes to attempt against his Commissary; and likewise to proceed against those which had assembled at Orthes contrary to his Edicts and Decrees, and to punish them according to the rigor of the lawes.

B This yeare Monf. de D'Ornano Gouverneur of Castle-Trompet in Bourdeaux was made Lieutenant Gouverneur in the Prouince of Normandie, and the particular government of Pont de Larche, the which Monf. de Luyne enioyed after the death of the Marshall D'Ancre: And the said Monf. de D'Ornano yielded vp Castle-Trompet into the Kings hands. Monf. de Luyne was made Gouverneur of the Ile of France, and had likewise the particular government of Soissons, Noyon, Chauny and Compi. by the resignation which the Duke of Mayenne made thereof into the Kings hands: whereupon he was made Gouverneur and Lieutenant Generall in Guienne, for which he tooke his oath before his Maieitie. Thus the Duke of Mayenne left Soissons to goe to Bourdeaux to be at the Registering of his Letters of Prouision in Parliament. Where hee arrived in the beginning of C Iuly, at the reading whereof there was much spoken in honour of the said Duke, and of the many good seruices which he and the House of Lorraine had done to the House of France.

Exchange of Gouernments.

Barnonville, who commanded in the Bistille, being accused to haue had his eyes blinded with a diamond, to suffer Barbin, a prisoner there, to receiue letters and write answers, lost his place, & was the cause that the Baron of Persan his brother, who had the custodie of the Prince of Conde, being come from Bois de Vincennes to Paris, vpon certaine haughty words which he spake, was committed to prison: the King giuing the guard of the Prince, to the Seigneur of Vernet, brother in law to Monfieur de Luyne.

Of all the accused, one was condemned to dye, others banished, some to retire to their D houses, and the Prisons were opened to others. The King being intriued by the kinsmen of some great men condemned, to shew his clemency towards them, would that it should not only extend vnto them for whom they were suitors but vnto all, Barbin onely excepted, who had beene banished France, but his punishment was changed to a perpetuall imprisonment.

About the beginning of September, France lost the Cardinall of Perron. King Henry the third knowing the sharpnesse of his wit, tooke him into his seruice, and gaue him 1200 crownes a yeare to be his Reader. He followed his Master to Tours. After whose decesse, the Cardinall of Vendosme making great accompt of his learning, brought him to the Court after the siege of Chartres. The King seeing his sufficiency and learning, E beganne to affect him much, and made him Bishop of Eureux. After the Kings conuersion, as some write by his perswasion, hee was sent to Rome to represent his filiall obedience, and to reconcile him to the holy Sea, the which he obtained from Pope Clement 8. Being returned from Rome, he purchased a great deale of honour and reputation with the King and Court, vpon a conference which he had at Fontaine Bleau with Monfieur de Plessis Moray. Soone after, his Holinesse sent him a Cardinall Hat, the which was very pleasing vnto the King, who gaue him the Archbishopricke of Sens being void, and made him his chiefe Almoner. The Reconciliation of the Pope with the Venetians, was partly made by his aduice, with many other goodly actions. And without doubt it may bee said of him, that he had beene one of the learnedst and greatest Prelates of the Romish Church F in his time.

The Kings
voyage to Soissons.

On the last of September Monf. de Luyne came to Soissons, to take possession of the government of the Ile of France. The next day the King came thither, where he was receiued with all demonstrations of publike ioy; the which the inhabitants did shew by the brute of their Cannon, which they had planted vpon their Bulwarkes. The Kings voyage should haue been longer; but all the Country thereabouts being ruined by the Armies, for the space of four yeares, it drew the King backe againe with his Court to Paris.

The King being aduertised, that the Duke of Sauoy sent the Prince Cardinall his sonne [f]

sonne vnto him, as well to giue him thanks for the assistance which he had receiued from A his Ma^{tie} in the protection and pacifying of his Estates and Countries, as to finish the alliance propounded for the marriage of the Prince of Piedmont, the Dukes eldest son, and Madam^e Christienne, the Kings second Sister. He gaue commandement to the Gouernours of Prouinces and Townes where hee should passe, to receiue him with all honour, and to dⁱst^ray him as was fit for a personage of his qualitie and dignitie, wherein there was nothing wanting during his whole iourney.

In the beginning of Nouember, hee arriued at Paris, where he receiued as honorable entertainment, as he could desire or imagine, no lesse suitable to his blood and ranke, then to the greatnesse and magnificence of the House of France. Hee was lodged in Piquigny place, and was serued by the Kings Officers. He had audience, and in the end obtained a Grant of the Marriage for which hee came: the accomplishment whereof will belong to the next year.

Proposition of the French Ambassador: to the vniued
Estates.

The beginning of this year was troublesome in the vniued Prouinces, by reason of the Arminian faction, and their criminal proceeding against Barnetus, Advocate generall of the Estates of Holland and West-Friesland, who was held to bee the head and chiefe of the Arminians. Hee was a man of great credit and authoritie in those Prouinces, having past all the Offices a man could desire in a Soueraigne Commonwealth; but alwayes opposite to the Prince of Orange. Being committed to Prison the last year, they were now vpon the point to proceed against him. Whereupon the French King sent an extraordinarie Ambassadour to the generall Estates, who being assisted by the Leiger; they made their proposition vnto the said Estates, exhorting them, to continue firme in the vnion of their Prouinces; as the chiefe foundation of an Estate, and to be careful left the changes of Magistrats and Consuls, which they had made in their Townes, did not increate the hatred and dissention among the Citizens in stead of curing it. That the Synode which they had called should be free and safe, for all which should assit there. That free Common-weales, had alwayes spared the blood of their Citizens. That the Seigneur of Barnetus was recommendable for the good seruices which he had done vnto his Country. That they should giue to him and others accused, Iudges which were not suspect, nor passionat, who may iudge according to the lawes of your Country, by plaine and vndoubtfull proofes, and not by coniectures and presumptions. That the King aduised them to vse Clemencie, and mildnes towards these prisoners, and not rigor, as most pleasing to God, and fit to winne the loues of the people, and make them obedient, which his Ma^{tie} desired for the interest hee hath in the preservation of their State, and the knowledge he had of the great seruices this prisoner had done them, and the affection he had alwayes borne to entertaine the Alliance between France and that Estate; such remarkable testimonies of his loyalty and fidelitie, that they seemed to exclude all treason and treacherie.

The answer of
the generall
Estates.

The generall Estates made answer to the Ambassadors proposition; wherein they complained, for that the most Christian King would not suffer any of the Ministers of France to assit at their Nationall Synod, which began at Dordrecht the last year. And touching the Prisoners, there was no losse of time, but they laboured therein duely and diligently, wherein they had proceeded so farre, as they doubted not but they would doone come to iudgement, which should be such as at the publication thereof, all the Allies which did affect the prosperity of that Estate, and especially his Ma^{tie}, who was a Prince of Iustice and Equitie, would commend their iust proceedings. But touching the Ministers of France, assit at any foraine Synode, K. Henry the 4. at the Pacification of Nantes, inserted an Article, whereby all strange Ministers were forbidden to come to the Synods of the reformed Churches in France; and in like manner the Ministers of France restrained from any foraine Synods.

An Italian Amenist burnt at Thoulouze.

The last year in Nouember, there was an Italian in the towne of Thoulouze committed Prisoner, who was a Philosopher, and a very learned man, and went from house to house to teach such youth as desired to learne Philosophie. Hee maintained and taught, that our bodies were without soules, & that dying all dies with vs like vnto brut beasts. That the blessed Virgin Mary (oh execrable blasphemie) had had carnall knowledge like vnto other women, with other words more scandalous, and vnworthy to be written, or spoken.

A By his eloquence he did so insinuate his pernicious doctrine into the vnderstandings of his p^rimate auditors, as they began to wauer in their Faith: which comming to the knowledge of the Parliament, they sent out Warrants to apprehend him; who being examined, hee maintained his instructions to bee true: whereupon his proceffe was made, and sentence giuen, by which hee was condemned to doe penance in his shirt, with a Torch in his hand, and to be drawne vpon a Hurdle, his tongue to be cut out, and to be burnt aliue, the which was executed in the beginning of Februarie. He died with as much constancie, patience and resolution, as euery man did. For coming out of the prison with a cheerefull countenance; He spake these words in Italian: Gou gowe, let us die cheerfully like a Philosopher. Being aduised to aske God forgiveness, he said in the presence of many; There is neither God nor deuill: for if there were a God, I would intreat him to shooe a Thunderbolt vpon the Parliament, as being altogether vniust. And if there were a Deuill, I would also pray him to swallow them vp into the infernall gulphes: but because there is neither the one or the other, I will not say any thing.

Having made mention of the punishment of Atheists, wee will continue the discourse, with the relation of a Jewish woman, which was burnt by the people of Saint Iohn de Luz on the twentieth of March. Philip the second of Spain, hauing vniued Portugall to the Crowne of Castile, many Families of Iewes retired themselves into Holland, and other places of Christendome, for feare of a strict Inquisition: and many were fled into the Villages, vpon the Frontiers of Biscay, where they did liue Christian-like in shew, and yet in secret they made their Conuenticles and Synagogues in Caves, contrarie to the Kings ordinances.

The Vicar generall of Bayonne, hauing giuen charge to a Priest of Saint Iohn de Luz, to obserue the behaviour of these Portugals, he did it so carefully, as on the 19 of March, certaine Portugall women presenting themselves to Confession, and afterwards to the Communion, which was administred vnto them, by one Don Anthony a Portugall Priest, but held for a Iew: he discouered that all these women as soone as they had receiued the sacred Host, they presently put their right hand to their mouths, which made him coniecture that theyooke it forth. Being verie nere vnto the last, whose name was Katherine Fernandes, he plainly perceiued, that as soone as she had receiued it, she drew it out with her Handkerchiefe, and hid it in her sleeve. Whereupon the Priest went vnto her, saying, wicked woman, what hast thou done? who seeing her selfe surprized, answered that she was mad. Hereupon the Priest called some to assit him: which the Portugall Priest, & the other women perceiuing, they fled presently away. Fernandes being taken, and caused to draw out her handkerchiefe, they found the Host in it somewhat moist, the which they put vp againe with great reuerence into the holy Pixe. The woman being examined by the Vicar generall of Bayonne, she excused her selfe, saying, that the Deuill had made her commit this sinne; that coughing, it had slip out of her mouth, and that she had kept it to take at leisure in her lodging. The people being impatient of any long delay in her examination; and hearing that the Iewes had made a purse to saue her life; they resolved to doe iustice themselves. So going into the Vestry, they brought her forth in the view of many Iudges, putting her presently into an empty barrell, and an empty Pitch-barrel vpon her head and shoulders. Then filling the barrell wherein the fate with Pitch and Rosin, Straw, drie Wood, and other combustible materials, all the people came running and set fire to it, burning her aliue, which the Officers of Iustice could not hinder. Being burnt, they found in the Ashes Jewels of great price, for she was verie rich.

After this, the people gaue present commandement to all the Portugals and Iewes to depart from thence forthwith, if not, to be all burnt: whereunto they were forced to obey flying to Biarritell, a league distant from Bayonne, where they now remaine.

The King Proctor generall of Bourdeaux caused information to be made for this burning, and Warrants to be sent out, to apprehend as well the Bailiffe and Jurats, as against the rest of the Inhabitants of Saint Iohn de Luz, being an enterprize of dangerous consequence, and against the authoritie of the Kings iustice: but it was a popular mutinie, zealous in their Religion.

The Duke of Sauoy, hauing receiued newes in the beginning of the year by a Post, sent from the Cardinall of Sauoy; That the Treatie of marriage of the Prince of Pied-

Triumph at Thurin for the conclusion of

1619 Piedmont with the Ladie Christienne second daughter of France was concluded, A they were verie acceptable, being accompanied with a fauor wherewith the King honored the Prince, knding him the Ladies colours, which were presented vnto him by Monsieur Marin, Councillor to his Maieftie, and his Agent in Italie. For three daies space there was nothing but publike piceoffions throughout all Sauoy, and Picdmont, shooting off of Cannons, Bonfires; and other exterior signes of ioy.

After which there was a solemne triumph proclaimed, in which the Prince was Challenger, being assisted by eleuen other Knights, and Prince Thomas his brother defendant with as many more, all which was performed with great state. The Court of France was in like manner full of ioy. The Duke of Elbauf married the yong Ladie of Vendosme. B The Duke of Guise went from Paris to Marfeilles, to draw a Fleet together to free the Seas from the Pyra's of Argier; and the Duke of Tremouille went to Sedan, to marrie the Duke of Bouillons Daughter, where there was great triumphs and ioy.

The marriage of the Prince of Piedmont with the Ladie Christienne.

The Prince of Piedmont and his brother Prince Thomas, came to Lions on the first of February, where Monsi. D'Alincourt, Gouverneur of the Towne, entertained them very sumptuously. From thence they tooke Poste and came to Rouen where they embarked vpon the Loire: but their boat making no such speed as the Prince desired, he landed at Bonne with his brother and some Noblemen, leaving their traine to come after: there they tooke Posts and came to Paris on the seventh of February, wherethey were entertained with all shewes of honour. On the 10 of February the Prince of Piedmont was married to the Ladie Christienne the Kings sister: And it was obserued that on the 10 of February, in the year 1606 she was borne. There were manie discourses vpon this marriage, to shew how religiously the will of the deceased King Henry the Great, had bene performed in the accomplishment of this marriage: That it was necessary to renew the ancient alliances of the Kings of France and Dukes of Sauoy thereby. To honour this Marriage the King presented the most stateliest masque which hath bene read of.

The Duke of Espernon returned to Metz.

During these Magnificences in signe of publike ioy for the Ladies marriage, and of an assured peace in France, They might discover a thicke cloud rising about Metz. The King had sent for the Duke of Esperson to come to him to Rouen during the Assembly, who leaving his government of Angoulême attended vpon his Maieftie. The Court returning to Paris, in the beginning of the year 1618, whether he had taken some discontent, or they had giuen him any: In Aprill following, hee tooke occasion to goe visit his faire house of Fontenay in Brie, and some dayes after retired to Metz, being discontented with those whom the King fauoured, so as meeting them once going downe the great staires at the Louure, and they coming vp, he said vnto them, My masters you mount, and we descend. The which the Courtiers obserued well. That being at Metz, vpon certain differences which had happened, the President and some of the discreetest Inhabitants, were gone out of the Towne. The King desiring to bee informed of the true cause thereof, had sent Monsieur Fanier a Councillor and Master of Requests to Metz, with commission to restore all things to their first state. The which he had done for the President, but not for the rest: whereof he brought Letters from the Duke vnto the King, and that it seemed he had a desire to part from Metz, to goe to Angoulême. Whereupon the King wrote vnto him.

The King wrote
the Duke of Espernon.

That in regard the warres were newly kindled in Germanie; and that it seemed they would not bee so easily quenched, but might extend further: He held his preference more necessarie now then euer in the towne of Metz, commanding him expressly not to depart without order from him, the which he should haue, as soone as the affaires of the Frontiers would suffer it: assuring himselfe, that hee would yield him the seruice he desired, and whereunto he was bound by his place. Paris the eleuenth of Ianuary 1619.

The Duke of Espernon answers to the Kings last let.

The Duke made answer vnto the Kings Letter, the which I amforced to insert, being matter of State, and the forerunner of a great alteration.

Sir, (saith he) I haue nothing to answer to your Maieftie: But that hauing alwaies depended absolutely vpon your commandments, and hauing neuer propounded in my actions any other ends then the good of your Estate; the least interst which shal concern my charge, is not only sufficient to stay me here, but shall bind me to expose my life in all places for your seruice: but now, Sir, France enioying a generall Peace, your affaires

A so strongly confirmed; and the honour of your friendship so deare vnto your neighbors, that as there is nothing within the Realme, but bowes vnder your authority; so abroad there is no Prince but doth respect your power, or is preferred by your iustice. And touching the troops of Bohemia. The danger which they imagin (who make matters greater then they are) is so farre from this Frontier, as the apprehension wee would take, can haue no ground, seeing that no man Armes on this side the Rhine. These considerations, Sir, doe not binde mee to stay in this Countie where all things are in so good an Estate, and where the stay of my Sonne La Vallette shall be sufficient in my absence, to giue order for anything which may concerne the good of your affaires. I assure my selfe your Maie- B ste is so iust, as you will regard the necessitie of my particular, and be pleased that I may returne vnto my house from whence I haue bene absent about fiftene moneths. I take that libertie which you allow vnto the least, which haue the honour to be vnder your obedience. I doubt not but you will be well pleased with the desire I haue to make this Voyage, and I assure my selfe you will consider that since your coming to the Crown, C hauing bene engaged in 100000 crownes for your seruice; for which I pay the interrest at Paris, and not hauing receiued any gift from your Maieftie these two yeares, but the simple pay of a Collonell, at the rate of ten moneths a yeare, it is not possible for mee to defray the great and necessarie charges that I am bound to bee at here, to maintain the dignitie of my charge, and doe your Maieftie seruice with more lustre. Finally, Sir, seeing mine enemies daily seek to raise doubts in your Maiesties minde of my purcell intentions, D & that I am so unfortunate as being growne old in the seruice of three great Kings, I must be troubled to defend my loyaltie against slander. I am inforced to say with much griefe, that I haue contained my selfe in my dutie, when as they propounded vnto me recompence for disobedience: and that I haue defended your authority, when as some abused it, and others contemned it. They doe mee wrong to thinke, that I would begin to faile at this age; and that my particular interrests are more deare vnto me then your seruice. Wherein Sir, I will freely confesse, that I haue no cause to complaine but of my bad fortune, being assured that verue is not suspected vnder your raigne, nor reputation odious; and that your Maieftie is too iust, not to distinguish the innocent from the Nocent. For E in effect, Sir, seeing that when you were not yet at libertie, the mildnesse of your disposition was so great, as you did alwayes oppose against violent Councils, and could not endure that your authority should be employed to the ruine of your subiects. There is no apparance, that now when you depend wholly of your selfe, and that no man doth force the bounty of your inclination: you would toyle the age of one of your best seruants, and the most ancient Officer of your Crowne, nor deny him that rest which Nature demands. I thinke, Sir, I may hope for this, at the least as a recompence of my long & faithful seruices, seeing your Maieftie may giue it me, (as I most humbly beseech you) without any discommoditie of your affaires: hauing neuer expected any other fruit of my actions, then the contentment to haue done them. I shall hold my selfe happie enough to receiue the Testimonie of my conscience, to haue bene truly, and so will continue, your most humble, faithfull, and affectionate subiect and seruant, L. Louis de La Vallette. From Metz the seventeenth of Ianuary 1619.

Thus the King would haue the Duke of Esperson continue at Metz, and he desired to goe to Angoulême. The subiect of his desire will bee knowne hereafter by that which happened.

Vpon this resolution he made preparation for all which he held necessarie for his voyage; that is to say, of Men, Armes, and Horfes, hauing drawne together 200 Cheualiers and Carabins. All being ready, he caused the gates of Metz to be shut (some daies together before his departure; and certaine daies after, so as they could haue no aduertisement at Court, before he had crost Lorraine and Bourgundie, past the Riuer of Loire betwene Desire and Rouane, and Lallerat at Pont de Vichy. From whence hee wrote thus vnto the King.

Sir, hauing formerly represented vnto your Maieftie the long patience wherein I haue attended in my government of Metz all occasions to doe your seruice, and promising vnto my selfe, that hauing taken into consideration, the necessitie of my affaires, you would bee fully satisfied of my resolution, so lawfully grounded. I did beleue that I should not bee blamed by your Maieftie, or any other; if at this age (hauing giuen the best part of my life vnto the publike) I desired to goe and end it in peace, and to enioy part of that rest, which you haue purchased for your estate. Notwithstanding, Sir, the least of your desires are so deare vnto me, and I am so religious in all the circumstances of my duty, as I had not vnderaken my journey, if the subiect of my stay had not ceased, and the difficulties of the warre of Bohemia quite taken away. But hearing that the Duke of Lorraine had bene aduertised from those Countries, that the affaires were vpon point of reconciliation; and that the ouerture began by a suspension of Armes, I did not thinke that the good of your seruice bound mee to stay any longer in a place, which is in no danger in the time of Peace, and which will reape benefit by the weaknesse of the Empire, if the warre continue. If there be any part in this Estate which is lesse sound B then other, and where the publike tranquillitie hath need to bee more carefully preferred: I assure my selfe that your Maiestie will iudge, it is the Prouince whither I goe: And that seeing it is vnder my charge, I am bound to watch for all which may concerne the quiet thereof, and not to suffer any thing to passe, which may preiudice your authoritie. So as Sir, if now I embrace the occasions, your Maiestie (if you please) will doe mee the honour to consider that herein I disobay not your commandements, but doe expound them according to their true sense, and giue them their best interpretation, being most profitable for your seruice. For in effect, Sir, no man is ignorant, that as the maintenance of your authoritie is the first law of your Estate; so the good of your affaires, is the most important of your commandements: which being absolutely true, C what apparance should there be (if hauing means to preserve a Prouince diuided in will, for your Maiestie; and by my presence to stay them which might bee subiect to alterations, if they were not fortified in their duties) to breake off a necessarie voyage, I should propound to my selfe so weak and remote considerations as those of the warre of Bohemia. I am not, Sir, of that age that I should feede my selfe with vanities; neither doe I thinke that your Maiestie doth regard me so slightly, as you will make no other vse of my seruice, then to see your pocketes safely conueyed from Germany. Nor doe I hold my selfe so vnprofitable as I must be forced to doe you and your Estate seruices of so small consequence. I humbly beseech your Maiestie to iudge fauourably, and to doe me the honour to beleuee that wherofeuer I am, (notwithstanding the bad vltage D I haue receiued for these twenty moneths) there is not any man liuing, that can corrupt me; nor any powerfull necessitie alter me, but will alwayes be your most humble, most obedient, faithfull, and affectionate seruant, Lo: Lewis de la Vallée. The Duke of

was going out of Metz.

The Duke continued on his journey to recouer Angoulême, by the Country of Lymosin. It was written to Court, that going from Metz, hee would see all his troope that should accompanie him in this voyage, goe out of the gates before him: that hee came last, and that the gates were shut vpon him. That hauing viewed his companie, and finding them all to bee well mounted and armed, he said, I goe to vndertake the boldest enterprise that euer I made. They thought in Court that his meaning was concerning his going from Metz, contrary to the Kings expresse commandement (which indeed was verie bold:) but afterwards they found, that his meaning was, by the assistance which he gaue vnto the Queene to conduct her from Blois to Angoulême.

The Duke of Espemou
knows the Queenes departure from Blois.

The King and the whole Court was gone in the beginning of Lent to Saint Germain in Lay, but he stayed not long; for on the three and twentieth of Februarie, a Nobleman brought him Newes that the Queene his Mother was gone from the Castle of Blois, vpon the one and twentieth, at night: That she had past by Mont Richard, whete the Archbishop of Thoulouſe met her with twenty horse; and a little beyond, the Duke of Espemou attended her with a great troope, and conducted her to Loches. These newes were the subiect of the Kings speedie returne to Paris, where hee receiued this Letter from the Queene his Mother.

The queens

My Lord, my sonne, I haue suffered my honour and libertie to bee long oppressed, and haue endured strong apprehensions of my life; and that which was most sensible vnto me, was the priuation of your sight. All which hath bene done, being in some fort countenanced by your name: with the like patience would I haue attended the future, without search for mine owne particular, whether your will were well or ill aduised, but being informed to my great griefe, of the apparant danger of your affaires, if it were not soone

A soone made knowne vnto you, I resolved to put my selfe into some sure place, where being free, I might let you vnderstand that which was impossible for me, being in the power of those which hide it from you, as some of the greatest of your Kingdome and abroad, haue with a thousand protestations counſelled me to doe. To this end I haue hazarded a perillous departure, and haue entreated my Cousin the Duke of Espemou, to retire me to Angoulême, whither I goe in regard of the certaine knowledge I haue of his fidelity and affection to your seruice, and by that which your father of happy memory my Lord and Husband gaue me, commanding me to rely wholly vpon his integrity and wisdom, in your most important affaires; and for mine owne particular, if they could bee diuided B from yours: which hauing done for your good, and to moue you to preuent the inconveniences which might trouble you, I assure my selfe that you will allow of my resolution, and be well pleased that I invite you therunto, by the most tender affections of a good mother, and by the trueſt duties a faithfull seruant can doe you; assuring you that you shall doe much for your selfe, and shall greatly binde me, if you giue the means and manner which it shall please you I shall hold to acquaint you therewith, without hatred or ambition: to the end I may see your reigne happy, and your Realme in peace; and that it may bee knowne, that I neither haue had, haue, or will haue hereafter any other end but your seruice: for the which I will not only forget all my discontents, but will willingly sacrifice my liberty and life, when the good counsell you should haue, or your selfe shall C hold it profitable. Delay will breed impossibility in the remedies, the which are now easie, safe, and honorable, as I will let you vnderstand with all sincerity and respect, and with protestation neuer to affect any authoritie in the conduct of your affaires: for as I deal therein with much paine and danger during your tender age, being therunto bound, so now I pretend no other part but the glorie to see them managed by your selfe, with the dignity and authority which is due vnto you, and to reioyce (as I would I now could) hearing every man content with your reigne, proclaime your vertues and your prayſes, in what place it pleased you I should end the remainder of my dayes: Praying God, as I doe continually, with the most passionate feeling of my soule for your prosperity, and of your whole Realme, being your most humble and affectionate mother and seruant, Mary. D From Loches the 23 of February.

The Duke of Espemou in like manner the same day, and from the sayd place wrote this following Letter to the King.

Sir, presently after my coming to this Towne, I receiued commandement from the Queene your Maiesties Mother, to receiue her here, and then to conduct her to Angoulême, wherewith I thinke she hath acquainted your Maiesty by her Letters, and with the subiect of her resolution: the which I thought I could not refuse, without failing much in my duty to your Maiesty and her; humbly beseeching you to beleuee, that as I haue neuer failed (notwithstanding any bad vltage) in my seruice to the King your Predecessor and your Maiesty, so I would not beginne at this age to make a breach in my duty, defining rather to die a thousand deaths, then to doe any thing contrary to the fidelity of my long seruices, and which might giue your Maiesty iust cause to doubt mee, as I hope to E witnesse by good effects, in all occasions which shall be offered, to be your most humble and obedient subiect and affectionate seruant, Lo: Lewis de la Vallée.

There was no answer made to this Letter: but to the Queene Mothers the King wrote this Letter with his owne hand.

Madam, I was at Saint Germaines with a resolution to see you within few dayes, when as three Postes brought me newes, that the Duke of Espemou had caried you from Blois, having first perswaded you to leaue that place, vpon pretext that you could not continue there in safety. This action seemed so extraordinary and strange vnto me, as I could hardly F ly beleuee it: For whether that I consider the quality of your person, or the condition of the time, you will confesse that there is no kind of discontent for the which I should bee lesse prepared, not thinking that there should be any man whatsoeuer, who in a full peace should presume, I will not say to execute, but to conceiue a resolution to attempt vpon the liberty of his Kings Mother; but God who is the iust protector of Kings, and doth assist me visibly in all my designs, will giue me the grace to punish this injury so powerfully, as the mischief shall fall vpon those which couer themselves with your name, and seeke their aduantages in the ruine of my subiects, and the blisfull of my authority. Wherunto the Prince made this Anſwer.

Madam, it was a great content to prepare my ſelfe, to accompany the King my Lord,
 " in his reſolued voyage to Blois to viſit your Maieſty; hoping to doe my duty vnto you,
 " and promiſing to my ſelfe that the interview of your Maieſties, ſeeling a perfect vnion (as " he hath obſerued all ſignes of good diſpoſition) I ſhould haue better meanes to reſiſte my

 " But the more I ioied in the expectation of this happineſſe, the more I was grieved to be " frustrated thereof by your Maieſties ſudden departure, the which was the more ſenſible,
 " for that I ſaw by your Letters you tooke an occaſion to retire, thinking you were not ſafe,
 " and that you could not freely acquaint the King with the diſorders which you conceived

 " keene your Maieſties readie to be ſtrictly vnited, haue giuen you theſe impreſſions, hoping
 " C to profit by your diuiſion, and the troubles which they thought to bring vnto the State.
 " For it is moſt certaine, and I can iuſtifie it, that there is no kind of libertie but your Ma-
 " ieſty might haue enioyed at Blois. And that nothing could be added to the tender fe" elings and true affection which the King beares you, nor to the conduct of his publicke and
 " priuate actions, all which are anſwerable to the great reputation which he hath gotten, and
 " the generall eſteeme is made of his vertue and generoſitie. Whereof (beſides the effects

Souldiers without his commission, and to set vpon all those which should attempt the contrary; concerning that those which had giuen this counsell for her departure, had bad designs, and would not faile to make vse of this occasion, and of her name, to seeke their owne aduantages, and to trouble the publicke peace.

At the same time the King wrote particularly to the Marshall of Bouillon being at Sedan, and sent vnto him the Seigneur of La Chesnaye to haue his aduice touching the Queene's departure: to whom he made this Answer.

Your Maiestie commands me to giue my aduice touching these occurrents of the Queene's departure. In obeying I cannot be taxed with presumption, but well of ignorance, for the small iudgement I haue in affaires. My affection to your seruice, and the fidelitie to the King.

I owe you, shall, if it please your Maiestie supplie the rest. The Queene your mothers departure hath giuen much discontent to all good Frenchmen, to see an alteration in the common and naturall intelligence which should be perpetuall betwixt your Maiesties. But as this displeasure is very sensible, so is it somewhat mollified by the assurance they haue that both by the law of God and Nature, your Maiesties cannot continue diuided in affection: You, Sir, of a good King and a good Sonne; she not onely of a Mother, but of a most humble Subject. Your Maiestie might see by the Letters which she wrote from Loches, that two passions, as the faith, made her goe from Blois with danger. First, the knowledge the hath of many things which concerne your Maiestie: and secondly, the fear of her life, submitting to your choice and will, the means she shal hold to acquaint you therewith: Herewith your Maiestie shal be without constraint, iudge of her actions. That taking those counsels which shall be profitable for your affaires, you may reiect the rest. Sir, France more then any other Realme hath bene crossed with the like sudden accidents, and much more violent: but they haue bene suddenly repaired without armes, which are alwaies hurtfull to an Estate. Thus, Sir, by a royall hand, powerfull, iust, and milde, your Maiestie shal reape profit hereby, and consider what is defectiue to an assured tranquillitie, in which your authority may be preferred, the lawes of the Realme maintained, your Edicts of pacification entertained, the breaches repaired, the ialousies of your subjects taken away, and your fauours and honors imparted to the qualitie and merit of such as your Maiestie shal make choice of. Thus, Sir, you shall enjoy an immortal glorie, and your Realme an assured felicitie. I cannot thinke that any man will aduise your Maiestie to take armes, but such as aime at a dissipation, and to equall their obedience to the equality which they shall finde in the sword, which is a detestable intention: they shall haue Heauen for their Iudge, and shall receiue their punishment on Earth. In like manner, they which offer their seruice to haue wherewithall to deserue, whereof there are manie. Sir, heare the Queene your mother, by faithfull and sufficient men; heare the common desires of your Estate, and giue that which shall bee fitting: in doing so, if there bee any which vnder goodly shewes haue bad intentions, they will discouer themselves, and serue to shew your power and iustice in punishing them. Wherein, Sir, you shall bee serued by your good subjects as they are bound. For my part, who haue little remaining of life, and lesse of health, I will bring all that is in me or mine, without excuse, to serue and settle your authority with an assured peace, and to runne with all my Forces and a perfect obedience to your commandements, vpon those which shall presume to make any opposition: The number of which will be small, if there bee any, seeing nothing in the intentions of the chiefe bodies of the Realme both of the one and the other Religion, but a desire to enjoy peace: thinking (as it is true) that warre would ruine both soules and bodies, and peace giue them a pious and religious vse. I haue dilated of these things more amply with Monsieur de la Chesnaye, whom I humbly beseech your Maiestie to heare, and to hold me your most humble subject and seruant, Henry de la Tour. Sedan, the 4 of March, 1619.

The words in this aduice, That many would offer their seruice to haue wherewithall to deserue, were found very true; for some imagining that a war would be kindled in the four corners of the Realme, came to offer themselves without sending for, but they were dismissed with thanks, for that their inclinations were well knowne. But the wisest and most iudicious spake their mindes plainly, saying, That they that should giue aduice to entertaine these diuisions, were pernicious: that it belonged onely to the King and Queen mother betwixt themselves to pacifie this alteration: and that they which should make themselves all gold by the fauour of Kings, should seeke meanes which might not bee prejudiciall ciall to the publicke. Within few daies after, the King caused a Declaration to be published, forbidding all leaues of souldiers, without Letters of commission signed by one of the Secretaries of State, and vnder the great Scale, with a Warrant annexed thereunto from the Gouernours of Prouinces where they should be raised, or in their absence by his Lieutenants generally, commanding all which were already leaied to disperse themselves and retire vnto their houses: and if any should attempt the contrary, he gaue charge to all Gouernours, Seneschals, Prouosts, and others, to charge them and cut them in pieces, which was strictly obserued in all France, but in some places of base Guienne and Poictou.

In the beginning of Februarie, there happened a difference in the Government of Guienne, betwixt the Duke of Mayen Gouernour, and the Marshall of Roquelaure the Kings Lieutenant in the said Government, vpon diuers subjects; amongst other, for the Castle of Reole, and the Cannon which was therein. This controuersie grew so bitter, as they drew souldiers to them on either side: and the Garrison of the Castle of Reole, which was usually but of nine men, was encreased to the number of 400, which in the beginning bred some amazement in Guienne, especially in the neighbour Townes and Borowes: for the Nobilitie of high Guienne did rather affect the Marshalls partie then the Dukes. The King hauing sent to the Parliament of Bourdeaux to pacifie this quarrel for the good of his seruice and affaires: Two Councillors of the Court were deputed, who went to the Marshall of Roquelaure, who was at Agen, and to the D. of Mayen to Nerac on the 21 of Februarie; and labored so in this businesse, as they reconciled it. The great Garrison of Reole was discharged, and onely the nine morte payes remained. They restored the Artillerie which the D. of Mayen demanded: and the assemblie of the Estates of the Prouince was concluded at Agen; where the Duke and the Marshall met, and entertained one another with all shewes and demonstrations of good intelligence for the Kings seruice: whereof his Maiestie being aduertised, was very well satisfied, for that they spake diuersly touching these alterations in Guienne: and at the same instant the D. sent vnto the King a copie of the Letter which the Queene Mother had sent vnto him: which was as followeth.

Cousin, I had alwaies resolved to haue more patience then I could haue affliction, as long as there was no question but of mine own interest and troubles: for that I would giue no suspicion vnto the King my Lord and Son, that I meant to separate my selfe from his will, although they held him ill aduised: but hauing bene solicited by complaints and generall entreaties, both within and without the Realme, to acquaint the King my Son with the euident danger of his authoritie, and the quiet of his Realme: I made no difficultie to hazard my life by a most perillous issue, that I might let him vnderstand in all firety the passion of a good and faithfull mother; and haue already written vnto him, most humbly beseeching him to prescribe me the forme I should obserue to giue him knowledge thereof. I thought good to impart the same speedily vnto you, for not onely the account which both my selfe and all France haue of you, makes me desire to haue your opinion: but also knowing that the King my Sonne doth much esteeme your counsels, I wish that you would ioine your prayers vnto mine to inuite him to the remedies which I know you vnderstand better then any other, to bee wonderfull necessarie: Coniuring you as much as possibly I may, to be carefull that no alteration may happen, and that euery man may attend from his good disposition that which hee owes vnto his subjects and his Estate. If I had need of witnesses to proue that the desire of the Kings seruice had moued me to these resolutions, wherein I had no consideration of that which concerns my selfe; I would name you the first. And now I sweare vnto you by the confidence which I desire to haue of your magnanimity for so important a businesse, & for the inclination which you know I haue alwaies had to you, that I haue not in my most inward thoughts other feelings then those which the prosperitie of the King my Lord and Son doe suggest. Let vs then labor therein, and you shall finde me for your particular, your good and affectionate Cousin Marie. From Roche Foday the 6 of March.

Mayen's answer.

1619 " your good intentions for the Kings contentment. Madam, I beseech God with all my A " heart to assist you with his holy inspirations, being vnable herein to contribute any other " thing then that which belongs to the duty of an honest man and most faithfull seruant to " the King, and who hath resolved without any other considerations to oblige himselfe only " to the Kings will. Doe mee the honor, Madam, in the meane time to beleuee that I am " your most humble and obedient seruant, de Mayenne. From Bourdeaux the twelfth of " March, 1619.

It was obserued, that the three answers from the King, Prince of Piedmont, and Duke de Mayenne, were all dated on the 12 of March, and that there were 17 dayes past from the writing of the Queens Letter at Loches, and the said 12 of March: the which gaue B the Queene occasion (seeing such preparations of warre) to write foure Letters on the 10 of Murch, that is to say, to the King, the Chancellor, the Keeper of the Seales, and President Jannin. Whereunto the King made no answer, for that hee expected to vnder-stand the Queens intention in answer of that which he had written vnto her: the rest made their severall answers, the which because they are conformable to the Letter which shee sent to the D. of Mayen, I will not trouble the Reader with any repetition.

In this moneth of March, the common talke in Court was variable, one day peace, and another day warre: one day they held it a good signe of peace, that Monsieur de Be- thunes, sent by the King to the Queene mother, had also commission to goe see the D. of Espemnon: and the next day they sayd there would be warre, in regard of the many com- C missions which were sent to the D. of Mayen in Guienne; to the Earle of Rochefoucault, in Poitou; and to the Earle of Schaumburg, in Lymosin: one day they shewed the names of Noblemen, which had assisted at the Queens entry into Angoulesme, who knowing that the King was not well pleased therewith, had retired to their houses, and since had taken armes for his Maiestie: and the next day they saw a lyst of such as had offered their service to the Queene; yea and some after they had leuied their Companies with the Kings Commission. Vpon these preparations made by the King to warre, the D. of Espem-non tooke occasion to extend himselfe to Towne Charente, where hee put a Garrison, to the end he might make himselfe Master of the Riuer of Charente vnto the Sea, and he sent his son the Archbishop of Thoulouse to Loches with diuers troops of horse. This so trou- D bled the inhabitants of Loches with the feare of a siege, as most of them retired to the neighbour Townes. At this day they had need of strong Citadels and Garisons, to force the Townes of France to obey their Governours, whom they see disobedient to the Kings will. In the beginning of April, the inhabitants of Vzerche in Lymosin, and of Bullen vpon the Scain Picardy (whereof the D. of Espemnon is Governour) shewed the effects to his Lieutenants.

Vzerche is a reasonable good Towne betwene high and base Lymosin, vpon the high way to Paris from Thoulouse. It belongs to the Church, the Abbot being Lord of the Towne. The Abbey is vpon a little hill enuironed with a Riuer, where is only a narrow passage which may be easily cut off; so as it is a naturall Citadell, and commands the Towne, and hee that holds this Abbey, is Governour. It was impertinent to repeat how this Abbey fell into the D. of Espemons hands during the last alterations, through the diuision which grew betwene the last Abbot deceased, and the inhabitants: but the Duke being now in quiet possession, he put Capitaine Breuil into the Abbey, with a garison of 24 souldiers. The inhabitants who had beene for that he had bene a great partizan to their deceased Abbot, finding that he had an intent to fortifie the Abbey with 100 men & munition, they resolved to hinder it, to take armes and recouer their liberty vpon this occasion: whereupon they entrenched themselves against the Abbey, and sent to the Earle of Schaumburg, the Kings Lieutenant in Lymosin, entreating him to succour them, who presently marched thither with what friends and troops he could draw together. The D. F of Espemnon on the other side being aduertised that the inhabitants of Vzerche were entrenched against the Abbey, he presently raised a flying Campe of 2000 foot 500 horse, and two peeces of ordnance to relieue the besieged, but they were forced before he came, as you shall heare: and in the meane time the Queene wrote a third Letter vnto the King in these termes.

The Queens " My Lord and Sonne, I will neuer cease humbly to beseech you to receive the sincerity third Letter " of my intentions, and to know that there is no person liuing that can haue more passion sideration of your good and of your Estate, and for the great content I shall receiue to see the inuolable power of your Scepter continue firme. Consider then if you please, whether it be iust, that in stead of receiving my dutie and affection, they make you leaue armes particularly round about me, either to suppress the voice of my faithfull remonstrances, or to overthrow my condition and libertie, which breathes nothing else then your authority and content. If I be so vnfortunate as to haue giuen you such bad impressions of me, as my petitions and libertie are in no esteeme, yet at the least turne your eyes vpon

B the quiet of your people, and the discommodities which the firme and most absolute Monarchies doe oftentimes receiue from warre: And consider that in this occurrent you shall haue no occasion to vse force, being most certaine, then when you shall haue heard what I shall deliuer vnto you, it shall depend of your selfe to apply those remedies which you shall hold most conuenient, and I neither can nor will vse any other meanes then sup-plications and humble remonstrances. Wherefore I coniure you vpon my knees, to free me from the apprehension of present armes, and to take from the malecontents the pretext of making vse of this occasion, and be pleased that I may seeke to preferre Vzerche, seeing that the Earle of Schaumburg is the assailant, as I vnderstand, contrarie to your intention, which is not to alter the quiet estate of your affaires: to the end that hearing that first of all) a law from you, and the order which you shall hold necessary for the good conduct of your affaires, &c. Your most humble and affectionate mother and subiect, Marie.

Angoulesme the 4 of April, 1619.

Whilst that the D. of Espemnon marched to relieue Vzerche, the Queene mother receiued Letters that the inhabitants of the towne of Bullen had done like vnto those of Vzerche, and that the Duke of Espemons Lieutenant had put the higher towne into the Kings hands. This reduction was the subiect of the fourth Letter which the Queen mother wrote vnto the King as followeth.

My Lord and Son, It grieues me extremely to be constrained to beleuee, that my Letters are troublesome vnto you, because I plainly see they preuaile nothing. For hauing besought you many times to giue mee the meanes to let you know (without feare or apprehension) that which I am bound vnto for the good of your seruice and State: I doe not onely see an increase of the appearances of euill, contrarie to that which your goodness made me hope; but by the counsels they giue you, I beginne to see the most pernicious effects in the enterprise which vnder your name hath bene made vpon Vzerche, as I haue already aduertised your Maiestie, and in the other vpon Bullen, which I now heare of with great griefe, it hauing added vnto my affliction so much the more, for being done at such a time as the faire speeches which Monsieur de Bethunes reported vnto me from you, and his presence here, had almost giuen assurance vnto my sinceritie, E and all men hope that I should bee shortly heard in the iust demand of making you to vnderstand (without perill) that which you are in no case to neglect for the enjoying the powerfull continuation of your authority, and to giue to all your good subiects that peaceable tranquillity which they desire. On the contrarie, I plainly perceiue, that they raise warre, and trouble the dignitie of your power, and the publike peace, onely to oppress me; seeing they assaile the places which should serue for my surtie and preferuation, during the time that my misshap and other mens passions constrain me to be out of the protection and assurance of your fauour, finding it very strange, that in stead of giuing me occasion to moderate my feares and distrusts, into which the bad vltage which I receiued at Blois hath made me fall, they haue now mightily augmented the subiect.
F I appaile vnto your good nature and your iustice; and if that suffice not, vnto Gods, against those which are the cause hereof: And in all humilitie coniure you, to hinder this beginning of mischiefe which they procure, from which I might the better shield my selfe, if the respect I beare you did not make mee vse all considerations of not exceeding the termes of the necessitie of a iust defence: In which I will attend to know, if I may haue hope to make you peaceably to vnderstand what I hold is my dutie to performe: And doe pray you to beleuee that I will continue (in seruing you as I should) to make true proofs that I am, my Lord my Sonne, your most humble and most affectionate Mother and subiect, Mary. From A Angoulême this 11 of April, 1619.

The morrow after the King had received this Letter from the Queene his Mother, a Post brought him this following from the Earle of Schomberg.

"Sir, seeing Monsieur D'Espemon within two leagues of Vzerche with his flying army, I resolved to assaile the Abbey, and that did so happily succeed, that giuing the assault in five or six places, we forced the same the twelfth of this moneth. At this exploit there were some of the defendants slaine, and composition giuen to therest which had shut themselves vp in a Tower. I thinke Monsieur D'Espemon was neuer more grieved, for being so neere and not able to helpe it; if he come to assaile it, he shall finde whom to talke vnto. I keepe the field with my friends, which are in all five hundred horse, and will see what the enemy will doe, continuing to yeeld vnto your Maiesty the best seruices which I may. &c. Schomberg.

The Cardinal of Rochefoucault sent to the Queene.

On the tenth of April, the Seigneur de Berulle, Rector of the Fathers of the Oratory, who was employed in the reconciliation of the King with the Queene his mother, arriued at Paris; and having made report vnto his Maiestie what Monsieur de Bethunes had aduanced in the business: the Cardinal of Rochefoucault received commandement to transport himselfe to Angoulême, and to treat in generall of this reconciliation: whereupon he parted presently from Paris with Berulle on the ninth of April.

Vpon the receipt of the *Queene*s last Letter, dated the 11 of April, the King sent her C this answer.

The Kings Letter to the Queene m.
t. &c.

Madam, louing and honoring you as I doe, I cannot be but much grieved to see that all the care I haue employed for your satisfaction proves fruitlesse. You haue both by my Letters and by diuers personages worthy of credit whom I haue sent vnto you, receiued all manner of assurances of the sincerity of my intentions. I haue caused you to be satisfied touching all ielousies and distrusts which they would giue you. Finally, I haue omitted nothing which I thought might content you; and yet, Madam, I finde by your two last Letters, and by aduertisements which I haue from diuers parts, that you wintesse, or rather that they make you to wintesse, to bee lesse satisfied now then at first. The cause hereof I would gladly find out, to the end that if it proceeded from any thing which depended on me, I might suddenly redresse it: But finding nothing about my person which breathes not as much your good as mine owne, I am easily perswaded, that the mischief proceeds from the cunning of such as are about you, who hauing drawne you to the state wherein you are, disguise all things and diuert you from accepting that which is offered you on my behalfe: labouring to engage you more and more into disorders, hoping to raise their fortunes by our losse. If it please you, Madam, to waigh their proceedings, you shall easily iudge of their designs: they counsell you to write and publish, That you haue no stronger passion, then to see my reigne to prosper; nor greater desire, then my peoples rest: That you will not attempt any thing to the prejudice of my authority; but will be the first to receive and obey my will. These are your very words, and as I beleue, your intention. But contrariwise, to trouble the publike peace, and to ruine my Crowne, they haue vnder your name begonne long before your departure from Blois, and since continued, to trouble, corrupt, and stirre vp all they could against me, both within and without my Realme: They haue not onely leauied Souldiers, but seized vpon my Reuenues, imposed vpon my subiects, made enterprises vpon my places; and to omit nothing which might make a breach in my royall authority, they haue brought troops into the field with Cannon to set vpon the Seigneur de Schomberg my Lieutenant generall in Lymosin, who they knew had commandement from me to goe to Vzerche, which depends vpon his charge, to persecute the Religious, and other inhabitants whom they would oppress. Iudge, Madam, I pray you, if the effects be answerable to the words which they make you giue; and whether there be any reason I should allow of them, being not allowable either before God or Men: You haue often condemned farre lesser faults, & I rely so much vpon your judgement, that if you were at liberty you would blame these, and would bee the first which would giue me counsell to suppress them.

As for that which they make you write touching the order I haue giuen for the preferuation of Vzerche and Billen, I know not vpon what ground you should haue any cause to take exception. Euery man knowes that Vzerche was vsurped by the D. of Espemon vpon

A vpon the Church and the inhabitants. That he had put a Garison into it of his owne priuate authority, and against my will: the which hee would haue augmented to molest my subiects, and to hinder the free passage betwene Paris and Thoulouse. As for Billen, the inhabitants seeing, that to make them altogether subiect, he had drawne in many strange souldiers, they opposed themselves, and haue had recourse to me to protect them from this danger: whereupon I haue provided for the safety and perseruacion of these two places. Who can iustly say that I should haue done otherwise, or that you haue reason to say it concerns your safety? they were appointed to another end, neither euer haue you had or shal haue need within my Realm: You shall be alwayes safe & free, where I focuer my power doth extend: And I pray you, Madam, doe not imagine that you shall find in this world a more certaine safety, or more perfect content then in my affection: you cannot finde it elsewhere. I did wonder much, seeing you complaine by your last Letters, that they seek by my Armes to stop your mouth, that I may not heare the aduice you haue to giue mee for the good of my affaires: You know that about three weekes since, I haue (according to your desire) commanded the Seigneur de Bethunes to heare them, and to represent them speedily vnto me, whereof you haue not yet made any mention, notwithstanding all his diligence; which makes me thinke, that what they perswade you to write, is but to giue some colour to the enterprises they make against my seruice. When it shall please you to make declaration, the Cardinal of Rochefoucault and the Seigneur de Bethunes, haue commandement to entreat you thereunto on my behalfe, and to assure you, that I will take such consideration as is fitting, coming from you. I vnderstand that the chiefe practice they vse to hold vs diuided, is to entertaine you daily in ielousies and distrusts, and to that end they disguise all the actions which passe here, yea those which are most to your aduantage. But I call God to wintesse, that there passeth nor any thing which can be preiudiciall vnto you, nor contradiet the honor, respect, and affection which is due vnto you, and which I will haue euery man yeeld vnto you, as my most deare mother.

It is by this name, Madam, and by the cordiall affections of a good Sonne that I conipern you to settle your spirits; stop your cares hereafter to so many bad reports, and such pernicious counsels as they giue you, and suffer not your name to be a cowering to actions like those which they make you practise, being quite contrary to our common good, and that which you say you desire for the greatesse of this Estate, and the maintenance of my authority. The best will be, Madam, if you please, and I entreat you with all my heart, to embrace the offers which haue beene made you in my name, seeing they containe whatsoever you can desire with reason, and tend particularly to confirme betwixt vs a perfect loue, vniuersity, and confidence, which is the end whereunto wee should aime, and the fault shall be yours if we doe not attaine vnto it: for my part, I will neuer stray from it by any of my actions, but will alwayes wintesse that I am your most humble and most obedient sonne, Lewis. Paris the 23 of April, 1619.

E This year in the Spring, the Prince of Conde fell dangerously sicke of an impostume in his bowels, which breaking he voyded the putrid matter by the seage. There was commandement giuen vnto all the Churches to pray for his health, which was performed with great affection, and God restored him: the King sent daily to visit him, and was glad of his recovery. On the eight of April he sent him the skarfe and sword which had beene taken from him when he was first committed, and withall assured him of his loue. His Maiesty commanded they should prepare a Hall for him, whither he might repaire when he went to heare Masse, and that they should suffer him to take the pleasure of hunting. Some hauing spoken maliciously of this sicknesse, were ashamed when as the Princes recovery gaue them the lye, for the false reports they had disperfed amongst the people.

His Maiesty hauing giuen the rendezuousto his Army of Champagne, on the 27 of April, at Virry, the troopes begonne to march, when as suddenly the King was aduertised, that there was some diuision in Metz, betwene the inhabitants of the towne, and the Marquis of La Vallette, whereupon hee caused his horse to aduance towards Metz, but brought no ease to the inhabitants: for that the Marquis hauing drawne in those souldiers which the Duke his father had engaged vpon the Frontiers of Germany, hee made himselfe absolute master of Metz, and disarmed the inhabitants.

During this retreat of the Queene, there were diuers small Discourses published, touching the present estate of France: among the rest there were two, the one was called The Torment of the Courtiers Envy, made in fauour of the Seigneurs of Luyne, by the Kings Proctor at Ville Neufue by Aignon; and the other was styled The Lymosin: who spake thus in his Discourse.

A Discourse
touching the estate of France.

The Queene Mother hath gouerned the State of France seuen yeares during the Kings Minority, the necessity of affaires hath brought in this kind of government, although it agree not with the humour of the French: All things haue past with reasonable good order during her Regency: and this Monarchy is much bound to her wisdom & bounty. It is true, they are parts which are necessary at some season, but not always: for there are some defects whereof her felicity may be accused. All that can bee said if the King hath not bene well serued, is, that there wanted a man. A womans spirit is subtil and inuentiue, but not so fit to gouerne and conduct. If the happinesse of France had produced a man worthy of this charge, it had bene hard to find him without interest. To chuse one which were not aduanced about the rest, no man would haue obeyed him: To take it by authority, and not capable, were the ruine of the Estate. It was then necessary to auoid these inconueniences, that the Queene should haue the government, not for the profit they might expect from her administration, but for the danger which might happen, if it had bene put into any others hands. The person of a sonne, and the quality of a King, could not be in any danger of life or of State, being in the hands of a Mother and Queene.

The King hath already found, and if he may attaine vnto the perfect experience of the government of his Estate, we shall see him iudge of all that hath past for the good of his seruice: amend that which shall be found imperfect, and take away that which the abuse and necessity of the time hath brought in. Such exercises will more fortifie his iudgement, then if he had found all things according to his desire. He will reioyce to see that France had wanted a man, and that hee was the man, which makes himselfe necessary for his affaires, which had need of his presence. The greatest of all the defects which had bene in the Queene mothers government, the King hath repaired of his owne disposition: which were the great aduancements of that obsequant and loothing Galigai. It is true, she had given her too great power, and too good a share in her secrets and counsell: for as for her husband, he was an image cast in mettall, his life and motion wrought not but by the springs of his wiues wit: the Queene Mothers credulity could not thinke that this mans fortune should grow suspect, or that any great conceit should enter into his thoughts. She imagined to vndoe him as easily as she had raised him, but shee was decieued. So was it one of the greatest maruels which was euer seene in France, that a stranger, a man vnknowne, without merit, without authority or friends, destitute of courage, of iudgement, and government, had done all for money: hee had made himselfe great, purchased honours, and had drawne many braue men to his partie; had made warre, assured his affaires, and seled his fortune in such fort, as none but the King could stay his violent course.

The Prince of Conde and the greatest of France ioyned their interest to the common apprehension of this insolent fortune, but they could not oppresse it. He had powerful Commanders, Townes and People, which caried the Kings authority vpon the front of their Armies onely to preferre him. The Armies were ready to ioine; and France had bene vndone by France, if the wisdom of the Commanders had not prevented it: God, who neuer fauours the designe of Armes without a iust occasion of warre, vnder-tooke the vengeance of his Anointed, whose innocency was ill serued by either party: both Armies passed vnder the Wine-press of his wrath, and Death caried away more men by sickness, then the sword had done in the bloodiest Battels which we haue seene. The Duke of Mayen endured a siege, and gave goodly testimonies of his valour and courage, but in the end he had had the worst, without the fall of this Huge Colosse, which had couered France with his shadow from East to West. The shadowes retire at the rising of the Sunne: so this spirit of darknesse vanished at the Kings anger: his life, his fortune, and his memory perished in an instant, and there remains nothing but the name of what hee was at the first.

As

A As Nature suffers nothing void, so a royall brest cannot liue without friendship. The King tooke Monseur de Luyne into his affection from his infancy, and so preferred it, as whilst he liued he had the goodliest fortune of any man liuing: Such great fauours cannot be enioyed without enuy, which made euery man discourse: some in regard of their private interest, others by opinion: so as all the world spake. Hee drew vnto him two of his Brethren, which fortified him greatly, for they were three in one. And to make them more inuincible, hee contracted alliance with Hercules of Rohan, Duke of Montbazon.

Romany in his Torment of Courtiers Envy, continues this discourse, saying; That the condition of all men is subiect to censure, for the Tongue is without respect, it pardons none. That the enuious would renew the fable of Gerion with three bodies, publishing that vnder the three Luyne the whole Estate of France was gouerned, and that they vsurped the absolute authority vnder the Kings name. That they would make the world beleue, that they were strangers and subiects to the Pope, for that they were borne in his County of Aignon; putting in the same ranke the Seigneur of Modena their Vncle, a Gentleman of many good parts, and much esteemed. But admit it were so, said he, for besides that they of Aignon and of the County of Venuffin are reputed for true and naturall Frenchmen; the truth is, that the House of Luyne comes out of Prouence, and that they are issued by the fathers side from the Illustrious Family of Albret, and by the mothers side from the noble House of Saint Paul. Monseur de Luyne Father had bene Knight of the Kings Order, Gouvernor of the Townes and Castles of Beaucaire, Pont S. Esprit, and Baignols, and had a Regiment entertained. The honor which he got during the reign of King Charles the ninth, in that furious combat at Vincennes in the face of the whole Court, is memorable, where hee tooke away the sword, and flue Captaine Pains, who had bene 36 times in the field. This act wonne him much reputation with the House of Bourbon, to whose seruice they haue bene always affected. Henry the great did so loue the father, as hee would be God-father to Monseur de Luyne his eldest son: And for that he was of the Reformed Religion, he made Charles, Cardinall of Bourbon, his Deputy, and Monseur de Belgard Master of his Horse: This Christning was in the Abbey of Saint Denis, in the yeare 1592, and the Cardinall named him Charles.

This great King finding his God-sonnes good disposition and loyalty, hee gaue him to the King his Son, being then Dauphin: That if this young Prince began then to affect him, it was first in obeying his Fathers will: But being aduanced to age, hee hath loved him by election, inuited by his commendable qualities.

The Author of the booke called Lymosin, saith, that looke in what credit Monseur de Luyne is with the King, the Duke of Espernon is with the Queene mother. The Sword and force of armes, said he, must be in the Kings right hand, and good Captaines must be called to Councils both of warre and peace: as warre cannot be made without them, so peace should not be concluded without their presence, seeing they are the true Iudges of times and occasions, to take or lay downe armes, and may discern whether a warre bee iust, or a peace dishonorable. There are martiall men of good capacity, which iudge naturally vpon a true and solid reason. A sound and vpright man hath no better Booke then his vnderstanding, nor surer Author then the experience of the affaires of his profession: after the modell whereof, he settles iudgements approaching to Prophecies.

I will not giue my censure vpon the conscience and merit of the Duke of Espernon, whether hee haue taken any cause of discontent, or that they haue given it him; in regard of the time many things might be spoken: But some few obseruations which I haue made thereupon, shall suffice, the which may well be spoken (although they be not common) seeing they are true.

F To speake of his fortune, it is without president hee himselfe made it, and hath preferred it (against mighty enemies) during the reignes of three great Kings vnto this present, when as it seemes hee hath forgotten himselfe, yet the good esteem the world hath of him, doth much assist him, being hard to beleuee that at this age hee would ruine his childrens fortunes.

This man hath gotten great secrets in the conduct of affaires; hee hath the manner to entertaine many with the opinion of his sufficiency, and opens himselfe to few. I wonder (saith hee) how hee can purchase so many friends, seeing his manner to oblige oblige them doth not engage their hearts. He is haughty and wary in the distribution of his favours: more secke him then doe enjoy him: They which secke are without hope, and they which enjoy him, without content: He that engageth himselfe vnto him, enters into servitude: whosoever is his, doth sooner lose his liberty then winne his friendship: If he doth good to any, he makes him feele it in such sort, as it distastes him: if he hate, hee is irreconcilable: he neither knowes humility nor pardon. These are the conditions of a man who makes account to live without the helpe of any: Norwithstanding, he is followed, as if there be any faction, where the King is not interested, you shall hardly find in France so powerfull a friend as he. He hath of all sorts, great and small: but such as hee calls to his friendship, are commonly active men, and fit for something. He makes a difference of their condition by discretion, to the end there might be no enuy amongst them. Without losing any thing of his gravity, he takes wonderfull paines to keepe them, and yet it appeares not. He visits his friends often by Letters of his owne hand: his Secretaries know not all his affaires. He imparts his secrets with so much retention, as he knowes there is capacity or hope of service in him that vnderstands them: for hee alwayes keeps the best, and neuer delivres the bottom of his thoughts, two being made partakers of the secrets of one thing will neuer judge alike of his intention; for that hee propounds it diversly: yet all his diversities answer to one sense: plurality of advertisements never hinder a resolution, whereas his thoughts have past to the determination of his will. His friends are so charmed, as they desire rather to be blamed by him, then commended by another, such esteeme they make of his judgement. He doth all things without any noyse. If hee hath a quarrel, or be forced to fortifie himselfe against some dangerous enemy, whether it be to surpris him, or to prevent a surpris, his preparations are made in his cabinet. Commonly great mens quarrels cary a great brute; they threaten as farre off; they take time to fortifie themselves with friends, and to winne those which will serve the first commor: But he hath the lyft of his friends in hand, a sheet of paper shewes him his strength when there is occasion to employ them: He doth advertise them in time, then they are ready and know whither to goe: So as in any good action when as they shall thinke him ill accompanied, he will be sooner able to draw together the body of an army, then another shall make a confused assembly of his friends, and all this costs him little, nor doth not incommode him.

The Duke of Espernon hath many good parts, we have seene him practise the vse of them in good and bad fortune. In the time of the deceased King, he had found his Master, and therefore he lived retired, and medled not much with affaires, labouring only for his owne preferuation. Since, he hath made himselfe necessary to the State: yet domesticke discontents did much trouble him, and were the cause of his misfortune. The King being mistier, the Murthall D'Ancres suppressed, and all things changed, he loyned his interest with that of the Queene mother; it may be he had some spleene against the Kings Favourites, and to maintaine himselfe, and to preserve his childrens fortunes. To attaine therunto, he hath fortified himselfe with friends and intelligences, according to his custome, in all the foure corners of France, where hee hath particular Governments.

His greatest Government is that of his particular Governments in Xaintonge, Angoulmois, and Lymosin, which he hath vntied as one Government, and made thereof a Barre (from the Mountaines of Auvergne vnto the mouth of Charente on the Sea) betwene the Governments of Poitou and Berry, and that of Guienne. But Lymoges and Lymosin remaining in these alterations in the Kings obedience, hee possesseth now but Xaintonge and Angoulmois.

As for his second Government, which is the County and Towne of Bullen, vpon the Frontiers of Picardy, and along the Sea side: the affection and love of the people towards the King, hath deprived him thereof, as hath beene sayd. And touching his third Government, which is Metz and the Country about it, which hath for frontier Germany and Lorraine; although the people bee as ill affectioned vnto him as else where, yet the strong Citadell of Metz keeps them in awe; notwithstanding the Kings Army bee neere them, vnder Monseigneur de Nemours command. The tower of Loches, which makes his fourth government, is a strong place, but in the midst of the kingdom on the Frontiers of Tourain, being vpon no important passage of a river.

A river. This is the estate of his foure governments. As for his forces they are for the present foure or five thousand foot, and a thousand, or a thousand and two hundred French horse, besides the strangers which he hath hired, and are in Metz: and this is all, and little against thirtie thousand men which the King can leaue in eight dayes. On the other side, there needs no more then one siege to ruine a mighty Armie: and as an ancient Councillor of State, said: It is sometime necessarie to appeale Fooles & Malecontents which one might easily chastise, lest the wife become fooles, as in a ciuil warre. Thus farre the discourse called the Lymosin.

At length the Cardinal of Rochefoucault, and the Seigneur of Bethunes, being at Angoulême, on the last of Aprill, agreed vpon these Articles following, in the name of the King and Queene Mother.

1. His Maiestie accordeth that the Queene his Mother may dispose of her house, as she shall please, making choice and retaining of what seruants she will.

2. That she may goe and come, and make her abode in what place of the Kingdome she please, and recee the Kings person if she like.

3. That during her life, she shall enjoy all that she hath held by assignation, gift, pension, and gratification, granted vnto her by the deceased King, and by his Maiestie, and that she should be paid the arrearages.

4. That she should freely dispose of all the Charges, Offices, and Benefices, depending C as well of the Demesnes which her Maiesty now enjoyeth, as those which shall be giuen her, conformable to the expeditions which she hath.

5. His Maiestie promisseth to entreat louingly (like vnto his other subiects) all those which haue served and assisted the said Queene, in her retreat from Blois; namely, the Duke of Espernon, and his children.

6. That his Maiestie will suffer them to enjoy all their Charges, Dignities, Offices, and Benefices, and restore them to the Townes, Places, and Castles, without any exception, whereof they haue beene dispossessed since the Queenes retreat. And moreover, that they shall be paid their Pensions, Estates, and appointments.

7. That all such as had beene dismiss by iudgements, or otherwise, from Court or D of the Realme, should be recalled, and all prisoners set at libertie.

8. That all which hath past by reason of the Queenes retreat from Blois, whether it were leauing of men, imposition of money, or any other thing whatsoever, it should be forgotten by his Maiestie without any question.

9. That within two moneths the Queene Mother should be discharged of the money which she was forced to borrow since her retreat.

10. That within sixe weekes, the Kings Declaration should be verified in all the Courts of Parliament, according vnto forme, without any restriction.

The King receiued these Articles on the second of May. Five dayes after he went into Touraine, to be the neerer to Angoulême, for the execution of the Articles, and to E treat of particular busineses. But especially for that hee had long before let the Queene vnderstand, of a desire hee had like vnto Kings his Predecessors to the government of Normandie, and principally King Leuis the eleuenth; who for the nearnesse of this Province to the Capitall Citie of his Realme, would not suffer his owne brother to hold it, although it had been promised him by the Peace concluded in the warre of the Common-wealth. The Queene had beene preferred to this government after the death of the Earle of Soissons, during his Maiesties minority: wherefore the King desired, that she should resigne this Government, and content her selfe with some thing else: the which was amiably compounded by an accord, to giue her the Governments of the Castles of Angiers and Chynon, with some other places.

F After this they began to disarme on either side, and the King wrote his Letter vnto the Court of Parliament of Paris, concerning this reconciliation betwene him and his Mother, and the conclusion of the peace. On the seuenth of Iune, the Duke of Espernon wrote this following Letter vnto the King.

Sir, if I haue beene so vnfortunate, that your Maiestie hath conceiued any bad opinion of my intentions before that you were truly informed, I thinke that I haue since to iustificed them by my proceedings, as there cannot remaine any sinister impression. The Queen your Mother hauing done me the honour to employ me in an occasion which she held held important for the good of your Estate, I dare boldly say, that the conduct I have used hath been such, as without any remembrance of mine owne feelings, or any resolutions which might haue apparently succeeded, I haue contented my selfe to let all France know, that I respect your authoritie euen among mine enemies. By this means, Sir, I thinke I haue cleared my actions to your Maiestie, as you should rest satisfied, and haue giuen you cause to know that as a naturall defence, neuer wants a lawfull excuse: so ciuill warre could haue no iust cause. Now that it hath pleased your Maiestie by a Christian-like action, to adde that which seemed to want in the felicity of your reign to settle a peace in your estate: All your good subjects are bound to haue the more confidence in your word; for that it is at this day the foundation, whereon all Christen dome relies; and that being giuen to the Queene your Maiesties mother; besides that God, Nature, your Conscience, and reputation doth warrant it, vpon this holy and inioinable assurance, haue giuen my interest to the good of your seruice, and taken all good Frenchmen to witnesse, that I haue maintained my fidelitie without reproach in all the troubles of your Estate; I assure my selfe that your Maiestie is so iust, as you will suffer me to passe the remainder of my age with some content; and that you will hold my long seruices worthy of your remembrance. I haue little to liue, and I should thinke I had liued too long, if I should feele my selfe culpable of a thought contrarie to the obedience which I owe your Maiestie. I humbly beseech you to consider, that desiring nothing in this world but a little rest for the end of my labours, and an honorable death, for your seruice, I thinke to deferre that which I desire, which is to die in the end content, so as your Maiestie will doe me the honour to beleeue that I haue neuer bene other then your Maiesties most humble and obedient subject and seruant, De La Pallette.

After this, the King caused a Declaration of his will to be verified in Parliament on the twentieth of Iune, concerning the Queenes departure from the Castle of Blois, and the execution of the Articles of the Treatie concluded at Angouleme.

The reduction of Conquer-
neau.

The King being at Tours in the beginning of Iuly, having receiued many aduertisements touching the carriage of the Seigneur of Lezonnet, Gouverneur of Conquerneau, tending to disobedience and bad designs. He resolved to take from him this place, lying vpon the Sea, importing much, by reason of the strength of the situation. To this end he sent to the Duke of Vendosme, being in his government of Britanie, and made him General of an Armie, the which consisted of three hundred of his men at Armes, three hundred Swisses, and some Cannon, which went downe the River of Loire, and were conducted by Sen. Sixscore Souldiers drawne out of the guards; which were sent to conduct La Besne, one of the Captaines of his Maiesties guards, and some companies of the Regiments of Picardie, Nuaire, and Beaumont.

This Captaine made such speed, as in nine dayes hee came to Quimperleg, within six leagues of the place, having marched in feue and fifty leagues in Britanie.

The Duke hearing of his diligence, commanded him to attend him there, and in the meane time to take vp all the Shouels and Pickaxes he could finde in the Towne. The Duke being ariued, he commanded La Besne to march away the next day, who came to Conquerneau, and lodged himselfe neere vnto the end of the bridge.

At the same instant the Duke of Vendosme, and the Marshall of Brisac ariued, sending to summon them of the Towne to yeeld it vnto the King. They demanded fiftene dayes respite, to aduertise their Gouverneur, (who was gone forth two dayes before to seeke for succours.) They made answer vnto them, they should not haue one dayes respite. Whereupon the truce was broken, and they all retired.

The Duke of Vendosme, gaue charge to La Besne to desire to speake with L'Hospital, Sergeant Maior in the towne, and to perswade him to seize vpon Querchesne, who commanded in the Gouvernors absence, and deliuer him with the town the next morning, else they should all die. This being done, the Souldiers made answer that if Querchesne were comprehended in the Capitulation, they would defend themselves so well, as they would ruine the Kings Armie. To whom La Besne replied, Souldiers, you that speake so boldly, there is but one meanes to saue you, in seizing vpon them which play the mutines with the hazard of your liues, the which you will lose ignominiously, for you will be all hang'd.

Hercupon they retired on either side: yet early in the morning the Souldiers desired to

A to speake with La Courbe Hiré Captaine of the Duke of Vendosmes guard: the which La Besne refused, he being there present and a Captaine of the Kings Guard. Then they sent vnto him to excuse them, and to tell him that they had a great desire to parley, touching their capitulation. A truce being made, hee went to the end of the bridge, where the Sergeant Maior, and Querchesne intreated him to be a meanes that he might be comprehended in the Capitulation. La Besne answered them, that when La Courbe came, they would both intreat the Duke, but he feared it would not be granted: and therefore their best expedient was to yeeld the place presently. The Souldiers told them that they were the Kings seruants, and that they would willingly yeeld: which Querchesne vnderstanding, he said, he would stabbe them all, and himselfe afterwards, if they had not a good composition.

La Besne aduertised the Duke of the parley, and Captaine La Courbe came vnto him; who hearing how matters had past, went presently to the Bridge, perswading the Souldiers to seize vpon Querchesne, which they did presently, and disarmed him, saying, wee will binde him, and bring him to you. The which La Besne vnderstanding, he ranne to the trenches, and brought forth his company in good order towards the Draw-bridge, where he met with La Courbe, to whom the souldiers had deliuered Querchesne, of whom La Besne seized, saying, that the Prisoner belonged to him, as commanding the Kings guard, and having besieged the place.

Querchesne

La Courbe.

C Presently after this, they deliuered the Keyes of Conquerneau vnto La Courbe, which La Besne in like manner challenged: but in the end they agreed that La Courbe should present them vnto the Duke in both their names. But in the meane time, La Besne got into the towne, and disarmed his souldiers, keeping his men in bartell two houres, attending the Dukes pleasure: who being ariued with the Marshall Brisac, their meaning was to capitulate with them. But La Besne assured them that he had surprized the Towne & Fort two houres before, and disarmed the Souldiers. The Marshall hearing him, told the Duke that La Besne had done his duty in seizing of the place after that manner. Whereupon Querchesne was presently condemned and hanged before the Bridge. The Souldiers were sent away naked without their Cloakes, and whire sticks in their hands: yet they were conducted three leagues, lest the Country people should haue slain vpon them.

The Keyes of
deliuered,

In Iuly and August the King had sent many men of quality to the Queene mother, to summon her for an enterview, and to tell her that her presence was necessary at Court, for the quiet of the State. The Prince of Piedmont, having a great desire to see the Queene before his returne into Sauoy being her sonne in law by his marriage with the Lady Christien, the King was very well pleased he should go to Angouleme, with Prince Thomas his brother, the which they did with a goodly traine of Noblemen. The Duke of Espernon receiued them with a state befitting their greatness: and the Queene held the marriage of her daughter with this Prince, for a speciall fauour from heaven. The Queen Mother (although they represented vnto her some difficulties, to diuert her from going to the King) told the Prince of Piedmont, that he might assure his Maiesty, that her desire was to approach neere vnto his person, to yeeld him and the State all manner of seruice: whereof he assured the King at his returne. But whether it were by reason of some indisposition, or for some distrust (as some supposed) the King seeing her stay, and desiring to haue the content to see her, he sent this letter by the Duke of Montbazon.

Madam, the perfect vnion which I desire to consume betwixt vs (being one of the worthiest and most commendable effects which a good inclination can produce) I will by all the meanes I can let you see how much I affect it. Madam, you know the persons whom I haue imployed to this end. I now send vnto you my cousin the Duke of Montbazon, whom I loue as much as any other, and the esteeme which you haue alwaies had of him makes me thinke, that you will giue more credit vnto that which hee shall deliuer vnto you on my behalfe, then to any other. Hee will assure you, that I desire not onely a good correspondency with you, but that you should come and take your place in my Court with full confidence as you haue in my heart: you may stay as long as you please, and not depart vnlesse you like: it is the meanes to liue together in amity. Seeing then Madam, that you know my intentions, and that you see them intirely disposed vnto all which you desired, I beseech you to repaire hither so soone as you may, to giue mee the contentment, that we may reture together to Paris: for I would not willingly leaue this Country

Letter to the Queen Mother

1619 "Country, (where I have so long stayed vpon your occasion) without you. I will attend A
"your resolution, and will remaine your most humble and obedient sonne Lewis, From "Amboise the 17 of Iuly, 1619.

The Queene Mother hauing receiued this Letter, gaue the Duke such assurance of her resolution, as he told his Maiestie that without any further delay shee disposed her selfe to come to Tours. Whereupon Monsieur de Brent, brother to Monsieur de Luyne was sent with some troopes of light-horse to attend the Queene in her voyage; who hauing conducted her to Poitiers, came to assure the King, that she would be at Tours by the 5 of September.

At this newes the whole Court prepared for her reception, as for a great feast long desired. Some great Personages which had accompanied the Queene from Angoulême to Poitiers, tooke their leaues, and returned to their houses, which made many thinke that all ielousies were suppressed.

The King sent Monsieur le Grand with many Noblemen to meet the Queene at Chastellerault, and himselfe with his Queene and the whole Nobilitie and Ladies, went two stellers out of Tours to receiue her. At their first meeting, there were vnspokeable demonstrations of ioy, and content on either side. They write that the Queene Mother approaching neere the King, said, My Lord, my Sonne, you are growne tall since I saw you. To whom the King answered, Madame, I am growne to doe you seruice. The Court stayed some dayes at Tours, when as the Queene desired to goe to Angiers to see her new government, where they made preparation to receiue her with great state, and in the meane time she retired to Chynon: And the King taking leaue of his Mother, went to Paris, where he entred not for feare of the Plague, but went directly to Compeigne, where they began to speake of the Prince of Conde's deliuerie.

On the three and twentieth of May past: The King had granted a Brieffe to them of the reformed Religion, to hold a generall assembly in the towne of Loudun: where being met, the Viscount of Turenne, second sonne to the Marshall of Bouillon, passing that way with his Mother, told them that his father would bee alwayes enclined to the good of the Churches, and would willingly embrace their resolutions. Within few dayes after they were assembled, they sent the Marquis of Mouffay, with some other Deputies with seven Articles vnto the King.

1, Touching the reuocation of the Edict for the Church-lands in Berne. 2, Concerning the continuation of their places of safety. 3, To haue the Gouverneur of Lorraine changed being become a Catholique. 4, To haue two Councillors of the Religion receiued into the Parliament of Paris. 5, To haue a substitute among the Kings learned Councill in the said Parliament. 6, To haue satisfaction touching the businesse of Tartas. 7, And for the burning of the Temple of Bourg. The Deputies had this answer giuen them; That it did ill befit the subiects (who termed themselves so zealous of the Royall authoritie) to treat with their King by speciall Articles; and that they should present all their demands together. Whereupon the Assembly laboured in such sort as their generall propositions were concluded in the beginning of December: with a resolution not to dissolue the assembly, vntill they had a full satisfaction of their demands, and the execution of the same. They were caried to the Court by the Seigneurs of Courelles, of Bouteroue, and Allain, who presented them vnto the King the 20 of December, and in giuing them, the Seigneur of Courelles said vnto his Maiestie:

Sir, we acknowledge it to be an inestimable honour vnto vs, that it pleaseth your Maiestie to giue vs so free access vnto you, to present our requests, and most humble supplications. For although, Sir, it seemes to some that the humble petitions which were presented vnto your Maiestie, for the maintaining of your Edicts, concerne vs alone, yet we may sincerely protest before God, that it is not our owne interest, that so much moues vs, as the desire of the quiet of your estate, and to preserve our selues for the good of your seruice, which will be an excellent meanes to maintaine all your subiects in peace, so much desired of all good men.

About the end of December, the said assembly made an order, touching Catholique Preachers, which should goe to preach in their Townes of safety; forbidding all Gouvernours, Maiors, and Sheriffs, to suffer any Iesuits, or of any other order, to preach being sent by the Bishops of the Diocesse.

A The Kings Proctor generall presented a request to the Parliament of Paris, against the said order. Whereupon there was a Decree made, commanding all Gouvernours and other Officers of the reformed Religion, to receiue all Preachers, were they Iesuits or of any other Order, that should be sent from their Bishops, for the comfort and instruction of Catholikes: forbidding them & all other the Kings subiects, to hinder them in their Sermons, or other spirituall functions, vpon paine to be declared troublers of the publique peace, and guiltie of treason.

Vpon the fourteenth of October, the Queene Mother went from Chynon, to Saurmur, and came to lodge at Pont de Cé, and on the sixteenth she made her ioyfull entry into Angiers. The Marshall of Boisdauphin, the Commander of La Porte, Gouverneur of the Towne and Castle of Angiers, the Marquis of Bellay, the Earle of Montfortau, and the Marquis of Breszé being followed by fifteene hundred Gentlemen well appointed, went to meet her: comming neere the towne, there were 6000 Inhabitants in armes to attend her, where she was receiued with Orations, triumphant Arches, and stately shewes and inuentions: all which I must leaue to the original.

But leauing the Queenes entry into Angiers, wee will obserue the Prince of Conde comming out of the Castle of Bois de Vincennes. The King being come to Compeigne, he resolved to set him at libertie; hauing beene a Prisoner euer since the first of September 1616, whereof he aduertised him by his Letters of the 17 of October. On the nineteenth the King being accompanied by his brother and all the chiefe men in Court, came to Chantilly, from whence he sent Monsieur de Luyne to the Prince, to whom he deliuered this Letter from the King. Cousin, I will not tell you how much I loue you, you see it, I send vnto you my cousin the Duke of Luyne, who knowes the secret of my heart, and will acquaint you therewith at large; and come to mee as speedily as you can, for I attend you with impatience: And in the meane time I will pray vnto God to haue you in his keeping.

At the same instant his guards retired, and he with the Princeesse his wife went to walk into the Parke, where Monsieur de Luyne acquainted him with his Maiesties pleasure: which done, he returned to the Castle. Hee lodged that night at Paris, and returned the next day to Vincennes, from whence he parted with Monsieur de Luyne, Monsieur Cadinet his brother, and many others to goe vnto the King, who had commanded the Duke of Mayenne as great Chamberlaine, to goe and meet him, and to bring him into his Maiesties Cabinet.

At his entrance, the Prince saluting the King, and bending his knee to the ground, King raised him vp, saying; Cousin you are welcome: then retiring themselves apart, they had some conference together: which done, the King commanded him to goe and refresh himselfe; and the next day the King and the Prince, with the whole Court returned to Compeigne, and on the fixe and twentieth of Nouember, there was a Declaration made, touching the Prince of Conde's deliuerie. By which he declared the Prince to bee innocent; of all those things which had beene imposed vpon him, and wherewith they had charged his honour and reputation, and had made a pretext to haue him committed: reuoking all Letters, Declarations, Edicts, Decrees, Sentences, and Iudgements, made against his said Cousin, which might any wayes preiudice him; commanding them to bee taken out of all the Registers of his Courts of Parliaments, and other places, and that the memory thereof might bee suppressed. His pleasure also was, That the Prince should enioy all his charges, and governments, rights, prerogatives and preheminences appertaining to his qualitie, as hee did before his detention and arrest.

The King hauing a desire, to take away all the ielousies which of late yeares had bin F betweene the Gouverneur of Picardy, and the Gouvernours and Capitaines of the Cittadell of Amiens; and to assure the peace and quiet of that Prouince, he made these changes following.

The Duke of Longueuille, who was Gouverneur of Picardie, and Capitaine of the Castle of Han: Leauing those places, was made Gouverneur of Normandie, and of the towne of Decepe.

And the Duke of Montbazon, who was Lieutenant generall for the King in Picardie, and Gouverneur of the Towne and Cittadell of Amiens, hauing resigned those charges:

1620 said Order, held on the 5 of December last past at S. Germaine in Lay. On New-yeares A Eve, after dinner, the King & the ancient Knights of the order, with the Knights which were to bee created, came to the President Segniers house, neere the Augullins, from whence about three of the clocke, they went to the Augullins Church to Eueu-long.

First, the Archers of the great Prouost, led by his Lieutenants, the hundred Swissers of the Guard, the Kings Trumpets, Fifes, and Drummes, cloathed in his Maiesties Liuerie of blue Veluet, marched before those Knights which were to be receiued, who went two and two together; the hindmost of which was the Kings brother, and before him the yong Earle of Soissons. There were five Prelates named to bee associates to the Order, which were the Cardinall of Retz; the Archbishop of Tours; the Bishop of Carcassonne, B the Bishop of Orleans; and the Bishop of Marfeilles. There were 59 Knights receiued at this creation, being the fiftenth after the first institution.

The Deputies of the Assembly of the reformed Religion at Loudun, had presented the Articles of their grieuances in the end of the last yeare, and had demanded the execution thereof, before they should disloue their assembly: the which was contrary to the Kings permission; according to the which, having drawne their complaints, they should name fixe Deputies, whereof the King should chooe two, to reside in Court to sollicite an answer to their grieuances, and to haue a care to the execution of that which should be decreed in his Maiesties Council.

The King seeing that they continued in their resolution, and would not name their C Agents, he sent Monsieur du Mayen a Councillor of State, and Marscot, who coming into the Assembly on the tenth of Ianuary, Du Mayen said vnto them: My Masters you haue scene by the Kings Letters, the Commission here giuen vs, to acquaint you with his good intentions, and to deliuer you his commandments, vpon the occurrents of this assembly. I will deliuer these two points briefly: and I assure my selfe, that you will giue Io fauourable a hearing to the one; as the other shall be followed with a speedy obedience: seeing it is a father which speak vnto his children; the Master to his good seruants, and the King to his naturall subiects; who protest that they breathe nothing but the reformation of the Church and Religion. I will first tell you my masters, that the King hath commanded vs to assure you that his intention is, to make you enioy fully, D and peaceably, whatsoever hath bene granted by the Edicts of Kings his Predecesssors, and his Maiestic. To this end he hath bene pleased you should set downe your grieuances in generall, hath receiued them fauourably (notwithstanding that you have presented them before your separation, contrary to the accustomed forme) and promiseth you to make them labour seriously about the answer, and within one moneth, to let you haue the execution.

Touching the second point, he said, The King had commanded them to let the assembly vnderstand; that seeing he had their demands and grieuances, and they his promises to receiue all fauour and iustice; the long subsistence of the Assembly, could not bee pleasing vnto him, being not onely vnprofitable, but also preiudiciall to his authoritie, E and might rather cause scandall, then edifie his subiects. That hee could not allow of the reason they gaue, saying, that they would onely attend the answers and executions of their demands: nor yet the reiterated supplications they might make: for that it seemes they would extort that which they must attend from his mere grace and bounty, or participate with him in the bond which his subiects of the reformed Religion owe him, for the graces, fauour, and iustice which they shall receiue. Wherefore his Maiestic hath giuen vs in charge to command you expressly from him, to proceed forthwith to the nomination of fixe Deputies; of which (according to the custome) we will make choice oftwo to remaine in Court: And to separate yourselves within fiftene dayes at the farthest, beginning at this present tenth of Ianuary, and euery man to returne into the P rouince from whence he was deputed, to carry his promises to all his good subiects of the reformed Religion, with assurance they should be speedily followed with all the desired and iust effects they can hope from their good King.

The Assembly gaue them no other answer, but that they must reiterate their most humble supplications vnto the King, to whom they sent their Deputies: whereof they presently aduertised all their Churches of what had past touching this subiect: complaining that the execution of promises made to them of the reformed Religion

at Loudun, where they were choise Deputies.

A ligation, was the cause of the subsistence of their assembly. That King Henry the Great had allowed the continuance of their assembly at Saumur, in the yeare 1598. That the question was to repaire the Edict of Nantes. That there was no touch of the Kings authoritie: the question being onely to doe iustice to his subiects assembled. And that the resolution of the assembly was, not to separate themselves before that all which concerned the iustice of their complaints were executed.

The Deputies came vnto his Maiestic with Letters, protesting their humble submission and seruice; and shewing how necessarie it was, for the reformed Religion to haue strong Townes for their safety. But they had no other answer, but that they must obey his Maiesties will, whereof he had acquainted them by du Mayen and Marscot.

Soone after, there was a Declaration verified in Parliament against them of the Assembly at Loudun. By the which he declared them guilty of treason, if they did not separate themselves within the prefixed time, which was three weekes; during which they should name their Deputies to reside in Court.

After which (they not obeying) he declared the assembly vnlawfull, and contrary to his authoritie and seruice. This Declaration made many of both religions apprehend some new alterations. They saw that the iusalouies of such as had taken Armes the yeare before, increased. Some great men of the reformed Religion (as is mentioned in the Declaration) all affected to the State, made visits for the continuance of the said distrusts, in those places whither they could not goe without giuing the King cause to suspect that they had some bad intent; as it appeared afterwards by the effects.

At this time, the Marshall Desdiguieres came to Paris, and was receiued Duke and Peere of France in Parliament, Monsieur de Chastillon was also there. These two being of the Religion, began to deale in this businesse. The King was well pleased therewith, and gaue charge to the Prince of Conde and Duke of Luynes to treat with them.

Having heard the Deputies of the Assembly, and scene their complaints, they found that they consisted vpon three chiefe points. First, in the reception of two Councillors in the Parliament of Paris. Secondly, to put a Gouernor of the Religion into L'Estore: D and thirdly, to haue a Briefe for the continuance of places of safety. Of which three points the Prince of Conde and Duke of Luynes promised verbally, that they of the Religion should haue all satisfaction and content within fixe monthes.

And touching the restitution of the Clergie goods in Bearne, That within one moneth after the expiration of the said fixe monthes, his Maiestic would heare the remonstrances of the reformed Churches of Bearne.

The Prince and Luynes, gaue their words in the Kings name, for the execution of these promises: conditionally that the assembly should proceed speedily to the nomination of fixe persons, whereof his Maiestic should chooe two to bee generall Deputies for the reformed Churches in Court: after which choise the said Assembly should separate themselves. The Duke of D'Eldiguieres, and Earle of Chastillon, having aduertised the assembly of the conditions of this Treatie, they returned them answer that they were well satisfied therewith.

The Assembly named fixe persons, whereof the King made choise of two. There remained nothing now, but for the Assembly to disloue it selfe. They desired to haue in writing that the three Articles promised, should be effected within fixe monthes; and for want thereof, it should be lawfull for them by the same writing to assemble themselves again (without any new permission) touching the inexecution of the said promises, Monsieur de Pleisis Moray, had commandement from the King by the Duke of Montbazou, to assure the Assembly at Loudun, that what had been promised them, should be kept F and effected. Vpon their reiterated demand to haue the permission in writing to assemble againe within fixe monthes, if the three Articles were not executed, Monsieur de Luynes told them, that they should not haue any thing in writing; but he promised to doe all his endeavour with his Maiestic for the permission, in case those things promised were not executed. Hereupon Monsieur de Pleisis sent vnto the Assembly, representing vnto them of what weight the Kings word should be. Whereupon the assembly dissolued, and they returned into their Provinces.

The King sends Ambassadors
into Germany.

Ambassador for the Emperour, to assist him in his warres; He resolved rather to procure a Peace, and to reconcile the troubles of Germanie, then to adde matter which might maintaine the warre. Whereupon he made choice of the Duke of Angouleme, and others (as wee haue formerly said) to goe both to the Protestant Princes and States, which were ancient Allies to the Crowne of France, and to the Emperour. To exhort both the one and the other party, not to enter into warre one against another, as it seemed they were inclined, and that they should onely giue succours to the Emperour, or the Bohemians, according to their affections, and that within the Realme of Bohemia and Austria, where the warre was, and no where else. And secondly, to mediate some accord betweene the Emperour, and the Estates of Bohemia, who had chosen the Elector Palatine for their King.

Dispute about holding the Towell to his
King.

About this time there were promyses of future mariages betweene the yong Lady of Bourbon, daughter to the Prince of Conde, and the Prince of Guisille; eldest sonne to the Duke of Guise: and the Duke of Ioyeuse, second sonne to the Duke of Guise, with the Duke of Luynes Daughter. There also hapned a dispute about giuing the Towell to the King, betwixt the Prince of Conde, first Prince of the Blood, and the Cont Soissons, a Prince also of the Blood, and Lord Steward of the Kings House; which to appeale, the King sent presently for his brother, who held the same to his Maiestie.

The Prince of Conde, as first Prince of the Blood, maintained that none in France ought to present the Towell to the King before him, except his Maiesties brother. And the Earle of Soissons, as high Steward and Prince of the blood, maintained that his office ioyned with his qualitie of Prince of the Blood, could not giue place to any person but a sonne of France. The friends of both these Princes repaired to their Houses to offer them their seruices.

The Duke of Guise, ioyned himselfe vnto the Prince of Conde. And the Duke of Mayenne (who was already in some difference with the Prince) drew to the Earle of Soissons: so all those which were not in good termes with the said Prince, or the Dukes of Guise or Luynes, cast themselves on this side. On the other side, all such as were discontented with the creation of the Knights of the Holy Ghost, or for that they were not of the number; or who (hauing been named) would not accept thereof, because of the pretensions of their precedencies; and some about the placing of the Ladies (about the Queene) at that Ceremonie: So that (as wee shall see hereafter) the said Earle of Soissons, with many other Princes and Noblemen, retired themselves one after another from the Court, to ioyne their discontents with the jealousies and distrusts which they possessed the Queene Mother withall.

The King sends
for his Sister to come to Court.She excuseth herselfe.

In the meane time the King (being at Fontaine-Beau) sent the Duke of Montbazon to Angiers, to sollicite the Queene Mother, to draw neere vnto him, and come vnto the Court. And vpon the assurance they gaue him shee would come, his Maiesty went to Orleans to meet her, where he received aduice that she could not as yet come, for the reasons which the Controller of her house (whom she would send vnto his Maiesty) should deliuer.

The King being come backe againe to Fontaine-Beau, was aduertised that the Duke of Mayen (whom hee left at Paris) had taken Post and was gone into his Government without any other leave then what hee tooke by this Letter which he wrote from Precigny.

Monsieur de
Mayenne's Letter
to the King.

Sir, I neuer did any thing with more discontent, and vnwillingnesse, then to part from Paris, before I had the honour to receiue your Maiesties commandement. But hauing too long neglected an aduice giuen mee of some designe against my person, it hath been since confirmed by so many, and with so strong assurances, as I was constrained (that I might eschew the mischiefe which threatened mee) to depart thus sodainly. I craue your Maiesties pardon for the same with all sorts of submission, appertaining to a most humble seruant and subiect; beseeching you not to make mee so vnhappy, as to deprive mee of the honour of your gracious fauour in this regard. For in all therest of my actions I finde my selfe so cleare, as I haue more reason to imploie your iustice against such as would slander them, then any need to haue recourse vnto your clemencie. I hope, Sir, that God will giue mee the grace to performe the like hereafter, or better. And I am going into my Government with this firme resolution

A to render vnto your Maiesty all faithfull endeavors, to preserve the reputation (which I hold dearer then my life) to be your Maiesties most humble obedient and faithful subiect and seruant, H. de Lorraine. From Precigny the thirtieth of March, 1620.

Vpon the retreat of the Duke of Mayenne from Court, they assured the King there was a faction framed, and that the Dukes of Vendosme and Longueville were enraged: who iudging themselves not to be safe in Court, the one of them tooke his way towards his government of Normandie; and the other to Anet, from thence to Vendosme, and afterwards to the Queene Mother at Angiers.

Two months time was spent, in diuers voyages to and fro, which the Seigneur of Blainville and other persons on the Kings part, made vnto the Queene Mother at Angiers, to treat with her of the contentment which shee desired; that shee might come to the King, and by this meanes disperse the clouds, which began to appeare in many of the Prouinces, vnder this faire pretext of reformation of the State. But they preuailed little with her at this time by meanes of her distrusts.

In Iune, many Princes and Noblemen retired from Court one after another, which they performed by night. Of the Princes, the Duke of Nemours was the first which beganne, and was followed on the next day by his wife, who went straight towards Angiers. Three dayes after, the Earle of Soissons and the Countesse his Mother, withdrew themselves by night, and went to Dreux, and from thence to the Queene mother. Two daies after, they were followed by the Cheualier of Vendosme, Grand Prior of France. The King had giuen vnto this Prince, (after the Marshall D'Ancre's death) the best of his Benefices and Offices, namely, the Abbey of Marmoutier in Touraine, and the Government of the Towne and Castle of Caen, the best place of Normandy; and of all those which should come to be on the Queenes party: Wherefore he sent thither with all speed, the Seigneur Prudent his Lieutenant, who came vnto the Castle on the first of Iuly to strengthen the place with all which he should hold fit to defend a siege.

All these Princes thus retired from Paris and their associates, they gaue out, that the motive of their leaving the Court, was, because they could not endure (but with greife) the disorder of the State. That they could not impute it vnto the King, but vnto his Fauorites, who being raised from a meane condition, vnto a great and mighty fortune, did wholly enjoy his Maiesties eares and his bounty. That the Queene Mothers partie (as being the most iust) would prooue the strongest; that it was vpheld by the greatest number of the Princes & chiefe Officers of the Crowne: that their designe ought not to be termed rebellion, because all the malecontents were the Kings good seruants, but capital enemies vnto his fauorites; that they would onely settle the State which was almost ruined: That the Queene notwithstanding would not be the first which should arme, but in case they oppressed any of those of her partie, or her allies, that then her defence should be iust, and haue some appearance.

According to the common course in all combustions, many Discourses were dispersed abroad, touching the deformations which they sayd to bee in the State. Some of them were Scurrill: others more milde, which they entituled, Christian verities vnto the most Christian King, words a little more sacred, but to the life effect.

The Queene
Mothers parties.

The King was aduertised from many places, that they leauied Souldiers openly in the Queene mothers name: That in Normandy the Duke of Longueville had a partie, who held Diepe on this side the Riuier of Seine, with purpose to make himselfe sole master of Rouen: That beyond the Riuier of Seine, the great Prior of France held the Castle of Caen: and that the Earle of Torigny, the Duke of Longuevilles alie, was Lieutenant generall in Base Normandy: That the Earle of Soissons holding Dreux and La Fyrt Bernard, would be master of the Country of Perche, and a part of Mayen: That the Governor of Alencon was of their party: That the Marshall of Bois-Dauphin had the passages of the Riuers of Sarre and Mayenne, holding in his possession the Townes of Sablé and Chateaugontier: and the Duke of Vendosme those of the Riuier of Loire. The Queene mother had Angiers and Pont de Cé, a passage vpon Loire, with all the Nobility of the Countrie in a manner, which were of her faction. On the other side of Loire, shee had Chynon vpon the Riuier of Vienne, to walke into Touraine, where Loches held for the Duke of Elspenon. Monsieur de la Tremouille Duke of Tours; and the Duke of Retz were Masters in Poitou, which ioynes vpon Loire, and in Britany opposite on the other side.

[v3]

1620

The Duke of Roannois had his lands lying in the midft of Poitou, for the leauing of A fouldiers. The Duke of Rohan Gouverneur of Saint Iohn D'Angely, was Master in bafe Poitou nere the Sea. The Duke of Epemnon commanded throughout all Angoulmois, and Naintonge, and vpon all the Riuer of Charente: and the Duke of Mayenne in his Gouvernement of Guierneand Bourdeaux. The Viscount of Aubeterre, held Blaye, and the mouth of the Riuer of Gironde. Barbin leauied fouldiers in Liege, to paffe ouer at Metz, which was held by Monf. de la Valette, the Duke of Elpernon's sonne. And the Duke of Nemours had sent Faffeur his Secrerarie, to leauy fouldiers in the Country about Geneua.

This was the estate of the Queene Mothers party, which held many Prouinces, from B Diepe in Normandy, vnto the other side of the Riuer of Garonne, being almost two hundred leagues. A party wherein we see great personages of either Religion, hauing many good Captaines with strong places vpon all the Riuers. A faction which without troubling themselves to besiege Townes, should haue marched directly to Paris with a great Armie, to reforme the abuses which they said were in the State: thinking it so easie, as they held it in a manner done. Many were not of his opinion, who held this enterprize to be like the warre of the Common-weale, vnder the raigne of Lewis the eleuenth, for that there were too many Princes and Generals of Armies, to continue long together without ieaiousies; or to performe any exploit of worth; and that in stead of a reformation, they would breed a deformation in France: yea although the successe should be answerable to their desires: for that they were thus vnitied, onely for their owne private interest.

Deputies sent from the King to the Queene Mother.

The King foreseeing that whatsoeuer hapned, the discommoditie of the warre must fall vpon his estate and subiects, resolved to send an honorable deputation by Du Peron Archbishop of Sens; the Duke Montbazon, Monsieur Belgarde Master of the Horse, and President Jauin to treat with the Queene Mother of the meanes to pacifie these alterations in the breeding; and on the other side to arme strongly, to reduce those by force, which should not yeeld to reason: And to the end there shall bee no stirring in Britanie, he sent the Marshall of Brillac thither. But before their departures, both Monseigneur de Belgard and the Marshall, were receiued Dukes and Peeres of France in Par. D liament.

The Popes Nuncio vnto the Queene Mother.

The Popes Nuncio, desiring to imploy his seruice, and his Holinesse authoritie to reconcile the Queene Mother with the King, he wrote a Letter vnto her, and recommended it vnto the Archbishop of Sens: by the which hee gaue her to vnderstand, how much his Holinesse was grieved, to see their old ieaiousies reuiued, the which were growne to discontent. That he had receiued commandement to doe all good Offices with the King, bestitting a businesse of that importance. That the King had protested, that he had beene alwayes carefull to giue her Maiestie all satisfaction, and that he did not thinke to haue euer failed to yeeld her all due honour and respect. That hee had often inuited her to come vnto him, and to that end had sent diuers times vnto her. In the end he exhorted E the Queene in his Holinesse name, that she would likewise contribute for her part, whatsoeuer might serue to reconcile her to the King her sonne, and to vnitie their wils: coniuering her by all meanes, to auoid the occasions which might bring matters to extremitie and draw them to Armes.

Some write, that the King hauing prayed earnestly to God to inspire him what hee should doe for his glory, and the safety of his Estate, he called a Councell, where he assisted in person; and where many aduertisements were represented from all the Prouinces of a nere rebellion. They first considered of the factions which were in Paris, and the restraint of some of their minds who had places in Soueraigne Courts.

After this, they treated of those of Normandie, and particularly of Rouen, where the first President and almost all the Officers of Soueraigne Courts, were for the Kings seruice; and yet there were many of place and qualitie which did fauour the Duke of Longueuille Gouverneur of Normandie, who was of the Queene Mothers faction. They were also aduertised of many practises made by them of the reformed Religion, whereof there were many in that towne; so as the fire began to kindle, the which they must seeke speedily to quench, & to giue order in like manner for the Castle of Caen, whither the Grand Prior of France had sent Prudent, to fortifie it, and make himselfe Master of the towne.

Some

Two factions in Rouen.

1620

A Some said that they should not suffer that Prouince to bee lost, which was the bafe Court to the Loure: but others considering the estate of affaires, were of opinion, that he should first looke to the preferuation of Paris, before that of Rouen and Caen. That the Kings presence in Paris, would disperse all factions, if there were any: wherefore his stay there was most necessarie; and that there was nothing so dangerous, as to draw his Maiestie out of that great Citie. And that if Normandie were oppress by the factions, they might recouer it at another time. That leauing Paris, it would fauour the designe of those murines: and that all factions which had beene made in France, did commonly come and demand Peace, or make warre about Paris. And that those forces which were leauied in Liege, and which might come from Metz, might suffice to oppress it. They did also represent, that if the King did not enter into Rouen, but would paffe on to assure Caen, vndoubtedly all the other Townes would grow amazed, and the Kings reputation would be blemished, both within and without the Realme. They also spake of the danger wherein the King should be if hee found the forces of Normandie in front, those of Angiers on his side; those of Champaigne at his backe marching towards Paris; and those of Guierne and Aulgoumois vpon the banks of Loire.

His Maiestie hauing heard all these difficulties with attention, he said generously: That amidst so many dangers which presented themselves, they must enter into the greatest and neediest, which was in Normandie: and that his opinion was to goe thither directly, and not to stay in Paris to see his Realme in prey, and his faithfull seruants oppress. That hee had a great hope in the innocencie of his Armes, and that his conscience could not reproach him to haue failed of his duty to the Queene his Mother; of iustice to his people; and of bounty to all the great Personages of his Realme.

The King resolves to goe into Normandie.

The Prince of Conde, and the Duke of Luynes, were the first which did second his Maiesties opinion, saying, that it was more honorable and safer: for that if it pleased God to suffer his first Armes to triumph in this voyage, he should thereby assure the Prouinces and great Townes which had not bene distracted: and strike a terror into those which were reuolted. The rest of his Councell were of the same opinion. It is said the Prince added moreouer, Sir, you must goe vnto them before they assure themselves: it is a point D of victorie, and the most expedient and easie. I haue found it by experience: for if at the alteration of Mezieres, they had come directly vnto vs, before we had considered of our forces, as some had aduised Monf. de Villeroi, without doubt they had easily separated vs.

Hauing in this Councell resolved to warre, they sent out diuers Commissions; to the Marshall of Themines, to oppose himselfe to the Duke of Mayen. The Earle of Rochefoucault, Gouverneur of Poitiers, to make head against the Duke of Rohan. The Marquis of Courtenaut was sent vnto Touraine: And Monseigneur de Bosompierre to fetch the troopes which were vpon the Frontiers of Champaigne, and to conduct them speedily towards Chartres.

All Governours of Prouinces were commanded to returne to their gouernments. So E the Duke of Guise prepared to goe into Prouence, and the Duke of Neuers into Champaigne, with Commission to leauy troopes to oppose against the Liegeois, which were comming for the Queene Mother.

Comming from Councell, the Seigneur of Roulet, great Prouost of Normandie, presenting himselfe vnto his Maiestie, said, That it was not fit hee should goe thither, where hee should finde nothing but reuolts, and discontents: To whom the King answered, you are not of my Councell, I haue taken a more generous resolution. Vnderstand that if the way were all paved with armes, I would paffe vpon mine enemies bellies: seeing they haue no cause to declare themselves against mee, who haue not offended any man. You shall haue the content to see it: and I know you will reioyce at it, hauing serued the de- F ceased King my father so faithfully.

The Kings Speech to the great Prouost of Normandie.

Before his going from Paris, hee sent for all the Soueraigne Courts and Magistrates; and recommended vnto them the preferuation of his good Citie, where hee left the Queene his wife for Gouvernesse, and with her the Chancellor, and some of the Councell, for the dispatch of all affaires; leading with him onely the Keeper of the Seales, and some Counsellors of State, and Masters of Requests, hoping to bee backe againe within three weekes.

The 7 of Iuly, the King accompanied with his brother, the Prince of Conde and many Noble from Caen.

Noblemen, left Paris, and lodged at Pontoise, whither the Deputies of Caen came vnto him with Letters, to assure him of the inhabitants fidelitie, who according to his commandement were become Masters of the Towne, whereof they would giue him a good accompt: They let him vnderstand that his presence was very necessarie to preserue the Towne from the oppressions which threatened it; and that in the meane time they would defend themselves with their owne forces. The King had sent the Seigneur of Bellefons with Letters vnto them, giuing them to vnderstand, that the Grand Prior was retired discontented from Court, and that he desired the inhabitants would haue a care of his Towne of Caen vnder his obedience, and not suffer any one to enter the fronger. Bellefons (who had sometime beene Governor there) made offer, that if the inhabitants would defend themselves against the Castle, hee would serue them: to whom they answered, That matters were not yet reduced to those extremities: That they were in good iatelligence with those of the Castle, the which they would husband: That this discreet temporizing would more auail the Kings affaires, then his designe which was very hardy, and the successe doubtfull: That it was to no purpose to incense them of the Castle, and expose the Towne to the mercy of the Cannon: That dissembling was more profitable both for the aduancement of the Kings affaires, and of the Towne, on whose preservation depended the safety of the Prouince.

enters into the Deputies of Caen.

His Maiesties Letters were imparted to Seigneur Prudent, and hee was invited to come into the towne to assist at their deliberations, who thanked the Deputies for this complement, entreating them to assure the bodie of the towne: That he desired nothing more then to serue them, and that they needed not feare any thing from the Castle: That the Grand Prior was not retired from Court to doe the King any bad seruice, but to defend himselfe from the oppression of his enemies, who had conspired to haue him arrested: That in taking leaue of the Grand Prior, he had commanded him expressly to take a care to the preservation of his place and the towne, that if the inhabitants would lue in good intelligence with the castle, they should without danger see the miseries of other townes. Finally, he said, he had not so little experience in his profession, as he knew not how much it did import a Governour to abandon his place in a doubtful and suspicious time, the which he was resolved to preferue for the King vnder his Masters seruice, and that he would endure all extremities by an obdurate siege: Finally, that hee would suffer himselfe to be buried in the ruines thereof.

The Kings answer to the inhabitants of Caen.

The townsmen erected a Councell of the chiefe Magistrates, for the government and guard of the Towne, wherewith they acquainted Prudent, intreating him to referre the order and the keyes to the disposition of the towne; for that the King desired they should remaine Masters: whereunto he yielded willingly. And this was the state of the towne when the Deputies came vnto the King, who sent them away with Letters of assurance of his great content for their obedience, and that within few dayes he would be with them, and in the meane time the Marshall of Praslin should come vnto them with two thousand foot and five hundred Swisses: and at the same time his Maiestic sent away the Marquis of Muny, who came to Caen on the eight of Iuly, and after him the Seigneur of Arnault. The King lodged within one daies iourney of Rouen, his Harbingers going thither before to marke their lodgings: whereof the Duke of Longueville being aduertised, he sent for one of them, demanding where he had left the King? At Pontoise, my Lord, answered the Marshall, but this night hee lyes at Magny. Where make you account to lodge him, said the Duke? Here, my Lord, replied the Harbinger. It is reason, said the Duke, that I should quit him the place. The Duke had bene the same morning with the Parliament, and made protestation of his fidelity to the Kings seruice, but with some complaints for his owne priuate against those which were nere vnto his Maiestic, with whom they had put him in disgrace without cause: saying, that to auoyd the detention of his person, which they had long protected, he was resolved to retire to Diepe: which hee did, and tooke horse about five of the clocke in the euening. At the same time also some officers and persons of quality left Rouen, whereof the King was aduertised the next day at his departure from Magny. Within an houre after the Dukes going from Rouen, Colonell Orlando came thither by the Kings commandement, who presently visited the chiefe of the Parliament, and of the body of the City assuring them that the King came with speed to settle an order for the combustions which they intended to make in Normandy. Hee had

A had also some conference with the Gouvernor of the old Palace, telling him that his Maiestic held him for his seruant: and the gouvernor gaue him his faith to serue the King: but being afterward aduised not to stay the Kings coming, left hee were made an example, he retired and abandoned the place, into which he had put 150 souldiers, besides the ordinary garison. At the same time the Prince of Conde (whom his Maiestic had caused to aduance) arrived at Rouen, who commanded the Colonell to assure himselfe of the old Palace. The King was assured vpon the way that Rouen was wholly at his deuotion; all the ruer of Seine free, and the Duke of Longueville in the Country of Caux, so as he could by no means succour Caen but by Sea; whereupon he commanded the Marshall of Praslin, and Monsi. de Crequy to aduance with all speed to Caen, with ten companies of his Guard, and one of Swisses. The King entred into Rouen on the tenth of Iuly, where the people attended him with generall acclamations of ioy and blessings. The Parliament went presently to tender their seruices vnto him: the first President so moued his heart with a short Speech, as he gaue God thanks to haue preferred them from the rebellion which was so nere, confessing that his onely presence had prevented the desolation of the Prouince; and of the City. The next day his Maiestic went to the Parliament, where the Keeper of the Seales represented what had past since the alterations of Angoulême: The gratifications the Queene his mother had receiued; and the care he had to visit her: The offers which had bene lately made vnto her; and his tender affection. He then spake of the Letters which the King had sent vnto Monsieur de Longueville to come vnto him, and to accompany him at his entry into the Prouince; and the refusal he had made. After which they presented Letters of suspension of the Dukes authoritie in the Government of Normandie, vntill he had iustified himselfe in his Maiesties presence. The first President gaue the King most humble thanks, that he had vouchsafed to communicate his affaires to his Parliament, who had no part but obedience, & did not breathe but from his commandements, protesting an inuolable fidelitie to his seruice; beseeching him, that as he had preferred them from danger by his coming, whereto they had undoubtedly fallen, so he would not depart the Prouinée, vntill hee had settled their peace. His Maiestic stayed three dayes in Rouen, where he gaue order for the safety of this capital Citie: And at the request of the Parliament he made new Captaines, chosen out of the Soueraigne Courts, who tooke their oath of fidelitie vnto his Maiestic.

The King goes to the Parliament at Rouen

The diuers pretexts which had embarked many, were suppressed by the Kings presence: for they wist, that in all Normandy not about eight daies before, no man durst speake of the Kings name, but in blemishing his name and reputation; so powerfull their practices were: That their designe was to assure themselves of Rouen on the ninth of the Moneth, by a great faction of the Nobility which followed the Duke of Longueville, and by 1200 Souldiers which should come thither, and make the execution easie: That it was a wonder, at the very bruite of the Kings coming there being three or foure hundred Gentlemen within the City, of all these there were but five & twentie remaining with the Duke, E all the rest protesting that they would serue the King: That the fidelitie of the Parliament and generally of other officers, was to be honored for euer; for that there was no kind of temptation but had bene tried to withdraw them from their obedience.

But let vs obserue what hath past at Caen; the inhabitants were wholly royall, and breathed nothing but the Kings seruice, yet they apprehended a Garison, and that a Gouvernor for the King, attempting against the Castle, they should grow to those tearmes, as their towne should be ruined on the one side with the Cannon from the Castle, and on the other by the Kings troops which they would lodge in their houses. A considerable feare in a great towne. This Councell of the Towne then was forced discreetly to entertaine a correspondencie with the Seigneur Prudent: but they had diuers intentions. He F expected the Grand Prior with forces to constraîne them of Caen to embrace the Queen mothers party: And the Councell of the Towne drew on the time vntill the Kings coming to succour them, and that by his presence he might reduce the Castle to his obedience.

What passed at
Caen.

You haue formerly heard what Bellefons offered vnto the Towne, and their answer: Prudent grew jealous of his stay there, sending word to the Councell of the towne that he could not endure it: That if they would entertaine their common intelligence, they must cause him retire: That he knew him to be a capitall enemy to the Grand Prior: That if

if they would preferue themselves, they must not vse this conuinnce : And that if the A Towne had bandy against the Castle, he would come down with two thousand men with fire and sword ; entreating them to resolute thereupon, and fend him their answer.

The Councell being assembled vpon this occasion, they found it harsh to entreat the Seigneur of Bellefions to retire, being sent from the King ; and hauing offered his seruice to the Towne : notwithstanding, it was concluded, that he should be inuited thercunto. The Message was deliuered, but he could not relish it : they returned his Answer, which was, That he would rather die then retire without a speciall commandement from the King, or at the least, a Decree made by the body of the Towne, for his iustification to his Maiesty : yet soone after, doubting a mutiny of the people, he left the towne ; the like B did the Seigneur of Bleville, and Victor the Bayliffe of Caen.

The Earle of Thorigny comes to Caen thining to command
there.

The same day, the Earle of Thorigny, the Kings Lieutenant, came to Caen, being allied to the Duke of Longueville, and as they sayd, held his partie. The Councell of the Towne went to entreat him, that hee would allow of the order they had set downe for their preferation : That their Deputies had charge to know the Kings pleasure whom they should obey : That they were bound by his Maiesties Lettres and commandement, neuer to put his power to compromise. The Earle of Thorigny obserued, that he must of necessity yeeld to that which they held : whereupon he returned the next day, seeing all the officers and chiefe Burgesses girt to their swords, and witnessing by their resolute countenances, that they had courage enough to preferue themselves in their ancient fidelitie, and to maintain their libertie. The Towne doubled their guards, and fortified their Suburbs with Barricadoes ; and they of the Castle stood vpon their guard, drawing in all kind of victuall and munition, to endure a siege.

The answer of the Councell to Caen to the Marquis of Mauny.

The Marquis of Mauny and Arnault being arriued, went to the Town-house, to whom they spake somewhat obscurely, as if they would found their disposition for the receiving of a garison : wherewith they were discontented, saying, That the Towne was not resolute to endure the insolency of Souldiers : That the King should not enter into distrust of their fidelities, their forepassed actions prefiging of the future : and that in stead of confirming the people in the Kings obedience, the word of Garison would thrust them into extremities : That hauing hitherto entertained a good correspondency with them of the Castle, they would make vse of it vntill the Kings arriual : That they of the town would not commit the first acts of hostility ; but if Prudent falsifying his oath and promises, should seeke to force them, they would take aduice what was necessary for their defence.

Prudent being aduertised of these communications, he desired them to entreat the said Marquis and Arnault to retire : wherunto the Councell made answer, That being sent from the King they could not doe it without crime : but that hee should assure himselfe they should haue no command in the Towne, nor entry within their Councell. Yet to testifie their obedience to his Maiesty, they doubled their guards, drew their chaines, to hinder the descent of them of the garison, and set Corps de guard vpon all the approaches to the Castle.

Vpon the tenth of Iuly, a Gentleman came from the Grand Prior, to aduertise the Towne that he dined at Falaise, and came to preferue the place, and to maintain the liberty of the inhabitants, whom they sought to oppress with garisons ; entreating them to suffer him to passe through the Towne to the Castle : to whom they made answer, That they were sorry the Grand Prior was in bad tearmes with the King, who came directly to Caen : That he should doe well for himselfe and them to submit himselfe, and not to lose a towne which had alwayes much honored and esteemed him : That for the passage he desired, they could not grant it through the Towne, and that hee might take some other way.

The Kings troops aduanced towards Caen, and Monseur de Crequy entred the Town, F assuring the Councell that the King burnt with impatience to deliuer them from the oppression of the Castle : That for their parts, they came not to ill intreat the inhabitants, but rather to be ruled by them : That they would willingly expose their liues for their safety : and that they should giue them the most dangerous places to guard : That it was their profession to hazard their liues for the Kings seruice, and that they had gotten their honors and charges by such generous acts. The Lieutenant Generall answered ; That they held themselves very happy to be able to discharge the promise they had made to keepe

A keepe the towne for the King : That for the present, they which had taken the charge referred this care to them, and would hereafter rely vpon their vigilancy : yet the Towne should willingly furnish whatsoever should be necessary to their desigine, and the inhabitants would be bound to ease their troops, and guard such Ports of the Towne as they pleased.

Soone after, the Marshall of Praslin arriued, who sent a Gentleman with a Trumpet to summon Prudent in the Marshalls name (who commanded the Kings army) to yeeld the place ; perswading him to encline rather to obedience then rebellion. Prudent answered, That the place had bene committed vnto him by the Grand Prior, and that hee would expect his commandement before he would resolute to leaue it. This made Prudent look for a siege, and for that he had no Priests, he sent to demand two from the towne ; but the Marshall would not suffer it, saying, That it was wast, seeing they were Rebels against the King, and guilty of treason ; that they should all dye like beasts. To omit euery particular circumstance of this siege, the King gaue commandement to the Marshall, to assault the Castle.

Vpon the twelfth, the King parted from Rouen, where hee learned by the Prince of Ioinville, that the Cardinal of Guise his brother had failed of his promise to his Maiesty. And that it was reported hee was gone to ioyne with the Liegeois which should come for the Queenes party ; for the which the Prince seemed to be much grieved : He continued his journey towards Caen, and came to Diuex, which is within five Leagues vpon the Sea. There the Earle of Sardiny coming from Angiers, presented himselfe suddenly to his Maiesty, to deliuer him a Letter : but he said vnto him, that hee knew well what it contained : That it had bene drawne at Paris : and that he would not receive it : That there were men of quality about the Queene his mother, whom he might acquaint with what he desired for her content. Vpon he presently sent one to Angiers to aduertise his Deputies of the reasons which had moued him to refuse the Queenes Letters by the hands of Sardiny, commanding them to assure her, that he would neuer faile of his affection towards her, notwithstanding the pretexts which she suffered turbulent spirits to take for the troubling of his Realme.

D Some of the chiefe inhabitants of Caen came thither vnto his Maiesty, to know the order of the ceremony he desired they should obserue at his entry. The King received them graciously, and spake much vnto them in few words, I will haue no ceremony, continue in seruing me well, and I will be a good King vnto you. Before the King would enter into the towne, he went to visit the Trenches which were brought vnto the Castle Ditch. Within an houre after his entry, hee sent Les Clusiaux with a Trumpet to summon Prudent to yeeld the place vnto the King, who was then in the Towne. At this summons hee made shew that he would maintaine the siege generously, and seemed ignorant of the Kings being in Caen, Les Clusiaux going out of the Castle, and passing by the Corps de guard, said aloud, that there was 10000 Crownes to be gotten for him that should bring Prudent E head vnto the King. This liberty of speech did much discontent Prudent, yet hee knew well that Heralds were sacred persons, and that to wrong him were to violate the law of Nations : He therefore heard him without answer.

Whilest the Kings men laboured in the Trenches, there grew some alteration in the castle. It beganne by the Souldiers which were in guard vpon the Bulwarke towards the towne, who were discontented for that they were too often visited. This murmure was soone dispersed to the Corps de guard, so as all the souldiers of the garison protested that they would not grow obstinate to maintain a siege against the King. In the morning, they of the castle made a call, and Parifot Lieutenant to Prudent, desired to parlee with Monfieur de Crequy. The King was aduertised hereof, and commanded him to goe. Parifot he sought him to tell him if the King were in person within the towne : whereof being assured, he made answer, that they were ready to open the gates to his Maiesty without any capitulation. The King hearing of their intention, he sent the Seigneur of Crequy to grant them a pardon for their rebellion, in his Maiesties name, and drew in two companies of the French Guards, and one of Swisses.

A little before this Treaty, Prudent had retired into the dungeon with the Souldiers of the garison. Within halfe an houre after, Parifot went out of the Castle to craue pardon of his Maiesty, the which he obtained, and withall 3000 Crownes in recompence of his goods.

goods. On the eighteenth, the Garison came forth without any order. After dinner, the King went to see the Castle, being assisted by his brother, the Prince of Conde, the Duke of Luynes, and many other Noblemen. Prudent presented himselfe to the King, and craved pardon. His Maiefty full of clemency, who forgets nothing but iniuries, granted it.

Having well viewed and observed the place, finding it much stronger then they imagined, they beganne to smile at the weaknesse of Prudent, and the basenesse of such as had bene with him, who had yeelded at discretion, without any capitulation or marke of honour: That if they had but lyen vpon their bellies, they might haue stayed the Kings armie a month, and wonne themselves great reputation. This was their opinion of the Castle, saying inist, That hereafter to keepe places well, they must chooe Fooles, for the Prudent were nothing worth.

In the evening Prudent left the Castle and Towne to goe make his excuse to the Grand Prior of France. Presently after this reduction, many Noblemen of that Country came vnto the King, and all the Townes of base Normandy brought their keys. It was thought that the iudicious crriage of the Councell of the towne, had much advanced his Maiesties happy successe: for the destiny of France did in a manner depend of the fidelity or disobedience of this towne.

It was propounded in Councell, whether they should raze the Castle towards the Towne, to leaue this marke of libertie to the ancient fidelity of the inhabitants, and to giue courage to other townes to follow their example in the like occasion. But it was not held necessary being so neere the Sea, and the passage from England to France, considering the danger the towne should be exposed vnto, if it were destitute of this reliefe, vpon the sudden descent of strangers; whereupon it was left vntouched, and the Gouernment was giuen to the Marquis of Mauny. The inhabitants were gratified with diuers priuiledges, and some particular men were ennobled, leauing for euer in the said Towne an honorable marke of their fidelities, and a glorious reputation to the King to haue preferred them from the danger wherein they were.

The King sent presently to Angiers to aduertise his Deputies of the reduction of the Castle of Caen. These newes troubled the Princes which were with the Queene, thinking they should soone haue the King with them to reduce them to obedience. Vpon the losse of this Castle, the Earle of Rochfort, the onely sonne of the Duke of Montbazon, was stayed in Angiers. The Duke himselfe retired to the King, and then to Paris, where he continued during this alteration as Gouernour of the Isle of France. They also caused the Duke of Nemours sonne to be seized on in Paris, and two of the Duke of Vendomes children by way of retrifall, but within few dayes after, they were all freed of their detentions. The King doubting the Castle of Alençon, sent Monsieur de Crauay with certaine troops to assure it: after which hee marched speedily to Mans, being called by the Marquis of Marigny their Gouernour, who feared an enterprize, the which hee preferred happily for the Kings seruice and the whole Prouince.

The King desiring to goe directly to Angiers, to free all that was held by the discontented Princes and Noblemen, had sent Monsieur de Crauay before by the Duchy of Alençon, and County of Mayen: he himselfe parted from Caen on the 21 of Iuly, and tooke the left hand, to cleane the Country of Perche, where Dreux and diuers other Castles were held for the Earle of Soissons: and the Castle of Verneuil, with diuers other thereabout, for the Duke of Vendome: as also to ioyne with those troops which Monsieur de Bassompier had brought out of Champagne. Soone after, the Castles of Dreux, Verneuil, and La Ferté Bernard, yeelded to the Kings obedience. The King being at Bellesme on the 28 of Iuly, he made a Declaration to the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, which were retired vnto the Queene mother, to lay downe armes, and to come vnto him vpon paine of high treason. After repetition of many breaches made by them, he concludes, That in regard of the Queene his mother he could not beleue nor perswade himselfe that she had forgotten the loue whereunto Nature bound her, and the memory of his deceased Lord and Father required of her, and which hee himselfe had fought to deserue: And although she should carie her selfe otherwise towards him then she ought, yet would he haue no other feeling then a religious patience, and that approaching with his forces neere vnto them which borrowed her name, hee meant not to employ

A play them, but to free her from those which (to his prejudice and his Realmes) did captiuate her mind and will, and to hinder the designs they had to the ruine of his Estate. As for his Cousins, the Earle of Soissons, and the Countesse his mother, the Duke of Vendome, and the great Prior of France, the Dukes of Longueville, Nemours, Mayen, Espernon, Retz, Tremouille, Rohan, and Rohannois, the Marshall Bou-Dauphin, the Earle of Candale, the Marquis of La Vallée, the Archbishop of Thoulouse, and other Officers of his Crowne, he commanded them expressly to lay downe armes, and to forebare all acts of hostility against his subjects; to relinquish all leagues and associations both within and without the Realme; and within one moneth to come vnto him, and to giue him more ample assurance in person: promising (in so doing) to remit all crimes and offences committed against him in this last alteration, and to receive them into grace and fauour. And likewise to pardon all such as had followed them in armes, if within the time prefixed they retired to their houses, and made declaration thereof to the next Iudge. For not performance hereof, he declared them all guilty of treason, and troublers of the publique peace: To bee degraded of all their Honours, Gouernments, Dignities, Offices and Benefices, and their lands and Seigneuries to be vnto his Crowne.

In the end of the moneth, the Castle of Vendome was abandoned by him that kept it for the Duke, and the Grand Prior had a repulse with some losse, going to charge the Carabins quarter neere Mans; whereupon their army retired somewhat hastily towards Angiers and Pont Cé, which was some blemish to the Princes reputation, being done as it were in feare of the Kings army, which encreased daily both in horse, and new Regiments of Foot.

The King being come to Mans, the Archbishop of Sens (one of the Deputies which he had sent to the Queene his mother) came vnto him with father Berale, and told his Maiefty, that the Queene his mother desired peace: but she would treat in general, and haue some respite to make them resolute, which had declared themselves in her fauour. To whom his Maiefty said, Doe my commendations to the Queene my mother, and assure her that I will alwayes haue my heart and hands open to receiue her, and will not cease to entreat her to come vnto me, nor to honor her in my Court, and throughout my whole Realme. As for those turbulent spirits which oppress my subjects, and will share my authority by their faction, there is no danger which I will not vndergoe to driue them out of France, or reduce them to my obedience. God will assist me: pray for me. The Prince said also vnto the Deputies, That he had no other desire in his heart, but to see the Kings authority so respected, as it might prescribe a law to all the world. Hee coniuined them to assure the Queene mother of his seruice; and that he would thinke it a great happinesse to see her in Court, and to receiue all sorts of gratifications from his Maiefty. As for Monsieur de Luynes, he enreated them to represent vnto her what his great desire had bene to serue her since her departure from Court, and the care hee had taken to draw her from Angoulesme to Tours, to the end she might not bee farr from his Maiesties presence: E protesting that he had no other ambition, then to see their Maiesties vnted in one desire, and that the Queene might assure the peace of her mind for euer. The which shee could not hope for being retired from the King; considering the priuate interests of such as entertained her ieaiousness. Hee coniuined them not to regard any thing which concerned himselfe, but to labour that a peace might bee concluded, with the Kings dignity, and the safety of the Estate: and after this, not to spare any thing which might giue the Queene content.

On the fourth of August, the King vnted all his Forces into one body, and multered his army neere vnto La Fleche, consisting of 12000 foot, and 1200 horse, and then went to lodge there. They wrote that there was some diuersity of opinions: It was propounded, that (after her retreat from La Fleche to Angiers) shee should goe with a part of the armie to ioyne with the troops of the Dukes of Mayen, Espernon, Thours, Rohan, and Rohannois, on the other side of Loire, and should leade the other part on this side, for the guard of Angiers and Pont de Cé: That one of the greatest of the Country of Aniou, had promised the Queene to preferue Angiers in her absence, and to defend it in case of a siege to the last gaspe: That this Nobleman, hauing afterwards considered of the proposition which he had made vnto the Queene, and hauing conferred thereof, they let him vnderstand, that he should engage himself in an action wherein both he & his children 1620 should expose themselves to an inevitable ruine, and purchase the Kings hatred, which A would be irreconcilable, in seeking to oppose himselfe to the first exploits of his armes, and to stay the course of his victories. In like manner, neither the Souldiers which he should draw into Angiers, nor all the rigours hee should use vpon the inhabitants, should euer be able to change the loue and affection which that people (who said already they were afflictd) beare vnto the King. That all the officers of Iustice, the Magistrates, and all men of quality within the towne, sayd plainly, That they were resolu'd to maintaine their allegiance vnto the King. If they spake in this manner the Queene being preser, what would they not say or doe if she were past the Loire? Wherefore there was no assurance to engage himselfe into a Towne, hauing the inhabitants for enemies, transpor- B ted with loue and affection towards their King. Moreouer, victuals beganne to grow deare, the which they could not recouer but by Pont Cé, and from Poictou, the nurse of Angiers. Finally, to attempt to defend Angiers against the King (if the Queene mother retired) was to embarke himselfe in a ship to make a long voyage, without munition and basket. That vpon this consideration the Nobleman did afterwards tell the Queene, that he was most affectionate to her party, and would serue in her army whither soeuer shee went, but to command in Angiers during her absence, he entreated her to giue him leaue to recall his word.

An aduice
giuen to the Queene.

Hercupon the Queene hauing demanded aduice from one of her Councill, what was fittest to be done, he said vnto her, That as a Clergy-man he had alwayes be sought her to vntie her selfe in will vnto the King, for that all those great Personages (as well as he who had promised to keepe Angiers) had left the Court and vnted themselves to her party, for their priuate interests, the which they alwayes preferred before hers, or that of the State. You are now, Madam (said he) free to treat with the King: If you passe the Loire, you shall not be so. Peace or warre shall be at the disposition of great men, who shall be armed vnder your name, and will not bee so easie to content as you imagine. So many examples in the like case happened in France within these threecore yeares, should serue you as faithfull Councillors.

Besides, Madam, when you haue past the Loire, thinke not that the Duke of Mayen can come so soone vnto you: he is yet vpon the banks of Garonne, and is doubtfull to leaue D it, seeing the Marshall of Thempas leaue troops in Quercy, to enter into Guienne; and the Parliament of Bourdeaux, who attended onely his departure to resume their authority: the which you may coniecture by the Packet you sent vnto them, the which they conuall vn-opened vnto the King.

The Kings Disposicion to the Queenes
intentions vnto
him.

The Queene hauing considered of all these things, she opened her intention vnto the Kings Deputies; whereupon the Duke of Belgard, the Archbishop of Sens, and father Berule, went to his Maiesty at La Fleche, and told him that the intention of the Queene his mother was to liue hereafter in Court: and that she desired to separate her selfe with honour from the party wherein she was engaged, and to passe the remainder of her dayes in safety, and in his Maiesties good fauour.

The Kings answer.

The King said vnto them, That it was his greatest desire to see her liue after that manner, and that he had nothing to doe to contest with that which concerned her pleasures, and would yeeld to any thing that might serue for the assurance of her peace and happiness. But she should consider, that the dignity of the Crowne could not endure so pernicious a fiction as that which attempted against his authority: That if shee would leaue it for euer, shee should find whatsoeuer she could lawfully desire in his Court and heart. After which, the Deputies returned to the Queene mother with certaine propositions of an Accord, and hope of peace.

Difficulties represented for the siege of Angiers.

On the fifth of August, his Maiesty held a Councell of Warre, and disposed of the quarters of his army within three leagues of Angiers, resoluving to draw neere vnto it: But F they laid before him, That the Towne was very great, and that whatsoeuer good men were on this side the Loire for the Queenes party, were within it: that if he did assault it, and faile to take it, the great reputation which he had gotten in the taking of Caen and others where he had past, would be blemished.

They shewed him the inconuenience which had happed vnto the Duke of Anjou at the siege of Saint Iohn D'Angely, and to the Prince of Conde at Poitiers, where hee routed his army, which might haue kept the field against the Duke of Anjou, who commanded

A ded vnder Charles the ninth. Many other strong reasons were deliuered to dissuade him from this enterprize.

The King interrupted this conflict of opinions, saying, I desire not you should resolute presently whether we should assault or leaue Angiers: we must first know whether the Queene my mother will stay there, or goe her way. If she leaues Angiers, and goes into Poictou, we must cast the scabbards of our swords on this side Loire, and follow her. If she remaine, we shall haue a peace speedily. In this incertitude, I am of opinion to aduance as neere as I can to Pont Cé. The place is of great importance for the preservation of Angiers, and without doubt the braviest of all their army will cast themselves into it to defend it. It is not fit for me to haue enemies in field, and so neere, without making them to leaue their Armes, or their Trenches. Let vs embrace this resolution presently, and after we haue seene what God will giue vs at Pont Cé, we will aduise of the rest: In the meane time we must send to Saumur, to haue foure Cannon from Monsieur de Pleisy, and to Orleans to accompany the Cannon and Munition which shall bee embarked there. And that the Marshall of Praslin passe the Loire speedily at Saumur with foure thousand Foot, and foure hundred Horse, to lodge himselfe at the end of Pont Cé, and to hinder the succours which might come from Poictou. All which was concluded as his Maiesty had propounded.

The Queene mother hauing foreseene that they would attempt Pont Cé, she lodged therein three thousand foot, and foure hundred horse, with three pieces of Ordnance to defend it. As for the other part of her armie, she caused them to barricado themselves in the Suburbs of Angiers: and they of Pont Cé had laboured six dayes together to make a great Trench at the end of the Bridge towards Angiers.

Pont Cé is a long street in an Island vpon the Riuer of Loire, with two great Bridges which containe halfe a mile in length; that toward Brissac is a third part longer then that towards Angiers; vpon the which there are draw-bridges, which being drawne vp, there is no entering but by boat: It hath a good Cattle to defend it, the which commands all the approaches of the Bridge: the houses within the Island haue no walls.

The Kings army approached, and gaue an assault to the barricades of the suburbs D without the bridge, and recovered their Trench, and in the end beat them from the bridge, and entred the Town with them, there remaining nothing vntaken but the Castle, who seeing themselves without hope of succours, and ill furnished with things necessary for a siege, they resolu'd to parley: whereupon the next day morning they entred into treaty with Monsieur de Crequy: which being concluded, the King sent the Prince of Conde to signe the Capitulation, which was to depart with their armes and baggage, their matches out, and their Ensignes remaining to the King, the which he sent to Paris to the Queene Regnant, reseruing those which had the Queene mothers colours and chifres, the which he sent backe vnto her with all the prisoners (which had beene taken vpon the bridge) that were of her household: shauing a speciall care of those that were wounded. He E commended such as had fought valiantly, and shewed their valour, hoping they would one day doe him good seruice, and blasse such as had fled basely.

Pont de Cé
yeilded to the King.

The Duke of Belgard, and the Archbishop of Sens, being come from Angiers to the King, he sent them backe to the Queene mother, to tell her, That he respected the place too much where she did reside, to discharge his Cannon against it: but he coniu'd her in the name of God and all France, to cast her selfe into his armes, where she should find an assured rest; offering her for her particular, all that she could iustly desire of his Maiesty.

On Sunday the ninth of August, the Cardinal of Sourdis and the Bishop of Luson came vnto his Maiesty from the Queene Mother, with the Kings Deputies, to let F him vnderstand, That shee was resolu'd to retire her selfe for euer out of these combuitions, and that the onely doubt to bee oppress'd had drawne her to take armes. To whom answer was made, That the King had neuer giuen her occasion, his iustice and bounty being so apparant, as no man within his Realme had any cause to complaine of oppression. The Queene also desired, that for her sake he would pardon all those which had assisted her.

Deputies sent from the Queene to treat a peace.

The King represented the interest of such as had assisted her, who aymed at other ends then the Queene his Mother: Notwithstanding, at her entreaty hee pardoned them:

1620

Upon that condition the King would grant a peace.

them: So as within eight dayes after signification of the Peace, they did disarme and A yeld vnto his Maiesties obedience: also that the Kings intent was not to restore the Governments and charges of those which had left them, and wherof he had already disposed, as that of Caen, the old Palace of Rouen, and the twelve Companies which had cast themselves into Metz with their Colours, and had abandoned his army in Champagne. But in regard of the Queene his Mother, he yielded to the delivery of all the prisoners (which were many, and of quality) promising to pay their ransomes, for that hee would not deprive them of their due, which had taken them with great hazard.

The next day the Articles being drawne and signed by the King, Monsieur le Creguy caried them to the Queene mother, with his Maiesties Letter full of loue and respect. The Ar- B ticles were:

Articles granted by the King.

I. That there should be a Declaration of the Queenes innocency, and a discharge (in fauour of her) for those which had assisted her party.

II. That the Treatie of Angoulême should be executed in all points.

III. That all charges and governments should be restored, but such as hee had disposed of, and wherof he had made mention, yet notwithstanding it should be lawful for the Queene to be a tutor in that regard.

IV. That all Fees and Entertainments should be paid to the Gouvernors and others which were restored by vertue of this Treaty, like vnto those which had serued the King.

V. That there should be a discharge for all the Kings Reuenues which had beene ta- C ken or leauied.

VI. That it should be lawful for all persons of what quality soeuer, which had followed the Queenes party, to exercise the function of their charges freely: to goe and come to Court, or to stay in their houses and governments, with as much liberty as those which had followed the King.

VII. That all Prisoners should be set free on either side without ranfome.

VIII. That the Cattle of Pont de Cé should be delivered to any one whom the Queene should name.

IX. That Dreux should be deliuered to the Earle of Soissons, Vendôme to the Duke, D who should ruine the fortifications which had beene made since his absence from Court, together with the Towne of Verneuil, Sablé to the Marshall of Bois-Dauphin, and La Ferté Bernard to the Duke of Mayen.

X. That all Officers on either side should be restored to their charges and functions, by vertue of the Queenes Declaration.

XI. That all their Companies of Light Horfe which had followed the Queene Mothers party, should be restored and entertained like vnto others which had serued the King: and that all pursuits of condemnation should be discontinued, in regard of those which had not defended themselves.

XII. That the Queene Mother should haue thirty thousand pound sterling E presently, and as much more in the beginning of the next yeare, to helpe to pay her debts.

XIII. That by vertue of this Accord, made by the Queene mother and the Princes which assisted her, all places and officers should be restored to the same estate they were in before the first of January last past.

XIV. That they which had followed the Queene mother should be paid their pensions and entertainments like vnto those which had serued the King.

These Articles being brought backe vnto his Maiestie on the 11 of August, and signed by the Queene, all prisoners were set at liberty.

It was supposed in the beginning of this warre, that the ieaousies which should grow F betwene so many Princes and Generals of Armies, as were on the Queene mothers party, would be the cause they should neuer performe any exploit of importance; the effect hereof was seene at Pont de Cé, where the Dukes of Vendôme and Retz were, and the Earle of Saint Aignan, by reason of their ieaousies who should haue the point: so as the Duke of Retz retired with a thousand and five hundred men before the Combat, the Duke of Vendôme during the fight and the Earle of Saint Aignan was taken fighting. They to whom their places and charges were not restored

A restored by this treaty of peace, were much deceived of their expectations. Monsieur de Modene was sent vnto the Queene with a Letter of credit from the King, to let her vnder-stand that his Miesty desired to see her, and would to that end attend her at Brissac. To whom he made answer, Assure the King that I will see him to morrow, and that I am very well satisfied with him, and desire nothing more then to please him, praying to God for his person, and the prosperity of his Realme.

The King sent the Marshall of Praslin as farre as Pont Cé to meet the Queene, who drew out the Kings garison, to deliuer it into her hands. Monsieur de Breme, brother to the Duke of Luynes, and now Duke of Luxembourg (hauing married the only heyre of B that House) had commandement to receiue her, betwene Pont Cé and Brissac: And the King himselfe, impatient to see her, went forth to meet her about 3 quarters of a league, with Monsieur his brother, the Prince of Conde, the Duke of Luynes, and 200 Gentlesmen. The Queene had in her company many Princesses and great Ladies, with about 300 horse. The King seeing the Queenes Litter, left his hoise, which the Queene hearing, she likewise came forth, and aduanced to receiue him. At their first meeting the King said vnto her, That hee neuer had more impatience to see her, nor more affection to honour her. The Queene answered, That shee had made her daily vovues and prayers for him, and that shee desired nothing more then his fauour. The King presented his brother vnto her and the Prince: the first she embraced tenderly, and vied the other C very kindly.

Their Maiesties stayed three dayes at Brissac, during the which the King made a Declaration of the Queene mothers innocency, and of his pleasure concerning the Earle of Soissons, the Countesse his mother, with the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crowne, and all others which had assisted his said Lady and mother, during those last alterations, receiuing them into fauour, as his good and faithful subiects and seruants, and suppressing the memory of all which had past in regard thereof. The chiefe points of the peace, was the disarming according to the Declaration: And notwithstanding that all the Princes and Noblemen which had taken armes, assured his Maiesty that they would dismiss their troops according to his pleasure; yet the King was aduised to keepe his army
D together, and to make a voyage to Bourdeaux, and to the banks of Garonne, to shew himselfe vnto those people, and to settle an order in Guienne, where it seemed that some, which held places of strength (as well of those which had continued in their obedience, as of others who had taken armes in fauour of the Queene) caried themselves so insolently, as his royall authority, and that of his Parliament at Bourdeaux was growne in contempt:
Finally, that he must assure the whole Province vnder his authority, and withall to force them of Bearne to obey his Edict and Decree, for the restitution of the Lands of the Clergy: That all things seemed to inuite him hereunto; first, the season of the yeare:
and secondly, his army was faire and desired employment.

The young Queene was carefull at Paris for the government of the City, and for the E dispatch of all matters which concerned the warre; but the King freed her of that care, sending her the Articles of peace: whereupon she parted the next day to goe to Tours, according to the Kings desire, where she should meet with the Queene mother.

The King desiring to hasten his iourney to Guienne, left the Queene mother at Brissac, and came on the twentieth to Poitiers, where staying but one day, hee went to Tours to meet with the young Queene. On the thirtieth, hee returned to Poitiers with his Queene, and the Queene Mother came thither. The King left her his owne lodging. The young Queene went forth to meet her, and the King came to visit her vpon her arri-uall: after some complements shee demanded newes of the Duke of Luynes, who was then sicke, and went to visit him, assuring him of her loue in the Kings presence.

F The Duke de Mayen, arrived two daies after, and presented himselfe vnto his Maiesty, who said vnto him, I will forget what is past if you serue me faithfully hereafter: after which he led him to the Queene his Mother. The King still hastening his voyage, tooke his leaue of the two Queenes, who likewise left Poitiers: The Queene Mother went to Fournaine-bleau, and the young Queene returned to Paris. The King past by S. Iohn D'Angely, where the Inhabitants came to intreat him vpon their knees, not to restore the Duke of Rohans Lieutenant into their Towne: whereupon his Maiesty left an Exempt of his Guard until he had otherwise provided. The Duke of Espernon came vnto him

1620 him, whom the King receited graciously, willing him not to withdraw himselfe here-
A after from his obedience.

Assemblement Gouverneur of Fronsac becomded at Bourdeaux.

On the 16 of September, he arrived at Blay, whither the Cardinal of Sourdis, the Duke of Mayenne, the Marshall of Roquelaure, and many other Noblemen came unto his Maiestie: where embarking he came to Bourdeaux. The Count of Saint Paul, Duke of Fronfac, passing by Fronfac to goe to Bourdeaux to the King; the Seigneur of Arsillemont (whom he had placed Gouverneur in the Castles of Fronfac and Caumont) would needs accompany him to goe and salute the King: his friends dissuaded him, telling him that the Court of Parliament might embrace this occasion to doe iustice for the affront he had done to one of the Presidents of the Court at Caumont; and had caused one of the B Viliers thereof to carie a basket at the fortifications of Fronfac, comming with a Decree to forbid him the continuing of the sayd workes: That there were but too many complaints of burnings, violences, and concussion, committed vpon Merchants, trafficking vpon the River of Dordone, to make him lose his head. Nothing could dissuade him, but he would needs goe doe his duty to his Maiesty. He was no sooner arrived, but the Court of Parliament complained of him to the King, who promised to cause him to be apprehended and deliuered into their hands, which was done accordingly. The Earle of Saint Paul and the Duke of Mayenne sued for his pardon, and the Merchants whom he had wronged demanded iustice. The King refused the first, and told the others, hee had giuen them good Iudges, who within two dayes condemned him to lose his head.
C Being vpon the scaffold readie to receiue the blow which should separate his soule from the body, he demanded pardon of God, the King, and all those he had wronged. It is written, that being perswaded by the Bishop of Aue, and a Iesuit, to suffer his eyes to be banded, he said vnto the Bishop, Sir, put your selfe in my place, and then you may doe what you please.

Hee was a resolute Gentleman, who saw death come without amazement, and offered his necke freely to the Executioner, to make an end of his life. It was reported that he had a hundred thousand Crownes in the Castle of Fronfac: but it is a wretched prosperity seeing it was followed with so fatall and tragical an end. This execution of iustice, contained many in their duties, and the people layd his Maiesty, that he was another Her-D cules, which purged his Realme from Monsters.

During the Kings stay at Bourdeaux, he changed certaine particular Gouvernors, but to every mans content, for that such as were remoued were aduanced to offices of the Crowne; so as his Maiestie assured this Prouince from combustion which he had apprehended. As for L'Estoure, which they of the Reformed Religion said was a place of safetie, his Maiesty (hauing promised at the Assembly at Loudun, to take out Fontrailles, who was become a Catholicke, and to giue them a Gouvernor of the Religion) caused Fontrailles to be treated withall, who left the place, and Blainville, a Gentleman of the Religion, was made Gouvernor.

The King goes
towards Beane.

All the Kings enterprises having succeeded happily, there remained nothing for his
E last worke, but the affaires of Bearne. The long resistance which had beene made by them of the Country, against his will, and the Decrees of the Councell, for the restoring of the Bishops and other Clergy-men to their honors and temporall estates, had much wounded his patience. Being at Bourdeaux he was prest daily to verifie this restitution. Monsieur de la Force Gouvernor of Bearne, and the first President of the Councell at Pau, being come to Bourdeaux to that end, assured his Maiesty, that without doubt they would cause it to be verified: But the King was aduertised daily of contrary effects, and that some Gentlemen of the Country assembled in armes, and threatned those which should undertake the execution of his Maiesties will. The King in this expectation stayed F tenne dayes at Pregnac, a Village beyond Bourdeaux, where he endured all the discomforts which might be in a bad lodging, yet he surmounted all these discomforts vntill the ninth of October, when as there came vnto him two Councillors of Pau, to aduertise him that they had not beene free in their consultations, but had beene forced by the Souldiers which the Baron of Benac had brought into the Towne. And for that they had opposed the power of Monsieur de la Force, whom it concerned in regard of his charge, and his promise to the King, to make all things easie, and to suppress the popular mutinies of factious men unknown: knowing also that he was strong and armed for the Kings service:
The

A The said two Councillors protested to his Maiestie that Monsieur de la Force, being solicited by their company to ioyne with them in Councell to giue his aduice, and to maintaine obedience by his example: he not onely refused to appeare, but excused himselfe vpon his weakenesse, saying, that he was not able to hinder multitudes of strangers from comming into the Prouince vpon the brute of the Verification; as they had done at other times.

Hereupon the King commanded them to retire, telling them that his presence should assure the Clergie men for euer, for the enioying of that which did belong vnto them: The King refused instantly, to part the next day towards Pau: And although there
B were a thousand discomforts of bad way, represented vnto him by the said Councillors, yet he neither apprehended scarcitie of victuals, or any thing else which might hinder him, in his resolution for this voyage, as iudging that enterprize vnworthy of his vnder-taking, if there were no difficulty and hazard in it. He parted the tenth of October, and crossing the desert Country, he came on the thirteenth to Grenade, where the Ad-uocate Generall of Pau, came and presented the King with a Decree of the said Councell, importing the restitution which had been so often refused, thinking thereby to stay the Kings journey. Monsieur de la Force, came thither also with the like designe, representing vnto him the trouble and commotion of the Voyage. But nothing could diuert the King, hauing a desire to make his power knowne, and to assure the Catholique religion
C for euer, in a Country, which seemed to neglect his royall authoritie.

The King
enters into Pau.

His Maiestie commanded them both to retire, assuring them that within two dayes he would be at Pau: For it behooues you (said hee) I should goe to assure your weakenesse. Comming to lodge within six Leagues of Pau, the chiefe inhabitants came vnto him, to know his Maiesties pleasure, touching the Ceremonie of his entry. To whom the King answered, That he would enter into Pau, as Soueraigne of Bearne, if there were a Church to goe vnto: But if there were none, hee would no Ceremonies; for that it would be visiting to receiue honors in a place where he had neuer bene, before hee had giuen thanks vnto God, from whom he held his inheritance. On the fifteenth he D entered into Pau, without ceremonie. It was obserued that his Maiestie was not retriued with those acclamations, which subiects doe usually make at the sight of their Prince: and some write that they had drawne away the victuals to force him to dislodge speedily: and that they had giuen out, they would crosse the orders which should be setled.

The King to preuent all inconueniences was forced to change some Gouvernors: and hauing stayed two dayes at Pau, he went to Nauarreux a place of importance, seuen great Leagues from Pau.

Hauing visited the place, Cannon, Munition, and Armes, He commanded Monsieur de Medene to acquaint de Salles Gouverneur of the Towne with his pleasure: which was, That the King (vnderstanding what had past in the Prouince, and the many enterprises E he had bene made to surprize that place) was resolved to free him of so painefull a guard in his old age, being now almost fourescore: yet his intent was not to deprive him of the reward of his seruices, but to recompence him worthily, and giue him rest. Whereunto de Salles opposed not; but seemed ready to obey his Maiesties will, who made him Marshall of the field in his Armies, and gaue him a good reward.

He changed the Gouverneur
of Nauarreux

In Nauarreux, which is a little towne but very well fortified, there were found 48 Cannons all mounted; and forty Culierins and smaller pieces, with great store of bullets, powder and victuals: besides the filer plate, which belonged to the Houses of Nauarre and Albiert, and was kept there: the which in former times had bene very great, but it was wasted in the yeare 1587, and much taken away to supply the necessities of his F Maiesties Father.

The King made the Seigneur of Poyenne Gouvernor of Nauarreux: Every man greatly commended this election, for the reputation hee had gotten both in Gienne and Bearne by his courage and fidelitie. And the King before his departure caused Masse to be sung in the Towne, which had been discontinued for the space of fifty yeares. The King returning to Pau, he resolved foure things in Councell: two, for the restoring of the Catholique Religion; and other two belonging to the State, and the preferuation of the publicke peace in base Nauarre, and the Soueraignie of Bearne.

The King resolves four things at Pau.

The first was to restore the Bishops and Abbots of Bearne to their places in the Council of Pau, as their Predecessors had formerly held them: and to cause the said Council to verify 47 Articles, containing an order for the free exercise of the Catholike Religion: the enioying of Clergy-lands, and in regard of their rights and prerogatives.

The second was, to restore the Catholikes to the possession of the great Church in Pau, where he would assist at diuine seruice and Proceffion.

The third, to make an Edict for the vniing of base Nauarre and the Souerignty of Bearne, to the Crowne of France, with an vnion of both Councils, and to make one Parliament.

The fourth was, for the suppressing of the Persans or Captaines of horse in Bearne.

The first, concerning the admission of the Bishops and Abbots to Council, with the 47 Articles, were verified by the said Council on the 19 of October. The next day the King put the Catholiques into possession of their great Church, whereof they had beene dispossessed almost 60 yeares: the King assisted at Masse, after which there was a sollemne proceffion. There was an Edict past, for the incorporating of these Prouinces to the Crowne, and the vniing of the Soueraine Courts of Pau in Bearne, and Saint Pallas in Nauarre into one body of a Parliament, which should be established at Pau, consisting of three Presidents, and 22 Councillors, to iudge souerainly, and with like power and authority to his other Courts of Parliament. Touching the suppression of the Persans, the Edict was verified by the Council, the Chambers being assembled on the 20 of October. Thus the King in few daies stay at Pau, hauing seded the Catholique Religion throughout all Bearne; taken away all meanes from the factious to mutine; seded an order, that none should leaue souldiers but by his commission; put good garisons into Nauarreux, Orthes, Saueterre, and Oleron; and vniited those Countries to the Crowne of France; he returned to Bourdeaux, and from thence to Xaintes, where taking poste, he came to Paris on the 7 of Nouember, where he was receiued by both the Queenes and all the world, with a thousand blessings and applauses. His army was lodged in diuers parts of Guienne and Poitou to winter in.

In the end of October, there was no speech in France, but of a generall Assembly, which they of the reformed Religion, should hold at Rochel on the fixe and twentieth of Nouember, by reason of the Kings voyage into Bearne. There were also many priuate Assemblies, where (as some write) they treated of meanes to leaue money, and to begin warre, but all was referred to the generall assembly at Rochel, where they should shew their grieuances touching the inexecution of that they said had beene promised them, at the dissolving of the Assembly at Loudun.

The King vpon his returne from Bearne, hauing beene aduertised of the propositions which were made in diuers parts of France, for the holding of a generall assembly at Rochel by them of the reformed Religion; he caused a Declaration to be made and verified in Parliament, by the which he declared, the assembly which his subiects of the Religion had called in his Towne of Rochel, to be vnlawfull, forbidden by his Edicts; and contrarie to his will and pleasure: enioying the Maior, Sherifes, Peeres, and Burgessees of Rochel, not to receiue them into their Towne; forbidding also all Gouernors, Lieutenants, Maiors, Consuls and Magistrats of other Townes, to receiue or admit the said Assembly, or any other which should bee called, contrary to the tenor of his Edicts, and without his expresse leaue: & to all his subiects of what quality soeuer to goe vnto it, vpon any pretext whatsoever, declaring them which should contradict this his will, breakers of his said Edicts, disobedient, troublers of the publike peace, and guilty of treason, &c. The subiect of this assembly will be the leauen of much misery, and shall fill France with ciuill combustions. We shall see townes forced and razed; Forts and Castles ruined; Houses and Families dispeopled and left desolate; the country wasted; and the poore people opprest by the insolent Souldier. We shall see intestine diuisions. Sonne against father, and brother against brother, kinsman against kinsman, and neighbour against neighbour, and the poore reformed Churches in danger of ruine, and at the brinke of despair. We shall see an angry King exclaiming against the disobedience of his subiects of the Religion; and we shall see those subiects complaining of the inexecution of his Edicts. We shall see an incensed Prince, who (zealous of his honour) vovves that hee will haue his owne, and force obedience. And we shall see those subiects, who (like a timorous

A merous man apprehending a Feuer, lets blood and takes Physicke, there being no alteration in his pulse, nor symptome nor signe of diffeimperature, zealous of their safeties, and fearing designs tending to their ruine; arme, fortifie themselves, and stand vpon their guard: when as voluntary obedience, and a dismissal of their Assembly at Rochel, had happily diuerted the storme, and they had not beene disarmed and lost their Townes of safety. The King should haue had no colour nor pretext to take armes against them who had obeyed his will: Foraine Princes, who had an interest in their preservation (seeing their dutifull obedience) should haue had iust cause to haue blamed the breach of his Edicts but newly confirmed. I will not presume to censure of the motives of these troubles; I leaue it to the iudicious Reader: onely giue me leaue to let downe what I haue receiued from a iudicious Gentleman of the same Nation and Religion: one that hath been much employed in those State-affaires: That the fiery zeale of some who had the guiding of their consciences, had thrust them into these desperate courses. But let vs now returne to our History.

The King hauing left many Garisons in Bearne and base Nauarre, there were foure strong Companies put into Nauarreux, the which is commonly called in France Nauarins; being the only place of importance within the Prouince, and considerable for many reasons. Some Bearnois of the reformed Religion, much discontented for the change of the Gouernor of this place, especially the Benfins (nephewes to La Salle the last Gouernour) beganne to make many practices to surprise it; not so much for any particular zeale to their Religion, but for hope to make themselves masters of the place whereof their vncl had beene so long time Gouernor. To this end, hauing a house within a league and a halfe of Nauarreux, whither they came often, they made great shewes of loue to the three Captaines which were there in garison, and commanded in the absence of the Seigneure of Poyenne; so as these Captaines would rather haue suspected their owne Souldiers then these Benfins, with whom they lived like brethren, eating and drinking daily together. During this familiaritie these Captaines had diuers aduertisements, that there would be an enterprize vpon Nauarreux: whereupon they doubted their guards, and searched diuers houses. Vpon the eight of December at night, one of the inhabitants which was of the Conspiracy, discovered it to a Souldier which lay in his house, (whether moued with loue to him, or his fidelitie to the King, or vpon hope of recompence) and said vnto him, That for the execution thereof one of the Benfins was hidden within the Towne. This Souldier discovered it presently to the three Captaines, who put their men in armes, and searched the houses of such as were accused, but found no man: they seized vpon the chiefe inhabitants, who denyed all confidently: comming to the house of one Merous, whereas Benfin was, with many others, which hee had drawne into the Towne for the execution of the Enterprize; they slipped out at a backe-doore, hoping to saue themselves the next day. Notwithstanding in the search of this house, they found two in the hay, who being examined denyed all. In the end they found some in the streets: E they take one to whom they promise his life so he will confesse; the which he did, telling them that there should haue beene two troops made within the Towne, the one of Inhabitants, who about midnight should haue killed the three Captaines, and charged the Corps de gard in the market-place, whilst that Benfin and such as came with him, should haue fallen vpon the Corps de gard at the Port, and force it open to giue entry vnto five hundred men which should be there ready. Whereupon they made such diligent search, as they found diuers; yet Benfin and most of his company got away ouer the walls, by cords and other meanes. The next day there were ten of them condemned and hanged in the market-place.

This Execution, and the feare of the like for many others, which were imprisoned, caused them of the reformed Religion to make many enterprizes in Languedoc & the Countrey of Foix: and among others in the Towne of Montauban; whereas all the religious men were imprisoned; as you may conceiue by this Letter of aduice which was sent vnto the King.

Sir, I cannot but grieue to see my selfe still forced to importune your Maiesties patience by my Letters, vpon the continuall errors of your subiects of the reformed Religion; but the world I haue to enforce your Maiesty duly of the present estate of this Country, and the oppressions which your subiects receiue, and the contempt of your authority, binde 1621 "me thereunto. Notwithstanding your Declaration against the Assemblée of Rochel, their A "Deputations have bene made: and notwithstanding the Resolution of the Parliament of "Thoulouse, their Consultation about the same is held at Montauban; their Fortifications

 "are continued in an extraordinary fashion: for they goe voluntary thereunto, both men "and women, and of all qualities; and are taxed in particular to performe at their owne "charges, certaine fathomes, by a certaine time, and of such a depth. This they doe in all "their Townes, and at Castres more then the rest. At Montauban they have committed a "new excesse on the 17 of this month of December, vpon aduice that at Nauarreux they "had executed tenne of the traitors which had intelligence to surprize it: They presently
 "imprisoned all the Clergy-men, and all the Catholiques they found within their towne; B
 "and sent to aduertise all those of their Towne, which were at Thoulouse for their priuate
 "affaires, to retire. They searched for all the Clergy-men in their houses, and caried them "prisoners to the Bishops palace, guarded by two Companies of Souldiers, where they
 "continued till the next day at five a clocke in the euening, and then were dismissed, with "charge not to depart vpon paine of death: the which was done by a resolution of their
 "Towne-house, and the abridgment of the generall Assembly.

"The first President of Thoulouse blamed this fact much by his Letters; That to the "preiudice of the publique and priuate safety, they had treacherously abused the Catho-
 "liques, nothing apprehending the danger of them of their Religion, dispersed throughout "the Realme, who might runne the like fortune, if the faith of the Edicts were not religi- C
 "ously obserued by the Catholiques, who conform themselves to your Maiesties com"mandments. At the same instant the first President foibad all reprisals, whereby hee assured "them which were of the Religion in Thoulouse. After this, the Clergy-men were freed "from the present danger, vntill that the factious of the said Religion finde some new oc"casion. It is true, that some of the Magistrats, Consuls, and Burgeses, disliked of this "proceeding, but they are subiect to the law of the factious. Your Parliament hath here-
 "upon interposed their authoritie, and often forbidden them to continue their Assembly,
 "but they desist not. This disorder of Montauban hath been followed with the like insol"encies in the Countie of Foix, where they shut the gates of Saierdun, Cazeres, and Pamiers,
 "taking the Catholiques, & seizing vpon some farms, into which they have put souldiers, D
 "who haue robbed passengers, and haue failed to surprize a strong place, belonging to the "Bishop of Pamiers, putting the whole countie into combustion. Wee hope your Maiesty "will prescribe them their duties; and prouide that your subiects may be freed from the in-"conueniences which may follow in their weake and turbulent resolutions. Their fury for "the fact of Nauarreux is great, proceeding from the resolutions of the Assembly of Milhau;
 "and it is doubted that they of Montauban will be drawne to the like enterprizes. In the "meane time it is a great toyle to your Catholique subiects, to be alwayes vpon the defen-
 "sue, fearing the attempts of men which are in perpetuall counsell and armes. Wee will "attend your commandments, and remaine, &c. From Thoulouse, Decemb 22. 1620.

About the end of this year, the King went to visit his frontiers of Picardy, as Abbe- E
 "ville, Montreuil, Bullen, Calais, and Ardres, putting two Companies of his Guards into "that Towne, wherewith some were not well satisfied. This voyage continued from the "14 of December to the 12 of Ianuary, in a very hard and vnseasonable time for his traine.
 "The Archduke Albert, hearing that he was vpon the frontiers, sent to visit him by an Earle
 "of the House of Granuelle. The King sent the Marshall of Cadener, brother to the Duke "of Luynes, in Embassie to his Maiesty of great Britaine: hee parted from Calais on the "first of Ianuary, being followed by a gallant troop of Noblemen, and had a very honour"able reception from the King at his coming to Court. Within few dayes after his re-
 "turne to Paris, hee was receiued in Parliament Duke of Chaunc and Peere of France.

In the beginning of this year, the Deputies of the reformed Religion assembled at F
 "Rochel, came to Court, where they published their Remonstrances vnto the King, touch"ing the causes of their assembly: the which although it be long, yet I am enforced to in"sert it, being the subiect of all the following miseries, whereby the Reader may bee the "better satisfied.

Sir, wee do not thinke that the outrages of our ill-willers, who it may be will seeke to "stop your Maiesties cares to our most humble petitions, should also stop our mouths:
 "neither were it iust, that during the liberty of our enemies, to slander our actions, and

A make them odious, they should impose vs silence: or that hauing hindered the effects of "your sacred word and royall bounty, they should blame vs, if wee insist at your Maiesties
 "feet to demand the accomplishment of that which it hath pleased you to promise. Where"fore Sir, in confidence of our iustice and your bounty, we present vnto your Maiesty our "most humble requests by writing, which is now all the meanes we haue, since our access
 "into your royall presence is forbidden vs, by a Declaration published against vs, for our "being here assembled vpon the onely subiect of our complaints. But for that this action "of ours is repured a crime, and our proceeding defamed ascending vnto some rebellion,
 "wee should iudge our selues vnworthy of the fruit of your gratiuous regard vnto our peti"tions; or that we should make any, if our consciences accused vs to be culpable of any "crime; or if wee had not both before God and your Maiesty our iustifications ready to "exhibit.

We haue assembled Sir, heretofore vnder the permission and authoritie of your Ma-
 "iesty, in your Towne of Loudun, about the same subiect of our complaints, and to pro"cure from you the reparation of so many grieuances, by which our liberty and assurance
 "are continually impaired, and the authority of your Edicts from day to day weakened.
 "The long suffering of our euils, the apprehension of their increase, the knowledge of our "enemies audacious pride, which swels with our disgrace, the expresse charge of those "which haue sent vs, and the generall consent of all men, that your Edicts (the fundamen-
 "tall Lawes of your Estate) cannot bee vndermined, but it will fall, caused vs to attend
 "sixe whole moneths, with perseverance proportionable to our necessity, to obtaine of "your Maiesty some effects of your good will towards vs. In the end, after this long in"stance, your Maiesty was pleased to command vs to name our Deputies, and to separate
 "our selues, and that the Prince and the Duke of Luynes, should giue their words to the "Duke of Lesdiguiers and Monsieur de Chastillon, and by them to assure vs, that separating
 "our selues according to your commandment, your Maiesty would within six moneths,
 "cause some principall points of our demands to be faithfully executed, and fauourably
 "answer our grieuances: and that within seauen moneths the Deputies of Beame should "be heard, a month after the execution of the said points. And that if the said promises
 "D should not be fulfilled, the same persons might assemble againe, or others delegated,
 "whereof the Prince gaue his word, to procure vs this permission with effect; and Monsieur
 "de Luynes assured that his word should be as good as a Brieffe, and it might be better. They "added on your Maiesties behalfe, that this was the first word you had given to your sub-
 "iects of the Religion since that you held the helme of your Estate; and therefore wee
 "should giue credit vnto it, hauing bene neuer violated. This onely consideration stonget
 "then all the rest, found no resistance in our consent, and shewed our speedy obedience.

After the nomination of our Deputies, your Maiesty confirmed to those which brought "the names, that you would effect the promise which the Prince and Duke of Luynes had "giuen vs. Thus separating our selues, we drew an Act of our obedience, containing all the "E foresaid conditions and promises, according to the which, the Deputies of Provinces in "their particular Assemblies, according to the order allowed by your Maiesty, hauing giuen
 "an account of their employment, haue confirmed or subrogated all those which are here
 "at this present, after the six moneths, in case the points accorded were not executed. This
 "hath not bene done in secret, your Maiesty might easily know it, and the Lords of your
 "Councell were not ignorant of it.

All these things promised being vnexecuted after the six moneths, they haue notwith-
 "standing pressed your Maiesty to goe into Beame, before the seauenth, contrary to your "Letters written to the Parliament of Pau, the 21 of September. So as contrary to those
 "expresse promises, they haue anticipated the execution of the restitution of the Clergy-
 "F lands, which hath been followed with a great alteration in the Countie, and the totall re-
 "uoc of the safety and liberty of those which make profession of the same religion with vs.

For these causes Sir, according to the order taken amongst vs, vpon the assurances
 "giuen vs on your Maiesties behalfe, the case so hapning, wee haue bene called to this "place, whither we are come with charge from all your subiects of the religion, with an in"tent to obtaine by our humble petitions vnto your Maiesty, the accomplishment of what "was promised; reparation for the important grieuances which haue since hapned, and an "effectuall assurance of your good inclination to our protection against the threats and
 "alarmes

1621 alarms, which are generally practised with a designe of our totall ruine. Wherefore Sir, A we say out of a good conscience, that we are in no sort culpable of the contempt of your authority: but contrariwise that the causes of our reunion in this place are lawful, and our proceeding without crime, being authorized and supported by your sacred word. If our enemies haue preuailed so much, as by a Declaration published against vs, they call in question the word which hath beene giuen vs in your Maiesties name, and make vs guilty: it is a new subiect of bitter griefe, and of iust complaint. We are not culpable, but in beleeuing the word of the first Prince of the blood, and of a Nobleman whom your Majesty doth cherish dearly. We are not guilty but for renewing the pursuit of our humble petitions, authorized by the first inuolable word which it hath pleased your Majesty to giue B vs, the which we haue taken for pledge and caution after so many delays, and by the iustice which the appearance of so many grievances hath made so publique. May it now please your Majesty to haue consideration of our innocency, and not to suffer our enemies thus to oppress vs before you. They take vs to haue violated your authority: but it is ealie to iudge whole actions tend most to the preservation of your authority, and the setting of your Crowne. When as we pursue, by the formes of respect and reuerence due to your Majesty, the execution of your Edicts; the reparation of so many breaches, and the means of our preferuation; they command vs to be silent, and then oppose the name of your authority to our preferuance, as if we fought to crosse it. But where your authority is truly and really engaged, as in the maintenance of your Edicts, and the assurance C of your word: what care haue they to persuee it? nay what doe they not to ruine it?

Is there any thing which doth more wound your Maiesties authority and reputation, then that after such solemne promises, we could not obtaine deliuerance of the estate of the places of safety in Dauphine, the deniaill whereof tends to make vs lose the chiefe Townes? In the meane time they haue giuen vs your word, the which they might free in halfe an houre. They haue promised vs faithfully vpon your word the reception of two Councillors in your Parliament of Paris, so long delayed contrary to your Edicts, the which is not yet accomplished but in part. But which is worse, this faith promised is frustrated in this point, in the most important, and which we vied most; by a Decree which the Court hath made, that the Seigneur Le Cag should not resigne but to a Romane Catholicke: whereby our liberty is oppressed, being granted to them of our Religion by your Edicts, leaue to enter indifferently into charges. They assured vs in your Maiesties name, that the restitution of the Clergy goods in Bearn should not be put in execution before seauen moneths; and that within one month after the execution of the points accorded, they should be heard in their Remonstrances: but contrariwise they haue anticipated the time, and drawne your Majesty into Bearn before that any of the promises tooke effect. And without hearing their grievances, the restitution hath not onely beene executed, but to say truly, hath serued as a pretext for the entire desolation of those of the Religion, and the liberty of the Country; although their obedience and chearfull reception of your Majesty did merit a more fauourable vsage. But what greater violence to your authority, E Sir, then after our last separation made vpon such solemne promises, with liberty to reunit our selues in case of failing, to present our petitions and grievances to your Majesty, being now in these termes, in stead of hearing vs, they cause vs to be declared guilty: they deny that we had cyther promise or permission to assemble, and the words which should be as good as Briefes, are made frustrate. They indite vs because wee haue beleueed: and which is worse, they threaten the towne wherein we are assembled with siege and ruine, that is to say, your whole Estate with a dangerous accident, whereof your Majesty, and your wife Councill may fore-see the consequence.

What shall we say touching so many points of your Edicts infringed, yea, since your Majesty sate at the helme of your Estate? with what instance haue we pursued the restoring of our Religion in Clermont of Lodeux, a place of surety, whereas our enemies (to the outrages they haue done vs) haue added a contempt of your authority, hindring by armes the execution of the Decrees of your Councill, and expelling the Commissaries which your Majesty had sent to that effect. They made shew to prevent our complaints with restitution. They called it your Maiesties business. They acknowledged that your respect and authority was sensibly wounded: yet they had rather haue it suppressed, then in raising it, they should repara the breaches which are done vnto our liberty. Thus by a violence

A violence unrestrained and not punished, the exercise of our Religion is banished from a place which hath beene assigned vnto vs for the maintenance thereof. They haue taken from vs the guards of Priuies in Viuairet, one of the places where nothing should be altered according to your Edicts and Briefes. And to the end all the rest should be made vnprofitable and without any safety, the monies appointed for the Garisons and Ministers, haue not beene paid these eightene moneths. Finally, Sir, contrary to your will and authority, and to the prejudice of the peace and publique tranquility, they preach sedition against vs: they publish bookes to the same end: whence comes it, that of late in diuers places they vnbury our dead; they burne our Temples; they chase away our Pastors, and they will not suffer those places which are giuen vnto vs neere vnto Townes for the exercise of our Religion, to be deliuered vnto vs. The which we haue and doe still suffer in diuers parts of your Realme, and namely, at Moulins, Bourges, Baux in Prouence, at Lyons, and at Dijon, and yet we can obtaine no iustice.

We will adde no other particular grievances, wherewith the Articles of our complaints are charged, some without answer, and some answered contrary to the intention of your Edicts: and for reparation whereof, they make no accompt after all our pursuit to send Commissaries into the Prouinces, notwithstanding any promise which hath been made; and such as haue beene sent, refuse to doe their charge when they are summoned. By these contrauentions, Sir, your sacred authority and the reputation of your iustice are highly intereased.

But all this is little in regard of the pernicious accidents which they endeavour to produce: for these men, Sir, whom all your good subiects Romane Catholics well affected to your Crowne, doe hold for enemies; and all those whom they haue corrupted in your Estate, to serue a foraine command, whose Ministers they are, strue now more then euer to raise vp that Engine in your Realme, by the which they haue ouerthrowne (as wee see) so many Estates in Christendome; and by the same practices seeke to draw yours into the like confusion. Euery man knows how by their seditious Sermons and the secrete drifts of their Congregations, they daily more and more stirre vp the peoples hatred against vs, with designe to ruine vs. They are so insolent as vaunt to D haue an absolute Empire ouer your conscience, to be able to possess your eares and mind with what they please, and to haue already induced your Majesty to hate vs: so as assuring themselves of our disgrace with your Majesty, they haue plotted (what wrongs fouer are done vs) to hinder still the reparation. Whereby in the end hauing made the vigour of your Edicts fruitlesse, they take occasion to make our complaints to be held a crime, as they doe at this present, and thereby to stirre vp a generall persecution. And would to God their designe were not so farre aduanced, they should not then proceed against vs as offenders: they should not heare throughout your Realme (as they doe) war pronounced against vs, saying that the Dice are cast, that preparations are made in all parts, and your countries of Poictou and Guienne full of troops, which already in hope diuide E the spoile of this Towne.

These alarms, Sir, these fatall accidents wherewith your Estate is threatened, are the chiefe motives which make vs humbly to beseech your Majesty to discern our iustice from the slander and hatred of our enemies. And that it would please your Majesty to cause the Declaration published against vs to be disannulled, and to giue vs free access vnto you to present our complaints and humble petitions: to the end that returning with an aduall testimony of your good inclination towards vs, wee may infuse into the hearts of all men, some seeds of better hope; that as your Majesty doth acknowledge vs for your faithful subiects, you will protect vs against all the designs and enterprises of such as hate vs: and that our liberty, goods, and liues, being thereby assured, wee may employ them F for your Maiesties seruice: Protesting religiously before God and men, for our selues and all those whom we represent, that we desire not the liberty of our consciences, and to serue God, with any other intent, then to remaine inseparably tied to your obedience, and to the good and aduancement of your Estate and Crowne, and your Maiesties long and happy reigne, whose prosperity recommending with all our vovs to God, we beseech him that he will make vs find fauour with your Majesty, and inspire your mind with the knowledge that we are your Maiesties most humble, most obedient, and most faithful subiects and seruants, The Deputies of the Assembly at Rochel. The 2 of January, 1621.

These

This complaint is interpreted against the Jesuits.

These were the reasons whereby they pretended to iustifie the calling of their Assembly, the continuing whereof proued the subiect of all the ensuing miseries: for what can complaints and iustificacions preuaile with an incensed Prince, who is possessed with other counsels? They giue him to vnderstand, That the calling of this Assembly is an affront done to his authority: that it was a breach of his Edicts: that it was a president of dangerous consequence for his State: and that it was an act tending to rebellion. That if he suffered it, it would blemish his reputation, and make him contemptible both to his subiects and strangers. These were strong motives to thrust a young Prince into choller: but you shall heare an answer which was published in the name of the Duke of Ledsiguier touching the said complaints, and sent vnto the Assembly.

The Duke of Ledsiguier answers the Assembly at Rouen.

My Masters, the Letter you wrote vnto me on the 28 of the last Moneth, inuities mee to make this answer: I pray you take it in good part, comming from the heart and hand of one who alwayes will wish honour and prosperitie to your iust desires. You are assembled according to the resolution you tooke at your parting from Loudun: but you cannot shew that you haue leaue. It is true, you required a Brieve for it, but could not obtaine it. Wherefore our generall Deputies should first haue made instance to the King to allow of it, and their humble petition should haue bene grounded vpon the necessity there was to assemble. This hath not bene done, wherefore my opinion is, That hauing not obserued this forme, his Maiesty hath iust cause to be incensed against you, and against those which haue receiued you. As for the occasions of your Assembly, they are so small, as they scarce make any shew. The King had promised you, that within fixe Moneths he would cause L'Estoure to bee restored: that two Councillors of the Religion should be admitted into the Parliament at Paris: That a Brieve should bee giuen for the guard of places of safety, the which was deliuered soone after to our Deputies: And touching the affaires of Bearne, that within seven moneths the Deputies of the Countrie of Bearne should be heard by his Maiesty. There was a moneth more of time giuen, not so much in consideration of that businesse, as for that they imagined the action of L'Estoure would proue difficult, and that they would not meddle with Bearne before they had ended the other: and of this intention Monseigneur de Blainville is a true witness, being the inuenter of this delay granted by his Maiesty, to the end hee might haue time to make L'Estoure obey, before he required obedience from them of Bearne. You know that L'Estoure hath bene deliuered to a Gentleman of the Religion: that the Councillors haue bene receiued: and a Brieve for the places of safety deliuered. There remains nothing to giue you but an Estate of the places in Dauphine: This was not so hasty a businesse as you must needs assemble to demand them: for we hold them, and no man can tests them.

I know that the clamour of them of Bearne, hath bene a powerfull motive for your Assembly: but I thinke before you should haue done it in regard of these points about mentioned, you should haue made petition by our Deputies, or haue required Monseigneur Chastillon and me, to beseech the King to remember what we had promised you in his Maiesties name, confirmed by his royall mouth at Fontainebleau, that our Deputies of the Assembly at Loudun, when as they aduertised him of their separation.

I haue briefly touched these points, in answer to that you haue written vnto me; that I am not ignorant of the inexecution of most of the important things which had bene promised you: and I represent vnto you what I know, the which you should call to mind, to the end that you your selues might iudge that your Assembly hath bene somewhat too hasty: and I say with griefe, that it may be held vnlawfull: This is the reason his Maiesty hath so declared it: but his indignation may be mitigated and turned into grace. I know no meanes to attaine vnto it but by your separation: for although you pretended grievances were apparent and full of reason, yet could you not present them to the King to doe you iustice: but by the lawfull meanes which admit the Subiect to his Soueraigne Prince, otherwise it is a blemish to authority, a sharing of the Royalty, and the making of a good cause bad. Moreover, it doth incite by a bad example his Maiesties Subiects, to shake off the gracious yoke of his obedience. This fault must not proceed from vs; I say from vs, who haue alwayes obeyed our Kings in all things, and haue onely retained that which belongs to GOD, to yeeld it vnto him

A him by their Maiesties permission. He that reignes ouer vs at this day will not deny it: He will obserue his Edicts, and heare our Complaints and Remonstrances, when we shall addresse our selues vnto him with those submissions which are befitting vs, and due from vs to him. I beseech you and exhort you as much as I can and ought, to put your selues into this posture after your separation, and I will ioyne with our Deputies, humbly to beseech his Maiesty to grant vs that which we may lawfully demand, be it for our selues or our brethren of the Countrey of Bearne, who haue drawne their miserie vpon them by their owne fault. I had diuerted it, if they had giuen me credit when I was in Court. I presse your separation, for without it, I see my selfe (to my great griefe) deprived of all meanes to ayd and serue you with the King: But if you will beleue my aduice, and separate your selues, I dare promise that his Maiestie at my humble sute, will forget the fault which he conceiues you haue committed against his authority; will take regard of our complaints and humble petitions by your generall Deputies: will call his troops out of Poitou, Guienne, and other places which hold our Churches in continuall alarme: will remoue the crime of the Deputies of the Assembly, to the end they may returne with all safety: will make a new Declaration in your fauour, according to the graces which haue bene granted vs, to quench all iealousies: and finally, will giue all reasonable content, setting a firme and assured peace in his Estate, to maintaine his reputation with his neighbours and allies, and to make himselfe a necessary Arbitrator of all their differences: the which we should desire about all things, and not to hinder him as wee doe, by any ciuill combustion, whereof the cause might be imputed vnto vs. If I may be beleueed, there will be no need for me to send any body vnto you, nor may I doe it, because you are assembled without the Kings permission; not that I will leaue to be of your vnion, for I will remain firme in the seruice of the Churches of God, and of the profession of our Religion vnto the last gaspe; continuing still in the obedience due to his Maiestie, as a thing conuenient.

In this affection I will rest, by the helpe of God, whom I beseech to cause you to receive my aduice, and the assurance of my promises, grounded vpon the hope I haue of his Maiesties goodness, that we may continue in his fauour with all surety, and his Realme in peace. And so I will remaine your humble and affectionate seruant, Ledsiguier. Grenoble the first of February, 1621.

This yeare there fell out an accident at Priuas in Viuaetz, which disquieted the peace of the Countrey. After the death of the Seigneur of Chambault, Lord of Priuas, being of the Reformed Religion; his onely daughter and heyre, widow to a Gentleman also of the Religion, married with the Viscont of Cheylane, a Catholique, sonne to the Seigneur of L'Estrange, who hauing taken possession of the Castle of Priuas, and the Tower of the Lake, put Catholique Captaines and Souldiers into them; the which had the last yeare put all the inhabitants of the Religion in Priuas, Viuaetz, and Seuenues into alarme, which caused great combustions on either side: they of the Religion pretending that it was a Towne of guard, although none of the hostages of surety, and that the Castle and the Towne appertained vnto them. On the contrary, the Viscont of Cheylane maintained that being Lord thereof, and they his vassals, the guard belonged to him. This trouble was for a time appeased by an ordinary courie, That things should remaine in the estate that they were, vntill that by an Assembly vnder the Kings authority the businesse were agreed. Notwithstanding, the inhabitants of Priuas, impatient to see Catholique Souldiers put into the Castle and Tower of the Lake, made many instances and complaints, as well to the generall Synode of the Ministers which was held in October last at Alce, as to Monseigneur de Chastillon at Montpellier. The Duke of Vantadour, Lieutenant generall for the King in Languedoc, sent his Prouost to take information thereof.

F In January this yeare, they fell to armes, the Towne against the Castle. Whereupon the Duke of Vantadour sent two Gentlemen with his Letters for the pacifying of this combustion; offering them his succour and assistance, either by his authority as the Kings Lieutenant Generall, or by the mediation of the Chamber of the Edict of Castrres, and the Presidiall Court of Nismes their naturall Iudges, from whence hee would draw Commissaries to doe them iustice, and punish the delinquents: But this preuailed nothing: for the seditious continued their attempts. Whereupon the Duke of Vantadour was forced to goe to Araxes to maintaine the Kings authoritie, for that the Castle of Priuas was besieged by the Seigneur of Buſon and them of the religion, A who had seized vpon diuers other Castles. Thus they take armes in Viuaretz on all sides: The Duke of Montmorency, Gouernor of the Country, hearing that Buſon with the Consuls and Inhabitants of Priuas, had besieged Saint Pallais in the Castle, seeing the Kings authority contemned by this action, and his honor engaged, hee resolved to goe to Priuas. Passing by Montpellier, the Earle of Chastillon with the Consuls of Montpellier, Nismes, and Vzes, and the Deputies of the Assembly of that Circle being then at Lunel, came vnto him, entreating him not to proceed to extremities: that they disauowed Buſon action, and would labour to draw him to obedience: That he should cary himselfe as prudently in this, as hee had done powerfully the yeare before. To whom hee answered, That he could neither stay nor retire, and that the affront was such, as hee must B maintain the Kings authority and his owne honour, in punishing Buſon and the inhabitants of Priuas in such sort, as they might serue for a president to posterity, hauing rebelled against their King, and broken their word with their Gouernor; but at the entreaty of Monſieur de Chastillon, he would goe thither with a spirit of peace, and should be glad that they themselves would reduce Buſon to his duty.

The Duke of Montmorency was sent to Monſieur de Chastillon.

La Baume sent to the King.

Vpon the way he was aduertised that the Castle of Priuas was deliuered vp by Saint Pallais, vpon an honorable composition to depart with their full armes: the which did much trouble the Duke, who sent presently La Baume to aduertise the King thereof, and to attend his pleasure; who presently returned him with Letters whereby he did much commend his fidelity and care, recommending vnto him especially the publique peace, but yet he desired to be obeyed.

The Duke, finding that he could not satisfie the Kings expectation without force, he employed all his meanes, credit, and friends, and in fiew dayes drew together eight thousand foot, and foure hundred horse. The Assembly at Lunel commaunded Monſieur de Chastillon to arme, who with the like speed leauied three or foure thousand horse and foot. Buſon fortifies himselfe, and is assisted with men from the Assembly. The Duke marching towards Priuas, the Duke of Lefdiguiers going towards the Court, desired to conferre with him about this businesse; whereupon he went to Valence with the Duke of Vantadour, but they could not find the meanes to settle the Kings authority in Priuas; D whereupon they retired, yet with this resolution, not to attempt any thing against Priuas vntill they had received his Maiesties intention.

Villeneuve de Berg taken by the Duke.

The Duke, in his Councell of warre, resolved to besiege Villeneuve de Berg, into the which the Assembly had put some Companies of Souldiers, being a very convenient place to receiue the succours which the Seuennes should send to Priuas, if it were besieged. This Towne was inuested on the fifth of March: Buſon seeing the Kings army had left him, and was turned thither, hee presently sent an hundred Musketers to relieue them, but they found the Towne so besieged as it was not possible to enter.

The next day the Duke summons the Consuls to open their gates: who seeing themselves too weak to maintain a siege, and without hope of succours, they caryed him E their keyes, beseeching him to let them enioy the liberty of the Edicts. It is the Kings will and intent, (said he) that his subjects should enioy the free exercise of the one and the other Religion; you shall not be troubled in yours, and I will keepe you from molesting the Catholiques. Hereupon hee sent certaine Companies to seize vpon the gates, and went himselfe to lodge in the Towne; where the next day hee caused Masse to be restored, whereof they had bene deprived 62 yeares. The same day the Seigneur de Reaux Lieutenant of the Guard, arrived at Viuaretz, sent by his Maiesty, to cause as well Monſieur de Montmorency as Monſieur de Chastillon, and the Assembly at Lunel to disarme; which they did in shew: yet afterwards M. Montmorency went and besieged Vualz; and the reason was, for that they had refused to lodge Montmajor brother to Collonel D'Ornano, F who led the Regiment of his brother Mazarques, to whom the towne belonged, with an intent to vse his subjects more kindly then another would: vpon this repulse (thinking his honor to be interessed) hee intreated the Duke to make good the quarter which he had giuen him. Vualz is strong by situation, being among the mountaines, and hath a Castle of aduantage: the inhabitants are all of the reformed Religion, and there were likewise 400 Souldiers sent them from the Seuennes, so as they resolved to defend the town, and not to lodge any Catholique troops. They fortified a Mill with an hundred of their best Souldiers,

A Souldiers, whereby they might hinder the passage of the river of Ardeche. The Marquis of Portes charged them, and in the end forced them to retire to the Towne, which was presently inuested; so as after some volleys of Cannon, they desired to parley with De Reaux, to whom they said, they desired to obey his Maiesties commandments, and to be maintained according to the Edicts, beseeching him to bee mediator for them vnto the Duke: who considering the strong situation of the Castle, was content to receiue them to grace, vpon condition that they should haue three hundred men of Mazarques regiment in garison: that the Castle should be deliuered into the hands of an Exempt of the Guard: that the Souldiers should be conducted to a place of safety: and that the Consuls should B vpon their knees for the inhabitants, demand pardon of the King in the person of the Duke, who should maintaine them in the liberty of their religion.

Vualz yielded to the Duke, of Montmorency.

The Seigneur of Autiege had bene sent by the Assembly of that Circle, with twelve hundred men, to defend Vualz; but hearing vpon the way that it was lost, he put himselfe into Valons, and expelled the Exempt of the Guard whom De Reaux had placed there. This action caused the Councell of warre to resolve to besiege it, to repaire this affront done to the Kings authority. The Duke caused the army to march, and the town was inuested and battered: a reasonable breach was made, & the Marquis de Portes lodged with his men vpon the walls. Whereupon Autiege finding that hee should be forced the same day, he demanded a safe conduct to parley with the Marquis, who conducted him to the Duke; by whom this Composition was made: That within one hour after, hee and all his Souldiers should depart out of Valons, with their armes onely, without Drumme or March light, like vanquished men: That they should not cary armes for six moneths in the Prouince: and that if there were any Inhabitants of Valons amongst them, the Captain in whose troope they were found, should be slayed and punished. The Souldiers retired presently through the Army to Monſieur de Chastillon, and the town was abandoned for one whole day to the spoyle of the Souldiers.

Valons yielded to the Duke.

In Ianuary there was a Letter presented vnto the King touching the Assembly at Rochel, in the name of the Marshall of Bouillon, as followeth.

The Marshall of Bouillon presents to the King.

Sir, I was resolved to remaine in silence, seeking to ease my ordinary indisposition in the quiet rest of my family: but now I thought that I ought not to concele from your Maiesty, That of late the Deputies of high Languedoc and high Guienne assembled at Millaut, haue sent a Gentleman vnto mee, to aduertise mee of the feares and distrusts wherein your subjects of the Religion are in those parts, as well as in other Prouinces, by reason of the threats they vse daily in all the parts of your Kingdom: That they will breake the Edicts; take from them the liberty of their consciences, the safety of their liues, and the quiet enioying of their dignities: moued hereunto (they say) by that which hath passed in Bearne, for that they had anticipated the execution, contrary to the order, whereof they had giuen assurance in your Maiesties name, at the last assembly of your subjects at Loudun; they hauing committed no act contrary to their duties. Whereunto they E adde the execution of those things which had bene promised: the ialousie which the Garisons giue them which haue bene left in diuers places without necessity: the rigorous Iniunctions made against the Assembly at Rochel, which they hold to be grounded vpon the word, which (they beleue) had been giuen in your Maiesties name to the said Assembly at Loudun, as the Deputies thereof haue reported to their Prouinces: and diuers other occasions arising daily, which makes them doubt there is a generall designe to ruine the Religion, and all those which make profession thereof within your Realme. And hereupon, Sir, protesting that they will neuer depart from the duty and obedience whereunto their subiection and conscience doth binde them to your Maiesty: I cannot but suffer in their miseries, being bound thereunto by the profession of that Religion which I haue F common with them. They inuite mee to giue my aduice, and to send some one to the Assembly at Rochel, to ioine in their humble complaints they desire to make vnto your Maiesty: I thought it my duty first to aduertise you before I made any answer, and to beseech you to giue me your commandments thereupon. Sir, I will presume to tell you with that humble respect which I owe, and the liberty which my age and former experience hath giuen mee, That Remonstrances being the onely and lawfull meanes by the which your Subjects of the Religion should adresse themselves vnto your Maiesty, who by your equity may iudge of the iustice or iniustice thereof, and haue have more contentment and profit for your service by receiving them, than in rejecting, especially now when they are so full of distrust, as they thinke their ruine is resolved, and that they will thrust them into despair to vndoe them. The remedy cannot bee applied but by your Maiestie, who alone after God may diuert this mischief, and prevent it by your wisdom and authority, in continuing your royall protection to your subjects of the Religion, and not suffer that to aduance the ruine of so many innocent persons, who breathe nothing but the prosperity of your reigne, and their faithfull obedience to your service, they should offer violence to the Edicts of Kings your Predecessors, the which your Maiestie hath oft confirmed. I cannot beleue, Sir, they give you such hurtfull counsels, and so prejudiciall to your Estate; and much lesse, that your Maiestie will put them in practice, to kindle a fire of ciuill warre in the midst of your kingdom, which the deceased King your father quenched with so much pains and wisdom; knowing well that the conscience cannot be forced by the power of sword or fire, nor the spirit constrained to beleue that which it beleueth not: It might be rather feared that by a doubtfull and vncertain hope (which the passion of some ill-willers vnto your subjects beleeue your authority would bee engaged in most dangerous inconueniences. And I pray God to remove from about your sacred Maiestie all those which would enduce you to this violence, and together with them the dreadfull presages which may come of such counsels. That if in these present occurrents, which haue given mee occasion to write vnto you, touched with a liuely feeling which I haue of the mischief these distrusts may breed, and wherein I attend the honor of your commandements, I may be so happy to be able to contribute any thing to helpe to maintain the publiqu peace, and tranquillity, all which your Maiesty may expect of me, and of my deuotion and fidelity to your service, I most humbly beseech you to excuse me, if by reason of my infirmities of the gout, I haue bene enforced to borrow my sonnes hand to signe, rather then to faile of my duty, beseeching God to poure all his blessings vpon your Maiestie, and to give you a long and happy life. From Sedan the second of January, 1621.

The D. of Lesdiguiers second Letter to the Assembly at Rochel.

The Answer of the Assembly.

Monseur de la Force Gouverneur of Bearne, wrote a Letter about the same time to his Maiestie, and to the same effect. The Duke of Lesdiguiers wrote a second Letter vnto the Assembly at Rochel on the 22 of February, giuing them to vnderstand, that he went to Court according to the Kings commandement, where hee would serue the Churches with all his power, to the end they might be maintained in peace according to the Edicts; but hee could not comprehend the subject of their Conuocation, nor of their stay at Rochel, seeing that what had bene granted at their separation from Loudun, had bene fully executed.

To these two Letters of Monseur Lesdiguiers the Assembly at Rochel published an Answer in Print, whereby they did insin that their Assembly was lawfull, and with the Kings permission; they being promised at the time of their separation from Loudun, that if the Articles granted, were not accomplished within the time prefixed, they might meet againe: whereof he himselfe (they say) had giuen them assurance in his Maiesties name, and that the King himselfe had confirmed the same at Fontaine-bleau, to the Deputies of the Assembly, when they did aduertise him of their separation: so as they thought they had no need to craue a permission of more force, or a more firme assurance then his Maiesties most sacred word: and to confirme the reasons of their Assembly, they said that nothing had bene executed within the terme of six moneths prefixed, but only the deliery of the Briefe for the places of safety; and in the mean time the King had gone into Bearne, during the delay granted for their Remonstrances, which had not bene heard; where the restitution was not only executed, but their Churches had lost their safety and liberty which for many yeares they had enjoyed in those parts, and in an instant had followed the euent of all those dangerous consequents which they had doubted from the beginning.

Hereunto they added many other Griouances, humbly beseeching him to assist them with his fauour to his Maiesty, that he would be pleased to heare their complaints so necessary for their preseruatiue and peace.

Monseur de la Force continued in his Gouvernement of Bearne, and Nauarreux was committed to the fidelity of Monseur de Poyanne, betwene whom there grew ieaiousities: They Captaine Bessacienzeuy on Monsieur de Montgiscard.

A They of the Religion held an Assembly at Pau: from whence Captaine Benfins with some others, went and put himselfe into the Towers of Montgiscard, neere vnto the bridge of Berence, about the end of February, hauing before secretly sent thither store of munition and victuals. The Gouverneur of Nauarreux found presently that Benfins had not put himselfe into Montgiscard, but by the commandement of Monseur de la Force, and of the said Assembly, to the end that this place might ouer-look the store of munition and victuals, being seated vpon an high steepe Mountain, whereunto there is no passage but for one man going bias wile. On the top there are two Towers in the midst of a round platforme, being sixscore paces in diameter, enuironed with great ditches; which Benfins had suddenly fortified within the platforme, with a high Pallisade filled with earth. To haue a pretext of a quarrell, Benfins caused the Abbot of Caignore and one of Poyannes horsemen to be stayd vpon the bridge of Berence, whereupon he presently sent Lataulade his Lieutenant to Monseur de la Force, to acquaint him with Benfins actions in Montgiscard, and to tell him plainly, that if hee would not contribute, for his part hee was resolved, to doe his dutie for the Kings service. Lataulade returned without any other answer, but that Monseur de la Force knew not what it meant, but would refer himselfe to that which Monseur Poyanne should doe.

Hereupon he drawes what Forces hee can about Ortes, where he found a Gentleman belonging to Monseur de la Force, who told him, that if he went to Montgiscard, it would alter the Kings service in Bearne; to whom Monseur Poyanne answered, that hee went not to Montgiscard but to serue the King, to whom hee must giue an account of his actions, assuring himselfe that he would rest satisfied therewith as of his fidelity: and seeing that Monseur de la Force had referred the action to his discretion, he was resolved to see the end, and oppose himselfe to the rebellion of factious Benfins.

Before his coming thither, he sent to summon him to leaue the place; whose answer was, That he had bene put into the Towers of Montgiscard by the Assembly of Pau, and that he would not abandon it but by their commandement: whereupon they were instructed, and notwithstanding the difficulty of the hill, they made their approaches neere vnto the Towers. During this siege, Monseur de la Force takes occasion to draw together what forces he could, and the Marquis his sonne was coming out of Perigord with some troops of horse, and Regiments of foot. Monseur de la Force told a Gentleman, sent vnto him from Monseur de Poyanne, that he would be Master in his Gouvernement, and that he would come to Montgiscard to play his part, seeing that Monseur de Poyanne took vpon him his place. Thus the Nobility and Gentry of the Country were diuided into two factions, according to their affections in Religion. Monseur de Poyanne had drawe together 2000 foot, 500 Masters, and as many Harquebusers on horsebacke. In the meane time they presse the siege, and winne the first ditch, so as Benfins (seeing the danger that it could not be long before he were forced) desired a Parley, at the which he made no difficulty to offer the place, so as he might depart with a little honour. This being reported Montgiscard yielded.

E To Monseur de Poyanne, he made answer, That he had neuer fought for vanity nor spoile. The composition was made, that yielding vp Montgiscard, he and his Souldiers should depart with their liues and baggage, and be conducted to a place of safety; so as on the 11 of March he went forth of the place with about threescore Souldiers, which Monseur de Poyanne caused to be presently ruined.

The King being aduertised of these alterations in Bearne, he sent the Seigneur of Salady to Monseur de la Force, with commandement to disarme: and if hee found him not well inclined thereto, he should deliuer a Commission vnto the Duke of Epseron, to goe into Bearne with 2000 foot and 500 horse, to make them all disarm which had nor speciall warrant. His Maiesty also sent Letters of commandement to the Seigneurs of Montespau, Gondrin, Vignolles, Miossens, and Grammont, to assist him with their troops and felends. Saladie deliuered his charge to Monseur de la Force, commanding him to dismis his troops; to whom he answered, That he must first accommodate the enterprife which Monseur de Poyanne had made, in taking armes in his Gouvernement without his leaue. Saladie replied; The King hath aduowed him, considering the importance of the action. Now the question is, said he, that you tell me whether you will obey his Maiesties commandement or no: whereupon Monseur de la Force said vnto him, The Kings meaning is, that no man shall attempt vpon my Gouvernement: I desire to know his Maiesties pleasure: returne returne vnto him, and hauing brought me word, you shall finde that I haue alwayes bene and will be most obedient to his commandements. This delay makes Saladie deliuer his Commission to the Duke of Espernon and the rest, so as in an instant Guienne was in armes, and on the 21 day of April entred into Bearne, with whom Monseur de Payanne ioynd with 300 horse and good troopes of foot. This storme approaching, Monseur de la Force and all those of his partie retired speedily out of the Countrie, some hiding themselves in the mountaines, and hee himselfe with others retired into Guienne towards Nerac.

The D. of Epseron sent into Bearne with an army.

A peace offered in Bearne.

Monseur de la Force and his Souldiers dismissed from their places.

The D. of Espernon comming to Pau, he acquainted the Parliament that his commission was onely to haue the King obeyed: He assured himselfe of diuers Castles in the countrie, and caused such to be purloined as were fled into the mountaines, where many were slain in diuers encounters, and others taken prisoners: so as in fifteene dayes hee sealed a peace vnder the obedience of the Kings Edicts, causing euery man to enioy the libertie of his religion. As for Monseur de la Force, he lost the government of Bearne, which was conferred vpon the Marshall of Themes: His eldest sonne the Marquis, who was captain of the Guard, was dismissed from his place, and it was given to the Marquis of Munay. He had a younger sonne, whose name was Montpoullan, whom the King had alwayes affected, but now he was commanded to retire from Court.

The continuance of the assemblie at Rochel, had much incensed the King against them of the religion: the late Combustions in Viareux and Bearne, had increased his dislike. He thinks his authoritie blemished and troden vnder foot: He therefore resolues to arme, and to force them to obedience; but there wanted the sinewes of warre: An Army cannot subsist long without money: it supplies the wants both of backe and belly, which are of more force then any command. It must be found out, before he goes to this warre: but by what meanes? To draw it from the people, were to adde affliction to affliction: They haue smarted too much in the late ciuill combustions: so as in the end hee resolues to make vse of his owne, and to alienate some of his Reuenues: and to that end his Maiestie went on the third of April to the Parliament, to verifie an Edict, by the which hee declared that for the entertainment of his armies, and the reliefe of his poore subiects, (much oppressed by the calamities of former wars) he was resolved to alienate part of his imposts by way of a rent-charge to the value of 40000 pound sterling yearly, the which should be sold to the Prouost of Merchants and the Sheriffes of Paris, for the summe of 600000 pound sterling, which rent should be taken out of the Imposts of Salt, which should be bound and pawned for the payment and continuance of the said Rents. And his pleasure was, that sales and priuate assignations should bee made by the said Prouost and Sheriffes, to the particular inhabitants of Paris, and other his subiects, which were willing to buy, paying three parts in ready money, and the other fourth part, in discharge of those debts which were lawfully due by him, the which they should freely and peaceably enioy without any restraint vntill they were actually satisfied at one entire payment of the whole summe, for the which they had made their purchases, notwithstanding that a fourth part had bene paid in debts. There were also other Edicts verified for the making of money, the which was thought would bring in a Million of pounds sterling euery year for the maintenance of the warre against them of the Reformed Religion, and against the towne of Rochel, which contrary to his Maiesties will had suffered a general Assembly to be held there.

The Office of Constable offered to Lesdiguiers.

The King fore-seeing in the beginning of this year, that hee was to enter into agreat warre, resolved to settle the place of Constable, and according to his first intention, he had sent a Briefe to the Duke of Lesdiguiers, who was at Grenoble for the same, vpon condition that he should become a Catholicke: This was one of the two reasons which drew him to Court: the first was to thanke the King for the honour he had done him in offering him the first office of the Crowne: and the second was, to employ himselfe to accommodate the disobedience of the assembly which was held at Rochel without his Maiesties leave. The Dukes Catholicke friends exhorted him both by word and writing to accept it, saying that this charge was due vnto him, as to the greatest Captain of our age, to the most faithfull of the Kings subiects, most happy in his successe in all his enterprises, and the man who had most obliged his Countrey: and as he was without companion for those qualities, so he needed not feare any coruall in his pretension; but to these qualities he must make

A make profession of the Romish religion: which they said was so necessary, as the King would rather forebare to make a Constable, then to doe it without this condition. That they of the reformed Religion had by the Graunts and Edicts of their former Kings become made capable of all Offices: but this (which makes him that enioyes it, the second person in the State, and gives a power in a manner equall to the royall authoritie,) must be excepted. They of the religion said, that it was sufficient to haue deferred this honour, although he did not enioy it, with that condition; which if he did, he would lose all his ancient seruants and friends, and his credit with them of his religion. The Duke being come to Paris, he thanked the king for the Briefe he had sent him for the office of Constable, and excused himselfe vpon many great and important considerations, propounding vnto him the Duke of Luyne, who was in speciall grace with his Maiestie; whereupon with the approbation of the Prince of Conde, the Duke of Guise, and many other great personages, the Duke of Luyne was made Constable of France, and took his oath: his letters being verified by the Court of Parliament: After which, the Duke of Lesdiguiers was made Marshall generall of the Royall Armies.

Duke of Luyne
made Constable of France

The King desirous to aduertise all the chiefe of his realme of the estate of his affaires, through the disobedience of the assemblie at Rochel, and that hee had made the Duke of Luyne Constable of France, he wrote this following letter to the Marshall of Bouillon.

Cousin, seeing the Assembly of Rochel yeelds mee not the obedience which they ought, and that I haue as you know, attended it hitherto: That in Bearne they haue made publike enterprises, and drawne souldiers together against my authoritie and expresse commandement; And that it seemes that some of my subiects endeavour to trouble the publike peace; to ouerthrow the order I haue taken with so much paine and traualle to assure and establish the same in my kingdom: I am resolved presently after Easter to goe to Tours, where I will aduise of what I haue to doe, and to provide for the maintenance of my authoritie and Edicts, which is the end of my journey and my intentions: Hauing the like will to preserve and fauour those which shall continue in their duties, as to reduce such as shall forget their obedience; not regarding herein religion, but onely the faction; whereof I will hereafter aduertise you more particularly when I come to Tours. In the meane time I thought good to acquaint you herewith, being assured that you will allow of my designe, blaming these disobediences and disorders; and continue in this occasion and all others to shew your good will, for the maintenance of your authoritie, and the publike good of this businesse. I will adde herunto, that I haue advanced my Cousin the Duke of Luyne to the charge of Constable of France, judging that the re-establishment of that place will be greatly profitable and behouefull to my affaires and Kingdom, putting the same into the hands of a Personage endowed with so many good parts. Whereby I assure my selfe the successe will be answerable to my hopes, and to the contentment of such as loue my person, and the good of my seruice, and particularly of you, Cousin, whom I pray God to preserve. Paris the 4 of April.

E Vnto this Letter the Marshall of Bouillon made this answer. Sir, I receiued the Letter which it pleased your Maiestie to send me of the fourth of this present moneth, by which I vnderstand to my great griefe, the discontent which your Maiestie continues to receiue from your subiects of the Religion assembled at Rochel, and your resolution to goe to Tours, there to aduise of the meanes how you may maintaine your authoritie and Edicts. Whereupon Sir, I most humbly beseech your Maiestie to pardon me, if I make bold to say vnto you, that you might receiue more contentment in this troublesome businesse, vntill your bounty and clemency, rather then the rigour and force of armes, in causing (without any other consideration) that immediately of your selfe, by your iustice and goodnesse, the fore-passed inexecution of your Edicts may be executed; & that for the time to come, they may be maintained and observed: for by these means you will take away the feare which almost all your subiects of the Religion in all the Prouinces haue: that contrary to your Maiesties intention, they will breake the Edicts; and that they make but their pretext of this disobedience of those of Rochel. That herunto tend all the oaths which haue been lately taken in diuers places, yea, in the presence of your Maiestie. And this apprehension which is almost generally, making them beleue, that their ruine is intended, cannot but produce dangerous incontinencies, which might be avoided, by causing them to see the contrary in effect. For this feare being taken away, a notable disobedience would appaere,

The Afflictions
 answer.

The King going from Paris on the fifth of April, hee stayed at Fontaine-bleau vntill the nine and twentieth, to giue the Duke Lefdiguiers time (as hee had intreated his Maieftie) to imploy his credit (if it were poffible) to reduce the afsemble of Rochel to obedience. The Duke had fent two feuerall Gentlemen with Letters to Rochel, reproaching their difobedience, which deferted a fharpe punifhment; and exhorting them to confider of the afflictions which might fall vpon their Churches in diuers parts of France.
 To his letters they published this answer. Wee know Sir how much wee should attribute to the aduice which comes from fo great an experience; but withall, remember if you please, what hath followed againft your expectation and ours, after your mediation C at Loudun, and to what dangerous inconueniences our facilitie hath brought vs, being in danger to fall into the like, if we follow the fame courfes; to the end you may beare with vs, if that wound which it hath giuen vs in our prefervation, makes vs incapable of the feparation which you require with fuch instance, adding to your aduice reproaches of difobedience, and the threats of a fharpe punifhment; which we should not finde strange in the enemies of our profefion; who diuerting his Maiefties good inclination, take delight in flau-ders and violence, and whose fplene we know, will not bee refrained with the ruine of the Churches of Bearne: but when as they (which are fo much bound to the peace of Gods houfe, in the which they haue taken their being and muft leaue an Honorable memorie to pofteritie) lift vp their armes againft vs, this is an affliction which wee cannot D exprefle, &c.

Articles propounded vnto
 the Deputies of the reformed Churches.

Notwithstanding the sharpneffe of thefe Letters, the Seigneurs of Faus and Chalas deputies of the reformed Churches, being commaunded to perfue their complaints in the name of the Churches (becaufe that in Court they would in no cafe heare mention of the faid Affembly) aduertifed the faid Duke Lefdiguiers of all their former grieuances, and pray him once for all to giue peace vnto the Churches. The Duke hauing treated hereof with the Kings Council, hee gaue them this answer, firft that the King was refolued to maintain his Authoritie, and not to fuffer any afsembly within his Realme without his permission. Secondly, to caufe his Edicts of pacification to bee obferued; Thirdly, As for the afsemble at Rochel his Maiefties pleasure was, that the Deputies should craue E pardon, and then they should proceed to their feparation. Fourthly, that in regard thereof, his Maieftie would caufe his Souldiers to retire from thofe places which might giue any caufe of diftruff. Fifthly, that for the places of furetie in Dauphine, his Maieftie would ordaine that within fixe Moneths, they should haue what they could iuffly and reafonably demand in that regard. Sixtly, touching Bearne, that there should bee an order effectually performed, if it were not already done, for the payment of the money which his Ma-ieftie had graunted in ftead of that which had beene receiued out of the reuenues of the Clergie. Seuenthly, That Monfieur de la Force, should enioy his Government of Bearne and his Children their places, with all Honors belonging vnto them: or elfe his Maieftie should giue them recompence, or fuffer them to receiue it from fuch as should bee plea-fing vnto him. Eightly, And touching the Government of Oitez, it should not bee taken out of his hands who commaunded therein; his Maieftie being aduertifed that hee had not fwared from his obedience: And to witnesse his Maiefties will to make vfe of his feruice, he would fend him a particular Letter.

The Deputies at the reading of thefe Articles, fhewed that the afsembly at Rochel would neuer accept of thefe Conditions, yet they intreated the Duke that nothing might bee attempted againft the Churches vntill the returne of Monfieur de Faus from Rochel, the which

A which he promifed, defiring his fpeede: but all this wrought no effect, but they fent Lerters to the Duke reiterating their former complaints with that which had paff in Bearne; and Viuetz.

The King hearing of their proceedings and intention, halted his journey to Tours, from thence to go into Poitou. And to the end they offered the reformed Religion should nor grow icalous of his journey, on the fecond of April he published a Declaration in fauor of thofe which should containe themfelves in their dutie and obedience, taking them into his protection. During this Declaration which was made at Fontaine-bleau, there hapned a great combustion in Tours againft them of the Religion, about the burying of one Martin

The Kings Declaration in fauor of thefe

 Religion.

B le Noir an Inn-keeper. They going to intetre him on Sunday the 13 of April, the people and children flocked together, finging of fonges againft the party deceafed, who they faid was a man of a lewd life. The bafe multitude increafed ftill, and animated the childrer, who followed them with ftones and railings, fo as they were forced to retire themfelves into an houfe neere vnto the Church-yard, where as this rafcal rable held them in a manner befieged. Some got into the towne and complained vnto the Maior, who came pre-fently to the place, and freed them which were in the houfe. Hee being retired, the mutiny grew greater; for that many rafcals were ioined with the boies, and came into the Church-yard, where they drew the bodie out of the graue, with an intent to burne it, if the Maior and other Officers had not come and caufed the bodie to be re-interred. Notwithftanding all their endeavors, this infolencie continued the next day, and they spoiled & burnt the houfes of them of the Religion about the Church-yard, & their Temple. The King being aduertifed of this fedition from the Maior of Tours, he prefently gaue Commiffion to Melleuille le Doux Mafter of Requests, to goe thither and informe of the fact, being accompanied by an Exempt of the Guard and two Archers. Hee alfo commaunded the Secretaries of State to write into all parts, that this diforder should be punifhed ex-emplarily. In the meane time the Lieutenant criminall and the Kings Proctor had committed fife of thofe feditious rafcals to prifon, which had affited the boies and holpen to burne the Temple. Melleuille comes to Tours, and beganne to proceed againft them.

A multitude of Tours.

The people hearing that they would hang the prifoners, a multitude of the bafe fort came before the Palace, and with a fudden violence entred, brake the doores and windows of the criminall Chamber, freed the fife prifoners, and forced the Iudges to fawe themfelves as they could. After this they spoiled fife houfes belonging to them of the Religion. Vpon this great diforder the inhabitants began to fhut vp their fhopps, to goe to armes, and to make barricadoes, threatening to fhoot at the feditious, who were nothing amazed, but defired to fpeake with the Maior: who being acquainted with their demand, he gaue them to vnderftand, that if three or foure would fpeake with him, they should be conducted with all fafetie: the multitude allowed of it, and three great Rogues offering themfelves, paff three barricadoes without armes. At their firft approach they infolently demanded three prifoners which were yet detained. My friends faid the Lieutenant crimi-nall, you haue them all. Wee haue but two faid they, and there remaine three: but being affured of the contrary; This is not all faid they, we require, that you and the Maior fhall figne it vnder your hands, that if there be any of ours found in your prifons, you fhall fet them at libertie; and that hereafter (vpon your foules and bodies) there fhall neuer any in-quirie bee made for that which is paff, the which was granted and prefently figned. At night Melleuille and others came out of thofe places where they had hidden themfelves to auoide the furie of the multitude, taking poffe to goe and aduertife the King, who was come to Blois with an intent to make fome ftay there, but hearing of this mutiny, hee departed the next day, and came to Tours on the fixt of May. The Grand Prouoft committed 25 or 30 of this feditious multitude, and a day was appointed for the execution of F fife of them which were moft culpable, and the reft were pardoned.

The violence of the feditious multitude.

The day before this execution the King parted from Tours towards Saumur, vpon a certaine intelligence which hee receiued from Rochel, that in their afsembly it had beene refolued to put 6000 fouldiers into that Town, and to furprife Mon: de Plessis, and the Siegneur of Armagnac gouernor of Loudun, to the end that if the king marched into Poitou with an army, they might cut off the intercourfe betweene Paris and it. Moreover, that they of the Religion of Mayen, Perche, and Beaufe should ioyne together and execute their defignes, vpon Chartres, Vendome and Plumiers.

Advertisements given to the King touching
the Assembly.

They write that the King showed this advertisement to the Duke of Lefdiguiers, who was of opinion that he should prevent the danger, and speedily assure this Towne and passage of Loire to his obedience. Hereupon his harbingers come on the 10 of May, where they began to make out the King and Queens lodgings. In the evening some companies of the Guard arrive; and the next morning the Suisses, who marched directly to the castle, Monf: de Pleffus seeing them at the gate, and the harbingers ready to make out the Kings lodgings, hee intreated them to have patience untill hee knew his Majesties pleasure, unto whom he had sent: but hearing in the afternoon that his pleasure was to lye in the castle, he presently delivered the keys to the Captaine of the Guard: drew his garison out into the field, and himselfe went into the town. The King arriving towards the evening at the Chappell, Monf: de Pleffus saluted him, and offered whatsoever hee had or might have: the Officers of Iustice did the like, with the Magistrates and Clergy. The King stayed five daies at Saumur untill the 16 of May, where he received a confirmation both of the former advertisement for the putting of 6000 men into Saumur, and that they had made a division of the Prouinces of France into 7 Synods or Circles, making Bearne the eighth. That they had chosen a head for their generall Army which they should raise, and Generals in every Circle, with the orders which should be observed; the said Assembly referring the foreigne authority to dispose and depose the said Generals and of all affaires. That the duke of Rohan (having accepted to be Generall in chiefe of high Languedoc and high Guienne) had delivered the government of Saint Iohn D'Angely unto Monf: de Soubise his brother, who was also chosen Generall of Britany, Poictou, and L'Isle-Bouchard. That on the 13 of May, the Duke of Rohan and his brother Soubise, had made a Proclamation in Saint Iohn D'Angely; that whosoever would not carry armes for the defence of the Towne, should depart within three daies, the which most of the Catholikes did, and some of the reformed Religion. That the Assembly had sent to the Noblemen, Townes, and Churches of their party, in the Country of Orleans, Berry, Sologne, Gassinois and Loris, to take Armes and to assure Gergeau, Sancerre, Sully & Chasteau-Renard, and to surprize all the passages they could upon the river of Loire about Orleans. That they had sent to all those of their religion in Normandy, Britany and Champagne, to take armes and seize upon all the strong places they could within their Prouinces. Finally, they write, that they had resolved to make war in all the Prouinces of France.

These advertisements whether true or false, were the subiect which made the King send to the Earle of Saint Paul from Saumur, and to the Prince of Conde, to give order for Sancerre: To Monf: de Longueville to disarme them of the religion in the Townes of Rouen, Caen, Diepe, and New-hauen, and to treat with the Earle of Montgomery for Pontorion: To the Duke of Vendosme, to assure himselfe of Vitry and Chastillon in Vandolais: and unto Monf: de Nevers, to disarme them of the religion in Champagne. How these commandements were executed in their Gouvernements, you shall hereafter.

The Assembly (as they said) being forced to take armes for their iust and naturall defence, and for the liberties of their consciences, and safety of their liues, diuided their Prouinces into eight circles (as hath been said) and made choice of generals who should command therein. To the Duke of Bouillon first Marshall of France was given Normandy, the Isle of France, Berry, Anjou, Mayen, Perche and Touraine, except L'Isle-Bouchard. To Monf: de Soubise, Britany, L'Isle-Bouchard, Poictou, and that which depends thereon. To the Duke of Tremouille, Angoulmois, Xaintonge, and the adjacent Islands. To Monf: de la Force, base Guienne. To the Marquis of La Force, Bearne. To the Duke of Rohan, high Languedoc, and high Guienne. To the Earle of Chastillon, base Languedoc, the Seuennes, Gevodan, and Vivarez. And to the Duke D'Esdiguiers, Dauphine, Prouence and Bourgondy. They made many orders in this Assembly for military service, whereof the Assembly referred to themselves a foreigne power: That no treaties of peace nor truce might be made, but by the resolution of the generall Assembly. Touching the orders souldiers should observe: Forbidding of traffike: For the payment of souldiers: For the liberty of husbandmen: For the stay of the Kings reuenuues and of the Clergy: with diuers others, the full power whereof was referred to the generall Assembly.

The Prouinces of France being thus diuided into 7 Circles, and choice made by the Assembly of severall persons to be commanders in those Circles: the Duke of Bouillon who was the first (and should have been general of their army, whosoever he had come) would

A would not accept of their Commission. The Duke of Tremouille also refused it, protesting all fidelity and obedience to the King. And as for the seventh Circle which they had giuen to the Duke D'Esdiguiers, seeing him so constant in the Kings service, and that he was now made Great Marshall of the Kings Armies; and besides, that he had by his letters termed their Assembly unlawfull, they resolved to make Lieutenants generall in that seventh Circle, whereof Monf: de Montbrun had letters for Prouence. They of the reformed Religion had 59 Townes of safety within these seven Circles, and 601 Churches. These Townes were giuen them by former Kings for their safety after the Ciuill Warres, in the which they had Gouvernours of their owne Religion, and in many of them the King paid the Garisons. Montauban and Rochel were not of the number, but Gouverned themselves, apart by their Consuls and Maior. Besides, they enjoyed many Townes and Castles which were no Towns of safety: But you shall see this summers war will deprive them of most of them, taken by force, or yielded by voluntary obedience.

The King before his departure from Saumur, made the Earle of Sault (of the reformed Religion, sonne to Monf: de Crequi, and grand-child to the Duke D'Esdiguiers) Gouvernour of the Towne with a good Garison; and as they write, contented Monf: de Lestis, letting him know that it was necessary for the publique safety, the Towne and Castle should remaine during his voyage, in the order he left it, and likewise for his entertainments he gave him allowance. On the 17, the King came to Tours, a Towne of safety, belonging to the Duke of Tremouille, where the Lady his mother remayned. The place imports for the passage, yet the King tooke the Ladies word for the Towne and Castle. He came from thence to Partenay, where he stayed 4 daies, to let his Cannon & munition aduance. In the meane time, he writes to all places both within and without the Realme, touching the innocencie of his Armes. The Secretaries of State write into all the Prouinces, not to suffer any leauies of Souldiers, and that the Edicts in fauour of them of the religion (who had no society nor correspondence with the factions of Rochel) should be strictly observed. There the Constable de Luyne, examined the state of the Army, and saw the accompt of the Munition of Warre, and enquired of the Earle of Chomberg, what Treasure hee had to support the charges of the Warre; giuing order for all things which was held necessary for the siege of Saint Iohn D'Angely.

During the Kings stay at Partenay, the Earle of Aurac advanced towards Saint Iohn with five regiments of Foot, and two Companies of Horse. On May 16, in the night, hee camped within a quarter of a league of the Towne, taking the bridges which crosse the River of Buttone, and there made three barricadoes. Here they within the Towne committed a great error, not knowing the importance of the passage untill it was too late: for if they had broken these bridges, it would have beene difficult to haue passed their cannon. They of the Towne drew in what prouision they could, seeing the enemy so neere them: for they had still two Ports open, by which there entered in seuen daies about 2000 Foot and many Gentlemen. The Earle forced the barricadoes, which they of the Towne had made in the suburbs of Maitha, and drew neere to the Port. The town-men burnt three of their suburbs; and the Duke of Rohan seeing himselfe thus pressed, complains by his Letters unto the Earle of Aurac, for that hee vied such acts of hostilitie against him, considering their great familiaritie & friendship. He protested he would not attempt any thing against the Kings authority, but was still ready to obey his commandements, desiring him to suffer a Gentleman to passe whom hee had sent with Letters to the Constable. The Earle made him this Answer.

Sir, You must not misconstrue my proceeding, seeing it is by the Kings command. I should haue beene glad this charge had been giuen to some other, in regard of the friendship which is betwixt vs, but seeing it hath pleased his Majestic to command mee to it, I use the Towne. I could not contradict his will: wherefore I pray you hold it not strange, and beleeue (although to my great griefe) that I will doe what possibly I can, to shew how faithfull and obedient I am to his commandement. I assure you that the Seigneur of L'E. stand may passe with all safety to the Constable: but in the meane time I will not forbear that which hath been giuen me in charge, and dispose of the Forces as shalbe thought fit: And will remaine your humble and obedient Seruant, &c.

The Gentleman coming to Partenay delivered this letter following to the Constable: Sir, Reposing myselfe on the credit of your fauor, I write unto you to beseech you to mitigate the sharp and violent pursuits, and strait pressing of S. Iohn. You know I neuer refused to giue the King entry into this towne: but some mutiners and feditious, which were in armes about the rampiers, caused me for sometime to keep the Ports shut, that I might pacifie to people greatly animated, and draw them to the obedience which they owe vnto the King: this haue I by all meanes endeouored to doe, and therein employed the fueritie and power of that command which it hath pleased his Maiestie to giue me in this Towne; and haue so much preuailed, as I can assure you they will receiue whomsoever he shall appoint: and for my owne part, I am resolved to quie the place. But as you know, my enemies who haue brought me into bad termes with his Maiestie, giue me occasion enough of distrust. I pray you to moue the King to permit me to leaue him the Town without seeing his Maiefty, for the Icalousie I haue that my enemies seek rather my ruine then the publike good. I referre this businesse to your discretion, and intreat you to beleeue that I am your most humble and obedient seruant, Henry de Rohan. From Saint-Iohn May 13, 1621.

Some said, that the Duke of Rohans intention was contrary to his writing: his acceptance of the Assemblies Commission: his preparations to take possession of the Circle of Languedoc and Guienne: the burning of the suburbs of S. Iohn, and the souldiers which he had drawne into the towne, were sufficient proofes: And whereas he said hee would quit the towne, it was not to deliuer it into the Kings hands, but commit it in guard to his brother Soubise. To whom the Constitute made this answer.

The Dukes answer.

"Sir: If my fauor were such as it could stay the Kings designe, and preuent his enterprises, I would boldly promise that which you require with such instance: but you know the King is so absolute in his resolutions, as it is hard to diuert him from his will: yet I promise to employ all my credit for your content, and to draw him to that which you demand; not that I will constantly assure you, but I will doe my best endeavour, being your most obedient seruant, De Luynes.

Dukes Gouverneurs bring their keyes vnto the King.

The Gouvernors of S. Maixant and Fountenay, came and brought their keyes vnto the King being at Partenay: and they of Châtelierault and L'Isle-Bouchard had done the like at Saumur. Comming to Fountenay on the 23, the Minister & Consistory cast themselves at his feet. The Minister craued pardon, beseeching the King to leaue them the libertie of their Religion, and to assure himselfe of their obedience. His Maiestie answered, that he had neuer infringed the Edicts, and that he had not taken armes but to punish those which had violated them, and to maintaine the rest in peace, and that he pardoned what was past, hoping they would doe better hereafter. He spake principally to the Minister, who had bene one of the most turbulent of the Assembly. Mons. de la Boulay Gouverneur of Fountenay made knowne vnto his Maiestie, that the place might be in danger of revolt by reason of the neighborhood of Rochel, whereupon the King left an Exempt of his Guard in the Caste. Maillezay situated in an Iland, and hauing but one passage to enter, yielded at the same time to the King. The Gouverneur of Maran, brother to Monsieur de la Boulay brought also his keyes to Fountenay: to whom the King deliuered them againe commanding him to continue faithfull in his seruice, and to leaue souldiers for the preservation of the place, for that it would cut off all commerce betwene Rochel and Poictou.

The King came to Niort a towne of surety, whereas M. Parabel receiued him with all freedome. He blamed the disobedience of Rochel, and grieved at their designs, protesting that he would neuer separate himselfe from the Kings commandement. Thus all the Gouvernors of the townes of safetie in Poictou and Touraine hauing brought their keyes vnto the King, his Maiestie vpon their free submission, returned them to their Gouvernements, with command to see the Edicts of Pacification obserued, and to maintaine peace among his subiects.

Petition of them to the Region at Tours

During his Maiesties stay at Niort, the Deputies of the Religion at Turos, presented a petition vnto his Maiestie, wherein after a solemne protestation of their seruice and obedience, they gaue him to vnderstand, that by reason of the late sedition in Tours, they had bene deprived of all meanes to bury their dead, their Churchyard being made a highway, their Temple burnt, and some priuate men spoiled of their goods, so as they could not remaine safely in their houses. They humbly besought his Maiestie, that their Church-yard might be restored, their Temple built againe, and in the meane time they might haue some place appointed them by prouision where they might assemble. That their

A their goods might be restored, and that hereafter they might liue in Peace amongst their fellow Citizens: And that his Maiestie would commaund the Magistrate to protect them, and that the like intion should bee made vnto the Chiefe inhabitants of the Suburbs. Whereupon his Maiestie resolved in Councell, that a Commisarie should bee sent to Tours, who with the aduice of the Gouvernors, the Officers of Iustice, and the Mayor and Sheriffs thereof, should giue them a place in the Suburbs or neere vnto the Towne for the exercise of their Religion, according to his Maiesties Edicts, and that with the consent of the Inhabitants of both Religions, whom he tooke into his protection, Commanding the Gouverneur and Mayor to haue a care of their preferation. And to giue them a place whereon to build a Temple for the exercise of their Religion, hee granted eightene hundred pound sterling to be taken in two yeares, out of the money which was appointed for the fortification and reparation of the said Towne. As touching the loles which had bene sustained by particular men, who had bene spoiled during that sedition, his Maiesties pleasure was, the Commisarie should informe himselfe of the truth to make report vnto him, after which hee would take such course as should be fit.

At the same time, the King made a Declaration, by the which, all that were remaining or retired into Saint Iohn D'Angely and Rochel, and all others which fauoured them directly or indirectly, or should haue any access, intelligence, or association with them: or that should in any sort acknowledge the said Assembly of Rochel, or the other Assemblies, Circles, Prouinciall Councels, or other Congregacions, which had correspondence with that of Rochel, and which assembled themselves without his expresse Commission, were declared disobedient, and guilty of high Treason, and to haue lost all Graunts, Priuileges, Freedomes, and immunities: Commanding all His subiects making profession of the reformed Religion, and all Townes and Communalities of the said qualitie, to make declaration in the Presidiall Courts and Bayliwicks of their Iurisdiccions, of their good intentions to his Maiesties seruice: And that they should renounce, disauow, and protest, in no sort to adhere to the assembly of Rochel, nor to any other that should be held without expresse leaue; and that they would oppose themselves against all the resolutions which should be taken there: forbidding all Gentlemen and others, to suffer their Children or any other depending on them, to goe into the said Townes or to giue them any comfort or assistance, or to lodge them in their houses, vpon paine to be held guilty of the said crime.

The King being at Niort, with a resolution to besiege Saint Iohn D'Angely, from whence the Duke of Rohan was retired, assuring his brother that hee would see him with succours: The Duke of Luynes Constitute, considering that Mons. de Soubise would ruine himselfe in defending of this siege, he desired in fauour of the alliance which hee had with the house of Rohan, to draw this Nobleman out of danger, sending vnto him the Seig. Eplend to exhort him to obedience, and to yeeld the place: but being fortified with the counsells of Hault-Fontaine, and the succours the Duke his brother had promised him, he refused to attend the Cannon and to keepe the Towne.

Vpon this willfull resolution of Mons. de Soubise, his Maiestie finding that the Seigneur of Loudriere by a prooffe of his fidelity had procured the yeelding of Fontaine le Comte, contrary to the liking of the Lady of La Boulay, and that hee might helpe much in the siege of Saint Iohn, and reduce Mons. de Soubise to his dutie: Hee suffered him to put himselfe into the Towne, vpon coulor to hold his ranck vnder Soubises command: during the which he might inspire him with obedience, and make the meanes easie to receiue the Kings mercy. In the meane time the Towne is inuested as you haue heard. On the 19 the Dukes of Desdiguiers and Brissac arrived, hauing the conduct of the whole Armie. The Duke of Rohan was gone into Guienne, where he raised some men, and ioyned with certaine troopes which the Marquise of Malause brought vnto him, with the which hee assured Nerae, and degraded the Catholike Councillors of the Chamber, and commanded the Towne with a garison of 600 men.

At Saint Iohn D'Angely they spent foure dayes attending the Souldiers which came from all parts to this siege: The approaches being made, they framed their Campe, pitched their Tents, lodged their Munition, assigned out the Quarters, marked the Trenches, viewed the place and all the approaches whereby they might hope for any succours. The King arrived on the last of May, and tooke view of the Towne: and on the second of Iune,

Summons the Gouernor by a Herald.

His Maieftie ſent an Herald to Monſ: de Soubiſe, commanding him to deliuer the A Towne vnto him, vpon paine to be declared guiltie of Treafon. The Herald deliuered his charge in theſe words. *To thee Benjamin of Roban, I command thee in the name of the King thy Soueraigne and mine, that thou open the Gates of the Towne of Saint Iohn D'Angely, to the King to enter therein with all His Armie. In default of ſo doing, I declare thee from the King thy Soueraigne Lord and mine, guiltie of high Treason; thy Houſes and Caſtles to be razed, thy goods conſiſcate to the King, and thou and all thy poſteritie baſe and ignoble. To whom the Seig. of Soubiſe answered. That he was the Kings moſt humble ſeruant, that he was but a Soldier, and could make no anſwere, before hee had communicated this commandment vnto the aſſembly of Rochell, and to his brother the Duke of Roban. And becauſe hee ſpake with his B hat on, the Herald replied; Know that thou oughteſt not neither as Capitaine or Soldier to anſwer with thy head covered, but that when I ſpeake in the Kings behalfemy Soueraigne Lord and thine, thou oughteſt to haue thy hat in thy hand. Hereupon the Seig. of Hault Fontaine ſaid vnto the Herald, The King may excuſe Monſ: de Soubiſe if he pleaſe, for he was neuer ſummoned. Thus the Herald returning without any reſolution, hee met the Seigne-neur of La Salle Capitaine of the Guard, vnto whom he ſaid, that hee found no obedience, and that it was fit the Cannon ſhould ſpeake.*

At the ſame time his Maieſty hearing that at Rochell they peruerſed all order of iuſtice, and that his Officers could not with libertie exerciſe their places to doe right vnto each partie: He reſolved to tranſfere the Preſidiall Court from Rochell vnto the Towne of C Marans, and ſent forth his letters patents to that end.

The Towne is ſiſſed.

The Herald hauing made report vnto his Maieſty, of the anſwer which Monſieur de Soubiſe made vnto his charge, hee gaue preſently order that the place ſhould bee furioſly aſſaulted: ordered all his troopes towards Aunis, and other places from whence any fauours might come, and brought his Trenches vnto their Ditches. There were many braue exploits of Armes, Aſſaults, Batteries, and Mines performed during this ſiege, at one of the which Hault Fontaine (the ſoule of their affaires within the Towne) was ſlaine, whoſe death did ſomewhat daunt their ſpirits. About the 23 of Iune, the Seigneure of Soubiſe, beginning to doubt his being long able to preſerue the place, hee cauſed a trumpet to craue to ſpeake with Monſieur Zamet, his meſſage was to demand a ſafe conſult for a Gentleman named Montmartin, ſent by the ſaid Seigneure of Soubiſe to the Conſtable: he was conſulted by the ſaid Seigneure Zamet Maſhall of the Campe vnto the Kings quarter. He beſought his Maieſty to giue him time to ſend to the Duke his Brother, and if he had not an anſwer within foure dayes, he would yeeld the place: whereunto his Maieſty would not yeeld, but willed him to tell Monſieur de Soubiſe, that all he could hope for was, to yeeld the place and to preſerue his life; and that if he would accept of this grace, he ſhould reſolue by the next day, for afterwards there was no more mercie. Loudriere (who had put himſelfe into the Towne as you haue heard) ſeeing him penſiue in this extremitie, aduiled him to reſolue to yeeld the place, offering to engage his Honor and life, that he would obtaine his pardon in caſe of ſpeedie obedience. Monſ: de Soubiſe who could not B truſt vnto it, conſidering the great loſſe of ſo many braue Men ſlaine at this ſiege, deſired to be aſſured: Loudriere offers to remaine in hoſtage, and to go and get the pardon ſigned if he would proſt to yeeld the place.

Loudriere perſuaſion vnto
Monſ: de Soubiſe.

In the meane time the batteries are redoubled with ſuch furie by the Duke of Eſpernon, as ſeeing the Kings men lodged on either ſide in their Rampiers, their walls beaten downe and the Mines ready to play, they reſolued by the perſuaſion of Loudriere, and the preſent feare which preſſed them, to accept of the Kings grace, beyond the expectation of all men, who did not beleue that 2000 men which yet remained, ſhould yeeld vpon thoſe termes of aduantage for the King. Whereupon Loudriere, Bigaudiere and Montmartin came vnto the Campe with authoritie from Monſ: de Soubiſe and the other Commanders, who F accepted and ſigned the Kings Pardon and tooke an oath contained in theſe words. Wee vnder written, by vertue of the power giuen vs by Monſ: de Soubiſe, commanding in the Towne of Saint Iohn, accept the grace contained in this preſent writing which is pleaſeth the King to doe vs, promiſing to ſee it eſſied. Signed the 25 of Iune.

Articles of the Kings pardon to the beſieged.

His Maieſty ſeeing his Enemies implore his fauour, Hee graunted them theſe Articles following. Firſt, That the King pretends not to make any Treatie, but at the moſt humble ſupplication often reiterated, of thoſe which are in Saint Iohn D'Angely, His Maieſty doth

1621

A doth pardon them all indifferently, whatſoeuer hath beene done or committed during this ſiege: vpon condition, that they ſhall craue pardon and ſwear to remaine eternallie vnder his obedience, and that they ſhall neuer carrie Armes againſt His ſeruiſe vnder any colour or pretext whatſoeuer. Secondly, That His Maieſty did graunt them free libertie of their Conſciences according to His Edicts. Vpon theſe Conditions His Maieſty offered them his bounty, did graunt them the libertie of their perſons, and the enioying of their goods, as they had formerly done; and ſuch as would retire themſelves, ſhould haue ſafe conſult giuen them, for their Perſons, Armes and Horſes. And as for any other demands made by them, they ſhould be left to His Maieſties pleaſure. The next day the Grand-Prouoſt of France, entered early into S. Iohn D'Angely, who preſented a great diſorder, for that the Souldiers which were to depart, had abandoned the Gates and Breaches, and prepared themſelves to begone, the which they ſhould not haue done, before the companies of the Kings Guard had entered and ſeized vpon the Portes and Breaches. But he gaue commandment vnto his Lieutenants, Exempts and Archers to guard thoſe places, himſelf walking vp and downe the Towne, and cauſing all the Soldiers and voluntaries of the Armie to depart, for that they began to grow inſolent; And in the meane time the Duke of Deſdignieres and Duke of Eſpernon entered, to take order for their departure. Attending the coming of theſe Noblemen, the Grand Prouoſt entertained Monſieur de Soubiſe, and the chiefe Gentlemen which were with him touching their taking C of Armes; To whom they answered, that the contrauention of the Edicts, and the feare to be oppreſſed in their conſciences, had drawne them to thoſe extremities: But the Grand Prouoſt let them vnderſtand, that the eſtabliſhment of Circles, and Prouinciall Councils were manifeſt contrauentions of the Edicts. He preſented vnto them the inſolence of the Aſſembly of Rochell in the diuiſion they had made of the Prouinces; in their Commiſſion, and their new ſcale to leaue Souldiers; to ſeize vpon the Kings money; and to forſite their places.

Diſcourſe betweene Monſ: de Soubiſe and the Grand Prouoſt.

On the fixe and twentieth of Iune, the Garriſon, the Gouernor, and all the Voluntaries went out of Saint Iohn: They paſſed through the Kings Arme without Drum or ſhow of Armes paſſing before the King. Monſieur de Soubiſe came laſt with his Houſe and D voluntaries, which had aſſiſted him during the Siege, and they were conduced into a place of ſafety. They were held to be about 1500 foot, and about 200 Gentlemen. Monſieur de Soubiſe preſented himſelf vpon his knees vnto the King and demanded pardon, aſſuring his Maieſty that he would eſſect, whatſoeuer he had promiſed by the Seigneurs of Lodriere and Montmartin. His Maieſty being on horſeback layd his hand vpon his ſhoulder, and ſaid vnto him: I ſhall be glad that hereafter you giue me more occaſion to be ſatiſfied with you; riſe, and ſerue me better. This ſiege continued little about a Moneth, but it was very furious. There were many Noblemen and Gentlemen of quality ſlaine and hurt on the Kings partie, but not about 200 Souldiers loſt of the whole Armie. During this ſhort ſiege, there was about 10000 Cannon ſhot againſt the Towne, the which did F annoy it, as there was ſcarce any houſe free from ſpoyle, ſo as the inhabitants were faine to lye in cellers and neere the ground, ſtaring to bee cruſht vnder the ruines of houſes, and with the bullets which fell in the ſtreets, and on their houſes like haile; They were reduced to ſuch extremitie, as the Souldiers had but two ounces of bread a day, and they were ſo tyred from the beginning of the Siege, as they had no meanes to take one houres reſt. The Kings Troops being in poſſeſſion of the Towne, there was a brute in the Campe, that the Souldiers had ruined the Temple and ſpoyled the Miniſters houſe with ſome others, whereof many of the reformed Religion, which ſerued the King faithfully, hauing made report to the Grand Prouoſt, he returned ſpeedily to Saint Iohn and aſſembled the Councell of the Towne, the Miniſter, and the Conſiſtorie; letting them vnderſtand, that F without doubt this inſolence would be caried throughout the Prouinces, with a great ſhew by ſome ill affected Frenchmen, and made an hundred times greater, and more prejudiciall then it was; perſwading weak ſpirits, that the faith was violated, and that it was impoſſible to ground any aſſurance vpon the Kings promiſes; wherefore to make the truth more apparent, he deſired them to declare in publique, what loſſes they had recieued in particular. To which ſummons they all agreed freely, giuing him letters of Atteſtation, by which they declared that the ſouldiers of his Maieſties army, which had entred into the towne to demand bread and wine of houſe-keepers, had not taken any thing but victu-

The siege of Gergeau.

Gergeau yeelded to the Earle of S. Paul.

all, without any excess, force or violence, and had about all preserved the chastitie of women. The Minister and Consistorie likewise declared, that their pulpit, seats, and glasse windowes of the Temple had bene brent to the value of ten pounds sterling; and that the Minister had lost certaine goods to the value of fiftene pounds, taken by unknowne laches. But he that writes the generall History of the Rebellion of France, saith that notwithstanding any order they could take, the souldiers for an houres space fell to spoile, contrary to his Maiesties expresse Defence. The King gave commandment by his Letters patents, that the wals and fortifications should be razed, and the ditches filled vp; and withall he deprived the towne of all their priuiledges, and made the Inhabitants subiect to taxe, like vnto the Labourer of the champion country.

Whilest the King prepared for the siege of S. Iohn, the Prince of Conde and the Earle of S. Paul imploied themselves for the reduction of Sancerre, Gergeau, and Chasteau-Renard, places of surty. Being at Saumur, he had written to the Earle of S. Paul to assure himselfe of Gergeau, which is a small towne foure leagues about Orleans, hauing a goodly bridge vpon the riuer of Loire. Henry the fourth had made it a Towne of surty, and had affected the government to the Duke of Sully, after the death of du Faur. It had bene greatly fortified during the League, and since in the late alterations. The Earle of S. Paul hauing had conference with the Seigneur of Monde Bailiffe of Gergeau (who was an enemy to the fortifications thereof, and had caused the fort in the suburbs of S. Denis to be razed) they found that the onely difficultie was, That Bourbiers who commanded, and the two Captaines that were in garison therein, had not long since, not onely made Companies compleat, but much augmented them, and kept a very wary guard: That almost halfe of the Inhabitants were of the Religion: That the Catholiques had ben disarmed: besides, that they were all in a ialousie, for that some officers of the Artillery had but three daies before, drawn powder and some warlike instruments out of their magazin, to send vnto the King army. Vpon these difficulties the Earle of S. Paul (loth to hazard any thing) came from Orleans to the suburbs of S. Denis at Gergeau, sending for Bourbiers and the other Captaines, to whom hee deliuered the Kings Letters, commanding them to doe whatsoeuer the Earle of S. Paul should ordaine in his name. The Earle telling them that his Maiesties intention was, to be assured of the towne of Gergeau. They excused themselves, and said, that the King by his Letters did not command them to come forth: On the contrary, that his Maiestie passing by Orleans, had charged them to guard well the Towne and Passage for his seruice. Moreouer, that the Duke of Sully Gouvernor of the Towne had placed them there; and that it was fit they should aduertise him, who was then in Languedoc. The Earle seeing he could preuaile nothing with Bourbiers, resolved to besiege Gergeau, drawing together what forces he could. The Marshall of Vitry, and the Baron of Purlan his brother in law, with the Marquis of Rothelin, passing by Orleans, and hearing of this siege, came to assist the Earle in this occasion. The Marquis entered into the Towne to perswade Bourbiers and the Garison to obedience, but hee preuailed nothing: whereupon the Earle resolved to batter it, sending for Cannon and munition to Orleans. The besieged seeing themselves inuelted, sent to craue aid of the reformed Churches neere about them, who with all speed made choice of Vateville Monchistien to command the succors they would put into Gergeau the day that Bourbiers had limited. But the besieged being doubtfull thereof, and withall, fearing they should not be able to enter, they sent to present Articles vnto the Earle for the yeelding of the Towne, which were granted vpon condition they should depart the next day being May 23. The Articles were, For the free exercise of the Religion, and the payment of what was due vnto the Garison. The same night Vateville came downe the Riuer with 200 men, and the guards being retired, in the morning they put themselves into the Towne, and became masters thereof, by the help of the inhabitants of the Religion.

The Earle of S. Paul hauing summoned Bourbiers to effect the Composition which he & the rest had signed, hee was much troubled, for on the one side Vateville shewed his Letters, and told him he was come at the houre appointed; and on the other, hee had signed the treatie, and given his word to depart. Notwithstanding, hauing called a Councell, and considered that they had not things necessarie to maintaine a Siege; nor men sufficient to defend their fortifications, being withall engaged in a Composition, they resolved to obferue it, and to deliuer the place vnto the Earle, the which was performed accordingly.

A The Earle of Saint Paul hauing put a new Garison into Gergeau, returned the next day to Orleans, where hee received an aduertisement, that many Gentlemen and others of Vandemois and Danois of the Reformed Religion, were assembled together neere vnto the Forest of Marchenoir, either with an intent to succour Gergeau, or for some other enterprise. Whereupon he drew his Forces together, and caused them to marche instantly towards the Forest where they were retired, who seeing themselves pursued and charged, some fled through the woods, and the rest fell into the Earles power; among the which there were many Gentlemen, whom hee caused to be set at liberty, and their horses restored, vpon promise they should not cary arms against the Kings seruice.

B Chasteau-Renard, which is two leagues from Gergeau vpon the Riuer of Loin, appertained vnto the deceased Princeesse of Orange, daughter of Jaspar de Colligny Admirall of France, and Earle of Chastillon vpon Loin: It had bene numbered amongst the Townes of surty, with a Garison of fiftene men in the Fort called the Chastellet, which is a Rocke fortified with faulconets, powder, bullets, and other necessaries of defence. Congis and Vaudelin were as dead paies therein, who vpon rumor of the war, had brought certaine of the Religion into the place, furnished it with vituals, and kept it more strictly shut vp then before time. Whereof the inhabitants of Chasteau-Renard entring into distrust, and hauing enforced the King thereof, they were commanded to seize and to assure themselves thereof. Hereupon, the execution being resolved, all the inhabitants goe to arms, and being conducted by the Seigneur de L'Isle, Lieutenant of the Baillywicke of Chasteau-Renard, on the fourteenth of May, about foure of the clocke in the afternoon, they goe vp to the Fort, and summon Congis and Vaudelin to put the place into their hands, according to the Kings Letters: which they refusing to doe, they presently scale and enter the place, force such as make resistance, and thrust out Congis, Vaudelin, and the residue: and in their rooms place some of the inhabitants to guard the Fortresse. This done, they aduertised Monsieur de Saint Paul thereof, who sent word to the King of what had passed, assuring his Maiefty that he would take such order in his government, as there should be no alteration on this side Loire.

The King, during his abode at Saumur, had written to the Prince of Conde, to goe to Sancerre and assure himselfe thereof, and to them of Sancerre to receiue him. Now therefore the Prince about the end of April, comming into his Government of Berry, knowing the importance of this place, and that vndoubtedly it would bee the cause of trouble and disorder, if by industry and without open force (according to his Maiesties directions) he did not seize thereon: he practised his intelligences both within and without the Towne, with such as were affectioned vnto the Kings seruice: During which, he was aduertised that the Townsmen had a designe to worke in some of their Fortifications, and that the younger Briguemant had perswaded the youth and some inhabitants to receiue a Garison. Wherefore he sent word vnto the Sheriffs and inhabitants of Sancerre, that they should depute some among them to come vnto him; that hee had something to say vnto them which concerned the Kings seruice, and their owne preservation.

Three of them being come to Bourges, after he had very gently entertained them, and conferred with them about the practice of the younger Briguemant, he sayd vnto them, That their duty bound them to continue in the Kings obedience: That necessity constrained them therunto, being in the midst of France, without succours or hope of any to uphold them, but their modesty and obedience: That remaining in the state they were, fortifying nothing, nor receiuing any garison, hee promised to preserve them, and to change nothing in their Towne, goods, and liberty of conscience. They thanked him for the care he had of them; assuring him that they had no designe to fortifie, promised not to doe it, nor to take in any Garison.

F Notwithstanding, the Prince being assured by them with whom he had intelligence, that the inhabitants of Sancerre would not suffer him to enter the stronger into the town, he resolved to arme with all diligence, and not to send them the Kings Letters until hee had forces ready to surprize and make them to obey, in case they refused him entry. Hee signified therefore vnto some Gentlemen as well of Berry as of Bourbonnois, his Maiesties commandement, and prayed them to raise all the troops, and with all the speed they could, and appointed his Rendezvous at Saint Satur, on the 29 of May. He gaue order also for 12 peeces of Artillery to be brought the same day before Sancerre.

During these leavies, the Prince assured himselfe of such places and persons as hee thought might wauer or hinder his designs, and caused all the inhabitants of the Religion in the townes of Issoudun, Argenton, Chastauroux, La Castre, Aubigny, Chastillon, and other places where there were any numbers of them, to bee disarmed. Whilest the Prince was occupied herein, and ready to march with his troops towards Sancerre, he receiued newes that the towne had receiued a Garison on this manner: Gergeau being put into the Kings obedience, Vatenille (before mentioned) had left the Towne with about 400 men well armed, with the which he entred by night into Sancerre, by the fauour or conniuenue of the chiefe inhabitants: The younger Briquemant was in Bourgundy to leaue troops. Vatenille being entred, fought to make himselfe Master of the Towne by the meanes of them of the Reformed Religion, onely the Earle of Marans crossed his designe, being then in the Towne, whom hee vsed so audaciously and with such insolent threats as hee refused to retire.

Hee goes to besiege Sancerre.

The Prince of Conde had long before wonne vnto him one Capitaine Bronchard, an old Souldier, and of great credit in Sancerre, who by his commandement seized vpon the Castle, with some of the Earles seruants, and some inhabitants, the which hee defended valiantly against the Towne: whereof the Prince being aduertised, hee aduanced his troops with all speed to relieue them. Approaching neere the towne, the Earle of Marans Lord thereof, met him, and the two Gentlemen whom hee had sent with the Kings Letters and his owne, bringing answer that they of the Towne were humble seruants to the King and Prince, ready vnto all obedience, but they were not at liberty, nor Masters of their Town, to dispose as they desired, nor strong enough to obey, for that Vatenille was Master: wherefore they intreated the Prince to haue pity on them, and to free them from this seruitude, promising to contribute what they could to serue him. The Prince hauing not forces sufficient to inuest the Towne, hee sought to winne them by policy, trying them by goodly reasons and perswasions, and sowing jealousies betweene the inhabitants and the Garison, so as distrustful one another, they might yeeld to his will; and in the meane time hee might put succours into the Castle. His practises prevailed so well, as Vatenille grew fearfulfull of some bad designe, and banded a part with his Garison: They of the towne were likewise in feare, lest that Vatenille should commit some folly; whereupon they beganne to ioine themselves together, and to arme, so as they were all in mutinie, distrust, and feare one of another. In the meane time, the Prince put an hundred men into the Castle, where with they grew much amazed. Vatenille goes to the Prince, who feeds him with such good words, and a gratuitie of six hundred pound sterling, as hee resolues to depart with his souldiers, armes and baggage. The Townsmen in like manner (fearing lest Vatenille should abandon them and deliuer the Towne into the Princes hands) came also vnto him, and after great contestation receiued this Capitulation: Not to be molested in the exercise of their Religion: That they should be free in their liues, goods, and honors: That whereas they desired not to be disarmed, nor to receiue any Garison, it should bee according to his Maiesties pleasure: That all which had borne armes, might retire and be conducted to a place of safety. After this, Vatenille with his Garison, came forth, and the Prince entred, and put in a sufficient guard for the place.

A Capitulation made with the inhabitants of Sancerre.

It is written, that Vatenille going forth, casting his eyes backe, wept for anger, saying, What a fortune lose I by the wickednesse of Traytors which haue sold me? Whereunto hee added: That the Prince had taken Sancerre with a dreame, and that hee wondered how it should come into the imagination of man to thinke to take the strange place of France, for situation, with words.

The same night the towne was yielded, they tooke a spy, whom they brought vnto the Prince, who confessed that hee had bene sent by the Duchesse of Sully, to assure them of the Towne, that within three daies they should haue succours: wherefore hee disarmed all the inhabitants of Sancerre, leauing them nothing but their swordes; their armes were caried into the Castle, to be restored when the towne should bee demantled. The same day the Prince mustred his troops of Berry and Bourbonnois to the number of 7000 foot, and 800 horse, all which arised the night before: But to the end the Prouince should not be ruined, hee presently sent them away, except 500 men which hee put in Garison into the Towne and Castle, whilest they laboured about the razing of the Fortifications. This Towne was of great strength, and had in former times bene long defended by them of

A the Religion against a Royall Army. In this month of May, all they of the Reformed Religion were disarmed in the Townes vpon the Riuer of Loire, Picardy, and Champagne. Vpon this apprehension, many sought to shrowd themselves from the storme of persecution which they feared, and retired themselves into England, Sedan, and other places.

They of the Religion disarmed in diuers places.

In Normandy, the Duke of Longueville, disarmed them of Diepe, Rouen, and Newhauen. They proceeded more mildly at Caen, where many of the Religion during the League, had obtained the places of Captaines, and other charges. The Marquis of Montny, acquainted the Magistrates with his Maiesties command, desiring their ayd and counsell in this disarming, to the end it might not alter the Kings seruice, nor the peace of the Towne. They refused to send for the Minister, one of the Captaines, and some of the chiefe of the Religion, whom the Marquis acquainted with his Maiesties pleasure, and his purpose to execute his commandements: That he had no will to surprize them, assuring himselfe of their voluntary obedience in that which concerned the Kings pleasure, they hauing bene already disarmed at Diepe, Rouen, and Newhauen. They required time to confer with the body of their Church, fearing they should find some difficulty to perswade the people to obey this commandement; for that in the greatest troubles for the same cause they had not bene distrustful: yet they would doe their best endeavors to dispose them to obedience. They had two houres giuen them to conferre: and at their returne were content to deliuer their armes to their Captaines: the which was performed the next day, and on the six and twentieth they were caried into the Castle, and laid vp in one of the Magazines, whereof an Inuentury was taken and signed by the Marquis, and then left with the Register of the Towne. The Duke of Vendosme in like manner assuured vnto the Kings obedience, Vitry, Chastillon in Vandelaix, and other townes and Castles in Britany.

The Assembly at Rochel had solicited the Earle of Montgomery, Gouernor of Pont-Orson, and of the Religion, to be of their faction, with an intent if hee would not yeeld therunto, to surprize this place: It is a frontier Towne of great importance, lying vpon the Sea betwene Normandy and Britany. The King being aduertised that the Earle D would by no meanes yeeld to the Assembly: He sent him word, that his desire was, he should receiue a recompence for his Gouernment, to the end hee might preferre that place so much importing those two great Prouinces. The Earle hauing taken aduice of his friends, and receiued content, deliuered the towne vnto a Catholique Gentleman to whom his Maiesty had giuen the Gouernment.

Pont-Orson yeilded to the King by the Earle of Montgomery.

On the twentieth of May, sixteen Ministers, fifteen of the Assembly, and twelue of them which they call free Burgeses, assembled together in Councell in the towne of Rochel, to consult whether they should expell the Priests of Saint Margaret of the Congregation of the Oratory, and in what manner they should doe it: some which were barbarous and inhumane, would haue them massacred or burnt in their Church; and some would haue them cast over the wals: but in the end the Magistrate letting them vnderstand that the like might be done vnto their brethren which were in Catholique townes, this miserable designe was not executed: onely it was resolved they should leaue the towne, and the Maior had charge to acquaint them therewith; vpon whose command two of them came vnto him, to whom hee made this short discourse: My Masters, hitherto I haue done what I could for your preservation, but now I acquaint you with my weaknesse: consider what I may doe for you: I haue retired my selfe from a Company, to come and giue you this aduice, Of necessity you must depart the towne speedily, there being no meanes to containe the people, being incensed against you: Consider speedily how I may further your departure.

The Fathers of the Oratory driven out of Rochel.

The Fathers of Saint Margaret seeing the Maiors honesty, gaue him thanks, and entreated him to assist them with his counsell: who aduised them to make shew of going to walke two and two together, and so depart. To who they answered, That they could not doe it without danger of their liues, for that they should undoubtedly fall into the hands of many souldiers which were without the Ports. Whereupon they retired. About noone, the Maior seeing the towne in quiet, euery man being gone to dinner, hee sent speedily for these Fathers, telling them that hee had prepared a boat, and would send them away: whereof they were very glad, resolving vpon their departure, the Maior came vnto them with thirty or forty men armed; who causing them to shut the doores of their Church

Church and house, tooke the keyes and conducted them to the new Port, where a Barke attended them to cary them to Brouage. The Mayor did full accompany them, and going out of the Port, shut it after him, to prevent the fury of the multitude, and to see them safely embarked.

Death of the Cardinal of Guise.

During the siege of Saint Iohn D'Angely, the Cardinall of Guise dyed at Xaintes of a Fever, having over-heat his blood with much toile at the siege. Hee was onely a Cardinall Deacon, and had neuer fung Masse: He was a Prince altogether martiall, and more enclined to armes then to his booke, whereof he made good prooffe, going vnarmed in the company of his brother the Prince of Ioinville, and forced the barricadoes of the suburbs of Saint Iohn, without any apprehension of all their shot: His death was generally lamented in Court: His Maiestie gaue good testimonies of his griefe, and the Prince his brother was wonderfully afflicted for his losse.

Pons yielded
to the King.

After the reduction of Saint Iohn, the King refreshed his army some few dayes, and in the meane time sent the Marshall of Chauue to inuest Pons, into the which the Marquis of Chasteau-neuf of Lymolin, nephew to Monsieur de la Force, had put himselfe, with diuers Gentlemen, and fifteene hundred Harquebusers, purposing by their resistance to giue leisure vnto the Rochellers and the Townes of Guienne and Languedoc to continue their fortifications, and mitigate their fears.

This Towne of Pons is of very great importance vnto the Prouince of Xaintonge, and within foure leagues of Xaintes: It hath a very faire and strong Castle, with strong walls and deepe ditches. The Towne standeth on the steepe decline of a hill, at the foot whereof runneth the Riuer of Seine. In briefe, it is a very good and strong Towne, and might well haue long disputed their approaches, and kept the Royalists from their Counterscarpes; but the Commanders seeing the Kings army so neere, and most of them being re-puted the authors which had caused the Assembly at Rochel to sweare their continuance, fearing the Kings iust indignation, they bethought themselves, giuing notice to the Constable by the Marshalls D'Esdaigniers, that they would accept of an honourable composition: whose answer was, That they should yeeld the place at the Kings discretion without conditions, and that he would be a meanes for their liues and liberty; the which they accepted: whereupon some of the chiefe brought the keyes presently to the King, the same day he came to Coignac, which was the last of Iune. The Marshall D'Esdaigniers and Chauue entred the towne to prevent disorders, and to draw forth the Garison, into the which the Regiment of Esflissac entred, vntill the fortifications and walls were demolished; for if this towne had fallen againe into rebellion, it had kept the passage from Poitou to Bourdeaux; and had much supported them of Rochel by their intelligences with the Townes of their party reuoluted in base Guienne.

The Fortifications and walls of Pons demolished.

The Assembly at Rochel imagining that the King should not bee able to force Saint Iohn D'Angely in so short a time, the which they could by no meanes succour, resolved to send those soldiery that had within Rochel to make a descent into base Poitou, towards Luffon, Olone, Tallemont and Saint Benoist, hoping by this meanes to draw together all them of the Religion in Poitou and other Prouinces; and withall to bring into Rochel all the victuals and other commodities they should find in that Country, foreseeing, that they would not suffer them to gather their haruest nor vintage. Fauas, La Noue, and Bessay, landed with twelve hundred men, and spoiled some places. The King being aduertised hereof, he presently sent the Marshall of Praslin, the Duke of Elbeuf, and the Earle of Rochefoucault, with their troops. They of the Religion had already embarked at the Port of Larrerie two thousand bushells of meale, and the best mouables they could find in Luffon and thereabouts, but the Marshall seized on these Burkes, and caried the meale to Luffon. The Rochellers comming to Saint Benoist began to build a Fort at the mouth of the Riuer of Lay, and in the meane time the three Commanders make an enterprize vpon Sables D'Olonne. The Marshall giues a furious assault vnto their new Fort, takes it, and kills a hundred and fifty of their men, and puts the rest to flight, whereof some were taken, and others drowned in the Owze. The three Commanders hearing hereof, saved themselves in their Burkes, and so retired: The Granges brethren to Bessay vnderstanding this defeat, abandoned Tallemont: so as all this Country which seemed lost, was in an instant freed from the Rochellers.

The Castle of Sully reuoluted.

The King being at Coignac was aduertised of the reuolt of the Castle of Sully vpon the 1621

A the Riuer of Loire, betweene Gian and Orleans. The Earle of Saint Paul hearing that the Duchesse of Sully had admitted many of the Reformed Religion into her Castle, with the consent of Buziou who was Capitaine, and that the number encreased daily, hee sent a Gentleman vnto the Duchesse, to know the reason of this alteration: She excused her selfe, saying, that they were poore men, exiled from their houses, and that being of her Religion, she had in charity giuen them entry into the parke of her house. The younger brother of Briquemaunt one of the Deputies of the Assembly in Rochel, with the Baron of Trinne, and many Gentlemen and Souldiers, had retired thither, so as in lesse then eight dayes they were foure hundred foot and horse, which did much annoy the adiacent Prouinces. They seized vpon the Church of Saint Pere on the other side of the Loire, right against the Castle, the which they fortified with good trenches, in the which the Baron of Trinne commanded with threecore men: they interrupted the comerce of the Riuer: and made the neighbour Parishes to pay taxes, and to labour in their fortifications. The inhabitants of Sully seeing this alteration, resolved to maintaine themselves in the Kings seruice against the Castle: and to keepe them in this duty, the Earle of Saint Paul sent the Baron of Courtenay to command ouer them: and seeing the harme this place did, not onely in his Government, but in the other neighbour Prouinces, and what might happen in time, he resolved to prevent it: but for that he wanted sufficient forces, hee wrote to the Duke of Montbazon Governour of the Ile of France, to the Marshall of Vitry, and especially to the Prince of Conde, Governour of Berry, who had the greatest interest, for that he was neereest: but there was some difficulty; for sayd some, If the Prince comes in person to the siege of Sully, the Earle of Saint Paul could not be Generall of the Army, although it were in his Government: whereunto the Earle answered, I desire to prefer the Kings seruice and the quiet of the Prouince, before the honour which I should get. He sent to the Prince, and they met at Aubigny, whither the Marquis of Rhosioy, sonne to the Duke of Sully, came (being sent by the King in Poste, to reduce Buziou to his duty, which he could not effect) where they resolved of this siege, preparing their troops and Cannons to batter it.

Fifth of all, they forced their new fortifications at Saint Pere, where they were most of them slaine and drowned. After this they went into Sully, and planted two Batteries, forcing them to abandon the Parke, and retire into the Castle, which was but little, and greatly annoyed by the Cannon. The Duchesse of Sully was retired into the Towne, being much grieved to see this house ruined by her owne fault, and that to be assured of her person, they spake of sending her to Bourges. The besieged were incommodated both with the want of meanes to cure their wounded (being many, who died for want of reliefe) and with the stench of the garbage of Cattell they fed on: so as on the 19 of Iuly they sent to the Prince to demand a Composition, the which was granted. The conditions were. To returne in safety to their houses, and to enioy their goods. A pardon for all that had beene done at Sully and thereabouts. A promise to obtaine a pardon from the King for Buziou. That they should haue free liberty of conscience according to the Edicts. That they should depart with their armes and baggage, booties and horses. That they should be conducted to a place of safety, and within three dayes to separate themselves, and returne vnto their houses. That they might leaue two within the Castle to retire their baggage. That all prisoners should be deliuered: vpon condition that they should yeeld the Castle of Sully into their hands, and take the oath which Monsieur Soubise had done to serue the King in all places, and against all men. These Articles were signed by the Prince of Conde and the Earle of Saint Paul.

A little before, the Duke of Tremouille came to the Kings quarter at Saint Iohn, to protest his fidelity and the obedience he ought vnto his Maiesty, who said vnto him, That he was glad to see him neere him, to the end he might see that hee had not taken armes but to suppress the new Common-wealth of Rochel, and such as did acknowledge their command: and that he would make it knowne that he was both a good King and a good Master to such as should serue and loue him: That he would not force any mans conscience no further then by the truth of doctrine, and the good examples of the Clergy, if God lent him any time to liue. At the same time Monsieur de Malherbe, a Gentleman of the Religion, came out of base Guienne, with an expresse commission from many Townes and Communalties, and especially from Monsieur de Boisse Pardailhan, to reuocall the Kings commandments, and to reuoke and disauow disauow the Deputies of this Prouince, which were at the Assembly at Rochel, which A gaue the King great content, being wrought by this meanes. Monseur de la Force being maide Generall Prouinciall of the Circle of bale Guienne by the Assembly; Monseur de Basse Pardaillan could not like of this diuision, nor to be commanded by him, who by the practices of his sonne Cassehan, and his nephew Chasteauneuf of Lymosin, Deputies in the said Assembly, had procured him this Commission after his retreat from Bearne. This Seigneur of Basse hauing refused a Commission to be his Lieutenant Generall, he preuiled to by his credit, as he procured a Prouinciall Councell of bale Guienne to bee called at Saint Foy, in May, to aduise of the meanes how they might obtaine a quiet condition for the rownes of the Religion in that Prouince vnder his Maiesties obedience: where it B was refused to send du Malleret vnto the King to offer obedience in the behalfe of their Prouinciall Assembly, and particularly of Monf: de Basse Pardaillan, and of all the townes of bale Guienne except Montauban and Bergerac. He deliuered his charge accordingly:

To whom the King made this answer: That they for whom he had brought assurance of their fidelity, should be entreated like vnto the Catholiques: neither would he euer suffer them to be forced in their consciences, nor oppress in their publique or priuate fortunes. But notwithstanding any care or foresight in his deputation, hauing exacted an oath from them that sent him, and caused all them which represented the Communalities, to signe his instructions:
yet the corruption of the time prevailed, and by meanes of the Duke of Rohans voyage C into high Languedoc, and the intelligences of Monseur de la Force, all the Townes of bale Guienne, (except Saint Foy, and Monur, Mont de Marfan, Cassau, and Castillon) contrary to their duties and promise, revolted, tooke armes, receiued souldiers, placed and displaced Governours at their pleasure, and the Chamber of the Edict established at Nerac, and the Kings Iudges and Officers were shamefully expelled.

On the eighth of Iuly, the King came to Cognac, a goodly house belonging to the Countess of Saint Paul, and a famous place for the battell which the deceased King did winne, and by the death of the Admirall of Joyeuse: His Maiesty discoursed iudiciously of this battell: That good Captaines should be without ostentation, and that the Admirals sealousie against the Marshall of Matignon (who was coming vnto him) for that he would not share the honor with him, was the cause of his ruine. During this discourse, Monseur D de Basse arriued, with many Gentlemen of the Religion, who came to offer their liues and Governments vnto his Maiestie, who receiued them fauourably, and entertained them in particular touching the innocency of his armes, and the bad designs of the Assembly at Rochel.

The Consuls of Castillon and Saint Foy came thither, and brought the keyes of their Townes, so as there remained not any but Bergerac, which held the Kings mind and his Councell in some suspence. But before his departure, the Constable (who had laboured powerfully with such as might sow diuision in the towne, and strike a terror into those fiftene hundred men) receiued certaine newes that Monseur de la Force prepared for his departure, and that the Garrison disbanded, the which many held incredible, for that the place being very well fortified and furnished with men, artillery, and munition, it seemed E that Monseur de la Force should haue kept it, either to cast himselfe at the Kings feet in opening him the Gates, or to haue buried himselfe in the ruines of a breach: but the Constables care had ruined his authority and his childrens, by lawfull and necessary meanes in this age of infidelity.

Before the Kings departure from Coignac, he gaue order for the blocking vp of Rochel both by Sea and Land. He sent to the Ports of Normandy and Britany, to prepare a fleet to stop the Pyrates courses, which came from all parts to Rochel, for that all their Thefts were held good prize there in paying their duties: Hee also sent to the Duke of Guise to Marcellus, to cause the General of the Gallies to bring them towards Rochel. F
By Land he commanded the Duke of Elspem to goe with foure thousand foot, and six hundred horse to lodge about the Towne, and to keepe them from all communication and commerce with Poitou, Xaintonge, and Aunis, the which troubled them of Rochel and the Deputies of the Assembly much. This Towne being now blocked vp, it shall not be impertinent to relate what I find written of the situation, government, and strength of this towne.

Rochel, they say, is the Queene and Midris of all others, and is the very Sanctuary of all

A all Malecontents. It is the strongest within the Realme, and may be speedily relieved by land and water, from Poitou, Xaintonge, and Aunis, and by sea from the neighbour Ilands, and from England, Holland, and other Countreies. The Seigneur of Loudriere, vnder the title and quality of Seneschall of Aunis, teames himselfe Gouvernor, but all his authority consists in chusing of a Maior yearly, out of three which they present vnto him, which is not much.

The body of the towne is composed of a Maior, forty eight Peeres, and one and fifty Burgeises. This company of 100 men of the most sufficient amongst them, gouerne the people absolutely. But within these six yeares some subtil spirits which had and yet haue B good entry into their Councils, that they might become the more necessary, haue sowed such distrusts among the people, and of such consequence, as they haue now formed another party, to counterpoise the body of the town, which being compounded of the Commons, and some of the rich inhabitants are called Franck Burgeises, and are at this day so strong, that they make the Ministers preach as they please, and haue brought the body of the towne to admit into all their Assemblies and Resolutions of importance, six of these Franck Burgeises, which are called Sindics or Tribunes, and to this effect are chosen euery yeare by the people, and changed as they see occasion. This nouelty causeth hatred and diuisions in the managing of affaires, wrong and confusion. The Towne is free from all Subsidies and Impositions, and for this cause much frequented with traffique, so as it is C thought there may bee found a hundred or sixscore Merchants worth 100000 Crownes apiece the worth of them. It is very well furnished with powder, and 150 Cannon for battery, besides Culuerins and smaller Pieces, with victuals, and other necessary prouisions: The inhabitants are so well armed, as they made shew of seven or eight thousand foot to the Duke of Sully, when he tooke possession of the Gouernment of Poitou; the fortifications of the towne are almost finished: it consists of twelue great Royall Bastions of free stone, with double ditches, deepe and broad at the bottome, with spacious Ramiers.

The hauen is small, but very safe, made like a horse-shoe, and within the compass of the wals, the road is in a manner round; the chain which shuts vp the hauen, is drawne D vp nightly, between two round Towers, betwix which there is no more place then for the passage of a good ship. The Lanthorne Tower which is higher then the rest, looks into the sea, and stands vpon the point of the wall on the right hand going out of the Port.

The town is of a flat situation, and the ditches may be easily filled with water when they please: there is a great Marish of two or three thousand paces broad, which diuides the approaches into two parts, at the least a French league from the Towne, so as to besiege it they must haue two Armies by land, which cannot releue one another, and a third by Sea to hinder their succours.

But let vs returne to the Kings voyage into Guienne. The Duke of Rohan and Monseur Description of E de la Force hauing assured Toncins, Clerac, and other places, to their partie, on this side the Garonne, they goe to Nerac, where they were receiued with great shewes of affection, and Monseur de la Force acknowledged for Generall of the Prouince. This towne was much fauoured by Henry the great, wherein he kept his Court long, being but King of Nauarre, in regard of the pleasantnesse thereof. It is able to endure a Royall siege. The Chamber of Iustice is held in the Castle. President Pichon, a Catholique, was lodged there, and La Force was Gouvernor. The President seeing the arriuall of these two Noblemen, and the reception they gaue vnto Monseur de la Force, he demanded assistance from the Gouvernor of the Castle, who swore that he would neuer open the gates but to the King: whereupon he sent presently to the Duke of Mayen, beseeching him to come to F Nerac, and to relieue him in this extremity, seeing that the Gouvernor had assured him neuer to yeeld the Castle.

The Duke was then sicke of an ague at Bourdeaux, hauing no troops leauied in his Government, but he presently posted away with his followers, giuing commandement to Barrault and Ornano Sainte croix, to come to him with their Regiments.

He aduanceth without troops, hoping to make them acknowledge their fault, and returne to their obedience: but he found the young Viscount of Casters, and a son of Monf:

de la Force, within the towne, who shut the gates against him, and answered him with a Musket shot.

In the meane time, the Kings army (by the care of the Marshals of Roquelaure, and Aubeterre, and of Monsieur de Vignolles) grew to bee three or foure thousand foot, and about eight hundred horse: but this was not sufficient to iueſt both Neracs and the Castle; they also wanted Officers, Cannon and Munition, and order for money to pay the army, which made some stay of the Dukes proceedings.

Caumont surprised by the Marquis of La Force.

On the 23 of Iune, the Duke being aduertised that the Marquis of La Force had drawn together about two thousand men, and given it out that he would raise the siege of Nerac, he suddenly went to horsebacke, leaving Monsieur de Vignolles with the foot and some horse before the towne: but upon the way he understood that they had surprised Caumont at noone day, by the treason of a Conſull and a Sentinell of the reformed Religion, whereof the other inhabitants of the same Religion were so innocent, as seeking to defend themselves; there were twelve or fifteene slaine, and three Catholiques: so as they had like to haue surprised the Castle, there being not about tenne souldiers within it.

This was the Marquis his chiefe designe, seeking to draw the Gouvernor Esparville into the Towne by an interposed person, upon colour of a Christning, the which he promised to doe, but did not, being forced to keepe within the Castle, by reason of the alarme which was giuen, and the flight of the Catholiques which came flying towards the same.

The Duke of Mayen being ariued, and seeing the Castle hold out, he resolved to relieue it, and charge the enemy; hauing drawne together about three thousand men, with the helpe of the neighbour townes, and the Regiments of Barrault and Ornano, which were come vnto him, with the which he charged the Protestants in their trenches and barricados, and they defended themselves resolutely for the space of foure houres, where the fight was very furious, but in the end they were forced to abandon them, and to retire to their other workes within the Towne, so as Colonell Barrault had good meanes to enter into the Castle with his Regiment. In the night the Protestants (seeing the Castle so well fortified, and the Duke of Mayen ready to charge them in the morning with the whole army) retired towards Castell-Jaloux, after the losse of foure hundred men, whereof one hundred were burnt and slaine with the ruines of a Church which they had made a Magazin for their powder, which was set on fire by negligence.

Caumont recovered from the Protestants.

Nerac yielded to the Duke of Mayenne.

Thus they lost Caumont againe, which is held the strongest place in Guienne, whereof they made themselves assured, hoping by this diuersion to raise the siege of Nerac.

The Duke of Mayen hauing reduced Caumont to the Kings obedience, he returned to Nerac, where notwithstanding that La Force Captaine of the Castle had broken his word and deliuered it vp, that succours were entred, and that they had made many resolute sallies, yet they were forced to yeeld vnto the Duke the ninth of Iuly, and to receiue a Catholique Gouvernor with a Garison of eight hundred men, and to feed the Kings army, being eight thousand men, for the space of foure dayes.

Thus Nerac, which had been honored by the Kings father with the Chamber of the Edict in Guenne, is for her reuolt thus punished, and it transferred to Agen. A goodly example for others, which giue eare to the passionate speeches of malecontents, who alwayes couer their owne interests, passions, ambition, and couetousnesse vnder the cloake of Religion, or that of the common-weale.

Castell-Jaloux.

The Duke of Mayen seeing himselfe fortified with a faire army both of horse and foot, and supplied with money from the King to defray the charges of the warre, he turned head towards Castell-Jaloux, a towne of surety in the Duchy of Albret, whereof the Viscount of Fauas was Gouvernor: It is a place of good repute for warre, and well seated, hauing meanes to interrupt the commerce of them of Bourdeaux, with Armagnac, Condomois, Ax, Bayonne, and Spaine: it is in a Country full of them of the Religion, and where the Catholique Religion was scarce knowne: but it is not able to maintaine a long siege. Wherefore seeing the Duke of Mayen turne head with his army and Cannon towards them, they sent their Deputies vnto him, promising to receiue what law it should please the King to prescribe.

Monhur.

A Monhur, a little towne of surety, vpon the bankes of Garonne, well fortified, was reduced to the Kings obedience by Monsieur de Boisse their Gouvernor (as we haue said) but it reuolted during the siege of Montauban, the sonne of Monsieur de Boisse falsifying his word which he had giuen his father, and his fidelity to the King: which was the cause of a parricide, and the ruine of Monhur.

Mont de Mar-tan and Tartas.

As for Mont de Marſan and Tartas, townes of surety also, in the Duchy of Albret, vpon the Riuer of Ladour, which falls into the Sea at Bayonne; the Gouvernors and inhabitants sent to make protestation of their fidelity vnto the King, or vnto the Duke of Mayenne in the name of his Maiestie. And so did Millau and other small places. In some they charged the Gouvernors, or tooke them quite away, hauing razed the fortifications. This is all which passed in base Guienne, beyond the Riuer of Garonne, where the townes were reduced to the Kings obedience, by the Duke of Mayenne.

The King
came to Castillon.

The King came to Castillon on the 21 of Iuly, where La Forest the Gouvernor receiued him with all kinds of submission. This towne belongs to the Duke of Bouillon, and all the inhabitants are of the Religion. In all the townes belonging to the said Duke, the King was receiued by the Gouvernors, Captaines, and Inhabitants, with all shewes of duty and demonstration of faithfull Subjects.

It is a towne of surety vpon the Riuer of Dordone: it purchased reputation, being assaulted by the Duke of Mayenne, who commanded an army in Guienne vnder Henry the third, for that it had made resistance foure moneths, and defended a trench five weekes, where there was nothing but a barricado of Hogsheds which made the separation, yet there was neuer place better assaulted, nor better defended. His Maiesty hearing that some indiscreet perſons would haue committed a disorder in their Temple, he commanded Monsieur de Madene to make enquiry, who set certaine Archers to guard it, to the end the souldiers which past, might not commit any insolency, whereof they gaue him a certificate, and desired his Maiesty to pardon what was past.

And to Saint Foy.

The King came to Saint Foy, where the Seigneurs of Theobon, who had married the daughter of Monsieur de Boisse, was Gouvernor. The Court lodged there, but the King in the Castle of Mezieres. This towne is in the Seneschalſhey of Agenois, three leagues from

D Bergerac, mounting vp the Riuer of Dordone, and of no lesse esteeme then Bergerac. It is well fortified, manned, and munitioned. The Magistrats and Conſuls gaue the Grand Prouost a Declaration that they had receiued no bad vſage, either in their persons or goods, but all honour and fauour from his Maiesty: yet afterwards both they and Theobon their Gouvernor, whom the King left in the place, reuolted during the siege of Montauban. The Seigneurs Panissant came thither vnto the King, he was powerfull in Bergerac, and had laboured faithfully to reduce them to their obedience by the Constables care. His Maiesty receiued him fauourably, and was well pleased with his seruice, promising to acknowledge his fidelitie to him and his posterity. The King came to Bergerac, where he entred without any solemnity; he stayed there foure dayes, and viewed the fortifications.

Bergerac.

E This towne is held of great importance in base Guienne, for their wealth, traffique, and great fortifications: It stands vpon the Riuer of Dordone, in a large plaine not commanded.

During his Maiesties stay there, many neighbour places of Agenois and Quercy (who fought nothing but a president of some reuolt within the Realme) were deliuered into the Kings hands by their Gouvernors, who gaue them recompence, and commanded their wals and fortifications should be demantled, speaking these words worthy of his piety and iustice, That he wished there were no places fortified, but vpon the Frontiers of his Realme, to the end the hearts and fidelities of his subjects, might serue as Citadels for the guard of his person. The chiefe places thus reduced, were Puymerol, Thonneins, and Montflanquin on

F this side the Riuer of Garonne. Finally, Montsegur, Parado, Saint Serre, Castellnou, Cardailac, Cadenac, Casters, and Mucidan, places of surety, with others which the Protestants held, betweene the Riuers of L'Isle, Dordone, Garonne, and Lot, (except Clerac, whither the most zealous of these townes retired themselves to defend it against the king) came and brought their keyes to his Maiesty. The Duke of Sully being at Figeac, sent to assure the King of his fidelity, the like did they of Turene, Lymeuil, and all other places belonging to the Marshall of Bouillon.

The Kings vi-gilan y in the council of his Army.

The King passed his Cannon over the River of Dordone, and left Rembures with his Regiment in Bergerac, to see the fortifications thereof demolished: In his marche hee was very carefull (seeing the bad wayes) for his Cannon, which hee caused to be sheltered by his troops, to prevent all surpris by them of Clerac, so as hee was forced to stay a day at Saint Bartholmewes for it, which hee desired to see in the head of his army, for neuer Prince was more ieaalous nor more carefull for the lodging of his troops, as well for their safeties, as for the commodities of water, wood, and forage. When the army is quartered, he desired to know the situation of their lodgings, the approaches and the distance of the enemies Garisons: saying, that it is a great impiety in a Generall, not to take an exact care of lodgings, for that the whole armie relies vpon his foresight and vigilancy. He would not suffer his horse and foot to be diuided by any sudden Torrent, or by any charge of the Enemy falling betwene them, so as they might not succour one another, saying, that they must accustom them to lodge after this manner, were it but for the reputation of the Generall which commands the Army.

The King sends
to view Clerac.

The King having refused to march, it was propounded by the Constable to send the Marshall of Saint Geran, and the Seigneurs of Termes and Zamet, to view the situation of Clerac, which was but three Gallie leagues from Saint Bartholmew, to bring him word at his comming to Toneins, what they had discovered: which his Maiefty finding very necessary, commanded that Monsieur Company of horse, and Arnauds Carabins should accompany them.

It is faile to lodge and slip without his Officers.
The vigilancy of the Constable.

On Monday the nineteenth, the King removed from Saint Bartholmewes, with intention to goe lodge at Toneins, but there fell such a storme of raine, as all the grounds were drowned, and the brookes which were betweene Hautlevigne and Toneins, so ouerflowed, that most part of the army was in great danger. The King seeing this deluge with which his poore souldiers were drenched, would neuer enter vnder any rooffe, or into his Coach, to giue them an example of constant suffering, and besides, comforted them with good words. This rayne lasted six or seven houres without intermission, and forced the King to lodge at Hautlevigne vpon the brinke of the flood, without any of his Officers, because they were already past these waters, and by this meanes was faile to slip with such prouisions as was found amongst some stragling souldiers of the army.

The Constable slept not all the night, and foreseeing that those of Clerac (who had foure thousand souldiers in their towne) would wax audacious with this accident of the weather, & that they should haue small seruice of the footmen or Cannon for foure daies after, he sent many messages vnto the Grand Prouost, as well to repaire the bridge which the Torrent had broken, as to cause lights to be set vpon all eminent places, and in the high-ways, to guide those which were yet in the waters, or other wayes strayed, that they might ioyne themselves vnto the army.

The Lord Keeper, and many other of the Councell, were passed a little before, vpon a little bridge, before the throng of people came, or that the River was risen, and went to Toneins. The Secretaries of State and Treasurers came while after, but too late, for they found the passage stoppt vp by the Foot. At the same instant arriued the Grand Prouost, who leaving the King, to enter into the meadows all couered with water, in many places to the skirts of the Saddle, and fearing lest the little bridge should be broken, which was the only refuge for the King if he had come into the water, advanced himselfe to seize vpon the same, but stepping vp to get thereon, the thrust was so great, that hee was borne downe into the River, with his cloake buttoned about him, where, had not the souldiers of the Guard pulled him suddenly out, he had perished, as some others did in the same place. Being gotten into a Mill hard by, hee sent presently for Carpenters to strengthen the bridge that the King might passe; but he would not abandon his Cannon, nor his foot, which made the Grand Prouost goe to Toneins, where he found the Keeper of the Seales, and the Earle of Schomberg, where they refused to assure themselves of Toneins, in the which there were but two Companies which should enter in guard before the Kings lodging.

This accident might well tempt the inhabitants in regard of the persons which were come into the Towne; but they prouided carefully for the keeping of the Ports, and for their hosts and armes.

The

Opinions touching the siege
of Clerac.

A The waters being somewhat fallen, his Maiefty came on the twentieth of Iuly to Toneins, where it was propounded in Councell, that the army could not bee drawne together to attempt any exploit in three dayes, nor recouer their Cannon and Baggage in foure, wherefore in the meane time they should consider what might be fit for the siege of Clerac, if they persisted in their rebellion. There were diuersities of opinion; Some held that Clerac was without fame or reputation, and that it was not to bee found in the Mappe; yet the situation, the fortification, and foure thousand men (which were held to be the most warlike of the Prouince) defended it: That the soile was so fat and slippery, as three dayes of raine would ruine the Kings trenches: That it was easie to imagine that they of Montauban encouraged them to endure a siege, to preserve themselves, and to draw the Kings army into a rainy season, which was their only hope: That it was better to prevent them before they had finished the parapet of their new workes, or resolved what troops they would receiue to maintaine the siege: That they knew well they were very ieaalous to recieve any troops from any great man of their party, and therefore they could not recouer any but from their neighbours, which would not be sufficient, for that they must haue about two thousand men, only to keepe the halfe-moones and new fortifications of Villebourbon: That Clerac might be kept from all acts of hostility by the neighbour garisons: That the full obedience of the townes of Languedoc, depended on the taking of Montauban, and in like manner Clerac would yield, the siege whereof would consume much time, and make them lose the fruits which they expected before winter: wherefore they were of opinion, That if they of Clerac would yield to the raising of their new fortifications, and giue hostages to perform it, they should accept them, whereby they should gaine time, and spare much blood which would be spilt.

Opinions for the besieging
of Clerac first.

The contrary opinion maintained, That it touched the Kings reputation, to leaue a place in Guienne, which might be a shelter and refuge to the mutins (who commonly liue quietly in their houses, hauing no retreat) and that there was no other place which would maintaine a revolt: That they must not consider the number of men within it, but the quality of such as had authority, and remember, that if the Marquis of La Force, who was Gouernor, could haue found any safety, he would not haue left it so shamefully: That S. Torse (who was the most eminent in birth and reputation) had good parts for a Souldier, but he had not sufficient for a Commander, nor to defend a place which should be battered with 25 Cannons, and that they knew well there were not ten men of command within the towne: That the inhabitants (who had goods to lose) would maintaine their authority, and not suffer S. Torse nor his souldiers to suppress their power, and that when as they should see themselves assaulted, and ready to be made a prey to the armie, they would embrace a partie: That the souldiers (seeing themselves in ieaalousie with the inhabitants, and they alone exposed to all dangers) would thinke of their safety, especially, when they should haue lost their Counterscarpe and ditches: That they must spend a moneth in taking of the townes which were in the way to Montauban: the which the Duke of Mayen (who would arriue the next day, from the taking of Caumont and Nerac) might performe with his armie, and so no time should be lost.

The Constable said, That there were many reasons on either side, but he was of opinion to attempt Clerac, relying vpon the intelligences which hee had practised with the enemy, whereby he hoped that Clerac would bee reduced to obedience within three weekes. Whereupon the King resolved for this siege, commanding the Cannon should be brought on. On the 21 of Iuly, D'Esplan, a Captaine of Carabins, brought foure of the chiefe inhabitants of Clerac to the Constable, who demanded, That his Maiefty should suffer them to enioy their libertie, and leaue their fortifications as they were, for the satisfaction of their liues, and so they would declare themselves his subjects. To whom the Constable made answer, You should be wisser or more powerfull to use this speech: you remember, yet that the King is at your gates, and hath behind him thirty Cannons to open them: Can you expect at his feet, any pardon of your criminall designes, and referre your selues to his clemency, when he hath the honor to be allied vnto him, and you who are rebellious people, and cannot submit but by his only bounty, presume to dispute his authority and reputation. Hereupon these Deputies retired, saying, It was true, but they could not doe otherwise, hauing no further power.

The next day, the King being in Councell, said, That the day following they must giue a Rendezvous to all the foot, to inuest the towne : To whom the Constable answered : A That the Marshall D'Esdaigniers and Monsieur de Beille were gone, to see if they could make them become honest men : who arising at that instant, made report, That they had saluted them with the Cannon, and fiore of Musquet shot, and that they must not expect any reason from them by mildnesse : Moreouer, they said, that the approach vnto the towne was troublefome, and barricadoed in many places, which they must force, and give the command to the wisest and most resolute and couragious. Some write that they feared themselves, Souldiers without feare, defending a Towne without a King.

They layd also, That the iustice the King should doe in Clerac, would strike a terror into all the factions of France: That his subiects complained by the officers of Soueraigne Courts, That his Maiefty had left the title of Lewis the Lust, which his admirable iudgement had purchased, to take (by his too great mildnesse) that of Lewis the Gentle : That it was a kind of cruelty to vse indulgence to such as fought to peruert the Lawes of the Monarchy, and that he must doe like vnto a pitifull father, who to saue his sonnes body, cauleth the Chirurgion to cut off an arme or a leg : By these reasons they concluded, That they must not speake of any treatie, but of an absolute submission at the Kings discretion.

The Constable gaue three Rendezvous to the army, for that Clerac is enuironed with many hills full of Vines, of very hard access; the approaches were narrow passages, difficult for the horse, where the besieged were entrenched and barricadoed. The army being armed, and the Commanders hauing viewed the places fittest to be assailed, they gaue order for the charge, the which was giuen in three severall places with great resolution, and maintained by them of the towne very obstinately. The Regiment of the Kings Guard (being led by Monsieur de Termes, Marshall of the Camp) hauing forced their third barricado, and pursued the besieged to the very ditch, he was unfortunately shot into the body, being on horsebacke and without armes. Hee was presently caried to Tonneins (which was the Kings quarter) lying till the next day. He was generally lamented. The Kings Confessor came to visit him, who saluted him in the Kings name : Father, said hee, speake no more vnto me of the Kings of the earth, to whom I am now vnprofitable, but speake onely of the King of heauen. He committed his last sighs vnto the Grand Prouost, and entreated him to assure the King, That the onely griefe hee had to dye, was for that he could no longer serue him : That he left a brother afflicted, a young iue in despair, and two children without means and in miserie: That he recommended them to the Kings charity, protesting that he had not any thing but what it pleased him to giue him. The King hearing of this disaster, went to visite him, and hauing embraced him, he comforted him, promising him to haue a care of his children, who returning from him, the teares fell from his eyes.

The siege continued, and the Kings troops advanced with their trenches which were ready to breake into their ditches. These sharpe assaults, with their Batteries and Mines, terrified the besieged, there being also some jealousie and distrust betweene the souldiers and the inhabitants, by the Constables industry, praised from the beginning of the siege. All these encounters drew the first Confull and the chiefe inhabitants to thinke of their safety; and for that he had the honour to be well knowne vnto the Duke of Angoulême, he desired to speake with him, whom hee made acquainted with the desire they had to submit themselves, whereof he aduertised the Constable. Many held this report incredible, that a place of that situation, fortified, in perfection, and full of men and munition, hauing performed an action of vnexpected resistance, should on the twelfth day of the siege beginne to yeeld. Yet for that the Counterscarpe was now ready to be opened on the fourth of August, hoping for no reliefe but from the Kings clemency; they deputed the first Confull, and some of the inhabitants, with a Minister, to cast themselves at his Maiesties feet, and to craue pardon. They were presented at Tonneins by the Constable: Being before the King vpon their knees, the Minister spake after this manner : Sir, the rebels of a Towne full of rebellion, who haue suffered themselves to be caried away with a furious torrent of renolt, vpon pretext of Religion and oppression of consciences, cast our selues at your Maiesties feet, to offer our liues, liberty, and goods, to the discretion of your Maiesties iustice or mercie : We haue begunne to make triall of some parts of the first, yet much lesse then our crime deserved : neither can we hope any thing of the other, except your Maiesty will as warily pardon the title of mercifull, as you doe hold that of iust : If we may be so happy, we will say con-

A rary to the Children of Israel, who said, We haue seene God, and we shall dye : But we will leane in eternall memory to our posterity, That wee haue seene the King, from whose bounty wee haue receiued life. If your Maiesty grant it, we shall acknowledge you for the Tulerary god of the world : We shall not open our mouthes, but to blesse your name and reigne : our hearts shall desire nothing more then the greatnesse of your Scepter. And as we haue bene the most rebellious, and least worthy of mercy, we will be hereafter the most faithfull and obedient of all your subiects.

The King made them this Answer : You haue done well to submit your selues wholly to my mercy, shew your duties to morrow, and I will make you taste of my bounty. My Constable shall acquaint you with my further pleasure. Whereupon they retired to Clerac, to giue order for the dislodging of their Souldiers.

The Kings pleasure was, that they should yeeld at discretion, vpon assurance of his mercy, and that they to whom his Maiestie gaue life, should depart with white wands and some baggage, the inhabitants paying 50000 crownes to redeeme themselves from spoile : moreouer, 10000 which were giuen to the Master of the artillery, for the rights due to his charge ; and 10000 more vnto him that had caused the Capitulation to be signed ; and the Towne to remaine at the Kings pleasure. The Capitulation being concluded & diuulged, the battery ceased, and the souldiers prepared presently to scale the bulwarke, desiring nothing but pillage. The Marshall D'Esdaigniers entered early on the fifth of August to draw forth the Souldiers, and to bring in some of the Kings Guards. The Constable came soon after, to whom the Confuls presented the keys of the Towne : and S. Torse who commanded the souldiers, deliuered vp his sword ; and all together besought him to acquaint them with the Kings pleasure. He assured S. Torse of his life, and to the rest he said, The King hath giuen me charge, to command you to lye hereafter in the obedience to the which you are naturally bound, and neuer to engage your selues in the resolutions of these vnlawfull Assemblies, to the which you haue indiscreetly tyed your selues. If you fall into a relapse, assure your selues, he will make you generally feele the effects of his indignation. He is now satisfied with the punishment of some few which are most culpable, to be a terror to many, and an example to all such as shall rune headlong vnto the disloyalty of these seditious reuolts : and as for the rest of the inhabitants, he gaue them their liberties, liues and goods.

At the departure of the Souldiers, there happened a great disaster : the foore companies of the Kings Armie, had promised vnto themselves to force Clerac, and to reuenge the death of the Marquis of Termes, and of many other braue men slain at the approaches. The Constable had provided for all disorders within the Towne ; They had resolved to passe then ouer the riuer of Lot, to auoyd the fury of the Kings Armie : They which embarked first, entered confusedly and in great numbers, the Souldiers of the guards, seeing some with their Muskets and Swords contrary to the accord, fell vpon them to take them away : This first violence amazed such as were disarmed, who fearing their liues caused the Boate to leane on the one side, so as many fell into the Riuer, and were drowned. Others being ready to embarke, and not knowing the cause of this combustion,

E thinking themselves to be in danger of death, cast themselves into the riuer which is swift and deepe in that place. The third Boate being ouer-laden, was ouerturned and most of them drowned : others seeking to saue their liues by the current of the streame vpon a causey of stone which ranne crosse the Riuer, were soone swallowed vp in those gulphes. Moreouer, there was a rope fashioned to either banke for the passage of the Boates, at the which there were some 30 Souldiers hung, but the Kings men cutting the rope they were caried away with the violence of the streame. The King was much displeased at this infolency and commanded iustice should be done.

Clerac being reduced to the Kings obedience, they made choice of foure or five of the most mutinious to suffer for the rest, which were one of the Confuls, a Proctor, and his some who was a Minister a Physitian and a Shoemaker a very turbulent man. They were condemned by the Grand Prouost to be hanged, and were executed ; but the Physitian being ready to die, had his pardon brought him, by the intercession of the Kings Physitian.

Hauing giuen order for the razing of the fortifications of Clerac, the king went towards Agen, but before his departure the Duke of Mayenne was come vnto him, who had charge to free all those little Townes reuolted beyond the Riuer of Garonne, and then to passe at Thouloze and ioyne with his Maiesty at Montauban : Being at Agen, the Townes of Leirac, Leyroure, and Tournon, brought their keys vnto the King : the like did the Townes of

The Duke having past the Garonne, went to assault the Tower of Barira, into the which they of Montauban had put 200 men, who yielded vpon composition: The Duke deliuered it vnto the owner vpon condition that he should maintaine 50 Souldiers for the defence thereof, but they of Montauban recovered it sooner after, and slew all which made resistance. The Duke went and besieged Albiac, where they refused to lodge him, and put themselves in Armes: so as in three dayes siege the Duke lost about 200 men: but in the end having forced them with the Cannon, to yeeld to his mercy, he caused the Captaine, the Consuls, and 20 of the chiefe Burgeesses to be hanged: the rest were put to ranfome, and those which could not pay, were bound, B and sent afterwards to serue as Pioners at the siege of Montauban: They write that the cause wherefore the Duke vsed so much rigor at Albiac, was for that (besides the violent vsage of the Kings Souldiers by them of Montauban, when they fell into their hands) Monfi: de Vignolles Marshall of the Campe had been fore hurt at this siege. Those of the Religion of Realleuill with in one League of Albiac, which had likewise prepared to endure a siege, seeing this hard vsage, abandoned their Towne. The Inhabitants of Caussade vpon their suite, were received to obedience. The like did Bourniquet, Negrepellisse, and Bitule. Saint Anthoine a little strong Towne in Rouergne, sent their keyes by one of their Consuls, with protestation to maintaine themselves in the Kings obedience, C but marching thither, and being within one Gascoigne league, hee receiued intelligence that they were revolted, they sending him word that their Consull had betrayed them in his Commission. The Duke preparing to besiege it, hee had commandment from the King to come with his troopes of Montauban.

On the fourth of August, there was a Hollanders ship taken at Cet in Languedoc on this manner. About midnight, this Shippe came to an Ancre, within musket shot of the shore, the Captaine, with three souldiers, and an Interpreter landed. They found a fisherman of whom they demanded in what country they were: yea before he would answer, asked them if they were of the Religion: and they answering yea, he said also he was one. The Captaine hearing this, discovered his voyage vnto him: he presently conducted him into the Citadell of Cet, making him beleue the Gouvernor was cousin to Monfi: de Chastillon, who receiued him very courteously. Having enquired the Captaines name, he sent Grassy the Fisherman to the Souldiers aboard, to come to land by commandement from their Captaine. The Gouvernor having entertained them, he presently sent twelue of his souldiers to seize vpon the ship, who being Masters thereof, they discharged all the Ordnance of the ship and Citadell for ioy. The next day morning the Duke of Montmorency came from Pezenas, and visited the ship: where they write, he found six double Cannons, and eight Field-peeces, besides eight other which belonged to the ship; 4000 Muskets, 4000 Carabins, 2500 Pistols, 2500 Pikes, 500 Curasses, 500 Souldiers coates, 200 Quintals of powder, a great number of bullets for Ordnance, and great store of Lead for small-shot, with a number of planks for the seruice of the warre, which wood was valued at 4000 Crownes. This ship was giuen to Espinault Gouvernor of Cet, and the Fisherman had 200 Pistols: the armes were carryed to Pezenas and Agde. They write that the whole freight of this ship was valued at 200000 Crownes, and that it did belong to the Churches of the Circle of base Languedoc.

The King had made the Duke of Elpernon General of his Army in Xaintonge and Aulnis, who approached neere vnto Rochel, with 4000 Foot, and eight Corners of Horse, where there were many skirmishes, encounters, and exploits of armes, which were too tedious to relate in particular. In one of them the Seigneur of La Noue, being of the Rochellers party was taken: He had obtained a pass-port from the Duke of Elpernon to see a sister of his who lay sicke, vpon condition that he should come vnto him: he came, F and the Duke coniuied him to retorne vnto the Kings seruice, laying before him the honor which his Father and Grandfather had purchased by seruing their Kings well: but he prevailed nothing: having seene his sister, he returned to Rochel, where hee resolved to lay an ambuscado in a wood, to surprize some of the Kings men which went daily to the gates of Rochel. But he continued so long in his ambuscado, with 20 curasses without any discovery, as they were forced to send to the next village for meat: the post which brought it, observed the place and the number, and acquainted the Duke of Elpernon therewith,

A therewith, who presently sent 60 men of Armes, who seized vpon all the approaches of the Ambuscado. La Noue was on the top of a Tree with a periscope-glasse, to see if he could discouer any one in field; but he was so suddenly surprized, as he had no leysure to get to Horse-backe, but was forced to yeeld to the Baron of Nicuil, hauing 7 of his men slaine, and 8 taken prisoners. Being brought to the Duke of Elpernon, hee receiued him courteously, telling him he was to blame he had not beleued him, when hee entreated him to leaue Rochel and acknowledge the King, yet he was glad to see him in good estate and not hurt, and that hee would aduertise his Maiesty. The Duke, did only blocke vpon Rochel by land, so as they could haue no commerce with their Neighbours; He gathers B vp their rents from their Farmers, neither could they receiue, either Corne, wine, or any other commodities by land, so as their only helpe was by Sea.

There was diuision among the Protestants in the Circle of base Languedoc, Genaudan, Viuarce, and the Sauennes, of the which Monfi: de Chastillon, had been made Prouinciall General by the assembly of Rochel: some of the milder spirits, desired to yeeld obedience to the King, and to enjoy the liberty of their consciences according to his Edicts: but such as were zealous for the assembly of Rochel prevailed, which bred much alteration in those parts. They grew ialous of Monfi: de Chastillon. They call an assembly at Nismes, where they frame many complaints against him: That hee contemned the Generall assembly, and would not appeare the Vnion: That hee had intelligence with the enemies of their partie: That hee discountenanced all such as were affected to the Churches: That hee had hindered the succors of Saint Iohn D'Angely, whereby had followed the losse of Guienne: That he would not doe anything against the Kings will and pleasure: That hee had sought to diuide the Prouinces from the generall Assembly, and had giuen support to all such as would forsake it, with many such like. Whereupon the Assembly, as well by the consent of the generall Assembly, as that of these Prouinces, and the generall desire of the Churches, being forced by the necessity of affaires, wherein all delays (they said) would be prejudiciall: They declared Monfi: de Chastillon, fallen from all Charges and Dignities which hee had held in the name of the Church, and particularly from the place of General of the Prouinces of base Languedoc, the Sauennes, Genaudan D and Viuarce, as also of the Governments of Montpellier and Aiguemortes; forbidding him expressly to exercise any faction of General or Gouvernor, in the same Generality or Governments, vpon paine to be declared an open enemy: And also, forbidding all men which made profession of the Religion, to acknowledge him for General, nor to receiue any order from him, or any other in his name, touching the warre or Treasure, without the expresse resolution of the Assembly.

There were many enterprises and surprises on either partie in base Languedoc and Viuarce, during the moneths of Iuly and August. Monfi: de Montmorency Gouvernor for the King in Languedoc, had receiued commandment to spoile the Haruest & Vintage about Nismes and Montpellier. M. de Chastillon had lodged his troopes neere to Montpellier to E prevent it. And they of Nismes entertained some troops to that end about their Towne. The Duke of Montmorency vnderstanding that they of Nismes had lodged 400 men in Marguerite, a great village entrenched, a league from their Towne; hee resolves to defeat them, and lodge in that place, to annoy them of Nismes during the haruest. Hee had drawne together 300 horse and 3500 foot, with which hee marched by night toward Marguerite, and in the morning gaue a furious charge, and forced them to retire notwithstanding all their resistance: in which retreat very many were slaine, so as in the end such as were fled into a Tower and the Church, demanded composition for their liues and armes, the which was granted, they being in all not about fourecore men. There came out of Nismes 1500 foot and 500 horse; but they found it difficult to relieue them with any F safety, seeing the Dukes army in front of them with two peeces of Ordnance, which made them retire.

In April this yeare, the Pope had granted a generall Indulge, to pray vnto God to protect and defend his Church, and to roote out all heresies. Hee gloried to see his eldest sonne of the Church triumph over his enemies, sending him a Letter, which was presented vnto him at the siege of Clerac: whereby hee encouraged the King to continue his victorious armes against heretikes, as he termed them.

parts, fought meanes to diuert them, by stirring vp some combustions in Normandie, which is in the other extremity of the Realme; presuming that there were many of the reformed Religion in the chiefe Townes of that Prouince, which would be ready to take Armes vpon any good occasion, if they might haue a leader. The Assembly made choice of Vatville called Mont-Christien (who had been in Gergeau and Sancerre when they were taken) knowing him to be a man of action, fit for troubles, mutinous and factious, whom they appointed to go and leaue men in Normandie, and to draw them of the Religion vnto Armes. He came to Rochel in Iuly, where he stayed 15 dayes to confer with the Assembly; And as he was a good speaker, so he promised them Mountaines: They deliuered vnto him many commissions with mony & bills of exchange, to leaue regiments of foot and some Companies of horse in Mayen, and the neighbour Prouinces: which Commissions were of this Tenour. That the Churches being persecuted by the enemies of their Religion which abused the Kings affection and conscience, (vnder whose humble subiection and obedience, they protested before God and men to continue inuolubly, acknowledging that he was giuen them of God, to be their Soueraigne Lord.) It was necessary to vie a iust defence, and to oppose lawfull and naturall meanes to violence and oppression, to maintaine his Maiesties authoritie, and Edicts, the liberty of Conscience, and safety of their liues. To which end they gaue out their commissions to whom they pleased, by vertue of the authoritie giuen them by all the Churches of France, and Soueraginitie of Bearne.

Vatville being come from Rochel, before he deliuered his Commissions he visits many Gentlemen of Mayen and Normandie, aswell of the reformed Religion as others of their faction: Hee imparts his designe to none but such as hee knew well affected to the partie; and in the end being assured of diuers Capitaines, he deliueres them Commissions and Money, to leaue men speedily, and to be ready to goe to field vpon the first command they shall receiue from the Assembly at Rochel, which hee thought would be in the beginning of October. In the meane time Vatville being assisted by 10 or 12 of his most confident Capitaines, did often visit them of the partie in base Normandie, and giues them a Rendezuous on the 11 of October, neere the Forest of Andaine by Alençon, where hee had already some numbers assembled, who began to spoyle the neighbouring Townes and Villages, and had already attempted to surpris the strong houses and the Castle of Carrouge. The Duke of Longueuille Governor of the Prouince, and Monsieur de Matignon Lieutenant general, aduertised of Vatvilles designs, came to Alençon & Donfront, in the beginning of October. Vatville continues his practices, and assures them of the partie, that there would be 5 or 6000 men at the Rendezuous. On the 7 of October, hee came to a Borrough called Touraills 5 leagues from Falaize, and as much from Donfront, accompanied onely with 6 of his Capitaines, and the groom of his chamber: They came into an Inne and called speedily for their Supper, seeming by their talke that they meant not to stay long. The Host had an opinion that this was Vatville of whom there was so much spoken, and held it fit to giue notice to this was Vatville of whom there was so much spoken, and held it fit to giue notice to the Seigneur of Touraills, a Gentleman whom he knew to be well affected to the Kings seruice.

He ranne vp to the Castle (a quarter of a league from the Borrough) and told his Lord what guests were at his house, and that he supposed them to be Vatville and his Capitaines. The Gentleman resolved instantly to serue the King in this occasion, or to lose his life. He sent presently to two Gentlemen his neighbours, intreats them to come vnto him on an occasion whereon the Kings seruice depended and the safety of the Countrey; but whilst they prepared their Armes to goe, a Souldier by mischance shot off a peece in the court of the Castle, which made them feare that this noise would make Vatville dislodge, wherefore hee advanced speedily with such men as he had, to inuest the Inne: but coming forth hee met with two Gentlemen, and 3 or 4 Souldiers which came to assist him, being in all 20 persons: Coming to the Inne, they saw by the Candle in Vatvilles lodging that they were about to dislodge: And for that no man knew them well, he sent to command them in the Kings name to tell their names, and lay downe their armes. Vatville called himself Champeaux: but hearing a noise about the Houle and in the hall, they came downe well armed, and at the staires foot slew 2 Gentlemen and one Souldier, and hurt some others. Touraills and his company charged Vatville, who was slaine vpon the place, his groom was wounded and taken, the other 7 being fore hurt, escaped by the darknesse of the Night, passing on foot

A foot through the riuier neere vnto the Inne. The next day morning they were met by the Countrey-people, much troubled with their wounds, whereof some dyed; and the rest retired to some places of strength. Touraills took their horses and baggage, and causing the dead body, with the prisoner, to be caryed to his Castle, giues the armes, horses and baggage to the Gentlemen and Souldiers which had assisted him: examines the Groom, who confessed that it was Vatville his master whom they had slaine, and discouers many things importing the King seruice. Early in the morning, Touraills aduertised M. de Matignon, the D. of Longueuille, and the Parliamēt of Rouen of this accident; sending also a Gentleman poste to the King lying before Montauban. They proceeded criminally against his body at Donfront, whither it was sent, where they condemned it to be broken, burnt, and the ashes cast into the winde. His seruant confessed, that some of his masters Commissions which were not yet distributed, remained with one Ventez a cousin of Vatvilles, where they found 48 Commissions hidden in a chest. This seruice done by Touraills was much commended, and the death of the two Gentlemen which were slaine greatly lamented. These newes were very pleasing to the King, who wrote vnto Touraills, thanking him for the good seruice he had done him, and assured him hee should finde the effects of his loue and bounty when occasion should be offered.

The King comes to Agen the tenth of August: He meditates on nothing but the siege of Montauban, which was the chiefe bulwarke and refuge for the Protestants in high Guienne and Languedoc. This was an enterprise of great importance: for if hee takes this Towne, all the rest will easily yeeld themselves vnder the yoke of obedience; if hee faile, the honor of his former victories will be blemished. He propounds it to his Councell of warre; in the which there were diuersities of opinions. They which were against the present siege objected foure Reasons. First, the neernes of Autumne, the father of diseases, which would be the death of the souldiers, who eating new fruits and grapes, would be instantly afflicted with contagious diseases, burning agues, purples, and bloody fluxes. The second was the ordinary ouer-flowing of the riuier of Tarn, in September, by reason of the raine which the Southerly windes engender at that time in those Countreys; and in March by the melting of the snow from the mountaines: which raine ceasing, and the riuier being retired within its channell, leaues the Countrey about Montauban (being a fat rich ground) so bad, myrie, and slippery, that they should not be able to retire for the space of three weekes. Thirdly, the fortifications of the place, being the refuge of all the reuolted and resolute men of their party, with the obstinacie of the inhabitants. And fourthly, the Duke of Rohan who was at Millaud, where hee assembled the succors of the neighbour-Prouinces, being most of the Religion: being more necessary to goe and defeat him, and to cleanse the Countreys of Albigeois and Rouergue. Finally, that it was convenient to delay the siege of Montauban vntill April following: and in the meane time to leaue strong garisons in the neighbour-Townes, to hinder their trafficke, and cut off their victuals.

E They which held the contrary opinion, said, That the ouer-flowing of Tarn hapned but in the end of October: and that in two monthes and a halfe they might easily take Montauban, if it were not releued with men and victuals. That the insolent humor of the inhabitants of Montauban would neuer agree with the Souldiers. That against the pretended succors of the Duke of Rohan, his Maiestie might send his Light-horse into Albigeois, to fight with them vpon all occasions, being well aduertised that his chiefe Forces consisted onely in Foot, and that his Cheualery was doing worth. That it would blemish the reputation of his Maiesties armes, to passe towards Albigeois and Rouergue, and leaue such a Towne as Montauban at his backe, the which would presently reuiue a rebellion in all the Townes reduced vpon the riuier of Garonne, in Quercy, and Perigord. F whilst the Kings army should be fighting for the passages of the mountaines, where 100 men may oppose themselves to an army; and where it is not good to bee but when the weather is dusty and dry, and not during the stormes of snow which reigne there. That the discommoditie of Autumne and of new fruits, might be found as well in Albigeois & Rouergue as in Quercy. That the suit of the Thoulouzains to his Maiestie, to take this thorne out of their feet, and what they offered towards the charges of the siege, should be preferred before the proposition of eight monthes time, for the delaying of the siege, during which there was no doubt but they of Montauban would recouer meanes to make 1621 new broyles. Moreouer, the preparation of so many cannons and munition ready; the courage of so many souldiers, and the iustice of his Maiesties armes, were powerfull reasons to conclude the siege of Montauban as speedily as might be, to free the reult in so many prouinces without hope of reuiling.

The powder in the Kings quarter set on fire.

These opinions being weighed and considered, the Siege of Montauban was resolved, and it was concluded that the Duke of Angoulême should goe with the Light-horse into Albigeois and Rouergue, to crosse the Duke of Rohans designs. The King came to Moissac, and from thence to his quarter in the Castle of Picquecot, a little league from Montauban, on the 17 of August. The Duke of Mayen, and the Marshall of Thémies came vnto him with their Forces, and were commanded to inuest Montauban, towards Villebourbon. This towne is situated vpon the declining of a hill, which discouers the Country round about. At the foot of this hill there is a long bridge, but narrow, which passeth ouer the riuer of Tarn, the which commeth not vnto the walls, but when it ouerfloweth so as they may goe on dry-foot round about the Towne, the which is well fortified with bastions, raucins, bulwarkes, halfe-moones, and all other fortifications, being also well furnished with artillery, men, and munition; so as they did hope to make a long defence. It was inuested on the 13 of August on three sides: vpon the East was the Constables quarter; where commanded the Prince Joinville, the Earle of Bossompierre, and the Marshalls of Prallin and Chaunc, with the regiments of Elstiac, Champagne, and Normandy. On the South was the Duke of Mayenne, with the Marshall of Thémies. On the West lay the Duke of Desdiguier, with the Marshall of S. Geran, with the Regiment of the Guards, and three others: And the Kings quarter was at Picquecot, as you haue heard.

In the beginning of the Siege the Duke of Sully who had some yeares before retired himselfe into Quercy and Languedoc, came vnto the King, beseeching him to giue peace vnto his people, hoping hee should preuaile so much with them of Montauban, as they should craue pardon. The King promised to pardon their offence, if they would submit themselves vnder his obedience: being content that the Duke should enter into Montauban, seeing he said he had no other desire but to perswade them to obedience. Being entered, he found that the Earle of Bolfrand a Biemois (otherwise called Captain Mazetis) commanded the souldiers: The reputation which he had gotten in the warres of Sauoy, where his Highnes had giuen him for his notable seruice, the little Earldome of Bolfrand, had made the people to chuse him for their Commander: yet some say Monf. de la Force, had the charge. For the government of affaires, there was a Councell chosen, consisting of the Minister Chamier, the Consuls, and sixe others of the most zealous of the party.

The Duke of Sully finding that Monf. de la Force and the other Gentlemen of the party, which had put themselves into Montauban, had no authoritie, and that all was gouerned by this Councell of the Towne: He laid before them the importance of their resistance, and told them freely, that they would make themselves odious vnto all the world by their proceeding. He propounded the meanes vnto them to obtaine their pardon in particular, and the reason they had to procure it. Hee shewed them that for the combustions which were in all Europe, there was no meanes for them to hope for any succours from strangers: And that Kings and Princes embraced not their protection, in whose ruine they had no interest. To whom the first Consull (hauing taken aduice of the Councell) made this answer, That they had resolved to liue and die in the vnion of the Churches, according to their oath, and therefore they neither could nor would doe any thing in particular, but treat for the general of the cause, and the approbation of the Duke of Rohan, Generall of the Prouince. The Duke of Sully returning with this answer, his Maiesty and Councell saw they would treat as companions in authority, and not as subiects: so as this negociation proued fruitlesse.

On the first of September, they beganne to play against the Towne with 45 peeces of Ordnance: There were three batteries against the old Towne, two against the new, and two others against Villebourbon. Yet they had Saint Anthonies gate fill open: where-by the besieged might goe in and out at their pleasure, and send their spies out daily to see what was done in the Kings Camp, by whom the powder (as they suppose) was set on fire, the second of the month, in two of the quarters: The first was about ten of the clocke in the morning in the Kings quarter at the chiefe battery neere vnto the Kings guards,

A guards, the which was so violent, as it ouerthrew the Gabions which couered the Cannon; burnt most of the Gunners and Officers of the Artillerie: amongst the which was La Vallée a famous Canoniere.

Another fire in the Duke of Mayens quarter.

The like accident hapned the same day in the afternoone at one of the Duke of Mayennes batteries, which not onely burnt the Officers of the Ordnance; but also the Marquis of Villars, brother by the mothers side to the Duke of Mayenne, and Marshall of the Campe, and the eldest sonne of the Earle of Ruberac, with two Capuchins which preached in the armie. The next day the Duke resolved to assault the halfe Moone at Ville-Bourbon, where many Noblemen and Gentlemen voluntaries went courageously to assault the place, but they were repulled with such resolution, as they lost two and thirtie men of note, and forty souldiers.

This was the first disgrace receiued before Montauban, the which was the same night somewhat moderated by the newes which the King receiued, that the Duke of Angoulême had defeated the Marquis of Maloze, hauing three thousand foot and foure hundred and fifty horse at Fauch, where they had foure hundred men slaine vpon the place, and two hundred wounded, amongst the which were about forty Gentlemen, or Captaines, with about an hundred prisoners.

The Marquis of Maloze defeated.

On the Dukes side were slaine three Commanders, with twenty light-horsemen, and fiftene, or sixtene hurt: about thirtie or forty footmen slaine. After which defeat, there was an accord made by the Duke with the Marquis of Maloze, That he, the Seigneur of Cauffe, the Baron of Senegas, with the Colonels, Captaines, Commanders, and Souldiers, should promise vpon oath, not to carry Armes, during the space of sixe moneths vpon any pretext whatsoever, but for the Kings seruice. In regard whereof, they should vnder the Kings good pleasure, haue a general pardon to enioy the benefit of the Edicts, as well for the libertie of their consciences, as for their liues and goods. That they should depart out of the Fort of Fauch, with their liues, armes and baggage, and retire whither they pleased, with a safe conduct if they desired it.

But let vs returne to the siege of Montauban. The batteries at Ville-Bourbon, continued the third and fourth of September, vntill foure of the clocke in the afternoone.

D The Duke of Mayenne, being desirous to lodge in the halfe Moone, gaue a second assault in this order. The Marquis of Thémies conducted thirty Muskettiers, and a dozen Souldiers with Ladders, in the head of forty men at armes, hauing on either hand certaine voluntaries supported by the Regiment of Faucon, and seconded by that of Soze: passing out of their trenches, the Marquis had a Musket shot in the head, and was slaine, the which so amazed the Muskettiers which followed as they stood still.

The second assault of the halfe Moone.

The Marquis of Thémies slaine.

E Then the men at Armes, led by the Seigneurs of Sajanne, Monban, and Angy, passed on to the point, hauing the voluntaries on either side, and were the first which cast themselves into the ditch, which was sixe foot deepe. The besieged had a casemate which did much annoy them, yet they forced them to abandon it.

E The Ladders which they should haue planted to the bastion, right against the halfe Moone, were foure foot too short, which was the losse of many. The voluntaries & men at armes which assaulted the halfe Moone, finding the earth much beaten downe with the Cannon, and easie to mount vpon, tooke the halfe Moone, notwithstanding all their shot, and without doubt had caried Ville-Bourbon, if the footmen had charged. But they grew so amazed seeing many retorne wounded, and beleeving that all had bene lost, as they stood still, leauing those Gentlemen to the slaughter; neither was it possible for their Campe-masters to make them aduance.

The halfe Moone taken.

During this little stay, the besieged resumed new courage, and the voluntaries and men at Armes seeing no man to second them, and a cloud of a thousand men comming, and passing the bridge to cry kill, kill, they were forced to retire, and leaue the place, which they had so happily gotten and defended for the space of two houres. The slaughter increased by this disorder and retreat, where there were slaine forty Gentlemen vpon the Halfe Moone and in the Ditches, so hurt, with a great number of souldiers, whereof many died since. In this assault, the Earle of Boulfrand Commander within Montauban, with many others were slaine.

Retoured againe by the besieged.

Some write that the Duke of Mayen grew so melancholy for the losse of his brother the Marquis of Villars, and so many of the Nobilitie slaine at two assaults, as hee wished himselfe himselfe dayly dead. Being blamed by his familiar friends, he answered, it was not fit for him to liue any longer after the losse of so many friends. That hee was ioy he had not followed the aduice which had been giuen him, to approach by trenches without the hazard of so many braue men.

The batteries continued furiously, to open a greater passage, and to renew the assault. At the Kings quarter, they advanced their trenches vnto the Ditch, and the Duke D'Espaignes did the like to come to the Sap and Mine. The Duke de Mayenne, had caused Gabions to be brought to the Counterscarpe of the halfe Moone, which being discouered by their Centinels, the besieged sallied forth, and with hookes pulled them downe, with three fouldiers which were surpris'd amongst them.

The Duke of Mayen, hauing with infinit toyle aduanced his trenches vnto the edge of the Ditch, and planted his Gabions, on the seventeenth of September: the D. of Guise (newly come from Prouence to the Armie,) and the Earle of Schomberg comming to see him in his Tent, he told them that he would shew them his vvalkes, bringing them to the end of his trenches and Gabions, where he meant to plant a new battery within Musket shot of the besieged; where being discouered by the enemy, they made certaine Musket shot at them without any harme, onely the Earle of Schombergs hat was shot off. The Duke of Mayenne looking backe to see whence it came, was shot into the left eye with a musket bullet and flaine vpon the place, which presently put all the quarter into armes. At the brute hereof the fouldiers had no courage to take their Armes; the Commanders and Captaines wept: But the sorrow was farre greater in the Kings quarter. His Maiesty who had a great interest in the losse of this generous Prince, wept bitterly, and could hardly resolute for the space of eight dayes; nor be diuerted from his melancholy. All France shewed great feelings of griefe for his death: but especially the Citie of Paris, which vpon the newes of fo great an accident, went about to thrust a sword into her owne bosome, and consume her selfe in a cruell sedition, if by the wisdom of her Governours, and Magistrates, this fire had not beene quenched in the beginning. The Duke of Guise after his cousins death, returned into Prouence, to prepare a Fleet against Rochel. His Maiesty tooke time to dispose of his Governments. The Prince of Ioinville was made great Chamberlaine of France in recompence of his vertue, and to binde him more strictly to serue the King faithfully, making promise to all the Dukes officers and household seruants, to recompence them for their wages and services. The generall sorrow for his death, throughout the Campe, did somewhat coole the heate of their assaults, and batteries, for the space of ten or twelue dayes.

The newes of the Dukes death, being brought to Paris on the one and twentieth of September, his friends lamented it, but the raskall multitude spake boldly, saying, that they endured too much, and that they must kill all the Huguenots who had slaine their Catholique Princes and Noblemen; and that if they presumed on Sunday next to goe to Charenton to the exercise of their Religion, they should not returne home. The wiser sort of the Burgeses hearing these bold speeches, chid these raskals and scumme of the people, as seditious and greedy of alteration; there being also in Paris at this present a great number of murdering theues, and other needy Rogues, ready to take what was not their owne. This speech continued vntill Saturday following. Those of the Religion in the Towne, were not a little astonish'd. And this murmure spread abroad, so amazed them, that the most part of them left their houses, and abandoned Paris.

The Duke of Montbazon Governour of the Towne, foreseeing this sedition, desiring to assure them of the Religion, against these popular threats, and to prevent the mischief, sent for the ancients of the Church, to know their resolution, and whether they would goe on the morrow the sixe and twentieth of September vnto Charenton: but they being affrighted with these former rumors, said that they were determined not to goe.

Hereupon the councill was held at the Chancelors house, where it was at first concluded they should not goe; but because it was a matter of importance, and where in the King and his Edicts were interested, it was at length resolved, that notwithstanding all these rumours, they should continue their exercise, and in case they would, they should be assisted as well as possibly they might. The Duke of Montbazon gaue aduertisement hereof to the Ciuill and Criminall Lieutenants, and the two Prouosts, to attend vpon the way to Charenton; who sent their Commiffaries, and Sergeants, and

A and a good number of the Officers of Iustice armed vnto the gates and streets of Paris, to drue away the people which flocked together; some to see what would be done, others, to put themselves into action. All along the way to Charenton, the Prouosts with their Archers, continued all day vntill the euening. And the Duke himselfe assisted with a great number of Gentlemen besides his guards, went early in the morning that way, attending the hour of their returne, desiring it might be without any combustion, which could not be. For presently after noone, an infinit number of the base multitude ranne to S. Anthons gate to attend their returne, and a great number went out as farre of the valley of Fescamp vpon the way to Charenton. The guards seeing such

B a number of people inclined to doe mischief, were much troubled to prevent the disorder. The Duke sends his guards to ioyne with them: The Knight of the Watch did what he could with his Archers, and closed the wayes, making those Rascals to runne through the Vines. In the meane time the Prouosts with their people, and the Dukes Carabins conduct them of the Religion, being all together in one body in the midst of them.

Being thus disposed, they began to march towards Paris: but notwithstanding all this good order, this insolent scumme, beganne to assault them of the Religion: first with inuiolous words, and then with blowes, who defended themselves, hauing swords and daggers; so as they flew three, and four of theirs were beaten downe with stones. The slaughter had beene greater, if the guards had not stayed the peoples fury, which continued

C even in the Citie, notwithstanding the Gouernours presence and his guard. The sedition was great at Saint Anthons gate: and comming into the great street, a poore Gentlewoman with some others which had not put themselves with troope amongst the guards, was stayed at the gates by a troope of rascals, who would force her to salute our Ladies Image ouer the Port, who speaking some words against the worshipping of that Image, was presently murdered. A poore Priest passing through the street, was runne after by a number of these people, who would haue slaine him, taking him for a Minister, if by the care of the Gouernours folke, he had not beene speedily shut into the Arsenall.

D This tumult increased still, so as the Prouost of Merchants was forced to cause the Burgeses to arme, to draw the chaines, and to keepe good watch. They which dwelt most remote from Saint Anthons street, hearing a cry that they did massacre the Huguenots at Saint Anthons gate, lest the Churches being euensong time, and ranne to their houses to take their Armes, thinking there was some great sedition in the Citie.

This popular fury steyed not thus, but extended it selfe vnto Charenton. For as soone as the guards were parted to conduct them of the Religion to the Citie, a troope of idle vagabonds fall vpon their Temple, breake open the Court, spoile the Stationers shops, and burne the Temple, and so passe the river to enter into Paris by the Vniuersity, being in number about foure hundred, hauing made them an ensigne of a sheete. A furious

E sedition which troubled all the Magistrates, and put the whole Citie in alarme. The night following, they of the Religion were so terrified, as no man durst assure himselfe in his owne house, but went and lodged with their Catholike friends. And they which during the tumult stayed abroad, durst not returne into the Citie, but very late, and by other gates.

The next day the Duke of Montbazon with all the Magistrates, went vnto the Parliament, where a Decree was made, by the which the Court tooke them of the Religion into the Kings protection: Forbidding all men vpon paine of death to wrong them. The Magistrates were also enioyned to make enquire of the authors of this said sedition, and burning at Charenton.

F Whilst the Court laboured to suppress this disorder, the sedition renued againe in the suburbs of S. Marceau, where one of the Religion hauing slaine his owne sonne, and some others, was presently murdered by the people, and his house spoiled: but the Duke and the Prouost of Merchants comming, dispersed this multitude: yet after their departure they returned againe, and beganne to spoile two houses belonging to some of the Religion: but the Prouost and Lieutenant comming with their Archers, seized vpon foure laden with goods, which they would haue caried away. These they commit, and the next day they were punished by a Decree of the Court; that is to say, two were

The passage of Hicks into Montauban.

But now to returne to our siege of Montauban. Presently after the D. of Mayens death, there was a piece of service performed at that siege by a young man of our Nation, whose name deserves to be registred in this History, and left to posterity: which was, for the carrying of Letters into the towne besieged, from them of Rochell, and to assure them of their estate. I finde it not written in any of our yetters, being either ignorant of the fact, or careless to doe a stranger that honour: yet I will deliver it faithfully vnto the Reader, as I receiued it from his owne mouth. For the better vnderstanding whereof I must acquaint you with his life there. His name is Ellis Hicks, his father was a Scribeur dwelling within Ludgate, not long since deceased. He followed Monf: de Mont Pouillon, second sonne to Monfieur de la Force in France, during these last warres, being then not above twenty years old.

The Marquis of La Force his elder brother and his Lord being forced to leave Caumont by the Duke of Mayenne, they came to Clerac before the siege; where finding the inhabitants divided, the better sort desirous to obey the King, and the multitude resolute in their revolt, they left the towne, thinking to goe to Bergerac, but they had submitted themselves vnto the King: So as leaving Guienne, they came down towards Rochel with fifteen horse. Comming to the gates, they were shut against them, they calling the Marquis Traitor, and telling him that having betrayed Guienne, hee came now to betray them; yet by the means of Monfieur de Fauas, who commanded all the strangers which were in Rochel, they were let in, yet without any good liking of them of the towne, or with any assurance of their safeties. Montauban had beene besieged above a moneth, the assembly at Rochel was in suspense, having no communication with them being shut vp by land. They had sent many with Letters to informe them of their estate, but none returned, and were daily made beleue that Montauban was yielded vnto the King.

They were desirous to make a new tryall. Master Hicks (for his service well deserves that Title) offers his service to the Marquis. The Assembly hearing of it embrace it, although his young yeares could give them no great assurance of resolution. They furnish him with horse and money, and ship him to Mornac, after which, in eight dayes, travelling most by night with guides, he came to Moissac foure leagues from Montauban, where the Earle of Carleil, then extraordinary Ambassadour for his Maiestie was lodged, being the same night that Monfieur de Mayenne was slain.

There hee findes attending vpon my Lord Ambassadour, a familiar friend of his called Fairefax, who brings him to the armie, where they meet with one Webbe a follower of the Marshall of Saint Geran, who shewes him the campe, the trenches and the Mine by the Marshalls commandement, and lodgeth that night in his quarter.

The next day he resolves to put his designe in execution, hee had acquainted Fairefax therewith, who perswades him by all means to desist; but he told him that seeing hee had promised to doe it, he would die in the enterprife, or performe it. Hereupon hee dismissed Fairefax, and having made choice of a void place betwene the Kings quarter, and the Constables, where there was neither trench nor guard, but some straggling Centinels. He set spurs to his horse, and made towards the towne, there were some horsemen pursued him, and the Centinels shot at him, and the towne did the like: but comming neere to one of the bulwarkes, hee waied with his hat vnto them, which caused them to forbear, and to come downe to a Posterne to let him in.

Fairefax having beene seene in his company, was presently laid hold on, and carried to the Kings quarter; where being examined, hee confessed that hee had knowne Hicks long, but was not acquainted with his intent; and that for his owne part he was a Gentleman belonging to the Lord Ambassadour, and was come onely in curiositie to see the Campe, which being verified, he was sent home with good vñage.

Hicks being come into the towne, was conducted by the Consuls to Monfieur de la Force, who knew him well. He delivers his Letters, and acquaints them with the estate of Rochel, which gaue them great content. He informes them with the estate of the Kings

A Kings Army: that the Duke de Mayen was lately slain; that the Souldiers dyed daily of the purples and flux; and that if there should fall any store of raine they would not be able to lye there. He likewise told them there was a Myne ready to be blowne vp that night, and shewed them the place for the which they prepared. Having made a breach, they came to the assault, and were repulsed with the losse of six hundred men. He staid three weekes in the Towne, during the which there were diuers enterprises. His desire was to returne to Rochel, telling them that his worke was yet but halfe done. Hee would take no letters with him but onely a note from Monfieur de la Force, to witness that hee had bene there: onely they willed him to assure the Assembly, that they would neuer treat but for the general of all the Churches, and if hee would haue any letters, they would signe them with their bloods. Hee takes the opportunity of a dark night (after diuers former attempts) and gets out on foot with a guide, creeping vpon their knees, vntill they had past the Kings Centinels, and came that night to Negropelisse, where he lay hidden in an old ruinous house all the next day. The next night hee came to Saint Antonia, being seven good leagues from Montauban; where they began to wauer, and were ready to submit themselves: but hee having assured them of the estate of Montauban, they persisted. There they furnished him with a horse, from whence hee went to Castellana, and visited Monfieur de la Force Ladie: which done, after some daies trauell he got to Marans; and from thence by sea, being seven leagues, to Rochel, where he gaue an account of his employment, to their great contents.

On the foure and twentieth of October in the night, there happened a great fire vpon the Merchants Bridge at Paris, the which in three houres consumed both that and the Changers Bridge, so as the houses which were built vpon them fell into the riuer, to the vndoing of many men. They spake diuersly of the cause, some of the ignorant multitude would needs ascribe it to them of the religion; but it was more truly verified to be by the negligence of a maide in a Scribeurs house. The priuate losses vpon these two Bridges were very great, and many men vndone thereby: whereupon the Court of Parliament made a decree, whereby all Rogues and Vagabonds were banished the Citie. A general gathering was made throughout all the Parishes, for the reliefe of such as had beene ruined by the fire. The Prouost and Sheriffs were enioyned to free the course of the Riuer, and draw out the materials. Men were appointed to looke for the goods in the bottome thereof, and to cary them to the Towne-house, there to be inventoried. That the poore Merchants who had lost their estates, should not bee sued for their debts for the space of one whole yeare.

The Duke of Rohan having no means to relieue Montauban by force, the Marquis of Maloze being defeated by the Duke of Angoulesme, he sent Beaufort with twelve hundred men to succour the Towne; who got to Saint Antonin, where hee was pressed to hasten his succours, else Montauban would be lost: whereupon he resolved to march by the plaine, comming about midnight neere vnto the towne, where there was a strong Barricado, guarded by three hundred men. They write of these twelve hundred, a third part entred into the Towne, and that the rest were slain and taken prisoners, amongst the which were Beaufort that led them, and the Governor of Saint Antonin. But Master Hicks, who was then within the towne, reports confidently, that there entred seven hundred men well armed. The day after this exploit, the Kings army was fortified with 6 or 7000 men, brought by the D. of Memorency, the Marquis of Villeroy, and others.

On the eighth of October there was an interview betwix the Constable Luznes, and the Duke of Rohan, to aduise by what means they might conclude a peace, but there was great contrariety in their propositions. The Constable offered to treat particularly for the Duke of Rohan, and high Languedoc, and that Montauban should render to the Kings mercy. The D. of Rohan, as General of the Churches, desired to make a general treaty forall the Townes of their party; the repairing of the demolished Townes, and 100000 crownes to pay his troops; which was thought an vnreasonable demand: And so they departed, but ill satisfied one with another.

On the ninth day of October, the Prince of Toiuille gaue an assault vnto the great Bastion of the old Towne, that he might lodge therein; but hee was repulsed with some losse. And the next day, the Marshall of Themines, having blowne vp a myne in the halfe moone of the Bastion at Villeboubour, and lodged some souldiers thereupon: the night following, the besieged issued out, cut the throats of them all; put to flight the first, second and third guards of the Trenches, and came vnto the Marshalls Tent, filled a great part of their Trenches, burnt their Galleries, and the carriages of their Cannon; set fire on their powder, and carried away a Falcon.

Having held the trenches six houres, in the end they were driven out by Saint Croix, Barail, and Faucon, Camp-masters; whereof the last had his arme shot off, and died soone after. They write that in this fallie, there were twenty eight men of note or Officers slaine, with two hundred souldiers: and of the besieged but foure slaine, and two prisoners. This repulse did nothing daunt the Kings army, for on the fteenth of October they gaue a generall assault at the three Batteries; where they were repulsed, but with equall losses. There were two things afflicted the Kings Armie, sicknesse, and jealousyes: and there followed a third, which was the onely hope of the besieged, which was ruine, whereby the Riuier swelled.

At this time the King received an aduertisement that M. de Montbrun (who had bene made Lieutenant generall of Prouence, by the Assembly at Rochelly) had revolted in Mure in Dauphiné, and that his troops being three or foure thousand strong spoiled the champion Countrie: That he had great enterprises vpon Grenoble, and that the Earle of Suze was taken and brought thither. This Earle had his chiefe abode in Champagne; But seeing how the affaires of them of the Religion declined in many Provinces, he resolved to gaue make warre in Dauphiné, being followed by some Gentlemen. Passing by Griere, within a league of Grenoble, on the sixteenth of October to goe to Mure, the Countrey people growing jealous, demanded whither they went; the Earle answered they had nothing to doe; so as from words they fell to blowes, in which conflict there were three Pefants slaine, and six hurt, whereby the Earle had a free passage; after which they made what speed they could, yet knew not whither they went: in the end they came to a Village called S. Mary, where they intreated a Pefant to direct them their way, promising him foure pistols: the Pefant offered his seruice willingly; but hee willed his Boy to goe and aduertise the Commons, whilst he led them through the rocks of Marinette, where they were no sooner entred, but they were encountered by three or foure hundred Pefants, armed after their manner, who cried vnto them, S and deliuer your armes, else you are dead men. The Earle and his followers, seeing themselves in a place of such disadvantage, seeked to saue themselves; but the Earle of Suze, and some gentlemen to the number of twenty fife were taken and caried to Grenoble. The Pefants pursued the rest, and tooke foureene more, among the which there were found diuers letters to M. de Montbrun, with a plot of the Towne, and on which side they should assault it. The Pefants were rewarded with some money, and the horses and armes of them which were taken.

A second enterprise to seize vpon Grenoble

This first enterprise against Grenoble being discovered, they within the towne which had intelligence with Montbrun plotted a second, but the meanes to aduertise him was very difficult: they must of necessity passe by Port de Clay, two leagues from Grenoble, which was well guarded; Bouffier, an Advocate in Parliament tooke the charge vpon him, and drew the instructions of the enterprise, who hauing giuen them to his Clerk, to carie to Montbrun, and for the more safety he put him into a Wine-pipe, and laid it in a Cart, which passeth Clay without any discouery; hauing gone a quarter of a league further, the Carter beat out the head of the vessell, and the Clarke went his way towards Montbrun: he presently encounters with another Clarke his great companion and friend, who enquired of his journey, and he like a silly fellow discouered vnto him the enterprise, promising him mountaines if hee would make one. The other seemed to be glad, giues him great thanks, and promiseth to goe with him; entreating him to stay but halfe an houre vntill he had done some necessary businesse. In the meane time he runs speedily to Clay F to aduertise them which were in Guard, who post after and seize vpon the Clarke; they search him and finde his letters and instructions, and conduct him to Grenoble, where Bouffier his Master, and others were committed to prison: And thus the second enterprise was also discovered.

The enterprise of Grenoble discovered.

In the meane time Montbrun spoiled many Castles in the countrie of Diois, and the Mountaines of Dauphiné, threatening to come neere vnto Grenoble, which made the Parliament to giue order for the leauing of 6000 men for their defence. The Duke

d'Esclignieres

A d'Esclignieres being aduertised of these alterations, wrote this following letter; "M. de Montbrun, I haue bene aduertised that you haue armed in Dauphiné, and haue had some reproach, as if I were your Consort, the which hath much troubled me, both for that I desire there should not be any combustion in Dauphiné, or that they should feele the discomforts of warre; as also for the consequence of the fact. You know the King doth not take armes against the reformed religion, but doth onely pursue them which are revolted; else I would not assit nor giue my consent, being against my Conscience which I preferre aboue all things. It is most iust his Majesty should be master of his Townes, and that those which will not yeeld obedience willingly, he should force by his armes; otherwise he should be neither Master nor King, but euery one should make a party by himselfe: the which would proue to bee of a very dangerous consequence, by the which any soeigne enemy (how weake soeuer) surprising vs in the heat of our diuisions, would make him selfe Master of the whole Realme. You know that strangers haue alwaies sought to diuide vs; and when they haue seene vs banded one against another, they haue then fallen vpon France and troubled vs, whereas they could neuer annoy vs being at vnity. There is nothing which makes a kingdom more powerful then peace and concord: but when as discord begins to creepe in, and euery one drawes his owne way, and will not heare the voice of the master Pilot, it is an euident signe of Shipwrecke. I am not yet so ignorant in affaires of State, but I know how wee should carry our selues; and I cannot but tax our Ministers of great rashnesse in this conclusion which they haue taken in the assembly at Rochel, neither would I nor any good man giue his consent, being a meane to ruine the State. I haue bene aduertised of the disaster which is befallen the Earle of Suze, and am sorry for it, although I am ignorant of his intention, or whereunto it tended. I pray you consider what you doe, and that you attempt nothing by armes which may be prejudiciall to the Kings seruice. But contrariwise, if you discouer any mutines, employ your armes to suppress their infolency; or rather lay them quite downe to free the world from iealousie. I desire not that Dauphiné should bee oppressed, and you cannot entertaine your troops without discomfort to the people. For this cause I entreat you againe to disarme and to dismisse your forces: but, aboue all haue an especiall care not to attempt any thing against Grenoble, where they say you haue intelligences. I haue bene aduertised that there are certaine busie-headed people, who haue bene desirous to deliuer it vnto you, to the prejudice of the Kings seruice, and in fauour of Rebells, the which I abhorre. You know with what paines I haue preferred this Prouince, during the troubles; and now I desire it should not fall into the miseries wherunto others are subiect. Rebellion is a crime which cannot be exprest: and which drawes after it all kindes of calamities; the which I should bee loath to see in Dauphiné; and you cannot make your selfe Master of Grenoble but by apparant rebellion. And therefore I entreat you to leaue the affaires in the same estate they now are in, and that I may haue the contentment to heare you haue laid downe your armes, &c. From the Campe before Montauban the 13 of November 1621.

The Seigneur of Boisse Pardailan, being in the Kings armie before Montauban, an aduertisement came vnto his Maiesty, that there were two thousand of the Religion in armes which spoiled the Countrey lying vpon the Riuers of Garonne and Dardonne, hauing their retreats into Monheur and Saint Foy; and that his Sonne and Sonne-in-law were the Leaders, wherupon the King said vnto de Boisse; These are yours, goe speedily and take such order as shall bee fit. Vpon this commandment hee leaues Montauban and enters Monheur before they had any intelligence of his coming, which made such as were in armes to leape ouer the walls to auoid his indignation. Thinking to haue assured Monheur, he passeth the riuier of Garonne, and goes towards S. Foy, where hee had left F Theobon his Sonne-in-law, who was revolted. He passed by Genlac, where hee assembled the Consuls, and let them know the necessity of their obedience.

At night Monsieur de Boisse, being retired into an Advocates house called Nanze, after Supper Saignac of Eineffe, being followed by fortie Muskettiers, entered the lodging, finding Monsieur de Boisse in a Gallery, who without any amazement leapt to his armes and cried out, Ah Traitors, will you murder me thus wretchedly? These assassines cried vnto the Iudge of Genlac, and vnto Nanze to stand aside, and presently discharged fife and twenty Musket shot, and slew him with a Priest which was alwaies about him. After this detestable murder, they threatened the Inhabitants of Genfai to burne all about the towne if they opened not their gates: but it is easie to force them, which are willing to be forced: so as seeing M. de Boisse dead, they opened their gates, and they became Masters of that place, the which did much fortifie Saint Foy. The Marquis of Mirebeau, sonne to the deceased, commanding in Monheur, declared himselfe presently for the reuoluted: they which had slaine his Father were kindly entertained into Saint Foy, and Monheur, which towne did much hinder the commerce betwene Bourdeaux and Thoulouse, and was likely to bee a bridle to the Kings Armie.

Disorder in the Kings Camp.

At Montauban they continued their batteries, and the besieged were still resolute: knowing the difcommodities of the Kings campe, and assuring themselves, that the abundance of raine which fell, would force them to rise; for intruth, the Campe was full of sicknesse, as fevers, bloody fluxes, purples, and other contagious diseases, whereof many men of quality died daily, besides an infinite number of souldiers. The Duke of Memory (who had brought goodly troopes to the Kings army) fell dangerously sicke, so as the Physicians despaired of his health: His troopes being lodged in the Duke d'Esquigniers quarter, holding their Commander to be dead, three thousand went away in one night, whereby the quarter was left very bare, and those which remained were forced to be daily in guard, which caused great sicknesse in the regiment of the guards, and other troopes being ouer toyled. Many went away without leaue and could not be staied. The mortality was great throughout the whole Campe, and the infection of the ayre dangerous for such as continued at the siege. They within the towne were not freed from the said miseries; many souldiers and inhabitants died of the plague, and pouerty. These miseries which had wasted about a third part of the Kings army, greatly distasted the Commanders and Souldiers, with the tediousnesse of the siege, during the which they had gotten little ground on the enemy. In the meane time the bad season of the yeare pressed them, and the continuall raine so annoyed their troopes, as they knew Montauban would not be taken that yeare, and that they should be forced to yeeld vnto the time. At the quarter of Ville Bourbon, where the Marshall de Themines commanded, the Regiment of Thoulouse went almost all away: and the other Regiments for the losses and sicknesse they had had, were not able to winter there, and stood in great neede of some ease of their continuall travell in the trenches; whereupon those of the towne grew insolent, making many brauadoes against the besiegers, inciting them to yeelde to Monsieur de Rohan, or Monsieur de la Force, and they would hold good quarter with them.

The newes therefore of the continuance of the warre in Daulphiné by Monsieur de Montbrun, where the presence of Monsieur d'Esquigniers was very requisite for the peace of that Prouince; together with the important necessity of the regaining Monheur, which troubled the country vpon the Riuer of Garonne, and all Guienne; and the continuall raine and ouerflowing of the Riuer of Tarne, were the principall causes which moued his Maiesty. First, to goe and besiege Monheur. Secondly, to leaue fix thousand men in the Townes, Castles, and Forts about Montauban; with five hundred horse to keepe the field, vnder the charge of M. de Saint Geran. And thirdly, to send backe Monsieur d'Esquigniers into Daulphiné; and to make his grand Child the Earle of Saulx Lieutenant General in Daulphiné, which for very important considerations was effected. And to establish certaine Imposts for three yeares at Valance, vpon all things which should be transported up or downe the Riuer of Rofne, to furnish towards the charges of the siege of Pouffin and of Biy, which since this war had hindered the trafficke both by water and land all along the said riuer.

The Constables letter to D. of Mont.

About this time the Constable wrote a letter vnto the Duke of Montbazón, wherein he obserues the defects of the siege of Montauban in these termes; "Sir, I did assure you I would be the last at the siege of Montauban, which I haue not failed to performe, because this morning I made our retreat, and by the same means the review of our miserable troopes, which sicknesse and length of the siege had so wasted. Wee haue raised the siege, but not withdrawne our intent, and the affliction we haue at one time or other to ruine them, hauing reduced them to such estate as they cannot come out of their towne, but they must either be taken or slaine by our troopes which inuiron them, to the number of six thousand foot, and five hundred horse, composed of those new troopes which

A which arriued here within these two dayes, and of some old Regiments which wee leaue to refresh and strengthen themselves. This is our misery, which although it touch all our army, yet hath it not taken downe our courage, as we will shortly shew them, if it please God. We were resolute to goe into Languedoc, but an accident hath happened, which hath diuerted our designe, the death of Monsieur de Boisse, who was murdered by his owne sonne, and his sonne in law; for he who slue him, is retired vnto them, and they are reuoluted, with two places which the King had by agreement entrusted them withall before the siege of Saint Iohn D'Angely. Vpon this accident the King had sent to inuest them, and after his Maiesties entry into Thoulouse, hee will goe and assaile Monheur, to chastise the elder sonne, who is in that towne, and hath declared himselfe against the King: of which I will aduertise you. This, Sir, is our misery, the which would much more afflict vs, if the deceased King (the greatest Captaine of elder times) had not many times assailed places of lesse strength, and yet bene forced to leaue them, and raise his sieges. And for vs, it is certaine he was neuer in the like extremity as we, who for the great sicknesse amongst vs, haue bene constrained to raise the siege of a towne which could not hold out twelve dayes longer, if we had had men; but the length of the siege had so wearied our Captains, that in stead of encouraging the souldiers, they disheartned them. Four things haue ruined vs: the first was, The Duke of Mayen by his rashnesse made diuers assaults to no effect, and lost thereby a great number of Noblemen, Gentlemen, with many Captaines and souldiers, so as the rest of his troopes were vterly discouraged, & went almost all away, what order foucer could be giuen: The amazement of his quarter gaue the enemy such heart, as they verily beleueed they could not be forced, and hindered them from treating, which else without doubt they would haue done. The second was the fault which the D. of Angoulesmes troopes committed in suffering the succors to passe into the towne, which else had bene taken within foure dayes. The third was, the sicknesse of Monsieur de Montmorency, which caused three thousand men which he had brought with him to depart in one night, by which means the Duke d'Esquigniers quarter was ruined. The last and the greatest, was the great & intolerable sicknesse which spread it selfe vniuersally through all the campe, from which none hath bene free, the King excepted and my selfe, whom D our good God hath preferred. You haue seene my Letter to Monsieur: which shewed our miseries, the repetition whereof would be now too long; I dreame on the siege no longer, but thinke on what is to be done hereafter. You know the King hath so bridled these people, as they cannot escape; they shall haue no more libertie, no more commerce or trafficke, no labour or tillage, no means to victual their towne, seeing that round about them we haue placed strong Garisons (as you know) to cut them off if they issue forth. This is all I can say vnto you, the rest the bearer shall report. Assure you that I am with all the forces of my soule, Your most humble sonne, and obedient seruant, Luyne.

There were diuers things published notwithstanding, which made the Constable author of all the miseries of this siege, vnderaken out of season, and contrary to the opinion E of all the world. They taxed him, That he had not besieged it on all sides, as hee should haue done: That he had leauied much money vpon Edicts, loanes, and impositions, and had brought much from Paris with conuoyes, with pretext to pay the souldiers, where hunger slew more then the enemy or sicknesse: That he caused fix hundred men to labor daily at Lefseny, as many at Quille-beuf, eight hundred at Amiens, five hundred at Calais, two hundred at Luyne house, which they built at Paris, all after the rate of two shillings sterling per diem. Besides 1500 in garison at Amiens, for the guard of part of his treasure, and all vpon the Kings costs; whilst the poore souldiers before Montauban died of hunger, and had bene forced to abandon the army for want of pay. They taxed him with many things; First, with his absolute power in the government of the State, commanding F the armies and Seales. Secondly, for the new Edicts which he would passe. Thirdly, for his cariage in military actions. Fourthly, with his riches: and fifthly, his Governments. So as not onely the common people of Thoulouse cursed him, but also men of qualitie complained: whereof a kinsman of his being at Thoulouse to aduance the Kings entry, aduertised him by Letter, to whom he made this answer.

Cousin, if I were a new Courtier, and that I were not accustomed to the continuall assaults of flaunder, I would not so easily oppose my constancy to diuert it, and should not resolute to that patience which the knowledge of such actions giues me; but being inured

 "wherewithall to repell them as I haue, by that innocency wherein I haue liued. I heare
 "them with indifferency; this contagion infects me not, because I am armed with a coun-
 "terpoison, which is my sinceritie and my incomparable fidelitie, which marcheth in the "front of all my actions. You who heare but the thunder of the people, lye in apprehen"sion, although you can iudge better then any other, that my good intentions may wor"thily shelter me from such stormes. Let vs giue the vulgar leaue to talke, and those whose "idleness giues them leasure, to glosse vpon other mens actions. Hee that brought heretofore
 "into the Realme, hath he not attempted against heauen? Wherefore those which haue no B "better foules, haue they not the like libertie to controule my actions, and that falsely? They "are men full of malice, and without fame, seeing they speake ill of the present euents, and
 "so easily forget what is past, which hath bene publickly applauded and held for miracles.
 "What haue we done to be so condemned? What ingratitude is it, that this towne should "forget the good hath bene done them, to haue taken many townes, which like Harpies
 "had their tailons ready to teare them in peeces? What more pretious thing could they
 "haue for, then the person of our King, and that of his Constable, and of all the Princes,
 "Officers of the Crowne, and many other men of quality, who haue caried some markes
 "of this siege, either by the hand of heauen, or by them of the towne. And although those "masters which glosse vpon our actions (who are continually in danger, and they secure in C
 "their seats) shall it be lawfull for them to iudge vniuersally of our carnage, and may we not
 "appeale from their passions, but must see our selues condemned? I am of opinion, that the "King should attend iustice from heauen, seeing wee fight for him who can discerne the "good from the bad.

"I will not stand to iustifie that which concerns the siege; our foresight for the vnder-
 "taking of it; our care and resolution in ordering all things necessary; our diligence in pre"ferring a continuall toile before rest, which they which speake so much would willingly
 "haue spared; and our resolution to expose our liues without consideration, but only for "the Kings seruice, and the good of his Estate. To whom am I bound to giue any account
 "but vnto God, and the King? seeing I fight for none but for Religion and the State; all D
 "other considerations are indifferent. Whatsoeuer happens, I will neuer confesse any de"fect, seeing I am innocent before God, and know how to make those controuersers silent,
 "not with the Constables sword, but in letting them see that they haue beleued too lightly
 "or inuented too maliciously.

"Touching the euent of this siege, God will dispose at his pleasure, and I will doe my
 "dutie; assuring you that whatsoeuer happens, we will leaue such forces in this Prouince,
 "as they shall haue no cause to feare. We will leaue such forces about Montauban, as they "shall be more miserable in their imaginarij liberty, then if they were in the Kings prote"ction. Let them of Thoulouse consider, that they are no proprietaries of their towne:
 "that the King is their soueraine Lord, and hath the greatest interest in their preferuation: E
 "His reputation is engaged; it is for the good of Languedoc: Let them giue vs leaue, for
 "in taxing men they daunt their courages, and in accusing them falsely they take from them
 "all courage to doe them good: And if it were not in respect of the King, seeing them so ill
 "affected, I could make them know that they must hope for much from my care, and not
 "breake with me, who am able to assist them powerfully, &c.

The King
comes to Thoulouse.

The King having raised his siege from before Montauban, hee went to make his entry into Thoulouse, where he was receiued with great shewes and state: the particularities I will leaue to the Originall. Coming thither, the Constable entertained the Court of Parliament and the Capitouls of the towne with a goodly discourse touching the raising of the Siege, and spake so plausibly vnto them, who had contributed their men, money, F and cannon, to assist his Maiestie in this Siege, as he made them to allow of the Kings resolution in retiring of his armie. He told them that it was for the best, assuring them, that in the Spring the King would shew great effects of his power against his rebellious enemies.

The Baron of Leran and some of the Religion advised.

During the Kings abode at Thoulouse, he was aduertised of a defeat of three thousand of the Religion in the Countie of Foix, who vnder the conduct of the Baron of Leran, had attempted the towne of Vareilles, into the which the Seigneur of Urban had put himselfe

A himselfe with his friends to defend it: but being fearfull of the Kings approach, and the Duke of Angoulesmes, with the light-horse, they raised their siege, and retired their Cannon.

They write, that in their retreat they were charged by the Barons of Aunoux and S.
 Chamant, and by Urban, who fallied out of the towne, and were wholly defeated, so as six hundred were slaine vpon the place, and many taken prisoners, amongst which was the Baron of Leran their Commander.

The King vpon the first aduertisement of the revolt of Monheur, sent the Marshall of Roquelaure to inuest it; and presently after the raising of the siege of Montauban, he dis-
 B patched Monsieur de Bassompierre with foure Regiments. The winter season made them apprehend a long siege, yet the souldiers laboured willingly, and vpon the Kings coming to the Campe, they recovered their counterscarpe. They of Saint Foy fought to relieue them. The King hearing that they of Saint Foy kept the field, he sent the Duke of Luxemburg with twelue hundred foot, foure hundred horse, and two Cannons, to charge them; but they retired and abandoned those petty places which they had taken. The King commanded the Marshall of Roquelaure to giue an assault to Monheur, but hee entreated his Maiestie to haue patience, assuring him that hee would soone bring them to submit themselves to his mercy.

There were diuers batteries, mynes, and assaults; in the one of them the tenth of December, the Marquis of Themines, Marshall of the Campys shot through the left ankle, whereof he died within few dayes. He was much lamented for his valour, both by the King and the whole armie. The same day the Kings troops going to renew an assault, the Marquis of Mirambeau, eldest sonne to the Seigneur of Boisse, who had bene hurt in the cheeke in the beginning of the siege, shewed himselfe vpon the rampier with the Viscount of Casters, holding out their armes as if they meant to parle, and anon after came downe into the ditch, and spake with Monsieur de Montispan, whom the King had sent into that quarter: They offered to yeeld vp the towne and agree to any reasonable conditions; which being reported to his Maiestie, he sent them word they should render themselves to his mercy, and that he would not grant them any articles: yet towards evening the D King made a promise of life to the Gentlemen, yeelding at his discretion, and to the souldiers to march away with white stickes in their hands; as for the inhabitants, he would ad-uise what order should be taken with them.

On the next day, his Maiestie having sent them a commandement what order they should obserue, they came forth of the towne; first the women and maids in boats, but some were obstinate and would needs stay behind, which afterwards perished, for the regiments got in disorderly at the breaches, spoiled the towne, & burnt it to the ground.
 The Marquis of Mirambeau was vnhorfed, his cloake taken from him, and so ill entreated, as but for the Marshall of Roquelaure he had not escaped: the Viscount of Casters was also detained. There came out of this towne 260 souldiers.

E The fourteenth of December, and three dayes after the taking of Monheur, towards night, died the Constable Luynes of a pestilent feuer: he lay sicke some eight dayes, and drawing towards his end, was troubled with frequent convulsions, which left him not till his death, which bred great amazement in many, and gaue occasion vnto diuers to iudge thereof according to their passions. His body was presently opened, embalmed, and sent by water to Bourdeaux, and from thence to Tours.

On his death-bed he besought the King to take his wife and children into his protection, which his Maiestie promised, and gaue assurance thereof vnto the Lady, by a comfortable Letter which he wrote vnto her at Paris. Thus this great man, who had as it were a soueraigne power over warre and peace, is wrapped vp in the bundell of the dead with F the common souldiers; all his honors could not adde one houre to his life, nor the Kings fauours purchase him any fauour with death.

During the siege of Monheur, there were some insolencies committed by them of the Religion at Montpellier and other townes in Languedoc. They write, that they forbad the Churches and Couents in Montpellier, in the name of that Circle, to say Masse, or doe any act of the Romish Religion; whereof notice being giuen to the Capuchins, they would rather dye then desist willingly; so as they continued their exercise, but the doores being shut, and without the ringing of any bell, apprehending some tumult of the common people; yet afterwards they were forced to abandon their Church, so as in these combustions in Languedoc there were threescore and six Churches spoiled and beaten downe.

The same day that Monsieur was taken, his Maiefty was aduertised that Royan had been deliuered to Monsieur de Soubise, by means of the inhabitants; the castle was deliuered vnto him with this shamefull composition, That the Capitaines brother, who was Lieutenant in the place, should remaine Governour. Who comming soone after vnto the King, was deliuered into the Grand Prouosts hands.

Ships built by the Duke of Neuers.

Rochel, as you haue heard, was blocked vp by land, by the Duke of Espernon and his troops. His Maiesties intent was to doe the like by sea; for the effecting whereof, he had given order to the Duke of Neuers to cause five goodly ships to be made, the which begun rigged and made ready at Diepe, about the midst of October, and furnished with cannon and all things necessary, they set sail, but being vpon the coast of Britanie, they were diuided by a tempest; two of them were cast vpon the coast of England, and the other three anchored vnder Bel-Ile. In Nouember, sayling towards the Isle of Re, they were encountered by tenne Rochellers, who suncke one, rooke another, and the third fled to Brouage.

The Kings army put into garison.

His Maiefty hauing resolved to returne to Paris, and to put his army during the winter into garison, in the townes of Guienne, to keepe Saint Foy in awe; hee gaue the charge thereof to the Duke of Elbeuf. The long siege of Montauban had caused Monsieur de Montbrun to reuiue his designs in Dauphiné, and to make vse of his Commission which hee had from the Assembly at Rochel, hoping to make himselfe as great a man as his father had formerly beene. The pretext of their taking armes, was the burning of the Temple at Charenton; and for that it was giuen out, they had murdered diuers of them of the Religion at Paris. The Estate of Dauphiné was very confused, where the souldiers on either side committed a thousand insolencies: the people cried out; the passages were not safe; Grenoble fearing surpris, fortified it selfe; the inhabitants were burthened with great guards; the gates were barricadoed: both within and without; and no man durst speake his mind freely, nor tell of which party he was.

The Duke of Esclignieres returnes into Dauphiné.

The Duke of Esclignieres arriued in the beginning of December: his returne freed the inhabitants of Grenoble from their feare, and terrified Montbruns troops; hauing dismist most of the companies which had beene leauied by commission, he freed the country from the oppression of souldiers. Montbrun and those of his party assembled soone after at Die, and sent the Seigneur of Champoleon to the Duke, who would not heare him, sending them word that he would not receiue any one of their partie before they had sent him a Declaration and promise to disarme, and to submit themselves to the Kings seruice vnder the benefit of the Edicts: which hauing done, he caused this following order to be published, for the settling of a peace in Dauphiné.

A Declaration
made by the D.
of Esclignieres concerning them o the Religion.

Hauing carefully laboured since our returne into this Prouince to maintain the Kings Authority, restraints all disorders, and giue peace vnto his Maiesties subjects; hauing heard the Deputies of them of the Religion assembled at Die, and receiued their protestations of fidelity and obedience to the Kings seruice, and not to adhere to any designs or intelligences, to the preiudice of his Maiefty, and the good of his Estate: knowing that his Maiesties intention is, to suffer all them to enioy the benefit of his Edicts, which make themselves worthy of his fauour: We charge and command all Capitaines and Commanders of horse and foot, to dismisst their troops within eight dayes after the date hereof, and to retire vnto their houses, and not to commit any act of hostility or exaction, vpon paine of death.

He also ordained, that all prisoners taken by them should bee presently set at liberty without ransom, neither should they be stayed for their charges, which hee would taxe after their enlargement: That all places and Castles taken by their party, shall bee restored to the proprietaries, and the new fortifications demolished. In yeelding this obedience, they shall not be molested nor disquieted for any thing that hath happened during the said alterations: the which shall be supposed as if they had neuer beene, taking all the Commanders, Capitaines, and Souldiers, with their goods and families into the Kings protection and his. Forbidding all men of what estate soeuer, to attempt any thing against their

A their persons and goods, vnder pretext of iustice or otherwise, notwithstanding any decree made to the contrary, the which shall be without effect: and to suffer them to liue quietly in their houses and in the possession of their goods, charges, and honors, with free libertie to goe, come, and stay, in all places whither their affaires shall call them, &c.

Within three dayes after, the Earle of Saulx, grand-child to the Duke of Esclignieres made his entrie into Grenoble as the Kings Lieutenant Generall in Dauphiné. The Seigneur de Montbrun also disarmed and retired vnto his house. About this time the Duke caused his armie to march towards Valentinois to goe to besiege Pouzin and Bay, to cleare the Riuier of Rofne, and free the commerce which these two places had hindred since the moneth of May last. The next yeare will shew vs the successe of these enterprises.

Preparations to besiege Pouzin and Bay.

The newes of this peace in Dauphine was very pleasing vnto the King: all the world did greatly extoll the Duke of Esclignieres, giuing him the title of the Kings most faithfull seruant.

The King hauing disposed of his army in Guienne, he returned to Paris about the end of Ianuarie, where the inhabitants receiued him with great content (being twelue thousand of them richly appointed in their armes) a league without the towne. The Deputies of Rouen came to Court, to be suters vnto his Maiefty for the razing of the Fort of Quillebeuf; he preuented them with a royall bounty: I know well (said hee) what you would demand; you desire to haue Quillebeuf razed, I tell you I haue resolved not onely to ruine the fortifications of Quillebeuf, but of all those petty places within my Realme which are not on the frontiers; so in stead of Petition, the Deputies beganne their speech with thanks for this bounty; and ended it with vovues and prayers for his prosperity.

The King returnes to Paris.

The ordinary Assembly for the accompts of the Clergy had beene held at Paris in Iune, from whence it was transferred to Bourdeaux. The King deputed the Seigneurs of Vie and Houfay Councillors of State, vnto them, to acquaint them with the estate of his affaires, which had need to be speedily relieued with money from the Clergy. Vpon their proposition the Assembly resolved to assit his Maiefty with a million of crownes, to be onely employed in the siege of Rochel.

An assembly of the Clergy.

The Assembly hauing deputed certaine of them to make this offer vnto the King, the Bishop of Rennes made this speech, being assisted by the Cardinals of Retz and La Valette, and the chiefe Prelates of the said Assembly.

Remonstrance of the Clergy vnto the King.

SIR, as the present miseries cause vnspokeable griefe, being accompanied with the remembrance of former felicities: so the ioy of prosperitie and happy successe, hath not any more liuely feeling then that of calamities endured when all object of sorrow is taken away.

The griefe and heauinesse of the French Church was great, seeing the ancient and true Religion oppressed, her lustre blemished and defaced, and her libertie captiuated in many places of this kingdom.

But now, that heauen (fauourable to her vovues) hath restored the greatest part of that which force and violence had wrested from her, and our miserie beginning to change into happinesse, we also change our feares into hopes, our sighes into songs, and our complaints into praises; yeelding infinit thanks vnto his diuine bounty, for the particular care he hath had of this Monarchy, giuing vs a powerfull King, to maintain the beauty and dignity of the Church.

It is you, Sir, that changeth our mournfull accents into acclamations of ioy, by the great aduantage and good, wee beginne to reape by your piety and the effect of your armes: So next vnto GOD, wee wholly consecrate our praises to your vertue.

You daily raise vp the Altars which Heretic had trodden vnder foot, vpon the which they now renew the ancient and true sacrifices of reconciliation and peace. You disperse all the feares and apprehensions which did enuiron vs. Feare hath

 " your labours promise vs, we will bleſſe your name, and praife your generous actions which " cannot be enough worthily praized.

" Let the ancient Historiſes of the Hebrewes extoll their King who beganne to raigne
 " at eight yeares, and in the twelfth of his reigne vnderooke to chaſe away Idolatry, which " his predeceſſors had ſuffered; the which he performed in foure yeares: but we will ex-
 " ale our Auguſtus about him. It is true, Sir, that you had one yeare more then this young " King, when you tooke in hand the nobleſt Scepter of the earth. But you haue exceeded
 " him in zeale towards God, hauing not attended vntill the twelfth yeare of your reigne
 " to ſuppreſſe irreligion and reuolt which are ſifters, and go hand in hand; ſo we expect this
 " grace from heauen, that in leſſe then foure yeares wee ſhall ſee the time, when as God
 " ſhall be ſerued and honoured by all your ſubiects without diuiſion, as he is indiuiſible and
 " alwayes like vnto himſelfe: That hee ſhall bee called vpon with one heart and beliefe
 " throughout your Realme, whoſe bounds hee will vndoubtedly enlarge, ſeeing the paine " and care you take daily to encreaſe his ſeruite.

" Hauing dilated much vpon the Kings zeale and piety, hee complains of many outrages
 " (as they pretend) done vnto the Clergy by them of the Reformed Religion, and " animates the King to continue his deſigne of proſecuting armes againſt them, ſeeing it " tends onely, (ſaith he) to repell the iniuries done to God and your Maieſtie, the which be" ing ſuffered, will entertaine a Chaos and conſuſion in your Realme: for where order, re-
 " ſpect, and the lawes are violated, it is impoſſible the Eſtate ſhould be quiet and happy: and " ſeeing that matters are reduced to that paſſe, as their obſtinate error cannot endure the " King and the authority of the Church; nor their felony the yoke of obedience which is " due vnto you; what can you doe better, Sir, then to take the rod of Iron to puniſh theſe
 " traitors, who deſire rather to lye in toyle, then to be governed in peace; who conuert all " your fauour into poiſon, and grow more bitter by the effects of your bounty. Sir, wee
 " deſire not warre, but peace: the God whom we preach daily, is a God of peace and not
 " of diſſention; we muſt imitate him in the ſame ſpirit, and demand it of him inceſſantly, as " the chiefe point of felicity.

" But to enioy a good peace, you muſt ſometimes cement it with warre, the which be" ing juſtly vnderaken, although it draw after it ruines, ſpoiles, and loſſes, yet is it much " better then a bad peace; for God who is a juſt Iudge, doth alwayes giue a happy end to
 " a war well grounded. But there was neuer any more iuſt then yours, ſeeing it tends onely
 " to haue that reſtored vnto God and your Maieſtie, which is due vnto you within your

A And as the diuine bountie doth often heare the vowes and prayers which are made vnto him when his Altars are couered with offerings; ſo we humbly beſeech your Ma-ieſtie to take in good part two humble Petitions wee offer vnto you: Firſt, Sir, That it would pleaſe you to maintaine vs in our ancient rights, priuiledges, and immunities, and aſſiſt vs with your authority and conſent, for the enioying of that which belongs vnto vs;
 be it fees, or Caſtles, or ſtrong places, for the which wee haue taken the oath of fidelity vnto you: And withall not to ſuffer any exerciſe of the Reformed Religion in our lands and Iuriſdictions, remembering that if we hold them of your Maieſty, you alſo hold them from God, who ought to be more particularly honoured and ſerued in thoſe places then

B in any other, ſeeing they haue bene giuen vnto the Church, for expiation of offences committed. The other Petition, Sir, is; That you would not calme this ſtorme by the ſame meanes they haue done in former times; when they ſhare the rights of heauen with thoſe of the earth: when they balance feare, humane conſiderations and reaſons, with the power and aſſiſtance of heauen: when they meaſure the honour of God with priuate intereſt, whatſoeuer they build thereupon, is as variable and inconstant as the foundation, which is the world: and euery Edict which diuides the faith, diuides alſo Kingdomes.
 This peace is no peace, but trauailes onely the name: It is a miſchiefe painted ouer with a ſhew of good. We ſeeke not to deſtroy the effects of your clemency towards priuate

C men, who touched with a true repentance, haue reſcorted vnto your bounty as to an afſured Sanctuary, knowing that ſo great a Monarch is better pleaſed to ſaue and pardon his ſubiects, then to ruine them: but all theſe advantages which haue bene giuen them, by the generall Edicts of pacification, haue made them more obſtinate to maintain their errors againſt God, and their rebellion againſt you: They haue often ſubmitted themſelues vnto the yoke, and often ſhaken it off againe, which be marks of their infidelity and our weakneſſe. Neither doe we pretend to root out their error by force and violence, acknowledging the liberty which is engrauen naturally in the ſoule of man: That what is brought in by force is of no continuance; much leſſe of merit for faith, which ſhould be free and inſinuated mildly by diuine inſpiration, by patience, remonſtrance, and all forts of good example; which bee the armes wee pretend to vſe, to bring them vnto the true D Religion.

" But for your part, Sir, as the cauſes and root of a miſchiefe being knowne, they muſt be cut off and the courſe ſtayed: ſo your Maieſtie hauing ſcene by effect, that the places of ſurety, which they held not by Edict, but by a ſimple Brieffe, whereof the terme is expired, haue ſerued to no other end but to entertaine an open faction of diſobedience, and to pra-tiſe all kind of rigours againſt the Clergy and Catholiques. Wherefore we humbly beſeech your Maieſty to cauſe them to bee demoliſhed, when God ſhall deliuer them into your hands, as you haue begonne; and if any be preferred, that the Catholiques may be the ſtronger, from whom they may expect all fauourable vſage.

" In the end he concludes in theſe words: God grant, Sir, that the Rebels of your Realme E ſeeing themſelues deſtroyed of Forts and Rampiers, and of meanes to doe euill, may bee conuerted to the Catholique Faith, and to the obedience which they owe you. God grant, that ſuch as continue obſtinate, may ſlee ſpeedily to your mercie; or continuing in their malice, may be a prey to your Maieſties armies, and their memorie perpetually accurſed, &c. This was the ſubſtance of the Biſhops long ſpeech.

" The Aſſembly at Niſmes for the Circle of baſe Languedoc, had (as you haue heard) made an act for the diſmiſſion of Monſieur de Chaſſillon from his charge; and called the Duke of Rohan to be Generall of their Churches, and of the Prouince, in his place, who likewiſe cauſed an Apologie to be publiſhed in his defence againſt their criminations.

F The D. D'Eſquieres (who after the ſiege of Montauban was retired into Daulphiné to pacifie thoſe troubles) was aduiſed to ſend ſome man of authority and of the reformed Religion to the Duke of Rohan at Montpellier, to repreſent vnto him the miſeries which the continuation of theſe warres, would bring to the generall of their Religion, and that a peace would be more expedient for them, and would quench the exceſſe of the peoples fury in the three townes of Montpellier, Niſmes, and Vzez.

Monſieur du Cruſ, a Preſident in the Parliament of Daulphiné (who during the reigne of King Henry of the fourth, had bene general agent for the Churches; and had purchaſed chafed great credit and reputation amongst them of his Religion) was entreated by the A Duke D'Esquigues to performe this good office, and to goe vnto the Duke of Rohan to acquaint him with the meanes to attaine to some treaty of an assured peace. This President comes to Montpellier, and is well received by the Duke of Rohan, who heard him willingly, and made him this answer, That he had with griefe seene the insolencies which had bene committed in base Languedoc: but those people touched with a feeling of that which their brethren throughout all Europe suffered, were growne thus bitter: That hee would labour by all meanes to restraints their excesse: And as for himselfe, whensoever any occasion were offered to make knowne his fidelitie and obedience to his Maistie, to whom he had the honor to be allied, the seruice of God excepted, he would shew all dutie and due respect.

The Deputies of the Circle and their Partisans, grew wonderfully ialous of the Presidents coming, and of his conference with Monsieur de Rohan: They presently brute it abroad, that he was come to Montpellier, to perswade the Duke of Rohan to abandon them, and to deprive them of their Commanders and Leaders; That they must free themselves of him, and make him an example for all others to attempt the like.

They which had conspired this Presidents death, fearing their designe might be discovered, and so diuerted by the Duke, resolved to execute it instantly, sending one to salute him on the behalfe of the towne, to let him vnderstand that the chiefe Burgesse desired to doe their duties.

The President hauing receiued him with all courtesie, said, That if they did him the honor to come they should be welcome. This spy being returned to them which sent him, about forty of them entred suddenly into the Presidents lodging, where one of them like a mad man, for the beginning of his salutation, sayd vnto him; Traytor, commitst thou to withdraw the Duke from vs? who at this day is the onely protector of the faithfull, seeking our ruine with that goodly D'Esquigues who hath sought the overthrow of our Religion in France: if we had him here, we would make him feele the reward of his deserts as well as your selfe. The President making offer to answer, one presently stopped his discourse, thrusting him into the bodie, wherewith hee fell downe, yet not dead, but they presently dispatched him, giuing him fiftene or twenty wounds, which done they D shut his seruants into the house, and retired themselves.

The Duke of Rohan (who had entered ioyfully into the Towne) was so much displeased at this action, committed during his abode there, as he was forced to take his bed being sicke with very griefe for so barbarous an act, committed vpon the person of a Deputy of so high a qualitie, and sent from a Nobleman to whom they were infinitely bound.

This popular fury being somewhat cooled, and those which had been least enraged, and were most capable of reason, and counsaile, to pacifie the Duke of Rohan, who demanded iustice for this act, and to giue some forme of satisfaction to the King, and the Duke D'Esquigues, seized vpon foure of these murderers, who were presently executed; E yet some write that the chiefe authors and most culpable escaped.

The King was much incensed at this murder, committed contrarie to the Law of Nations, vowing to doe exemplarie iustice. The Duke D'Esquigues knowing the danger of a great Kings indignation, whose grace and clemencie is neglected, writes vnto the reuolted of Languedoc, Montauban, Guienne, and Rochel, conjuring them by the loue and zeale which he hath vnto their safety, to expiate their crimes and reuolt, by their prompt resolution vnto obedience; in these tearmes.

My masters, my name it may be will be suspected, as not hauing bene necessarie vnto the same reuolts, vnto which your rebellion hath plunged you within these eightene months; yet the affection which I haue euer borne you, and the care I haue had of you these fifty years, may chance to adde some force to my remonstrances, which ayme at nothing but the good of you and your affaires.

You know how much I haue bene offended with the murder of Monsieur du Cros, who was so traitorously vsed at Montpellier. You cannot be ignorant how much his death hath grieved me, seeing a man whom I much honoured and held in great esteeme to be so cruelly slaine. Yet hath not all this so much enflamed me, but the affection on which I beare you hath left some tendernes of heart in me, to giue you such counsell

A as one friend may giue vnto another whom he loueth. It is not at this present that you haue made proofe of my friendship, the happy raigne of Henry the Great doth carie the admirable makes thereof. I made the same remonstrances vnto you the last yeare, hoping to put a bit into the mouth of the headstrong horse of reuolt; which hath gotten loose amongst you.

You haue scene with what griefe and compassion, I haue beheld your Townes ruined by this error; & how much more expedient it were for you, to open your gates vnto this great King, whose iustice giues life vnto his courage, then to attend the furie of his choller, which will nor be pacified but with the ruine of such as ioyne in faction with you. I haue employed my selfe many times to procure you a peace; but the iustice of his Maiesties armes, the authoritie which he hath ouer those townes, the power of his arme, and in briefe, his iust demands haue as often shut my mouth, as my tongue hath been ready to speake thereof vnto him: Every man knowes, that the King will in no wife trouble the peace of our Churches, or meddle with our consciences: but his iustice would be satisfied for many indignities, and mutinies which haue bene committed amongst you. For as hee is a most iust King, so will he haue equitie in equal regard throughout his dominion, and his glorious name admits him not to make any composition with inferiours; nor is there any Nation so barbarous in all the world, which approue your leauing of armes against your most lawfull Prince.

For my part, if the memory of mee be of any esteeme amongst you: and if the good offices which I haue performed on your behalfe, be not altogether buried in obliuion, I doe againe conjure and beseech you to depart from your partialities, and to follow the aduice of him who is and euer hath been most affectionate vnto you. A subiect can neuer humble himselfe so much vnto his Prince, both diuine and humane lawes require it: your Natures should inuite you, better late then neuer. The King is so milde, as your least submission will make him pardon your offences. He is a Lyon in courage, who seeing his enemy at his feet ready to submit himselfe, he toucheth him not; but if he growes obstinate he knows how to breake all his practices, to the preiudice of his enemies. You should be well aduised, and not attend him before your townes to offer an entry. The honour you shall haue in submitting your selues, shall be the greater, the more speedy it is. The reputation a subiect may get, when he mutines against his Prince, is greater when he humbles himselfe generously, and subdues his owne pride, then to contest against his King. If the Kings clemencie and bounty be not capable to bring you into the right way, and that this naturall piety be not sufficient to reduce his obstinate subjects to his seruice: yet let his powerfull armes (which are already false vpon you) moue you. Let his great authoritie; his generous troopes, and his glorious scepter, be as an adamant to draw your iron hearts to his seruice.

Consider, I pray you, & remember, what this inuincible King hath done this last yeare against you: what townes and places he hath taken from you, and apprehend the furie of his armes. The clouds of discord will in the end dissolve to your preiudice, and these mists of rebellion will be dispersed by the heate of a Sunne, I meane of Leuis the iust, who hath alwayes bene our Protector, when we haue humbled our selues at his feete.

You cannot deny but you are his subjects: you and I and all Frenchmen owe him tribute and obedience. It is one of Gods commandments, and we must honour his Prince, and not contest against his will. If hitherto you haue made shew of rebellion, now make it known that you are his Maiesties good seruants, and wipe out this blemish of your infamy by a voluntarie submission, you shall get more by mildnesse then by force. You haue no occasion of discontent: for since the Kings coming to the crowne, what priuiledges or immunities hath he denied or abolished? Nay, hath he not increased and augmented them by new Edicts in our fauour. You haue vnderaken this warre, vpon a false Title, and there is no man that hath any zeale to his Maiesties seruice, but disaduowes your rebellion: and they which conuerse daily with you, condemne your reuolts, as capitall crimes, contrarie to all diuine, naturall and humane lawes.

Many seditious persons, who haue no other desire but to breed confusion, and to trouble the state, are crept in amongst you, whose absence should be as much desired, as their presence seemes to promise you fauour, and seeke to animate you against the King, to the

"end they may fish more freely in a troubled water, and make vse of you to countenance A
 "their designs. You should banish them out of your townes: you shall not see the ruine
 "which will fall vpon you, if you take this aduice; the Kings royall authoritie is most inter-
 "ressed. For my part I giue you this counsell out of the sincere good will I haue to your "good. I should be fory this rebellion should be the cause of your ruine; I aduertise you,
 "according to the small iudgement which breathes yet in my soule. If a happy peace
 "should make vs againe enioy the fruits of his fauours, and that you would present your
 "selues vnto the King with the keyes of your townes and hearts, it were not the worst aff-
 "you could doe: but contrariwise you should giue more peace vnto your affaires and con-
 "sciences; seeing the King desires not to breake the Edicts which hee hath made in fauour B
 "of vs. Thinke of it, and I pray vnto God that he will open your vnderstandings, and that "you may end the controuersie by a long and happy peace. Adieu.

What passed at Sea before
 Rochel.

The D. of Espernon, as you haue heard, had held Rochel blocked vp by land; but winter approaching, he was forced to leaue his lodgings. The Kings Fleet which should haue stopped their entry by Sea, had many misfortunes, so as the Rochellers were Masters of the Sea of Guienne, with an armie of thirty Ships, and one Gally.

Monsieur de Saint Luc, Gouvernor of Brouage was made Commander of the Kings Fleet, the which should lye betwene Chetebois, and the point of Coreille, and so block vp Rochel. But he was aduertised about the sixth of October 1621, by two Flemish ships that the Chevallier de Razilly (who commanded those vessels which had bene rigged in C the Ports of Bretagne) was towards the North of the Ile of Re, with fourteen ships, and had beaten the Fort of Saint Martin, with his Cannon, and taken thirtie ships thereabouts of diuers countries, and laden with diuers merchandize, which hee had sent with one of his men of warre into the riuer of Maran. The Rochellers being aduertified by one of their party, of Razillys his exploit, and that he battered their Fort of Re together with the estate of those vessels taken by him, and brought into that Riuer, rigged out in all haste thirtie ships, and one Gally to assaile Razilly, and to bring backe those hee had taken.

This newes being brought to Monsieur de Saint Luc, caused him presently to imbarke in his owne ship of a hundred Tunnages onely, appointing three others which by chance D were at Brouage to follow him and goe and ioine with Razilly, with whom after some hazard and danger of the Rochellers hee met; and boarding him, vnderstood of him that hee had had a combat with the Rochellers but two dayes before, and that they had recovered their thirtie Ships which were in the Riuer of Maran and his owne man of Warre.

This mischance made Monsieur de Saint Luc resolute to goe in good order, and fight with the Rochellers, although they were in greater number then the Kings ships; who finding them to the North of the Ile of Re, hard aboard the shore, in a place where the Kings Fleet could not approach them, drawing too much water, except onely the Pinaces, whereof one running aground vpon the Shelle of Cornau, it was E presently inuaded by the Rochellers and taken. Monsieur de Saint Luc hauing no meanes to draw the Rochellers to fight; and being pressed with want of victuals, munition and men, resolute to retire to Brouage: where hauing furnished their Fleet with what was necessarie: the Rochellers came with five and twenty saile, to charge the Kings Fleet, who prepared themselves to defend two of the Duke of Neuers ships which were runne on ground, which they battered with such violence, as in the end they boarded them, and caried them to Rochel, Monsieur de Saint Luc hauing no meanes to relieue them, by reason of the winde and tyde.

After this, the Rochellers hauing no meanes to annoy the Kings Fleet, they resolute to make a pallisado of ships in the Channell at the entrie of Brouage to keepe the Kings Fleet from coming out: But Monsieur de Saint Luc foreseeing this designe, F made in lesse then fixe dayes a Fort of earth, enuironed with planks and pyles, without the entrie of the Hauen of Brouage, and placed thereon three Cannons.

When the Rocheller came to make their pallisado, and sinke their Vessels laden with stores; Monsieur de Saint Luc being in the Fort, so plyed them with shot from thence, the Towne, and some ships vnder saile, that the Rochellers did but what they could, and not what they had proiected; who as soone as they were gone, had their vessels

A sels to make their pallisado which they had sunke, weighed vp againe, and by this meanes the entrie of Brouage, remained as free as before.

This done, Monsieur de Saint Luc, to winne time, rigged vp the rest of the shipping in the Hauen of Brouage, with the which hauing two or three times attempted to goe to Sea, and finding still the winde contrarie, hee was in the end constrained by the importunitie of his Captaines, to resolute to stay still there vntill the King had giuen order for the men which serued his Maiestie in his ships, whose time was now expired, and for other supplies which they wanted.

Thus the Rochellers being Masters of the Sea of Guienne, did daily inuent B new meanes how they might ruine this Fleet in the Hauen of Brouage, and in the end concluded to burne it: to which effect they sent three burning vessels with winde and tyde to breake in vpon them. But Monsieur de Saint Luc had also prevented this by sending out certaine long Boats with hookes and chaines of iron to draw them out the current vpon the owle, where they consumed without any hurt doing. Afterwards the Rochellers attempted to make a second Pallisado of Ships in the entrance of the Hauen of Brouage, but it tooke no effect.

The King being come to Paris, hee conferred the Government of the Cittadell of Amiens, vpon the Constables sonne, and made the Marshall of Cadneten his Vncle Lieutenant. He put another Gouverneur into Amboise, and changed the Gouver- C neurs and Garisons of Calais and Bullen. Into Calais he put the Seigneur of Pallisseur, an ancient seruant of the Crowne of France. Monsieur D'Amont had the command of Bullen, and La Fere was committed to Beaumont, who had bene in Kilbeuf. Thus after the Constables death, there were great changes in the places which he held.

In the beginning of the yeare, some of the Religion, had thrust themselves into Bourniquet, a little Towne in Quercy, weake and not able to resist. The Inhabi- B tants being most of the Religion were willing to be surprized. The Castle made some resistance but soone yielded.

Bourniquet in Quercy has presented and reco-uered.

The Duke of Angoulême and the Marshall of Themines, hearing of the taking and D reuolt of this place, which was like to bring great discommoditie vnto the countrie, resolute to besiege it with some part of their troopes, plant their Cannon, batter it, and so blocke it vp, as no succours could come thereunto: which they within seeing (who had now held it some three weekes) craue composition, and haue it granted them by the Duke of Angoulême vpon honorable tearmes.

The Rochellers of whom wee haue formerly made mention, had made themselues Masters of the Sea of Guienne, and kept the Kings Fleet shut vp in the Port of Brouage, fixe of which Ships vnder the command of the Chevallier Razilly had staine out in a darke night, and retired themselves to the Ports of Britanie.

This misfortune of the Kings Naue, the raising of the siege of Montauban, and E the discommodities of a long and tedious winter, which would stay the King at Paris vntill May, made the Assembly at Rochel to provide so much worke for the King during this Winter, as they hoped hee would be constrained to treat of a peace with them to their aduantage. They therefore resolute to make two descents or landings, at the entrance of the Riuers of Loire and Garonne, neither of them being above five and twenty leagues from Rochel. The one vnder the command of Monsieur de Souillac, who should land at Sables d'Olone, attempt vpon Talmond, and enter into basle Poitou, and so recouer the Bankes of Loire towards Nantes, with five thousand foot, and as many horse as he could draw together of their partisans, whereof their were great numbers in that Prouince: That they should build Forts F wherefoever they got any footing, and thereby make all Poitou subiect to contribution, and drew Imposts from all that should be transported by water or land, as they had done in Oleron, and at Saint Martin de Re.

The other descent which should bee vnder the conduct of Monsieur de Fa-uas, should bee executed in two seuerall places, at the mouth of the Riuer of Geronne; the one in the Iland of Argenton, a league from Blay towards the Sea, where he should build a Fort, and furnish it with Cannon and Munition. First, to leaue more exactly, their great Imposts, imposed at Royan vpon merchan-doc, for the largeness of the riuer being three leagues, which caused many vessels to escape often. Secondly, to augment the said Imposts, and to gather there the part promised to the Seigneur of Soubise distinguished from that of the Assembly, which they called of the cause and of the towne of Rochel. Thirdly, to keepe them from carrying of any graine to Bourdeaux; and fourthly, to hinder the commerce of Medoc, and Xaintonge with Bourdeaux.

The second descent should be at Soulauc, situated at the point on Medoc side, opposite to Royan, the which had also diuers ends. First, they should build a Fort, and land good numbers of foot and horse, to runne vnto the gates of Bourdeaux, and annoy them by B all acts of hostility, it being but fiftene leagues from Soulauc, the country being plaine and of easie access. Secondly, to entertaine their intelligences with them of their party, as well in the champion countrie of Gascoigne, as in Bearne, there being no Riuer nor Towne vpon the way to hinder their succours. Thirdly, to furnish Royan, Rochel, and their Navy at Sea with fresh meat, the countrie about Soulauc being full of cattell. And fourthly, to haue commoditie for their ships which lay before Royan, to Anchor by Soulauc, when contrarie windes should driue them from Royan.

The party of the Religion did also hold Boy vpon Bay, and Poufin vpon the riuer of Rofne, where no merchandise could passe without paying the imposts according to the taxes which they had set. So as they made an account, that of the imposts which they C should raise vpon all merchandise coming and going vpon the Loire & Garonne, or the Rofne; of the contributions of the open Country; of the prizes taken at Sea; of the re-uenues of the Church; and of the sale of the goods of those of their party which were retired into the Kingstownes, to be able to defray more then 25000 souldiers which they entertaind in their fleet, in the field, and in their garisons in diuers Prouinces; and with-all, to find the King so much businesse, as they should be constrained to make peace with them at their pleasure.

This was the estate of them of the Reformed party, in the beginning of this yeare.
Let vs now see the successe of so many enterprises one after another, and the order which the King, his officers, and Lieutenants tooke to hinder the execution of their designs. D

On the 22 of January 1622, the Rochellers made their descent in the Isle of Argenton, which was onely for pasture and uninhabited, where they beganne to build a Fort with fourre bastions, and furnished it with Ordnance, which they might easily doe, being masters of the Riuer and of the Sea, the King hauing no ships armed, but such as were kept in at Brouage.

Monsieur de Gourgues first President at Bourdeaux, being aduertised of this descent and building of a Fort, and of the spoiles which Monsieur de La Forces troops committed vpon the riuers of L'Isle and Dordone, seeing Guienne without a Gouvernor since the decess of the Duke of Mayenne; and without a Lieutenant Generall, the Marshall de Roquelaure hauing deliuered vp his charge vnto the King; and the Marshall Themines being not yet E settled: he propounded in Parliament to arme the people of the Champion country as well in Medoc, as throughout all Bourdelois for their defence; and to send two Councillors to Libourne to leauy two thousand men, with the which they should assist the Duke of Elbeuf at the siege of Moutrauel. And likewise to raise foure or fue hundred foot or more, to hinder the enterprise of the Rochellers within the Ri-uer, and to rigge out some ships. For the performing of which charge, they should gather certaine Loanes, and establish a Councill vpon all occurrences: That they should disarme them of the Religion within the Towne, thereby to free the people from all iealousie of them: That they should prouide Munition, and Graine, and assure their Ports and Walls.

Monsieur de Fauas landed with his foot, horse, and Artillerie, at Soulauc, on the fifth of February. Hee tooke the Borough suddenly, and besieged the Church, the which yielded within foure and twenty houres, hauing promised the inhabitants to preferre their liues and goods. Hee hoped to be reuenged vpon Bourdelois, but especially vpon the countrie Houses of them of the Parliament, who by a Decree the yeare before, had condemned him to lose his head; declared him ignoble, and his goods confiscate.

The

A The very day of this descent, the first President sent Capitaine La Salle with his company of foot to the Island of Calaus, whereof if the Rochellers had seized, as they might easily haue done, they had cut off all commerce betweene the towne of Bourdeaux and Medoc, Xaintonge, Blay, Bourg, and the riuer of Dordone; and had reduced it to great extremity. La Salle had commission to leauy threecore men for the guard of the Island, and the building of a Fort: and to march with threecore of the ablest to Soulauc, to re-lieue them which were in the Church; or if it were yielded, to ioine with the people of the country. La Salle leauies the building of the Fort to two of his brethren, and comes to Lefpare the onely Towne of Medoc, where he heares of the yeelding of Soulauc, and B finds the inhabitants of Lefpare and thereabouts so amazed, as they began to carry away their goods, thinking they should neuer be able to defend their towne nor Castle; but he reassures them, and breakes some Bridges, ouer which their enemies in this season were to passe to come towards Lefpare and Bourdeaux, making Ports and placing guards vpon certaine passages.

Soone after, the Seigneur Dornano Saint Croix (chosen by the Parliament to command the troops) attending the leauying of more forces, came to Lefpare, and within a while were to the number of five hundred foot, which staid the course of Monsieur de Fauas, and in diuers encounters slue and tooke many of their enemies. Fauas for his part caused all the people neare to Soulauc, to worke about the building of a Fort neare vnto the Church.

C Hee pillaged and burnt the houses betweene Soulauc and Lefpare; put garison into the Church of Grayan, vnto the aduantage of his horse in the plaine Country vpon the foot Companies of Bourdelois; which being reported vnto the Parliament, they giue order for the leauying of a Company of forty light horse, with the which the Seigneur Dornano arrives at L'Espare on the two and twentieth of March; and on the three and twentieth (before Fauas knew he had any company of horse) he parted in the evening, and by break of day came within a mile of Soulauc, where he fortheth the Bourrough, slue about thirtie souldiers, and tooke sixteene; after which they retired with their booty to Lef-pare, being five leagues off. Fauas much incensed at this affront, resolu'd to be reuenged; and entreates the Baron of Saint Seuerin, commanding in Royan, to come and assist him;
D who brought a hundred good men to Soulauc on the last of March; hauing also drawne some of their best souldiers out of their Ships, he came with forty horse, seuen hundred foot, and one peece of Ordnance to Saint Viuien, where two companies of their enemies were carelessly lodged, with weak barricadoes. As soone as they perceiued the Rochel-lers, La Salle issued with thirty Muskettiers and begins the skirmish: the Rochellers so follow the charge, as they get into the towne, and discharge their artillery, so as the enemy is much endamaged, and La Salle hurt. But the north wind caused them of Lefpare three leagues off, to heare this Combate, so as Dornano gets speedily to horse, and with twelue voluntaries, and his light horse comes to Saint Viuien, chargeth threecore Muskettiers at ten paces distance, who slue diuers of his horse, but were themselves all slaine;
E and the fight continuing, Fauas and S. Seuerin in the end retired with the losse of 125 of theirs, and but few of their enemies.

After this rout at Saint Viuien, Dornano returned to Bourdeaux, where letting them vnderstand that he could not besiege the Church of Soulauc with lesse then a thousand or twelue hundred foot, fifty light horse, a company of Harguebusers on horsebacke, and two Peeces of artillery, as well to inuelt and force the besieged as to prevent all succours from Rochell and Royan. Afterwards Fauas, seeing no great successe of his enterprises as the assembly of Rochel hoped; and that Monsieur de Soubise had but bad fortune in the Isle of Ric, as shall be said hereafter, he brake his Port of Soulauc, to guard the Church onely; made a truce with the first President and Dornano, and after retired himself F to Rochel.

One of the principall designs of the Assembly of Rochel in procuring this descent at Soulauc was, as you haue heard, for other respects. And the enterprise of Nerac (into which by their intelligence they were entred, and had slain five men vpon the little bridge betweene both townes) succeeded not. In Bearne they which affected M. de La Force, seeing the siege of Montauban raised, had a designe vpon the Castle of Berloc, situate in the way betweene Acqs, and Nauarrex: the King had ordained it should be raised, but as such demolitions are commonly at his charge; M. de Piles, who commanded in the Ca-file, being of the Religion, begged the ruines of the Kings, vpon condition to doe it at his owne charge, the which was granted; but as they write, he meant it not: which policy being discovered by Monsieur de Poyanne, Gouernor of Nauarreux, being also aduertised that the Captaine of Betloc was present in assemblies, where they spake of nothing but taking armes, and that he had no intent to raze Betloc, although he had begged the ruines, onely to keepe any other from that commission; he presently surpris'd Piles in the said Castele, causing all the Country thereabouts to labour in the demolishing thereof, so as within fifteene daies it was laid euen with the ground.

Ancienterprise
vpon Caulfade.

In the beginning of the yeare they of Saint Antonin and Montauban made diuers enterprises, to free the passages from one towne to another, as well vpon the townes of Caulfade and Bourriquet, as vpon Negrepelisse, which three townes are two leagues distant one from another, and iust in the mid-way between Saint Antonin and Montauban. They had an enterprize to force Caulfade by Pettard, but before they would undertake it, there was a letter sent to the Consuls, in the name of the Duke of Rohan, in the which he blamed them for the fault they had committed, in abandoning the party of their religion, before the siege of Montauban, and contrary to their oath of the Union with the Churches: but there being now a fit opportunity offered to repaire this error, they might free themselves of their garison, being aduertised that most of the best souldiers were gone away, which made him to perswade them to recover their liberty with courage; and that for his part he would giue order, the Gouernour of Saint Antonin should so fauour them in this enterprize, as it should succcede to the great content of all their Churches. La Gafnerie, who caried these letters, finding the Consuls deafe, returned to Saint Antonin, where Ballagure, who was Gouernor, with others, refused vpon this enterprize, having drawne together about fifteen hundred men from all the neighbour Garisons of the religion; whereof the Baron of Vaillac who lay in Queilus of Bonnetre, a league from Saint Antonin, aduertised Pagnet Gouernor of Caulfade, who presently sent word thereof vnto the Marshall of Themines, being in Cahors, who gave order to the Commanders and Gouernors thereabout, to send succours to Caulfade. Pagnet having drawne together seuentene or eightene hundred horse and foot, lodged them (as he thought fit) attending their coming. On the ninth of January betwene two and three in the morning, the Gouernour of Saint Antonin approached with his troops, and planted his ladders nere vnto the Temple gate, and entered the Temple with three hundred men, besides two hundred which were vpon the walls attending the playing of the Pettard. The evening before, all the streets were barricadoed, and field peeces planted, which vpon the alarme giuen were discharged, & the Garison fell vpon them so as there were two hundred slaine within the towne, and the rest fled ouer the wall. The Kings succours which lay without the towne, hearing the noise, aduanced, and meeting the enemy without, there was a great conflict; but in the end the troops of Saint Antonin were put to rout, where many Gentlemen, Captaines and Souldiers were slaine, and others taken prisoners, among the which was the Gouernor of Saint Antonin.

The Garison
of Montauban defeated.

They of Montauban being fauoured by the commodities of the winter, and by the Forest of Montefich, where they made their retreat, went often towards Thoulouse to take prisoners and cattell; but the Kings Garisons in Montefich and Eignan annoyed them much, and cut off the victuals which was brought vnto them; and on the fifteenth of January came vnto the gates of Montauban, and caried away thirty Kine with some horse, which the souldiers within the towne would not offer to rescue, being pressed therunto by the inhabitants, but told them, if they would giue them their pay they would goe to field, and not be shut vp in a place afflicted with plague and hunger. The Consuls seeing they could draw no seruice from such men, dismissed three hundred, to whom they gave part of their pay. They marched away by night, and recovered a wood nere the Towne, fearing that if they kept the champion, they should bee discovered by the Kings forces which lay thereabouts: the extremity of the cold caused them to make fires to heat them, the which being discovered by the Countreimen, they presently gave aduertisement to the Marquis of Ambre, and the Consuls of Lauour, who armed what forces they could, and set vpon them, so as of the three hundred, there were not about forty left aliue, which were taken prisoners.

The King being come to Paris, many grew weary with the toyles of warre, who seeing

D'Esquiers
mediates a Peace.

The reasons of such a propounded a peace.

As the Kings Treasure exhausted, and many of the Nobility slaine, they propounded diuers meanes vnto the King to resolute to a Peace. The Duke d'Esquiers beseecheth his Maestie to giue it vnto his people, promising to draw his reuolted subiects to obedience. The King who desired nothing more then his subiects hearts, with the preservation of his authority, lets the Duke vnderstand, that if they would resolute to obey, they should finde him ready to pardon. It was propounded whether they should continue the warre, or grant them peace: which bred a contrariety of opinions. They which perswaded to peace, said, it might be made after this sort; First, that continuing in full subiection and obedience, they should leave them their townes, euery one enjoying their ancient priuiledges; for the which towns they should be answerable vnto the King, vpon paine of confiscation of all their goods, whereunto they should submit themselves willingly, and by treaty. Secondly, that within their townes they should obey the King in all things, to which the rest of the Prouince and their neighbors were subiect. Thirdly, that they should pay the like tributes and impositions, obserue the same lawes, and other rites, if they had no ancient exemptions. Fourthly, that they should obey the Edicts; and should not keepe any Garisons in their Townes or ancient fortresses but their Morriages onely. Fifthly, that they should demolish the new fortifications of Castles and small places which they possessed, and onely continue the strength of their greater townes and other fortifications, made before the death of the deceased King: and the King for his part shall keepe them in the protection of his Edicts, so long as they should continue obedient. Sixthly, that strict commandment should be giuen to doe iustice without distinction of religion, and to prevent all scandals and acts which might breed complaints and sedition. Seuenthly, that they should haue permission to assemble from time to time, but no where but in Paris, to the end it might be knowne to the King and all France that they treated nothing but according to the duty of subiects. Eighthly, the particular assemblies to make deputies, should bee held in their severall places, with the permission of Gouernours of Parliaments.

Reasons
gainst the peace.

The reasons of such as maintained the continuance of the warre, were; First, that the King should not seeme to desire a peace; Secondly, that if he gaue care vnto it, it would make the rebels more proud and obdinate, and withall, he should wrong his authority; Thirdly, that he should not heare any speech of treating with his subiects, but all hee should doe, was to receiue them without any other capitulation then a simple pardon and naked obedience: the which, if they did not offer freely, hee ought not to heare them; Fourthly, that he should not treat with them, as with a body, seeing there is a distinction betwene Huguenots which obey, liuing vnder the Kings protection & disauow the rest, and those which are reuolted; Fifthly, that there is a difference betweene the Huguenots which are reuolted, for some may pretend particular priuiledges, as Rochell; others iust feare, as weake townes, and others interest of accords and graunts: and therefore it was fit euery towne should treat in particular; Sixthly, that no Commander was capable to E treat for another, but for himselfe, for that he cannot haue power of all the rest, and therefore it would be in vaine to treat; Seuenthly, that by colour of a treaty, they would discover the kings intentions and forces, and fortifie themselves accordingly: and therefore in stead of treating, they should let vpon them; Eighthly, that a treaty would giue them time to furnish their townes with men, victuals, armes and munition; Ninthly, that they had solicited strangers to ioyne with them and assist them in their cause, and therefore should not be admitted to treat with their King; Tenthly, that they had not kept their promises, so as they which maintained the iustnesse of this warre, said, that it was honorable, profitable, iust and necessary.

All these goodly propositions of peace were changed into a resolution of warre, by reason of the disorders which they said were committed in Languedec, bafe Guienne, and at Rochell.

The Duke of Elbeuf, being made Generall of the kings army in Guienne, as you haue heard, to restrain the course of Monf. de la Force and those of that parrie, hauing vnder his command fixe regiments of Foote, consisting of one thousand eight hundred men, and fixe companies of light-horse, most of which were with Monf. du Hallier, Captaine of the kings guard, at the siege of Genfac, where he found greater resistance then hee expected. The Duke, hauing caused the towne to be well viewed, and finding there was small store of munition in the army, and that they had too few men to attempt such a place which expected succours speedily, it was resolved not to engage themselves at this siege: whereupon he put his army into garison, and assured Duras for the King. The Duke lying at Bergerac, was advertised that certain troops which retired themselves into the Castle of La Force, did much annoy the Countrey, whereupon he resolved to besiege it with three thousand foot, five hundred horse, and four Cannon. M. de la Force hearing that the Duke meant to force his chiefe house, parts from Saint Foy with all his troops both of horse and foot, being one thousand and five hundred men, which made the Duke to come downe into the plaine. M. de la Force advanced all he could to relieve them, coming within halfe a league on the thirtieth of January in the evening; by two a clock in the morning came resolutely into the plaine, where hee gave two furious charges to the right wing of the Dukes army, and continued the fight for the space of six houres, during the darkenesse of the night; but being much gauled by their Ordnance, they were forced to retire behind a hill, where they stood in battell eight houres more, according to the relation of M. Hiekes, who was present at this encounter. Some authors write that M. de la Force lost three hundred men, and the Duke but twenty five, who retired his army without taking the Castle; and the reason was (as they say) for that M. de la Force had sent to intreat him to suffer him to deliver it into the hands of the Seigneur of Bourdeilles, Gouverneur of the Countrey, who should answer for it. wherewith the Duke refused satisfied; and the rather because he was solicited thereunto by many Gentlemen of the Countrey, the Kings servants, who feared the ruine of their houses if this Castle should be razed, according to a decree of the Parliament of Bourdeaux.

Montflanquin surpris'd and fortified by M. de la Force.

Whilest that the Duke takes muster of his army at Elmet, with a designe to besiege Montrauel, the Marquis of La Force was sent by his Father to seize vpon Montflanquin, a towne situated vpon a hill, and strong by nature, the which the year before had beene reduced vnto the Kings obedience, their fortifications ruined, and their Cannon taken away: but as soone as the Marquis was entred, the inhabitants repaired their breaches speedily, so as in fiftene daies they were able to defend it against an army of foure thousand men. This surpris'd did much fauor the Marquis of Lusignan designe vpon Clerac. The year before he had beene Gouverneur of Pignerol, and had left it without any recompence, it being demolished with the rest: for the which he grew so discontented as hee sought by all meanes to enter againe into the partie of the reformed, but would not doe it but by the surprize of some place to purchase him the more credit. At that time Bachelier Senechal of Esquillon was Gouverneur of Clerac with a Garison of five hundred men. The Marquis well informed of the State of the garison, began to practise with some Burgesses, wishing them to get a Mason to make a hole in the wall within for one man to enter, and to relye vpon him for the rest of the execution; the which they promise, but all his care was to recover men and not be discouered. The result of Montflanquin, being but six leagues off, was a great helpe to him, hauing meanes to draw what men he pleased from thence.

Clerac surpris'd by the M. of Lusignan.

The Gouverneur had beene advertised of an enterprife vpon Clerac, but hee could not discouer how it could be done. Monsieur Duc, a Councillor of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, and Commissary for his Maiesty for the razing of the fortifications of Monheur, Clerac, and Tonneins, hauing discouered that the Marquis of Lusignan had an enterprife vpon Clerac, advertised the Duke of Elbeuf, sending him word it was good hee should come vnto the banks of the river of Lot, where all the people seemed to breathe nothing but a reuolt; but his answer was, that he was otherwise employed. This Councillor hearing that it should be put in execution vpon the one and twentieth of Februarie at night, he resolved to put himselfe into the towne the day before with fiftene horse and fifty Muskettiers: but the Gouverneur would not suffer his footmen to enter, so as they were forced to lodge in a Village, halfe a league from Clerac: They visited the walls that night, yet could not finde the hole; they were advertised of an enterprife, but could not discouer the particulars, or how it should be executed. The Marquis was in no lesse feare that it was discouered, hauing receiued some intelligences from the towne. Ferrant, who had most conference with the Mason, and should haue come vnto him to acquaint him with the place, came not, but only wrote vnto him, that the Mason had sene him that day, and was full of trouble and feare, by reason of their alarmes in the Towne; yet hee had

A had promised to doe what he could; if he made the hole, hee would not then send vnto him, but if he could not, he would then come vnto the Marquis. Another sent him word, the inhabitant who should lend his house for to make the hole, was resolved to discouer it to the Gouverneur. All this could not diuert the Marquis, who coming to the rendezvous, they refused to go vnto the wall to see if the hole were made. At their approach to the walls they were discouered and shot at by the Centinells. At the last they found the hole with much difficultie, the which was so little and vnease as one man could hardly enter in on all foure, but notwithstanding the alarme they entered & forced their barricadoes and all their places of strength. The Gouverneur, Duc the Councillor, the Abbot of Clerac, and many others were taken prisoners, and as they write, about two hundred slaine, amongst the which was Eroy Mauet a Lesiue.

During this surprize of Clerac, the Duke of Elbeuf was at the siege of Montrauel, in the which was Motte Ganchon, with three hundred choice men, and diuers good Captaines. The towne was soone taken, and the besieged retired to their Fort and bastions. The Gouverneur demands composition, and Duke refused to receive them but at discretion. They planted a new battery, and gaue an assault, the which was valiantly defended for the space of two houres, where the Gouverneur was slaine vpon the breach, with many others: They retired into a Tower, but being readie to be forced, on the third of March they yielded to the Dukes mercy. All the Commanders were prisoners, whereof some of them were sent to Bourdeaux, to be exchanged for Duc the Councillor taken at Clerac: The women and maidens were conducted away in safety, to auoide the insolency of the Souldiers; and some fiftene souldiers and inhabitants hanged, and the rest prisoners.

Montrauel besieged by the Duke of Elbeuf.

During this siege, M. de la Force surpris'd Tonneins, where there are three townes, the vpper, the lower, and the Bourrough of Cuges. The inhabitants received them willingly, being much affected to the religion. There remained nothing opposite vnto them but the Castle of great Tonneins, belonging to the Earle of La Vauguion, which after some daies siege hee yielded. The D. of Elbeuf, hauing taken Montrauel, resolved to besiege it, being defended by M. de Monpouillan, second sonne to M. de la Force, the Viscount of Castets, Theoben, and diuers other Commanders with fiftene hundred foot. Vpon D his march, the Marshall of Themines met him with his forces at Marmande, being about three thousand men. At their first approach they took the lower towne, and as they write, slew about three hundred of the besieged. M. de la Force came from Clerac to relieve them, but was repulsed. They gaue an assault to the vpper Towne, but they were furiously driuen backe by the besieged. They gaue another assault to a house which the besieged held, the which was obstinately defended; but Monpouillan the Gouverneur had a Musket shot in the head, and many of his men hurt and slaine. The Dukes men hauing taken a bastion of importance, they were forced to demand a parle, and Monpouillan intreated him by his letters to grant a Passport to foure or five Gentlemen he would send vnto him and the Marshall, the which hauing obtained, they came and propounded conditions to their owne advantage, the which the D. would not accept but vpon these terms: That the Commanders should be prisoners, and put to what ransom it should please the King, and the souldiers at discretion; yet to haue their liues saued, and to remaine prisoners during these troubles. The Deputies returned without conclusion. M. de la Force the father, sent two other gentlemen to treat, but itooke no effect: after which hee made other attempts to relieve his sonne and the besieged within Tonneins, which he failed of, nor without losse to both parties: for during the combate, the besieged made a sallie out, where they ouerthrew some, and forced the rest to abandon their Commanders, who were slaine fighting, so as they became masters of the bastion and trenches, burnt the carriages of their Ordnance, and cast two into the ditch, and one into the river: but soone after they recovered F their trenches and bastion againe: what succeeded at this siege, you shall heare about the end of May.

Besieged again and taken by the D. of Elbeuf.

The Marq. of Lusignan, seeing himselfe, freed from the Marshall of Themines, who was gone to the siege of Tonneins, hauing raised a regiment, and being well fortified with good souldiers from diuers places, and hauing also recovered two pieces of iron Ordnance, he resolved to attempt the Abbey & Castle of Granges, a league from Clerac, where he vnderstood there was store of corne, wine, lard, and other necessaries to victuall a place. Hauing besieged the Castle, there came five hundred horse and foot of the Commons, led by the Seigneur of Catus with some horse sent by the Marshall of Themines to relieve A it: The Marquis leaves his trenches, and chargeth them so suddenly as few returned. That night the castle yielded, and the Marquis caused great store of provisions to be carried by boat to Clerac with armes for 700 men.

Monsieur du Pleis Letter to the King concerning a peace.

The proposition of peace formerly mentioned continued in Court the two first Months of the year, during the which Monsieur du Pleis Mornay wrote thus vnto the King. Sir, Heretofore your Maiesty hath bene pleased, yea and hath commanded me to speake of your subiects of the Religion. I am so little, and the businesse so great, as I feare lest your Maiestic should terme it presumption. Wherefore, Not daring to sayne my selfe with those which demand peace for themselves, I hold it my duty to craue it in all humility for your selfe, and by your owne bounty of whom, next vnto God, they are to acknowledge both to haue their being and well being. I hope to see your Maiestic moued, like a good father, to giue it them: can they bee ignorant what need they haue to sue for it with all kinds of submissions which may expiate what is past, and protect their future obedience. If hitherto, Sir, they haue not done it in such good manner as was to be desired, your Maiesty may be pleased to consider, the feare was giuen them, that their ruine was absolutely resolved; which made them thinke all meanes iust and lawfull to preferre themselves; hath made them shut their eyes to all respect and dutie, and to fix them onely vpon their necessity; yet being already, as soone as it shall please your Maiestic to shew them a good countenance, to cast themselves at your feet, and to poure out their liues for your service. I haue said, Sir, that I presumed most humbly to entreat you for your selfe: for it is your house which is on fire, they are your men which are lost, your blood which is spilt, your treasure which is wasted, your triumphs which are turned into funerals, and when these designs shall succed beyond imagination, you shall haue nothing remaining but desarts and ruines. Suffer an ancient Seruant, Sir, to put you in mind, in what perils they haue sometimes assisted that great King Henry your father, and for how many yeares; and let these their seruices past, hold some place in their account, in deduction of the discontents your Maiestic hath receiued. The chief negotiation consists in you, who can iudge vprightly what assurance is necessary to warrant them from the malice of their ill-willers which hath been but too apparant in these latter yeares. And although they should neither haue counsell nor courage to demand them of your Maiesty, yet it is incident to your naturall bounty and fatherly affection to grant them of your selfe; that is to say, to capitulate properly with your iustice, wherein your authority shall shine absolutely, and it may be, occasion may be soon offered, wherein your Maiesty may employ men of all qualities, and make trial of their courage and fidelitie together. I bend my knees before your Maiestic, and craue pardon for my presumption; beseeching the Creator, that I may see your Maiestic peaceable within, and glorious abroad, to die in this inuincible qualitie, your most humble, &c.

And in the same moneth there was a discourse directed vnto the Queen Mother, whom they knew to be much inclined to a peace, to entreat her to procure it for France, and to be an intercessor to the King her sonne.

Monsieur de Soubise comes into base Poitou.

According to the designe of their Assembly at Rochel, formerly mentioned, Monsieur de Soubise landed the foureteenth of February in base Poitou, neere to Saint Benoit in the mouth of the River of Iard, with three thousand foot, and about three hundred horse, hoping within few dayes to double his troops, the which succeeded: for many of the religion in base Poitou, came vnto him at Marci upon the said River. This descent gaue an alarme to all the countrie, and caused the Earle of Rochefoucault Gouvernor of Poitou to come straight waies to Saint Ermine on the said river of Iard, sending to some Noblemen and for some companies of foot to come vnto him to oppose the enterprises of them of the Religion. But Monsieur de Soubise according to the intelligence which he had with some Catholique Gentlemen, went & surpris'd Sables, D'Olonne, and the castle of Chaume: Those of Sables compounded with him; to be free from spoile; to giue him twenty thousand crownes, a certaine number of iron peeces, and three vessels, all which he receiued: but being entred with some troops, hee forbore not to pillage them for two houres space, whereof the inhabitants complaining vnto him, I had (said he) promised them the spoile before your composition was made. The Earle of Rochefoucault hearing that M. de Soubise his troops increased hourly, and that he had a designe to attempt Talmond: hee sent to entreat the Seigneur of Roche Baritault (who had drawne his friends together)

An encounter betweene Roche Baritault and Cressaniere.

A to put himselfe into the place. Whereupon he parted on the eight and twentieth of February with fourescore horse, and thirtie Muskettiers to goe to Talmond. Cressaniere, whom M. de Soubise had left in Marceil, hearing thereof, resolved to lay in ambuscado for him; but finding that he was past, and not faire, hee pursued him, hoping to finde meanes to fight with him at some passage. Being aduertised of their coming, and seeing no meanes to retire but by flight, hee resolved to fight. Cressaniere seeing him in this resolution founded a charge, where there was a long and obstinate conflict, which continued aboue an houre and a halfe. Roche Baritault fighting long on foot, was wounded, taken, carried away, and afterwards released; there were some other of note slaine, some of the common souldiers, and fiftene taken prisoners. The Earle of Grassay, sonne to Roche Baritault, with his Lieutenant, and thirty of their troope retired safely, with foure prisoners. They of the religion (as they write) lost fiftie persons in the fight, amongst the which were Cressaniere their Leader, and foureene Gentlemen of quality. In the meantime M. de Soubise fortifies the Castle of Chaume: hee meant to besiege Talmond; but hearing that great numbers of men were within it, hee retired his troops. Being aduanced along the Sea shore, towards Saint Giles, and the Ile of Ré, the inhabitants would not suffer him to enter. It is written that he laid; If the Earle of Roche-Foucault came to field, he would vndoubtedly beat him: that if the Earle ioyned his forces with the Duke of Espérons, they should fight; but if the King came, hee would flye away, the which afterwards proued too true.

The estate of the affaires in base Poitou required the Kings presence: They which were inclined and spake for a peace, wished he had not parted from Paris till after Easter, being aduertised from M. d'Esperances, that all the reformed Churches should send their Deputies, with their demands for a peace, and should bee there presently after Easter. But such as could not relish this peace, said; It must needs bee dishonourable, being made with enemies who keep the field, and proclaimed themselves victors both by Sea and land. Hereupon they speedily set downe the estate of their armies, and gaue order to hasten the preparations; and to aduance the munition and carriages to the riuier of Loire. But warre cannot be made without money, and it cannot be recovered but from the people: They that direct the treasure, seeke to draw it with the least oppression that may be. The creation of Offices, and increase of Officers fees being the mildest courses, and the most assured to finde money speedily; which being propounded in Councell, there were twelve Edicts sealed for new Creations, the which were verified in Parliament, the King sitting in his seat of iustice.

Twelve Edicts for the raising of money.

The King after his coming to Paris, had granted the demolition of the Fortifications at Quillebeuf, which would no lesse annoy Paris then Rouen: They had bene much aduanced when the deceased D. of Montpensier was Gouverneur of that Province: the Marshall D'Amers continued them, & they were almost finished by the Constable Luyne, notwithstanding all the complaints of the Parliament of Rouen: a worke which had cost about six hundred thousand crownes. The King had resolved in Councell that they should be demolished and the ditches filled vp, giuing Commission to the Deputies of Rouen for the effecting thereof. The Inhabitants of Quillebeuf, who thought to grow rich by this fortification opposed themselves, threatening to kill and drown all the Labourers which should be sent thither. In the end, the Duke of Longueville, Gouvernor of the Province, and the first President of Rouen, were forced to goe thither with foure companies of Foot to see the demolishment performed, the which was begun and ended with force and armes, to the great grieve of the Inhabitants, the content of the Country, and the ease of them at Rouen.

The fortifications at Quillebeuf razed.

The King, before his departure for Poitou, meant to reconcile the Duke of Nevers with the Prince of Ioyville, incited one against another for a quarrell which happened the yeare before between the said Duke, and the Cardinal of Guise deceased, in the house of Monsieur Guines, a Councillor in the great Councell, where the Prince Ioyville accompanying his brother the Cardinal, had stricken the Seigneur of Marsetot, Master of Requests of the Kings house, who managed the Dukes affaires. The Cardinal of Guise at his death had craued pardon of the Duke of Nevers, who remained satisfied, so as the Duke had no spleene but against the Prince of Ioyville, whom his Maiestic would himselfe reconcile, causing this Act following to be drawne the 19 of March, 1622.

The Duke of Nevers and Prince Ioyville reconciled.

Monsieur

Monsieur de Nevers, I am duly informed and satisfied of your obedience to my commandments, in that soliciting a suite between you and the deceased Cardinall of Guise, you were not accompanied in your Carrosse, but with such a number of Gentlemen as I had limited, vpon that which had past in the house of the reporter, where the Cardinall and Prince Joanville his brother went to seeke you: the Cardinall thinking that in some writings you had done him wrong, was transported with choller, and gaue you a blow with his hand vpon the head; and you returned it with thrusting him backe with the like stroke: which wrong the Cardinall hauing acknowledged at his death, demanded pardon of you, and you haue rested satisfied; yet, for that your spleene continues still against the Prince Joanville, who did accompany him; he doth assure you, that if he had knowne his brothers intention, he would haue sought to dissuade him, or at least not accompanied him, acknowledging that this action was done by surprize and aduantage: that you had not your Sword when you were stricke, and that as soone as the Gentleman of your horse had giuen it you, you did endeavor to witness the feeling a generous Prince ought to haue vpon such an affront: And the P. Joanville assures you, that when he drew his sword putting himselfe between you and the said Cardinall, his purpose was not but to prevent some greater mischief which might for euer make both your Families irreconcilable: confessing likewise that diuers times since you haue endeauoured by all honourable means to be righted by him; and that my foresight and authority onely haue hindered the deciding hereof by armes. And as for that which concerns the Seigneur of Marefcot, the said Prince Joanville declares, That the opinion he had that the said Marefcot did nourish this strife between you, prouoked him, being in choler to see him present, to strike him with his sword: and for that he hath the honour to be of my Councill, and a Master of requests of my household, and that you shew a discontent for that with my leaue hee deales in your affaires, the said Prince Joanville saith, That he is very fory, and would not haue done it but for the former cause; and being loath to omit any thing that may content you, he will giue him when you please, or euen now, such contentment as you and he shall rest satisfied. In all which your generous carriage being well knowne to all men, and to him in particular, the suspition you had of his intention being wholly taken away by his declaration, the offer to content Marefcot for your sake, and the desire he shewes to haue to embrace that good correspondency which should bee cherished between Cousins-germans, I conceiue that all this should giue you content and satisfaction; And therefore in reason, and by my authority I desire and command you to forget what is past, to embrace one another, and to continue friends. I will also that vpon your reconciliation, such as accompanied you, forget whatsoever hath past in their particular. Which done, the Prince Joanville, directing himselfe to the Seigneur of Marefcot, said; Monsieur Marefcot, I am very fory, for the loue of Monsieur de Nevers, to haue stricken you, I pray you forget it, and I will be one of your friends. To whom he answered; Sir, seeing that M. de Nevers is content, I am also satisfied.

The Kings second voyage into Poictou.

The next day being Palme Sunday, the King parted in the afternoon for his voyage into Poictou, going without any late to Blois: His Guards both French and Suisse were sent with all speede downe the riuer of Loire towards Saumur. Being at Orleans, he receiued aduertisement from the Duke d'Esclignieres of the reduction of Poussin, which towne, with that of Bay, hindered the free commerce vpon the Riuer of Rofne, betweene Lions and Marfeilles.

Reduction of Poussin and Bay

The Duke hauing sent to perswade Blacons, who commanded in these two townes, to conforme himselfe to the order which he had set downe for the peace of Dauphiné, seeing that these two places depended on the country of Valentinois. Whereunto hee answered, That they depended not of the government of Dauphiné, but of Viueretz, and therefore belonged to Lanquedoc: that he was not resolved to yeild them but by the consent of the Assembly of base Languedoc and Viueretz. This answer drew the Duke from Grenoble in the end of February, meaning to besiege Poussin, which Blacons had greatly fortified. Hee inuested the towne, and planted his battery speedily vpon a little hil which did much annoy them. In the end he made a breach, which the Seigneur of Grange vndertook to assault with his Regiment, but they entertained them with such resistance, as he was glad to make his retreat, lost many of his men, & himselfe hurt. He was seconded by the E. of Tallard, who, in the beginning forced the besieged to retire. Hee

A He recovered their walls thrice, but yet they defended the breach with such furie; as in the end they left it being not held reasonable. The Cannon being readie to play againe, and the Duke hauing built a fort, Blacons offered to yeild the place vpon certaine conditions: After much contestation, the towne being important and strong, the Duke yeilded to these Articles, all with the Kings good liking, and not otherwise. 1. That the Seigneur of Blacons should come forth of the towne, with armes and baggage, and should haue the towne of Bay vpon Bay in government. 2. That the Gouernors of the towne and castle of Poussin which were to be changed by the Duke d'Esclignieres, should not withstanding be of the Religion. 3. That the garison also which was to be established there should be of the Religion. 4. And as for Bay vpon Bay, that the like conditions should be observed in the reduction thereof. 5. Finally, that there should no hurt or damage be done vnto the inhabitants of the said places in their persons or goods. According to this agreement the Duke made Gouernor of the Castle of Poussin d'Allons Gouernor of Serres in Dauphiné, a Gentleman of the Religion; and of the towne of La Roche de Grange, one of the Religion also, and the garisons of the same Bay vpon Bay was rendred vpon the same conditions, and Blacons made Gouernor thereof.

Prince Ioanville enables the Constables widow.

The King being at Blois, the Prince of Ioanville went thither, to craue his leaue and permission to marrie with the Constable of Luynes widow, to whom hee was already made sure, conditionally, that as soone as the Nuptials were performed, he should repaire vnto his Maiestie againe with all speed. Being come backe to Paris, hee espoused the said Ladie in the Castle of Lusigny, where the wedding was kept with great magnificence. The Prince of Conde, all the House of Lorraine, the Duke of Nevers, the Duke of Montbazon, the Duke of Chaulne, and many great Personages were invited therunto.

A resolution to demolish the fortifications at Saumur.

The King (hauing made some stay at Blois and Tours) came to Saumur to take order with his Councill for some matters concerning that place: Hee had bene aduertised, that they of the Religion in that towne had beene very factious, and that they had practised with Monsieur de Souffie to surpriue the place, by the means of some souldiers of the Garison whom they had corrupted. The King went to Councill with the Princes and Noblemen, where they were made acquainted with the great charges of the towne of Saumur, for the maintenance of such a garison, whereupon the King resolved, the fortifications should be demolished in the suburbs, and ordely a garison of three hundred men left in the towne and castle, with a company of light horse.

The King comes to Nantes.

The King continuing his voyage, and causing his troops to aduance both by water and land, he came to Nantes on the tenth of April, where hearing what troopes the Earle of Rochefoucault had in base Poictou, being three thousand foot, and four hundred horse, he sent vnto him to be ready when he should call for him. He enformed himselfe of Souffie his designs; what way they could take to come into Britany; what forces he had, and what shipping he had brought from Rochel, and what meanes there were to charge him and defeat him by land. He resolved to aduance with his armie, vpon an aduice giuen by the Earle of Rochefoucault, who found the enemies army easie to be defeated, if his Maiestie tooke a fit time and aduanced his army with speed.

The King sends to attend the Ile of Rie.

The King had sent the Seigneur of Boisfargrois who was well acquainted with those Countries of base Poictou, to put himselfe into the Ile of Rie, and to defend it with the inhabitants, whom he found ready to capitulate with Monsieur de Souffie, assuring them that the King would come to succor them within two dayes; whereupon they planted two small peeces of iron, with the which they kept them from entering that day into the Island. The next day, Monsieur de Souffie found another passage whereby he entred, but this resistance gaue the King time to approach and was the cause of his ruine.

Boisfargrois returns to the King, and assures him that if he would charge Souffie in the Ile of Rie, he doubted not but to find him a passage both for horse and foot. This Ile of Rie is enuironed with an arme of the sea, and is five leagues in length, and two leagues broad, in which there are great marshes: vpon the firme land are the Burroughes of Rie, Saint Giles point, Saint Hillary, La Barre du Pont, our Lady of Pont, and Saint Iohn de Mons. Some were of opinion they should not attempt the Island, being of hard access, and that the enemy had six thousand foot, and about five hundred horse, three peeces of brasse Ordnance, and foure of iron: the King indeed had more men, but no ordnance. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, he resolved to see if Souffie had any courage to attend him. Vpon this resolution, the Earle of Rochefoucault was sent for to come the next day with his troops to ioyne with the Kings armie between Aispremont and Cominques, where the whole armie met, and the King tooke vp his quarter at Châlans, within a league of Rie.

On the next day by two a'clocke in the morning, the King was on horsebacke, and according to his former deliberation of assaulting the Ile in two places, the Prince of Conde had charge to march along the Dike of Perie with the Regiments of the guards of Normandy, and the Earle of Rochefoucault to set vpon Saint Giles Point with his troops of horse, and the Regiments of Estillac, Rainville, and Saint Vincent. The King with the body of the army according to their successe was to succour them. Monsieur de Soubise made shew to defend the entry of the Iland, and to charge the Regiments of the guards with his horse and foot, but he retired to Rie without fight. His Maiesty hauing bene 15 houres on horsebacke, camped at Saint Iohn de Mons, and there fed his troops, staying for the ebb to passe the Channell of Saint Giles called Bessé, the which he did about midnight, being fife hundred paces broad, the foot-men wading vp to the middle.

The Kings army is put in battell, but as they write, Monsieur de Soubise's troops were partly embarked, the rest cried for mercy, casting away their armes: but the Persants to be reuenged slew many. Monsieur de Soubise fled with his horse, and abandoned his Cannon.

On the 16 of April, the King marched with his forces to the Crosse of Rie, diuided from Saint Giles by an arme of the Sea, where he defeated all the foot, and part of their horse. Many cast themselves into Barkes to flye to Rochel, but being aground they were most of them slaine. There were fix or seuen hundred prisoners taken. At the same time the King sent to the Earle of Rochefoucault being at Saint Giles, to inuest the Castle of Chaume with three thousand men, which vpon the first summons yielded, vpon condition to haue their liues saved. Monsieur de Soubise fled to Rochel, where he was receiued with little fauour.

After this, there was some contestation about the prisoners of quality, namely, for the Earle of Marenier, and La Motte Saint Seuerin. The Duke of Vendosme, Monsieur Schomberg and Humieres, sued for their pardons, or at the least that they might be ransomed. The Prince opposed himselfe, saying that they were vnworthy of any grace. It was referred to Councell, and afterwards all men of quality were entreated as prisoners of warre, but of the souldiers about six hundred were caried to Nantes, where of some sixteen were hanged, and the rest condemned to the gallies for euil.

The Duke of Eslinguieres, seeing the King resolved to force them of the Religion, sent Monsieur de Buillon to his Maiesty being at Nyort, to make their submissions, and to disauow all the reuolts which had bene made against him since the last troubles: He saluted his Maiesty on the Dukes behalfe, with all the protestations of a good subject. The King receiued Buillon graciously, and made it knowne, hee did no lesse affect him, then the Duke whose businesse hee did manage. Hee let the King vnderstand, that many townes which had sent him, besought his Maiesty to receiue them into his protection, and to accept of their seruice, promising neuer to embrace any other party but his. Hee had diuers audiences, where the King made it knowne, with what affection he embraced those which with a generous mind came willingly to submit themselves vnto his lawes, and how much he desired rather to reduce his subjects by mildnesse and clemency, then by force and the rigor of armes, whereupon the Deputies of euery towne in particular were sent backe with all assurances of his good intentions.

Monsieur de Soubise being returned to Rochel after this great defeat, fell into a generall hatred of the multitude; reproaching him with his poore carriage, and for so great a losse of the body of Religion, so as soone after he resolved to make a voyage into England, to procure some succors, but it had no great successe.

The King came into Xaintonge, and past by Saint Iohn D'Angely, to see the end of the demolishing. He was put in ialousie of the Castle of Taillebourg, which belonged vnto the Duke of Tremouille, who had contained himselfe within the bounds of Neutrality, and would not embarrake himselfe with the Rochellers, foreseeing the storme which threatened them, neither yet ioyne himselfe to the Kings party, for that hee would

A giue no ialousie to the other, giuing alwayes vnto his Maiesty an entry into his Townes when he pleased. The King resolved to see if any of the townes which the yeare before had vowed all obedience, would mutine against his army. The Gouernor of Taillebourg seeing the King neere, resolved to offer his seruice like a faithfull subject, as hee had done the yeare before, imagining his Maiesty would haue bene contented with his offer. The King receiued him with all courtesie, but withall hee commanded Monsieur du Halier to take some troops of horse and foot to visit the place, and see if the effects were answerable to the Gouernors promises. Vpon his approach, the Inhabitants grew into a mutiny, some would open the gates, and some refused to let Monsieur du Halier enter, who presently sent word thereof vnto his Maiesty, and in the mean time he sent to aduertise the Townsmen, that if they did not render, they would presently cut off their Gouernors head before the gates, which at first moued them not, but when they saw a scaffold preparing, to saue their Gouernor they receiued the Kings troops into the Castle, into which du Halier put a strong garison. There was found great quantity of munition and armes for fixe thousand men, with 25 peeces of Cannon. This newes was brought vnto the King at Xaintes, who sent backe the Gouernor into his place, with commandement to draw nothing into the Castle.

The King being at Nyort, resolved to besiege Royan, who had suffered themselves to be surprisid, and was fortified by Monsieur de Soubise, and the Seigneur of Fauas, seruing as a backe-doore to them of Rochel, to come forth and roue vp and downe all the plaines of Xaintonge; and now his Maiesty being come to Xaintes, he sent the Duke of Espernon with foure thousand men to inuest it, who soone became Master of the suburbs, lodging therein two Regiments: And vpon the newes of the Kings approach in person, and the Cannons coming to batter it, he which commanded therein vnder Monsieur de Fauas, had already sent vnto Monsieur D'Espernon to yeeld the towne vpon an honorable composition, which being almost agreed vpon, Monsieur de Fauas ariues with succors, breaks off the treaty, and wrakes his anger vpon the said Capitaine. Thus Royan resolves for a siege.

The Kings army approached, planted their Cannon, forced their out-works, and downe a bastion called Soubise: the besieged blew vp a Myne, where many Noblemen and Gentlemen were slaine, and amongst others, the Seigneur of Humieres much lamented, with 80 souldiers.

In the end, seeing they could keepe the place no longer after the taking of these two bastions, they demanded a composition, with pardon, which his Maiesty granted vpon these Articles. 1. He gaue life and liberty to his subjects of what qualitie soeuer being in Royan. 2. He suffered them to retire by sea or land whither soeuer they would in all safety, except into the Ile of Argenton and Medoc, and to carie away their armes and baggage, except their cannon, munition, and victuals. 3. That they should restore to the Seigneur of Saint Surin, what soeuer did belong to him and those that went out with him, with their ships, or the value thereof. 4. That they should set at liberty Monsieur de Poussie, and other prisoners taken in Royan, where soeuer they were, for the which they should giue hostages. 5. That his subjects of Royan should liue in libertie of conscience according to his Edicts. 6. That all men might retire to their houses, and liue vnder the benefit of his Edicts, hauing made declaration, for the which they should haue passports, and they which would not make vse of this grace, should promise not to carry arms against his Maiesty. 7. That they should deliuer vp the place within fixe houres.

According to this capitulation, the besieged left their Cannon in Royan, and retired to Rochel by Sea, with their armes and baggage. The King made Drouet Capitaine of the Regiment of the guards Gouernour of this place, with three hundred men in garison.

The King being at this siege, hee had two seuerall aduertisements, the one pleasing, the other distastfull: The first was the yeelding of Toncins, and the other the reuolt of Mont de Marfan, with the Marquis of Castelnau their Gouernour. Toncins had endured all the discommodities which might bee, as well by the want of victuals and munition of warre, as in regard of the infection, the towne being finall, and the multitude of sicke and wounded men. Monsieur de la Force had twice attempted to relieue it, being forced to retire with losse. The Duke D'Alen would would haue them yeeld at discretion, and they resolved to dye rather then to doe it.

The length of this siege did much import the Kings desire to passe into Languedoc. Whereupon the Duke vpon the fourth of May granted these Articles following to Monseigneur de Montpauillon and the besieged.

Articles of composition.

- 1 That they should demand a generall pardon for all that had bene attempted against the Kings seruice.
- 2 That they should sweare and protest not to carie armes for six moneths against his Maiestie.
- 3 That in consideration thereof, they should depart out of Tonneins with their armes and baggage, their matches dead.
- 4 That they should leaue all the Cannon and Munition.
- 5 That they should haue boats or carts to carie away their sicke in safety, or to remain there to be cured.
- 6 That they should haue passports to retire whither they pleased.

This Capitulation being faithfully performed, Monseigneur de Montpauillon and the Viscount of Casters died within three dayes after of their wounds: and on the Kings side there died at this siege, the Marquis D'Ambre, and Cornuillon great Seneschall of Thoulouse. After which the three townes of Tonneins were set on fire, for a punishment of their revolt.

The result of Mont de Marfan, and the reduction.

The Marquis of Castelnaud Governor of Mont de Marfan, and Seneschall of the Country, had during these last troubles continued firme in the Kings seruice; in regard whereof, he had given him an hundred men more in garison: but growing discontented for that he had not employment according to his desire, and pressed by some who perswaded him, that if he were master of the place, it would aduance a treaty of peace, which would be profitable for them of the Religion: he draws souldiers secretly into the castle, and on the first of May he sends a prisoner to be kept in the old Castle with twelve Muskettiers, the next day he draws two hundred horse and foure hundred foot into the town and dismaies the inhabitants. The first President of Bourdeaux who had alwaies strict correspondency with the Marquis for the Kings seruice, hearing this unexpected newes, sent presently vnto him to let him vnderstand, that whatsoever he had done might be excused by his friends, and that he might retire himselfe with aduantage. Presently the Lieutenant Criminal arrived at Bourdeaux, letting the President vnderstand, that he was come with aduice of the Marquis and his confident friends, by his meanes to retire him from the danger (whereinto some factious spirits and the discontent he had against some inhabitants, had ingaged him) and the towne and country from the ruine which threatened them, who if he might be protected and those which assisted him, and that in recompence of his charges and the government of the towne and castle (the onely recompence of 50 yeares seruice done by his father and brother lately slaine, the one before Montauban, the other before Tonneins) he would deliuer the place vnto whom it pleased the King.

The importance of the result of Mont de Marfan.

The first President considering how much this siege of this place would crosse the Kings designs, and hinder the progresse of his armes, hauing a resolution after the taking of Royan to reduce Saint Foy, Montlanguin, and Clerac, and so to passe into Languedoc, hauing nothing so pretious as time: That the place might well be fortified and defended, hauing many men within it, and that the country round about could hardly feed the Kings army eight dayes: that the entertainment of the Governor and Garison cost the King yearly eight thousand Crownes, and that for these 50 yeares it had bene held among the townes of furetie, for that the Gouvernors were of the Religion, and that the malecontents had no other retreat in Beane and Gasconie: he returns the Lieutenant Criminal with all speed to the Marquis and his friends, with a promise to procure for his Maiestie the greatest recompence hee could, and an assurance to deliuer twenty thousand Crownes presently, to any one he should make choice of in the Prouince, and his Maiesties approbation for all which had past in Mont de Marfan, for the which hee engaged his word and faith. Hee entreats him to appoint one to receiue the money, and to set downe a day when he would deliuer the place: hee conuerts him to doe it speedily, and in the meane time to make vse of the Governor of Royans misfortune, whom his owne men shut out of the gates, and that hee would haue a cart to himselfe and the place.

The

A The first President aduertised the King what he had concluded, as if he had had an ample commission, considering the benefit would redound to his seruice, and the danger delay would bring, either by the change of the Marquis minde, or by some enterprize, which such as he had drawne into the towne might make vpon his place or person. His Maiestie allowed of this Treatie, commanded the Earl of Schonberg to furnish the money presently, and doth aduertise the Prince of Conde thereof (being gone the day before to Bourdeaux) to whom he recommended the execution. In the meane time the first President receiued two generall messengers from the Marquis with certaine conditions: That hee held it not fit to deliuer the place, before he had disposed such as did assist him, to retire to their houses, and to that end to let them see the Kings Pardon verified, and a Passport, fearing that returning to their houses, they might be taken by the Troopes of La Motte Gondrin and Poyanne. The President acquaints the Prince of Conde herewith, and intreats him to write in such sort to the Marquis, as his Letters may bee a new assurance of the Kings approbation, and a Pardon and Passport for his friends: The Prince to hasten the execution of this Treatie, deliuered 30000 crownes (appointed for the payment of such troopes as he had brought from Royan, and binds himselfe with the first President for the rest, giuing charge to the Seigneur of Poyanne, to receiue the place, and to keepe it till his Maiestie had otherwise disposed thereof.

Vpon the receipt of these Letters the Marquis dismissed his friends, and deliuers the place accordingly; the which a month after, by order from his Maiestie, Poyanne resigned to the Mayor and Jurats, who by vertue of a Commission from his Maiestie razed the Castle, and bound all the inhabitants of the reformed religion to depart the Towne, to free them from suspicion, and popular sedition, during these combustions.

About this time John Paul de L'Escur, sometime a Councillor in the Councill of Pau, and Deputy in Court for the Churches of Beane, was taken at Cozes in Xaintonge, with many Commissions for the leauing of souldiers. He was sent to Bourdeaux, where the Court of Parliament made a quick dispatch of him: for vpon the examination of some Witneses, and the verification of his own hand-writing, he was condemned to be drawn through all the streets vpon a Hurdle, with a writing vpon his head, containing GUILTY OF

D High Treason, and President in the assembly at Rochel: and so brought before the Palace there to doe penance in his shirt vpon his knees with a halter about his necke, barcheaded and barefoot, holding in his hand a burning Torch of two pound weight: After which, to haue his head cut off, and his body quartered, for that, said the sentence, he had wickedly and maliciously assisted and presided in the said assembly at Rochel; and in qualitie of President signed commissions, to leauy souldiers against the Kings seruice and authoritie, and had assisted in the Councill of iustice, established in Rochel, by authoritie of the Assembly, to iudge soveraignly of the life and goods of the Kings subiects: and withall, that he had made a booke, entituled, The Persecution of the Reformed Churches of Beane, which Booke and Commissions were condemned to be burnt: His posterity was declared base and ignoble, and all his goods confiscate to the King.

In the end of the last yeare, the King had by his Letters Patents declared the Duke of Rohan guilty of High Treason; but they had not bene sent to the Parliament to be verified, in regard of the conference which was then made for a Peace: which being broken off, and there being no more hope, they were now sent to Paris and verified. By the which he was deprived of all honour, Dignities, Offices, Governements, Pensions, Priviledges and Prerogatives, and commandement given to all men to seize vpon his person. Whereupon the Earle of Rochefortcaule, was made Gouverneur and Lieutenant General in Poictou in the Dukes place.

After the reduction of Royan, the King stayed some dayes in his Campe, to resolve vpon three points. First, for the preservation of Poictou, Xaintonge, Aulnix, & against the enterprizes of the Rochellers. Secondly, to free the Riuer of Garonne, Bourdelois, and Medoc, from the Ports of Soulaç, and the Ile of Argenton, held by Fauas and Boisse, for them of Rochel. Thirdly, Touching his voyage into Languedoc by the Riuer of Dordogne, and in passing, to reduce Saint Foy, and Clerac, which had revolted; the Gouvernors of which places had sent vnto his Maiestie for pardon.

For the first, the King appointed the Earle of Soissons, assisted by the Marshal of Vetry, to command the army which he resolved to leaue in Poictou, Xaintonge, and Aulnix; as well well to retaine each one in his duty; as also to inuest and blocke vp Rochel both by Sea A and Land.

For the second, it was resolved, to send the Earle of Auria Marshall of the Campe, into Medoc, with 1000 men, and two Culierins: whereof hauing aduertised the first President of Bourdeaux, he presently sent the Seigneur of Aspalais vnto his Maiestie to let him vnderstand, that this expedition would cause a great combustion in all Medoc, which since the encounter at Saint Viuban, had not bene troubled by the reuolted: That he had hope that if Fauas did not shortly yeeld vp his place by treatie, vnto his Maiesties obedience, he should either surprize or force it. He represented the same vnto the Prince of Conde being at Bourdeaux.

At the same time the President hearing that Fauas was gone to Rochel, vpon diuers occasions; and that there were few men left in Soulac, they caused some of the principall to be dealt withall, to take a recompence for the place; and withall caused it to bee inuested by two Companies, making preparation to force it: whereupon they parleyed, and on the nine and twentieth of May yeelded the place into the hands of Aspalais, to haue their lues and goods saued, vpon condition they should not cary away any ornaments of the Church nor graine, and in recompence, the first President gaue one hundred and fifty Pistols, and a Barque, as they had demanded: but being embarqued with their armes and goods, they saw certaine long boats armed, which attended to take them, finding too late, that they had not demanded a safe conduct in their Capitulation; so as they were presently taken prisoners. As for the Fort in Argenton, held by Baiffe, it was not yeelded till Iune.

Touchnig the Kings voyage into Languedoc, by the Riuer of Dordone; they said hee was bound vnto it, and that he should make vse of the losses his enemies had receiued, during the siege of Tonneins, there being slaine in diuers combats; about two thousand of their best souldiers, and about fifty men of command, most of the which had bene in Montrauban, during the siege: That Monsieur de la Force, who was in Saint Foy, and the Marquis of Lufignan in Clerac, had promised to submit themselves to the Kings obedience, if his Maiestie came with his armie.

Hereupon he sent the Prince of Conde with part of his troopes towards Saint Foy, D and gaue commandement to the Duke of Elbeuf (who was yet with his forces about Tonneins) to come thither.

Vpon the way, the Prince assured himselfe of the Townes of Genfac, Monsecuq, and Esmet. Monsi: de la Force, seeing Saint Foy inuested, desired a conference with Monsieur de Lomenie, Secretarie of State; where making shew of great repentance for his former errors, with a desire to submit himselfe wholly to the Kings clemency, hee presented Articles for his reduction, his childrens, and the Nobilitie which had followed him: and for the townes of Saint Foy, and Montflanquin, beseeching his Maiestie to giue them a fauourable answer.

These Articles being brought to the King, he made these following Answers; where- E by he found that his Maiestie remembered not what was past, but gratified him for his gouernments and charges, wherof he had disposed.

1, Your Maiesties most humble and obedient subjects, making profession of the Religion in Saint Foy, humbly beseech you to beleecue, that next to their duties to God, they haue nothing in greater esteeme, then to yeeld you the humble seruice, and perfect obedience they owe you, in submitting themselves to your clemencie and bounty: and to liue the more happily vnder the benefit of your Edicts. They humbly beseech you to giue them a generall abolition and pardon for all things which haue past since the first of February 1620.

Anf. Granted.

2, His Maiestie is also humbly intreated to allow of their new fortifications, and of all iudgements and condemnations, giuen and executed by the authoritie of the Consuls, and other officers of Iustice to that effect; and generally of all things done and committed since the first of February 1620.

Anf. Granted.

3, That the exercise of their Religion should be free as at this present, according to the Edicts of Pacification; and that all men, of what qualitie soeuer should en- Ioy

4, All iudgements and Decrees of death and confiscation of goods, giuen against the inhabitants of Saint Foy, without lawfull defence since the first of Februarie, should be void and of no force; and the parties to be restored to their former estate.

Anf. Granted.

5, And to witnesse vnto his royall Maiestie the great desire the inhabitants had to make knowne their obedience and fidelitie, they submitted themselves, to execute in all B points, whatsoever his Maiestie should please to ordaine for the demolishing of their fortifications: yet they humbly besought him, to grant them their walls and old ditches, with their Draw-bridge, Ruelins, and other things profitable for their preservation, wishing they might be so happy as that his Maiestie would wholly rely vpon them for the demolishings, yet referring it to his pleasure, and beseeching him to vse the mildest and lightest means that might be; and that if any souldiers should be left there to that end, they might be discharged when the worke was finished.

Anf. The King granted them an old wall, and the rest was referred to his comming to Saint Foy, wherof hee would dispose with the least discommoditie which might be for the inhabitants.

C 6, And in regard of the great Expences, the Consuls and inhabitants haue been forced to vndergoe since the said first day of February; it may please his Maiestie to grant them Letters freely, to impose vpon the towne and iurisdiction thereof, the summe of sixe hundred pound sterling, to be leauied in two yeares.

Anf. Granted.

7, That nothing might be altered in their Artillerie and Munitions, but to be left in their possession as before.

Anf. That his Maiestie would dispose of it as his pleasure.

8, Likewise they beseech his Maiestie most humbly, to free them of the passage of his Armie, considering the extreme necessitie of the Country.

Anf. Granted.

D 9, All Noblemen, Gentlemen, Captaines and Souldiers, of what qualitie and condition soeuer, shall promise and sweare, well and faithfully to serue the King, vnder the benefit of his Edicts, and to enioy peaceably their goods.

Anf. All such as are in Saint Foy, or elsewhere, whose names Monsi: de la Force shall presently present, shall enioy the benefit of this present Article, if so be within fixe dayes they accept thereof, and doe moreover take an oath of fidelitie.

10, His Maiestie is most humbly intreated to restore Monsi: de la Force and his children vnto their Charges, Dignities, and Pensions, or to giue them recompence, and to haue consideration of the great losses which he hath suffered; and in like manner E that his Maiestie would be pleased to restore the Seigneur of Contenant, to his gouernment of Bergerac.

Anf. His Maiestie grants the place of a Marshall of France vnto Monsieur de la Force, and the summe of 200000 crownes in recompence of his and his childrens places: the one mortie to be paid at Paris, vpon sight of the Letter; and the other in the end of the yeare, and all Pensions granted to his children to be continued.

11, That it may be lawfull for all Noblemen, Gentlemen, Captaines, Souldiers, and others, of what qualitie soeuer, which haue assisted Monsieur de la Force, and his children, since the first of February 1620, to retire with all safety whither they please with their armes, horses, and baggage.

Anf. Granted.

F 12, His Maiestie is humbly intreated to grant them a generall Pardon, for all things done and past, since the first of February 1620.

Anf. Granted.

13, That they may enioy the free exercise of their Religion, in all places, as they had done before these combustions.

Anf. The King will cause his Edicts to be executed.

14, All iudgements and Decrees, giuen against the said men of warre, or others which haue assisted these Noblemen, and haue not bene heard and lawfully defended, shall be void

18, That it would please his Maiestie to haue consideration of such as had been named to Monseur de Villeaux Clercs, for the gratifications which had been promised.

Answ. Granted.

19, The Earle of Vauguion, and all other Souldiers which are in Saint Foy shall be set at libertie, and in like manner his Maiestie shall cause all such as are prisoners in the Armie, commanded by the Duke of Elbeuf, and taken since the first of February 1620, in base Guienne to be deliuered, be they Catholiques, or of the reformed Religion. These Articles being signed, the Prince and Duke D'Elbeuf entred into Saint Foy, on the foure and twentieth of May, to draw out the Garison. The keeper of the Seales hauing taken the oath of allegiance from the Magistrates, and the regiments of the guards hauing seized vpon the Poits, his Maiestie entred the next day, where he carefully visited the place and fortifications.

The reduction
of Clerac.

He left the towne on the eight and twentieth of May, with some troopes therein, vntill they had razed the fortifications, and sent part of his armie with the Duke of Vendosme, for the reduction of Clerac, which had been mediated by one Duc a Councillor of Bourdeaux who was a prisoner. Vpon the surprize of the towne, the first President of Bourdeaux had caused two of the Marquis his daughters to be stayed there, with five cheifs of his greatest wealth; whereof being aduertised, hee told the Councillor that hee would not put him to ransom, but desired his liberty, and withall intreated him to be a means to free his two daughters, and to haue restitution of his goods. Hee also sent presently to the first President, letting him vnderstand that no man was better acquainted with his continuall zeale to the Kings seruice, yea, in these last alterations; that for his requittall he had been deprived of his government without recompence; driven for a long time from his house of Lusignan, ransacked and spoiled with a Garison, and threatened to haue it demolished; which had caused him to seek some refuge and assurance by an enterprize vpon Clerac. That although by the practice of his enemies hee were thrust out of the Kings fauour, yet he desired nothing more then to returne to his obedience, and that restoring vnto him his daughters, his moueables, & the townemen of Clerac, whom they detained prisoners, he was content to set at libertie Duc the Councillor, and all the Church-men and seculars which were taken in Clerac.

Five thousand pound sterling.

The first President in the answer which he made vnto him, exhorted him to haue recourse vnto the Kings clemencie, assured him the fiftie thousand Franks which he demanded; and besides that the inhabitants of Clerac should be discharged of 50000 crownes which they had promised: That he would beseech his Maiestie to honour him with the Government of Clerac, and to grant him a most ample abolition for all which was past in the surprize of the towne, which was all that hee or the inhabitants could desire.

Prisoners set at liberty
at Clerac.

In the same time after some passages to & fro, the Marquis his daughters & his goods were sent backe; and the Councillor with the Abbot of Clerac, and some other Prisoners set at libertie. Duc the Councillor comming to the King, he sent him backe to Clerac, to treat

A treat with the Marquis vpon these conditions, that yielding the towne to his Maiesties obedience, he did grant them a general pardon, for all faults committed against his authoritie. That they should haue free exercise of the reformed Religion in the towne of Clerac, according to the Edict of Nantes: That his Maiestie also did discharge the inhabitants of the payment of fifty thousand crownes due vnto him: That he granted vnto the Marquis of Lusignan, (as a testimonie of the trust he reposed in his fidelitie) the gouernment of the said towne of Clerac, and the summe of five thousand pound sterling, in recompence of the government of Puenteil, which he was possessed of; as also to see him paid his Pensions hereafter, and to bestow his fauour and benefits on him, as he should endeavour to deserve. Wherevpon the Marquis and inhabitants submitted themselves, and receiued the Duke of Vendosme, two leagues without Clerac, farre thither with some part of the Kings Armie, to receive their submission.

The next day Duc the Councillor presented the Marquis, the Consuls, and chiefe inhabitants of Clerac, vnto the King at Agen with these words:

The submission of the Consuls of Clerac by Monseur du Vau.

Sir, behold the Consuls and inhabitants of your Towne of Clerac, who come to offer their obedience, by my mouth, with all respect and submission. They had intreated mee to represent their humbled hearts, and sorrow for their errors: but Sir, I dare not do it. Methinks I heare you say: I will none of these hearts hardened in their rebellion: these hearts of flint, whom my mildnesse could not tame: the examples of their neighbours instruct; nor my chastilements amend. These refractarie hearts for whom I haue now the third time come from the furthest parts of my Realme, endured the injuries of the weather, runne the hazard of my life, so deare and necessarie to my subiects, and yet could not be assured of their conquest. You haue reason, Sir, if you take counsell of your iustice, she will not onely make you reject the offer, as insolent and fruitlesse to your Maiestie, but also to punish the presumption. But if you giue leave to your Clemencie to giue her aduice, seeing she hath been hitherto so witty and politique for your enemies, as it seemes she hath had intelligence with them to advance their designs, and to keepe backe yours; beleeue, she will make this offer very pleasing vnto you. She will tell you, Sir, that the dislike of Kings should be without Armes, and their choller without sting, that they must pardon some, being as it were ashamed to be reuenged on others, and draw backe their hands, as if it were from those creatures which pollute them, when they are crucified: she will tell you that the lustre of your armes, will be more pleasing entring into Clerac, when as they shall serue but as ornaments and shew, then when as the last yeare they were instruments of your reuenge: she will let you see their breasts; and I thinke, Sir, that you shall see their repentance, with heauy hammers breaking and bruising their hearts, which haue so often giuen consent to their crimes.

Is it not true you ill aduised spirits, that you would die presently at the Kings feet, to witness your sorrow and repentance, if the desire which you haue to amend, did not make you desire life? The foulness of your offences makes you so hideous vnto your selues, as you should not dare to present your selues before his Maiesticall presence, if you were not fully resolved by some notable seruice, to deface those blemishes which make you so foule and vnpleasing. If they euer faile, Sir, to yeeld the obedience which they owe you: If they euer breathe any thing against your seruice: If their cares be euer open to those whisperers which haue so often enchanted them: If they euer bow their knees against vnto Rochel, that Idol of Rebellion: If they take for a guide that supposd opinion, that your Maiestie would deprive them of the libertie of their consciences: Finally, if they be euer what they haue beene, and become not truly what they should be; let them feeble the rigour of your iustice, as you now make them taste of your Clemencie. For my part, as I am an Intercessor in fauour of their repentance, I will become their aduersie party in hatred of their obduracy if they fall into a relapse: and as I haue beene a mediator for their gracious reconciliation, I will be the solicitor to pursue their rigorous punishment.

In the beginning of Iune the King came to Agen, where hee receiued the submissions of the Duke of Sully, who offered all the places hee held in that countrie; namely, Pigeac, Tardillac, Cadinae and Cariac. From thence he came to Moulillac, where he diuided his troopes. He sent some towards Montauban, vnder the command of the Duke of Vendosme to keepe them in: Monseur Zamet had charge to goe with five hundred Masters into base Languedoc, to ioyne with the Duke of Memorencie, and Montf. de Chaffillon, A and to spoile the Countrie about Nismes, and Montpellier, thereby to annoy the inhabitants and drive them to wint.

Before the King past from Blay, to enter into base Guennie, certaine stranger Ships, whereof some were English, but most Hollanders, lying in the river before Bourdeaux, to take in their ladings of Wine, Corne, and other commodities, the Prince of Conde being then within the towne, and seeing the ships fraught with Wine and Corne, (thinking perchance that this provision went for the reliefe of Rochel: but others have written that he meant to make these ships to serve as men of warre against the Rochellers) he commanded them to bring them aground, the which they refused to doe: whereupon the B Prince commanded the Castle to shoor at them, and they spared not their Ordnance against the towne, so as one of the ships was sunk with the towne Cannon, and the Merchants much damnaifed, whereof they made great complaints in Holland. The King hearing what had past, assured the States Ambassador, that it was not done with any bad designe of the Prince, and that he was ready to make reparation for the losse, disavowing the action which was done contrary to his priuity and commandement.

The King passing from Saint Foy to Agen, by Montrauel, a towne which the Duke of Elbeuf had lately forced, considering that he had onely demantied it, and that it was still a retreat for Theeues, he commanded all the houses should be set on fire, and consumed to Ashes. And the Prince of Conde leaving Saint Foy, and passing by Tonneins, he caused the C three townes to be set on fire, and all the buildings to be consumed; for that it had twice revolted, and did trouble the passage of Garonne, and much annoy the Country; wherefore the King was well pleased with what the Prince had done.

The Arnie still advanced towards Montauban: but first of all the King meant to become Master of Negrepelisse, which had beene the yeare before reduced to obedience by the Duke of Angouleme, and the Marshall de Themines, who left three hundred men there in Garison to assure the place. The inhabitants could not long continue in the protestations which they had made to maintain themselves in the Kings obedience: but being inspired by some bad counsel of their revolted neighbours, they studied by all means once againe to free themselves, and to shake off his Majesties yoke, and in the end resolved to murder the Kings Garison, which were sufficient at the first to master the people, who were not many in that paltry place; but a third part being consumed with diseases growne by infection of the ayre, especially after the siege of Montauban, and for scarcitie of victuals, the inhabitants might the more easily prevail over them: So as (having resolved on their designe) in one night they slew their Corps de garde, & massacred the rest of the souldiers which were in their lodgings. They write the women shewed great crueltie in this execution.

The King was much offended at this treacherous act, and vowed to make them an example to the world: wherefore hee marched with part of his troopes to Negrepelisse, where the Prince of Conde commanded as Lieutenant generall. They were summoned to open their gates for the Arnie to enter; but they knowing themselves unworthy of any favour, refused it, saying, they would die with their swords in their hands, for the defence of their Towne, but the next day they were battered and forced, where the souldiers committed the cruellst butchery which had beene heard of; for they slew a man, woman, and child, but such as were saved through the charitie of good men; namely, by Monsieur de Vicq, keeper of the Seales, who presently after the taking of the Towne, commanded one of his followers to redeem the women and the maidens hee should finde amongst the souldiers, thereby to preserve their honour and lives: he brought fiftene to his Lord, who were conducted into his lodging, as into a place of safety: and so preserved. Other women fled unto certaine religious men following the armie, but they could not save them, for they were wretched from them by the rage of the souldiers, who flew one another to enioy them, and in despite murdered the poore women.

This Charitie of Monsieur de Vicq was imitated by the Cardinall of Retz, and others of the Council, who had compassion of these poore women and Virgins, which were falling into the souldiers hands, to satisfie their furious lust; many could not avoid them; and which was worse, after they had forced them, they stabbed them barbarously: some were worse entreated, and perished by the violence of fire; the cruell souldiers putting

A Gunpowder into their priuy parts. For the which, his Majestic and the Commanders in the armie were much offended. They excused this excesse, for that these miserable women had a little before murdered the Kings garisons, and had shewed themselves most cruell at the breach. The Castle yielded the day after at discretion, where the men were all hanged, but the women were preferred without any touch to their honour.

After the sacke and ruine of this towne, the armie advanced to Saint Antonin, a place which the Duke of Rohan had caused to be fortified; as the hope of Montauban, the terror of the Country, and the most commodious to send succours to them of his party in that Province. He had put into it twelve hundred souldiers with Armes, Cannon, and B Muniton for their defence. Norwithstanding the King sent to assault it, and came himselfe in person to the siege, being resolved to force it. The approaches to this place are very difficult, being full of Rocks and bushes, and therefore very troublesome for the horse. It was long before they could bring and mount their Cannon, but in the end they made a reasonable breach, and an assault was given, the which was resolutely defended by the besieged, where there were many slain on either side. The Duke of Retz was hurt in the knee, with a Faulcon shot neere unto the Kings Person; and they write there had not bin scene a more bloody siege for so short a continuance in a long time.

In the end, the Garison and Gentry which were within the towne, (desiring rather to fly to the Kings mercy, then to lose themselves with the miserable inhabitants, who would have perished within their towne) being masters of a Port, yielded the place to his Majestic on the three and twentieth of June. Hee suffered them to retire, upon condition never to carry Armes against his service; to take entertainment in his armie, or to goe to their houses. The Inhabitants redeemed the towne from the spoile of the souldier for 100000 crowns which they delivered unto the presently. There were 10 or 12 of the most malicious hanged. The King left the Regiment of Nauarre for defence of the place, under the command of M. de Chappes. Others write that Perodil was made governor thereof.

During the siege of Saint Antonin, the King received newes, that the Earle of Toiny Generall of the Gallies, who had been forced to lye all the winter at Lisbon, coming from Marceilles, was arrived at the mouth of the River of Garonne with ten Gallies, and that in passing before the Ile of Argenton, he had caused Boisse (who commanded in the Fort for the Assembly of Rochel) to be summoned to yield the place, or else hee would besiege it. Whereupon he had promised to give him all contentment within two dayes: but the same day the D. of Luxemburg comming to Blay, and sending to Boisse, he delivered unto him the place, with the Artillery and Muniton for six hundred crownes: after which, they of Rochel had no retreat in the River of Garonne. Boisse leaving this Fort, fell mad and died soone after. The King being gone to Thoulouse, the Marshall of Praslin, and Bassompierre caused the armie to advance, to take in three little places from the revolted, which greatly annoyed that Citie; namely, Cucy, Carman, and the M. de Saint Pucelle, but the enemy perceiving the armie to approach, abandoned them, fearing the chastisement of Negrepelisse, and Saint Antonin. His Majestic caused them to be demolished, but spared Carman, in consideration of the Earle of Carman, Gouvernor of Foix, a Nobleman very much affected to the Kings service.

And to the end, that during his Majesties journey into base Languedoc, the revolted might no more nestle themselves in the places which they had formerly held in base Guennie, on either side of the River of Garonne, there were some Councillors in the Parliament, appointed to see the razing of the fortifications of certaine Townes, Forts, and Castles, which had been held by them of the Religion: which was put in execution.

During the Kings stay at Thoulouse, there was much speech of the obstinacie of them of the religion, which made the King and the whole Court to conceive, that most of their Townes in that Province how small so ever, would make resistance, the which would cost much of the Nobilities blood. Therefore his Majestic exhorted the Princes and Noblemen of his Court unto two things: the first not to carie themselves rashly in combats without armes, and without command: the other was, to cleanse their consciences from the finnes and offences they had committed: whereupon they all disposed themselves to confession, and to receive the Sacrament.

In the meane time, the Inhabitants of Montpellier seeing themselves in danger to lose the fruits of their fields, and the benefit of Haruest, resolved to prevent the spoile which they were ready to make. Whereupon they sent forth 800 men, to assaile such as they had employed to cut downe their Hay and Corne speedily. Monsi: de Montmorency being advertised hereof, sent all his horsemen to charge them, followed with good troopes of foot, who being assailed by the Earle of Chastillon, and Monsi: Zamet, charged them with such fury, as there were five hundred of them cut in pieces, many taken Prisoners, and the rest pursued to the very gates of Montpellier: after which, they carried away all their Hay, Corne, and Fruit.

The Kings Arme being about Beziers past the River of Orb, and had commandement to besiege Bee de Ritz, a towne situate amongst steepe and inaccessible Mountaines, which made the besieged thinke they should not be able to bring the Cannon neere to batter them, but they were deceived in their expectation: for seeing the Cannon brought, the besieged resolved to fly by night; but most of them were taken by the Regiments which were in guard; whereof some were slaine, some hanged, and some saved vpon promise of ranfome. They which remained within the towne, yeelded at discretion, whereof there were twelve hanged, and the town redeemed from spoile for 1200 crownes. Whereupon three townes which were revolted submitted themselves, fearing the like punishment.

The Duke of Rohan and his Arme, hearing that the King was resolved to passe into base Languedoc, as well to pursue him, as to besiege Montpellier, his Arme growing amazed, abandoned him, desiring rather to retire themselves, then to attend a bad encounter. The Duke put himself into Castles, with an hundred horse onely, assuring himself that place would be one of the last which should be besieged; and that in the meane time he might worke his reconciliation: for the effecting whereof, the Duke of Sully, and the Seigneur of Chalonge came on the Dukes behalfe vnto the King at Castelaudary, but there was nothing yet concluded.

The Earle of Carleil being then extraordinary Ambassador for his Maiestie with the French King, did often sollicit him in his name for a Peace for them of the reformed Religion. To whom the French King made answer (as they write) that no man desired peace more then himselfe; and that he would willingly give it his subiects; but withall he would be obeyed and haue the keys of his Townes. In the meane time Monsi: de Soubise came into England, to sollicit his Maiefty for some succors for that party. The Duke haue presumed to diue into secrets of State, and to set downe his Maiesties answer vnto Monsi: de Soubise in this manner.

The King of England one of the wisest Princes in the world, being well assured of the pure & good intentions of his most Christian Maiefty, as also of the fraud and perfidiousnes of his bad subiects revolted, which refused him his townes & their obedience, prevented the said Seig: de Soubise, and told him, That if he were come to plead the cause of the revolted in France, and to demand succours for them, hee would not heare him, as a Prince, enemy vnto such reuolts and rebellions, which toucheth all Soueraignes to molest. But if he came to intreat him to be a Mediator for Peace, and to employ his fauour towards the said most Christian King, to pardon them, returning to their obedience, That he had not only given this in charge vnto his Ambassadors, but would therein employ himselfe againe most willingly, & that for M. de Soubises own part, it would be much better for him to procure his Princes grace & pardon, then to haue recourse vnto new means of making warre against him. That if he would resolve to returne vnto his duty, hee was ready to write vnto the King, and to intreat for him. So he returned againe without any succors granted from hence: but some voluntaries out of the West parts of England, and others went to serue at Rochel of their owne accord.

The King being in Languedoc, sent a commandement to the Earle of Brissac to goe to Fresnay in base Britanie, and to seaze vpon the D. of Rohans wife, whom he brought to Angiers, where she continued some time, to see if this proceeding would make the D. resolve to emprove the Kings mercy by his obedience. The King stayed long at Beziers during the Canicular dayes. In the meane time all the Clergy of base Languedoc repaired vnto his Maiefty: In whose name the Bishop of Montpellier made a long speech vnto him, full of complaints, and inuectiues against them of the Religion, perswading the King to persist in his designe, and to root them out. And hearing that Monsieur de Soubise was passed into England, to craue succours of men and Armes from his Maiefty in the name of the assembly at Rochel; He made a Declaration by the which he was pronounced guilty of Treason, vnworthy of pardon, and incapable of all honours and Offices within his Realme, all his goods confiscate, and his lands vntied to the Crowne.

About this time there hapned an accident which pleased the King, and gaue great cause of admiration to the world. The Duke D'Esquigues who had made profession of the reformed Religion for the space of threecore yeares, was now resolved to leaue it, and to vntie himselfe to the Church of Rome. Some write that he had long before certain motions to this conuersion, and that in the year 1616, during the warres betwene the King of Spaine, and the D. of Sauoy, being in Asse with the Cardinall Ludouicio, Nuncio to Pope Paul the fifth, he was intreated by him to returne vnto the Church. To whom he made answer, I promise you, Sir, when you are Pope, I will become a Catholique. Afterwards Cardinall Ludouicio was created Pope, and called Gregory the fiftenth, who by his Letters summoned the Duke to performe his promise, and to become a Catholique. The King desired this conuersion should be solemnely performed in the Cathedrall Church of Grenoble, by the Archbishop of Ambrun. His Maiefty sent the Seigneur of Villeaux Clercs, Secretarie of State, Prouost and Master of the Ceremonies of the Order of the Holy Ghost, with a Commission for the Office of Constable, which Letters should be presented vnto the Duke, by the Marshall of Crequy, after hee had made a solemne profession to be a Catholique. And there were other Letters directed vnto the said Marshall, and to the Seigneur D'Alincourt, and Saint Chaumont, to deliuer vnto him the collar of the said Order.

This Ceremonie was performed on the foure and twentieth of Iuly with great state, where there assisted the Court of Parliament, the Chamber of accounts, with many Noblemen and Gentlemen. They write, that being ready to goe vnto the Church to make protestation of his faith, some Ministers of the Religion which had vntill assisted him, came vnto him, as it seemed, with intent to diuert him from his resolution: seeing them bend their knees, and make offer to speake vnto him, he prevented them, saying:

*My masters, behold a man who by the grace of God hath vowed to serue God, and his King, the remainder of his dayes, in another manner of instruction: then that you gave me. If you come to imitate me, and doe the like, I am ready to heare you; but if it be to speake of any other thing I will not: whereupon they retired somewhat amazed. After which, the Duke was conducted to the Church, where he made a protestation of his faith vnto the Archbishop: returning to his lodging after Masse; the Marshall of Crequi his Sonne-in-law, presented him with his Letters of Constable, and said vnto him; Sir, seeing you are become a Catholique, the King giues you the Office of Constable, and commanded me to deliuer you the Commission, with a dispensation of your oath, the which were presently read. The next day he receiued the order of the Holy Ghost, with the accustomed Ceremonies, and the day after he receiued the Sacrament, with the other Knights of the order. In the evening, the chiefe of the reformed Church at Grenoble (amongst which were diuers Gentlemen and Advocates) came to see the Constable, to whom Pulsena Councillor spake in the name of them all, saying: Sir, we are much amazed at the change wee haue seen in your person within these 3 dayes: the change of honour, the change of quality, and the change of Religion. And that which we most apprehend is the change of humour and affection. For that having been brought up from your youth in the Religion which we profess, instructed and confirmed for many yeares in the same: this metamorphosis was the more strange being not foreseen. And moreover, it is not without cause we apprehend, that the same Armes which you haue so long earied to defend and protect our religion, and which haue bin so fearfull to our enemies, will be now employed against vs. To whom he made answer: My masters, you haue no great cause to be amazed at my change of religio. I haue long felt a combat in my soule, and had sooner* resolved this change if your Ministers, and your selues by artificiall persuasions had not diuerted me. I will say nothing of your Religion; but that I profess now, and to the which it hath pleased God of his speciall Grace to call me, is much better. As for the 4 changes which you say are happed to my person, I may reduce them to two. Of Religion & Honour. For the first, it is the more pleasing, for that I hold it more profitable for my soules health. As for the other, it hath pleased the King to honour me with the quality of Knight of his Order and Constable of France, the which, although there be many within his Realme, which deserue it better then my selfe; yet will I not yeeld to any man living in fidelitie, and will wisseffe vnto his Maieftie, with the hazard of my blood and life, the humble duty which bindes me to his seruice, desiring to employ my selfe for your support and protection, so long as you shall be good seruants to the King, and not otherwise.

The Council
loosely reply.

Hereunto the Councillor replied: Sir, I thinke you will doe vs the honour to beleue, that we are good and faithfull seruants to his Maieftie. The seruices which our partie hath done vnto the deceased King Henry the Great, his father, during the last troubles, are such apparant proofes, as we thinke no man will call them in question. But we are much troubled to see the bad impressions which the enemies of our Religion giue daily to his Maieftie, breed an alteration in this Estate, and of the fauours which it hath pleased him to shew heretofore vnto vs, as well for the libertie of our consciences, and obseruation of his Edicts; as for the assurance of our liues, goods, and freedom. But that which is most scandalous, is to see Libels cast daily abroad, which tend onely to incense the people against vs.

The Dukes
answer.

My Matters (said he) concerning that which you say of those Libellers, make your informations apprehend, and doe iustice vpon them, wherein I doe offer you all aide and assistance, and will not spare any thing for your protection, conformable to his Maiefties intention: but touching the Kings seruice whereof you speake, there are three sorts of professors of your Religion. The one are direct Rebels, who seeke if it were possible to shake off the oath of obedience, and fidelitic, which they owe vnto their Prince and soveraigne Lord. Others haue beene reduced to his Maiefties obedience by force, and tearme themselves the Kings seruants; for that they haue neither Fort, Meanes, nor Armes to resist him. The third kinde are like vnto Sorcerers, who in the cure of their Witchcrafts and diseases, make vse of the Name of God, and the Scripture, to abuse the simple people, and to couer their abominable impieties, with the vail of deuotion: So are there many of your Religion who endeavour to cloake their bad designs vnder pretext of the Kings seruice, which they haue alwayes in their mouth to deceiue the people (which alwayes are too credulous) being the Kings seruants but in shew: take heed you be not of this number; and speaking these words, he turned his backe and left them.

Mansfield
comes vpon the Frontiers of France.

Whilest that the King was busied with his armie in Languedoc, the further part of France, namely, Champagne euen to the gates of Paris, were put into alarme vpon the approach of Count Mansfield, and the Duke of Brunswicke, who had left the Palatinate, past through Alsacia, Lorraine, and were come vpon the Frontiers of France with their Armie: consisting (as they write) of twelue thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, and fourteene pieces of Ordnance. Mouzon, where the Earle of Grandpré was Governour stood in most feare, and was but weakly provided both for men and fortification. He aduertised the Duke of Neuers, Governour of the Prouince, and craued his assistance, and fortified the townes as much as time would giue him leaue.

The Duke comes to Champagne vpon the brute of Mansfield's approach; but seeing he had no forces to hinder him, hee sends the Seigneur of Montereau vnto him to draw him if he could to the Kings seruice: and in the meane time leaues 12000 foot, and 1500 horse by the Kings command, to oppose against Mansfield, and all others. Hee sent succours into Mouzon. The treatie continued ten or twelue dayes betweene the Duke of Neuers, and Mansfield; who seeing no conclusion, resolved to besiege Mouzon. In the meane time two thousand of his horse mutined, and would know whom they should serue, and who should pay them. Mansfield lying about Mouzon, to let them know that he was in treatie with the Duke of Neuers, and to enter into the Kings seruice; he put his Ordnance into the towne, and gaue the Duke of Saxon Waymer, as hostage of his true intent. The Queene, knowing they should not bee able to leaue an armie in time, to make head against Mansfield, invited Don Gonzales de Cordona, General of the Spanish forces, to follow him and fight with him, who came presently with his Armie neere vnto Mouzon, and sent a Gentleman with Letters vnto the Earle of Grandpré, intreating him to informe him of the state of the enemies armie, being ready to doe any thing for the most Christian Kings seruice. The Earle of Grandpré, who was assured from the D. of Neuers, that the King would make vse of Mansfield, and his troops, temporized, and would giue him no resolute answer, but referred him to the Queene and her Councill, thanking him for his good will; & intreating him to continue.

Count Mansfield seeing the Spanish armie in Luxembourg, and that of France ready to march; That the French had fed him with hopes as he had them with faire words: That they had giuen him no commodities but such as might reduce him to extremity, whereby he had lost many of his Souldiers: That as his men wasted, the French army augmented, and approached neere the Frontiers: And that the Duke of Neuers abated still of his demands, he resolved with the Duke of Brunswicke to make a retreat to Breda in Brabant: But the difficulty was to retire the Duke of Saxony in Waymer with his Artillery out of Mouzon: for the which he vled this policy, giuing the Earle of Grandpré to vnderstand that without any more treaty he was absolutely resolved to serue the King, and to that end would march to Cassine (a Castle three leagues off, belonging to the Duke of Neuers) and cary his artillery thither.

Politique of Mansfield.

The Earle was easily perswaded to deliuer him his hostages and cannon, and so suffered him to depart with his carriages: but he tooke his course towards Mezières, and sent to the Duke of Neuers to demand 60000 crownes to dismis his troops, and for the first pay of such as should be entertained into the Kings seruice according to promise, but they varied so in their resolutions, as there was nothing performed of the treatie, but Mansfield fearing to be engaged betweene two armies, resolved to be gone.

The Kings army hauing mustred at Chasteaufortien, the Commanders seeing Count Mansfield and the Duke of Brunswicke gone out of France, resolved first to send speedily to Don Gonzales who lay in Luxembourg on the other side of the Riuier of Meuze; to offer him the assistance of the Kings troops: and withall to follow Count Mansfield lest he should enter into France againe some other way. Don Gonzales being at Ivoy with 2500 horse and 7000 foot, hearing that Mansfield had taken his way towards Haynault, and that his great forces were reduced to five thousand horse, and five thousand foot, hee resolved to cut off their passage: where we will leaue them going towards Breda, after a great battell fought, much honor gotten, and as braue a retreat made, as hath beene in the memory of man.

Mansfield being vpon the frontiers of France, many of the Religion left the places of their aboad and retired to Sedan, which bred occasion of much ialousie, so as many were stayed in passing, by the Gouvernors of townes and Prouinces. The Duke of Sully passing by Moullins in the night with foure boats laden with armes, goods, and money, went to lodge at Villeneufue three leagues off: The Earle of Charles Lieutenant to the Prince of Conde, being aduertised thereof, sent a gentleman to demand if hee had any passport from the King to retire himselfe, but he refusing to giue him any answer, the Earle went to horse backe well accompanied after midnight, to Villeneufue, and summoned the Duke to yeeld himselfe, the which he did after some refusal, and was in the morning brought backe to the Castle of Moullins and put in safe custody, and an inventory taken of al which was found in those foure boats. The Earle aduertised the King of this action, who knowing that the D. desired to retire himselfe to his house at Sully, commanded that he should be set at liberty, and suffered to depart with all his train, armes and baggage, yet he allowed of the Earles action, and commended his fidelity.

The Duke of Sully stayed at

At the same time the Earle of Suze was stayed at Lions, by Monsieur d'Alincourt, suspected to be going to Sedan, to lead the Duke of Bouillons troops.

Many others were committed in diuers places, so as vpon the aduertisements which came daily, that many of the Religion left their dwellings, some for feare and apprehension, others to fauour the comming in of the strangers, and the Duke of Bouillons designs, the King made a Declaration, whereby he did forbid all his subiects of the Reformed Religion to abandon their houses and aboads wherefoeuer, to ioyne with them that were in armes, or with the strangers, nor to giue them any retreat, fauour, succour, or assistance, vpon paine of Treason, and to be declared troublers of the publique peace.

The Centinel seeing them, gave the alarm, and the Citizens finding they were not about two or three hundred (never dreaming of any ambush) refused to send out six hundred muskettiers to charge these haughty men, who seeing them come, made shew to retire, but being nere unto them, they gave fire to those warlike instruments which were in their Carts, whereupon they flue about one hundred upon the place: their companions beganne to flye, but the horsemen brake out vpon them and charged them in flankes, so as most were cut in pieces, and few returned to the towne: which newes were very pleasing vnto the King, who resolved speedily to blocke vp the towne, having three thousand five hundred Reiters and Lanquents brought vnto him by the Duke of Aluin, sonne to the Earle of Schomberg.

The Gentry little effected at Rochel.

The seizure of the vic of Soissons army before Rochel.

After the defeat of Monsieur de Soubise, in the Isle of Ric, and before the Kings going to Royan, the Seneschall of Viouonne had bene taken prisoner by Beaulieu younger brother to Dampierre, and caried to Rochel, where he was condemned to pay double ranfome, that is to say, to Beaulieu 1200 crownes, and to the Councell of 48, 600 crownes. Having presented the passport he received from the Assembly at Rochel to Monsieur de Vicq, hee shewed it vnto the King and to diuers of the Councell, all which were amazed at the rearmes they vsed against the King and his authoritie in the same. The Keeper of the Seales enforming himselfe particularly of another prisoner which came from Rochel of the forme of this new common-wealth, he told him that besides the generall Assembly which was like the generall Councell of the League, by these words, We command you, as they did infer in their passports, they had erected three Councels: the first was a Councell of warre, called the Councell of 48, which resembled the Councell of the vnion of fixteece at Paris, which had bene the cause of so many miseries during the league. The second was the Councell of Iustice, which did imitate a Court of Parliament. And the third was the Councell of the Admiraltie, which iudged of all prizes they tooke at sea. That the Presidents, Assitants, and Secretaries of the Assembly, were changed euery two monthes, and in like manner the said three Councels. That at these changes there was much labouring to be named President, Assitant, or Secretary. They which had bene two monthes of the 48, were put into the Councell of Iustice, or of the Admiralty; And they of the Admiralty were put into the Councell of 48, or of Iustice: In all which three Councels they did put some of the Deputies of the Assembly and of the Towne-houfe: These Councels treated of the ranfome of prisoners, and of spoiles taken by Sea or Land: of confiscations and the reuennues of the Clergy: of imposts, customes, tributes, and the Kings reuennues. He sayd that the Nobility and Gentry which went to Rochel to assist them in this warre, were sleightly regarded, and held in ialousie and distrust, for whensoever a Gentleman went out of his lodging, he was followed and watched by some inhabitant. Yea, he had seene after the taking of Sables D'Olonne, how Monsieur de Soubise hauing sent Mallery to Rochel, to haue leaue to suffer corn to passe into Bourdeaux, whereby he should draw a great imposition to helpe to entertaine his army which encreased daily; This demand being granted by the Assembly and them of the Towne-houfe, was hindred by the Councell of warre or 48: and vpon instance made by Mallery to haue an answer, they peremptorily told him that they would make no other answer to Monsieur de Soubise but with the Cannon. This was the respect the Rochellers bare vnto their Generall.

Touching their forces in the Towne; he said there were three companies of English, each consisting of an hundred men, (yet others which haue serued there, report they had six hundred English.) There were some companies of French foot and some of horse, besides the Burgeses which bare armes. That their chiefe strength was their army at Sea; whereof one Guitton a Burgesse of Rochel was Admirall, and about an hundred ships and pinaces which scoured vp and downe; yet flesh and wood was very deare within the Towne.

The King being at Xaintes as you haue heard, had resolved to leaue a part of his army in Poitou to blocke vp Rochel by land; he made the Earle of Soissons Generall, and the Marshall of Vetry Lieutenant. This army which consisted of 6000 foot and 600 horse, was to keepe them by land from all commerce with the neighbour Prouinces and from enioying the fruits of their lands, lying without their wals.

They

1622 They were to build forts according to the direction of Pompeius Targona a great Engineer sent from the Pope, who should passe the Channell betwene Coreille and Chef de Bois with a chaine, to keepe ships from entring into the Towne. This army had their rendezvous on the 28 of Iune within a league of Rochel. They made their approaches and lodged at Laleu and Saint Maurice, where they beganne to build a fort, which the Townsmen did often seeke to interrupt, but it was finished by the 24 of September as you shall heare.

The Kings army preparing for the siege of Montpellier, Aimagues, Vauuert, and other weake townes thereabouts, razed their wals and retired themselves into Montpellier, Vlez, Nismes, and other places. They sought to hinder the Lanquents from ioyning with the Kings army, and to that end had put three hundred men well armed into Saint Giles; and they being led by the Duke of Aluin, and the Comte Rhyngraue, prepared to force it, whereupon they sent to Montpellier for succours, knowing they should not bee long able to subsist.

On the 15 of Iuly they sent out seven hundred choice men to annoy the said Lanquents, whilst they were busie about forcing of the place; who being aduertised of their coming, went and charged them, and after some resistance defeated them, whereof most were flaine and taken prisoners: The besieged hearing of this defeat, fled away in the night and abandoned the towne.

The Kings armie led by the Prince of Conde, marched towards Berderine and Ginac which made some shew of resistance. Being come to Berderine, they battered it furiously, and it was well defended in the beginning, but there being a sufficient breach made, an assault was giuen with such fury, as the towne was forced, and many of the besieged slain, the rest had likewise perished, and the towne bene burnt to ashes, if the Commanders had not stayed the souldiers fury: His Maiestie was contented to be Master of the place, causing forty of the chiefe authors of this revolt to be apprehended and hanged, and the fortifications of the towne to be razed. His Maiesties meaning was to reduce Ginac, another reuolted Towne, to the end nothing might hinder the sieges of Montpellier, Nismes, Vlez, and other townes of importance, if they persisted in their wilfulnesse and disobedience; but being better aduised then the other, and loath to lose it selfe miserably like to Negrepelisse, the preuented her ruine by her speedy returne to obedience, imploring his Maiesties mercy. So they within it yielded to what composition it should please the king to grant them, and deliuered the place, hauing a generall pardon: yet to preuent any future reuolt, and to saue the charges of a garison, he commanded the wals and fortifications should be razed.

Berderine forced.

Ginac perished and pardoned.

After this, the army marched to besiege Lunel, a towne situated betwene Aiguemortes and Montpellier, hauing a garison of twelue hundred men to defend the place, which they beganne to batter. But in the meane time they had aduertisement that succours were coming to them, and were within two leagues of the place: whereupon they sent out certain troops to encounter them, but they vnderstood they were past by certaine vnknowne wayes, and entred by night into Lunel: The Kings Cannon continued the battery, notwithstanding the entry of these supplies; but there fell out a miserable accident, for the wind being very great, hauing giuen fire to a peece, the flame being driuen by a contrary gulf, tooke hold of the powder with such fury, as threecore souldiers were burnt, whereof most of them died.

Lunel besieged and yielded.

The besieged seeing a great breach made, and an assault ready to be giuen, had recourse vnto the Kings mercy and vnto the Prince of Conde, who received them the eight of August, and granted them their liues, armes, and baggage, the souldiers to depart with their matches out: But at their coming forth the disorder was very great by reason of a cart laden with armes which the souldiers set vpon and rifed; and not so content, assailed the garison, who were glad to depart with the best things they had to escape their furie, by whom notwithstanding some of them were flaine.

This tumult came to the eares of the Prince and of the Marshall of Praslin, who drawing his sword, slew some of these pillagers which he met withall. On the morrow after, as they were bringing some carts of powder into the towne, the fire tooke therein againe which burnt some twenty houses and some people, but the cause hereof could not bee knowne.

Sommières.

Two days after, the King entered Lunel, but the army went towards Sommières, which having defended it selfe in the year 1573 for the space of fixe weekes against the Marshall D'Amville, afterwards Constable, being battered with many Cannon, thought now to doe the like yet after the Kings army was once in sight: that the Seigneur de Vireville had yielded his Town and Castle, which is within Harquebussie shot of Sommières: that after their best opposition and couragions defending of their approaches (wherein some persons of note of the army were slaine and hurt, as namely, the Duke of Aluin in the legge) they were faine to retire: that their suburbs after their strongest resistance (in which some famous Captaines were lost, and namely, the Seigneur de Lancheres, a Captaine of the Regiment of Piedmont, and an Ayde of the Camp, and one whom the King more lamented then any other in all these warres) were all wonne: their trenches gotten, and the foot of their wall, where they flew Fountaines a Lieutenant of the Regiment of Piedmont: that a fearful battery was ready which discovered them behind, and now within 24. houres had made a reasonable breach, and that they were without hope of succours, they yielded, their liues and goods saved, without armes. The King in person assisted at their coming forth, that good order might bee exactly obserued within and without, and the garison was with all safety conducted, being in number twelve hundred men.

The death of so many braue Noblemen, Captaines and Souldiers slaine, as well as the sieges of townes as in combats, and so much people lost and ruined in six monthes, since the Kings departure from Paris, made many desire a peace, with this addition, So as it might not be dishonorable: for there was not only a great losse of men of warre, but even of the chiefs of the Kings Council which died in this voyage, or were sicke to the extremity, as well through toyle and the change of ayre, as by the intemperatenesse of the season: amongst the which the Cardinal of Retz, President of the Council, died the 16 of August of a fever, and was much lamented of many. Monsieur de Vieu, Keeper of the Seales of France, did also yield his soule to God on the second of September, a personage growne old in the seruice of the King and State, the offices which hee had worthily discharged, and the Embassies wherein he had beene employed, had brought him by degrees to this eminent place, the which the King gaue afterwards to President Comartin, one of his ancient Councillors of State.

The King having left the Duke of Vendosme with eight thousand foot and five hundred horse, to cleare Guisane, with the Countries of Foix and Albigeois, and to take such places about Montauban as denied him obedience: He resolved to besiege Lombes, a towne which did much import, for the communication it had with Castres, Montauban, Remont, Saint Paul, Paylars, and other revolted townes, being situated in the midst of them; the which he invested on the 26 of Iuly, and the souldiers lodged vpon the Counterscarpe, notwithstanding any resistance the Garison made. The Cannon played vpon them, and the Marquis of Maloze shewed himselfe with two thousand foot, and three hundred horse to succour them, which he could not effect, the Duke drawing part of his forces from the siege to fight with him, so as they were glad to retire to Rcalmont. The besieged seeing themselves pressed by the Cannon, and out of hope of succours, they being retired, refused to abandon it, and to save themselves by a Port which remained free, in regard they wanted men in the army, the which they did, leaving their families and goods. The Duke advancing his troops at the breake of day to give an assault, found the breach abandoned, and the gates open, which made him doubt that the enemy had some hidden designe: whereupon he sent to discouer, and being assured there were none but women and children in the towne, he caused them to be put in safety, and gaue the spoile to the souldiers, commanding the wals and fortifications to be razed.

The Duke having fortified his army with the Regiment of the Prince of Martigues his second sonne, being twelve or thirteenth hundred men, he came to Saint Supplice, where he received newes that they of Montauban during his absence and the Marshall of Themines, had made roades, and taken Renierz, with foure or five Castles about that towne, and that Monsieur de Montbrun (who commanded the souldiers in Montauban) was advanced with three hundred horse, and what foot he could draw together, and had taken the Castle of Villebrunier vpon the Riuier of Tarn a league from Villemur. Vpon this aduice the Duke postes away with his horse, caueh his foot to follow, and doubles the draught

A of two Cannon, to goe the swifter: he surprised Montbrun on the sudden, who beganne to fortifie the Castle, and forced him to retire vpon purre to Renierz, his footmen being thus abandoned, disperised and saved themselves, some in the Vines, others retired themselves into the Castle of Villebrunier, the which being invested, the besieged grew amazed, and slipped downe in the night (being very darke) into the ditches and saved themselves by secret by-ways, onely tenne were taken, whereof nine were hanged, and the tenth saved in regard of his young yeares: after which the Duke recovered Renierz, and all the other places which Montbrun and they of Montauban had taken, and then lodged his troops vpon all the approaches to Montauban, where they took three spies, whom they had sent forth with Letters from Montbrun to the Duke of Rohan, whom he qualified General of the Reformed Churches of France, and with many other priuate Letters, containing their friends to find meanes to free them of the great miseries wherein they were, being oppressed with contributions, lodging of souldiers, continuall guard, and want of necessities, the common people having no other sustenance but bread and water; and having to doe with a Prince which slept not, so as they should be forced to retire themselves, if they had not speedie liberty given them by a good peace. Thus were their wants discovered, and their messengers hanged for their pains.

After the reduction of so many places in Languedoc, Foix, Albigeois, and other Provinces, the Duke of Rohan seeing their affaires to decline daily, that there remained only Montpellier, Nismes, Véz, Castres, and some few other places which held their part, all dreamed with sieges, and deprived of assistance and succours from their neighbours which were already reduced: he resolved to reconcile himselfe by the mediation of the Constable D'Esquignieres, to whom he went (being at Pont Saint Esprit) the which the Constable accepted willingly, & obtained leave from the King to treat with him, in which conference there were some Weekes spent, but nothing yet concluded.

The common people suspected that the Duke of Rohan treated for his owne particular, and that he would abandon them, whereupon hee obtained a passport from the King to goe into Montpellier to conferre with the Deputies of that Circle, and the Consuls of the Towne; and for that they grew obdurate, seeing the Kings army but small and wearied, it made his Maiesty approach vnto Verone where the Constable came vnto him, every man thinking a peace had beene concluded, wherewith many of the chiefs were discontented, thinking the Kings honor to be intreated by some secret Articles. Others seeing the souldiers grow cold, and that Montpellier was well fortified, held the Kings presence more necessary at Paris, then to enter into a long siege, in September, the event whereof might proue doubtful: In the end, they which held for the warre prevailed, or rather they of Montpellier who desired no peace. They wrote, that many Tickers were sent vnto them, by which they were given to vnderstand, that if they yielded vpon condition the King should enter (which was the chiefe point of the treaty) they were vnto: whereupon resolution was given to besiege the towne, and the Constable tooke leave of the King to returne into Dauphine, seeing the Prince ialous for the command of the army: having charge from his Maiesty to treat still with Monsieur de Rohan. The Earle of Soissons lying before Rochel, and continuing the making of his Fort, there were many sallies and encounters made by them of the towne, in one of the which Enesse, he who had murthered Monsieur de Boisse Pardailhan the year before in Genesac, was taken. The Earle planted certaine peeces of Ordnance vpon his fort, and shot into the towne to ruine their houses, which did much amaze the inhabitants. There grew some diuision in the towne among the Commanders, some adhering vnto La Noue, some to Fasas. In Iuly, Pompeius Targos the Earles Engineer, had past the Channell at a low water, and measured the bredth of it with a line, and on the fourth of August the chaine of iron which should shut vpon the Channell was brought in 35 Carres, and yet was it not all, and they planted two Cannons vpon the Sea side, to hinder the passage of the Rochellers, so as they could not approach so neere the shoare as they had done.

The Rochellers being much weakened by the ouerthrow of their army vnder Monsieur de Soissons in the Ile of Ric, they devised all the means they could to get men out of Normandy, and sending some of their faction with Letters vnto diuers of the Religion in that Province, as well to leauy, as to make some surpris: they wrote that in May before there were thire of those men taken in Alençon, whereof the one named himselfe to be be Secretary Maieur de Senlis, who being examined vpon the contents of their Letters and taken oaths, were sent to the Court of Parliament at Rouen. There was another practice discovered, as they write, for the surprizing of Cherebourg, a Sea towne of great importance in base Normandy, the which was prevented by the care of Monseur de Matignon Lieutenant generall for the King, who having discovered the plot vpon the fort of Cherebourg, and vpon the port, the secret intelligences they had with the Gouvernor of the towne, and the inhabitants of the Religion: hee dismissed the Gouvernor, and changed the garison, visited the place, and supplied the defects. The Rochellers ships which should have executed this enterprise vpon Cherebourg being returned, they had commandement to keepe themselves ready, and to ioyne with the rest, to hinder the Kings Fleet, which they heard would bee within few dayes vpon the Coast of Britany, to ioyne with those of that Prouince and of Normandy, all which would make a body of about 60 saile, besides the Gallies, meaning to lie in the Road before Rochel; and to blocke it vp by sea, as well as it was by land, and to beginne the siege when it should please the King. The Gallies being come into the Riuer of Nantes, the whole Fleet attended the coming of the Duke of Guise, who was appointed Generall, and came to Paris in the beginning of August, where making small stay, hee posted into Britany, and arriued at Nantes about the end of the moneth. The Captaines and Commanders of the Gallies of Marilles, lying at Coueron three leagues off, in stead of going to salute him and receive his commandements (as they ought to haue done) went out of the Riuer and put to Sea, as if they meant to returne to Bourdeaux, making thier that they did affect the Generall of the Gallies, betwixt whom and the Duke there had beene some priuate discontent, for the command of those Gallies: Notwithstanding, the Duke had commission from the King to be Admirall of his Fleet at Sea, against them of Rochel. In the end this ialousie was reconciled, the Duke acknowledged for Generall, and the Gallies returned into the Riuer of Nantes to receive his commandements: so as hee embarked speedily to goe to Brest, to draw all the Fleet together in Pont Louis or Blauet, from thence to goe in grosse to assault the Ile of Re neere Rochel, and spare the Rochellers the paines of gathering in their Vintage there.

But let vs returne to Languedoc: the King had resolved to besiege Montpellier, notwithstanding that the world expected the conclusion of a peace; they thought the towne would haue bene content their new fortifications should be razed; that the Catholiques should be restored to their former liberty; that the Kings Officers should be restored to their places, honors, and dignities; that those which were absent, should be recalled, and in signe of obedience, they should receive a Catholique Garison vnder a Gouvernor of the Religion. All these things (as they write) had beene concluded; and the King was to enter with his army; but on the last of August, his Miesties guards coming to seize vpon the ports and walls, (as they are accustomed to doe in the reduction of Townes, before the King enters, and the rest of the army being in battell to giue passage to the garison which should retire, according to the Articles of the Treaty) they within fell into a mutinie, and shut their gates against the Kings troops, letting them know, that they were refused to defend themselves and to die like souldiers, willing them to retire: Hereupon the kings army aduanced, and forced a Fort called Saint Denis. The besieged seeing it taken, sent our a Trumpet to complaine of this enterprise made contrary to the Treaty, which they said they would entertaine, but it was onely to discover the state of the Kings army, and to recover it, who seeing small guard in the Campe, and their quarters scattered, the besieged resolved to make a furious sally, and to recover it: and to take away all knowledge of their resolution from the Kings Centinels, they opened an old Port which had beene for many yeares together mured vp, and sallied forth to the number of 1500 foot, and 80 horse: they surprized the guards, slaw some, and put the rest to flight, where diuers Commanders, Captaines, and Gentlemen were slaine. The Alarme came to the Kings quarter. The Duke of Montmorency who was then present, with the Duke of Fronfack, went speedily to horse-backe with all the Gentlemen which were about the King, and charged the enemy, shewing great proofes of their valour and resolution, yet the Kings losse was great: the Duke of Fronfack was slaine, Monseur de Montmorency hurt in the belly and thigh with a pike. There were also slaine the Marquis of Beueron, the Baron of Canillac, the Seigneurs of Estrange, Luçon the elder, Combolet, and many others. There were few

A souldiers slaine, for they fled; but the Kings army aduancing with all speed, they were forced to retire and leaue the place.

This ad did much incense them throughout all France against them of the religion. At Orleans the newes of the Duke of Fronfacks death made them ready to take armes against them, offering vnto the Earle of Saint Paul to employ their liues and armes to take reuenge for his sonne: but the Earle answered, that hee was sufficiently grieved for his death, not desiring to see any sedition in a towne which his Maiesty had committed to his care, entreating them to containe themselves in peace. But matters past not so quietly at Lions, where the common people, ioyning with a number of youth, fell vpon them of the religion, spoiled their houses, burnt some with all their goods, and slew and hurt diuers: the which the Gouvernor, Magistrate, nor Guards were able to prevent; and if the Queene Mother had not bene in the towne, and come vnto the place where this tumult was, it had not bene pacified without great murder and spoile of them of the religion, where they are more hated then in any towne of France.

The King having received this losse at the fort of Saint Denis, sent consolatory Letters vnto the Earle of Saint Paul, and the Lady his wife, vpon the death of the Duke of Fronfack their son. The siege continued, and many braue sallies and charges were on either side. Vpon the seuenth of September they took a spy coming out of Montpellier with Letters to the Duke of Rohan, to sollicit him to send them succours speedily, or else they were vndone. He told them that they of Montpellier had attired twelue hundred women like souldiers, to make shew to the Kings army that they had many men. In the meane time they fall vpon the Duke Montmorencys quarter; Monseur Zamet Marshall of the Campe came presently thither, and seeing the souldiers retire, said vnto them, Souldiers, you flee. To whom they answered, Sir, we haue no more powder nor shot. What (said he) haue you neither swords nor nayles? These words touched them to the quick, and made them returne to their trenches, where he found the Captaines, who said vnto him, Sir, you will be a witnesse that you haue found vs doing our duties. Having repulsed the enemy, and returning to another place, meeting vpon the way with the Seigneur of Coueron, an Ayde of the Campe, they had both their thighs broke with a Cannon shot from the Port of Peyrou, whereof Monseur Zamet died five dayes after, to the great griefe of the King and the whole army. On the 22 of September the King resolved to attempt an out-woke betwixt two bastions at midnight, to the end the darknes might make their bastions and curtaines vnseruiceable: whereupon six or seuen hundred of the besieged sallied forth, but they were beaten, and the worke taken, where the Kings men entrenched themselves. This conflict continued about two houres, with losse on both sides: On the Kings were slaine Tarnaud, Lieutenant to the Duke of Luxembourg, Gouvernor of Blaye, Captain Lago, the Seigneur of Mironde, and Capitaine La Bene, and some souldiers: the besieged (as they write) lost about 200 of their best men.

The Kings army was too weak to inuest Montpellier on all sides, victuals waxed very scant, and were passing deare: they found no forage for their horses, sicknesse encreased, and the fruits and grapes of Autumne killed more men then the shot and sword of the enemy. The King to strengthen himselfe with more men, sent for the Duke of Vendosme from the siege of Briteste to ioyne with his army, and to the Prince of Conde to hasten his regiment of Berry, which was said to be embarked at Lions: vnto Monseur Bressieu to come vnto the army with his regiment: to the Seigneur of Montepan to bring his vnto the Seigneurs of Tremont and of Ragny, who were leauying of two regiments in Bourgundy, to hasten them to come into Languedoc with all speed: and to the Duke of Angoulême to bring six thousand men as well horse as foot, of the army which was leauied to defend the frontiers of Champagne against Manfeld, seeing the apprehension of all danger was past. They brought come downe the riuer of Rofne, with artillery and munition for the siege of Montpellier. About the same time the Duke of Elsperson was made Gouvernor of Guienne, which place had been voyd since the death of the Duke of Mayen. In the end of September the King battered the towne with 16 pieces of Ordnance, and the besieged seeing themselves cooped vp, beganne to entrench themselves within the Towne, forcing all in generall, men, women, and children, to labour in the trenches. They made a reasonable breach in the wall, but the King would not giue an assault, fearing they had some myne, and withall seeing his army tired, hee desired to be refreshed with new forces before he would attempt it; yet they still advanced their workes, in the which there were divers encounters, and many slaine: amongst others, Casselman an old Captain of the Regiment of the Guards, and M. de Roquelaure Generall of the Venetians, (who had succeeded in the place of Monsieur Zamet) with Capitaine Saint Iohn, and many others. The disorder was great in this combat, where the Kings troops flying away, young Gittereau and Guymermont were slaine. In the end the Duke of Espernon seeing this confusion, drew his sword and commanded the Seigneur of Nantes to charge with an hundred Pikes, and as many voluntaries, which made the besieged retire.

The Pope commands them of Auignon to assist the King.

During this siege the Pope had commanded his Vice Legat to supply the King with armes, powder, munition, victuals, and all other necessaries, and if his Maiefty had a desire in his returne from Languedoc or otherwise to visit Auignon, that he should prepare to receive and entertaine him and his Court as his owne person. And for that the Kings army was full of infectious diseases, the inhabitants of Marseilles, to witnesse their affection to the Kings service, offered that if the King pleased to send the sicke men of his army vnto their towne, they should be carefully lodged and entreated at their owne charges, wherewith the King was verie well pleased. In the meane time, new troops came towards Montpellier for the King. The Duke of Rohan was in Nismes with most of his forces, and the troops that were in Suenness and Viuairetz, which he might easily draw together to succour Montpellier: the King hearing of their intent by some spies which were taken, and which way they would come, tooke such order as they durst not attempt it.

Their factions encreased daily at Rochel for command, the people being ready to ruin one another; they which had not commands according to their desires, turned their coats, left the towne, and went daily to the Earle of Soissons troops, and to Monsieur de Saint Luc at Brouage, and made more cruell warre against the Rochellers then any other.

A Combat at Sea.

Vpon the nineteenth of Septemb: there was a great fight at Sea, betwixt the Marquis of Rouillac who commanded the Fleet in Brouage, and the Rochellers: the Marquis having a Gallion called S. Michael, and tenne smaller ships, wherof six were runne aground and could not follow the rest, going to ioine with the Duke of Guise, Admirall of the Fleet. The Rochellers attended them at the beginning of the flood, being 14 ships, and bent their course towards Brouage, where meeting them, they beganne the fight, which continued fix houres vntill the ebbe, and then retired without any great advantage on either side. Touching the Affaires of Rochel, and the estate of the Kings army, you cannot be better satisfied then by this Letter written from the Iudge of the Army vnto the first President of Bourdeaux on the 24. of September.

A Letter to the first President of Bourdeaux from Monsieur de Saint Luc.

Sir, the Count Soissons Fort is now in defence, and furnished with foureteene pieces of Ordnance, he hath sent fortytwo more to batter the towne furiously. The Rochellers haue great want of money and wood, and their fleet is ready to leaue them for want of pay. They haue taxed thirty of their best inhabitants at an hundred Crownes apiece, ten or twelue haue paid willingly, some with griefe, and others by force. All men of quality desire to yeeld obedience to the King, and are not kept backe but by the impudency of some factious people, who threaten to thrust 15. or 16 out of the Assemblée, saying, they are the cause of all their miseries. Wee attend daily the proceedings of the Kings fleet, which vndoubtedly will be master of the Seas, considering the estate whereunto the enemye is reduced. The Flemish ships which lay by vs, are goneladen with salt. On Monday last, most of the English came out of the towne to our army, where they were well entertained and feasted. My Lord gaue them money and a guard to conduct them to Nantes, where they desired to imbarke themselves to returne into their Country, exclaiming against the discomforts they had received in Rochel, and seeming very glad to be at liberty. The Lieutenant who commanded them with the rest of the English, haue bene committed to prison; we attend hourly what will become of them: but this is not the way to haue Englishmen another time.

We haue a braue Sea-man of Bourage called Sauteron of the reformed religion, but a sworn enemy to the Rochellers, who hath past through their fleet, and lodgeth vnder the fauour of our forts: hee takes all the Birkes which bring meale to Rochel, and euen yesterday hee tooke foure at their Chaine; Hee lies within Cannon shot of the Enemy, but neere our Forts and supported by our Cannon; so as when they

A they shoot at him, we shoot at them: Thus we make warre by Sea and Land, and forget nothing which may bring honor and reputation to the Kings forces.

But returning into Languedoc, you shall vnderstand, that some horse-men passing out of Nismes towards Auignon, tooke the Popes Legat, with the Seigneurs of Portes, Bandouin a Treasurer, and some others prisoners, and brought them to their towne, but they were set at liberty, paying their ranfomes. This Legat a little before had presented Letters vnto his Maiefty from his Holinesse, who did congratulate his victories, and commanded him not to thrust himselfe into danger, whereby in his person hee should hazard the hope of Christendome.

In the meane time, the Constable by the Kings commandment, had often conference with the Duke of Rohan, whereby they found meanes to enter into a treaty of peace, protected euer since February; many times begonne, and as often broken off. Many contradicted this designe, and represented the state whereunto they had reduced them of the religion, whom his Maiefty in fix months might wholly ruine or force to obedience: That the King and all France should reape profit thereby, when as the malecontented should haue no place of refuge, and the people should be freed from the apprehension of falling into new troubles: That they of the religion would promise much, but neuer effect the raising of their fortifications but by force: That within fix months they should be constrained to renew the warre: finally, they objected many reasons against the peace which was in hand.

But the King having stronger considerations, according to the aduice of the most ancient officers of the Crown, finding great advantage in the propositions and offers which the Duke of Rohan then made, he commanded the Constable to conclude the businesse, and come to the Campe, but the Marshall of Crecqui came before, and (as they write) brought the first newes vnto the King, of the obedience which Monsieur de Rohan was resolved to yeeld vnto his Maiefty, and that he would draw them of Montpellier to submit themselves.

This Treaty was held very secret, vntill that the King causing the Prince of Conde to come priuately vnto him, told him, that he had received newes by a Poste, that the Duke of Rohan was resolved to obey him, and to cause the Deputies of the Reformed Churches, with the inhabitants of Montpellier, to yeeld him all sorts of submission; and withall to haue the Articles put in execution, touching the raising of the new fortifications, in all the townes which were held by them of the religion, wherewith his Maiefty held himselfe well satisfied, resolving to giue peace vnto his subiects.

The Prince shewing some discontent, for that it had bene treated without his priuety, hee humbly besought the King, that seeing hee had now no more need of his person, it would please him to giue him leave to goe and performe a vow which hee had made to our Ladie of Lorette, which his Maiefty presently granted, and he left the Campe with a small traine.

During these negotiations, the Duke of Neuers having freed Champagne from the feare of Mansfelds army, finding a fit opportunity, and having good forces in the Country of Rethelois, he lodged his troops as neere as possibly he could to Sedan, forbidding all men to transport any come or victuall out of the Realme, and by consequence to Sedan, which is out of France; and withall, dispersed his troops round about it, in such sort, as victuall grew exceeding deare, especially bread, by reason of the multitude of families which were retired thither during the troubles. The Duke of Bouillon was troubled with this proceeding, he complained to the King, and wrote to the Councell at Paris, desiring to know what they intended to doe: The Duke of Neuers sent vnto the King at the same time to know his pleasure touching Sedan, for that there was neuer so faire an opportunity offered to besiege it. His Maiefty tired with so many troubles which oppressed the people, sent him word by the Marquis of Vieuville, that he should dismisse his troops, or send them with his army of Champagne, which was marching towards Montpellier, which had committed a thousand thefts, cruelties, and spoiles, more then enemies could haue done.

In the meane time Mansfeld (leaving the Frontiers of France) had sent word to the Duke of Neuers, that hee gaue the King the Ordnance which he left in Sedan, who shewing this Letter to the Duke of Bouillon, made instance in his Maiefties name to haue it deliuered, but he made answer, that Mansfeld had fold them vnto him, and moreover that the Prince A Palatine opposed himselfe, saying, that they were his and not Mansfelds, for prooffe whereof, if hee would visit the peeces, hee should finde his Armes.

At Rochel the Kings Fleet had not yet done any great exploit, onely they had taken one ship at the Sea, wherein were diuers Gentlemen of Normandy going to Rochel: the Fleet lay at Blauet, from whence the Duke of Guise sent to summon the English and Hollanders who lay with their ships before Rochel, to declare themselves what party they would follow, and then he resolved to goe with the Fleet against the Islands of Rie and Oleron, and to make himselfe Master thereof, with an intent to ioyne with the ships of Bouage, and to fight with the Rochellers if they offered themselves, and the wind and tyde would giue him leaue.

In the meane time the Duke of Rethelois, eldest sonne to the Duke of Neuers, (being but fiftene or sixtene years old) died at Meziers, a young Prince of very great hope.
This death did very much afflict the Duke his father, who had grounded the support of his House vpon the generosity of this Sonne, whose body was caried to Neuers, and interred by his mother, and the Duke himselfe went to the King.

But returning to the treaty, the Constable came vnto the King when euery man held the peace assured, yet he went to view the trenches and gaue it out that the peace was broken: But soone after there was a truce concluded for foure or fife dayes, during the which they visited one another, and the Gentlemen of Montpellier came walking to the halfe-moone to view the Campe.

In the meane time newes came, that the Marquis of Maloze would put himselfe into Montpellier to fauour such as would not heare speake of a peace; whereupon the King went to horsebacke, and so continued all night, but the next day these newes were found false.

The Articles of the peace being concluded on the ninth of October, the Duke of Rohan entred into Montpellier on the eleuenth, where there were many seditious persons which refused to murder him, calling him Scamblerat, a name inuented among them for such of the religion as they held to be the Kings seruants.

In the end, after many Assemblies, they of Montpellier promised to obey, and to ob-serue this treaty of peace concluded for the general of all the reformed Churches of France and Berne. There seemed to be some difficulties in the execution thereof, for the clearing of which, the Constable, the Duke of Rohan, with the Deputies of the Seuennes, Nismes, Viez, and Montpellier, had diuers conferences vnder the Fort of Saint Denis, where in the end a peace was fully resolved.

The Duke of Rohan in performance of that which he had promised, came the eighteenth of October in the euening to the Kings quarter, most of the Court being retired, so as the King was almost alone; he knelled downe before his Maiestie, and craued pardon for bearing armes against him: the King said, Be you better aduised for the time to come, and I will forget what is past. So hauing made him rise vp, they changed their discourse, and halfe an houre after, the Duke retired to the Constables quarter, where he lay all night. On the morrow he entred againe into Montpellier, and came soone after forth with the Seigneur of Gallagne, Gouernor thereof, and all the Deputies of the other townes, who came to beseech his Maiestie to giue them peace, and to pardon their faults past: Hee presented them before his Maiestie, where all of them vpon their knees craued pardon and peace, by the mouth of the foresaid Seigneur of Gallagne, who spake for them all, saying:

Sir, We are sent from all the reformed Churches of France, and the Soueraignty of Berne, most humbly to craue (in their names) peace of your Maiestie, and with their humbled more then our bodies, we beseege by the same, most humbly beseeching you to believe that the false reports which were dispersed amongst vs, of the designs your Maiestie had against our religion, haue plunged vs in these miseries: we desire not to palliate the crime, we confesse our felues guilty: wherefore we present our selues vnto your Maiestie to craue pardon, and humbly beseech you to receive vs into grace, and after the example of God (whose image you are) to haue a regard to our infirmities & to yeeld fomthing to the feare we had to lose the liberty of our consciences oppressed: The more culpable your Maiestie shall find vs, the more place shall you haue to imploy your Clemency. How the great your Maiesties father, hath vied our seruise; hath trusted vs, and hath

A Ioued vs, we humbly beseech you that as heire to his royall vertues, so you would cary the like affection towards vs, and not to distinguish vs hereafter from your other subiects, but by the seruice we shall doe you. For thereby Sir we pretend to let your Maiestie see that none can be more then we are, your most humble, and most obedient subiects and seruants.

The King answered, that he willingly pardoned them, vpon condition they should be wiser hereafter then they had bene, that they should be good subiects to him, and he would be a very good King to them. After which they approached neere vnto the King one after another, to make their submissions: first, the Seigneur of Calogne, then the Deputies of Seuennes, after them Viez, and Nismes, and lastly they of Montpellier, all which the King receiued according to his accustomed clemency, and then causing them to rise, he commanded the Seigneur Herbaux to reade a Declaration which he had caused to be made for the peace. The same day after dinner, the Constable entred into Montpellier with the Marshalls of Crequi and Bassompierre, and foure thousand Souldiers, who seized vpon the Ports, Magazines, Cannons, and two of the chiefe Bastions. The Grand Prouost hauing caused the Kings decree touching peace to be solemnly proclaimed in the Kings quarter and trenches, hee entred into Montpellier and did the like; and the Harbin-gers went and marked out their lodgings for the Court, after the accustomed manner.
The next day being the 21 of October, the Souldiers which were within the towne came forth in very good order, being twelue hundred in number, who were receiued by Monsieur de la Courte, and part of the Kings horse, and were conducted whither they desired.

After dinner the King entred in armes with his whole Court. His reception was stately:
considering the shortnesse of time, and the difficulties of warre; all their rich hangings and precious mouables which they had hidden for feare of a sacke, were now brought forth, and set to view to honor this happy entry. They stroue to expresse their duties, the ioy was general, and nothing was heard, but the acclamations of the inhabitants of both sexes, who cried continually, God save the King. The Consuls being accompanied with the best inhabitants of the towne, came to meete him, witnessing by the speech they made vnto his Maiestie, that they were much grieved to haue offended him, and besought him (in presenting the keys of the Towne, themselves, and their liues) to extend his mercy vnto them, and not to punish their crimes, and the transgressions of his lawes with other armes then those of his Clemency and Pity. His Maiestie granted what they demanded, vpon condition that hereafter they should be faithfull, and neuer take armes against his seruice vpon any pretext whatsoever: That they should suffer their new fortifications to be razed, their defences ruined, and their ditches filled vp, till the which were done and accomplished, they should haue three Regiments in Garrison, and should obey whatsoever did concerne his Maiesties seruice.

Viez which hath the title of a Duchy, would no longer persist in her disobedience, but submitted in imitation of Montpellier, and for the better assurance, consented the Castle should be razed and the fortifications demolished. The Towne of Nismes followed their example. The Duke of Rohan was left Gouernor of these two townes, and of Milhaud, yet could he not put in any garrison. Many other townes desired to be numbred amongst the obedient, and of those which would not contradict the Kings will. In the meane time Commissioners were sent to all the Courts of Parliament, to carie the declaration of peace, and to haue it verified, the tenure whereof followeth.

The Articles of the Peace.

I. THAT the Edict of Nantes, Declarations, and fecret Articles enrolled in our Courts D of Parliament, fhall be faithfully obferued to our fubiects of the Reformed Religion, in all points as they haue enioyed them during the reigne of the deceased King our Lord and Fa- ther, and fince our comming to the Crowne, before thefe laft alterations.

II. That the exercife of the Catholique and Romifh Religion, fhall be reftored in all places of this Realme, and Countreys of our obedience, where it hath beene intermitted, to be freely continued without any trouble.

III. We exprefly forbid all perfons of what eftate and condition foeuer, vpon paine of pnnifh- ment, as breakers of the peace, and troublers of the publique quiet, to moleft or trouble Clergy- men in the celebration of Diuine Service, and in the enioying of the Offices, Fruits, and Re- uenues of their Benefices, and all other rights which belong vnto them.

IV. And in like manner the exercife of the reformed Religion fhall be reftored againe in thofe places where it hath beene, according to our Edicts and Grants, and the Seats of Iuflice, Offices of Receipt, and Officers of the Treafure, fhall be reftored to the fame eftate they were in before thefe laft troubles, except the Chamber of Nerae, which fhall bee fettled where wee fhall thinke good, hauing heard the complaints of the Deputies of our Province of Guienne.

V. Our pleafure is, that all new fortifications of Townes, Castles, Forts, and others held by our fubiects of the Reformed Religion, and efppecially thofe which haue beene made in the Iflands of Rie and Oleron, fhall be razed and demolifhed, the old walls, towers, ports, ditches, and counterfcarpes, remaining in their former eftate, forbidding all townes to forfike any more: And for the execution of the faid demolifhments, fome of the chiefe inhabitants of the faid Townes fhall be deliuered in hofage to fuch as we fhall pleafe to appoint.

VI. To the end that the Officers of our Crowne, and others depuied, may execute the com- ments hereof, according to the inftructions which fhall be giuen them: our meaning is, that all Townes held by them of the Religion, which within fixteene dayes after the publication of thefe prefents, fhall fubmit themfelues to our obedience, and open their gates willingly vnto vs, fhall enioy the contents of this prefent Declaration.

VII. We exprefly forbid our fubiects of the Reformed Religion, all sorts of Affemblies, Circles,

A Circles, Councels, Abridgement of Synods, and all other of what quality foeuer, vpon paine of Treafon, if they haue not exprefly leane from vs: But they are only allowed Affemblies of Con- fiftories, Conferences, and Synods for matters concerning the government and difcipline of the faid Reformed Religion: forbidding them exprefly to treat of any other politique affaire.

VIII. Our faid fubiects of the reformed Religion, fhall be difcharged and freed from all acts of hofility and from all Affemblies and Circles, and from all other things whatfoeuer contained in the 76 and 77 Articles of our Edict of Nantes, from the first of Ianuary 1621, vntill this prefent.

IX. And for what hath happened at Prinas, we will that a particular abolition thereof B be made vnto the inhabitants of the faid place, and vnto the Seigneur of Brifon.

X. And concerning the Accomplables and other officers in matters belonging to their char- ges, we will that the 78 and 79 Articles of the Edict of Nantes, fhall be wholly kept and obferued.

XI. Likewise for the indgements, sentences, and condemnations, made againft them of the reformed religion, which haue borne armes, We will that they be therof difcharged according to the 58, 59, and 60 Articles of the faid Edict.

XII. So also we ratifie and confirme all indgements giuen by Iudges ordained by the Gouer- nors of Provinces, either in ciuill or criminall caufes, and the executions which haue followed amongft thofe of their party, and the faid Iudges to be freed from all pursuits in that behalf: C impofing perpetuall fentence to our Profectors Generall, their Subftitutes, or any other that may pretend intereff.

XIII. Our pleafure is, that all prifoners on both fides, which haue not payd their ranfomes, fhall be freely fet at liberty; and all promifes made for ranfomes which haue not beene dis- charged before the day of the date hereof, fhall be void and of no effect.

XIV. That all perfons of what quality and condition foeuer, fhall be reftored to their goods, names, actions, honours, and dignities, whereof they haue beene deprived, by reason of thefe prefent troubles, notwithstanding all gifts and confiscations which haue beene made, except mili- tary charges: And fuch as haue willingly treated, or to whom wee meane to giue fome re- compence.

XV. We ordaine that this prefent Declaration fhall be entertained and kept by all our fub- iects according to the forme fet downe in the eight Article of our Edict of Nantes: and that D Commiffioners of both Religions, fhall be fent by vs into all the Provinces, to fee the contents therof put in execution. Commanding all our Courts of Parliament, and all other Iuftices and Officers to whom it fhall appertaine, to caufe thefe prefents to be read, regiftred, and enrolled, and to be inuicably obferued and kept, without any contravention, for fuch is our pleafure. Given in our Campe at Montpellier the nineteenth of October, 1622. and the 13 of our Reigne. Signed Lewis.

Monfieur de Fiat being fent with this Declaration vnto the Court of Parliament at Pa- ris, the Duke of Rohan gaue him this Letter following to the Duke of Montbazon.

My Lord, your * firft fonne in law hath endeoured to ruine our * Houfeyour * fecond hath procured vs peace and confirmed it; and for my part I am fo fatisfied with him, and find my felfe fo much bound vnto him, as I fhall openly declare my felfe vnthankfull, if I fhould euer fhew my felfe other then his moft humble feruant: Ofa delinquent I am be- come a fauorite, wherein he hath not a little furthered mee: And I muft needs confeffe that I am more obliged to the Kings goodneffe then any man elfe in this kingdom, there- fore he may affure himfelfe I will neuer faile in my duty towards him. Monfieur de Fiat will further enforme you of all matters, vnto whole relation I referre my felfe, and in life F and death will remaine your Lordships moft humble Cousin and moft affectionate fer- uant, De Rohan.

As for the particular Articles granted vnto the Duke of Rohan, the fubftance of them was this: 1. That the D. of Rohan fhould haue the Duchy of Vallois by way of engage- ment for 60000 pound Sterling, to be paid at one entire payment, which Duchy fhould be of the value of three thoufand pound Sterling yearly rent: and withall hee fhould haue twenty thoufand pound Sterling in hand, in recompence of his government in Poitou, and other particular gouernments of Saint Iohn D'Angely, Saint Maxant, Mallizaits, Melle, and for the Abbey of Lor in Poitiers: That hee should haue the gouernment of Niimes, and Vice, without Garifons: That his Pension and his brothers should be restored, and that the Seigneur of Calonge should haue six hundred pound sterling yearly pension.

2, That Rochel and Montauban should remaine Townes of suretie for three yeares, and haue nothing demolished.

3, That all the new fortification of Montpellier should bee razed: That hereafter the Consuls should be named by the D. of Montmorency, according to the Kings pleasure, that is to say, two of either Religion: That in all other things the Kings will should be obeyed, and there should be no more townes of safetie, Hostage, or Mariage: That all B Gouernours should hold their gouernments of the King onely, and not of the said Churches, and without any Garifons, but such as it should please his Maiestie to appoint.

Institution of a new Regiment of light-horse.

Thus the Peace is concluded at Montpellier, where the King stayed six dayes: during the which many new Regiments came vnto him; but hauing no further employment, he cashiered some, and entertained others: hee also cast all the light-horse, taking from the Princes their Companies, and instituting a new Regiment of Horse, consisting of fiftene companies which should be commanded by Gentlemen chosen by his Maiesty, to prevent the disorders which hapned daily vpon the first discontent of any Prince, who falling from his obedience, carried his company with him: which done, the King leauing Monseur Valence in Montpellier with forty Companies of foot, to see the fortifications razed, he went to visit his chiefe Townes of Prouence, Dauphine, and Lionois.

The disposition of the Kings Fleet.

The Peace was not yet proclaimed before Rochel, nor any surcease of Armes: The Earle of Soissons kept them from all commerce by land; and shot into the Towne at random, and greatly ruined their Houses. The D. of Guise meant to doe the like by sea, wherein they had their greatest hope. He appointed a Rendezvous for the whole Fleet at Blauet, called Port Lewis. He attended three great Gallions from Marfeilles, and one from Malta. But the D. fearing that winter would approach, the time would be vnsafefonable, and the Roads bad in those parts, he refused to goe and fight with them, and not stay for the Leuant ships, but contrarie winds kept him in the Harbor. During the which the said Leuant ships came vnto him about the end of September. Hee then gaue order for the fight, and diuided his fleet into three bodies. The first was commanded by Monfieur de Saint Luc, Gouernor of Brouage, being Vice-Admirall, hauing ten ships, and two Pinaces. The second commanded by Monfieur de Guise, being in number sixteene ships, and two Pinaces. The third body contained six ships, and two Pinaces, commanded by Monfieur de Marly. Before these were three Squadrons; the first consisting of ten Gallies. The second Squadron of two & twenty Pinaces, in which M. de Rochefoucault was with 1200 footmen. In the third Squadron were three Pinaces, commanded by the Marquis of Afferac.

Hauing thus disposed of the Fleet, about the nineteenth of October, the winde being fauourable, they began to set sayle: but changing suddenly, they were forced to stay in the Road of Bel-Ile, and on the five and twentieth, they came in fight of the Ile of Rie, E where the calme made them cast Anchor, so as they could not approach the enemy by two leagues. There they concluded of the manner of their fight. On the seven and twentieth, hauing little winde, the Gallies approached towards the Rochellers who lay at Anchor about a league from Saint Martin de Rie, being about 70 ships: who seeing the Gallies approach, and the whole Fleet in sight, they set sayle; but the calme was so great, and the Tyde against them, as the Kings Fleet was forced to cast anchor a league from them. In the meane time the Gallies came within Cannon-shot of the Rochellers, hauing commandement not to engage themselves too farre. The Duke of Guise refused to goe and discover their Armie, commanding the Earle of Joigny to send him a Gallie, and in the meane time he tooke a barge, being accompanied by the Earle of Rochefoucault and foure or five Gentlemen, vntill he met with the Gally, with the which hee approached neere vnto the Rochellers, as well to haue the better opportunitie to fight with them, as to discover the burthen of their ships and their Ordnance. The fight grew hot, as the Rochellers were forced to cast anchor, in regard of the calme, in three diuided Squadrons: but the winde growing fresh about one of the clocke after noone, they set sayle againe; and giuing way to the aduantage which the Gallies had by their Cannon, retired by little and little.

The

A The Duke of Guise thinking them to be disordered and in feare, held it fit to packe on all their failles to fight with them. And to this end he commanded Bouc, Sergeant Maior of the Armie to bring on the best failers as they came, without any Order: vsing all diligence, to the end they might fight with them. Monfieur de Saint Luc, being gone about some Commission to the Rereward, could not recover his Ship, but many others were gone before him; to whom hee sent commandement to attend him; which some did, and others continued on their course, so as hee shot two pieces of Ordnance after them, and made their retire: The which hee did, as well to maintaine the first ranke which was due vnto his Charge, as to prevent all aduantages which the Rochellers might B get by the Fleets being thus scattered. The Duke of Guise recovered his Gallion, and the Rochellers got the winde, so as they must fight with them vpon disadvantage. Monfieur de Saint Luc crept vp the winde all he could, being onely assisted by two ships, the rest fell all to lee-wards, and could onely helpe them with their Cannon a farre off, and by the Gallies, who likewise plyed them with their Ordnance, as long as they might doe it without annoying their owne company. In the meane time, the two Ships which were got into the winde with Monfieur de Saint Luc, were boarded by foure or five of the Rochellers, one of which was sunke, and in one of the two ships, the Cheualier de Cuges Captaine thereof was slaine: this combat lasted vntill one clocke at night, before they were cleared one from another.

C In the meane time Monfieur de Saint Luc, continued the fight alone with the Rochellers Admirall, and Vice-Admirall, followed by their whole Fleet, the space of an houre and a halfe: the Admirall attempting twice to board him, and the Vice-Admirall thrice; but hee plyed them so with Cannon, and Musket, that they fell off againe without grappling: and so it hapned with other foure of their tallest Ships, of which some had laid him aboard. But a fift Ship of foure hundred Tunnes, being more eager then the rest to board him, was so entertained, as after hee had vngarled himselfe, and was full of water, which would gladly haue runne aground at Rie, but could not for it sunke by the way.

Now Monfieur de Guise (seeing Monfieur de Saint Luc so farre engaged) had fetched such a compasse about with fowerall boardings, as hee had gotten into the winde more then all the rest of the Fleet which followed him, and so much desired to succour him, that hee alone without staying for any other, turned short vpon the Enemy (although the rest of his Fleet were stil to lee-ward) and thrust himselfe amongst the thickest of them; which the Admirall of the Rochellers perceiuing, hee turned towards him with all their Fleet (except their Vice-Admirall, with ten other vessels, which were in fight with Monfieur de Saint Luc) and bringing vwith them two ships full of fire-works, hee found the meanes whilst they were in fight, to fasten their ships to the poope of his Gallion: so as on a sudden the fire working his effect, burst out all ouer the said two ships, to the vnderment of all the Kings Fleet how the Duke of Guise could free himselfe from them, which in the end, notwithstanding all the enemies Cannon and Musket shot, by his great diligence and valour he effected, and quenched the fire also which had taken hold of his owne ship. This combat lasted about an houre, and was so hotly pursued as many of the Rochellers were slaine, at the push of the pike by them aboard the Admirall. Hauing thus cleared himselfe, hee passed through their whole Fleet.

During this, the Kings Fleet following the said rout vvhich the Duke of Guises ship tooke, cauled the Rochellers Vice-Admirall, and the other ten ships vvhich assailed M. de Saint Luc all this vvhile, and were grappled vnto him, to leaue the combat. As soone as hee was freed, and had gotten to the head of the Fleet. Hee set so furiously againe vpon the Rochellers, euen as they were about to reuinite themselves, as the Vice-Admirall, and his Squadron were forced to separate themselves from the rest, and sayle before the wind F vnto Rochel, and the Admirall with the rest to plie vp into the vvinde to recouer Rie: so the night fauouring their retreat, protected them from further losse; the combat hauing lasted vntill one a clocke within night; the darknesse did much endamage the Kings Fleet with boarding and shooting one at another. In this conflict were slaine aboard the Duke of Guises Gallion, the Seigneur of Vinciguerre, with some other Gentlemen and Officers.

The Duke of Guise vwith the vvhole Fleet, anchored in the place vvhich this fight was, the which was very furious, and continued from the morning till fix a clocke at night, A second fight.

night, in which they write were spent 20000 great shot. The Rochellers retired to Saint Martins Road, vnder the fauour of their Forts, and couered with many shelles and barres, where no great Ships could enter but with danger to runne aground. They write that in this battell there were not aboue foure hundred men slaine and hurt on the Kings side, but two thousand slaine and hurt of the Rochellers, and diuers of their Ships sunke.

The Duke of Guise being still resolu'd to charge the Enemy, commanded the General of the Gallies (for that the Ships could not aduance by reason of the great calme) to assault them where they lay. They met with the Vice-Admirall, caried by the Tide along the Coast of the Ile of Re, which they battered so with their Cannon, as the ranne aground hauing lost many men. After this they were ouertaken by a storme, so the Kings Fleet was forced to stay many dayes at L'Eguillon, and the Gallies went to seeke shelter at Brouage. The storme being past, the Duke went to set vpon them in Saint Martins Road, but could not draw them forth, so as after many Cannon shot, the winde being contrary, he was forced to leaue them.

Three dayes after, the Duke gaue order to passe the Flats which couered them, commanding Adm: de Saint Lus to take the head of the Fleet, and to ioyne with them if he could: According to this order, hauing past the danger by sound, and spent aboue foure thousand shot on both sides: the Rochellers, as they write, were ready to runne aground to save themselves, hauing no other meanes to escape: but the winde growing contrary, the Kings Fleet was forced to retire.

The Rochellers seeing their ruine apparent, and not to be auoided, came the same night to offer their Standard to the Duke of Guise, beseeching him to suffer them to enioy the benefit of the Peace which it had pleased the King out of his bounty to giue them. The next day Gittin their Admirall brought his fagge vnto the Duke, with assurance to disarm, & to satisfe all the other Articles which were enioyned them by his Maiestie, in regard of the said Peace, according to the order vvhich he had receiued from the Maior and Towne-houfe of Rochel.

After this submission, they were stayed three dayes before they could make their retreat by reason of a tempest. On the fourth day, they passed vnder the Lee of the Kings Armie, and saluted it with their Cannon, carrying neither Flags nor Ensignes, and so retired within the Chaine, and vpon the Owle of Rochel. The Kings Ships went to winter in Britanie, and the Gallies in Brouage and Tonne Charante.

This Discourse of the Nauies, my Author faith, was sent him from a man of qualitie, who was in the Kings Fleet, and one of the first in all fights. I haue done what I could to haue all other aduertisements of these encounters by Sea, from those of the Religion which liue in this towne, but could not be assisted, and therefore I must leaue the censure of the Truth, to the iudicious Reader, hauing discharged my dutie as faithfully as I could.

According to their Relation, there were many men of name slaine in these conficts. E Of the Rochellers side the Seigneurs of Plomb, of Loille, of Coudray, of Merande the elder, all foure of Rochel. Moreouer, Lannay of Cane; Emanuel a Norman; Captaine La Porte of Loudun; the Seigneur of Queris, and of S. John D'Angely: all these they write were slaine in one Ship; & Tessere a Councillor of Rochel was taken prisoner there. As for the Kings Fleet, they write, there perished not any one Ship, neither did they lose many men of command; onely the Seigneur of Vinceguerre, and the Cheualier de Cuge, Beaulieu Persay, Captain of a Gally, and de L'Isle Lieutenant to Monsieur de Valence. The peace hauing preferred the rest of the Rochellers Fleet, they gaue publike testimonies of their ioy both by word and writing, as may appeare by this following Letter, which the Mayor and Sheriffs of Rochel wrote to the Earle of Soissons.

My Lord, as our vowes & earnest prayers to God, haue a long time preuented the good newes of the Peace, which it hath pleased the King out of his bounty to giue vs; so wee beseech you to beleuee, that not onely the actions of thanks to his Maiestie for this singular benefit, haue presently followed the happy aduertisements which came vnto vs, and that at that instant we haue shewed all signes of ioy and deuotion, and haue made no stay of the publication thereof, which we haue performed with all kinds of publike acclamations. Wee were bound thereunto for many considerations; but especially by the natural obedience

A obedience which we owe vnto our King, which shall alwayes bee preferred before our priuat interest, especially which he provides for the liberie of our Conscience as he promiseth to doe. We hope, my Lord, presently to renew the assurances by your Deputies, which we meane to send vnto his Maiestie to that end, who shall not depart before they haue the honour to kisse your hands, and receiue your commendements. In the meane time we beseech you to take in good part, as it were by way of anticipation, the priuat submissions which shall be made vnto you on our behaile by the Seigneurs of Lalicu, Beaulieu, Pyneau, and Lamoignon of the body of our Towne: Beithel, La Londe, Parnau, and Olivier, Burgeses, whom we send expressly to your Excellencie to acquaint you with what hath hitherto past vpon signification of this happy newes.

B Wee humbly beseech you, not to suffer this Peace to bee interrupted by any alteration which might distemper mens minds; but contrariwise, so to dispose of all things, not onely for the publication of the said peace in your Armie; but also for the sincere execution of the contents thereof, as well by Sea as Land, as wee for our parts will be careful, to obserue whatsoeuer depends of vs, and to witnesse that wee are of vs his Maiesties most humble Subiects and serpents, and that we particularly honour with all affections the Princes of his Blood, amongst the which my Lo: wee know the rank you hold, and the interest which all France hath, that so precious a bud of the Flower-de-luce; should be esteemed, and preferred, for the which wee will pray to Almighty God, as your most humble and obedient seruants; the Maior, Sheriffe, Peeres, Burgeses, and Inhabitants of Rochel, the sixteenth of Nouember 1622.

C The Earle of Soissons, according to the order he had receiued from the King, hauing caused the Peace to be published, dismissed his Armie. The Regiment of Champagne, with twenty complete Companies, vnder the command of Arnault their Campe-Master, were left in garison in Port Lewis, which was munitioned with viuals, and all other things necessary; the which troubled the Rochellers, and made them send often vnto the King to be freed thereof. What succeeded you must heare hereafter.

D This with the conclusion of the Peace (which was so pleasing to all France in generall, but especially to the poore afflicted Church of the Religion) I will end the continuation of this History. I know I haue vnder taken a taske will be subiect to much controuersie, hauing treated of a subiect which we haue scene with our eyes, so as some who presume to haue had good intelligences of these actions which haue past, will haply contradict mee, and tax me with mistakings. But they must accept of this answer, that I haue added nothing of mine owne, but can bring my Authors for my varrant, if they haue erred, either transported with passion, or abused with mis-reports and false instructions; the fault is not mine: Neither doe I doubt but other mens relations, which shall speake most confidently, will be subiect to the like constructions. I haue done my best endeavour, and haue related euery thing with as much modestie as I could, no way inclining to any party; but only to set downe briefly (being tyed to strict bounds in this Continuation) what hath been written by my authors, whom I haue found to be altogether Royalists. I haue much desired to haue had information from them of the religion, wherein I intreated some friends to employ their credits, but could receiue no assistance.

Wherefore if in these my painfull employments, I shall giue the Reader any content and satisfaction, I haue the reward I expected, in being throwed from the Detraction of maleuolent tongues.

FINIS.

Soissons dis-misseth his Armie.
